

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF # AMERICAN LITERATURE

REVISED EDITION

1607 to the Present

Marshall Boswell
and Carl Rollyson

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

1607–TO THE PRESENT

About the Editors

Brett Barney is research assistant professor at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln's Center for Digital Research in the Humanities. He has contributed to the Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition Online and is senior associate editor of the Walt Whitman Archive. He has written on Whitman and nineteenth-century popular culture.

Lisa Paddock has written scholarly articles on literature for Mississippi Quarterly, Massachusetts Studies in English, and other journals. She is the coauthor, with Carl Rollyson, of Susan Sontag: The Making of an Icon, Herman Melville A to Z, and The Brontes A to Z.

Matthew J. Bruccoli has written or edited 100 volumes on American literature and is president of Bruccoli Clark Layman Publishers and Manly, Inc. He is Emily Brown Jefferies Professor of English, Emeritus, at the University of South Carolina.

George Parker Anderson is a senior editor at Bruccoli Clark Layman Publishers and Manly, Inc. He is the principal in-house editor for the Documentary Series of the Dictionary of Literary Biography.

Judith S. Baughman is the author of Literary Masters: F. Scott Fitzgerald, editor of American Decades: 1920-1929, and coeditor of books on Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, John Hall Wheelock, James Dickey, and Nelson Algren.

Carl Rollyson is professor of English at Baruch College and has written biographies and articles on 20th-century writers, including William Faulkner, Lillian Hellman, Norman Mailer, and Martha Gellhorn.

Marshall Boswell is professor of English at Rhodes College. He is the author of John Updike's Rabbit Tetralogy and Understanding David Foster Wallace, as well as works of fiction.

Assigning editors for are:

Park Bucker, assistant professor of English, University of South Carolina, Sumter

Darlene Harbour Unrue, professor of English, University of Nevada, Las Vegas

John Unrue, professor of English, University of Nevada, Las Vegas

Planning Advisory Board for the Encyclopedia of American Literature

Sandra Adell, professor of literature in the Department of Afro-American Studies, University of Wisconsin

Matthew J. Bruccoli, professor of English, emeritus, University of South Carolina

Emory Elliott, professor of English, University of California, Irvine

Richard Layman, vice president of Bruccoli Clark Layman/Manly, Inc.

Wendy Martin, chair and professor of American literature and American studies at Claremont Graduate University

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

1607—TO THE PRESENT

Revised and Augmented by

Susan Clair Imbarrato

Brett Barney

George Parker Anderson

Judith S. Baughman

Matthew J. Bruccoli

Marshall Boswell

from the first edition prepared by

Carol Berkin

Lisa Paddock

Carl Rollyson

Matthew J. Bruccoli and Richard Layman

Editorial Directors

Elizabeth Leverton

Series Editor

Encyclopedia of American Literature, Volume I: Settlement to the New Republic, 1607–1815

Copyright © 2002 by Carol Berkin © 2008 by Manly, Inc.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or by any information storage or retrieval systems, without permission in writing from the publisher. For information contact:

Facts On File, Inc.
An imprint of Infobase Publishing
132 West 31st Street
New York NY 10001

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of American literature. —2nd ed.
v. cm.

Rev. and augmentation of: 1st ed. Vol. 1 / prepared by Carol Berkin; vol. 2 / prepared by Lisa Paddock; vol. 3 & vol. 4 / prepared by Carl Rollyson.

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

Contents: Vol. I: Settlement to the new republic 1607–1815 / edited by Susan Clair Imbarrato and Carol Berkin — vol. II: The age of Romanticism and realism 1816–1895 / edited by Brett Barney and Lisa Paddock — vol. III: Into the modern 1896–1945 / edited by George Parker Anderson, Judith S. Baughman, Matthew J. Bruccoli and Carl Rollyson — vol. IV: The contemporary world 1946 to the present / edited by Marshall Boswell and Carl Rollyson.

eISBN: 978-1-4381-0992-3

1. American literature—Encyclopedias. I. Facts On File, Inc.

PS21 .E533 2007

810'.3—dc22

2007025662

Facts On File books are available at special discounts when purchased in bulk quantities for businesses, associations, institutions, or sales promotions. Please call our Special Sales Department in New York at (212) 967-8800 or (800) 322-8755.

You can find Facts On File on the World Wide Web at <http://www.factsonfile.com>

Text design by Rachel L. Berlin
Cover illustration by Smart Graphics
Cover design by Cathy Rincon

Printed in the United States of America

VB FOF 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

CONTENTS

|                               |      |
|-------------------------------|------|
| Acknowledgments               | vii  |
| Preface to the Second Edition | ix   |
| Introduction                  | xi   |
| Editorial Plan                | xv   |
| Chronology 1607–Present       | xvii |
| Entries A to Z                | 1    |
| Selected Bibliography         | 1253 |
| Contributors                  | 1259 |

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The editor thanks Facts On File and Professor Emory Elliott, University of California at Riverside, for extending the opportunity to compile and to revise this volume, an exciting and stimulating enterprise. I also thank and acknowledge the excellent editing and kind assistance of Penny Hope and Elizabeth Leverton, whose good humor and astonishing organization sustained this project. This volume also owes a debt to its initial compiler and author, Dr. Carol Berkin, for providing the foundation upon which this current volume has been expanded. Thank you, as well, to James Bense, professor of English at Minnesota State University at Moorhead, for his enthusiastic support, and to the staff at the MSUM Livingston Lord Library for assistance with resources. To my students, I have appreciated discussing these materials and benefiting from their insightful responses. From the classroom to the edited volume, I continue to gain new appreciation for this rich literary and historical period extending from Settlement to the New Republic (1607–1815).

—S. C. I.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

This four-volume Encyclopedia of American Literature is a thorough revision of the three-volume work published by Facts On File in 2002. It adds more than one thousand entries, some four hundred thousand words, and a new volume to the original work. Some one million books have been published in the United States since the first edition of EAL appeared; among them are many that require recognition in the encyclopedia, both as primary and secondary resources, some by writers who had not yet published five years ago.

The revised and updated work differs from its predecessor in these respects: 1) entries have been added to reflect the emergence of significant authors, current scholarship, and student interest; 2) bibliographies have been reworked and updated to include newly published primary and secondary works; 3) the scope has been expanded from 2001 to 2007; 4) chronologies, which provide the social, political, and literary context for the encyclopedia, have been substantially expanded; 5) study guides have been added for most frequently studied authors and literary topics to aid students in organizing their approach to literary appreciation; 6) illustrations have been added to mark and elucidate entries and major figures; 7) epigraphs, taken from writers' works or interviews, have been added to entries on significant figures; and 8) corrections have been made, as necessary.

A circumstance too often ignored by compilers of literary reference works is the ever-changing landscape of the literary world. The usefulness of a reference book is, in large part, determined by the currency of its information. With this augmented, revised, and corrected edition, the editors of Encyclopedia of American Literature undertake to accomplish what all who prepare reference works should aspire to: currency, accuracy, relevance, and maximum utility. It is a work in progress.

Matthew J. Bruccoli
Richard Layman
Editorial Directors

INTRODUCTION

Referencing the literature and events of the earliest moments of contact with the North American continent to the establishment of the early Republic, this revised first volume of the Encyclopedia of American Literature includes more than three hundred entries that invite readers to explore the literary history of early America. In response to the expanding canon of early American literature, approximately one hundred of these entries are new.

Perhaps more than any other period in American literary history, the literature of 1607 to 1815 engages students in interdisciplinary study. Students must familiarize themselves with the historical background of their subjects, learning about the physical and material cultures in which early Americans lived, in order to better understand the literature of the period, its place in history (including the compelling story of America's turn from a literature of the Old World to one decidedly of the New), and the value of early American literature in present times. The compilers of this volume have taken into account both the social influences—economics, religion, science, foodways, geography, politics, and printing—and the literary elements, such as symbol, image, voice, and narrative, of the period. Yet, however helpful it is to understand cultural context when examining literature, the focus of this series lies in the realm of literature—and, therefore, volume one specifically examines the journals, sermons, essays, poems, pamphlets, and novels that have played significant roles in the first two hundred years of the nation's developing literary tradition.

Because the early American experience is characterized by the establishment of the nation's independence, volume one includes expressions of rebellion—the religious dissent of Roger Williams and the fiery political essays of Thomas

Paine, for example—as well as calls for cohesion—John Winthrop's "A Modell of Christian Charity," a sermon delivered in 1630; and Timothy Dwight's Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts (1794). The volume makes it clear that America was settled by immigrants of all classes, creeds, and ethnicities, by both men and women, by the young and the elderly. In volume one students will find a multiplicity of views and voices and a range of literary forms, from the jeremiad (a type of sermon) to the sentimental novel.

CONTACT TO JAMESTOWN

In the entries that cover the initial contact and subsequent settlement of the North American continent by British and European explorers, from approximately 1492 to 1607, America is portrayed as a land of opportunity and, in some cases, as an idealized utopia. In letters, journals, histories, promotional tracts, and exploration narratives, lands and peoples are evaluated for potential expansion and wealth. Motivated to discover trade routes, to find exotic and valuable commodities, and to attract converts, explorers tended to describe the landscape according to its physical appearance. In Christopher Columbus's "Letter to Lord Raphael Sanchez, Treasurer to Ferdinand and Isabella King and Queen of Spain, on His First Voyage" (1493), for example, he observes, "The harbors of the sea here are such as you could not believe in without seeing them, and so the rivers, many and great, and good streams, the most of which bear gold. And the trees and fruits and plants have great differences from those of La Juana; in this there are many spices and great mines of gold and of other metals."

Such descriptions of the beauty and potential wealth of the New World encouraged further exploration by Spanish, French, and British explorers. Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, for example, provided this catalogue of wildlife in northern Florida in his Narrative of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca (1542): "There are deer of three kinds, rabbits, hares, bears, lions, and other wild beasts . . . Geese in great numbers. Ducks, mallards, royal-ducks, fly-catchers, night-herons and partridges abound." Further north, Samuel de Champlain explored the Hudson Bay area and noted in The Voyages of Samuel de Champlain, 1604–1618 on July 13, 1609: "There is also a great abundance of fish, of many varieties; among others, one called by the savages of the country Chaousarou, which varies in length, the largest being, as the people told me, eight or ten feet long." These reports describe fertile lands, teeming with wildlife and rich with valuable minerals. The persuasiveness of these so-called promotional tracts encouraged patrons to fund yet more journeys, and eventually, to invest in settlements. The resulting journals, books, and letters collectively indicate through their descriptions the presence of some four to five million indigenous peoples, who, speaking more than 350 different languages, had expertly managed these lands for centuries.

This volume recognizes the integral presence and valuable perspective of Native Americans; entries on tribes, such as the Iroquois, Narragansett, and Wampanoag; events, such as King Philip's War; and other aspects of Native American culture are included, and acts of generosity on the part of Native Americans is marked throughout early American texts. In his History of Plymouth Plantation (written between 1630 and 1650), William Bradford noted Samoset's assistance and Squanto's service as an interpreter to the Pilgrims in 1620 as "a special instrument of God for their good beyond expectation." Because native history was conveyed orally rather than by written records, an entry on oral Native American literature is included for further background.

As Native American lifestyles were disrupted by disease, war, and the appropriation of sacred land by early settlers, the drastic decline in their populations left the impression to the newly arrived colonists that the land was virtually empty and that its discovery was an act of divine providence. The Wampanoag, who made contact with European fishing boats in the 1500s, numbered between twelve and fifteen thousand in 1600. Due to epidemics from this contact, however, by 1620 their population was about five thousand. Bradford reflected on what he perhaps considered the good luck of the settlers when he wrote: "found a pond of clear, fresh water, and shortly after a good quantity of clear ground where the Indians had formerly set corn, and some of their graves." Immediately thereafter, they found a house and uncovered "divers fair Indian baskets filled with corn."

During the Great Migration of the 1630s, about fourteen thousand English Puritans journeyed to New England. As their ships continued to arrive, appearing at first as "floating islands," their large size suggested that the new visitors intended more than just fishing the coasts. The Encyclopedia of American Literature attempts to include significant events from the history and literature of Native Americans as it resists a simplified narrative of cultural displacement and allows the student to uncover the many complicated stages by which colonization took place.

As settlement and expansion increased contact between Anglo-Europeans and native peoples, territorial battles ensued. The continual vying for control by British, French, and Spanish over North American lands signaled that settlement and colonization of the New World was a multinational endeavor to expand empires and gain resources. In keeping with current study and teaching of this period, this volume includes entries on New England, New France, and New Spain. The ongoing colonization of the eastern seaboard from Virginia to New England that precipitated the Great Migration from the Old World to the New World was influenced by two primary motives: some pursued wealth, while others came to establish a New Jerusalem. As charters were granted, families and groups from similar locations migrated together and often shared similar beliefs and skills. Northern colonies became the destination for shipbuilders and Puritans, who named towns after those Old World places left behind, such as Exeter, Lynne, Plymouth, Salem, and York. The middle colonies attracted farmers and merchants of Protestant, Catholic, and Quaker persuasions seeking a refuge from persecution in Anglican England; they named colonies for their leaders and affiliations, such as Pennsylvania for William Penn and Maryland for Queen Henrietta Maria, wife of King Charles I. The southern colonies attracted merchants and aristocrats of Anglican faith and were generally considered the wealthiest colonies for their ability to produce cash crops, such as tobacco and rice, with increasing use of slave labor; colonies and towns in turn reflected loyalist affiliations, such as Virginia, for Queen Elizabeth (the Virgin Queen), Jamestown for King James, Charlestown, for King Charles. Ideology and climate played significant roles in distinguishing these regions as northern colonists tended to emphasize values of industry and self-examination; middle colonies reflected mercantile interests and tolerant attitudes; and the southern or "Staple" colonies encouraged mercantile endeavors, attracting witty and worldly settlers. In the century of exploration and migration marked by the arrival of Columbus and the settling of Jamestown, though the North American continent may have appeared initially as an obstacle, yet, it clearly became a source of new markets and revenues.

PLYMOUTH TO SALEM

Among the many reasons for migrating to America, refuge from religious persecution in England motivated those such as the Separatist Puritans, Catholics, and Quakers, who significantly contributed to the intellectual and social developments of the new colonies. Maryland, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania were all established in direct responses to these migrations. The founding of Harvard College in 1636 to train the Puritan clergy, for example, contributed to a rich literary history. Some examples of literature that express Puritan doctrine include the poetry of Anne Bradstreet, Michael Wigglesworth, and Edward Taylor. In their poems they illustrate the practice of self-examination that requires a vigilant self-scrutiny and demonstrates the doctrine of Divine Providence, whereby all events are predestined. In journals and sermons by William Bradford and John Winthrop, the importance of community is reinforced. Spiritual autobiography provides a record of the religious thinking of writers such as Increase Mather, Thomas Shepard, Elizabeth Ashbridge, and Jonathan Edwards. Energetic debates are documented in sermons and pamphlets, diaries, and journals in which the words and actions of rebels and dissenters such as Thomas Morton, Anne Hutchinson, and Roger Williams were examined and judged.

Repeated attempts to address changing attitudes in the Puritan community, such as the Half-Way Covenant of 1662, signaled that the once tightly knit community of saints was dissipating. Mary White Rowlandson's A True History of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682) thus not only describes her travails during a three-month captivity but also documents the territorial conflicts with the New England Native American tribes as second-generation Puritans expanded into the western frontiers of Massachusetts and Connecticut. In all of these events, issues of tolerance are raised and the capacity for assimilation is tested. Increasingly, the Puritan leadership appears inflexible. The Salem Witchcraft Trials, for example, have been interpreted by some historians as an implosion of the Puritan community, because it was incapable of allowing for divergent points of view. Inarguably, the 1692 trials mark a decrease of the Puritan influence that eventually gave way to a diverse proliferation of faiths and creeds throughout the colonies.

GREAT AWAKENING TO REVOLUTION

With a population of approximately 250,000 at the beginning of the eighteenth century, the American colonies grew to about 2.5 million by the time of the battles at Lexington and Concord in 1775. From the evangelical revivals of the 1730s and 1740s known as the Great Awakening to the political and cultural turmoil of the American Revolution in the 1770s, these four decades point to tremendous upheaval and a willingness to entertain new systems. From entries on subjects such as Jonathan Edwards, the Great Awakening, the Enlightenment, and the American Revolution, students may examine the motives and events that brought Methodism and other denominations to the colonies and engendered a new tolerance for religious practices. The entries on ballads and songs, loyalists and patriots, and the Federalist Papers and the Constitution indicate the range of issues that provoked and sustained the rebellion that led to a new nation.

Paul Revere's ride into the Massachusetts countryside to relay the message of the British advance captured the spirit of a people committed to gaining their sovereignty. The revolutionary period is marked by an exciting flurry of pamphlets and newspapers, poems, plays, and novels that aided the process and revealed the range of the colonists' expressions and emotions, from sorrow, to anger, to celebration. They also mark several turning points, as revealed in Ann Eliza Bleecker's "Written in the Retreat from Burgoyne," dated October 29, 1777, in which she poignantly writes about her family's escape from John Burgoyne's troops in the summer of 1777 and the subsequent death of her child: "Was it for this, with thee a pleasing load. / I sadly wander'd through the hostile wood; / When I thought fortune's spite could do no more, / To see thee perish on a foreign shore?" Even the American Revolution could not separate the colonists from the influence of British culture. It took the skills of pamphleteers such as Thomas Paine to make overtures of reconciliation an unacceptable option, as he states in Common Sense: "'Tis repugnant to reason, to the universal order of things, to all examples from former ages, to suppose that this continent can long remain a subject to any external power. . . . Reconciliation is now a fallacious dream. Nature hath deserted the connection and art cannot supply her place." The constituting of the new United States and the establishment of the New Republic in many ways inspired identity formation as well as nation building.

Poets described America as a land of new beginnings with high ideals and agrarian values, as in Joel Barlow's The Vision of Columbus (1787), Philip Freneau and Hugh Henry Brackenridge's "The Rising Glory of America" (1775), and Timothy Dwight's Greenfield Hill. In Phillis Wheatley's "Liberty and Peace" (1785), for example, she celebrates these events: "From every Tongue celestial Peace resounds: / . . . / Auspicious Heaven shall fill with fav'ring Gales, / Where e'er Columbia spreads her swelling Sails: / To every Realm shall Peace her Charms display, / And Heavenly Freedom spread her golden Ray." Drama distinctly expressed American themes and emphasized American virtue over corrupt British ways, as in Royall Tyler's The Contrast (1787); Mercy Otis Warren's The Adulateur (1773), The Defeat (1773), and The Group (1775). Broadside and pamphlets addressed taxation and representation, as in John Adams's A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law (1765); James Otis Jr.'s The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved (1764); John Dickinson's Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania (1768); Thomas Jefferson's A Summary View of the Rights of British America (1774); and, notably, Paine's Common Sense (1776).

While elevated, inspired rhetoric distinguishes this period of American writings, minority voices that questioned the hypocrisy of fighting for a limited freedom also emerged. Abigail Adams anticipated these new voices in a letter to her husband on March 31, 1776, as she awaited the Declaration and reminded him that as they compose "the new Code of Laws" that they "would Remember the Ladies." She advised, "Do not put such unlimited power into the hands of the Husbands. Remember all Men would be tyrants if they could. If perticular care and attention is not paid to the Ladies we are determined to foment a Rebellion, and will not hold ourselves bound by any Laws in which we have no voice, or Representation."

CONSTITUTION TO NEW REPUBLIC

After ten years of battle and various compromises, the Treaty of Paris in 1785 signaled the end to hostilities and made way for the Constitution in 1789. Colonial subjects found themselves in a remade world as American citizens. The hard-won peace ushered in a new era, a new government, and new battles to protect hard-won freedoms. The contradiction of keeping 15 percent of the American population enslaved in a country that declared its independence by insisting that "all men are created equal" drew criticism from within and abroad. The antislavery movement grew and found powerful support in slave narratives such as Olaudah Equiano's The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano; or Gustavus Vassa, the African (1789) and in scores of other slave narratives in the years before the Civil War.

The combined influences of the Great Awakening, the spiritual autobiography, and the slave narrative were powerful tools during this period evidenced by Equiano, as well as by such books as John Marrant's A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black (1785). In Wheatley's "On Being Brought from Africa to America" (1773), she called on Christians to acknowledge the hypocrisy of racial prejudice as a contradiction to key theological principles: "Some view our sable race with scourful eye, / 'Their colour is a diabolic die' / Remember, Christians, Negroes, black as Cain, / May be refin'd, and join th' angelic train." From personal narrative to poetry, the new work of the nation had clearly begun.

The sentimental novel, which found its first publication by an American in 1789, also developed and expanded during this period, and addressed moral and social themes, as in William Hill Brown's The Power of Sympathy (1789), Susanna Rowson's Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791), and Hannah Webster Foster's The Coquette (1797). The Gothic novels of Charles Brockden Brown, such as Wieland (1798) and Edgar Huntly (1799), adapted European modes and settings to an American locale. Women's rights and gender issues regarding voting, marriage, and property rights were championed throughout this postwar era, with Judith Sargent Murray's "On the Equality of the Sexes" (1779), The History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (1805), and Annis Boudinot Stockton's poems, such as "A Poetical Epistle, Addressed by a Lady of New Jersey, to Her Niece, upon Her Marriage" (1786) and "The Vision, an Ode to Washington" (1789). Entries such as the ones concerning these authors and works introduce and begin to illustrate the intelligence, strength, and literary talents of America's earliest advocates and Patriots.

* * *

This volume reaches into the nineteenth century just after the War of 1812, when the nation's precarious independence was in question. Exploration west was ongoing as Americans spread out across the prairies, while poets and authors entertained romantic views of the independent individual and celebrated the American landscape with its wondrous falls and canyons, along with its expansive plains and rugged Rockies. Although Columbus was disappointed by his initial contact with the West Indies when he realized it was not Asia, and while Lewis and Clark were frustrated by their failure to discover a convenient east-west water route, the readjustment that led to these and other discoveries became commonplace and served ultimately to inspire new voyages. The persistence and the work ethic of Americans unwilling to accept failure fostered a pragmatism evidenced in the works of Benjamin Franklin, who distinguished the American from the European aristocrat in Information to Those Who Would Remove to America (1794):

America, where people do not inquire concerning a Stranger, What is he? but, What can he do? If he has any useful Art, he is welcome; and if he exercises it, and behaves well, he will be respected by all that know him; but a mere Man of Quality, who, on that Account, wants to live upon the Public, by some Office or Salary, will be despis'd and disregarded. The Husbandman is in honor there, and even the Mechanic, because their Employments are useful.

This early emphasis upon the industrious and the pragmatic over the aristocratic and the privileged has provoked debate and invigorated discourse among scholars since the beginning of the republic. As the scholarship in the Sources rubrics for the entries in this volume makes clear, there is a remarkable range and depth in the study of early American literature.

EDITORIAL PLAN

Volume I: Settlement to the New Republic poses special challenges for the Encyclopedia of American Literature. First is the matter of definition—entries in this volume necessarily include writers whose works defy literary categorization because literature of the period was more broadly construed, including history, sermons, correspondence, diaries, and other forms. In some cases, significant literary figures were not even published during their lifetimes. We opted for an inclusive editorial policy. Second, there is the problem with availability of texts. Many eighteenth-century works are most readily available to students in anthologies, so here a particular effort has been made to identify key titles and to quote generously in entries to provide a sense of the literature. We have also made an effort to identify available modern texts, while indicating first publication information, as well.

Because literary careers do not fall neatly into chronological divisions, decisions have been made about the placement of authors in volumes. When, for example, a writer might be placed in volume I or volume II, placement has been based on the publication of the author's first important or successful book or play. Washington Irving is a case in point: while he began publishing in the period covered in volume I, his first significant work, The Sketch Book, was published in 1819–1820, the period covered in volume II, and so his entry appears there.

Small caps indicate cross-referenced entries within this volume; a comprehensive list of entries for all four volumes of the encyclopedia is provided at the end of each volume. Thus, in volume I the name Mercy Otis WARREN appears in small caps when it is first mentioned in an entry, but Washington Irving is presented in regular type. In “List of Entries” at the end of each volume, Irving is listed with a roman numeral II beside his name, indicating his placement in the second volume.

Entries on a major figure are followed by a primary bibliography listing the author's principal works and a Study Guide, which advises students how to research the author. The form of the Study Guide in this volume has been shaped to accommodate students' needs. Thus, a Recommended Writings rubric, not included in other volumes, is provided here for the benefit of students not familiar with the author's canon.

In the Works rubric, Early American Imprints reference numbers are provided to aid students in finding hard-to-locate texts, which are often most readily available in microform or in online databases. In the case of works that are included in the Early American Imprints collection but that have multiple reference numbers, such as periodicals, the numbers are omitted.

All new entries and revisions to the first edition have been provided by Susan Clair Imbarrato.

A note on the illustrations: Scholarship begins with primary materials—books, documents, letters, and notes that form the uninterpreted record of people's expression. The primary materials of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods present special difficulties to students. Many significant books of the time exist only in imperfect copies. The printing is sometimes primitive by modern standards; in some cases only damaged copies of important books survive. Many important documents were never printed and survive in manuscript form only. The paper is old, often torn and foxed; the writing is faded, many times cramped, and the calligraphy conforms to standards that we are unaccustomed to today. At the same time, one can get no closer to the people of the period than by examining the historical materials associated with them.

A sampling of illustrations from such materials has been included here so that students can get a sense of the challenges—and the delights—of archival research.

CHRONOLOGY

1607–PRESENT

1607

Jamestown colony in present-day Virginia is founded.

1608

Captain John Smith's A True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Noate as Hath Hapned in Virginia Since the First Planting of that Collony is printed in London; it omits the story of Smith's involvement with the Powhatan Indian woman Pocahontas.

1613

Samuel de Champlain, The Voyages of Mr. Champlain of Xaintongeois.

1616

John Smith's A Description of New England, a promotional tract enticing settlers to Virginia, is printed.

1619

The first meeting of the Virginia House of Burgesses occurs; it is the first representative assembly in the New World.

The first Africans arrive in Jamestown. Their legal status is ambiguous, as the first slave law does not appear in Virginia until 1660.

1620

The Mayflower arrives off the coast of present-day Massachusetts. The Pilgrims and other passengers on board compose the Mayflower Compact, a document binding them to form a government, and establish the Plymouth colony.

1624

The Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles by Captain John Smith is published and includes the romantic tale of Pocahontas.

1630

John Winthrop leads the Puritan migration to Massachusetts Bay and establishes Boston. While on board the ship Arbella, he reads his sermon "A Modell of Christian Charity" in which he encourages his fellow colonists to build "a city upon a hill."

1634

William Wood's New England's Prospect promotes colonization of the region.

1636

Harvard College is founded. It is named after the Puritan minister John Harvard who bequeathed the school his library and one-half of his estate.

1637

The Pequot War rages in New England.

Thomas Morton's New English Canaan, or New Canaan, is published and describes the Native Americans as "full of humanity."

1638

The first printing press in the English North American colonies begins operating in Boston.

Anne Hutchinson is tried and convicted of antinomianism (the belief that faith alone is necessary for salvation) and banished to present-day Aquidneck Island, Rhode Island, along with her family.

1640

The Whole Booke of Psalmes or The Bay Psalm Book is the first tome published in America.

1642–1649

The English Civil War occurs; the Royalists are defeated by the Parliamentarians.

1644

Roger Williams's The Bloudy Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience is published anonymously and advocates freedom of conscience. It is part of a series of direct responses to Puritan leader John Cotton, who supports persecution based upon personal beliefs.

1649

John Winthrop dies.

1650

William Bradford, the governor of the Plymouth Colony, finishes compiling History of Plymouth Plantation. (It does not appear in print until 1856.)

Anne Bradstreet's book of poems, The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America, is published in England without her knowledge or consent. It is the first book of poems printed by an early American colonist.

1652

Roger Williams, The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody.

1653

John Eliot's Catechism in the Indian Language is the first book printed in a Native American language.

1654

Edward Johnson's Wonder-working Providence of Sions Saviour in New-England is published. A history of Massachusetts Bay, it defends the Puritans as instruments of God's will.

1655

John Hammond's Leah and Rachel, or The two fruitfull sisters Virginia and Mary-land is printed as a promotional tract for those two Southern colonies.

1656

Puritans in Massachusetts Bay imprison and then banish the first Quakers to arrive in the colony. Legislation in 1658 bars the Quakers from holding their services or "meetings."

1657

William Bradford dies.

1659

Quakers William Robinson and Marmaduke Stephenson are hanged for refusing to leave Massachusetts. Mary Dyer, an antinomian and later a Quaker, is scheduled to hang with them but is reprieved at the last minute.

1660

Charles II is restored to the English throne.

On June 1 Mary Dyer is hanged after defying an expulsion order by returning to Boston.

1661

John Eliot translates the New Testament into the Algonquian language; he produces an Old Testament translation two years later.

1662

Michael Wigglesworth's The Day of Doom is an immensely popular poem. Called the first American best-seller, it sells 1,800 copies in its first year, and by 1751 it is in its seventh printing.

1664

English forces take New Amsterdam and rename the colony New York in honor of the Duke of York, the future James II.

1666

John Eliot, The Indian Grammar Begun, or An Essay to Bring the Indian Language into Rules: For the Help of Such as Desire to Learn the Same, for the Furtherance of the Gospel among Them.

1669

New-Englands Memoriall: or, A Brief Relation of the Most Memorable and Remarkable Passages of the Providence of God, Manifested to the Planters of New-England in America; With Special Reference to the First Colony Thereof, Called New-Plimouth, by Nathaniel Morton, is the first comprehensive history of the region.

1670

The Hudson's Bay Company is incorporated in London with the express purpose of finding a northwest passage to the Pacific Ocean and establishing trading posts on lands adjacent to Hudson's Bay.

Michael Wigglesworth's long poem Meat Out of the Eater details the Christian view of suffering.

1671

Samuel Danforth's influential jeremiad, A Brief Recognition of New-Englands Errand into the Wilderness, is printed.

1674–1729

Samuel Sewall, a prominent Boston merchant and judge, compiles his diary, revealing much about the late New England Puritan mind-set.

1675–1676

King Philip's War rages between the New England colonists and the Wampanoag, Narragansett, and other tribes.

1676

Bacon's Rebellion erupts in Virginia when Nathaniel Bacon and his band of indentured servants openly oppose the governor's Indian policy. They burn Jamestown before order is restored in October.

Increase Mather, A Brief History of the War with the Indians in New-England.

1678

Anne Bradstreet's Several Poems Compiled with Great Variety of Wit and Learning is published posthumously.

1681

An American edition of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678) is published.

William Penn, Some Account of the Province of Pennsylvania.

1682

The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson is published. It is the firsthand account of a colonial woman taken captive by Native Americans during King Philip's War. The first Indian captivity narrative, this volume was immensely popular and went through more than thirty editions.

1682–1725

The Congregational minister Edward Taylor composes Poetical Works. This 400-page manuscript is divided into two main parts, "God's Determinations Touching His Elect" and "Sacramental Meditations." Taylor's verse was not published until 1939.

1684

Increase Mather, An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences.

1688

The Glorious Revolution occurs in England, and William and Mary are placed upon the throne. Within a year Sir Edmund Andros is removed as governor of the Dominion of New England.

1689

Cotton Mather, Memorable Providences, Relating to Witchcraft and Possessions.

1689–1697

King William's War rages, pitting England against France in North America.

1692

The Salem Witchcraft Trials occur between May and October; nineteen "witches" are hanged and 150 people imprisoned. These events spark several literary works, including Cotton Mather's The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693), commissioned by the Court of Oyer and Terminer ("to hear and determine") as a defense of the court's rulings. Other works include Samuel Willard's Some Miscellany Observations on our Present Debates Respecting Witchcrafts and Deodat Lawson's A Brief and True Narrative of Some Remarkable Passages Relating to Sundry Persons Afflicted by Witchcraft.

1693

Increase Mather, Cases of Conscience Concerning evil Spirits Personating Men, Witchcraft, infallible Proofs of Guilt in such as are accused with that Crime.

The College of William and Mary is chartered in Williamsburg, Virginia.

1697

The Massachusetts General Court expresses official repentance for the Salem Witchcraft Trials. At the Old South Church in Boston, Samuel Sewall, who served as a special commissioner and tried the cases, apologizes for his role in contributing to the hysteria.

1698

Cotton Mather, The Bostonian Ebenezer. Some Historical Remarks, on the State of Boston.

1700

The Massachusetts General Court orders all Roman Catholic priests to vacate the colony within three months; the New York assembly enacts similar legislation.

The population of the English North American mainland colonies is approximately 250,000. Samuel Sewall's The Selling of Joseph is the first antislavery tract in early America.

1702

In an attempt to distill the public outcry against the clergy following the witchcraft trials, Cotton Mather publishes his magnum opus, Magnalia Christi Americana (The Great Works of Christ in America), an ecclesiastical history of America from its founding to his own time.

1702–1713

Queen Anne's War rages, pitting England against France in North America.

1704

A French and Indian raiding party sacks Deerfield, Massachusetts, taking 112 residents captive.

The first weekly newspaper in the colonies, the Boston News-Letter, is founded by John Campbell.

Sarah Kemble Knight begins her Journal of a Journey from Boston to New York. Vivid and at times humorous, Knight's travel diary is a valuable chronicle of early-eighteenth-century America.

1705

Robert Beverley, The History and Present State of Virginia.

1706

Cotton Mather, The Good Old Way; The Negro Christianized.

1707

The Redeemed Captive, Returning to Zion by John Williams is published. A popular captivity narrative written at the urging of Cotton Mather, it recounts Williams's abduction during the Deerfield raid of 1704.

1708

Ebenezer Cook writes the satirical poem The Sot-Weed Factor.

1710

A postal system is established; by 1770 it has a network of sixty-five offices connecting all the English North American colonies.

Cotton Mather's Bonifacius, or Essays to Do Good, is printed. This work later influenced Benjamin Franklin when he created his "Poor Richard" character.

1711–1713

The Tuscarora War occurs in North Carolina; many of the defeated Tuscaroras migrate to upstate New York and join the Iroquois confederacy.

There are some thirty bookshops in Boston.

1713

England's South Sea Company is granted the asiento, a contract to transport 4,800 slaves annually for thirty years into the Spanish American colonies.

The Daniel Catcher, a collection of nature poems by Richard Steere, has what is probably the first American poem in blank verse.

The first American edition of Nathaniel Ward's The Simple Cobbler of Aggawam in America is printed. Originally published in 1647, it is a humorous plea for people in the New and Old Worlds to mend their ways.

1714

Cotton Mather preaches a sermon in which he states his belief in the Copernican theory of the universe, which places the Sun at the center and planets in orbit around it.

Robert Hunter's satirical farce Androboros appears in printed form, making it the first published American play.

1715–1716

The Yamasee War rages in South Carolina; the Yamasee are defeated, and many tribesmen and their families flee to Florida.

1716

The first theater in the colonies is built in Williamsburg, Virginia.

1718

Cotton Mather, Psalterum Americanum. The Book of Psalms, In a Translation Exactly Conforming to the Original.

1719

The Boston Gazette is established. Meanwhile, Philadelphia's first newspaper, the American Mercury, is founded.

The first American publication of hymns, Divine Songs Attempted in Easy Language, For the Use of Children, by Isaac Watts, is printed. It proves to be immensely popular in the colonies as well as in England.

1720

The English North American mainland colonies have an estimated population of 474,000.

Cotton Mather, The Christian Philosopher.

1721

A Memorial Relating to the Kennebeck Indians by Samuel Sewall argues for the humane treatment of Indians.

James Franklin's New-England Courant is established.

1722

Benjamin Franklin writes fourteen satirical essays signed "Silence Dogood."

1724

Boston booksellers form an association to fix prices and regulate the trade.

1725

The New-York Gazette is founded. Benjamin Franklin, A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain.

1726

Nathaniel Ames's An Astronomical Diary, or, An Almanack is printed; it is supposedly the model Franklin used to publish his own almanac.

1727

Cadwallader Colden, The History of the Five Indian Nations Depending on the Province of New-York in America.

1728

The Congregational minister and author Cotton Mather dies on February 13. He wrote more than 400 works during his lifetime, and his personal library contained 3,000 volumes. Elizabeth Hanson, God's Mercy Surmounting Man's Cruelty: Exemplified in the Captivity and Redemption of Elizabeth Hanson.

William Byrd begins to write History of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina.

1729

Benjamin Franklin purchases the Pennsylvania Gazette and soon turns it into the leading newspaper in the colonies.

1730

Ebenezer Cook, Sotweed Redivivus.

1731

Benjamin Franklin's Junto Club creates the Library Company of Philadelphia, the first circulating library in the colonies. It is funded by a subscription of 40 shillings.

Ebenezer Cook, The Maryland Muse.

1732

Georgia, the last of the original Thirteen Colonies, is founded. George Washington is born in Westmoreland County, Virginia, on February 22 (February 11, Old Style).

The Virginia planter Robert "King" Carter dies, leaving a personal library of 1,200 volumes.

The South Carolina Gazette is established.

Benjamin Franklin begins publishing Poor Richard's Almanack. It is published annually until 1757 with print runs of approximately 10,000 copies per year.

1734

John Peter Zenger, editor of the New York Weekly Journal, is imprisoned for upholding freedom of the press. He is accused of libeling New York governor William Cosby. In 1735 Zenger is acquitted after his attorney argues that the charges cannot be libelous because the accusations against Cosby are based on fact.

Puritan theologian Jonathan Edwards helps stimulate the religious revival known as the Great Awakening (circa 1730–1740s) by delivering the sermon "Justification by Faith Alone" at his church in Northampton, Massachusetts, and writing A Divine and Supernatural Light, Immediately Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God.

1735

Jonathan Edwards writes a letter to Benjamin Colman, describing the events of the Great Awakening; it is printed in 1737 as A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of Many Hundred Souls in Northampton, and the Neighboring Towns and Villages.

1736

Thomas Prince, A Chronological History of New-England.

1737

John and Charles Wesley, the founders of Methodism, have A Collection of Psalms and Hymns printed in Charleston, South Carolina.

1738

Mather Byles, On the Death of the Queen. A Poem. Anglican minister George Whitefield arrives in Savannah, Georgia; his sermons there and elsewhere in the colonies help promote the Great Awakening.

1739–1742

England and Spain wage the War of Jenkins' Ear, which involves naval engagements in the Caribbean and incursions along the Georgia-Florida border.

1741

Andrew Bradford's American Magazine; or, A Monthly View of the Political State of the British Colonies, is the first of its kind in North America.

Jonathan Edwards's Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God, perhaps the most famous sermon of the Great Awakening, is published.

1743

The American Philosophical Society is founded under the impetus of Benjamin Franklin.

1744

Mather Byles, Poems on Several Occasions.

Dr. Alexander Hamilton writes the travel narrative Itinerarium.

1747

William Bradford III, a Philadelphia printer, produces the first American edition of Alexander Pope's An Essay on Man, which was originally published in 1733–1734.

William Livingston, Philosophic Solitude: or, The Choice of a Rural Life: A Poem.

1747–1752

William Douglass, A Summary, Historical and Political, of the First Planting, Progressive Improvements, and Present State of the British Settlements in North America.

1748

Charleston, South Carolina, establishes a library company.

1749

The first American repertory acting company is established in Philadelphia; it opens with William Shakespeare's Richard III.

1750

The first American edition of Joseph Addison's Cato: A Tragedy (1713) is printed in Boston.

Jonathan Edwards is dismissed from Northampton Church and settles in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, to minister to Native Americans.

1751

Benjamin Church, A Poem Occasioned by the Death of the Honorable Jonathan Law, Esq., Late Governor of Connecticut.

The first American edition of John Gay's 1728 play The Beggar's Opera is printed in New York.

1751–1754

Benjamin Franklin, Experiments and Observations on Electricity.

1752

A London theatrical troupe led by Lewis Hallam performs William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice in Williamsburg, Virginia.

1753

Hugh Blair's long poem, The Grave, is printed for the first time in America by Hugh Gaine, owner and operator of the New-York Mercury.

1754

New York founds a library company. Thomas Cradock, A Poetical Translation of the Psalms of David.

Jonathan Edwards, Freedom of the Will.

George Washington, The Journal of Major George Washington: Sent by the Hon. Robert Dinwiddie, Esq; His Majesty's Lieutenant-Governor, and Commander in Chief of Virginia, to the Commandant of the French Forces on Ohio: To Which are Added, the Governor's Letter, and a Translation of the French Officer's Answer.

John Woolman, Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes.

1754–1763

During the French and Indian War, England and France battle for the possession of North America. In 1756 this conflict spreads to Europe, where it is known as the Seven Years' War.

1756

Jacob Duché, Pennsylvania: A Poem. Stephen Tilden, Tilden's Miscellaneous Poems, On Divers Occasions; Chiefly to Animate and Rouse the Soldiers.

1757

The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle for the British Colonies begins publication; it stops the next year.

Benjamin Franklin composes the essay "The Way to Wealth" to commemorate the twenty-fifth-anniversary issue of Poor Richard's Almanack.

William Smith, The History of the Province of New-York.

1758

John Brown, An Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times.

Jonathan Swift, The Journal of a Gaming Lady of Quality.
Jonathan Edwards becomes president of the College of New Jersey (present-day Princeton University) but dies soon thereafter of smallpox.

1760

Jean Lowry, A Journal of the Captivity of Jean Lowry and Her Children.
Pennsylvania-born painter Benjamin West travels to Italy to study art; he later becomes a distinguished artist in London.

1761

Samuel Davies, A Sermon Delivered at Nassau-Hall, January 14, 1761: On the Death of His Late Majesty King George II.
A theater company in Newport, Rhode Island, presents Moral Dialogues in 5 Parts, Depicting the Evil Effects of Jealousy and Other Bad Passions, and Proving that Happiness can Only Spring from the Pursuit of Virtue. The play is actually a version of William Shakespeare's Othello.

1762

Benjamin Franklin, Advice to a Young Tradesman. Written by an Old One.
Francis Hopkinson, Science: A Poem.

1763

The Treaty of Paris ends the French and Indian War; Great Britain acquires Canada, all French territory east of the Mississippi River, and Spanish Florida.
The New England Primer Enlarged.

1764

James Grainger's The Sugar-Cane depicts the West Indian sugarcane industry and plantation culture on St. Christopher (St. Kitts).

Thomas Hutchinson, The History of the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay, from the First Settlement Thereof in 1628, until its Incorporation with the Colony of Plimouth, Province of Main, &c. by the Charter of King William and Queen Mary, in 1691.

James Otis, The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved.
The Connecticut Courant begins circulation. It is later renamed the Hartford Courant, and it is the oldest continuously published newspaper in the United States.

1765

The Stamp Act, a direct tax on all commercial and legal documents, newspapers, pamphlets, almanacs, cards, and dice, is enacted. Colonial opposition is significant, and some leading newspapers, such as the New-London Gazette and New-York Gazette and Weekly Post-Boy, appear on unstamped paper in protest.
Jonathan Edwards's Personal Narrative is published posthumously.
Famed colonial ranger Robert Rogers publishes his Journals, detailing his exploits during the French and Indian War.

1765–1766

The naturalist John Bartram and his son William travel through Florida.

1766

The Southwark Theater opens in Philadelphia under the management of David Douglass.
Robert Rogers, Ponteach: or, The Savages of America: A Tragedy.

1767

The frontiersman Daniel Boone hunts for the first time in the Cumberland Gap, a pass in the Appalachian Mountains later used by settlers heading to Kentucky.

1768

Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania, to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies, a series of essays by the Pennsylvania lawyer John Dickinson, is printed in book form. Dickinson wrote the essays to protest the Townshend Duties of the previous year.
The American Philosophical Society is established.
Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson, "The Dream of the Patriotic Philosophical Farmer."

1769

Thomas Hopkinson, Liberty: A Poem.
The American Magazine begins circulation in Philadelphia.
Dartmouth College is founded in Hanover, New Hampshire.

1770

At the Boston Massacre on March 5 British redcoats fire on a mob of colonists, killing five.
Robert Munford, The Candidates; or, the Humours of a Virginia Election. A Comedy, in Three Acts.
John Trumbull, An Essay on the Use and Advantages of the Fine Arts.

1771

The Regulators, backcountry farmers in North Carolina who are protesting the eastern-dominated colonial government, are defeated by the forces of Governor William Tryon at the Battle of Alamance on May 16.
Benjamin Franklin begins writing his Autobiography, and he adds chapters sporadically over the course of the next nineteen years. The account of his life, however, does not go beyond 1757. The Autobiography is first published in French in 1791; an English edition does not appear until two years later.

1772

Philip Freneau, The American Village, A Poem.

Samson Occom, A Sermon, Preached at the Execution of Moses Paul, An Indian.

1773

At the Boston Tea Party on December 16, colonists disguised as Indians destroy a shipment of tea to protest a tax on that commodity as well as the trade monopoly of the East India Company.

Mercy Otis Warren, The Adulateur. A Tragedy, as It is Now Acted in Upper Servia.

Phillis Wheatley, Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral.

1774

All the colonies except Georgia send delegates to the First Continental Congress in Philadelphia. John Hancock of Massachusetts serves as president.

Quaker leader and abolitionist John Woolman's Journal is published.

Elizabeth Ashbridge's Some Account of the Fore-Part of the Life of Elizabeth Ashbridge is published posthumously.

Robert Hitchcock, The Macaroni: A Comedy, as it is Performed at the Theatre Royal.

Francis Hopkinson, A Pretty Story Written in the Year of Our Lord, 2774.

Hugh Kelly, The School for Wives: A Comedy. As it is Performed at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane.

1775

The Revolutionary War begins with the battles of Lexington and Concord on April 19.

The Second Continental Congress convenes in Philadelphia with John Hancock as president again.

Philip Freneau writes the patriotic poems American Liberty, General Gage's Soliloquy, and General Gage's Confession (the last two lampoon the British commander in chief in North America). Freneau later earns the title "poet of the American Revolution."

John Trumbull, M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem: Canto First, or The Town Meeting.

Mercy Otis Warren, The Group.

1776

Lemuel Haynes writes Liberty Further Extended: Or Free Thoughts on the Illegality of Slave-keeping.

Thomas Paine's Common Sense, a 50-page pamphlet defending the American quest for independence, comes off the press on January 10. Within a few months it sells more than 500,000 copies. In December, Paine also begins to write The American Crisis, a series of thirteen essays aimed at bolstering the morale of soldiers and citizens alike. The last one is issued in April 1783.

The Declaration of Independence is officially adopted by the Continental Congress on July 4.

The Blockheads: or, The Affrighted Officers. A Farce.

Hugh Henry Brackenridge, The Battle of Bunkers-Hill. A Dramatic Piece, of Five Acts in Heroic Measure.

1777

Hugh Henry Brackenridge, The Death of General Montgomery, in Storming the City of Quebec. A Tragedy.

Hugh Kelly, The Romance of an Hour: A New Comedy, of Two Acts.

1778

At Valley Forge, Pennsylvania, Continental troops stage Joseph Addison's Cato (1713).

Wheeler Case, Poems, Occasioned by Several Circumstances and Occurrences, in the Present Grand Contest of America for Liberty.

1779

The United States Magazine begins publication under the editorship of Philip Freneau and Hugh Henry Brackenridge.

Ethan Allen, A Narrative of Colonel Ethan Allen's Captivity.

Mercy Otis Warren, The Motley Assembly, A Farce.

1780

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences is chartered in Boston on May 4.

David Humphreys, A Poem, Addressed to the Armies of the United States of America. By a Gentleman of the Army.

Esther De Berdt Reed, The Sentiments of an American Woman.

1781

The Articles of Confederation are ratified by the Continental Congress. The first constitution of the United States, it remains in effect until replaced by the Constitution of 1787.

Following his capture and imprisonment by the British, Philip Freneau writes bitter verse concerning his experiences. The result is The British Prison-Ship: A Poem, in Four Cantos.

1782

J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur publishes Letters from an American Farmer, a collection of twelve essays detailing farm life, animals, and geography. By 1784 this popular work is in its eighth edition.

1783

With the Treaty of Paris, the Revolutionary War ends, and the United States gains its independence.

Noah Webster publishes The American Spelling Book, the famed “Blue-Backed Speller.” It is the first part of A Grammatical Institute of the English Language and is followed by a grammar (1784) and a reader (1785).

The Boston Magazine begins publication.

The Pennsylvania Evening Post becomes the first daily newspaper in the United States.

1784

Benjamin Franklin, Two Tracts: Information to Those Who Would Remove to America, and, Remarks Concerning the Savages of North America.

Samuel Low, Winter Display'd, A Poem.
Phillis Wheatley, Liberty and Peace, A Poem.

1785

Timothy Dwight, The Conquest of Canaan; a Poem, in Eleven Books. . .

John Marrant, A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black.

David Ramsay, The History of the Revolution of South-Carolina, from a British Province to an Independent State.

1786

The first installment of the mock epic The Anarchiad: A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Substantial Night is published in the New Haven Gazette. It is the work of the Hartford or Connecticut Wits, a group of Federalist poets and including Joel Barlow, David Humphreys, John Trumbull, and Lemuel Hopkins.

Philip Freneau, The Poems of Philip Freneau. Written Chiefly During the Late War.

Benjamin Rush, A Plan for the Establishment of Public Schools and the Diffusion of Knowledge in Pennsylvania.

St. George Tucker, The Knight and Friars: An Historical Tale.

1787

In January Shays's Rebellion in western Massachusetts reaches its climax when a group of disgruntled farmers and debtors who are protesting foreclosures and a lack of paper money attempt to seize the arsenal at Springfield. State militiamen disperse the insurgents.

The Constitutional Convention convenes at the Pennsylvania State House in Philadelphia on May 25; all the states except Rhode Island send delegates.

The Federalist appears in several New York newspapers in October. This essay is the first of eighty-five essays meant to drum up support for ratification of the U.S. Constitution. The last essay appears in print the following year. They are the works of Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay.

John Barlow, The Vision of Columbus; A Poem in Nine Books. . .

Thomas Jefferson, Notes on the State of Virginia.

Milcah Martha Moore, Miscellanies, Moral and Instructive, in Prose and Verse.

1788

The U.S. Constitution becomes effective following ratification of the ninth state (New Hampshire) on June 21.

Philip Freneau, The Miscellaneous Works.

1789

George Washington is unanimously elected first president of the United States.

William Hill Brown's The Power of Sympathy; or The Triumph of Nature Founded in Truth is printed. A story of incestuous love, it is considered by many to be the first American novel.

Olaudah Equiano, The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano; or, Gustavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself.

David Ramsay, The History of the American Revolution.

1790

The population of the United States is approximately 3.9 million people.

Congress authorizes the establishment of Washington, D.C. “On the Equality of the Sexes” by Judith Sargent Murray appears in the Massachusetts Magazine.

Royall Tyler's The Contrast, written in 1787, is performed, and it is the first commercially successful American play.

Mercy Otis Warren, Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous.

1791

Charlotte, a Tale of Truth, a novel about seduction and remorse by Susanna Rowson, is published. It is extremely popular and eventually goes through more than 200 editions.

William Bartram, Travels through North & South Carolina, Georgia, East & West Florida, the Cherokee Country, the Extensive Territories of the Muscogulges, or Creek Confederacy, and the Country of the Chactaws.

Thomas Paine, Rights of Man.

1792

Gilbert Imlay, A Topological Description of the Western Territory of North America.

Judith Sargent Murray begins a monthly column in the Massachusetts Magazine. "The Gleaner" provides commentary on contemporary issues, especially women's rights.

Thomas Paine, Rights of Man, Part II.

1793

Eli Whitney invents the cotton gin. Gilbert Imlay, The Emigrants.

E. H. Smith, ed., American Poems, Selected and Original.

John Woolman, A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich.

1794

The Whiskey Rebellion occurs in western Pennsylvania when farmers and distillers protest a new excise tax on whiskey.

Hendrick Aupaumut, A Short Narration of My Last Journey to the Western Country.

Timothy Dwight, Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts.

Thomas Paine, The Age of Reason.

Susanna Rowson, Slaves in Algiers; or, A Struggle for Freedom: A Play, Interspersed with Songs, in Three Acts.

1795

Philip Freneau, Poems: Written between the Years 1768 & 1794.

Lemuel Hopkins, The Democratiad. A Poem.

Robert Treat Paine Jr., The Invention of Letters.

1796

Lemuel Hopkins, The Guillotina, or, A Democratic Dirge: A Poem.

Thomas Paine, The Age of Reason, Part II.

1797

Ann Eliza Bleecker, The History of Maria Kittle.

Hannah Foster, The Coquette.

Sarah Wentworth Morton, Beacon Hill: A Local Poem, Historic and Descriptive.

Robert Treat Paine Jr., The Ruling Passion: An Occasional Poem.

1798

Charles Brockden Brown, Alcuin; a Dialogue and Wieland; or, The Transformation. An American Tale.

Susanna Rowson, Reuben and Rachel; or, Tales of Old Times. A Novel.

1799

George Washington dies at Mount Vernon on December 14.

Charles Brockden Brown, Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, Part I; Edgar Huntly; or, Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker; and Ormond; or, The Secret Witness.

1800

The U.S. Census reports a population of about 5.3 million people.

There are approximately fifty libraries in the nation with holdings of some 80,000 volumes.

Mason Locke Weems writes A History of the Life and Death, Virtues, and Exploits of General George Washington, an immensely popular biography that deifies the subject. Parson Weems (as he is more commonly known) is an Anglican minister and book peddler who supposedly had Washington as a parishioner. More than anyone else he is responsible for the half-truths surrounding the Founding Father. The apocryphal tale of the cherry tree does not appear in the book until the fifth edition (1806). By 1850 fifty-nine editions of the biography have been published.

Charles Brockden Brown, Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, Part II.

John Blair Linn, The Death of Washington. A Poem.

Robert Treat Paine Jr., An Eulogy on the Life of General George Washington, Who Died at Mount Vernon, December 14th, 1799, in the 68th Year of His Age.

1801

Charles Brockden Brown, Clara Howard; In a Series of Letters and Jane Talbot, A Novel.

John Blair Linn, The Powers of Genius, A Poem, In Three Parts.

1802

Sarah Wood, Amelia.

1803

Charles Brockden Brown begins to edit the Literary Magazine and American Register.

William Wirt, The Letters of the British Spy.

1804

Meriwether Lewis and William Clark leave St. Louis and begin their expedition to the Pacific Coast; they return two years later with invaluable information concerning the region's geography and flora and fauna.

The first volume of John Marshall's The Life of George Washington, Commander in Chief of the American Forces, during the War which Established the Independence of His Country, and First President of the United States appears. The fifth and final volume is published in 1807, and this biography is considered to be the most authoritative work on the Founding Father for many years.

Susanna Rowson, Miscellaneous Poems.

1805

John Davis, The First Settlers of Virginia, an Historical Novel.

Susanna Rowson, An Abridgment of Universal Geography, Together With Sketches of History. Designed for the Use of Schools and Academies in the United States.

Mercy Otis Warren, History of the Rise, Progress, and Termination of the American Revolution. Interspersed with Biographical, Political and Moral Observations.

1806

Noah Webster, A Compendious Dictionary of the English Language.

1807

Salmagundi, the first in a series of satirical essays by Washington Irving, William Irving, and James Kirke Paulding, is published.

Joel Barlow, The Columbiad: A Poem.

William Hill Brown, Ira and Isabella: or The Natural Children. A Novel, Founded in Fiction.

1808

The U.S. Congress bans the transatlantic slave trade.

William Cullen Bryant, The Embargo, or, Sketches of the Times: A Satire.

1809

Washington Irving, A History of New York, from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty. Attributed to the fictitious Diedrich Knickerbocker, this volume is more a satire than a true history. The term Knickerbocker School is later used to identify a group of writers dedicated to establishing New York City as a literary center. Aside from Irving, this group includes James Kirke Paulding, James Fenimore Cooper, and William Cullen Bryant.

David Ramsay, The History of South-Carolina, from its First Settlement in 1670, to the Year 1808.

Mason Locke Weems, The Life of Gen. Francis Marion in the Revolutionary War, against the British and Tories in South-Carolina and Georgia.

1810

Charles Jared Ingersoll, Inchiquin, the Jesuit's Letters, during a Late Residence in the United States of America.

1811

The Asylum; or, Alonzo and Melissa, a Gothic romance by Isaac Mitchell, is published. Soon thereafter A Short Account of the Courtship of Alonzo & Melissa by Daniel Jackson Jr. appears in print. Mitchell dies the next year before this case of plagiarism involving one of the most popular novels of the early nineteenth century can be resolved.

Robert Treat Paine Jr., A Monody on the Death of Lieut. General Sir John Moore.

1812

The War of 1812 begins, pitting the United States against Great Britain. The ostensible cause of the conflict is the violation of American neutral rights on the high seas.

James Kirke Paulding, The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan.

1813

John Davis, Life and Surprising Adventures of the Celebrated John Smith.

Susanna Rowson, Sarah, or The Exemplary Wife.

1814

The Treaty of Ghent ends the War of 1812, restoring the antebellum status quo.

Nicholas Biddle and Paul Allen, eds., History of the Expedition under the Command of Captains Lewis and Clark, to the Sources of the Missouri, Thence Across the Rocky Mountains and Down the River Columbia to the Pacific Ocean.

1815

In the last battle of the War of 1812, an American army under General Andrew Jackson defeats a British force at New Orleans on January 8.

Richard Henry Dana Jr. (1815–1882), sailor, author, and lawyer.

Philip Freneau, A Collection of Poems on American Affairs and a Variety of Other Subjects Chiefly Moral and Political.

The first literary magazine in the nation, the North American Review, is founded in Boston. It is published continuously until 1940, and among its early contributors are John Adams, William Cullen Bryant, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Francis Parkman, and Daniel Webster.

In the last battle of the War of 1812, an American army under General Andrew Jackson defeats a British force at New Orleans on January 8.

Richard Henry Dana Jr. (1815–1882), sailor, novelist, and lawyer.

Joseph Glover Baldwin (1815–1864), humor writer and essayist.

Rufus Wilmot Griswold (1815–1857), editor, journalist, and critic.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton (1815–1902), suffragist, editor, and autobiographer.

T. B. Thorpe (1815–1878), short-story writer and editor.

Philip Freneau, A Collection of Poems on American Affairs and a Variety of Other Subjects Chiefly Moral and Political.

The first literary magazine in the nation, the North American Review, is founded in Boston. It is published continuously until 1940 and among its early contributors are John Adams, William Cullen Bryant, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Francis Parkman, and Daniel Webster.

1816

Evert A. Duyckinck (1816–1878), editor and literary historian.
Parke Godwin (1816–1904), social reformer, literary critic, and editor.
Francis W. Gilmer, Sketches of American Orators.
Samuel Woodworth, The Champions of Freedom, or, The Mysterious Chief.

1817

The administration of President James Monroe (1817–1825) begins.
The University of Michigan is founded.
Harper & Brothers publishing house is founded.
Channing, William Ellery (1817–1901), essayist and poet.
Fields, James Thomas (1817–1881), editor and poet.
Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862), writer.
William Cullen Bryant's poem "Thanatopsis" appears in the North American Review.
John Neal, Keep Cool: A Novel, Written in Hot Weather.
James K. Paulding, Letters from the South, Written during an Excursion in the Summer of 1816.

1818

Amelia Bloomer (1818–1894), journalist.
George Copway (1818–1869), autobiographer and nonfiction writer.
Frederick Douglass (1818–1895), abolitionist, journalist, and autobiographer.

Mary Henderson Eastman (1818–1887), novelist and folklorist.
Oliver Gloux (1818–1883), novelist.
Elizabeth Keckley (circa 1818–1907), memoirist.
Henry Wheeler Shaw (1818–1885), humorist.
Lucy Stone (1818–1893), suffragist.
William Cullen Bryant's "To a Waterfowl" appears in the North American Review.
Edwin C. Holland, The Corsair.
John Howard Payne, Brutus; or, the Fall of Tarquin. An Historical Tragedy.

1819

The University of Virginia is founded.
James Russell Lowell (1819–1891), poet, essayist, and diplomat.
Herman Melville (1819–1891), fiction writer, and poet.
Walt Whitman (1819–1892), poet.
Anna Mowatt Ritchie (1819–1870) poet, novelist, and playwright.
Julia Ward Howe (1819–1910), poet and editor.
James Russell Lowell (1819–1891), poet and critic.
E. D. E. N. Southworth (1819–1899), novelist.
Mordecai M. Noah, She Would Be a Soldier; or, The Plains of Chippewa is staged.
Washington Irving, The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.
Under the name "Croaker and Company," Joseph Rodman Drake and Fitz-Greene Halleck begin to write satirical verse for the New York Evening Post. These poems become known as the "Croaker Papers."

1820

Under the provisions of the Missouri Compromise, Maine enters the Union as a free state and Missouri enters as a slave state. The law also bans slavery in the rest of the Louisiana Purchase north of 36° 30'. This compromise temporarily maintains the balance between slaveholding and nonslaveholding states in the U.S. Senate.

Susan B. Anthony (1820–1906), reformer.
Maturin Murray Ballou (1820–1895), editor and novelist.
Dion Boucicault (1820?–1890), playwright.
Alice Cary (1820–1871), poet and short-story writer.
Lucretia Peabody Hale (1820–1900), children's author.
James Fenimore Cooper, Precaution.
Samuel Judah, The Mountain Torrent.
William Tudor, Letters on the Eastern States.

1821

Erastus Beadle (1821–1894), novelist.
Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), religious reformer.
Maria White Lowell (1821–1853), poet.
Frederick Goddard Tuckerman (1821–1873), poet.
William Cullen Bryant, Poems.
James Fenimore Cooper, The Spy.
James Gates Percival, Poems.
Frances Wright, Views of Society and Manners in America in a Series of Letters from that Country to a Friend in England, during the Years 1818, 1819, and 1820, by an Englishwoman.
The Saturday Evening Post, a weekly magazine, begins publication; its last issue appears in 1969.

1822

William Taylor Adams (1822–1897), educator.
Edward Everett Hale (1822–1909), clergyman and author.
George Lippard (1822–1854), novelist and political activist.
James Parton (1822–1891), biographer and journalist.
Fitz-Greene Halleck, "Ainwick Castle."
Washington Irving, Bracebridge Hall.
John Neal, Logan: A Family History.
Catharine M. Sedgwick, A New-England Tale.

1823

George Henry Boker (1823–1890), author, poet, and diplomat.
 James Fenimore Cooper, The Pioneers and The Pilot.
 John Neal, Seventy-Six.
 James K. Paulding, Koningsmarke.
The New-York Mirror begins publication.
 The poem “A Visit from St. Nicholas,” also known as “’Twas the Night before Christmas,” appears in the Troy Sentinel in upstate New York on December 23. Clement C. Moore later claims authorship.

1824

Phoebe Cary (1824–1871), poet and short-story writer.
 George William Curtis (1824–1892), journalist, essayist.
 Lucy Larcom (1824–1893), poet and editor.
 Lydia Maria Child, Hobomok.
Le Souvenir, the first American gift book.
The Springfield Republican is founded.
 Washington Irving, Tales of a Traveller.
 John Neal writes a series of articles on American writers for Blackwood's Magazine in England.
 John Howard Payne, Charles the Second.
 James E. Seaver, A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison.

1825

The administration of President John Quincy Adams (1825–1829) begins.
 Rutgers College (former Queen's College) is founded in New Jersey.
 Richard Henry Stoddard (1825–1903), poet, critic, and man of letters.
 Bayard Taylor (1825–1878), poet, travel writer, and novelist.
 Frances Ellen Watkins Harper (1825–1911), poet, fiction writer, and essayist.

Richard Henry Stoddard (1825–1903), poet and editor.
 D. Appleton & Company is founded in New York City.
 American Unitarian Association is formed in Boston.
 William Cullen Bryant, “A Forest Hymn.”
 Fitz-Greene Halleck, “Marco Bozzaris.”
 Nicholas Hentz, Tadeuskund, the Last King of the Lenape.
 William Gilmore Simms, Monody, on the Death of Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney.
 Daniel Webster delivers his “Bunker Hill Oration” at the dedication of the Bunker Hill Monument in Boston.

1826

John William De Forest (1826–1906), novelist.
 Victor, Frances Fuller (1826–1902), historian, fiction writer, and poet.
 Charles Henry Smith (1826–1903), journalist and humorist.
 The American Temperance Society is formed in Boston.
 Josiah Holbrook founds the American Lyceum in Millbury, Massachusetts.
Graham's Magazine begins publication.
 James Fenimore Cooper, The Last of the Mohicans.
 Timothy Flint, Recollections of the Last Ten Years.
 James Kirke Paulding, The Merry Tales of the Three Wise Men of Gotham.
 John Howard Payne, Richelieu.

1827

John Rollin Ridge (1827–1867), novelist, poet, journalist.
 John Townsend Trowbridge (1827–1916), poet, memoirist, children's writer, and journalist.
 Lew Wallace (1827–1905), novelist.

Anna Bartlett Warner (1827–1915), novelist, children's author, hymn-writer, and biographer.
The Youth's Companion begins publication in Boston.
 James Fenimore Cooper, The Prairie.
 Edgar Allan Poe, Tamerlane and Other Poems.
 Catharine Maria Sedgwick, Hope Leslie.
 Sally Wood, Tales of the Night.

1828

George William Bagby (1828–1883), journalist and humorist.
 Martha Finley (1828–1909), children's author.
 Henry Timrod (1828–1867), poet, essayist, and journalist.
 Harriet E. Adams Wilson (1828?–1863?), novelist.
The Southern Review begins publication in Charleston, South Carolina.
 James Fenimore Cooper, The Red Rover.
 Timothy Flint, The Life and Adventures of Arthur Clenning.
 Nathaniel Hawthorne, Fanshawe.
 Washington Irving, A History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus.
 Noah Webster, American Dictionary of the English Language.

1829

The presidential administration of Andrew Jackson (1829–1837) begins.
 Silas Weir Mitchell (1829–1914), physician, novelist, and poet.
 Charles Dudley Warner (1829–1900), essayist, editor, and novelist.
 The first volume of Encyclopaedia Americana is published. Edited by Francis Lieber, the encyclopedia is dedicated to the arts, sciences, literature, history, and politics. Its thirteenth and last volume appears in 1833.
 The African American abolitionist David Walker writes the pamphlet Appeal . . . to the Colored Citizens.

of the World . . . , urging slaves to revolt.

James Fenimore Cooper, The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish.

Washington Irving, A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada.

Edgar Allan Poe, Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems.

John Augustus Stone, Metamora.

William Cullen Bryant, "To the Fringed Gentian."

1830

John Esten Cooke (1830–1886), novelist, biographer, and historian.

Emily Dickinson (1830–1886), poet.

Paul Hamilton Hayne (1830–1886), poet, editor, and biographer.

George L. Aiken (1830–1876), playwright.

Helen Hunt Jackson (1830–1885), novelist, poet, and essayist.

George Washington Parke Custis, Pocahontas.

The Boston Daily Evening Transcript is founded.

Godey's Lady's Book, a popular magazine among women, begins publication.

Sarah Josepha Hale's Poems for Our Children is published; among the poems is "Mary Had a Little Lamb."

Oliver Wendell Holmes composes the poem "Old Ironsides," which arouses public support for the preservation of the famed War of 1812 frigate the USS Constitution.

James Kirke Paulding, The Lion of the West.

1831

Amelia Edith Huddleston Barr (1831–1919), novelist.

Rebecca Harding Davis (1831–1910), novelist.

Mary Mapes Dodge (1831?–1905), children's writer.

Ignatius Donnelly (1831–1901), politician, editor, novelist, and historian.

Paul Belloni Du Chaillu (circa 1831–1903), explorer, children's writer, and travel writer.

Mortimer Thomson (1831–1875), journalist and humorist.

Metta Fuller Victor (1831–1885), novelist and editor.

William Lloyd Garrison begins publishing the antislavery newspaper The Liberator in Boston.

Robert Montgomery Bird, The Gladiator.

James Kirke Paulding, The Dutchman's Fireside.

Edgar Allan Poe, Poems.

John Greenleaf Whittier, Legends of New England in Prose and Verse.

1832

Louisa May Alcott (1832–1888), novelist.

Horatio Alger (1832–1899), clergyman and children's author.

Hubert Howe Bancroft (1832–1918), historian.

Robert Montgomery Bird, Oralloosa.

William Cullen Bryant, Poems.

Washington Irving, The Alhambra.

John Pendleton Kennedy, Swallow Barn.

Fanny Trollope, Domestic Manners of the Americans.

1833

Mary Abigail Dodge (1833–1896), essayist.

Robert Green Ingersoll (1833–1899), lawyer and orator.

David Ross Locke (1833–1888), journalist and editor.

Rowland Evans Robinson (1833–1900), short-story writer.

Edmund Clarence Stedman (1833–1908), poet and critic.

Black Hawk, Black Hawk, an Autobiography.

Haverford College is founded in Haverford, Pennsylvania.

Oberlin College is founded in Oberlin, Ohio.

Knickerbocker Magazine begins publication.

The New York Sun begins publication.

Parley's Magazine begins publication.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Outre-Mer.

John Neal, The Down-Easters.

William Gilmore Simms, Martin Faber.

Seba Smith, The Life and Writings of Major Jack Downing of Downingville.

1834

George Arnold (1834–1865), poet.

Charles Farrar Browne (1834–1867), journalist and lecturer.

Annie Adams Fields (1834–1915) poet, essayist, and novelist.

John Wesley Powell (1834–1902), geologist, ethnologist, and nonfiction writer.

Frank Stockton (1834–1902), fiction writer.

The Southern Literary Messenger begins publication in Richmond, Virginia. Edgar Allan Poe becomes the editor the next year.

The first volume of George Bancroft's History of the United States from the Discovery of the American Continent to the Present Time is printed. The tenth and final volume appears in 1874.

Davy Crockett, A Narrative of the Life of David Crockett of the State of Tennessee.

William Gilmore Simms, Guy Rivers.

1835

Lyman Abbott (1835–1922), theological writer and editor.

Charles Francis Adams Jr. (1835–1915), historian and biographer.

Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain; 1835–1910), novelist and travel writer.

Augusta Jane Evans (Wilson) (1835–1909), novelist.

Louise Chandler Moulton (1835–1908), poet, children's writer, journalist, editor, and critic.

Harriet Prescott Spofford (1835–1921), short-story writer, novelist, and poet.

Celia Thaxter (1835–1894), nature writer, poet, children's writer.

The New York Herald is founded.

The Western Messenger is founded in Louisville, Kentucky.

The first of the Crockett Almanacs, a series of anonymous pamphlets, appears in print. These pamphlets help perpetuate the myths surrounding the legendary frontiersman. The last one is published in 1856.

Robert Montgomery Bird, The Hawks of Hawk-Hollow.

Washington Irving, A Tour on the Prairies.

John Pendleton Kennedy, Horse-Shoe Robinson.

Augustus Baldwin Longstreet, Georgia Scenes.

William Gilmore Simms, The Yemassee and The Partisan.

1836

Henry Mills Alden (1836–1919), editor and nonfiction writer.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich (1836–1907), author and editor.

Davy Crockett (1786–1836), author and folk figure.

Bret Harte (1836–1902), writer.

Marietta Holley (1836–1926), humor writer and travel writer.

Sarah Morgan Bryan Piatt (1836–1919), poet.

The Transcendental Club, an informal gathering of leading intellectuals in the Boston area, meets for the first time. Among its members are Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Henry David Thoreau.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, Nature.

Richard Hildreth, The Slave.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Poems.

William Holmes McGuffey, Eclectic Readers (first and second readers).

Maria Monk, Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk.

1837

The administration of President Martin Van Buren (1837–1841) begins.

Mount Holyoke Female Seminary is founded in South Hadley, Massachusetts. It is one of the first institutions of higher learning for women in the United States.

John Burroughs (1837–1921), naturalist and author.

Edward Eggleston (1837–1902), author.

William Dean Howells (1837–1920), man of letters.

Joaquin Miller (1837–1913), poet.

The Baltimore Sun is founded.

The New Orleans Picayune is founded.

The United States Magazine and Democratic Review is founded in New York.

The Gentleman's Magazine begins publication.

Ralph Waldo Emerson delivers "The American Scholar" address at Harvard University.

Robert Montgomery Bird, Nick of the Woods.

Henry Charles Carey, Principles of Political Economy (1837–1840).

James Fenimore Cooper's first volumes of Gleanings in Europe are published.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, Twice-Told Tales.

William Holmes McGuffey, Eclectic Readers (third and fourth readers).

1838

Henry Adams (1838–1918), historian, novelist, and memoirist.

John Hay (1838–1905), diplomat and writer.

John Muir (1838–1914), essayist.

F. Hopkinson Smith (1838–1915), short-story writer, novelist, and illustrator.

Albion Tourgée (1838–1905), novelist.

Victoria C. Woodhull (1838–1927), reformer and pamphleteer.

William Hickling Prescott, History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, "Harvard Divinity School Address."

James Fenimore Cooper, The American Democrat.

John Pendleton Kennedy, Rob of the Bowl.

Harriet Martineau, A Retrospect of Western Travel.

Joseph Neal, Charcoal Sketches.

Edgar Allan Poe, Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym.

John Greenleaf Whittier, Ballads and Anti-Slavery Poems.

1839

Henry George (1839–1897), economist and author.

The Liberty Bell, an abolitionist gift book, begins publication in Boston.

Caroline Kirkland, A New Home—Who'll Follow?

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Hyperion, A Romance and Voices of the Night.

Edgar Allan Poe, Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque.

Daniel P. Thompson, The Green Mountain Boys.

Jones Very, Essays and Poems.

Nathaniel Parker Willis, Tortosa the Usurer.

1840

Thomas Nast (1840–1902), cartoonist.

The Dial, the magazine of the Transcendental Club and dedicated to literature, philosophy, and religion, begins publication.

Adolph F. Bandelier (1840–1914), archaeologist and novelist.

The Lowell Offering begins publication at the Lowell mills in Massachusetts.

The National Anti-Slavery Standard begins publication in New York.

James Fenimore Cooper, The Pathfinder.

Richard Henry Dana Jr., Two Years before the Mast.

John Pierpont, Airs of Palestine and Other Poems.

William Gilmore Simms, Border Beagles; A Tale of Mississippi.

1841

James Montgomery Bailey (1841–1894), journalist and humorist.

The presidential administration of William Henry Harrison begins. He dies within a month of taking office, and he is succeeded as president by John Tyler (1841–1845).

The New York Tribune is founded.

Edgar Allan Poe's short story "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" appears in Graham's Magazine.

The humorist Thomas B. Thorpe writes "The Big Bear of Arkansas" for the magazine Spirit of the Times in New York.

Brook Farm, an experimental community, is founded in Roxbury, Massachusetts. Experiences there are the basis for Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Blithedale Romance.

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle begins publication.

The Ladies' Repository begins publication in Cincinnati.

James Fenimore Cooper, The Deerslayer.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, Essays, First Series.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Balloads and Other Poems.

James Russell Lowell, A Year's Life.

1842

Ambrose Bierce (1842?–1914), journalist, short-story writer, and poet.

Bronson Howard (1842–1908), journalist and playwright.

William James (1842–1910), psychologist and philosopher.

Sidney Lanier (1842–1881), poet and critic.

William Cullen Bryant, The Fountain and Other Poems.

James Fenimore Cooper, The Wing-and-Wing.

Charles Dickens, American Notes.

Edgar Allan Poe, "The Mask of the Red Death" and "The Pit and the Pendulum."

William Gilmore Simms, Beauchampe.

Walt Whitman, Franklin Evans.

1843

Henry James (1843–1916), short-story writer, novelist, and critic.

Charles Warren Stoddard (1843–1909), poet and travel writer.

William Henry Smith, The Drunkard.

James Fenimore Cooper, Wyandotté.

Edgar Allan Poe, "The Black Cat," "The Gold-Bug," "The Pit and the Pendulum," and "The Tell-Tale Heart."

William Hickling Prescott, The Conquest of Mexico.

William Tappan Thompson, Major Jones's Courtship.

1844

George Washington Cable (1844–1925), author.

Richard Watson Gilder (1844–1909), editor and poet.

John Boyle O'Reilly (1844–1890), journalist, poet, and novelist.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps (1844–1911), novelist, short-story writer, poet, and essayist.

Sarah Winnemucca (circa 1844–1891), autobiographer and historian.

Littell's Living Age is founded.

Brownson's Quarterly Review is founded.

William Cullen Bryant, The White-Footed Deer and Other Poems.

James Fenimore Cooper, Afloat and Ashore.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, Essays, Second Series.

Margaret Fuller, Summer on the Lakes.

1845

The administration of President James K. Polk (1845–1849) begins.

The Broadway Journal is founded.

The Harbinger begins publication.

Bronson Alcott founds Fruitlands, a utopian community, in Harvard, Massachusetts.

James Fenimore Cooper, Satanstoe.

Frederick Douglass, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave.

Margaret Fuller, Woman in the Nineteenth Century.

Anna Cora Mowatt, Fashion.

Edgar Allan Poe, The Raven and Other Poems.

1846

Anna Katharine Green (1846–1935), novelist, short-story writer, and poet.

Julian Hawthorne (1846–1934), novelist, historian, and biographer.

The Mexican War begins; it ends two years later.

Margaret Fuller, Papers on Literature and Art.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, Mosses from an Old Manse.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Poems.

Herman Melville, Typee.

Edgar Allan Poe, "The Literati of New York City," "The Cask of Amontillado," and "The Philosophy of Composition."

Charles W. Webber, Jack Long, or, Shot in the Eye.

John Greenleaf Whittier, Voices of Freedom.

1847

Joseph Pulitzer (1847–1911), journalist and editor.

The Massachusetts Quarterly Review is founded.

The National Era begins publication in Washington, D.C.

The North Star begins publication in Rochester, New York.

The Union Magazine of Literature and Art is founded.

George Copway, The Life, History, and Travels of Kah-ge-gah-bowh.
 Ralph Waldo Emerson, Poems.
 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Evangeline.
 Herman Melville, Omoo.
 James Kirke Paulding, The Bucktails.
 William Hickling Prescott, The Conquest of Peru.

1848

H. H. Boyesen (1848–1895), literary critic and scholar.
 Joel Chandler Harris (1848–1908), writer.
 Alice James (1848–1892), diarist.
 The first Women's Rights Convention convenes at Seneca Falls, New York.
 The University of Wisconsin is founded.
 The College of the City of New York is founded.
The Independent is founded in New York.
 James Russell Lowell, The Biglow Papers, A Fable for Critics, and The Vision of Sir Launfal.
 Edgar Allan Poe, Eureka.
 Charles W. Webber, Old Hicks, the Guide.

1849

The administration of President Zachary Taylor begins.
 James Lane Allen (1849–1925), essayist, poet, fiction writer.
 Frances Hodgson Burnett (1849–1924), children's writer.
 Jeanette Gilder (1849–1916), critic.
 Sarah Orne Jewett (1849–1909), writer.
 Emma Lazarus (1849–1887), poet.
 Jacob August Riis (1849–1914), journalist and reformer.
 James Whitcomb Riley (1849–1916), poet.
 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Kavanagh.
 Herman Melville, Mardi and Redburn.
 Francis Parkman, The Oregon Trail.
 James Kirke Paulding, The Puritan and His Daughter.

Edgar Allan Poe, "Annabel Lee" and "Eldorado."
 Henry David Thoreau, A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers and "Resistance to Civil Government" (later known as "Civil Disobedience").
 John Greenleaf Whittier, Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal in the Province of Massachusetts Bay.

1850

The administration of President Millard Fillmore begins.
 Under the provisions of the Compromise of 1850, California is admitted to the Union as a free state, and settlers in the territories of Utah and New Mexico are allowed to decide whether to have slavery (popular sovereignty).
 Edward Bellamy (1850–1898), author.
 Eugene Field (1850–1895), poet and journalist.
 Lafcadio Hearn (1850–1904), writer.
 Mary N. Murfree (1850–1922), fiction writer.
 Bill Nye (1850–1896), journalist.
 Ella Wheeler Wilcox (1850–1919), poet, fiction writer and nonfiction writer.
Harper's Monthly Magazine begins publication in New York.
 Ralph Waldo Emerson, Representative Men.
 Nathaniel Hawthorne, The Scarlet Letter.
 Herman Melville, White-Jacket.
 Donald G. Mitchell, Reveries of a Bachelor.

Anna Mowatt Ritchie, Fashion!
 Bayard Taylor, El Dorado.
 Susan Bogart Warner, The Wide, Wide World.
 John Greenleaf Whittier, "Ichabod" and Songs of Labor and Other Poems.

1851

Northwestern University is founded in Evanston, Illinois.
 Kate Chopin (1851–1904), novelist and short-story writer.

The Carpet-Bag begins publication in Boston.
The New York Times is founded.
 Nathaniel Hawthorne, The House of the Seven Gables.
 Herman Melville, Moby-Dick.
 Donald G. Mitchell, Dream Life.
 Lewis Henry Morgan, League of the Ho-dé-no-sau-nee.
 Francis Parkman, The History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac and the Indian War after the Conquest of Canada.
 The first of six volumes of Henry Rowe Schoolcraft's Historical and Statistical Information Respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States appears in print.
 William Gilmore Simms, Katharine Walton.

1852

Mary Wilkins Freeman (1852–1930), fiction writer.
 Brander Matthews (1852–1929), essayist and critic.
 The Golden Era is founded in San Francisco.
 Alice Cary, Clovernook.
 Nathaniel Hawthorne, The Snow-Image, and Other Twice-Told Tales and The Blithedale Romance.
 Herman Melville, Pierre.
 William Gilmore Simms, The Sword and the Distaff.
 Harriet Beecher Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin.

1853

The administration of President Franklin Pierce (1853–1857) begins.
 Edgar W. Howe (1853–1937), journalist and author.
 Thomas Nelson Page (1853–1922), fiction writer and diplomat.
 Antioch College is founded in Yellow Springs, Ohio.
 Putnam's Monthly Magazine is founded.

Joseph Glover Baldwin, The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi.
 William Wells Brown, Clotel.
 George William Curtis, Potiphar Papers.
 Herman Melville, "Bartleby, the Scrivener."
 William Gilmore Simms, Poems: Descriptive, Dramatic, Legendary and Contemplative.
 Sarah Payton Willis, Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio.

1854

Under the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, settlers in the territories of Kansas and Nebraska are allowed to determine whether to have slavery.
 Francis Marion Crawford (1854–1909), novelist.
 T. S. Arthur, Ten Nights in a Bar-Room.
 John Esten Cooke, Leather Stocking and Silk.
 Maria Susanna Cummins, The Lamplighter.
 Henry David Thoreau, Walden.
 Thomas Bangs Thorpe, The Hive of "The Bee-Hunter".

1855

H. C. Bunner (1855–1896), writer.
 Josiah Royce (1855–1916), philosopher.
 Edgar Saltus (1855–1921), author.
 George Woodberry (1855–1930), man of letters.
 The Saturday Club is founded in Boston for men of distinction to discuss literature and philosophy; its early members include Ralph Waldo Emerson, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.
Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper begins publication in New York.
The New York Ledger is founded.
 John Bartlett, Familiar Quotations.
 George Henry Boker, Francesca da Rimini.

Evert Duyckinck, Cyclopaedia of American Literature.
 Sarah Payton Willis, Ruth Hall.
 The first of five volumes of Washington Irving's Life of George Washington is printed.
 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, The Song of Hiawatha.
 Herman Melville, Israel Potter.
 William Gilmore Simms, The Forayers.
 Mortimer Neal Thomson, Doesticks.
 Walt Whitman, Leaves of Grass.

1856

Congress passes a copyright law on August 18 to protect playwrights.
 Harold Frederic (1856–1898), fiction writer.
 Mabel Loomis Todd (1856–1932), editor.
 Booker T. Washington (circa 1856–1915), educator, autobiographer.
 William Wells Brown, The Escape.
 George William Curtis, Prue and I.
 Ralph Waldo Emerson, English Traits.
 Herman Melville, "Benito Cereno" and The Piazza Tales.
 John Lothrop Motley, The Rise of the Dutch Republic.
 William Gilmore Simms, Eutaw.
 Harriet Beecher Stowe, Dred.
 Mortimer Neal Thomson, Plu-ri-bus-tah.
 John Greenleaf Whittier, "The Barefoot Boy."

1857

The administration of President James Buchanan (1857–1861) begins.
 In Dred Scott v. Sandford, the U.S. Supreme Court overturns the Missouri Compromise of 1820.
 Gertrude Atherton (1857–1948), novelist.
 Henry B. Fuller (1857–1929), novelist.
 Thorstein Veblen (1857–1929), economist.
The Atlantic Monthly is founded.
Harper's Weekly is founded.

Dion Boucicault, The Poor of New York.
 Ralph Waldo Emerson, "Brahma."
 Herman Melville, The Confidence-Man.

1858

Charles Waddell Chesnutt (1858–1932), writer.
 Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table.
 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, The Courtship of Miles Standish and Other Poems.
 The first volume of John Gorham Palfrey's History of New England appears in print.

1859

The abolitionist John Brown raids the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry, Virginia (present-day West Virginia).
 John Dewey (1859–1952), philosopher, psychologist, and educator.
 Pauline E. Hopkins (1859–1930), novelist, journalist.
Vanity Fair begins publication.
 Dion Boucicault, The Octoroon.
 William Gilmore Simms, The Cassique of Kiawah.
 Harriet Beecher Stowe, The Minister's Wooing.
 Henry Timrod, Poems.
 Walt Whitman, "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking."
 Harriet Wilson, Our Nig.

1860

The Republican candidate Abraham Lincoln wins the presidential election, and as a result the state of South Carolina secedes from the Union. Within a year it is followed by ten other Southern states that form the Confederate States of America.
 Hamlin Garland (1860–1940), fiction writer.
 Charlotte Perkins Gilman (1860–1935), fiction writer.

Malaeska: The Indian Wife of the White Hunter, by Ann Sophia Stephens, is the first "dime novel" in the nation.

Dion Boucicault, The Colleen Bawn.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, The Conduct of Life.

Nathaniel Hawthorne, The Marble Faun: or, The Romance of Monte Beni.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Professor at the Breakfast-Table.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, "The Children's Hour."

Frederick Goddard Tuckerman, Poems.

John Greenleaf Whittier, Home Ballads and Poems.

1861

The administration of President Abraham Lincoln (1861–1865) begins.

The Civil War begins on April 12 when Confederate forces bombard Fort Sumter in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina.

Harland, Henry (1861–1905), editor, fiction writer.

Vassar College is founded in Poughkeepsie, New York.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Elsie Venner.

Harriet Jacobs, Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, "Paul Revere's Ride."

Henry Timrod, "Ethnogenesis."

Mrs. Henry Wood, East Lynne.

1862

Freedmen's Bureau established to educate freed slaves.

John Kendrick Bangs (1862–1922), humorist.

William Sydney Porter, or O. Henry (1862–1910), short-story writer.

Ida B. Wells-Barnett (1862–1931), journalist, pamphleteer, and autobiographer.

Edith Wharton (1862–1937), novelist.

Rebecca Harding Davis, Margaret Howth.

Charles Farrar Browne, Artemus Ward, His Book.

Harriet Beecher Stowe, The Pearl of Orr's Island.

Henry Timrod, "The Cotton Boll."

Theodore Winthrop, John Brent.

1863

Emancipation Proclamation goes into effect on January 1 and declares all slaves held within Confederate territory to be free.

Union forces win decisive victories at the Battle of Gettysburg in Pennsylvania (July 1–3) and the Siege of Vicksburg in Mississippi (July 4).

William Randolph Hearst (1863–1951), newspaper publisher.

Edward Everett Hale, "The Man Without a Country."

Nathaniel Hawthorne, Our Old Home.

Abraham Lincoln delivers his "Gettysburg Address" on November 19.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Tales of a Wayside Inn.

1864

Richard Harding Davis (1864–1916), journalist, fiction writer, and playwright.

Richard Hovey (1864–1900), poet.

Paul Elmer More (1864–1937), critic.

George Henry Boker, Poems of the War.

William Cullen Bryant, Thirty Poems.

David Ross Locke, The Nasby Papers.

James Russell Lowell, Fireside Travels.

1865

General Robert E. Lee surrenders the Army of Northern Virginia at Appomattox Courthouse, Virginia, on April 9. Nine days later General Joseph E. Johnston surrenders his Confederate forces at Durham Station, North Carolina, to end the Civil War.

Abraham Lincoln is assassinated on April 14.

The administration of President Andrew Johnson (1865–1869) begins. Cornell University is founded in Ithaca, New York.

Irving Babbitt (1865–1933), scholar and educator.

Paul Leicester Ford (1865–1902), bibliographer, historian, editor, and novelist.

The Nation is founded.

Dion Boucicault and Joseph Jefferson, Rip Van Winkle.

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), "Jim Smiley and His Jumping Frog (The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County)."

Francis Parkman, Pioneers of France in the New World.

Henry David Thoreau, Cape Cod.

Walt Whitman, Drum-Taps and Sequel to Drum-Taps.

1866

The New York World is founded.

The Galaxy is founded.

George Ade (1866–1944), humorist and playwright.

Lincoln Steffens (1866–1936), journalist.

John Esten Cooke, Surry of Eagle's-Nest.

William Dean Howells, Venetian Life.

Herman Melville, Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War.

John Greenleaf Whittier, Snow-Bound. A Winter Idyl.

1867

Howard University is founded in Washington, D.C.

The Radical Club, a group of New England Unitarian and Transcendentalist ministers and laymen, is founded.

Harper's Bazar begins publication.

David Graham Phillips (1867–1911), novelist.

John William De Forest, Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, May-Day and Other Pieces.

George Washington Harris, Sut Lovingood Yarns.

Bret Harte, Condensed Novels, and Other Papers.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Guardian Angel.

James Russell Lowell, Biglow Papers: Second Series.

Francis Parkman, The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century.

Henry Timrod, "Ode."

John Greenleaf Whittier, The Tent on the Beach and Other Poems.

1868

Mary Austin (1868–1934), writer.

W. E. B. Du Bois (1868–1963), educator, editor, and writer.

Robert Herrick (1868–1938), novelist.

Edgar Lee Masters (1868–1950), writer.

William Allen White (1868–1944), writer and journalist.

Hearth and Home begins publication.

Lippincott's Magazine is founded.

Overland Monthly is founded.

First volume of Sabin's Dictionary is published.

Amos Bronson Alcott, Tablets.

Louisa May Alcott, Little Women (1868–1869).

Bret Harte, "The Luck of Roaring Camp."

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, The Gates Ajar.

John Rollin Ridge, Poems.

1869

The administration of President Ulysses S. Grant (1869–1877) begins.

Appleton's Journal begins publication.

William Vaughn Moody (1869–1910), poet and playwright.

Edwin Arlington Robinson (1869–1935), poet.

George Sterling (1869–1926), poet.

Booth Tarkington (1869–1946), novelist.

Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain), The Innocents Abroad.

Bret Harte, "Tennessee's Partner" and "The Outcasts of Poker Flat."

Francis Parkman, The Discovery of the Great West (revised and enlarged as LaSalle and the Discovery of the Great West in 1879).

Harriet Beecher Stowe, Oldtown Folks.

1870

Scribner's Monthly is founded.

Frank Norris (1870–1902), novelist.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich, The Story of a Bad Boy.

William Cullen Bryant translates Homer's Iliad.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, Society and Solitude.

Bronson Howard, Saratoga.

James Russell Lowell, "The Cathedral."

1871

Smith College is established in Northampton, Massachusetts.

Winston Churchill (1871–1947), novelist.

Stephen Crane (1871–1900), writer.

Theodore Dreiser (1871–1945), writer.

William Cullen Bryant finishes the first volume of his translation of Homer's Odyssey.

John Burroughs, Wake-Robin.

Edward Eggleston, The Hoosier School-Master.

Bret Harte, East and West Poems.

Henry James, "A Passionate Pilgrim."

James Russell Lowell, My Study Windows.

Joaquin Miller, Pacific Poems and Songs of the Sierras.

Walt Whitman, Democratic Vistas and Passage to India.

1872

Paul Laurence Dunbar (1872–1906), poet.

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), Roughing It.

Bret Harte, Mrs. Skaggs's Husbands, and Other Sketches.

Paul Hamilton Hayne, Legends and Lyrics.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Poet at the Breakfast-Table.

William Dean Howells, Their Wedding Journey.

Clarence King, Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada.

Edward Payson Roe, Barriers Burned Away.

Sir Henry Morton Stanley, How I Found Livingstone.

1873

Willa Cather (1873–1947), novelist.

Ellen Glasgow (1873–1945), novelist. The Delineator begins publication.

St. Nicholas begins publication.

Woman's Home Companion begins publication.

Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Marjorie Daw and Other People.

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), Life on the Mississippi.

Mark Twain and Charles Dudley Warner, The Gilded Age.

William Dean Howells, A Chance Acquaintance.

Henry Timrod, The Cotton Boll.

1874

The Lambs Club, the first professional theatrical club in the nation, is established in New York.

Charles Beard (1874–1948), historian.

Owen Davis (1874–1956), playwright.

Clarence Day (1874–1935), writer.

Robert Frost (1874–1963), poet.

Zona Gale (1874–1938), writer.

Amy Lowell (1874–1925), poet and critic.

Gertrude Stein (1874–1946), writer.

Ambrose Bierce, Cobwebs from an Empty Skull.

Edward Eggleston, The Circuit Rider.

John Fiske, Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy.

William Dean Howells, A Foregone Conclusion.

Francis Parkman, The Old Régime in Canada.

1875

The Chicago Daily News is founded.
 John William De Forest, Honest John Vane.
 Mary Baker Eddy, Science and Health.
 Bret Harte, Echoes of the Foot-Hills and Tales of the Argonauts.
 Henry James, Transatlantic Sketches.

1876

American Library Association formed.
 Johns Hopkins University is founded in Baltimore.
 The University of Texas is founded in Austin.
 Sherwood Anderson (1876–1941), writer.
 Jack London (1876–1916), novelist and short-story writer.
 Ole Rølvaag (1876–1931), educator and novelist.
Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly begins publication.
 Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), The Adventures of Tom Sawyer.
 John Habberton, Helen's Babies.
 Henry James, Roderick Hudson.
 James Russell Lowell, Among My Books, Second Series.
 Herman Melville, Clarel.
 Joaquin Miller, The One Fair Woman.
 Charles Dudley Warner, My Winter on the Nile.

1877

The administration of President
 Rutherford B. Hayes (1877–1881) begins.
 Reconstruction in the South ends.
 The humor magazine Puck begins
 publication.
 John Burroughs, Birds and Poets.
 Henry James, The American.
 Sarah Orne Jewett, Deephaven.
 Sydney Lanier, Poems.
 Lewis Henry Morgan, Ancient Society.
 Julia A. Moore, The Sentimental Song Book.
 Francis Parkman, Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV.

1878

Carl Sandburg (1878–1967), writer.
 Upton Sinclair (1878–1968), writer and social reformer.
 Edward Eggleston, Roxy.
 Anna Katherine Green, The Leavenworth Case.
 Henry James, Daisy Miller and The Europeans.
 Sidney Lanier, "The Marshes of Glynn."
 John Greenleaf Whittier, The Vision of Echard and Other Poems.

1879

James Branch Cabell (1879–1958),
 novelist and essayist.
 Dorothy Canfield Fisher (1879–1958),
 novelist and essayist.
 Vachel Lindsay (1879–1931), poet.
 Wallace Stevens (1879–1955), poet.
 John Burroughs, Locusts and Wild Honey.
 George Washington Cable, Old Creole Days.
 Henry George, Progress and Poverty.
 William Dean Howells, The Lady of the Aroostook.
 Frank R. Stockton, Rudder Grange.
 Albion W. Tourgée, A Fool's Errand.

1880

The Dial: A Monthly Review and Index of Current Literature begins publication.
 Henry Adams, Democracy.
 Louisa May Alcott, Jack and Jill.
 Thomas Bailey Aldrich, The Stillwater Tragedy.
 George Washington Cable, The Grandissimes.
 Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), A Tramp Abroad.
 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Ultimia Thule.
 Steele MacKaye, Hazel Kirke.
 Albion W. Tourgée, Bricks without Straw.
 Lew Wallace, Ben-Hur.

1881

Tuskegee Normal School (later Tuskegee University) is founded in Alabama; its first principal is Booker
 T. Washington.
 President James A. Garfield is shot by an office seeker on July 2 and dies eighty days later; Vice President Chester A. Arthur assumes the presidency.
The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine begins
 publication.
 Rose Terry Cooke, *Somebody's
 Neighbors*.
 Ina Coolbrith, A Perfect Day, and Other Poems.
 John William De Forest, The Bloody Chasm.
 Joel Chandler Harris,
Uncle Remus.
 Helen Hunt Jackson, A Century of Dishonor.
 Henry James, The Portrait of a Lady and Washington Square.

1882

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), The Prince and the Pauper.
 F. Marion Crawford, Mr. Isaacs.
 Bronson Howard, *Young Mrs.
 Winthrop*.
 William Dean Howells, A Modern Instance.
 Frank R. Stockton, "The Lady or the Tiger?"
 Walt Whitman, Specimen Days and Collect.
 Constance Fenimore Woolson, Anne.

1883

Ladies' Home Journal is founded.
Life magazine begins publication.
 Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), Life on the Mississippi.
 F. Marion Crawford, Dr. Claudius.
 Edward Eggleston, *The Hoosier
 School-Boy*.
 E. W. Howe, *The Story of a Country
 Town*.
 George W. Peck, Peck's Bad Boy and His Pa.

Howard Pyle, The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood.

James Whitcomb Riley, The Old Swimmin' Hole and 'Leven More Poems.

Sarah Winnemucca, Life among the Piutes.

1884

Sara Teasdale (1884–1933), poet.

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), Adventures of Huckleberry Finn.

F. Marion Crawford, A Roman Singer.

John Fiske, Excursions of an Evolutionist.

Helen Hunt Jackson, Ramona.

Sarah Orne Jewett, A Country Doctor.

James Russell Lowell, "Democracy."

Katherine MacDowell (Sherwood Bonner), Suwanee River Tales.

Mary Noailles Murfree (Charles Egbert Craddock), In the Tennessee Mountains.

Francis Parkman, Montcalm and Wolfe.

1885

The administration of President Grover Cleveland (1885–1889) begins.

Bryn Mawr, a Quaker women's college, is founded in Pennsylvania.

Stanford University is founded in California.

Rose Terry Cooke, Root-Bound and Other Sketches.

Ulysses S. Grant, Personal Memoirs (1885–1886).

Oliver Wendell Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy.

William Dean Howells, The Rise of Silas Lapham.

Sarah Orne Jewett, A Marsh Island.

Edward Payson Roe, Driven Back to Eden.

Josiah Royce, The Religious Aspect of Philosophy.

1886

Cosmopolitan Magazine is founded.

The Forum magazine begins publication.

H. C. Bunner, The Midge.

Frances Hodgson Burnett, Little Lord Fauntleroy.

William Gillette, Held by the Enemy.

William Dean Howells, Indian Summer.

Henry James, The Bostonians and The Princess Casamassima.

Sarah Orne Jewett, A White Heron and Other Stories.

S. Weir Mitchell, Roland Blake.

1887

F. Marion Crawford, Saracinesca and Marzio's Crucifix.

Harold Frederic, Seth's Brother's Wife.

Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, A Humble Romance and Other Stories.

Bronson Howard, The Henrietta.

Joseph Kirkland, Zury: The Meanest Man in Spring County; A Novel of Western Life.

Thomas Nelson Page, In Ole Virginia.

1888

The American Folklore Society is established.

The National Geographic Society is founded.

Collier's begins publication.

Edward Bellamy, Looking Backward.

James Bryce, The American Commonwealth.

John Fiske, The Critical Period of American History, 1783–1789.

Henry James, The Aspern Papers, Louisa Pallant, The Modern Warning, and The Reverberator.

James Russell Lowell, Political Essays.

Amélie Rives, The Quick or the Dead?

Ernest Lawrence Thayer, "Casey at the Bat."

Walt Whitman, November Boughs and Complete Poems and Prose.

1889

The Arena begins publication.

Henry Adams, History of the United States (1889–1891).

Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court.

Lafcadio Hearn, Chita: A Memory of Last Island.

William Dean Howells, Annie Kilburn.

Eugene Field, A Little Book of Western Verse.

Bronson Howard, Shenandoah.

Theodore Roosevelt, The Winning of the West (1889–1896).

1890

Literary Digest is founded.

Smart Set begins publication.

Ambrose Bierce, "An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge."

Emily Dickinson, Poems.

William Dean Howells, A Hazard of New Fortunes.

Henry James, The Tragic Muse.

William James, The Principles of Psychology.

Alfred T. Mahan, The Influence of Sea Power Upon History, 1660–1783.

Jacob Riis, How the Other Half Lives.

George Edward Woodberry, The North Shore Watch and Other Poems.

1891

Congress passes the International Copyright Convention.

Review of Reviews is founded.

Ambrose Bierce, Tales of Soldiers and Civilians.

Sophia Alice Callahan, Wynema.

Emily Dickinson, Poems, Second Series.

John Fiske, The American Revolution.

Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, A New England Nun.

William Dean Howells, Criticism and Fiction.

Hamlin Garland, Main-Travelled Roads.

Francis Hopkinson Smith, Colonel Carter of Cartersville.

Walt Whitman, Good-Bye, My Fancy.

1892

The University of Chicago is founded. The Sewanee Review is founded.

Ambrose Bierce, Black Beetles in Amber.
 F. Marion Crawford, Don Orsino.
 Richard Harding Davis, Van Bibber and Others.
 Paul Laurence Dunbar, Oak and Ivy.
 Frances Ellen Watkins Harper, Iola Leroy.
 Joel Chandler Harris, Uncle Remus and His Friends.
 William Dean Howells, The Quality of Mercy.
 Francis Parkman, A Half-Century of Conflict.
 Thomas Nelson Page, The Old South.

1893

The second administration of Grover Cleveland (1893–1897) begins.
McClure's Magazine is founded.
Outlook begins publication.
 Stephen Crane, Maggie.
 Henry Blake Fuller, The Cliff-Dwellers.
 Richard Hovey, Seaward.
 Henry James, The Real Thing and Other Tales.
 Frederick Jackson Turner, "The Significance of the Frontier in American History."
 Lew Wallace, The Prince of India.

1894

Chap Book begins publication.
 Bliss Carman and Richard Hovey, Songs from Vagabondia.
 Kate Chopin, Bayou Folk.
 Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne Clemens), The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson and the Comedy of Those Extraordinary Twins.
 William Dean Howells, A Traveler from Altruria.
 John Muir, The Mountains of California.
 George Santayana, Sonnets and Other Verses.
 Margaret Marshall Saunders, Beautiful Joe.

1895

The New York Public Library is founded.
 Bookman begins publication.
 William Allen White's Emporia Gazette is founded.
 Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Unguarded Gates and Other Poems.
 John Kendrick Bangs, The Idiot.
 Alice Brown, Meadow-Grass.
 Robert W. Chambers, The King in Yellow.
 Hamlin Garland, Rose of Dutcher's Coolly.
 Edward Everett Hale, If Jesus Came to Boston.
 John Ames Mitchell, Amos Judd.

1896

The College of New Jersey is renamed Princeton University.
 Richard F. Outcault's comic strip "The Yellow Kid" appears in the New York World.
 The first public motion picture is shown in New York City.
 John Dos Passos (1896–1970), novelist.
 F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896–1940), writer.
 John Kendrick Bangs, A Houseboat on the Styx.
 Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain), Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc and Tom Sawyer, Detective, and Other Tales.
 Emily Dickinson, Poems, Third Series.
 Harold Frederic, The Damnation of Theron Ware.
 Sarah Orne Jewett, The Country of the Pointed Firs.
 Edwin Arlington Robinson, The Turret and the Night Before.
 George Santayana, The Sense of Beauty.
 Charles M. Sheldon, In His Steps.

1897

The administration of President William McKinley (1897–1901) begins.
 The Library of Congress building is completed.

Paul Dresser composes and Theodore Dreiser writes the lyrics for "On the Banks of the Wabash, Far Away."
 John Philip Sousa composes "The Stars and Stripes Forever."
 Frederic Remington, Drawings.
 The magazine Survey Graphic begins publication.
 William Faulkner (1897–1962), novelist.
 Richard Harding Davis, Soldiers of Fortune.
 Henry James, The Spoils of Poynton and What Maisie Knew.
 William James, The Will to Believe and Other Essays.
 Edwin Arlington Robinson, The Children of the Night.
 S. Weir Mitchell, Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker.

1898

The Spanish-American War occurs.
 The National Basketball League is founded.
A Trip to Coontown by Bob Cole and Billy Johnson premieres in New York City; it is the first musical written, performed, and produced by African Americans.
 Stephen Crane, The Open Boat and Other Tales of Adventure.
 Paul Laurence Dunbar, Folks from Dixie.
 Finley Peter Dunne, Mr. Dooley in Peace and War.
 Henry James, The Two Magics: The Turn of the Screw, Covering End.

1899

Joe E. Howard (music and lyrics) and Ida Emerson (music) write "Hello, Ma Baby."
 Chauncey Olcott writes the lyrics and music for "My Wild Irish Rose."
 Winslow Homer paints The Gulf Stream and After the Hurricane.
 William Gillette stars in Sherlock Holmes at the Garrick Theatre in New York City.
 Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961), writer.

Everybody's Magazine, edited by John O'Hara Cosgrave, is founded.
George Ade, Fables in Slang.
Charles Waddell Chesnutt, The Conjure Woman and The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line.
Stephen Crane, The Monster and Other Stories and War is Kind.
John Dewey, School and Society.
Paul Leicester Ford, Janice Meredith.
Elbert Hubbard, "A Message to Garcia."
Edwin Markham, The Man with the Hoe and Other Poems.
Frank Norris, McTeague.
Booth Tarkington, The Gentleman from Indiana.
Thorstein Veblen, The Theory of the Leisure Class.

1900

The US Census reports a population of 75,994,575 people.
Buffalo Bill Cody's Wild West Show performs in New York City.
Florodora, a popular stage musical, debuts in New York.
The Smart Set: A Magazine of Cleverness is founded by William D'Alton Mann; H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan serve as co-editors from 1914 to 1923.
Albert Pinkham Ryder paints Toilers of the Sea.
L. Frank Baum, The Wonderful Wizard of Oz.
Stephen Crane, Whilomville Stories.
Theodore Dreiser, Sister Carrie.
Pauline Elizabeth Hopkins, Contending Forces: A Romance Illustrative of Negro Life North and South.
Jack London, The Son of the Wolf.
Theodore Roosevelt, The Strenuous Life.
Josiah Royce, The World and the Individual (1900–1901).
Booth Tarkington, Monsieur Beaucaire.
Maurice Thompson, Alice of Old Vincennes.

1901

The administration of President Theodore Roosevelt (1901–1909) begins.
Steel magnate and philanthropist Andrew Carnegie gives more than $2 million to the New York public library system.
Sigmund Lubin produces the movies Couche Dance on the Midway and Wedding Procession in Cairo.
Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines, a play by Clyde Fitch, opens on Broadway.
William Vaughn Moody, Poems.
John Muir, Our National Parks.
Frank Norris, The Octopus.
Alice Caldwell Hegan Rice, Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch.
Jacob Riis, The Making of an American.
Booker T. Washington, Up From Slavery.

1902

Comin' Through the Rye, a bronze sculpture, is completed by Frederic Remington.
In Dahomey, a musical written and performed by African Americans, opens on Broadway.
The Carnegie Institute is established to sponsor research in the humanities and sciences.
The South Atlantic Quarterly begins publication.
Paul Laurence Dunbar, The Sport of the Gods.
Henry James, The Wings of the Dove.
William James, The Varieties of Religious Experience.
Helen Keller, The Story of My Life.
George Barr McCutcheon, Brewster's Millions.
Jacob Riis, The Battle with the Slum.
Owen Wister, The Virginian.

1903

The United States acquires the rights to build the Panama Canal.

Edwin S. Porter's one-reel movie The Great Train Robbery opens in theaters.
The musical version of The Wizard of Oz opens.
James Gould Cozzens (1903–1978), novelist.
W. E. B. Du Bois, The Souls of Black Folk.
Paul Laurence Dunbar, In Old Plantation Days.
Henry James, The Ambassadors.
Jack London, The Call of the Wild and People of the Abyss.
Frank Norris, The Pit.
Jacob Riis, Children of the Tenements.

1904

The American Academy of Arts and Letters is founded.
George M. Cohan writes the music and lyrics for "Give My Regards to Broadway."
Henry Adams, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres.
Ellen Glasgow, The Deliverance.
Joel Chandler Harris, The Tar Baby.
William Dean Howells, The Son of Royal Langbrith.
Henry James, The Golden Bowl.
Jack London, The Sea-Wolf.
William Sydney Porter (O. Henry), Cabbages and Kings.
Lincoln Steffens, The Shame of the Cities.
Ida M. Tarbell, The History of the Standard Oil Company.

1905

The first nickelodeon opens in Pittsburgh.
The Chicago Defender, the first black newspaper in the nation, is founded.
Variety, a show-business weekly, begins publication.
John O'Hara (1905–1970), writer.
Charles Waddell Chesnutt, The Colonel's Dream.
Thomas Dixon, The Clansman.

George Santayana, The Life of Reason; Or, The Phases of Human Progress (1905–1906).
Edith Wharton, The House of Mirth.

1906

The Pure Food and Drug Act and the Meat Inspection Act are passed.
The Intercollegiate Athletic Association of the United States is renamed the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA).
George M. Cohan writes the music and lyrics for “I’m a Yankee Doodle Dandy” and “You’re a Grand Old Flag.”
Rex Beach, The Spoilers.
Ambrose Bierce, The Cynic’s Word Book (enlarged as The Devil’s Dictionary in 1911).
Joel Chandler Harris, Uncle Remus and Brer Rabbit.
Jack London, White Fang.
William Vaughn Moody, The Great Divide.
William Sydney Porter (O. Henry), The Four Million.
Upton Sinclair, The Jungle.
Owen Wister, Lady Baltimore.

1907

The Ziegfeld Follies, a musical revue produced by Florenz Ziegfeld, opens in New York City.
Frank Lloyd Wright finishes building the Robey House in Chicago; with a broad low roof, it is a classic example of a prairie house.
Henry Brooks Adams, The Education of Henry Adams.
Charles Alexander Eastman, Old Indian Days.
Elinor Glyn, Three Weeks.
William James, Pragmatism.
William Sydney Porter (O. Henry), The Trimmed Lamp.
William Graham Sumner, Folkways.

1908

D. W. Griffith directs his first one-reel movie, The Adventures of Dolly.

Israel Zangwill’s play The Melting Pot and George M. Cohan’s musical The American Idea both open in New York.

Jack Johnson becomes the first black man to win the heavyweight boxing championship of the world.

The Eight, a group of prominent artists, exhibit their work in New York City.

Nora Bayes writes the music and Jack Norworth writes the lyrics for “Shine On, Harvest Moon.”

Zane Grey, The Last of the Plainsmen.
Jack London, The Iron Heel.

H. L. Mencken, The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche.

Ezra Pound, A Lume Spento.

Mary Roberts Rinehart, The Circular Staircase.

Josiah Royce, Philosophy of Loyalty.

1909

The administration of President William H. Taft (1909–1913) begins.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) is founded.

Gertie the Dinosaur is the first animated movie in the United States.

Clyde Fitch’s stage production The City is banned in Boston but not New York; it has the controversial line “You’re a goddamn liar.”

The first American transcontinental automobile race is held.

Gus Edwards writes the music and Edward Madden writes the lyrics for “By the Light of the Silvery Moon.”

Wallace Saunders composes the ballad “Casey Jones.”

Van Wyck Brooks, The Wine of the Puritans.

Herbert D. Croly, The Promise of American Life.

Jack London, Martin Eden.

William Vaughn Moody, The Faith Healer.

Ezra Pound, Personae.

Gertrude Stein, Three Lives.

William A. White, A Certain Rich Man.

1910

The US Census reports a population of 91,972,266 people.

Frederick Shepherd Converse’s The Pipe of Desire debuts at the Metropolitan Opera; it is the first time an opera by an American composer opens there.

Victor Herbert writes the music and Rida Johnson Young writes the lyrics for “Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life.”

Jane Addams, Twenty Years at Hull-House.

Jack London, Burning Daylight.

Clarence Mulford, Hopalong Cassidy.

Edwin Arlington Robinson, The Town Down the River.

1911

Irving Berlin composes “Alexander’s Ragtime Band.”

The Association of American Painters and Sculptors is established.

The first Indianapolis 500 automobile race is held; the winner, Ray Harroun, has an average speed of nearly 75 mph.

The Masses, later New Masses, begins publication.

Frances Hodgson Burnett, The Secret Garden.

Theodore Dreiser, Jennie Gerhardt.

Kathleen Norris, Mother.

David Graham Phillips, The Conflict.

Edith Wharton, Ethan Frome.

Harold Bell Wright, The Winning of Barbara Worth.

1912

Mack Sennett directs the first Keystone Comedy movies, the split-reel Cohen Collects a Debt and The Water Nymph.

Ernest R. Ball writes the music and Chauncey Olcott and George Graff Jr. write the lyrics for “When Irish Eyes Are Smiling.”

Poetry: A Magazine of Verse is founded.

Mary Austin, A Woman of Genius.

Willa Cather, Alexander’s Bridge.

Theodore Dreiser, The Financier.

Zane Grey, Riders of the Purple Sage.
James Weldon Johnson, The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man.
Jack London, Smoke Bellew.
Amy Lowell, A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass.
Ezra Pound, Ripostes.

1913

The administration of President Woodrow Wilson (1913–1921) begins.
The Woolworth Building is built in New York City; the tallest building in the world, it is 792 feet in height.
In New York City, the International Exhibition of Modern Art or the Armory Show opens with hundreds of avant-garde paintings and sculptures.
Willa Cather, O Pioneers!
Robert Frost, A Boy's Will.
Ellen Glasgow, Virginia.
Vachel Lindsay, General William Booth Enters into Heaven and Other Poems.
Jack London, The Valley of the Moon.
Eleanor H. Porter, Pollyanna.

1914

World War I begins.
The Panama Canal opens.
The American Society of Composers, Authors, and Publishers (ASCAP) is founded.
Watch Your Step, Irving Berlin's first musical, opens.
The magazines Little Review and New Republic begin publication.
Edgar Rice Burroughs, Tarzan of the Apes.
Theodore Dreiser, The Titan.
Robert Frost, North of Boston.
Vachel Lindsay, The Congo and Other Poems.
Booth Tarkington, Penrod.

1915

A German U-boat torpedoes the British ocean liner Lusitania off the coast of Ireland, killing some 1,200 passengers, on May 7.

The United States protests, and Germany temporarily halts unrestricted submarine warfare.
D. W. Griffith directs The Birth of a Nation.
Fred Fisher composes and Howard Johnson writes the words for "There's a Broken Heart for Every Light on Broadway."
Saul Bellow (1915–2005), novelist.
The Provincetown Players, a theatrical company, is founded; among its early members is the dramatist Eugene O'Neill.
Alfred A. Knopf establishes a publishing house.
Van Wyck Brooks, America's Coming-of-Age.
Willa Cather, The Song of the Lark.
Theodore Dreiser, The "Genius."
Edgar Lee Masters, Spoon River Anthology.
John G. Neihardt, The Song of Hugh Glass.
Ernest Poole, The Harbor.
Ezra Pound, Cathay.

1916

A US military expedition is sent into Mexico to stop the depredations of the bandit leader Pancho Villa.
The Professional Golfers' Association (PGA) is established.
Charlie Chaplin directs and stars in The Vagabond.
D. W. Griffith's Intolerance opens in movie theaters.
Seven Arts begins publication.
Theatre Arts Magazine is founded.
The Provincetown Players stage Bound East for Cardiff, the first production of a Eugene O'Neill play, at the Wharf Theater in Provincetown, Massachusetts.
Walker Percy (1916–1990), novelist.
Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain), The Mysterious Stranger.
John Dewey, Democracy and Education.
Robert Frost, Mountain Interval.

Ring Lardner, You Know Me Al.
Ezra Pound, Lustra.
Edwin Arlington Robinson, The Man Against the Sky.
Carl Sandburg, Chicago Poems.

1917

The United States enters World War I (1914–1918) after the Germans resume unrestricted submarine warfare, and the British government intercepts the Zimmermann Telegram.
The first Pulitzer Prizes, which acknowledge achievements in American journalism, letters, and music, are awarded.
Gwendolyn Brooks (1917–2000), poet and educator.
Robert Lowell (1917–1977), poet.
Carson McCullers (1917–1967), novelist.
T. S. Eliot, Prufrock and Other Observations.
Hamlin Garland, A Son of the Middle Border.
Joseph Hergesheimer, The Three Black Pennys.
H. L. Mencken, A Book of Prefaces.
David Graham Phillips, Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise.
Edwin Arlington Robinson, Merlin.
Upton Sinclair, King Coal.
Sara Teasdale, Love Songs.

1918

World War I ends.
The Eighteenth Amendment prohibits the manufacture, sale, and transport of alcoholic beverages in the United States.
Eddie Green writes the music and lyrics for "A Good Man Is Hard to Find."
The theater group known as the Carolina Playmakers is founded at the University of North Carolina.
The Theatre Guild is founded in New York City.
Willa Cather, My Ántonia.
Theodore Dreiser, Free and Other Stories.

H. L. Mencken, In Defense of Women.
Eugene O'Neill, The Moon of the Caribbees.

Carl Sandburg, Cornhuskers.

Booth Tarkington, The Magnificent Ambersons.

Thorstein Veblen, The Higher Learning in America.

1919

The Nineteenth Amendment grants women the right to vote in the United States.

Woodrow Wilson proposes the Fourteen Points, his vision of a liberal peace settlement, at the Versailles Peace Conference. His plan causes much debate.

The Communist Party of America is founded.

Maid of Harlem, a hit musical with an all-black cast, plays at the Lincoln Theater in New York.

Babe Ruth of the Boston Red Sox has twenty-nine home runs in a single season, setting a new major-league baseball record.

George Gershwin writes the music and Irving Caesar writes the lyrics for "Swanee."

Sherwood Anderson, Winesburg, Ohio.
James Branch Cabell, Beyond Life and Jorgen.

Joseph Hergesheimer, Linda Condon.

H. L. Mencken, The American Language and Prejudices, First Series.

John Crowe Ransom, Poems About God.

John Reed, Ten Days That Shook the World.

Louis Untermeyer, Modern American Poetry; An Introduction.

1920

The Senate votes against the United States joining the League of Nations.

The US Census reports a population of 105,710,620 people.

Babe Ruth is traded to the New York Yankees; by the end of the season he sets a new record with fifty-four home runs.

Eight Chicago White Sox players are indicted on charges of having taken bribes to throw the 1919 World Series.

Harry Von Tilzer and Bill Munro write the music and Andrew B. Sterling and Ted Lewis write the words for "When My Baby Smiles at Me."

H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan launch the pulp magazine Black Mask, which they soon sell; among its later contributors are Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler.

Sherwood Anderson, Poor White.

T. S. Eliot, Poems.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, This Side of Paradise and Flappers and Philosophers.

Zona Gale, Miss Lulu Bett.

Sinclair Lewis, Main Street.

Edna St. Vincent Millay, A Few Figs from Thistles.

Eugene O'Neill, Beyond the Horizon and The Emperor Jones.

Ezra Pound, Hugh Selwyn Mauberley.

Edwin Arlington Robinson, Lancelot.

Carl Sandburg, Smoke and Steel.

Edith Wharton, The Age of Innocence.

1921

The administration of President Warren G. Harding (1921–1923) begins.

On July 14 Italian immigrants Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti are convicted of murdering a paymaster and a guard during a robbery the previous year. Many people feel that the jury had been prejudiced by the defendants' anarchist beliefs.

Richard Wilbur (1921– ), poet.

Sherwood Anderson, The Triumph of the Egg.

John Dos Passos, Three Soldiers.

Eugene O'Neill, Anna Christie.

Booth Tarkington, Alice Adams.

Elinor Wylie, Nets to Catch the Wind.

1922

The US Senate begins to investigate the lease of the Teapot Dome oil fields in Wyoming and other federal oil reserves to private oil companies. The Teapot Dome Scandal leads to the resignation of Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall the next year.

Anne Nichols' comedy Abie's Irish Rose opens and sets a Broadway record of 2,327 performances.

Kurt Vonnegut Jr. (1922–2007), novelist.

The Fugitive, a poetry magazine, begins publication.

Reader's Digest is founded.

E. E. Cummings, The Enormous Room.

T. S. Eliot, The Waste Land.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Beautiful and Damned and Tales of the Jazz Age.

Sinclair Lewis, Babbitt.

Eugene O'Neill, The Hairy Ape.

1923

Warren G. Harding dies, and the administration of President Calvin Coolidge (1923–1929) begins.

Billy Jones composes "Yes, We Have No Bananas."

Time magazine begins publication.

Norman Mailer (1923– ), novelist and journalist.

Gertrude Atherton, Black Oxen.

Willa Cather, A Lost Lady.

Robert Frost, New Hampshire.

Ernest Hemingway, Three Stories & Ten Poems.

Edna St. Vincent Millay, The Ballad of the Harp-Weaver.

Elmer Rice, The Adding Machine.

Wallace Stevens, Harmonium.

1924

James Baldwin (1924–1987), writer.

Truman Capote (1924–1984), writer.

Eugene O'Neill's controversial play about miscegenation All God's Chillun Got Wings opens.

Richard L. Simon and M. Lincoln Schuster establish the publishing house Simon & Schuster.

The American Mercury first appears; it is published by Alfred A. Knopf and partly owned by co-editors

H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan.

Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings, What Price Glory.

Sherwood Anderson, A Story Teller's Story.

Louis Bromfield, The Green Bay Tree.

Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain), Autobiography.

James Gould Cozzens, Confusion.

Ernest Hemingway, in our time.

Sidney Howard, They Knew What They Wanted.

Robinson Jeffers, Tamar.

Ring Lardner, How to Write Short Stories.

Herman Melville, Billy Budd, Foretopman.

Edith Wharton, Old New York.

1925

The Scopes "Monkey" Trial, in which Clarence Darrow and William Jennings Bryan debate the theory of evolution, occurs in Dayton, Tennessee.

Charlie Chaplin's The Gold Rush plays in movie theaters.

Larry Hart's and Richard Rodgers' musical Garrick Gaieties opens and features the song "Manhattan."

The New Yorker magazine is founded.

The John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation is established.

William Styron (1925–2006), novelist.

Gore Vidal (1925– ), novelist, playwright, and essayist.

Sherwood Anderson, Dark Laughter.

Van Wyck Brooks, The Pilgrimage of Henry James.

Willa Cather, The Professor's House.

John Dos Passos, Manhattan Transfer.

Theodore Dreiser, An American Tragedy.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Great Gatsby.

Ellen Glasgow, Barren Ground.

Ernest Hemingway, In Our Time.

Robinson Jeffers, Roan Stallion, Tamar and Other Poems.

Sinclair Lewis, Arrowsmith.

Anita Loos, "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes": The Illuminating Diary of a Professional Lady.

John G. Neihardt, The Song of the Indian Wars.

Ezra Pound, A Draft of XVI Cantos.

1926

The first Technicolor movie, The Black Pirate, premieres.

Ray Henderson composes and Mort Dixon writes the words for "Bye Bye Blackbird."

Ray Henderson writes the music and Buddy G. DeSylva and Lew Brown write the lyrics for "The Birth of the Blues."

Gene Tunney defeats Jack Dempsey for the heavyweight boxing championship.

The Book-of-the-Month Club is founded.

Allen Ginsberg (1926–1997), poet.

Thomas Beer, The Mauve Decade.

Theodore Dreiser, Moods: Cadenced and Declaimed.

William Faulkner, Soldiers' Pay.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, All the Sad Young Men.

Paul Green, In Abraham's Bosom.

Ernest Hemingway, The Torrents of Spring and The Sun Also Rises.

Sidney Howard, The Silver Cord.

Langston Hughes, The Weary Blues.

Eugene O'Neill, The Great God Brown.

Elizabeth Madox Roberts, The Time of Man.

Carl Sandburg, Abraham Lincoln, The Prairie Years.

T. S. Stribling, Teeftallow.

Carl Van Vechten, Nigger Heaven.

1927

Charles Lindbergh flies nonstop from New York to Paris in the Spirit of St. Louis. The 3,600-mile trip takes him more than thirty-three hours to complete.

Anarchists Sacco and Vanzetti are executed for murder.

Bennett Cerf and Donald Klopfer name their publishing firm Random House.

The Literary Guild of America, a book club, is founded.

The literary magazine transition begins publication.

Babe Ruth hits his sixtieth home run in a season.

Jerome David Kern's and Oscar Hammerstein II's musical Show Boat debuts.

Hoagy Carmichael composes the jazz song "Stardust"; he later reworks it as a slow ballad and adds lyrics by Mitchell Parish.

The first talking movie, The Jazz Singer, is released.

John Ashbery (1927– ), poet.

Conrad Aiken, Blue Voyage.

Willa Cather, Death Comes for the Archbishop.

Ernest Hemingway, Men Without Women.

Eugene O'Neill, Marco Millions.

Vernon Parrington, Main Currents in American Thought (1927–1930).

Julia Peterkin, Black April.

Edwin Arlington Robinson, Tristram.

Ole Rølvaag, Giants in the Earth.

Carl Sandburg, The American Songbag.

Upton Sinclair, Oil!

Glenway Wescott, The Grandmothers.

Thornton Wilder, The Bridge of San Luis Rey.

1928

The first Mickey Mouse cartoon, "Steamboat Willie," premieres in New York City on November 18.

Walter Donaldson composes and Gus Kahn writes the words for "Makin' Whoopee!"

American Literature begins publication.

Edward Albee (1928– ), dramatist. Stephen Vincent Benét, John Brown's Body.

Robert Frost, West-Running Brook.

Archibald MacLeish, The Hamlet of A. MacLeish.

Eugene O'Neill, Strange Interlude.

Julia Peterkin, Scarlet Sister Mary.

Carl Sandburg, Good Morning, America.

1929

The administration of President Herbert Hoover (1929–1933) begins.
 The stock market crashes on Black Thursday, October 24, marking the beginning of the Great Depression. Five days later on Black Tuesday some 16 million shares of stock are traded, and stockholders lose some 10 billion dollars.
 The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences presents its first awards.
 The musical comedy Fifty Million Frenchmen debuts.
 Thomas Hart Benton paints Georgia Cotton Pickers.
 John Hollander (1929– ), poet.
 Conrad Aiken, Selected Poems.
 William Faulkner, The Sound and the Fury.
 Ellen Glasgow, They Stood to Folly.
 Dashiell Hammett, Red Harvest.
 Ernest Hemingway, A Farewell to Arms.
 Oliver La Farge, Laughing Boy.
 Sinclair Lewis, Dodsworth.
 Walter Lippmann, A Preface to Morals.
 Robert Lynd, Middletown: A Study in Contemporary American Culture.
 Elmer Rice, Street Scene.
 Ole Rølvaag, Peder Victorious.
 Edmund Wilson, I Thought of Daisy.
 Thomas Wolfe, Look Homeward, Angel.

1930

The US Census reports a population of 122,775,046 people.
All Quiet on the Western Front opens in movie theaters.
Children of Darkness, by Edwin Justus Mayer, opens in New York.
 Grant Wood paints American Gothic.
 Sinclair Lewis is the first American to receive the Nobel Prize in literature.
 The business magazine Fortune is founded.
 John Barth (1930– ), novelist.
 Gary Snyder (1930– ), poet.
 Marc Connelly, The Green Pastures.

Hart Crane, The Bridge.
 John Dos Passos, The 42nd Parallel.
 T. S. Eliot, Ash Wednesday.
 William Faulkner, As I Lay Dying.
 Susan Glaspell, Alison's House.
 Michael Gold, Jews Without Money.
 Dashiell Hammett, The Maltese Falcon.
I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition, by Twelve Southerners.
 Archibald MacLeish, New Found Land: Fourteen Poems.
 H. L. Mencken, Treatise on the Gods.
 Katherine Anne Porter, Flowering Judas.
 John Crowe Ransom, God Without Thunder.
 Elizabeth Madox Roberts, The Great Meadow.
 Kenneth Lewis Roberts, Arundel.

1931

Nine African American youths are brought to trial in Scottsboro, Alabama, for the rape of two white women. The "Scottsboro Boys" are convicted although doctors who examine the women determine no sexual assaults had occurred. The US Supreme Court overturns the convictions the next year.
 The Whitney Museum of American Art is founded.
 President Herbert Hoover signs an act making "The Star-Spangled Banner" the national anthem.
 George Gershwin writes the music and Ira Gershwin writes the lyrics for Of Thee I Sing, the first musical comedy to receive a Pulitzer Prize (1932). It is based on a book by George S. Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind.
 Charlie Chaplin directs the movie City Lights.
Frankenstein plays in movie theaters.
 The Group Theatre is founded in New York.
Green Grow the Lilacs, by Lynn Riggs, opens in New York.
 Tom Wolfe (1931– ), novelist and journalist.

Pearl S. Buck, The Good Earth.
 Willa Cather, Shadows on the Rock.
 James Gould Cozzens, S. S. San Pedro.
 William Faulkner, Sanctuary.
 Dashiell Hammett, The Glass Key.
 Eugene O'Neill, Mourning Becomes Electra.
 T. S. Stribling, The Forge.
 Lincoln Steffens, Autobiography.
 Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle.

1932

World War I veterans march on Washington, DC, demanding cash payments for their service bonus certificates; the "Bonus Army" is eventually dispersed by order of President Hoover.
 Jay Gorney writes the music and E. Y. "Yip" Harburg writes the lyrics for "Brother, Can You Spare a Dime?," considered by many to be the anthem of the Great Depression.
 George S. Kaufman's and Edna Ferber's play Dinner at Eight opens at the Music Box Theater in New York.
 Robert Coover (1932– ), novelist.
 John Updike (1932– ), writer.
 Sherwood Anderson, Beyond Desire.
 Erskine Caldwell, Tobacco Road.
 James T. Farrell, Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in Chicago Streets.
 William Faulkner, Light in August.
 Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall, Mutiny on the Bounty.
 John Dos Passos, 1919.
 Ellen Glasgow, A Sheltered Life.

1933

The administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt (1933–1945) begins, and he immediately introduces a domestic policy called the New Deal to combat the Great Depression.
 The unemployment rate in the United States reaches 25 percent.
 The United States formally recognizes the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.
 The Twenty-first Amendment repeals Prohibition.

Duck Soup (starring the Marx Brothers) and King Kong premiere in movie theaters.

Ted Koehler and Harold Arlen write the song "Stormy Weather."

The plays Design for Living and Mulatto open in New York.

John Gardner (1933–1982), novelist.

Philip Roth (1933– ), novelist.

Susan Sontag (1933– ), novelist.

Erskine Caldwell, God's Little Acre.

James Gould Cozzens, The Last Adam.

Ernest Hemingway, Winner Take Nothing.

Eugene O'Neill, Ah, Wilderness!

Kenneth Lewis Roberts, Rabble in Arms.

Gertrude Stein, The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas.

1934

It Happened One Night and Babes in Toyland premieres in movie theaters.

Harry Warren writes the music and Al Dubin writes the lyrics for "I Only Have Eyes for You."

Anything Goes, with music and lyrics by Cole Porter, opens at New York's Alvin Theater.

The Partisan Review begins publication.

Joan Didion (1934– ), novelist and literary journalist.

N. Scott Momaday (1934– ), writer.

James M. Cain, The Postman Always Rings Twice.

James T. Farrell, The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, Tender Is the Night.

Dashiell Hammett, The Thin Man.

John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax, American Ballads and Folk Songs.

Henry Miller, Tropic of Cancer.

John O'Hara, Appointment in Samarra.

William Saroyan, The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze.

Stark Young, So Red the Rose.

1935

The Works Progress Administration (WPA) is established as part of the New Deal. Two of its programs are the Federal Theatre Project and the Federal Writers' Project. The latter provides jobs for unemployed writers, editors, and researchers. By 1939 the Federal Writers' Project produces more than 1,000 books and pamphlets, including state guides, local histories, ethnic studies, folklore collections, and nature studies. Among the contributing authors are Conrad Aiken, Saul Bellow, and Ralph Ellison.

The Social Security Act is passed.

Louisiana senator Huey Long (the model for Robert Penn Warren's Willie Stark in the 1946 novel All the King's Men) is assassinated.

The opera Porgy and Bess opens in New York; the music is by George Gershwin and the lyrics by Ira Gershwin and DuBose Heyward.

Mutiny on the Bounty plays in movie theaters.

The American Writers' Congress is founded.

The Southern Review is founded.

Richard Brautigan (1935–1984), novelist and poet.

Ken Kesey (1935–2001), novelist.

Nelson Algren, Somebody in Boots.

Maxwell Anderson, Winterset.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, Taps at Reveille.

Ellen Glasgow, Vein of Iron.

Robinson Jeffers, Solstice and Other Poems.

Sinclair Lewis, It Can't Happen Here.

Clifford Odets, Waiting for Lefty and Awake and Sing!

John O'Hara, The Doctor's Son and Other Stories and Butterfield 8.

George Santayana, The Last Puritan.

Robert Sherwood, The Petrified Forest.

John Steinbeck, Tortilla Flat.

Thomas Wolfe, Of Time and the River and From Death to Morning.

1936

Charlie Chaplin directs Modern Times.

It Can't Happen Here, a production of the Federal Theatre Project, opens simultaneously in seventeen American cities.

Arthur Johnston writes the music and Johnny Burke writes the words for "Pennies From Heaven."

Eugene O'Neill receives the Nobel Prize in literature.

New Directions, a publishing company, is founded by James Laughlin.

Tom Robbins (1936– ), novelist.

Van Wyck Brooks, The Flowering of New England.

James Gould Cozzens, Men and Brethren.

John Dos Passos, The Big Money.

T. S. Eliot, Collected Poems, 1909–1935.

William Faulkner, Absalom, Absalom!

Robert Frost, A Further Range.

Margaret Mitchell, Gone With the Wind.

Carl Sandburg, The People, Yes.

Irwin Shaw, Bury the Dead.

Robert Sherwood, Idiot's Delight.

John Steinbeck, In Dubious Battle.

Edmund Wilson, Travels in Two Democracies.

1937

Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, the first full-length animated feature by Walt Disney, premieres in movie theaters.

Pins and Needles opens at New York's Labor Stage Theater.

Thomas Pynchon (1937– ), novelist.

Ernest Hemingway, To Have and Have Not.

Archibald MacLeish, The Fall of the City.

John P. Marquand, The Late George Apley.

Kenneth Lewis Roberts, Northwest Passage.

John Steinbeck, Of Mice and Men and The Red Pony.

1938

Orson Welles produces his radio play War of the Worlds; panic ensues among some listeners who believe an actual Martian invasion is occurring.

Ralph Rainger and Leo Robin write the music and words for "Thanks for the Memory."

The movie Bringing Up Baby opens.

Philip Barry's Here Come the Clowns premieres in New York.

Pearl S. Buck receives the Nobel Prize in literature.

Joyce Carol Oates (1938– ), writer.

Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren, Understanding Poetry.

John Dos Passos, U.S.A.

William Faulkner, The Unvanquished.

Ernest Hemingway, The Fifth Column.

John O'Hara, Hope of Heaven.

John Crowe Ransom, The World's Body.

Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings, The Yearling.

Robert Sherwood, Abe Lincoln in Illinois.

Carl Van Doren, Benjamin Franklin.

Thornton Wilder, Our Town.

Richard Wright, Uncle Tom's Children.

1939

World War II begins when Germany invades Poland.

Gone With the Wind, The Wizard of Oz, Stagecoach, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, and Wuthering Heights open in movie theaters.

Glenn Miller writes the music and Mitchell Parish writes the lyrics for "Moonlight Serenade."

Kenyon Review, founded by John Crowe Ransom, begins publication.

Raymond Chandler, The Big Sleep.

Robert Frost, Collected Poems.

Lillian Hellman, The Little Foxes.

John O'Hara, Files on Parade.

Dorothy Parker, Here Lies.

Carl Sandburg, Abraham Lincoln: The War Years.

William Saroyan, The Time of Your Life.

John Steinbeck, The Grapes of Wrath.

Lionel Trilling, Matthew Arnold.

Nathanael West, The Day of the Locust.

Thomas Wolfe, The Web and the Rock.

1940

The Grapes of Wrath, The Philadelphia Story, and Fantasia premiere in movie theaters.

Charlie Chaplin directs The Great Dictator.

Richard Rodgers and Larry Hart write the music and the lyrics for the Broadway production Pal Joey.

The newspaper PM begins publication.

Van Wyck Brooks, New England: Indian Summer, 1865–1915.

Willa Cather, Sapphira and the Slave Girl.

Raymond Chandler, Farewell, My Lovely.

Walter Van Tilburg Clark, The Ox-Bow Incident.

William Faulkner, The Hamlet.

Ernest Hemingway, For Whom the Bell Tolls.

Carson McCullers, The Heart is a Lonely Hunter.

John O'Hara, Pal Joey.

Kenneth Lewis Roberts, Oliver Wiswell.

Glenway Wescott, The Pilgrim Hawk, A Love Story.

Thomas Wolfe, You Can't Go Home Again.

Richard Wright, Native Son.

1941

In March the US Congress approves the Lend Lease Act. This statute allows the president to lend or lease arms, equipment, and foodstuffs to countries whose defense is deemed vital to American security. Countries who receive Lend Lease aid include Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China. By August 1945 the United States has provided $50 billion worth of aid.

The United States enters World War II after the surprise Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7.

Citizen Kane and The Maltese Falcon open in movie theaters.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Last Tycoon.

Ellen Glasgow, In This Our Life.

Lillian Hellman, Watch on the Rhine.

John P. Marquand, H. M. Pulham, Esq.

John Crowe Ransom, The New Criticism.

Budd Schulberg, What Makes Sammy Run?

Edmund Wilson, The Wound and the Bow.

1942

Allied forces invade North Africa.

The movies Casablanca and Yankee Doodle Dandy open in theaters.

Bing Crosby sings "White Christmas" in the movie Holiday Inn; Irving Berlin writes the song as well as the movie.

This is the Army, a revue with a cast of three hundred soldiers, opens on Broadway.

Nelson Algren, Never Come Morning.

Raymond Chandler, The High Window.

James Gould Cozzens, The Just and the Unjust.

William Faulkner, Go Down, Moses.

Zora Neale Hurston, Dust Tracks on a Road.

Thornton Wilder, The Skin of Our Teeth.

1943

Allied forces invade Italy.

At the Teheran Conference, US president Franklin D. Roosevelt, British prime minister Winston Churchill, and Soviet premier Joseph Stalin (the "Big Three") plan for the upcoming Allied invasion of France.

Oklahoma!, a musical comedy by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II, opens in New York.

James Tate (1943– ), poet.

Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn Warren, Understanding Fiction.

Raymond Chandler, The Lady in the Lake.

T. S. Eliot, Four Quartets.

Howard Fast, Citizen Tom Paine.

Betty Smith, A Tree Grows in Brooklyn.

Wallace Stegner, The Big Rock Candy Mountain.
James Thurber, Thurber's Men, Women and Dogs: A Book of Drawings.
Robert Penn Warren, At Heaven's Gate.

1944

Allied forces invade France (D-Day). The Servicemen's Readjustment Act, or the GI Bill of Rights, is signed into law. Its purpose is to compensate veterans for their military service and to reintegrate them into the civilian economy. Veterans receive tuition assistance and monthly subsistence stipends while in college. The GI Bill also provides loans for those who wish to purchase homes or open their own businesses.
Double Indemnity premieres in movie theaters.
Arsenic and Old Lace, by playwright Joseph Kesselring, closes on Broadway after more than 1,400 performances.
Saul Bellow, Dangling Man.
John Hersey, A Bell for Adano.
Charles Jackson, The Lost Weekend.
Ernie Pyle, Brave Men.
Karl Shapiro, V-Letter, and Other Poems.
Lillian Smith, Strange Fruit.
Tennessee Williams, The Glass Menagerie.

1945

At the Yalta Conference in February the Big Three discuss the postwar division of Europe and Asia, the punishment of war criminals, and the establishment of the United Nations. President Roosevelt dies of a cerebral hemorrhage in April, and he is replaced by Harry S Truman (1945–1953).
Germany surrenders to the Allies in May; Japan surrenders in August after the United States drops atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. World War II ends.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, The Crack-Up.
Robert Frost, A Masque of Reason.
Sinclair Lewis, Cass Timberlane.
John O'Hara, Pipe Night.
John Steinbeck, Cannery Row.
Richard Wright, Black Boy.

1946

The first General Assembly of the United Nations meets.
The United States conducts atomic tests in the Pacific.
The Fulbright Act creates an international exchange scholarship program.
The Best Years of Our Lives, It's a Wonderful Life, and The Yearling all premiere in movie theaters.
Frank Sinatra sings "Something Old, Something New."
Theodore Dreiser, The Bulwark.
John Hersey, Hiroshima.
Robert Lowell, Lord Weary's Castle.
Carson McCullers, The Member of the Wedding.
Robert Penn Warren, All the King's Men.
Eudora Welty, Delta Wedding.
William Carlos Williams, Paterson (Book One).

1947

The United States pledges $400 million to Greece and Turkey to help fight the spread of communism (Truman Doctrine).
Under the Marshall Plan, the United States gives $12 billion to help rebuild Western Europe.
Miracle on 34th Street opens in movie theaters.
Gene Autry sings "Here Comes Santa Claus."
Jackie Robinson becomes the first African American to play in the major baseball leagues when he signs with the Brooklyn Dodgers.
Ann Beattie (1947– ), short-story writer.
Nelson Algren, The Neon Wilderness.
W. H. Auden, The Age of Anxiety.
Robert Frost, A Masque of Mercy.

James Michener, Tales of the South Pacific.
John O'Hara, Hellbox.
Tennessee Williams, A Streetcar Named Desire.

1948

The Berlin blockade and airlift begins when the Soviet Union attempts to force the Western Allied powers to relinquish control of West Berlin.
The House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) investigates alleged Communists in the federal government.
President Harry S Truman outlaws segregation in the armed forces and federal civil service.
T. S. Eliot receives the Nobel Prize in literature.
Truman Capote, Other Voices, Other Rooms.
James Gould Cozzens, Guard of Honor.
William Faulkner, Intruder in the Dust.
Norman Mailer, The Naked and the Dead.
Ezra Pound, The Pisan Cantos.
Carl Sandburg, Remembrance Rock.
Irwin Shaw, The Young Lions.
William Carlos Williams, Paterson (Book Two).

1949

Eleven leaders of the U.S. Communist Party are convicted of conspiracy.
The Soviet Union explodes its first atomic weapon.
Joe DiMaggio renews his contract with the New York Yankees for $90,000.
Ezio Pinza sings "Some Enchanted Evening."
Sands of Iwo Jima opens in movie theaters.
William Faulkner receives the Nobel Prize in literature.
Nelson Algren, The Man With the Golden Arm.
Paul Bowles, The Sheltering Sky.
Raymond Chandler, The Little Sister.
Arthur Miller, Death of a Salesman.
John O'Hara, A Rage to Live.

1950

The Korean War begins when North Korea invades South Korea.
 Senator Joseph McCarthy asserts that 205 Communists are working in the U.S. State Department.
 Althea Gibson becomes the first African American woman to compete in a national tennis tournament.
 Nat "King" Cole sings "Mona Lisa."
 The musical Guys and Dolls premieres on Broadway.
 The National Book Awards are established.
 Ray Bradbury, The Martian Chronicles.
 T. S. Eliot, The Cocktail Party.
 Ernest Hemingway, Across the River and Into the Trees.
 Budd Schulberg, The Disenchanted.

1951

The Twenty-second Amendment to the Constitution limits presidential tenure to two terms.
 Julius and Ethel Rosenberg are found guilty of stealing U.S. atomic secrets for the U.S.S.R., and they are sentenced to death.
The African Queen opens in movie theaters.
 Nelson Algren, Chicago: City on the Make.
 William Faulkner, Requiem for a Nun.
 James Jones, From Here to Eternity.
 Carson McCullers, The Ballad of the Sad Café.
 Marianne Moore, Collected Poems.
 John O'Hara, The Farmers Hotel.
 J. D. Salinger, The Catcher in the Rye.
 William Styron, Lie Down in Darkness.
 Herman Wouk, The Caine Mutiny.

1952

The HUAC increases its investigations of Communists; meanwhile, the Truman administration enforces loyalty oaths for government employees.
High Noon premieres in movie theaters.

Rocky Marciano knocks out Jersey Joe Walcott to take the heavyweight boxing championship. Upon his retirement four years later, Marciano is undefeated in forty-nine professional fights (with forty-three knockouts).
 Ralph Ellison, The Invisible Man.
 Ernest Hemingway, The Old Man and the Sea.
 Archibald MacLeish, Collected Poems.
 John Steinbeck, East of Eden.
 E. B. White, Charlotte's Web.

1953

An armistice is signed, halting the fighting in the Korean War.
 The administration of Dwight D. Eisenhower (1953–1961) begins.
 Patti Page sings "That Doggie in the Window."
 George Plimpton begins publication of the Paris Review.
 Louis L'Amour, Hondo.
 James Baldwin, Go Tell It on the Mountain.
 Saul Bellow, The Adventures of Augie March.
 Raymond Chandler, The Long Goodbye.
 Arthur Miller, The Crucible.
 Richard Wright, The Outsider.

1954

In Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously declares racial segregation in public schools to be unconstitutional.
 Senator Joseph McCarthy is censured by the Senate.
 Ernest Hemingway receives the Nobel Prize in literature.
 T. S. Eliot, The Confidential Clerk.
 William Faulkner, A Fable.
 Louis L'Amour, Kilkenny.
 Wallace Stevens, Collected Poems.
 Eudora Welty, The Ponder Heart.

1955

The polio vaccine developed by Dr. Jonas Salk is declared effective and safe.
 African American leaders mount a bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama.
 Bill Haley and His Comets sing "Rock Around the Clock."
The Seven Year Itch premieres in movie theaters.
 Elizabeth Bishop, North & South: A Cold Spring.
 William Inge, Bus Stop.
 MacKinlay Kantor, Andersonville.
 Louis L'Amour, Guns of the Timberlands.
 Arthur Miller, A View from the Bridge.
 Flannery O'Connor, A Good Man is Hard to Find, and Other Stories.
 John O'Hara, Ten North Frederick.
 Tennessee Williams, Cat on a Hot Tin Roof.
 Herman Wouk, Marjorie Morningstar.

1956

The first African American student is admitted to the University of Alabama.
 Elvis Presley sings "Heartbreak Hotel."
 New York Yankee Don Larsen pitches the only perfect game in World Series history.
 Nelson Algren, A Walk on the Wild Side.
 John Berryman, Homage to Mistress Bradstreet.
 Allen Ginsberg, Howl: And Other Poems.
 John F. Kennedy, Profiles in Courage.
 Louis L'Amour, The Burning Hills.
 Edwin O'Connor, The Last Hurrah.
 Eugene O'Neill, Long Day's Journey into Night.
 Grace Metalious, Peyton Place.

1957

President Eisenhower sends U.S. Army paratroopers to Little Rock, Arkansas, to enforce the desegregation of Central High School.

Martin Luther King Jr. and other black leaders form the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to work for integration.
Elvis Presley sings "All Shook Up" and "Jailhouse Rock."
Twelve Angry Men opens in movie theaters.
Althea Gibson becomes the first African American to win the women's singles title at Wimbledon.
James Agee, A Death in the Family.
John Cheever, The Wapshot Chronicle.
James Gould Cozzens, By Love Possessed.
William Faulkner, The Town.
Jack Kerouac, On the Road.
Bernard Malamud, The Assistant.
Theodore Roethke, Words for the Wind.
Richard Wilbur, Poems, 1943–1956.

1958

The first U.S. Earth satellite, Explorer I, is launched.
Truman Capote, Breakfast at Tiffany's.
Raymond Chandler, Playback.
John Kenneth Galbraith, The Affluent Society.
Archibald MacLeish, J. B.
Vladimir Nabokov, Lolita.
John O'Hara, From the Terrace.
Tennessee Williams, Suddenly Last Summer.

1959

Alaska and Hawaii become the forty-ninth and fiftieth states in the union, respectively.
The movie Ben Hur opens in theaters.
Bobby Darin sings "Mack the Knife."
The American Football League is formed with eight professional teams.
Saul Bellow, Henderson the Rain King.
William S. Burroughs, The Naked Lunch.
T. S. Eliot, The Elder Statesman.
William Faulkner, The Mansion.
Lorraine Hansberry, A Raisin in the Sun.
Robert Lowell, Life Studies.

Philip Roth, Goodbye, Columbus.
W. D. Snodgrass, Heart's Needle.

1960

Sit-ins occur throughout the South in protest of racial discrimination.
Candidates Richard M. Nixon and John F. Kennedy hold the first televised presidential debates.
Psycho and Spartacus open in movie theaters.
Ray Charles sings "Georgia on My Mind."
Elvis Presley sings "Are You Lonesome Tonight?"
James Dickey, Into the Stone and Other Poems.
Randall Jarrell, The Woman at the Washington Zoo.
Harper Lee, To Kill a Mockingbird.
John O'Hara, Ourselves to Know and Sermons and Soda Water.
Isaac Bashevis Singer, The Magician of Lublin.
William Styron, Set This House on Fire.
John Updike, Rabbit, Run.

1961

The administration of President John F. Kennedy (1961–1963) begins.
The United States supports Cuban exiles in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion.
The Freedom Rides begin in the South to protest segregation.
West Side Story premieres in movie theaters.
Ray Charles sings "Hit the Road, Jack."
James Baldwin, Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son.
John Dos Passos, Midcentury.
Robert A. Heinlein, Stranger in a Strange Land.
Joseph Heller, Catch-22.
John O'Hara, Assembly.
J. D. Salinger, Franny and Zooey.
Isaac Bashevis Singer, The Spinoza of Market Street.

1962

In the Cuban Missile Crisis, American naval forces impose a blockade around Cuba in order to force the removal of Soviet missiles.
James Meredith is the first African American to attend the University of Mississippi.
John Steinbeck receives the Nobel Prize in literature.
Thornton Wilder receives the first National Medal for Literature.
The movie Dr. No opens.
Tony Bennett sings "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."
Wilt Chamberlain becomes the first professional basketball player to score 100 points in a single game.
Edward Albee, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?
James Dickey, Drowning with Others.
William Faulkner, The Reivers.
Vladimir Nabokov, Pale Fire.
Katherine Anne Porter, Ship of Fools.
William Carlos Williams, Pictures from Brueghel and Other Poems.
Edmund Wilson, Patriotic Gore.

1963

John F. Kennedy is assassinated, and Lyndon B. Johnson becomes president (1963–1969).
Martin Luther King Jr. gives his "I Have a Dream Speech" at the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C.
The Birds opens in movie theaters.
Jack Nicklaus wins the Masters Tournament and the PGA (Professional Golfers' Association of America) Championship.
The New York Review of Books is founded.
Nelson Algren, Who Lost an American?
Louis L'Amour, How the West Was Won.
Bernard Malamud, Idiot's First.
Mary McCarthy, The Group.
Thomas Pynchon, V.
John Updike, The Centaur.

1964

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 outlaws all discrimination in public accommodations and facilities; it also protects employment and voting rights. Martin Luther King Jr. is awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

The Gulf of Tonkin Resolution authorizes the president to use any means necessary to repel attacks against U.S. military forces in Southeast Asia.

Dr. Strangelove or: How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb opens in movie theaters.

Saul Bellow, Herzog.

John Berryman, 77 Dream Songs.

James Gould Cozzens, Children and Others.

James Dickey, Helmets, The Suspect in Poetry, and Two Poems of the Air.

Ernest Hemingway, A Moveable Feast.

John O'Hara, The Horse Knows the Way.

1965

In the State of the Union address, President Johnson uses the term Great Society to describe his program of national reform.

The Voting Rights Act is passed to counter local and state barriers that hinder African Americans from voting.

Civil-rights leader Malcolm X is assassinated by rival Black Muslims at a rally in Harlem.

The Sound of Music premieres in movie theaters.

The Metropolitan Museum in New York stages the highly successful "Three Centuries of American Painting" exhibit.

Edward Albee, Tiny Alice.

James Dickey, Buckdancer's Choice.

Alex Haley, The Autobiography of Malcolm X.

Frank Herbert, Dune.

Norman Mailer, An American Dream.

Flannery O'Connor, Everything That Rises Must Converge.

John O'Hara, The Lockwood Concern.

1966

Medicare and Medicaid, federal health-insurance programs for the elderly and the poor, respectively, go into effect.

Edward Albee, A Delicate Balance.

John Barth, Giles Goat-Boy.

Truman Capote, In Cold Blood.

Bernard Malamud, The Fixer.

James Merrill, Nights and Days: Poems.

Thomas Pynchon, The Crying of Lot 49.

1967

The U.S. troop strength in Vietnam reaches 475,000; meanwhile, antiwar protests at home increase.

Race riots occur in Detroit and Newark.

The Green Bay Packers defeat the Kansas City Chiefs in the first annual Super Bowl game.

The Graduate plays in movie theaters.

The Doors sing "Light My Fire."

Richard Brautigan, Trout Fishing in America.

James Dickey, Poems 1957–1967.

William Styron, The Confessions of Nat Turner.

Isaac Bashevis Singer, The Manor.

Thornton Wilder, The Eighth Day.

1968

Civil-rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. and Senator Robert F. Kennedy are both assassinated.

Antiwar protestors disrupt the Democratic National Convention in Chicago.

The Viet Cong, backed by North Vietnamese regular troops, launch the Tet Offensive and attack key sites throughout South Vietnam.

James Gould Cozzens, Morning Noon and Night.

Joan Didion, Slouching Towards Bethlehem.

Norman Mailer, The Armies of the Night.

Arthur Miller, The Price.

N. Scott Momaday, House Made of Dawn.

Ezra Pound, Cantos.

John Updike, Couples.

1969

The administration of President Richard M. Nixon (1969–1973) begins.

The number of U.S. troops in South Vietnam is at its highest level (541,500).

Astronauts of the Apollo 11 mission land on the Moon.

Elizabeth Bishop, Complete Poems.

N. Scott Momaday, The Way to Rainy Mountain.

Mario Puzo, The Godfather.

Philip Roth, Portnoy's Complaint.

Kurt Vonnegut, Slaughterhouse-Five.

1970

Four Kent State University students are shot by National Guardsmen during a campus antiwar demonstration.

The movies Love Story and Patton open in theaters.

The Beatles sing "Let It Be."

At Wimbledon, Billie Jean King and Rosemary Casals win the women's doubles title for the third time in four years.

Saul Bellow, Mr. Sammler's Planet.

James Dickey, Deliverance.

Joan Didion, Play It as It Lays.

Ernest Hemingway, Islands in the Stream.

Leon Uris, QB VII.

1971

The Twenty-sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution lowers the voting age from 21 to 18.

The French Connection premieres in movie theaters.

Janis Joplin sings "Me and Bobby McGee."

Godspell, a rock musical, plays on Broadway.
 Willie Mays scores his 1,950th run in the National League.
 William Peter Blatty, The Exorcist.
 Ernest J. Gaines, The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman.
 Bernard Malamud, The Tenants.
 Herman Wouk, The Winds of War.

1972

Richard M. Nixon becomes the first American president to visit China.
Fiddler on the Roof is the longest-running show in Broadway history.
 A. R. Ammons, Collected Poems, 1951–1971.
 John Barth, Chimera.
 Allen Ginsberg, The Fall of America: Poems of These States, 1965–1971.
 Ira Levin, The Stepford Wives.
 Ishmael Reed, Mumbo Jumbo.
 Isaac Bashevis Singer, Enemies: A Love Story.
 Eudora Welty, The Optimist's Daughter.

1973

The Paris Peace Accords are signed, ending the Vietnam War.
American Graffiti and The Sting play in movie theaters.
 Lillian Hellman, Pentimento.
 Robert Lowell, The Dolphin.
 Thomas Pynchon, Gravity's Rainbow.
 Isaac Bashevis Singer, A Crown of Feathers.
 Kurt Vonnegut, Breakfast of Champions.

1974

Because of the Watergate scandal, President Richard M. Nixon resigns, and he is succeeded by the vice president, Gerald R. Ford (1974–1977).
 The first issue of People, an offshoot of Time magazine dedicated to real life stories and celebrities, is printed.

Henry “Hank” Aaron of the Atlanta Braves breaks Babe Ruth's record when he hits his 715th career home run.
 Peter Benchley, Jaws.
 Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward, All the President's Men.
 Evan S. Connell, The Connoisseur.
 William Everson, Man-Fate: The Swan Song of Brother Antoninus.
 Joseph Heller, Something Happened.
 Stephen King, Carrie.
 James Michener, Centennial.
 Gary Snyder, Turtle Island.

1975

Barry Lyndon and The Rocky Horror Picture Show open in movie theaters.
 Edward Albee, Seascape.
 John Ashbery, Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror.
 Saul Bellow, Humboldt's Gift.
 James Clavell, Shogun: A Novel of Japan.
 E. L. Doctorow, Ragtime.
 Judith Rossner, Looking for Mr. Goodbar.
 Anne Sexton, The Awful Rowing Toward God.

1976

The United States celebrates the Bicentennial.
A Star Is Born opens in movie theaters.
 Saul Bellow wins the Nobel Prize in literature.
 Alex Haley, Roots.
 Ira Levin, The Boys from Brazil.
 Anne Rice, Interview with the Vampire.
 Leon Uris, Trinity.
 Kurt Vonnegut, Slapstick.

1977

The administration of Jimmy Carter (1977–1981) begins.
Star Wars opens in movie theaters.
 Philip Caputo, A Rumor of War.

Robert Coover, The Public Burning.
 John Gregory Dunne, True Confessions.
 Walker Percy, Lancelot.

1978

Muhammad Ali defeats Leon Spinks and becomes the first man ever to win the heavyweight boxing championship three times.
 Isaac Bashevis Singer wins the Nobel Prize in literature.
 John Gardner, On Moral Fiction.
 John Irving, The World According to Garp.
 Herman Wouk, War and Remembrance.
 Louis Zukofsky, “A.”

1979

Iranian militants storm the U.S. embassy in Teheran and take the diplomatic staff hostage.
 John Barth, Letters.
 Donald Justice, Selected Poems.
 Norman Mailer, The Executioner's Song.
 Philip Roth, The Ghost Writer.
 William Styron, Sophie's Choice.

1980

In a protest against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, President Carter announces that the United States will not participate in the summer Olympic Games in Moscow.
 The first American Book Awards, formerly known as the National Book Awards, are presented.
Grease, the longest-running show on Broadway to date, closes after nearly 3,390 performances.
 Jean M. Auel, The Clan of the Cave Bear.
 Galway Kinnell, Mortal Acts, Mortal Wounds.
 Walker Percy, The Second Coming.
 Tom Robbins, Still Life with Woodpecker.

1981

The administration of Ronald Reagan (1981–1989) begins.

Sandra Day O'Connor becomes the first female U.S. Supreme Court justice.

John Ashbery, Shadow Train.

Toni Morrison, Tar Baby.

Joseph Wambaugh, The Glitter Dome.

John Updike, Rabbit is Rich.

1982

The movie E.T.: The Extra-Terrestrial opens in theaters.

Jean M. Auel, The Valley of Horses.

Richard Condon, Prizzi's Honor.

John Jakes, North and South.

Richard Rodriguez, Hunger for Memory.

Paul Theroux, The Mosquito Coast.

Alice Walker, The Color Purple.

William Wharton, A Midnight Clear.

1983

Approximately 125 million people watch the last episode of the long-running comedy *M*A*S*H*; it is the largest television audience to date for a nonsports program.

The Martin Luther King Jr. national holiday is established.

A Chorus Line becomes the longest-running show in Broadway history.

Isaac Asimov, The Robots of Dawn.

William Kennedy, Ironweed.

Stephen King, Pet Sematary and Christine.

Isaac Bashevis Singer, Yentl the Yeshiva Boy.

1984

Geraldine Ferraro becomes the first woman to be nominated vice president on a major party ticket.

Jesse Jackson becomes the first African American to run a national campaign for a major party presidential nomination.

Michael Jackson's album Thriller reaches 37 million in sales and wins eight Grammy Awards.

Tom Clancy, The Hunt for Red October.

Louise Erdrich, Love Medicine.

Robert Ludlum, The Aquitaine Progression.

David Mamet, Glengarry Glen Ross.

Norman Mailer, Tough Guys Don't Dance.

Mario Puzo, The Sicilian.

Studs Terkel, The Good War.

John Updike, The Witches of Eastwick.

Gore Vidal, Lincoln.

1985

John Irving, The Cider House Rules.

Garrison Keillor, Lake Wobegon Days.

Stephen King, Skeleton Crew.

Carolyn Kizer, Yin.

Larry McMurtry, Lonesome Dove.

Anne Tyler, The Accidental Tourist.

Kurt Vonnegut, Galápagos.

1986

The space shuttle Challenger explodes shortly after liftoff, killing all crew members.

Blue Velvet plays in movie theaters.

Robert Penn Warren is named the first poet laureate of the United States.

Don DeLillo, White Noise.

Rita Dove, Thomas and Beulah.

Ernest Hemingway, The Garden of Eden.

Stephen King, It.

Robert Ludlum, The Bourne Supremacy.

James Welch, Fools Crow.

August Wilson, Fences.

1987

The Tower Commission reports on the Iran-Contra Affair, a secret arrangement by which American arms were sold to Iran in exchange for the release of hostages in Lebanon; some of the money was then funneled to the Contras, U.S.-backed rebels in Nicaragua.

Louis L'Amour, The Haunted Mesa.

T. Coraghessan Boyle, World's End.

Toni Morrison, Beloved.

Tom Wolfe, The Bonfire of the Vanities.

1988

President Reagan signs a bill offering apologies and reparations to Japanese Americans interned by the U.S. government during World War II (1941–1945).

Publishing rights to a sequel to Margaret Mitchell's Gone With the Wind (1936) are sold to Warner Books for nearly 5 million dollars.

Pop artist Andy Warhol's collection of art and other objects is auctioned for some 25 million dollars.

Anne Tyler, Breathing Lessons.

Alfred Uhry, Driving Miss Daisy.

Wendy Wasserstein, The Heidi Chronicles.

1989

The administration of George H. W. Bush (1989–1993) begins.

American military forces invade Panama and overthrow President Manuel Noriega.

Movies this year gross 5 billion dollars.

E. L. Doctorow, Billy Bathgate.

Ken Follett, Pillars of the Earth.

John Grisham, A Time to Kill.

Oscar Hijuelos, The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love.

Charles Simic, The World Doesn't End: Prose Poems.

Amy Tan, The Joy Luck Club.

1990

Andrew Wyeth becomes the first artist to receive a Congressional Gold Medal.

Congress requires artists who receive grants from the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and whose work is deemed obscene must return the money.

Walter Mosley, Devil in a Blue Dress.

Camille Paglia, Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson.

John Updike, Rabbit at Rest.

August Wilson, The Piano Lesson.

1991

The Soviet Union dissolves and twelve of the former member republics form the Commonwealth of Independent States.
Harold Brodkey, The Runaway Soul.
Don DeLillo, Mao II.
Bret Easton Ellis, American Psycho.
John Grisham, The Firm.
Amy Tan, The Kitchen God's Wife.

1992

A severe economic recession begins.
Dorothy Allison, Bastard out of Carolina.
Robert Olen Butler, A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain.
David Mamet, Oleanna.
Susan Sontag, The Volcano Lover.
Robert James Waller, The Bridges of Madison County.
Joseph Wambaugh, Fugitive Nights.

1993

The administration of Bill Clinton (1993–2001) begins.
Toni Morrison is awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.
T. Coraghessan Boyle, The Road to Wellville.
Larry McMurtry, Streets of Laredo.

1994

Woodstock '94 is held in upstate New York; it commemorates the twenty-fifth anniversary of the original weekend-long concert.
Julia Alvarez, In the Time of Butterflies.
Michael Crichton, Disclosure.
William Gaddis, A Frolic of His Own.
Joseph Heller, Closing Time.

1995

Ann Beattie, Another You.
Nicholas Evans, The Horse Whisperer.
William H. Gass, The Tunnel.
Philip Roth, Sabbath's Theater.

1996

Sherman Alexie, Indian Killer.
Mary Higgins Clark, Moonlight Becomes You.
Terry McMillan, How Stella Got Her Groove Back.
Robert Pinsky, The Figured Wheel: New and Collected Poems, 1966–1996.
Nicholas Sparks, The Notebook.

1997

Titanic, the most expensive movie of all time (it cost nearly 300 million dollars to produce), opens in American theaters.
Charles Frazier, Cold Mountain.
Kurt Vonnegut, Timequake.
Edmund White, The Farewell Symphony.

1998

The American Film Institute names Citizen Kane as the number-one movie of all time.
Volume 200 of the Dictionary of Literary Biography is published.
Barbara Kingsolver, The Poisonwood Bible.
Robert Stone, Damascus Gate.

1999

The long-awaited Star Wars prequel, Episode I: The Phantom Menace, grosses 102.7 million dollars in five days.
Ralph Ellison, Juneteenth.
Janet Fitch, White Oleander.
W. S. Merwin, The River Sound.
Annie Proulx, Close Range: Wyoming Stories.

2000

The presidential election is contested by Al Gore, who demands a recount of the Florida ballots; the U.S. Supreme Court later reaffirms the victory of George W. Bush.
Alice Adams, After the War.

Wendell Berry, Jayber Crow: The Life Story of Jayber Crow, Barber, of the Port William Membership, as Written by Himself.
Alyson Hagy, Graveyard of the Atlantic.
Stanley Kunitz, The Collected Poems.
Philip Roth, The Human Stain.
Dave Smith, The Wicks of Memory: New and Selected Poems, 1970–2000.
Susan Sontag, In America.

2001

The administration of George W. Bush (2001– ) begins.
In the worst terrorist attack on the U.S. homeland, Islamic terrorists hijack four jet airliners and destroy the World Trade Center in New York City and heavily damage the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.; approximately 3,000 people are killed.
The United States attacks and deposes the government in Afghanistan.
Betty Adcock, Intervale: New and Selected Poems.
Saul Bellow, Collected Stories.
Mary Lee Settle, I, Roger Williams.
Elizabeth Spencer, The Southern Woman: New and Selected Fiction.
Amy Tan, The Bonesetter's Daughter.

2002

Robert Ashcom, Winter Run: Stories of an Enchanted Boyhood in a Lost Time and Place.
Robert Bausch, The Gypsy Man.
Donald Hall, The Painted Bed.
Hilary McKay, Saffy's Angel.

2003

The American Academy of Arts and Letters Gold Medal in Poetry is awarded to W. S. Merwin.
Mitch Albom, The Five People You Meet in Heaven.

Dan Brown, The Da Vinci Code.
Khaled Hosseini, The Kite Runner.
Christopher Paolini, Eragon.

2004

Gennifer Choldenko, Al Capone Does My Shirts.
Wendy Coakley-Thompson, Back to Life.
Nick Sagan, Edenborn.

2005

Bret Easton Ellis, Lunar Park.
John Irving, Until I Find You.
Andrew Vachss, Two Trains Running.

2006

T. Coraghessan Boyle, Talk Talk.
Al Gore, An Inconvenient Truth.
David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole.
Thomas Pynchon, Against the Day.

2007

Michael Chabon, The Yiddish Policemen's Union.
Don DeLillo, Falling Man.
Joshua Ferris, Then We Came to the End.
Khaled Hosseini, A Thousand Splendid Suns.

Adair, James (circa 1709–circa 1783) historian

While little is known about James Adair himself, he left one major record: The History of the American Indians, completed in 1768 and published in 1775. His experience among the Native Americans in the South anticipated the experiences of the latter-day frontiersmen and pioneers of the American West. Adair's study preceded William BARTRAM's better-known Observations on the Creek and Cherokee Indians by twenty years. Adair returned to England to secure publication. His efforts were a success, and his history was widely read and cited in England and the American colonies. Although Adair repeats a commonly held belief that Native Americans may have been members of the lost tribes of Israel, the firsthand knowledge and details the book contains—including his observations concerning Indian customs, languages, daily life, and important incidents—far outweigh this perception.

Born in county Antrim, Ireland, during the first decade of the eighteenth century, Adair was an intriguing character. Although no documentation exists to support Adair's parentage, he may have been the younger son of a nobleman. Disqualified from inheriting land, Adair joined the ranks of young aristocrats who migrated to North America in search of opportunity. He arrived in Charleston sometime around 1735 and became an Indian trader. Adair traded with and lived among the Native Americans in the South, specifically the Catawba, Cherokee, and Choctaw nations, gaining significant insights into their customs, cultures, and languages. Adair's knowledge of and access to the Indians allowed him to play an important role as a diplomat and mediator. His position toward the Indians was, however, mutable. During the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR (1754–1763), Adair organized and served as captain for a band of Chickasaw, who fought against the French. At times Adair appeared to favor the Indian political position, a policy that incurred disfavor among the other traders and the colonial administration. On the other hand, Adair advocated intertribal warfare as a way of reducing the Indian population as a whole. After briefly traveling to England to publish his work, Adair returned to America in 1775 and died near the close of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION in 1783.

Work

Adair, James. The History of the American Indians, Particularly Those Nations Adjoining to the Mississippi, East and West Florida, Georgia, South and North Carolina, and Virginia. London: E. & C. Dilly, 1775; New York: Johnson Reprint, 1968.

Adams, Abigail (1744–1818) correspondent

Abigail Smith Adams was an energetic letter writer, an astute observer of politics and diplomacy, and the wife of John ADAMS, the second president of the United States. Her letters are considered “the best account that exists from the pre- to the post-Revolutionary period in America of a woman's life and world,” according to Adams historian Edith B. Gelles. Adams's correspondence reveals spontaneity, intelligence, and sincerity. It also illustrates in equal measure both the everyday and the historic during the early years of the Republic.

Despite her self-perception as a private person, Abigail Smith Adams was a public figure. She was often accused of having too much influence over her husband; a political opponent of the Adamses once sarcastically dubbed Abigail “her Majesty.” Like her husband, Adams was a staunch FEDERALIST, and she was probably of a more conservative social bent than he. In 1786 she condemned the western Massachusetts farmers who had mounted SHAYS'S REBELLION, a protest against taxation and the loss of their land, and called for the rebels to be executed. She also strongly supported the Alien and Sedition Acts, passed during her husband's term of office. At the same time, Adams was a proponent of legal reforms that would give married women more control over property. She could also be a peacemaker, writing to Thomas JEFFERSON to help heal the rift between the Virginian and her husband. Perhaps her best-known statement appears in her letter of March 31, 1776, to John Adams. Writing to her husband, then a delegate to the first Continental Congress, she issued this challenge:

In the new code of laws which I suppose it will be necessary for you to make, I desire you would remember the ladies and be more generous and favorable to them than your ancestors. Do not put such unlimited power in the hands of the husbands. Remember, all men would be tyrants if they could. If particular care and attention is not paid to the ladies, we are determined to foment a rebellion, and will not hold ourselves bound by any laws in which we have no voice or representation.

Abigail's mother, Elizabeth Quincy Smith, was connected by blood and marriage to many of the Massachusetts colony's elite. Her father, Reverend William Smith, was a Congregationalist minister in Weymouth, Massachusetts. Adams never had a formal education, perhaps due to bouts of illness as a child. She was educated at home in an intellectually stimulating atmosphere filled with discussion and debate. Nevertheless, she resented her lack of formal training, and as an adult she often pointed out the discrimination and disparities in the education of boys and girls.

Abigail Smith met John Adams in 1759, and the two married in 1764. They had five children, only two of whom outlived their mother. John Quincy Adams was the only son to follow in his father's footsteps as a national political figure.

Political activities, wartime, and diplomatic assignments often separated the Adamses. From 1774 to 1784, letters constituted their main contact with each other. During these years, Abigail ran their farm in Massachusetts, proving herself such a capable manager that the family's financial well-being in the postwar years was largely attributable to her.

At the end of the war, Abigail accompanied John on his diplomatic mission to France and later went with him to England for his three-year assignment as the first U.S. ambassador to the Court of St. James. In 1796 Abigail Smith Adams became the country's second First Lady. The unfinished President's House, she observed, was drafty and cold, and she showed no sorrow when the British later burned it down during the War of 1812. When John Adams retired from politics in 1801, the couple settled down on their Braintree farm. Abigail Smith Adams died on October 28, 1818.

Works

Adams, Abigail. New Letters of Abigail Adams, 1788–1801. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1947.

Adams, Abigail, and John Adams. The Adams-Jefferson Letters: The Complete Correspondence between Thomas Jefferson and Abigail and John Adams, 2 volumes, edited by Lester J. Cappon. Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1959.

Adams and Adams. The Book of Abigail and John: Selected Letters of the Adams Family, 1762–1784, edited by L. H. Butterfield, Marc Friedlaender, and Mary-Jo Kline. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1975.

Adams and Adams. The Letters of John and Abigail Adams, edited by Frank Shuffleton. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Sources

Akers, Charles W. Abigail Adams: An American Woman, third edition. New York: Longman, 2006.

Gelles, Edith B. Abigail Adams: A Writing Life. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Levin, Phyllis Lee. Abigail Adams: A Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987.

Adams, Hannah (1755–1831) historian

Hannah Adams, the first woman in America to make her living by writing, was born in the farming town of Medfield, Massachusetts. Her mother died when Adams was ten years old, but her father, an educated man despite his position as the proprietor of a small country store, nurtured a lifelong love of learning in his frail, often ailing daughter. Adams's poor health kept her from attending school, but she managed to learn both Greek and Latin from divinity students who boarded at the Adams home. It was her knowledge of these two classical languages that earned her a modest living as a teacher.

Adams published her first major work, An Alphabetical Compendium of the Various Sects . . . from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Present Day, in 1784. As Adams explained, she wanted to produce a work that would "avoid giving the least preference to any denomination." Nevertheless, if her descriptions were unbiased, the space she allotted to each denomination was not. Nor was this allotment constant. In the first edition, for example, the Shakers received four full pages while the Unitarians received six lines. By the second edition, which appeared in 1791, Unitarianism had come into its own, receiving nine pages.

Using the income from the compendium, Adams paid off her debts and began a new, ambitious project, a history of New England, to be compiled from primary sources. As she pored over colonial records, her eyesight weakened, but she refused to abandon the project. Using a mixture of "laudanum and sea water" several times a day for two years, she recovered sufficiently to complete the manuscript. A Summary History of New-England appeared in 1799 and sold briskly. She followed this book with others, including a history of the Jews.

Although she earned little money from these efforts, Adams built a faithful following, which included President John ADAMS and New England intellectuals such as Josiah Quincy (1772–1864). She also earned recognition as a scholar. When she began work on her history of the Jews in the early nineteenth century, Adams was granted free access to do research in the BOSTON ATHENAEUM and in the private libraries of leading New England families. Years of poverty and failing health put an end to Adams's writing career after the War of 1812. Unable to support herself during the last years of her life, Adams was assisted by friends who supplied her with an annuity. In A Memoir of Miss Hannah Adams, an autobiography published soon after her death in 1832, she recounted the difficulties of sustaining a career as a female writer, and acknowledged her need for assistance in her final years.

Works

Adams, Hannah. An Alphabetical Compendium of the Various Sects Which Have Appeared in the World from the Beginning of the Christian Era to the Present Day. Boston: Printed by B. Edes & Sons, 1784. Revised as A Dictionary of All Religions and Religious Denominations, Jewish, Heathen, Mahometan, and Christian, Ancient, and Modern. Boston: James Eastburn, 1817; Early American Imprints, 18319.

Adams. A Summary History of New-England, from the First Settlement at Plymouth, to the Acceptance of the Federal Constitution: Comprehending a General Sketch of the American War. Dedham, Mass.: Printed for the author by H. Mann and J. H. Adams, 1799; Early American Imprints, 35075.

Source

Schmidt, Gary D. A Passionate Usefulness: The Life and Literary Labors of Hannah Adams. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2004.

Adams, John (1735–1826) statesman, correspondent

The Revolution was effected before the War commenced. The Revolution was in the minds and hearts of the people. . . .

—Adams to Hezekiah Niles, February 13, 1818

The literary career of John Adams varied in style and substance throughout his life, but as a whole, Adams's letters represent one of the most important collections of correspondence from this period. He and Mercy Otis WARREN exchanged letters regularly. Their correspondence, which focused on the politics and personalities of the Revolutionary era, showcased their emerging political ideologies. At the same time, Adams established similar relationships with James Warren and Samuel ADAMS. Adams initiated a separate series of valuable correspondence with his wife Abigail during his frequent and lengthy absences from Boston. Although his correspondence was for the most part direct and businesslike, Adams displayed a literary side and a facility with metropolitan manners. The following passage is from a letter Adams wrote to Mercy Warren on January 8, 1776:

Portrait of John Adams, age 30, by Benjamin Blyth

I was charmed with three Characters drawn by a most masterly Pen . . . Copley's Pencil could not have touched off with more exquisite Finishings the Faces of those Gentlemen. Whether I ever answered that Letter I know not. But I hope Posterity will see it, if they do I am sure they will admire it. I think I will make a Bargain with you, to draw the Character of every new Personage I have an opportunity of knowing, on Condition you will do the same. My View will be to learn the Art of penetrating into Men's Bosoms, and then the more difficult Art of Painting what I shall see there. You Ladies are the most infallible judges of Characters, I think.

John Adams was born on October 30, 1735 in Braintree, Massachusetts, the eldest son of John Adams, a yeoman farmer, and Susanna Boylston, the daughter of a prominent family. From the beginning, his future was directed toward higher education. Adams notes in his autobiography that his father "had destined his first born, long before his birth to a public Education." Accordingly, Adams began his preparation at an early age, at home and under a series of local tutors.

Following his graduation from HARVARD COLLEGE in 1755, Adams turned his attention to a career in law. On November 18, 1755, Adams also made the first entry in his new diary. He maintained the diary for forty years, making it one of the most important first-hand records of life and politics during the late colonial and Revolutionary eras. Over time Adams improved as a diarist, his entries progressing from brief notations on the weather to complex and highly internalized commentaries on a wide range of subjects and individuals. For Adams, maintaining a diary, which included his autobiography, was a way to set the record straight regarding his life and his participation in the formative events that surrounded the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and the constituting of the NEW REPUBLIC.

As a legal apprentice to Jeremiah Gridley (1702–1767), a prominent Boston attorney, Adams met a number of important lawyers, including James OTIS Jr., one of the most talented legal scholars of his time. Otis became an informal mentor and model for Adams, giving him free access to his legal library and entry into Boston's legal and political circles. In turn, Adams sat through Otis's appearances in court, studiously recording his speeches. In 1758 Otis joined Gridley in sponsoring Adams's admission to the bar. Adams immediately established his own practice, but it grew slowly. In 1759 he recorded a mixture of frustration and determination in his diary: "How shall I gain a Reputation! How shall I Spread an Opinion of myself as a Lawyer of distinguished Genius, Learning, and Virtue . . . Shall I creep or fly."

In 1764 Adams married Abigail Smith, the daughter of Reverend William and Elizabeth Quincy Smith. They had four surviving children between 1765 and 1772: Abigail, John Quincy, Charles, and Thomas.

Adams's connections grew. He became a regular at the Monday Night Club, a gathering place for Boston's political opposition. In 1765 he penned a series of essays celebrating the law, A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law. Adams apparently wrote essays for practice as well, since a number of them remained unpublished, as was the case with "A Dissertation Upon Seekers—of Elections, Commissions from the Governour, of Commissions from the Crown" (1765). Adams wrote this piece as a retort to Jonathan SEWALL's "Philanthrop" essays, but it was never submitted for publication.

Protesting the STAMP ACT, an English tax on printed material and legal documents, Adams wrote the resolutions for Braintree in which he emphasized the colonists' right to freedom from taxation by Britain. The resolutions were subsequently published in a number of newspapers, including The Massachusetts Gazette (1765). Impressed with his cousin's arguments, Samuel Adams incorporated them into the resolutions for Boston. Now viewed as a member of the opposition leadership, Adams was elected along with Gridley and Otis to present the opposition's case before the governor and the council.

Politics led to public acclaim, a growing docket of cases, and an increasing list of important contacts. During 1768–1769, he defended John Hancock (1737–1793) on a charge of smuggling; and Michael Corbet and three other sailors, who were charged with the murder of an English naval officer. His friends urged him to move to Boston, and in 1768 Adams purchased a home on Brattle Square. That same year Adams was approached by Jonathan Sewall and offered the post of Advocate General in the Court of the Admiralty. Adams immediately declined the offer, noting in his autobiography that it was in direct conflict with his political loyalties. In 1770 Adams was elected as Boston's representative to the General Court, serving one year and resigning for reasons of health.

Throughout this period, Adams strengthened his connection with James Otis Jr., although he began to question his mentor's stability. Through Otis he met James Warren (1726–1808), Otis's brother-in-law, who was also a lawyer and a member of the Massachusetts elite. By early 1772 the Adamses and the Warrens had become friends and political allies, an alliance that lasted through the American Revolution.

Adams was continually on the front lines of the colonial rebellion. In 1774 he helped lead the protests against the Boston Port Act, a punitive English law designed as a response to the dumping of the tea in Boston Harbor. That same year he was chosen as a delegate to the First Continental Congress. After his return to Boston, Adams engaged in a war of newspaper essays with "Massachusettensis"—lawyer Daniel Leonard (1740–1829). Writing under the pseudonym "Novanglus," which translates as "New England," Adams argued that the legal status of the colonies—which included semi-autonomy from Parliament—was based on the precedents established in the colonial charters.

From 1774 forward, Adams abandoned his legal practice in favor of politics. His correspondence detailed the problems and opportunities of independence. Adams was concerned that the movement for a new government might result in too little democracy, particularly in the southern colonies, which he viewed as tending toward autocracy. Having read Thomas PAINE's recently published Common Sense (1776), Adams became equally concerned with the trend toward too much democracy. In Thoughts on Government (1776), Adams pro-

Miss Adorable

By the same Token that the Bearer hereof satt up with you last night I hereby order you to give him, as many kisses, and as many Hours of your Company after 9 O'Clock as he shall please to Demand and charge them to my Account: This Order, or Requisition call it which you will is in Consideration of a similar order Upon America for the like favours, and I presume I have good Right to draw upon you for the kisses as I have given two or three Millions at least, where one has been rec<sup>d</sup> and of consequence the Account between us is immensely in favour of you

Oct 4th 1762 John Adams

Love letter from 27-year-old John Adams to Abigail Smith dated October 4, 1772, two years before their marriage. The salutation is to "Miss Adorable," and the letter begins, "By the same Token that the Bearer hereof satt up with you last night I hereby order you to give him, as many Kisses, and as many Hours of your Company after 9 O'Clock as he shall please to Demand..."

posed a republic with a bicameral assembly and independent executive and judiciary branches, adding:

the happiness of society is the end of government, as all divines and moral philosophers will agree that the happiness of the individual is the end of man. From this principle it will follow, that the form of government which communicates ease, comfort, security, or, in one word, happiness, to the greatest number of persons, and in the greatest degree, is the best.

From 1776 to 1777 Adams was actively involved in politics on the national level as a delegate to the Second Continental Congress, where he endeavored to define the shape of the new government and to secure a formal declaration of independence from England. Adams also served on a number of important committees, including the Board of War. In November 1778 Adams was elected a commissioner to France. He arrived in Paris in April and returned to Boston in August 1779, having focused on securing loans, supplies, and military aid. In November 1779 Adams returned to Europe as minister to France and Spain, a position he shared with John JAY. He was also appointed as the sole American representative to Great Britain. Although his efforts were complicated by the presence and conflicting agendas of Jay and Benjamin FRANKLIN, Adams was relatively successful as a diplomat. He helped negotiate a favorable peace agreement with Britain, which included balancing the contradictory interests of France and Spain. Throughout this period Adams sent regular dispatches to Congress. These letters serve as an important source of information on American diplomacy during the Revolutionary era.

Remaining in Europe, Adams was appointed the official American envoy to England in 1785. In the face of unrelenting British criticism and suspicion of the political and economic viability of the United States, he published a three-volume Defence of the Constitutions of the United States of America against the Attack of Mr. Turgot (1787). Adams was particularly knowledgeable about the new state constitutions, since he had served as the primary author of the Massachusetts state constitution during the brief period between his two foreign appointments. Ratified in 1780, the Massachusetts constitution established a number of precedents for constitutions that followed, including the U.S. CONSTITUTION of 1789.

Adams returned to Boston in 1788. From 1789 to 1797 he served as the first vice president of the United States under George WASHINGTON. During this period Adams wrote Discourses on Davila (1791), a study of the French Revolution as an example of political chaos and democratic excess. In 1797 Adams became the second president of the United States. His administration was plagued with diplomatic and domestic problems, including French and British interference with American shipping and the unpopular Alien and Sedition Acts, which were a direct attempt to suppress political opposition. Adams failed in his reelection attempt, the victim of bad publicity, a flawed electoral process, and the machinations of Alexander HAMILTON. Following the completion of his term, he returned to the family estate in Quincy. In 1802 he began work on his Autobiography, which covered his life from birth through 1780.

Later in life, Adams was alienated from many of his earlier allies, including James and Mercy Warren. Comments made by Adams during his second mission to France and England had branded him, perhaps unfairly, as a monarchist. The Adamses and Warrens were further divided over the necessity of a new national constitution. Finally, the Warrens had requested Adams's assistance during his vice presidency in securing government positions for their sons. Adams, against political favoritism, politely ignored them. Their relationship was broken, and the letters ceased until 1807. That year Adams sent the first in a series of letters debating the veracity of Mercy Warren's recently published History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (1805). Adams complained that he had been misrepresented in the history, and an exchange of letters ensued. In the end, the letters succeeded in renewing the friendship. Adams had a similar experience with his old colleague and political rival, Thomas JEFFERSON. Ironically, Adams and Jefferson died hours apart on the fiftieth anniversary of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Works

- Adams, John. Thoughts on Government. Philadelphia: Printed by John Dunlap, 1776; Early American Imprints, 14639, 14640.
- Adams. Defence of the Constitutions. London, 1787; Early American Imprints, 20176, 20177.
- Adams. Discourses on Davila. A Series of Papers, on Political History. . . . Boston: Printed by Russell & Cutler, 1805; New York: De Capo, 1973.
- Adams. Diary of John Adams and Autobiography, in Volumes 2 and 3 of The Works of John Adams, edited by Charles Francis Adams. Boston: Little, Brown, 1850–1851. Republished as Diary and Autobiography of John Adams. Edited by L. H. Butterfield, Leonard C. Faber, and Wendell D. Garrett. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1961.
- Adams. The Political Writings of John Adams: Representative Selections. New York: Liberal Arts Press, 1954.
- Adams. Papers of John Adams, edited by Robert Joseph Taylor and others, 6 volumes to date. Cambridge, Mass: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1977– .
- Adams family. Adams Family Correspondence, edited by L. H. Butterfield and others, 8 volumes to date. Cambridge, Mass: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1963– .

Sources

- Ellis, Joseph J. Passionate Sage: The Character and Legacy of John Adams. New York: Norton, 1993.
- Grant, James. John Adams: Party of One. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2005.

McCullough, David. John Adams. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001.

Recommended Writings

A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law (1768)

Thoughts on Government (1776)

A Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America (1787–1788)

Discourses on Davila (1805)

Diary and Autobiography of John Adams (1850–1851)

Adams Family Correspondence (1761– )

Studying John Adams

John Adams is studied as a founding father whose philosophy helped shape the formation of the United States, as a political figure, and as a literary figure—largely on the basis of his letters. Actively involved in the PATRIOT cause for American independence, Adams served as a delegate from Massachusetts to the First and Second Continental Congresses in 1774 and 1777, as a diplomat in France, Spain, and Britain (1778–1788), and as George Washington's vice president (1789–1797). In 1797 Adams became the second president of the United States.

There are many extensive biographies on Adams. Among the more-recent biographies, students might explore Joseph J. Ellis's Passionate Sage: The Character and Legacy of John Adams (New York: Norton, 1993); David McCullough's John Adams (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001); John Patrick Diggins's John Adams (New York: Times Books, 2003); and James Grant's John Adams: Party of One (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2005).

For general background on the era of Adams's political and social career, students should consult Gordon Wood's Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969); John E. Ferling's Setting the World Ablaze: Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and the American Revolution (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000); and Richard Brookhiser's America's First Dynasty: The Adamses, 1735–1918 (New York: Free Press, 2002). For study on the Adams presidency, see Ralph A. Brown's The Presidency of John Adams (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1975). A standard bibliography on Adams is John Adams: A Bibliography, edited by Ferling (Westport, Conn: Greenwood Press, 1994).

Students interested in studying John Adams's correspondence should consult these standard editions: The Adams-Jefferson Letters: The Complete Correspondence between Thomas Jefferson and Abigail and John Adams, edited by Lester Jesse Cappon (2 volumes, Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1959) and The Book of Abigail and John: Selected Letters of the Adams Family, 1762–1784, edited by L. H. Butterfield, Marc Friedlaender, and Mary-Jo Kline (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1975). For access to Adams's correspondence with Mercy Warren see Correspondence between John Adams and Mercy Warren, edited by Charles Francis Adams (New York: Arno, 1972).

Electronic archives with extensive primary and secondary sources include The Adams Family Papers: An Electronic Archive, from the Massachusetts Historical Society, with images of manuscripts and digital transcriptions that include correspondence between John and Abigail Adams, the diary of John Adams, and the autobiography of John Adams (<<http://www.masshist.org/digitaladams/aea/>> viewed April 23, 2007); and the John Adams page from The University of Virginia's Miller Center of Public Affairs <<http://www.millercenter.virginia.edu/index.php/academic/americanpresident/adams>> viewed April 23, 2007).

Adams, Samuel (1722–1803) editorialist, statesman

Among the natural rights of the Colonists are these: First, a right to life; Second, to liberty; Thirdly, to property; together with the right to support and defend them in the best manner they can.

—“The State of the Rights of the Colonists” (1772)

PATRIOT leader Samuel Adams was born September 16, 1722 in Boston, the son of Samuel Adams, a prosperous brewer, and Mary Fifield Adams. Adams attended school in Massachusetts, beginning with a preparatory education at the Boston Latin School and continuing with two degrees at HARVARD COLLEGE. He earned his bachelor's degree in 1740 and his master's in 1743. Adams's education prepared him for one of three careers—law, commerce, or the ministry—and in a sense, he tried all three. He studied law for a brief period but did not complete his apprenticeship or apply for admission to the bar; he clerked for Thomas Cushing, one of the leading merchants in Boston, but he failed in his attempts to apply his training, both as a tax collector and as a shop owner; and although he did not become a clergyman, he punctuated his speeches and writing with references to religion and with Calvinist expressions.

Unsuccessful financially, Adams was among the first colonists to recognize the political value of the press. In 1748 he cofounded a short-lived newspaper; Adams thus received his initial training as a journalist. He became an editorialist, writing numerous articles on political and social subjects under a variety of pseudonyms. Adams was also active in the various informal political clubs that met in taverns, COFFEE-HOUSES, and in the back rooms of Boston's print shops. These meetings offered Bostonians the opportunity to exercise ideas, practice speaking, and form alliances. At the Monday Night Club, for example, Adams met with politically minded lawyers and merchants, including James OTIS Jr. and John ADAMS.

In 1763 Adams was chosen to write the instructions from Boston to the Crown concerning newly enacted taxes. In polite language he rejected the legal foundation of the taxes, claiming that taxation without representation amounted to a violation of the colonial charter. In 1765 he played a key role in the protests against the STAMP ACT, which resulted in riots. From then on, Adams was identified as an instigator of public demonstrations, even though he, like many other Patriot leaders, abhorred the mob. Immediately following the Stamp Act protests, Adams was elected as a representative to the state legislature, where he emerged as a leader of the opposition party. In 1766 he was elected clerk of the Assembly, a position he held until 1774.

Although opposed to royal interference in the politics and economy of Massachusetts, Adams was, at least in the early stages, a reluctant revolutionary. As the conflict with England expanded in the mid 1760s, his editorials continued to advise caution. By 1768, however, Adams was promoting organized resistance, serving as a cofounder of the Sons of Liberty, an urban militia made up of both upper- and lower-class citizens. For the next two years Adams opposed the presence of troops in his many editorials, listing numerous offenses allegedly committed by the soldiers against the citizenry.

To a large extent, Adams contributed to the tensions that resulted in the so-called Boston Massacre, a clash between British sentries and a local crowd on March 5, 1770. Although the British sentries were tried and acquitted by a jury of Bostonians, Adams, writing in THE BOSTON GAZETTE on December 24, 1770 under a pseudonym, continued to paint them as the guilty parties. Ignoring the mood and actions of the Boston crowd that had surrounded the soldiers, Adams insisted that the British soldiers had “behaved with an haughty air . . . abused the people as they pass’d along . . . and struck innocent persons there who offer’d them no injury.”

Adams was relentless in his attacks on English policy, publishing antigovernment editorials during the interim period of 1770 to 1773, often referred to as the quiet years of the Revolutionary era. In 1772 he played a leading role in founding the Boston committee of correspondence, which shared information with similar committees throughout Massachusetts and the other colonies. In “State of the Rights of the Colonists” (1772), issued as a report of the committee of correspondence, Adams drew upon the natural rights of man, inherent in each and every man irrespective of position or birth. The report kept the possibility and perhaps the probability of independence from England in the public mind. Adams’s argument reveals the depth of his education and reading: he makes references to classical literature, John Locke, British law, history, and current events in Europe.

In 1773 the quiet period was shattered by the Tea Act. Opposed to parliamentary taxes of any kind, Adams was a leader, at least in the planning stages, of the Boston Tea Party. He continued to lead the opposition against the series of retaliatory acts, which the colonists grouped as the Coercive or Intolerable Acts. These acts and the opposition to them led to the first Continental Congress in 1774. Adams served as a delegate from Massachusetts in this first national congress, and he became a signer of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Adams memorialized this event in one of his best-known speeches. Delivered in Philadelphia on August 1, 1776, the speech castigated moderates, who still sought an accommodation with England, and called for national unity among the thirteen new states. It was also a prime example of the Adams method—a political sermon or JEREMIAD, blending republican rhetoric with Calvinist preaching: “Our forefathers threw off the yoke of Popery in religion; for you is reserved the honor of leveling the popery of politics.”

Adams continued to serve in the Continental Congress until 1781. This service came at a cost, however. He was never able to win an election over his chief rival and former protégé, John Hancock (1737–1793), for state leadership. Adams settled into the role of political and social critic, periodically issuing editorials in opposition to the Hancock faction. The two remained bitter opponents until 1789, when Adams joined forces with Hancock and was elected lieutenant governor. Adams finally achieved the coveted post of governor when Hancock died in 1793. He was elected in his own right in 1794, holding the position until 1797. Adams died on October 2, 1803.

Works

Adams, Samuel. The Writings of Samuel Adams, 4 volumes, edited by Harry Alonzo Cushing. New York: Putnam, 1904–1908. New York: Octagon, 1968.

Adams. Papers, 1635–1859. New York: New York Public Library, 1964–1971.

Sources

Maier, Pauline. The Old Revolutionaries: Political Lives in the Age of Samuel Adams. New York: Knopf, 1980.

Miller, John Chester. Sam Adams: Pioneer in Propaganda. Boston: Little, Brown, 1936; Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1967.

Puls, Mark. Samuel Adams: Father of the American Revolution. New York: Macmillan, 2006.

The Age of Reason by Thomas Paine (Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1794 [Part One]; 1795 [Part Two]) treatise

Published in two parts, The Age of Reason was written as a critique of Christianity from a rational, scientific perspective, and as an explanation of DEISM. Thomas PAINE’s strong rhetoric and criticism of the Bible alienated many readers, who subsequently accused him of promoting atheism. These accusations followed Paine for the remainder of his life tainting his earlier reputation as the voice of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, which had originated with the publication of his Common Sense (1776). Paine began writing The Age of Reason while living in France, where he was a member of the National Convention and a supporter of the French Revolution. During the Reign of Terror, however, the Jacobins imprisoned him from December 1793 to November 1794.

While in prison, Paine continued work on his examination of Christianity, and after his release finished The Age of Reason, which was published in France and then secretly carried to the United States by Joel BARLOW. In an opening note addressed to “My Fellow Citizens of the United States of America,” Paine states, “The most formidable weapon against errors of every kind is Reason.” In part 1 Paine affirms the existence of God, offering the arguments of design and first cause. In part 2 Paine criticizes many of the events depicted in the Bible for being miraculous and supernatural and accuses Christianity and organized religions of perpetuating oppressive social institutions.

Sources

- Larkin, Edward. Thomas Paine and the Literature of Revolution. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
 Nelson, Craig. Thomas Paine: Enlightenment, Revolution, and the Birth of Modern Nations. New York: Viking, 2006.

Algonkin Tribe

The Algonkin (or Algonquin) tribe was located in the Ottawa Valley, between Lake Huron and the Ottawa River. Precontact population is estimated at more than 125,000, when the Algonkin lived in the territory from present-day Maine to New York. The name Algonkin derived from the Micmac name “algoomeaking,” which means “at the place of spearing fish and eels.” The Algonkin also hunted moose, deer, and caribou and participated in the fur trade. Men were largely responsible for hunting and fishing; women also fished, gathered wild foods, and tended to planting and harvesting. Ice fishing supplemented winter food stores, and snowshoes made of white ash twigs facilitated winter travel. In Samuel de CHAMPLAIN’s Voyages to New France (1619), he recorded his 1603 meeting with the Algonkins and described their hunting and fighting skills. He wrote: “they speak deliberately, as if to make sure you understand them, and they often stop to think. This is especially true when they are speaking in council.” Leaders of the tribes, known as “sachems” or “sagamos,” coordinated community life and oversaw spiritual matters.

By the mid 1600s their population had been reduced to approximately three thousand, due to European diseases and warfare. Throughout the first four decades of the seventeenth century, the Algonkin thrived in Quebec and Ontario, alternately defeating and being defeated by the IROQUOIS, until they relocated to areas near present-day Michigan and Montreal.

Sources

- Biggar, H. P., ed. The Works of Samuel Champlain, 6 volumes. Toronto: Champlain Society, 1922–1936.
 Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.

Alison, Francis (1705–1779) educator, scholar

Francis Alison rose to prominence during the religious revivalist movement known as the GREAT AWAKENING. As in much of NEW ENGLAND and the Middle Atlantic colonies, Pennsylvania Presbyterians were divided into a camp that promoted and celebrated the Great Awakening (“new-siders”) and another camp (“old-siders”) that feared the effects of the explosion in evangelism. Alison was a prominent old-sider who opposed the Great Awakening. Ultimately, however, he was a voice of reconciliation among the Presbyterians of Pennsylvania. Peace and Union Recommended, his only extant sermon, was preached in May 1758 to celebrate the reunion of old- and new-siders within Pennsylvania Presbyterianism. Alison chose to address the schism in general terms rather than risk reopening the freshly healed wounds within his own church. He urged all Christians to live in harmony and unity, and he listed eight notable men as exemplars of peacemakers within the faith. Among these men Alison included Gilbert TENNENT, one of the leading “Awakener” ministers.

Born in 1705 in county Donegal, Ireland, Alison received an education from an Anglican preparatory school and went on to study at the University of Edinburgh. He received his master’s degree from the university in 1733 and was ordained by the Presbytery of Letterkenny, Ireland, in 1735. That fall Alison immigrated to America, and soon afterward he was named pastor of the Presbyterian Church in New London, Pennsylvania. Settling in the prosperous middle colonies, Alison married Hannah Armitage of Delaware and began a family that eventually included six children.

As the Great Awakening swept across America in the 1740s, Alison became a vocal critic of its “wild disorders” and predicted that the movement would destroy many Protestant denominations. When Presbyterian congregations did begin to split into “new side” and “old side” factions, however, old-sider Alison became a leading advocate of moderation and compromise. He opposed a move within the Presbyterian Synod of Philadelphia to expel new-side representatives in 1741, for example, and actively worked for reconciliation.

In 1743 Alison established the New London Academy at New London, which later became the University of Delaware. He taught at the Academy for almost a decade, leaving the classroom only to become the Rector of the Academy and pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. When Philadelphia’s academy decided to offer college training, Alison accepted the post of vice provost and professor of classics and metaphysics at what would become the University of Pennsylvania.

Alison's reputation as an educator and scholar spread. Benjamin FRANKLIN respected him as a learned and honest man, and Ezra STILES praised Alison for his support of scientific study. In 1756 Alison received an honorary degree from the University of Glasgow, becoming the first American Presbyterian clergyman to be recognized in this fashion by a European university. Other honors followed: he was awarded honorary M.A. degrees from Yale in 1755 and from the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University) in 1756. Alison also received recognition for founding the first life insurance company in America, now known as the Presbyterian Ministers' Fund. Although the fervor of the Awakening years had died away, Alison was still strongly identified with the more traditional wing of his denomination. It was this identification that cost him the presidency of the College of New Jersey in 1766 as new-siders rallied to support John Witherspoon.

Alison died in 1779 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. He did not leave behind the great legacy of published sermons expected of a man of his standing within the clergy. As one of his students explained, Alison did not like to appear in print. He preferred to be remembered as a teacher.

Work

Alison, Francis. Peace and Union Recommended; and Self Disclaim'd, and Christ Exalted: In Two Sermons, Preached at Philadelphia, before the Reverend Synods of New-York and Philadelphia: The First, on the 24th of May, 1758. . . . Philadelphia: Printed by W. Dunlap, 1758; Early American Imprints, 8070.

Source

Miller, Kerby A., Arnold Schrier, Bruce D. Boling, and David N. Doyle, eds. Irish Immigrants I in the Land of Canaan: Letters and Memoirs from Colonial and Revolutionary America, 1675–1815. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Allen, Ethan (1738–1789) historian, polemicist

Military leader of Vermont's independence, Ethan Allen was born January 21, 1738 in Litchfield, Connecticut, the oldest child of Joseph and Mary Baker Allen. Educated at home by his parents, he became responsible for his seven siblings when his father died in 1755. A champion of the small farmer and the pioneer, Allen became the spokesman for a group of settlers being threatened with eviction from land that the colony of New York claimed was within its jurisdiction. When the courts ruled against these settlers in what would come to be known as Vermont, the men armed themselves. Allen immediately accepted command of the Green Mountain Boys.

The Green Mountain Boys joined the struggle for American independence, helping to capture Fort Ticonderoga in May 1775. They had less success in their next military venture, and Allen was captured in the attack on Montreal. He remained a prisoner of war for thirty-two months. While Allen was held in a British prison, Vermont declared itself a republic. After he was freed in 1778, Allen wrote his most popular work, A Narrative of Colonel Ethan Allen's Captivity. Published in 1779, his triumph over British captivity proved to be a morale booster for the American army. A Narrative, which was published in the darkest days of the war, was printed five times in the first two years of publication.

Allen also entered politics following his release, focusing immediately on Vermont's claim as a Republic, which was embroiled with property claims levied by New York. When the Continental Congress hesitated in recognizing Vermont's independence, Allen attempted to return Vermont to the British Empire, but the American victory in 1783 put an end to Allen's scheme. He spent the remainder of his life on his farm in Burlington.

Allen's A Brief Narrative of the Proceedings of the Government of New-York (1774) was a spirited defense of the Vermont settlers in the contest over property rights with New York. Allen based his argument on the second of John Locke's Two Treatises of Government (1690), which declared that a man has a natural right to property he acquires through his own labor.

In 1784 Allen published Reason the Only Oracle of Man, an attack on Christianity that came to be known as "Allen's Bible." Allen insisted that Americans did not need scriptures, revelation, clergy, or prayer to insure a moral life; all that was necessary was to follow the principles derived from nature and discovered by reason. If reason failed, Allen noted, men and women should fall back on intuition rather than turn to Christian faith. Although denounced immediately by the clergy, Allen's Bible is recognized today as an early expression of American DEISM—a belief system that accepts the existence of a supreme being but denies revealed religion.

Allen married twice. With his first wife, Mary Brownson, he had five children, only two of whom survived to adulthood. After Mary Brownson Allen died, Ethan married Frances Montresor Buchanan, with whom he had three children. Allen died of apoplexy on February 12, 1789.

Works

Allen, Ethan. A Narrative of Colonel Ethan Allen's Captivity. . . . Philadelphia: Printed for William Mentz, 1779. Cambridge, Mass.: Applewood Books, 1989; Early American Imprints, 16180, 16181, 16182.

Allen. Ethan and Ira Allen: Collected Works, edited by J. Kevin Graffagnino. Benson, Vt.: Chalidze Publications, 1992.

Allen. Ethan Allen and His Kin: Correspondence, 1772–1819, edited by John J. Duffy. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1998.

Sources

Bellesiles, Michael A. Revolutionary Outlaws: Ethan Allen and the Struggle for Independence on the Early American Frontier. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993.

Jellison, Charles A. Ethan Allen: Frontier Rebel. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1969.

Allouez, Claude-Jean (1622–1689) ethnographer, missionary

Claude-Jean Allouez was born June 6, 1622, in Saint-Didier, France. He joined the Society of Jesus in 1639 and was ordained in 1655. At the age of thirty-six Allouez went to Canada, and within seven years he had earned an appointment as vicar general to Bishop François-Xavier de Montmorency Laval (1623–1708). In the intervening years he pursued missionary activities in the forests of New France, traveling more than three thousand miles throughout the Great Lakes region and providing cartographers with the information needed to map the area. His experiences are recorded in his journals, published in part in volume fifty of The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents: Travels and Explorations of the Jesuit Missionaries in New France, 1610–1791 (1896–1901) as Recit d'un 3e voyage fait aux Illinois (Account of a Third Voyage Made to Illinois; 1679).

His journal begins in 1665 when he “embarked at Three Rivers with six Frenchmen, in the company of more than four hundred Indians of different tribes, who were returning to their country.” Throughout the journal the missionary shows his fascination with and fear of the religious practices he witnesses. After watching a shaman attempt to cure an ailing man through prayer and ritual, Allouez wrote: “I could not bear the invocation of their imaginary gods in my presence although I saw myself entirely at the mercy of all those people. I remained in doubt for some time whether it would be proper for me quietly to withdraw, or to oppose their superstitious practices.” Allouez chose to challenge the shaman and succeeded in winning a conversion from the dying man, yet in his appraisal of his impact on this group of Indians he wrote, “I had already noticed how little effect my words had on their minds.”

Allouez's other major literary contribution was his prayer book, written in both French and Illinois for the Illinois Indians, with whom he spent a substantial period of time. By his own calculation, he baptized ten thousand Indians from twenty tribes. Allouez founded several missions in what is now Mackinac County, Michigan, and lived among the Sac and Fox tribes near present-day Green Bay, Wisconsin. His work opened the door for future missionaries, including Jacques Marquette.

Allouez's accounts of religious practices are far from neutral in tone, but they are informative. Because of his journals, Europeans learned that the Great Lakes-region Indians counted among their deities the natural copper chunks that formed at the bottom of Lake Superior, brought to the surface and “cherish[ed] as household gods.” Jesuit missionaries were not collecting this type of information for scholarly or entertainment purposes; their goal was to understand the indigenous populations so as to better convert them to Christianity. Nevertheless, Europeans reading THE JESUIT RELATIONS found the missionaries' accounts to be exciting, and the Jesuits at home used these tales of the exotic to entice new recruits and raise funds for the missionary work to continue.

The journals and observations of Allouez and other Jesuit missionaries are invaluable ethnographic sources. These men chronicled even the most modest details of daily life, including what to Europeans were unusual diet and eating patterns. In time, Allouez adapted to many of these same habits, such as eating tree bark, and flour made of pulverized fish bones. Claude-Jean Allouez died August 27, 1689.

Works

Allouez, Claude Jean. Narrative of a Voyage Made to the I[l]linois. New York, 1852.

Allouez. Facsimile of Père Marquette's Illinois Prayer Book. Its History by the Owner, Colonel J. L. Hubert Neilson, M.D. Quebec: Quebec Literary and Historical Society, 1908.

Sources

La Boule, Joseph Stephen. Claude Jean Allouez: “The Apostle of the Ottawas” and the Builder of the First Indian Missions in Wisconsin. Milwaukee: Parkman Club, 1897.

Verwyst, Chrysostom. Missionary Labors of Fathers Marquette, Menard and Allouez, in the Lake Superior Region. Milwaukee & Chicago: Hoffmann Brothers, 1886.

White, Richard. The Middle Ground: Indians, Empires, and Republics in the Great Lakes Region, 1650–1815. New York & Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Almanacs

Almanacs originated in ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome as annual astronomical calendars that were divided into months, weeks, and days. With the advent of printing in the mid fifteenth century, almanacs became a popular source of information throughout Western Europe. As calendars, almanacs served as a ready reference for religious holidays and observances. They also provided astronomical data, including planetary, solar, lunar, and tidal information, along with astrological interpretations and meteorological predictions.

By the seventeenth century almanacs were an established genre in England and in the English colonies. The astronomical data made the almanac a popular source of information among farmers. This information varied in accuracy, however. Astronomical information was based on science and was therefore relatively accurate. Meteorological predictions were less consistent. Predictions based on established experience with local conditions were relatively accurate. Long-range weather forecasts, which were based on folklore, were not dependable.

Beginning in the late seventeenth century, this mixture of practical information and prophecy yielded to more accurate data based on newly developed scientific principles. At the same time, the almanac evolved into a literary publication. Verse, proverbs, folklore, and practical information were added. For many subscribers, particularly farmers and local merchants, the almanac functioned as a journal or daybook. While most entries were records of the weather, major farm activities or purchases and sales made on credit, occasionally they were records of notable events such as eclipses or floods.

Over time, the almanac became an important source of revenue for colonial printers. The colonies offered a ready market for almanacs in what was a predominantly agrarian society; although books were cheaper when imported from England, colonial printers had little competition for a publication that was valued as a source of local information.

The first American almanac, An Almanac for New England for the Year 1639, was published in Cambridge, Massachusetts, under the sponsorship of HARVARD COLLEGE. For the next century New England served as the major source of American almanacs. Nathaniel Ames (1708–1764) of Dedham, Massachusetts, published his Astronomical Diary and Almanack beginning in 1725. Encouraged by his success, Ames continued to publish his almanac without interruption for the next fifty years. In 1728 James Franklin (1697–1735), already a reputable general printer and newspaper publisher, launched the Rhode-Island Almanack. Borrowing the pseudonym “Poor Robin” from a popular English almanac, Franklin wrote most of the copy himself until his death in 1735. Assuming control of the print shop and the almanac, Franklin’s wife, Ann, continued publication until 1741. By incorporating literary elements along with the usual weather predictions, the Rhode-Island Almanack had a major influence on the evolution of the colonial almanac, including the one made famous by Benjamin FRANKLIN, James Franklin’s brother and former apprentice.

A newspaper publisher and artisan printer in Philadelphia, Benjamin Franklin published his first almanac in 1732. Over the next fifteen years Franklin’s Poor Richard: An Almanack for the Year . . . became one of the best-selling publications in the British colonies. Franklin’s almanac included the usual calendar and weather forecasts; however, it was distinguished by Franklin’s personal style and wit. Adopting the pseudonym Richard Saunders (or “Poor Richard”), Franklin laced his almanac with prose and verse, some of it original, much of it borrowed from other sources and then updated to fit an eighteenth-century American audience. Franklin’s folksy aphorisms became a regular and much anticipated feature of his almanac. Many of these became familiar American sayings. Franklin’s “the rotten Apple spoils his Companion,” for example, has survived to the present in one form or another.

Inspired by the success of Poor Richard’s Almanack, other printers began publishing almanacs, some targeted at local audiences and others printed for a wider distribution. Benjamin BANNEKER, a free black and a self-taught clock-maker living in Maryland, published his own almanac in the last decade of the eighteenth century. Almanacs became commonly available throughout the colonies and, later, throughout the newly independent states. In 1788 almanacs made the migration west with the inaugural edition of John BRADFORD’s Kentucky Almanac. In 1792 Robert Thomas published the first edition of the Farmer’s Almanac. Highly successful, the Farmer’s Almanac became a prototype of the nineteenth-century almanac, which served as a source of practical information and literature for rural readers throughout the expanding United States. Renamed the Old Farmer’s Almanac in 1830 to distinguish it from imitators, it has been in continuous publication longer than any other American journal, exemplifying the ongoing popularity of this genre.

Works

Danforth, Samuel. MDCXLVII, An Almanac for the Year of our Lord 1647. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Matthew Day, 1647; Early American Imprints, 21.

Poor Richard’s Franklin Almanac Calculated and Improved for the Year 1807. Boston: A. Newell, 1806? Early American Imprints, second series, 50717.

Sources

Dodge, Robert K. A Topical Index of Early U.S. Almanacs, 1776–1800. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Perkins, Maureen. Visions of the Future: Almanacs, Time, and Cultural Change, 1775–1870. Oxford & New York: Clarendon Press/Oxford University Press, 1996.

Sagendorph, Robb Hansell. America and Her Almanacs: Wit, Wisdom, & Weather, 1639–1970. Dublin, N.H.: Yankee, 1970.

Stowell, Marion Barber. Early American Almanacs: The Colonial Weekday Bible. New York: Burt Franklin, 1977.

Alsop, George (circa 1636–circa 1673) poet, satirist

George Alsop was born in London to Peter Alsop, a tailor of modest means, and his wife, Rose. Alsop grew to adulthood during the years of the Commonwealth, in a political and social atmosphere that did not suit his Anglican and Royalist sensibilities. In 1659 he chose indentured servitude in Maryland rather than stay in England under the rule of Oliver Cromwell. In Maryland, Alsop labored for four years on the plantation of Thomas Stockett. Three years after the restoration of the monarchy in 1660 he returned to England and eventually entered the clergy. While no date of death is recorded for him, Alsop was still alive in 1672, the year his father drafted a will and named George a beneficiary.

When he returned to England, Alsop wrote a history of Maryland in verse. This poem, titled A Character of the Province of Maryland (1666), conformed to the seventeenth-century literary tradition of bawdy and satiric sketches of cultures and character types. Despite its sarcasm, A Character was approved as promotional literature by Maryland's proprietor, Lord Baltimore (1605–1675). Although A Character contains several descriptions of the Susquehanna Indians as cannibals subject to “Devillish powers, and Hellish commands,” the danger of living beside the Indians was apparently offset by the cultural aspects that Alsop praised. In the poem he wrote positively of Maryland as a settlement; he praised the colony's politics, relations with its neighbors, hunting and farming opportunities, and its harmonious community. Apparently, his criticisms of Cromwell and PURITANISM and his portrayal of Maryland as a “superabounding” paradise also appealed to Lord Baltimore, a firm royalist himself. Of course, Maryland fell far short of the idyllic society described by Alsop, and his portrait of indentured servitude in particular rested more on fabrication than on fact.

Despite the bawdiness, the racism, and the exaggerations of Maryland's economic and social opportunities, A Character conveys the deep impression that Maryland's natural beauty and bounty made on Alsop.

Works

Alsop, George. An Orthodox Plea for the Sanctuary of God, Common Service, White Robe of the House. . . . London: Printed by R. Reynolds, 1669. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1978.

Alsop. A Character of the Province of Maryland. London, 1666. Cleveland, Ohio: Burrows, 1902.

Sources

Fields, Darin E. “George Alsop's Indentured Servant in A Character of the Province of Maryland,” Maryland Historical Magazine, 85 (Fall 1990): 221–235.

Hall, Clayton Colman, ed. Narratives of Early Maryland, 1633–1684. New York: Scribners, 1910.

American Antiquarian Society (1812– )

The American Antiquarian Society (AAS) was established on October 24, 1812 in Worcester by an act of the General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and was inspired by the efforts of Isaiah THOMAS, printer, publisher, and book collector, to “encourage the collection and preservation of the Antiquities of our country, and of curious and valuable productions in Art and nature [that] have a tendency to enlarge the sphere of human knowledge.” Thomas donated his collection of more than eight thousand books to the society's initial holdings. Christopher Columbus Baldwin (1800–1835), a lawyer and a librarian who was elected to the Society in 1827, succeeded Thomas as head librarian from 1827 to 1830 and from 1832 to 1835. Baldwin compiled a several-hundred-page catalogue of the library collections, which was published in 1837. The AAS has a large collection of the Richard Mather family writings, along with the books of Richard MATHER, Increase MATHER, Cotton MATHER, and Samuel Mather. Other significant holdings and interests include American book history; New England diaries; papers of prominent early New Englanders in the political, religious, and military spheres; and papers and records of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century central Massachusetts families, voluntary associations, and businesses. The American Antiquarian Society is a charter member of the American Council of Learned Societies, founded in 1919.

Sources

American Antiquarian Society: <<http://www.americanantiquarian.org>> (viewed August 16, 2006).

Burkett, Nancy Hall, and John B. Hench. Under Its Generous Dome: The Collections and Programs of the American Antiquarian Society, second edition, revised. Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society, 1992.

American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle

(1757–1758) periodical

This monthly literary magazine was established by William SMITH, a prominent eighteenth-century educator who was the first provost of the College of Philadelphia. Smith's theory of education stressed training in polite letters in the period prior to the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. In his capacity as provost, Smith organized an intellectual circle of talented individuals that became known as the SWAINS. The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle of the British Colonies served as an important outlet for the intellectual products of this group.

Smith patterned his magazine on the successful periodicals published in London, in particular the Gentleman's Magazine (1731–1914), and succeeded in establishing an American magazine where other publishers had failed. Among the most notable of these attempts was Benjamin FRANKLIN's General Magazine and Historical Chronicle, for All the British Plantations in America, which he published for less than a year in 1741.

In The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle, Smith included literature, science, and articles of general interest, combined with colonial and foreign news. By capitalizing on widespread interest in the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, Smith built a broad base of subscribers. In turn, The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle served as a showcase for the work of local authors. This was in keeping with Smith's original plan for the magazine, which he hoped would promote American culture and demonstrate the colonies' potential for independent rule.

Source

Gegenheimer, Albert Frank. William Smith, Educator and Churchman, 1727–1803. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943.

American Revolution (1775–1783)

The American Revolution (also called the War of Independence or Revolutionary War) began as an economic uprising of the British colonies against unfair taxation and importation laws levied by England. Initially, orderly resistance took the form of repeals and pamphlets voicing opposition to the Navigation Acts (1651–1696); Molasses Act (1733); Sugar Act (1764); STAMP ACT (1765); Townshend Revenue Acts (1767), which imposed taxes on paper, tea, glass, lead, and paints; and Tea Act (1773). In response to repeated taxation by the British, the American colonists protested, beginning in 1768, with a series of Non-Importation Agreements (1765–1775). Despite diplomatic attempts to maintain peaceful relations, growing unrest led to the Boston Massacre on March 5, 1770, the Boston Tea Party on December 16, 1773, and eventually the battles at Lexington and Concord on April 19, 1775, the beginnings of the Revolutionary War. Two months later, on June 17, 1775, the battle of Bunker Hill, one of the major battles of the American Revolution, took place. Although a British victory, it did not end the siege of Boston. The convening of the Second Continental Congress in Philadelphia led to a formal DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE on July 4, 1776. General George WASHINGTON coordinated a courageous battle, from the surprise attack on the Hessian troops on December 26, 1776, known as the Battle at Trenton, in which Washington led 2,600 troops across the Delaware River, to the final surrender of the British at Yorktown on October 19, 1781. The last of the British troops withdrew from New York on November 25, 1783.

Songs and literary works inspired by the Revolutionary War include Belinda's (fl. 1782) "Petition of an African Slave" (dated 1782, published 1787); John DICKINSON's Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania (1768); Benjamin FRANKLIN's "An Edict by the King of Prussia" (1773); Philip FRENEAU's "The Rising Glory of America" (with BRACKENRIDGE, 1775), "On the Emigration to America and Peopling the Western Country" (1784), "General Gage's Soliloquy" (1775), and "General Gage's Confession" (1775); Joel BARLOW's The Prospect of Peace (1778), The Vision of Columbus (1787), and The Columbiad (1807); Timothy DWIGHT's America: or, A Poem on the Settlement of the British Colonies; Addressed to Friends of Freedom, and Their Country (1780), and The Conquest of Canaan (1785); Judith Sargent MURRAY's "On the Equality of the Sexes" (1790); Esther De Berdt REED's The Sentiments of an American Woman (1780); David RAMSAY's The History of the American Revolution (1789); Mercy Otis WARREN's History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (3 volumes; 1805); Phillis WHEATLEY's "Liberty and Peace: A Poem" (1784); James Fenimore Cooper's (1759–1851) Leatherstocking Tales (1823– 1841); and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's (1807–1882) "Paul Revere's Ride" (1863).

Sources

Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1967.

Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Elliott, Emory. Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic, 1725–1810. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Ferling, John, ed. The World Turned Upside Down: The American Victory in the War of Independence. Contributions in Military Studies, no. 79. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1988.

American Weekly Mercury* (1719–1746) periodical

The American Weekly Mercury was established in 1719 in Philadelphia by the printer Andrew BRADFORD and John Copson, a local BOOKSELLER. Copson provided the capital, and Bradford, who was trained by his father, William Bradford (1663–1752), provided the expertise. A second-generation printer from England, the elder Bradford remained in New York but had a hand in the Mercury from the beginning.

Beginning with the first edition on December 22, 1719, the Weekly Mercury appeared continuously for the next twenty-six years. Free of any local competition for the first nine years of its existence, the Mercury established a large list of subscribers in and around Philadelphia. Like most newspapers in Boston and New York, The American Weekly Mercury stressed commercial, foreign, and domestic news compiled from imported newspapers. The Mercury also printed letters from subscribers and letters from the general post.

Copson left the business in 1721, and William Bradford replaced him as copublisher of the Mercury. In 1725 the elder Bradford established THE NEW YORK GAZETTE, and the two newspapers supported each other, sharing news features and helping secure advertising in New York and Philadelphia. The father-and-son partnership lasted until 1739, when Andrew BRADFORD became the sole publisher.

Like many of his contemporaries, including his father, Bradford was sensitive to the threat of censorship from political and religious authorities. Officially reprimanded for his January 2, 1721, critique of the Pennsylvania General Assembly, Bradford avoided punishment by immediately apologizing when he was called to appear before the council. The experience did not deter him from using the Mercury to actively support freedom of the press. In 1723 the Mercury published an editorial written by a subscriber that condemned government suppression of James Franklin (1697–1735) and his Boston newspaper, THE NEW-ENGLAND COURANT.

Bradford continued to publish politically sensitive material, feeling the sting of censorship once again in 1729, when he published a series of thirty-two essays written by Benjamin FRANKLIN and Joseph Breintnall (?–1746). Three of the essays, which closely followed the essays published in Addison and Steele's Spectator, were written under the title "The Busy-Body" and included attacks against Franklin's former employer Samuel Keimer (1688–circa 1739), who had recently launched a competing newspaper, the PENNSYLVANIA GAZETTE. Called to account for one of his "Busy-Body" essays, Bradford was jailed for a short duration. The Mercury defied the authorities by continuing to publish the "Busy-Body" series, and Bradford succeeded in driving Keimer out of business. He gained a stronger competitor, however, when Franklin assumed control of the Gazette in 1729.

The Mercury broke faith with the cause of freedom of the press in the 1730s when it opposed Andrew Hamilton (1676–1741) for elected office. Hamilton was serving at the time as defense attorney for John Peter ZENGER, a New York newspaper publisher accused of sedition and libel. Bradford's father, himself a long-term proponent of freedom of the press, had already taken a position against Zenger in his own paper, THE NEW-YORK GAZETTE, in order to secure Zenger's government printing contracts.

Following Bradford's death in 1742, his wife Cornelia continued to publish the American Weekly Mercury in partnership with Isaiah Warner until 1744 and then on her own until 1746.

Sources

De Armond, Anna Janney. Andrew Bradford, Colonial Journalist. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1949.

Sloan, William David, and Julie Hedgepeth Williams. The Early American Press, 1690–1783. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America: With a Biography of Printers & an Account of Newspapers, edited by Marcus A. McCorison. Worcester, Mass.: Printed by Isaiah Thomas, 1810; New York: Weathervane, 1970.

Anglican Church

The Anglican Church is the official Church of England. United by faith rather than by apostolic authority and generally not adherents of predestination, Anglicans believe in salvation through observance of moral and ethical guidelines outlined in a set of liturgies from the Book of Common Prayer. Compiled and authorized in 1549 during the reign of Edward VI (1537–1553), the Book of Common Prayer was subsequently revised through 1662.

In the American colonies Anglicans found a more hospitable welcome in the South than in Puritan-dominated NEW ENGLAND. While Anglican services were prohibited until 1686 in Massachusetts, services began in JAMESTOWN in 1607. By 1750 Anglicans had some three hundred parishes, making Anglicanism the most popular denomination behind CONGREGATIONALISM. Distinct from the dissenting positions of Puritans and Pilgrims who emphasized a literal interpretation of scripture and divine law, Anglicans sought a middle way that more broadly interpreted the Bible. Emory Elliott explains that for Anglicans "God gave people the power of reason for applying Biblical precepts to matters of ethics and morals, which change over time."

With the initiation of the evangelical movement known as the GREAT AWAKENING, beginning by some estimates in the late 1720s and continuing into the 1740s, the Church of England became more fully established in the American colonies. Anglican preacher Reverend George WHITEFIELD (along with Calvinist minister Jonathan EDWARDS) introduced an emotionally charged style of preaching; these "fire and brimstone" sermons were intended to provoke listeners to public conversion. Placing emphasis upon an emotional rather than solely rational understanding of religion, the evangelical revivals inspired spiritual participation that, in turn, increased church membership.

During the AMERICAN REVOLUTION Anglican churches in America began revising the Book of Common Prayer to reflect a new relationship to British rule. On May 25, 1776, the Maryland Convention passed a resolution to omit "every Prayer and Petition for the King's Majesty." In Philadelphia on July 4, 1776, Christ Church met and decided to substitute prayers for the king with prayers for Congress "to execute Justice and to maintain Truth." The Anglican Church, or the Anglican Communion as it became known, adapted to the changing politics of the new nation.

Archbishop of Canterbury John Tillotson's (1630–1694) Sermons Preached on Several Occasions (London, 1671) and other writings, for example, were popular among early Americans, including John ADAMS, Thomas JEFFERSON, and William BYRD. Another widely read Anglican writer was Richard Allestree (1619–1681), whose works include The Lively Oracles Given to Us: Or the Christians Birth-Right and Duty in the Custody and Use of the Holy Scripture (June 10, 1678) and The Ladies Calling (1673). Generally more conservative than the dissenting denominations, Anglicanism supported the classical scholarship and education typically associated with the privileged class. Not always overtly religious, literary works by Anglicans nevertheless reflect a more lyrically ornate, classically allusive style that differs significantly from the plain style of the Puritans. For example, Thomas MORTON's New English Canaan (1637) demonstrates the author's command of POETRY, PROMOTIONAL TRACT, SATIRE, and history.

Colleges established by the Anglican Communion include The College of William and Mary (1693) and King's College (1754; now Columbia University).

Source

Bonomi, Patricia U. Under the Cope of Heaven: Religion, Society, and Politics in Colonial America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Anti-Federalist

Following the ending of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION with the signing of the Treaty of Paris in 1783, the country engaged in vigorous debates over the actual forming of the new United States. From September 1787, with the initial drafting and proposal of the federal CONSTITUTION until its ratification in 1789, Americans argued in support of and for revisions in the new document. Those Americans critical of the proposed constitution were referred to as anti-federalists. They feared that the Constitution as originally presented would threaten liberty by creating a tyrannical, centralized government and advocated, instead, for popular control of the government. Though the anti-federalists did not succeed in halting the ratification of the constitution, their persuasive arguments ultimately influenced the inclusion of a Bill of Rights in the final drafts of the Constitution. Anti-federalist essays were written under various pseudonyms. The twenty-four articles by "Centinel," attributed to Samuel Bryan (1756–1837) and Eleazer Oswald (1755–1795) and written from October 5, 1787, to November 24, 1788, appeared in Philadelphia's The Independent Gazetteer, or The Chronicle of Freedom. Letters from the Federal Farmer appeared in the Poughkeepsie Country Journal from November 1787 to January 1788 and were attributed to Virginia delegate Richard Henry Lee (1732–1794) and New York delegate Melancton Smith (1744–1798). The sixteen essays by "Brutus" that appeared in The New York Journal from October 1787 to April 1788 were attributed to New York delegate Robert Yates (1738–1801) and addressed to "the Citizens of the State of New York." "John DeWitt" wrote five articles in the Boston American Herald, and The New York Journal published essays by "Cato" (possibly New York governor George Clinton [circa 1686–1761]). Other anti-federalist works include those by George MASON, a Virginia delegate who wrote the pamphlet The Objections of the Hon. George Mason to the Proposed Federal Constitution . . . (1787) and Mercy Otis WARREN, who wrote Observations on the New Constitution, and on the Federal and State Conventions (1788). Other notable anti-federalists included Samuel ADAMS and Elbridge Gerry (1744–1814) of Massachusetts, George Clinton (1739–1812) of New York, and Patrick HENRY of Virginia.

Sources

- Bailyn, Bernard, ed. The Debate on the Constitution: Federalist and Antifederalist Speeches, Articles, and Letters during the Struggle over Ratification, 2 volumes. New York: Library of America, 1993.
- Cornell, Saul. The Other Founders: Anti-Federalism and the Dissenting Tradition in America, 1788–1828. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
- Ketcham, Ralph, ed. The Anti-Federalist Papers and the Constitutional Convention Debates. New York: Signet Classic, 2003.

Main, Jackson Turner. The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781–1788. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1961.

Storing, Herbert J. What the Antifederalists Were For. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.

Antinomianism

Literally, "antinomianism" means "against or opposed to the law." Within the larger context of debates over the Doctrine of Grace versus the Doctrine of Works, antinomianism asserts that salvation comes from faith and divine grace rather than from established laws such as those found in the Old Testament. Between October 1636 and March 1638, tension between proponents of divine grace and adherents of religious law escalated in a series of confrontations later referred to as the Antinomian Controversy. In early America this term is most closely associated with the trials of Anne HUTCHINSON, who was accused of disregarding church doctrine by claiming to have direct communication with God and holding church prayer meetings in her home, among other activities. Such behavior was not taken lightly; the Puritan community was threatened by acts of antinomianism, considering the replacement of the church with individual grace to be heresy.

In her 1637 trial, which addressed central issues related to authority and doctrine, Hutchinson's responses to the Puritan leaders elucidated the doctrines and precepts of her faith. The trial ended in 1638 with Anne Hutchinson's excommunication and her family's banishment from MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY. The tension between proponents of church authority and those seeking different expressions of faith, however, continued to cause tension within the Puritan community.

Sources

- Hall, David. D., comp. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History. Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1968.
- Lang, Amy Schräger. Prophetic Woman: Anne Hutchinson and the Problem of Dissent in the Literature of New England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

Arbella

This flagship, along with the Talbot, the Jewel, and the Hopewell, set sail with approximately four hundred passengers on April 8, 1630 from Yarmouth, Isle of Wight to settle the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY and arrived at Salem, Massachusetts, on June 13, 1630. John WINTHROP and other prominent Puritans and merchants had obtained a royal CHARTER as the Massachusetts Bay Company. The Arbella was one of eleven ships, known as the Winthrop Fleet of 1630, that departed in two waves, one in April and one in May. The other ships include: the Ambrose, Charles, MAYFLOWER, Success, Trial, Whale, and William & Francis. John Winthrop includes a chronicle of the voyage in his Journal of John Winthrop, Esq.; Ship Arbella: Isle of Wight to Cape Ann in New England, 1630, with A Partial List of Passengers. Another first-person account is Francis Higginson's (1587–1630) "Journal," which he kept from April 25 to June 25, 1629; his voyage on the Talbot from London to Salem, titled "The True Story of the Voyage to New England," was later reprinted as A Short and True Description of New England by the Rev. Francis Higginson, 1629. Higginson also wrote New England's Plantation, or, A Short and True Description of the Commodities and Discommodities of That Country (1630).

Source

Anderson, Virginia DeJohn. New England's Generation: The Great Migration and the Formation of Society and Culture in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Articles of Confederation (1781)

The Articles of Confederation were America's first constitution, proposed initially by the Second Continental Congress in July 1776, just after the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE was approved. John DICKINSON, the chairman of the committee, was chosen to be the primary author of the Articles. The Third Continental Congress modified the document and put the Articles of Confederation in final form. On November 15, 1777, they were proposed to the states.

The original draft called for a strong central government, but because the articles had to be unanimously approved by the states, the Third Continental Congress reduced the power of the federal government. Concerns over land rights and representation slowed the ratification process; finally, on March 1, 1781 the Confederation, a union of autonomous states joined together for security, was officially established.

Among other declarations, the key articles within this constitution formally named the confederation as the United States of America, provided for a common defense, established Congress, guaranteed each state's sovereignty and freedoms, established limitations on state power, and committed the United States to pay all debts incurred by the colonies prior to the establishment of the articles. The confederation congress chose to endorse a meeting of the states at Philadelphia in May 1787 to discuss the weakness of the articles, and this eventually led to the drafting and adoption of the CONSTITUTION of the United States.

Work

Tansill, Charles C., ed. Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States. House Document no. 398. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1927.

Sources

Hoffert, Robert W. A Politics of Tensions: The Articles of Confederation and American Political Ideas. Niwot: University Press of Colorado, 1992.

Jensen, Merrill. The Articles of Confederation: An Interpretation of the Social-Constitutional History of the American Revolution, 1774–1781. 1940; reprint, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1959.

Pleasants, Samuel A. The Articles of Confederation. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1968.

Ashbridge, Elizabeth (1713–1755) journal writer, Quaker minister

I used to converse with people of all societies as opportunity offer'd & like many others had got a pretty deal of head knowledge . . . But I joynd strictly with none, resolving never to leave searching till I had found the truth.

—Some Account of the Fore-Part of the Life of Elizabeth Ashbridge (1774)

As a QUAKER minister Elizabeth Sampson Ashbridge traveled throughout Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and in England. Born in Middlewich in Cheshire, England, Ashbridge was the only daughter of Thomas Sampson, a doctor, and Mary Sampson. Shortly after Elizabeth's birth her father "took to the sea & followed his Profession on board a ship." When she was twelve, her father "then left off," leaving Elizabeth's mother to raise her and provide her with an education. Ashbridge credits her mother with teaching her "the principles of virtue"; yet, Ashbridge embarked on a tumultuous path at the age of fourteen, when she eloped with an impoverished stocking weaver. The marriage was brief and Elizabeth later cast it as a moment of youthful indiscretion. She explains: "I was soon Chastised for my disobedience—Divine Providence let me see my error. In five months I was stripped of the darling of my Soul, and left a young & disconsolate Widow."

Unable to return to her unforgiving parents, Ashbridge was sent to live with relatives in a Quaker community in Dublin, Ireland. She took an immediate dislike to the Quakers and sought a religion that would better suit her. In the spring of 1732, Ashbridge sailed to New York. On board she was unknowingly indentured and upon arrival was sent to work for an abusive master. After three years she bought off her indentures, tried her turn as an actress, and married an alcoholic named Sullivan: "I had got released from one cruel servitude & then not Contented got into another, and this for Life. . . ." As Ashbridge's interest in Quakerism developed, Sullivan resented her sober and devout ways and was especially displeased when she began speaking at meetings: "My husband soon bought a Horse, but would not Let me ride him, neither when my Shoes were worn out would he Let me have a new Pair, thinking by that means to keep me from going to meetings." Ashbridge, however, notes: "this did not hinder me. . . ." Sullivan joined the British army in 1740 and died following a beating he received for refusing to take up arms. Ashbridge worked as both a schoolteacher and a seamstress in order to repay Sullivan's extensive debts.

In 1746 she met her third husband, Aaron Ashbridge, while in the Quaker ministry and soon became an ordained minister herself. The Ashbridges traveled to Ireland as Quaker missionaries and in 1753 Ashbridge wrote her Account, which details her conversion to Quakerism. The book, a SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY, reads much like the plot of a SENTIMENTAL NOVEL. Ashbridge begins with a confession:

From my Infancy till fourteen years of age I was as innocent as most Children, about which time my Sorrows began, and have continued for the most part of my life ever since; by giving way to foolish passion, in Setting my affections on a young man who Courted me without my Parents' consent; till I consented, and with sorrow of Heart may say, I suffered myself to be carried off in the night.

Ashbridge and her husband remained in Ireland until her death in 1755.

Work

Ashbridge, Elizabeth. Some Account of the Early Part of the Life of Elizabeth Ashbridge: Who Died in the Truth's Service. . . . Stanford, N.Y.: Printed and sold by Daniel Lawrence, 1810; Worcester: American Antiquarian Society, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 12001.

Sources

Larson, Rebecca. Daughters of Light: Quaker Women Preaching and Prophesying in the Colonies and Abroad, 1700–1775. New York: Knopf, 1999.

Levenduski, Cristine M. Peculiar Power: A Quaker Woman Preacher in Eighteenth-Century America. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1996.

Aupaumut, Hendrick (1757–1830) sachem, orator, historian

We earnestly wish to see peace & friendship established between you and the Western Indians and we also wish that we may not be forgotten.

—Aupaumut speech (1791)

A Mohican sachem, Hendrick Aupaumut was born in 1757 at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, a village on the Housatonic River that was founded by Moravian missionaries. From this Christian community Aupaumut received an English education. In August 1775 he enlisted in the Continental Army as a private in Captain William Goodrich's Company of Indians of Colonel John Patterson's Regiment; he fought in the battle of White Plains in 1778, which earned him a position as a captain. After the war Aupaumut dedicated himself to representing the Stockbridge Indians in an attempt to establish a mutually supportive relationship between them and the white settlers.

As ambassador in the Washington administration during the 1790s Aupaumut was dispatched to negotiate treaties with the northwest tribes, such as the IROQUOIS, DELAWARE, Shawnee, and Miami. In 1792 Aupaumut embarked on an eleven-month mission to negotiate with these western nations and to allay their fears of the white man's motives. Aupaumut's account of this diplomatic mission appears in A Short Narration of My Last Journey to the Western Country, which was written around 1794 and published in 1827.

A powerful orator and skilled diplomat, Aupaumut gained praise from both sides. In both A Narrative of an Embassy to the Western Indians (1792) and A Short Narration of My Last Journey to the Western Country, however, Aupaumut answered criticism regarding his own truthfulness and sincerity, as in the conclusion to A Short Narration:

With regard to myself, I think it an easy matter to find out whether I was not faithful with the United States in the late war, and whether I have not been faithful in the work of peace according to abilities in these near two years. I have as it were sacrifice all my own affairs, and my family, for the sake of peace and this last time have gone from home better than Eleven months, and have gone thro a hazardous journeys, and have suffered with sickness and hunger, and have left my Counsellors with the nations who are for peace, to promote peace and forward every means of peace while I am absent.

In 1808 the Tuscarora, with Aupaumut as their representative, successfully petitioned the United States for restitution for lands lost during the war. Despite the eventual removal of the western tribes, including the Stockbridge Indians to Wisconsin, Aupaumut remained optimistic, and loyal to the United States. He died in 1830 and is buried in the old Stockbridge Indian Cemetery near Kaukauna, Wisconsin.

Works

Aupaumut, Hendrick. Narrative of an Embassy to the Western Indians. 1792; reprinted in Memoirs of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: M'Carty & Davis, 1827.

Aupaumut. A Short Narration of My Last Journey to the Western Country, N.p.: 1794.

Sources

Calloway, Colin G. The American Revolution in Indian Country: Crisis and Diversity in Native American Communities. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Gustafson, Sandra M. Eloquence Is Power: Oratory and Performance in Early America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Aurora (1791–circa 1800) periodical

Known for its strong opposition to the FEDERALISTS, the Aurora newspaper was established as the General Advertiser, and Political, Commercial, Agricultural and Literary Journal in Philadelphia in 1791 by Benjamin Franklin BACHE. Bache launched the General Advertiser in a crowded but changing market. Literature had given way during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION to patriotic editorials and reports of the war. Accordingly, the General Advertiser combined international and national news along with the various announcements and bills of the new national government. The debate over the CONSTITUTION, settled three years earlier, had in turn given rise to fledgling political parties. By 1790 two parties existed, the Federalists and the Democratic-Republicans (or Jeffersonians), and they were supported by the first party newspapers, the United States Gazette (Federalist); and the National Gazette (Democratic-Republican), edited by Philip FRENEAU. Bache positioned his newspaper for this political market as well, and when the National Gazette suspended publication in 1793 in response to the yellow-fever epidemic, Bache established his paper as the new organ for the Jeffersonian cause.

With the sponsorship of Thomas JEFFERSON, the General Advertiser, subtitled the Aurora in 1794, published pieces by James MADISON and other leading Jeffersonians. Bache also published a better-known series of anonymous editorials attacking George WASHINGTON and the Federalists. These editorials, many of them written by Bache but disguised as contributions from the public, accused Washington of pilfering the treasury for personal expenses, violating the Constitution, and coveting monarchy. Bache also published a series of embarrassing letters allegedly written by the president, even though the British had originally forged the same letters in 1776 in an earlier attempt to discredit Washington.

An ardent Francophile and a determined enemy of Britain, Bache used the Aurora to campaign against any alliance with Britain, arguing in favor of restoring diplomatic relations with France. Having secured an advance and unauthorized copy of the treaty John JAY had recently negotiated with Britain, Bache published the essential details in the Aurora on June 29, 1795. Bache succeeded not only in scooping the other newspapers but also in preempting Washington's presentation of the treaty.

Bache embarrassed Washington once again on the president's retirement from office in 1797. To his supporters and to a large segment of the public, Washington had generously refused a lifetime presidency. Bache responded by pointing to Washington's retirement as a moment for national celebration, now that the alleged corrupter and monarchist was gone. The abusive editorials continued with the inauguration of the new Federalist president, John ADAMS. However, the Federalists now began to demonstrate less restraint than they had under Washington. Bache was physically assaulted by a Federalist supporter—and eventually legally assaulted by Adams.

Already labeled by the Federalists as a paid agent of the French, Bache added to their suspicions during the XYZ Affair. Charles Pinckney (1757–1824), John Marshall (1755–1835), and Elbridge Gerry (1744–1814) were U.S. ministers assigned in 1797 to negotiate a new treaty with France. They were approached by three French agents—called X, Y, and Z in diplomatic correspondence—who suggested a loan and a bribe in order to arrange a meeting with Charles-Maurice de Talleyrand (1754–1838), the French foreign minister. Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry rejected the demand. When the affair became public knowledge, it brought the two nations to the brink of war.

Seeing the XYZ Affair as an opportunity to embarrass Adams, Bache published a number of editorials and letters supporting the French position. The administration used this as an opportunity to silence Bache, arresting him in 1798 under the authority of the newly legislated Sedition Act. Designed as a means of suppressing Jeffersonian opposition, the act made it illegal for any person, citizen or alien, to print or speak anything “false, scandalous, and malicious” against the government and, in particular, against the president.

Charged with libeling the president and the executive branch, Bache was released on parole. The Aurora quickly lost support, partly in response to overwhelming opposition to the French position following the XYZ Affair. The same year, Bache contracted yellow fever and died. The paper continued under the control of Bache's widow and an assistant editor, William Duane (1780–1865), until around 1800.

Works

General Advertiser. Philadelphia: B. F. Bache, 1791–1794; Early American Imprints.

Aurora General Advertiser. Philadelphia: B. F. Bache, 1794–1800; Early American Imprints.

Bache, Benjamin Franklin. Truth Will Out! The Foul Charges of the Tories against the Editor of the Aurora Repelled by Positive Proof and Plain Truth, and His Base Calumniators Put to Shame. . . . Philadelphia, 1798; Chicago: Library Resources, 1970.

Sources

Rosenfeld, Richard N. American Aurora: A Democratic-Republican Returns: The Suppressed History of Our Nation's Beginnings and the Heroic Newspaper That Tried to Report It. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.

Tagg, James. Benjamin Franklin Bache and the Philadelphia Aurora. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.

Austin, William (1778–1841) fiction writer, essayist

Writer and essayist William Austin published several pieces of fiction in NEW ENGLAND magazines. His most noteworthy story, “Peter Rugg, the Missing Man” (1824), is an eerie tale of a Bostonian who was lost when he set out for the city in the midst of a blinding snowstorm. For fifty years Rugg’s ghost haunts the roads, asking the way to Boston. Townspeople claim that the appearance of his jet-black horse with its white feet is an omen of an impending storm. Later in the nineteenth century, this story influenced Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804–1864) in “A Virtuoso’s Collection,” from Mosses from an Old Manse (1846), featuring Peter Rugg as a central character. Peter Rugg also captured the imagination of twentieth-century poet Amy Lowell (1874–1925), who wrote a poem about this mysterious wanderer.

Austin was born in the midst of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION in Lunenburg, Massachusetts, to Nathaniel Austin, a prosperous pewterer, and Margaret Rand Austin. He attended HARVARD, an institution he later criticized in Strictures on Harvard University (1798) as “the death-bed of genius” intent upon training merchants and lawyers instead of developing the intellect. Austin served as a chaplain on the U.S. frigate Constitution and then briefly studied law at London’s Lincoln’s Inn in 1802–1803. While in London, he wrote a series of letters describing and commenting on English life. Published in 1804, Letters from London: Written during the Years 1802 & 1803 contained observations on everything from Parliamentary oratory to national character. “A Scot,” he wrote, “is partial to his fellow Scotchmen, with very little fondness for Scotland; an Englishman is still more partial to England, with very little fondness for Englishmen.” Writing of one disheveled member of Parliament, Austin quipped: “He looked as if he had been long in the sea service, and after many a storm, had retired on half pay.”

Austin returned home to Massachusetts and established a large legal practice in Charlestown. He married his first wife, Charlotte Williams, in June 1806. She died in 1820, and two years later he married Lucy Jones. He had fourteen children. By this time Austin’s political career had been successfully launched: Between 1811 and 1834, he served five terms in the General Court, or Massachusetts legislature, and from 1821 to 1823 he was a state senator from the county of Middlesex.

Amid the contest for power between the FEDERALISTS and Thomas JEFFERSON’s Democratic-Republicans, a Jeffersonian militia captain was accused but acquitted of disobedience of orders. The Federalist general in command, Simon Elliot, could approve or disapprove of the ruling of the court. General Elliot did nothing for many months, and on March 17, 1806, Austin attacked the general in print for failing to release the captain. On March 31, 1806, Austin fought a duel with the general’s son, James Henderson Elliot, arising out of the heated exchange of letters to the Independent Chronicle, the local newspaper. Austin was wounded but recovered. This duel, like many others during the early national period, illustrated the power of the press.

Works

Austin, William. Letters from London, Written during the Years 1802 & 1803. Boston: W. Pelham, 1804; Chicago: Library Resources, 1970.

Austin. Literary Papers of William Austin, with a Biographical Sketch by His Son, James Walker Austin. Boston: Little, Brown, 1890.

Austin. A Critical Edition of William Austin’s Peter Rugg, The Missing Man: The Original Text. Edited by Alain Geoffroy. Saint-Denis: Alizés, 1996.

Source

Austin, Walter. William Austin: The Creator of Peter Rugg: Being a Biographical Sketch of William Austin: Together with the Best of His Short Stories. Boston: Marshall Jones, 1925.

The Autobiography by Benjamin Franklin (published as Oeuvres de M. Franklin, Paris: Quilleau, 1773; Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, first complete edition, Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1868)

autobiography
Benjamin FRANKLIN’s Autobiography chronicles his life for the benefit of his family, his friends, and the general public. Addressed to William Franklin, who was at the time the forty-year-old governor of New Jersey, The Autobiography begins “Dear Son,” and through anecdotes, episodes, and portraits, relates Franklin’s family history, his childhood, and his early career, inventions, and other civic accomplishments. Franklin presents his life as a series of cumulative lessons and describes a plan of self-examination and self-improvement, which he called his “arduous Project of arriving at moral Perfection.” Probably inspired by his QUAKER and Protestant upbringing and by his reading of Cotton MATHER’s Bonifacius: An Essay . . . to Do Good (1710), Franklin drew up a list of thirteen virtues to master: temperance, silence, order, resolution, frugality, industry, sincerity, justice, moderation, cleanliness, tranquility, chastity, and humility. In his Autobiography he explains: “I enter’d upon the Execution of this Plan for Self Examination, and continu’d it with occasional Intermissions for some time. I was surpris’d to find myself so much fuller of Faults than I had imagined, but I had the Satisfaction of seeing them diminish.”

Covering the events of his life until 1762 and divided into four parts, Franklin’s Autobiography charts his curiosity and quest for learning along with his desire to correct what he calls errata, certain events in his life that he considers to have been mistakes. Franklin wrote his memoir over an eighteen-year period, beginning on July 30, 1771, at the age of sixty-five, and continuing until his death on April 17, 1790, at the age of eighty-four. He referred to the work as his “Memoirs,” “Notes of My Early Life,” “Account of My Life,” and “History of My Life,” as the term “autobiography” had not yet come into usage. The first edition of Franklin’s Autobiography, which included only part 1, was first printed in Paris in 1791. It appeared in English in 1818. Parts 2, 3, and 4 appeared in 1840. In 1981 scholars J. A. Leo Lemay and Paul M. Zall printed a Genetic Text; this edition includes all the deletions and additions that Franklin originally made over the course of writing his Autobiography.

Sources

Lemay, J. A. Leo. The Life of Benjamin Franklin. Volume 1, Journalist: 1706–1730. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Lemay. The Life of Benjamin Franklin. Volume 2, Printer and Publisher: 1730–1747. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Lemay. Benjamin Franklin: A Documentary History to 1748. <<http://www.english.udel.edu/lemay/franklin/>> (viewed April 30, 2007).

Abbott, Jacob (1803–1879) educator, children's author
Born in Hallowell, Maine, Jacob Abbott was a Congregational clergyman and educator who founded the Mount Vernon School for Girls in Boston in 1832. He was also the author of hundreds of books for children, many of them written in collaboration with his brother, John S. C. Abbott. The first of Jacob Abbott's books, The Young Christian, appeared in 1832. He is perhaps best remembered for the sequence of instructional novels known—for their protagonist—as the Rollo series, the first of which appeared in 1835.

Source

Weber, Carl Jefferson. A Bibliography of Jacob Abbott. Waterville, Maine: Colby College Press, 1948.

Abbott, Lyman (1835–1922) theological writer, editor
A clergyman and philosopher, Lyman Abbott was born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, the son of the educator and Congregational clergyman Jacob ABBOTT. Ordained as a minister in 1860, Lyman Abbott succeeded Henry Ward BEECHER—whose biography he published in 1903—to the pulpit of the Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn, New York, in 1888. In 1876 Abbott and Beecher began editing a periodical called The Christian Union. Abbott eventually took over the editorship of the journal, changing its name to The Outlook in 1893. A leader of the rationalist approach to religion, Abbott attempted to reconcile Christianity with Darwinism. In addition to his biography of Beecher, Abbott published Christianity and Social Problems (1896), The Theology of an Evolutionist (1897), Remi- niscences (1915), and What Christianity Means to Me: A Spiritual Autobiography (1921).

Source

Brown, Ira V. Lyman Abbott, Christian Evolutionist: A Study in Religious Liberalism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953.

Abolitionism

Abolitionism was the movement to end the enslavement of blacks, the active agitation against slavery and the slave trade that began in the late eighteenth century. By 1807 the British Parliament had outlawed the slave trade in the British Empire. A year later the U.S. Congress also outlawed foreign slave trafficking; however, such prohibitions did not free slaves or even end the buying and selling of slaves born in the United States. Tensions within the U.S. increased as slave states declared their interest in spreading slavery to territories acquired in the country's expansion across the continent.

By the 1830s slavery had been outlawed in the Northern states, although the economy there still depended heavily on the South's cotton industry, which thrived on the use of slave labor. This reliance on slavery bothered the conscience of certain Northerners, and a campaign against the very idea of slavery began in earnest in 1831 with the formation of the New England Anti-Slavery Society. One of its chief organizers, William Lloyd GARRISON, established THE LIBERATOR, a militant periodical that demanded the immediate and outright emancipation of all slaves.

By 1833 the American Anti-Slavery Society had formed, along with several local organizations devoted to freeing the slaves. Garrison and other abolitionists orchestrated demonstrations and protests that aroused public sentiment both for and against slavery in the North. Writers such as Lydia Maria CHILD, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry David THOREAU, James Russell LOWELL, and John Greenleaf WHITTIER supported the abolition efforts. Yet, Northern mobs sometimes attacked abolitionists, and many Northerners showed little sympathy for the plight of slaves. Garrison staged a public burning of the U.S. Constitution because he believed the government had degraded itself by condoning slavery. His opponents argued that radical abolitionism was tearing apart the union and posing a threat to the peace of the nation.

Certainly the response in the South to abolitionism was a hardening of the rationale for a slave society. Southern apologists for slavery attacked Northern hypocrisy, pointing to “wage slavery” in the factories. To Southern Patriots, abolitionism seemed to be just another sign that the North wished to dominate the Union by excluding the spread of slavery (and, thereby, Southern culture) in the territories. The effort on the part of abolitionists to shame Southerners into realizing the evil of their “peculiar institution,” as it was often called, had the opposite effect: many Southerners tended to take an exaggerated pride in their slave-owning tradition. Others simply saw the agitation over slavery as a Northern excuse for restricting the power of the South.

Congress made many attempts to reconcile the North and the South while never directly addressing the issue of abolishing slavery. The Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 required Northerners to return escaped slaves to their owners, thus infuriating the abolitionists and redoubling their efforts. The South felt stymied because in Kansas and Nebraska they had to fight abolitionists like John Brown, who led his followers in an attempt to stop, by physical force, the entry of slaveholders into the territories. Brown’s gang murdered slaveholders and attempted a raid on a government arsenal at Harper’s Ferry in order to arm slaves and incite an uprising. Many in the South believed that such acts of abolitionism led directly to the South’s secession from the Union.

In literary terms, the cause of abolitionism was furthered by the powerful testimonies of escaped slaves such as Frederick DOUGLASS, whose NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS (1845) detailed the degradation of slavery and demonstrated the dignity and power that a former slave could attain by virtue of his own desire to be free and to become educated. What Douglass did to fortify the abolitionists was enhanced by the enormous success of UNCLE TOM’S CABIN (1852), Harriet Beecher STOWE’s novel about the horrors of slavery and its long-suffering Christian victim, Uncle Tom. Stowe’s book told the story of slavery in sentimental and melodramatic terms that were easily transferable to the stage, so that the injustices of slavery could be dramatized for hundreds of thousands of Americans who could not read or who were previously unmoved by the abolitionist cause.

Sources

- Bracey, John H., Jr., August Meier, and Elliott Rudwick, eds. Blacks in the Abolitionist Movement. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1971.
- Davis, David Brion. Inhuman Bondage: The Rise and Fall of Slavery in the New World. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Finkelman, Paul, ed. Antislavery. New York: Garland, 1989.
- Matthews, Donald G., ed. Agitation for Freedom: The Abolitionist Movement. New York: Wiley, 1972.
- Mayer, Henry. All on Fire: William Lloyd Garrison and the Abolition of Slavery. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1998.

Adams, Charles Francis, Jr. (1835–1915) historian, biographer

Charles Francis Adams Jr. was a member of an illustrious American family that included two presidents: his great-grandfather John Adams, second president of the United States; and his grandfather John Quincy ADAMS, sixth president of the United States. His father was the diplomat Charles Francis Adams, and his brothers the historians Brooks Adams and Henry ADAMS. The younger Charles Francis Adams was an eclectic writer, but his Railroads: Their Origin and Problems (1878) was clearly linked to his later position as president of the Union Pacific Railroad (1884–1890). He wrote two biographies, one about the Massachusetts man of letters Richard Henry DANA Jr., which was published in 1890; and one about his own father, which appeared a decade later. In 1892, like his brother Brooks, he published a history of Massachusetts, Three Episodes of Massachusetts History; and in 1916, like his brother Henry, he published An Autobiography.

Sources

- Adams, Charles Francis, Jr. Charles Francis Adams, 1835–1915: An Autobiography. New York: Russell & Russell, 1968.
- McCraw, Thomas K. Prophets of Regulation: Charles Francis Adams, Louis D. Brandeis, James M. Landis, Alfred E. Kahn. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1984.

Adams, Henry (1838–1918) historian, novelist, memoirist

Knowledge of human nature is the beginning and end of political education.

—The Education of Henry Adams (1907)

Born in Boston, Henry Adams was the grandson of President John Quincy ADAMS and the son of statesman Charles Francis Adams. Although a member of one of America’s most distinguished families, Adams demonstrated early on that rather than concentrate on national issues, he preferred to think and write about the greater world. Accompanying his father to England, where Charles Adams served as minister during the CIVIL WAR, Henry Adams served as a secretary in the ministry, and worked as a foreign correspondent for the Boston Courier and THE NEW YORK TIMES. After he returned from England in 1867 Adams became editor of the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, as well as an assistant professor of history. For seven years, from 1870 to 1877, Adams taught medieval, European, and American history, subjects he later transformed into an original philosophy of history. With typical irony and modesty, he wrote in his autobiography that by that time he had decided "So far as [I] had a function in life, it was as a stable-companion to statesmen."

Henry Adams

In 1873 Adams married fellow Bostonian Marian Hooper. Other than the fact that he published two novels while he was married, Democracy: An American Novel (1880) and Esther (1884), little is known about Adams's life during this thirteen-year period; he omitted it from his autobiographical writing. He also omitted any mention of his wife, although her suicide in 1885 affected him profoundly. He commissioned the sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens to create a sculpture, The Peace of God, for her grave in Washington, D.C., where they had been living, and then he left the country.

Adams traveled first through Asia, returning to Washington to complete his study of the politics and diplomacy of the early republic, the nine-volume History of the United States of America during the Administrations of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison (1889–1891). He then made several trips to France, where he developed his dynamic theory of history. At the Paris Exposition of 1900 he saw the enormous dynamo that symbolized for him the inevitable social progress to come in the future. He studied the past at the abbey at Mont-Saint-Michel and the chapel at Chartres, recognizing the power of the Virgin, "the ideal of human perfection," as a symbol of the social force of medieval Christianity. The similarity of the two forces is expressed in "The Dynamo and the Virgin," a key chapter in The Education of Henry Adams: An Autobiography (1918), Adams's candid autobiographical evaluation in which he serves as an everyman figure.

Principal Books by Adams

Civil-Service Reform. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1869.

Chapters of Erie and Other Essays, by Adams and Charles F. Adams Jr. Boston: Osgood, 1871.

The Life of Albert Gallatin. Philadelphia & London: Lippincott, 1879.

Democracy: An American Novel, anonymous. New York: Holt, 1880.

John Randolph. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882.

Esther: A Novel, as Frances Snow Compton. New York: Holt, 1884.

History of the United States of America during the Second Administration of Thomas Jefferson, 1 volume, Cambridge, Mass.: Privately printed, 1885; revised edition, 2 volumes, New York: Scribners, 1890.

History of the United States of America during the First Administration of James Madison, 1 volume, Cambridge, Mass.: Privately printed, 1888; revised edition, 2 volumes, New York: Scribners, 1890.

History of the United States of America during the First Administration of Thomas Jefferson, 2 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1889.

History of the United States of America during the Second Administration of James Madison, 3 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1891.

Historical Essays. New York: Scribners, 1891.

Memoirs of Marau Taaroa, Last Queen of Tahiti. N.p.: Privately printed, 1893.

Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres, anonymous. Washington, D.C.: Privately printed, 1904; revised and enlarged, 1912; Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1913.

The Education of Henry Adams: An Autobiography. Washington, D.C.: Privately printed, 1907; Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1918.

A Letter to American Teachers of History. Washington, D.C.: Privately printed, 1910.

The Life of George Cabot Lodge. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1911.

The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma, edited by Brooks Adams. New York & London: Macmillan, 1919.

Memorial designed by Adams and sculpted by Augustus St. Gaudens to mark the grave of Adams's wife, who committed suicide in 1885

Sketches for the North American Review by Henry Adams, edited by Edward Chalfant. Hamden: Archon Books, 1986.

Studying Henry Adams

No authoritative edition of Adams's collected works exists. The Education of Henry Adams: A Centennial Version, edited by Edward Chalfant and Conrad Edick Wright (Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 2007) is an excellent scholarly edition of that central work. A Henry Adams Reader, edited by Elizabeth Stevenson (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958), offers a sampling of Adams's work in the wide variety of genres in which he wrote.

Students with a biographical interest in Adams should, of course, be familiar with his own account in The Education. Recourse to other biographies can provide necessary compensation to the autobiography's omissions and misdirections. Edward Chalfant's three-volume life is generally considered the standard work: Both Sides of the Ocean: A Biography of Henry Adams, His First Life, 1838–1862 (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1982); Better in Darkness: A Biogra- phy of Henry Adams: His Second Life, 1862–1891 (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1994); and Improvement of the World: A Biography of Henry Adams, His Last Life, 1891–1918 (North Haven, Conn.: Archon Books, 2001). Ernest Samuel's earlier account, also in three volumes, is also highly regarded: Ernest Samuel, The Young Henry Adams (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1948); Henry Adams: The Middle Years (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958); Henry Adams: The Major Phase (Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1964). His single-volume Henry Adams (Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1989), is an excellent abridgement. Earl N. Harbert's The Force So Much Closer Home: Henry Adams and the Adams Family (New York: New York University Press, 1977) provides useful information on Adams's prominent family, and Patricia O'Toole's The Five of Hearts: An Intimate Portrait of Henry Adams and His Friends, 1880–1918 (New York: C. Potter, 1990) places the author in an enlightening social context.

Adams's letters are available in the six-volume The Letters of Henry Adams, 1858–1892, edited by J. C. Levenson, Ernest Samuel, Charles Vandersee, and Viola Hopkins Winner (Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1982–1988) and Supplement to the Letters of Henry Adams: Letters Omitted from the Harvard University Press Edition of the Letters of Henry Adams, edited by J. C. Levenson (Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1989), and students are directed to these as further rich sources of information, including biographical details.

An overview of criticism is offered in Henry Adams and His World, edited by David R. Contosta and Robert Mucigrosso (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1993) and in Critical Essays on Henry Adams, edited by Earl N. Harbert (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981). Other recommended critical treatments are R. P. Blackmur's Henry Adams (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1980), J. C. Levenson's The Mind and Art of Henry Adams (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1957), William Dusing's Henry Adams: The Myth of Failure (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1980), Brooks D. Simpson's The Political Education of Henry Adams (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996), Garry Wills's Henry Adams and the Making of America (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2005), William Merrill Decker's The Literary Vocation of Henry Adams (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990), and William Wasserstrom's The Ironies of Progress: Henry Adams and the American Dream (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1984). Students whose interests are focused on The Education are advised to consult New Essays on The Education of Henry Adams, edited by John Carlos Rowe (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996). The correspondence is helpfully analyzed by Joanne Jacobson in Authority and Alliance in the Letters of Henry Adams (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992).

Earl N. Harbert's Henry Adams: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1978) is a useful but out-of-date reference that should be used in conjunction with more current resources such as the MLA International Bibliography and American Literary Scholarship, edited by David J. Nordloh and others.

Adams, John Quincy (1767–1848) sixth president of the United States, diarist

Born in Braintree (later Quincy), Massachusetts, to second U.S. president, John Adams, and his wife, Abigail, John Quincy Adams was a precocious child whose introduction to statesmanship began early, when he accompanied his father on diplomatic missions to Europe. After studying in Paris and at the University of Leiden in Holland, Adams graduated from Harvard in 1787 and began practicing law.

Adams did not work long as a lawyer, however. In 1791 his response to Thomas Paine's Rights of Man—a series of articles in which Adams defended the Federalist position and signed himself "Publicola"—brought him to the attention of President George Washington, who in 1794 appointed Adams U.S. minister to Holland.

Adams went on to serve as minister to Portugal and Prussia before returning to the United States in 1801. He continued his political career by winning a seat in the U.S. Senate in 1803, a position he resigned in 1808 after his independent voting record caused a break with the Federalist Party. Diplomatic postings in Russia and England followed, and in 1817 Adams was called back to serve as secretary of state in the administration of President James Monroe. In this position Adams became the primary author of the Monroe Doctrine, which unilaterally declared that the continents of the Western Hemisphere were no longer "to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

Adams ran as the Republican candidate for president in the election of 1824. Although his rival, Andrew Jackson, received more popular votes, neither candidate held a majority of electoral votes, and the election was decided in the House of Representatives. There, the support of Speaker of the House Henry Clay led to the outcome in Adams's favor. When Adams named Clay as secretary of state, Jackson cried foul, splitting the Republican Party. Jackson defeated Adams in the next election.

In 1830 Adams was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives, where he served for the next seventeen years without any true party affiliation. His independence permitted him to oppose slavery by fighting for the petitions of abolitionists (see ABOLITIONISM) and against the admission of Texas to the Union as a slaveholding state.

Adams's nonconformity is reflected in his twelve-volume Memoirs, written with what one editor called "malice towards all" and published between 1874 and 1877. Covering more than sixty years of American political history, the account provides a significant chronicle of the life and times of the nation as well as of the author. Adams's other notable works include his classic treatise Report upon Weights and Measures (1821) and his Lectures on Rhetoric and Oratory Delivered to the Classes of Senior and Junior Sophisters in Harvard University (1810), delivered in 1806 during his tenure as professor of rhetoric and belles lettres.

Sources

Allen, David Grayson, and others, eds. Diary of John Quincy Adams. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1981.

Brookhiser, Richard. America's First Dynasty: The Adamses, 1735–1918. New York: Free Press, 2002.

Parsons, Lynn H. John Quincy Adams: A Bibliography. Madison, Wis.: Madison House, 1998.

Adams, Mary

See PHELPS, ELIZABETH STUART.

Adams, William Taylor (1822–1897) educator

William Taylor Adams was a Boston schoolteacher who, under the pen name Oliver Optic, began in the 1850s to publish books and magazine stories aimed at young readers and modeled on the extremely popular works of Horatio ALGER. Adams succeeded with such works, and in 1865 he left the teaching profession to devote himself full-time to the literary world. Adams published more than one hundred novels (most of them in sequences with titles like the "Starry Flag Series," or the "Onward and Upward Series") and more than one thousand stories. He also edited several periodicals for youngsters, including his own Oliver Optic's Magazine: Our Boys and Girls (1867–1875).

Source

Jones, Dolores Blythe, comp. An "Oliver Optic" Checklist: An Annotated Catalog-Index to the Series, Nonseries Stories, and Magazine Publications of William Taylor Adams. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1985.

An Address Delivered before the Senior Class in Divinity College, Cambridge by Ralph Waldo

Emerson (Boston: Munroe, 1838) address

Ralph Waldo EMERSON delivered this speech, commonly referred to as "The Divinity School Address," to the graduating class of Harvard Divinity School on July 15, 1838, and he subsequently published it as a pamphlet. (The address was later republished as Man Thinking: An Oration [1843]). The main theme of the speech,—that spirituality comes through personal reflection and nature rather than adherence to the doctrines and rituals of organized religion, is reflected in Emerson's invitation to his listeners "to go alone . . . and dare to love God without mediator or veil.” Though a former minister himself, he argued that the church “gives a false impression” of the message of Jesus Christ, which highlighted “the greatness of man” and revealed that “man’s life is a miracle.” Emerson encouraged his listeners to see divinity within—to be “a divine man”—and thereby to consider themselves as equal to Jesus. Emerson was accused of blasphemy in a very public controversy, and it was several decades before he spoke at Harvard again.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Adventures of Huckleberry Finn* by Mark

Twain (New York: Webster, 1885; originally published as The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn [London: Chatto & Windus, 1884]) novel

A sequel to Mark Twain’s The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876), Adventures of Huckleberry Finn is considered a greater work of literature for its entertaining, picaresque style and for Twain’s (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) more complex exploration of social and political issues such as slavery and the frontier experience.

Huck tells his own story. Abandoned by his derelict father, Pap, Huck lives with the Widow Douglas and her sister, Miss Watson. Accustomed to living on his own, he chafes under the women’s regimen of good manners and schooling. Huck is then kidnapped by his father but escapes to Jackson’s Island, where he encounters Jim, Miss Watson’s runaway slave. Huck and Jim travel together on a raft down the Mississippi River, but when their raft collides with a steamboat, they are separated.

After Jim is sold back into slavery Huck enlists his friend Tom in a plan to liberate Jim. Tom, full of his reading of romance literature, puts Jim and Huck through unnecessary contortions so that Jim’s liberation will conform to the plot of an adventure novel. To compound the absurdity, Tom eventually tells Huck that Miss Watson has died and set Jim free in her will. Tom’s cruelty—a kind of madness—becomes clear to Huck when Tom says he wanted to rescue Jim for the “adventure of it.” Disgusted with the absurd preconceptions of so-called civilized life, Huck announces that he is going to “light out for the territory.” The end of the novel reflects Twain’s ambivalence about the frontier. On the one hand, it is the refuge of the lawless; on the other, it still represents a free space where an individual can pursue his dreams of freedom.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Mark Twain: The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.

Champion, Laurie, ed. The Critical Response to Mark Twain’s Huckleberry Finn. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Colley, Thomas, ed. Adventures of Huckleberry Finn: An Authoritative Text, Contexts and Sources, Criticism. New York: Norton, 1999.

Graff, Gerald, and Phelan, James, eds. Adventures of Huckleberry Finn: A Case Study in Critical Controversy. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin’s Press, 2004.

Hutchinson, Stuart, ed. Mark Twain: Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998.

Johnson, Claudia Durst. Understanding Adventures of Huckleberry Finn: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

—Revised by Amy Cummins

The Adventures of Tom Sawyer* by Samuel

Langhorne Clemens (London: Chatto & Windus; Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing Company, 1876) novel

Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS’s first work of long fiction (after the collaboratively written THE GILDED AGE [1873]), The Adventures of Tom Sawyer is also his most autobiographical and most popular novel. According to Clemens’s preface, the novel is set “thirty or forty years ago” (i.e., 1836–1846) and is based on the author’s boyhood experiences. The orphaned Tom is “a combination of the characteristics of three boys” Clemens knew in his hometown of Hannibal, Missouri—a drowsy Mississippi River town that is called St. Petersburg in the novel. There, the mischievous Tom lives with Aunt Polly, against whose authority he struggles; his half brother, Sid, who acts as self-righteous foil; and his cousin Mary, a kindly maternal influence.

The novel’s plot traces Tom’s boyish adventures: his misbehavior at church and school, his crush on the judge’s daughter, and his elaborate games of make-believe. In his hijinks Tom is often joined by Joe Harper and Huckleberry Finn, “the juvenile pariah of the village,” whose outsider status Tom and the other children admire. Amid the light-hearted tales of childhood play runs a subplot of suspense: Tom and Huck witness a murder for which the wrong man is jailed, and they become involved in efforts to bring the real murderer, Injun Joe, to justice. When Injun Joe dies, they are awarded his $12,000 loot. As a reward for foiling Joe’s plot to disfigure her, Widow Douglas takes Huck into her home and invests his money. Under her “civilization,” though, Huck is uncomfortable and runs away; at last Tom coaxes him to return in exchange for being allowed to join the gang of robbers that Tom is forming.

Clemens drafted Tom Sawyer in several stages during years of working on other writing projects. He sent a complete manuscript to his friend, William Dean HOWELLS, who suggested that Clemens pitch the novel as a book for boys. Clemens followed the advice. In the book’s preface, he suggests his ambivalence about the book’s proper audience and interpretation, writing that it “is intended mainly for the entertainment of boys and girls” but that he also “hope[s] it will not be shunned by men and women” for whom it might serve as a reminder of “what they once were themselves.” Clemens’s words have proven prophetic; read by both children and adults, the book has been continually in print for over a hundred and thirty years, and it continues to enjoy world-wide popularity in dozens of translations and various forms of dramatization.

The Adventures of Tom Sawyer was followed by ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN, a book whose weightier themes have tended to cast Tom Sawyer in a less favorable critical light. Late in his career, Clemens revived the Tom and Huck characters in Tom Sawyer Abroad (1894) and Tom Sawyer, Detective (1896), both of which proved less popular than the original books.

Sources

Evans, John D. A Tom Sawyer Companion: An Autobiographical Guided Tour with Mark Twain. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1993.

Norton, Charles A. Writing Tom Sawyer: The Adventures of a Classic. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1983.

Scharnhorst, Gary, ed. Critical Essays on The Adventures of Tom Sawyer. New York: G. K. Hall, 1993.

—Revised by Brett Barney

Agassiz, Louis (1807–1873) naturalist, essayist

Louis Agassiz was born in Switzerland, where he attended medical school. In 1831 he went to Paris. There, under the influence of the German botanist Alexander von Humboldt and the French comparative anatomist George Cuvier, he became interested in the natural sciences. Agassiz had already made a name for himself as an expert on glaciers and on fossil fishes when he came to the United States in 1846 on a lecture tour. Two years later he accepted a professorship at Harvard, where he began work on the collections that became the Harvard Museum of Comparative Zoology.

Although he remained at Harvard until his death, Agassiz was also associated with the Charleston Medical College, Cornell University, and the Smithsonian Institution. Agassiz also founded the Marine Biological Laboratory at Wood's Hole, Massachusetts, in 1872 and led extensive research expeditions to Brazil (1865–1866) and along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the Americas (1871–1872).

Agassiz's emphasis on direct observation of nature proved enormously influential, as did his Contributions to the Natural History of the United States (1857–1862), which includes his famous "Essay on Classification." In the essay, Agassiz discourses on geology and paleontology and elaborates his opposition to the evolutionary theories of the British scientist Charles Darwin.

Sources

Bolles, Edmund Blair. The Ice Finders: How a Poet, a Professor, and a Politician Discovered the Ice Age. Washington, D.C.: Counterpoint, 1999.

Lurie, Edward. Louis Agassiz: A Life in Science. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960.

Aiken, George L. (1830–1876) playwright

Born in Boston, actor and playwright George L. Aiken made his stage debut in an 1848 production of Six Degrees of Crime in Providence, Rhode Island. Although he was not a star, he played many important roles, and his own play, Helos the Helot (produced 1852), won a prize intended to encourage American playwriting. He is best remembered, however, for his stage adaptation of Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, a work Aiken supposedly completed in one week. The play premiered in Troy, New York, on September 27, 1852 and was an instant success. Aiken appeared in the premiere performance, and the play continued to run another ninety-nine nights, after which it went to New York City, where it played for a record three hundred performances.

Aimard, Gustave

See GLOUX, OLIVER.

Alcott, Bronson (1799–1888) educator, social theorist

Born in Connecticut, Bronson Alcott supported himself as a teacher in New England and in Pennsylvania between 1822 and 1833. Later in Boston (1834–1839) and much later in Concord, Massachusetts (after 1859), Alcott advocated a program of progressive education that included promoting a concept of the whole student—one who was fit physically and mentally, with an aesthetic and moral sensibility. A committed transcendentalist (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), Alcott believed that individuals carried within them the spirit of the universe and an affinity for a central Mind, which he equated with the idea of God. This core belief has much in common with ROMANTICISM. The individual is considered to have an inborn sense of truth and intuition that can be strengthened by education.

Alcott set forth his philosophy in several books, including Record of a School: Exemplifying the General Principles of Spiritual Culture (1835) and the two-volume Conversations with Children on the Gospels (1836–1837). Although Alcott's ideas were rejected in Boston, where he was considered an extremist, they later were affirmed by other transcendentalists in Concord, most notably Ralph Waldo EMERSON and William Ellery CHANNING.

After 1840 Alcott traveled to England to discuss his ideas with thinkers such as Thomas Carlyle and then returned to the United States to participate in the experimental utopian community of FRUITLANDS. Thereafter, Alcott took to giving public lectures, though he was supported, in the main, by his wife and by his daughter Louisa May ALCOTT.

In 1859 Bronson Alcott became Concord's superintendent of schools and introduced singing, dancing, and reading aloud as well as the study of physiology into the curriculum. He believed that education should be a kind of recreation, that students should understand both their bodies and their minds, and that they should appreciate both the cerebral and the emotional aspects of life. In 1879 Alcott extended his influence on American education by establishing the Concord School of Philosophy (1879–1888). Reminiscent of Plato, who was an important influence on the transcendentalists, Alcott spread his ideas through public dialogue. His conversations were memorable and served to entice followers who spread the word of his philosophy.

Alcott's other noteworthy books include Observations on the Principles and Methods of Infant Instruction (1830) and The Doctrine and Discipline of Human Culture (1836). Concord Days (1872) contains excerpts from his journals. Other editions of his journals have been published, as have his efforts at autobiography, including Table Talk (1877) and New Connecticut (1887). The Letters of A. Bronson Alcott appeared in 1969.

Sources

Dahlstrand, Frederick C. Amos Bronson Alcott: An Intellectual Biography. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1982.

Schreiner, Samuel A. The Concord Quartet: Alcott, Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and the Friendship That Freed the American Mind. Hoboken, N.J.: Wiley, 2006.

Alcott, Louisa May (1832–1888) novelist

My definition [of a philosopher] is of a man up in a balloon, with his family and friends holding the ropes . . . and trying to haul him down.

—Life, Letters, and Journals (1889)

Born in Pennsylvania, Louisa May Alcott was the daughter of Bronson ALCOTT, a prominent transcendentalist (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). She spent her early years in Boston, where her father taught school. He instructed her at home, where she also learned from her father's visitors—Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry David THOREAU, and Theodore PARKER. At a very early age she turned to writing, producing a collection of fairy tales called Flower Fables (1854) at the age of sixteen. Like her mother, she helped to support the family.

Alcott wanted to become an actress, and she wrote several unpublished melodramas for the stage. She also wrote short stories and poetry, some of which were published in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. During the CIVIL WAR she worked as a nurse; Hospital Sketches (1863) reflects this experience. Moods (1865) was her first novel, but she spent much of her time writing anonymous GOTHIC ROMANCES. These novels were later identified and published as Behind a Mask (1975), Plots and Counterplots (1976), A Double Life: Newly Discovered Thrillers of Louisa May Alcott (1988), Freaks of Genius: Unknown Thrillers of Louisa May Alcott (1991), and From Jo March's Attic: Stories of Intrigue and Suspense (1993).

In 1867 Alcott became the editor of Merry's Museum, a magazine for young readers. There she published her most enduring work, LITTLE WOMEN, the story of a spirited young woman, Jo March, and her sisters Amy, Beth, and Meg. The novel was based on Alcott's own family life and was so popular that it brought the whole family financial security.

Alcott's later novels include An Old-Fashioned Girl (1870), Little Men (1871), and Work (1873). She wrote many other books for children in her later years, including the collections Proverb Stories (1882) and Spinning-Wheel Stories (1884). Silver Pitchers and Independence (1876) includes the short story "Transcendental Wild Oats," a fictionalized account of her father's utopian experiment, FRUITLANDS. Although Alcott's fiction is often heavily moralistic, it is also a fine example of domestic fiction, in which the joys of home and family are evoked with enthusiasm and nostalgia.

Sources

Alberghene, Janice M., and Beverly Lyon Clark, eds. Little Women and the Feminist Imagination: Criticism, Controversy, Personal Essays. New York: Garland, 1999.

Keyser, Elizabeth Lennox. Whispers in the Dark: The Fiction of Louisa May Alcott. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.

Shealy, Daniel, ed. Alcott in Her Own Time: A Biographical Chronicle of Her Life, Drawn from Recollections, Interviews, and Memoirs by Family, Friends, and Associates. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2005.

Stern, Madeleine B. Louisa May Alcott. New York: Random House, 1996.

Stern, ed. Critical Essays on Louisa May Alcott. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1984.

Alden, Henry Mills (1836–1919) editor, nonfiction writer

Born in Mt. Tabor, Vermont, Henry Mills Alden was known as the "dean of American magazine editors," serving from 1869 until his death in 1919 as the editor of HARPER'S MONTHLY. A highly religious man, he attempted to make Harper's suitable reading for the whole family. His books include God in His World (1890), A Study of Death (1895), and Magazine Writing and the New Literature (1908).

Source

Allen, Frederick Lewis. Harper's Magazine, 1850–1950: A Centenary Address. New York: Newcomen Society in North America, 1950.

Aldrich, Thomas Bailey (1836–1907) editor, poet, novelist, short-story writer, dramatist, essayist

Born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Thomas Aldrich was obliged by his father's early death to enter business at sixteen.

At the same time, however, Aldrich began to write poetry, publishing his first collection, The Bells, in 1855 while performing a variety of editorial duties at a New York magazine. With the coming of the CIVIL WAR, he became a correspondent for the Tribune, and from 1862 to 1865 he also served as managing editor of the Illustrated News. After the war, Aldrich settled in Boston, where he edited Every Saturday from 1866 to 1874. In 1881 he succeeded William Dean HOWELLS as editor of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

In 1890 Aldrich retired to devote more time to writing. He was already an accomplished writer, known for such works as "Marjorie Daw" (1873), a tale about an epistolary hoax, and The Story of a Bad Boy (1869), an autobiographical novel set in Portsmouth. In 1880 he published The Stillwater Tragedy, a successful detective mystery, and he broadened his range by dramatizing several of his poems, most notably "Mercedes" in 1894. Aldrich also published essays and travel sketches.

Source

Samuels, Charles E. Thomas Bailey Aldrich. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Alger, Horatio, Jr. (1832–1899) children's writer

Alger, according to his biographer, Herbert R. Mayes, wrote 119 books. Actually, he wrote one book and rewrote it 118 times.

—Quentin Reynolds, The Fiction Factory (1955)

The son of a Massachusetts Unitarian minister (see UNITARIANISM), Horatio Alger Jr. graduated from Harvard College and attended Harvard Divinity School but then ran away to Paris, where he took up a bohemian lifestyle. Alger returned to the United States in 1864 and took a position as a Unitarian minister. Ten years later he moved to New York, became chaplain at the Newsboys' Lodging House, and began his literary career. Over the next three decades Alger wrote almost 130 books for boys, all of them following the premise that pluck and hard work save one from poverty. Among his more popular works were the Ragged Dick series (began in 1867), the Luck and Pluck series (began in 1869), and the Tattered Tom series (began in 1871). Alger also wrote biographies of famous men for his young audience.

In 1898 Alger had a nervous breakdown and contracted with another writer, Edward Stratemeyer, to finish his work in progress. Stratemeyer, who sometimes wrote under the pseudonym Arthur M. Winfield, wrote eleven books published under Alger's name after his death, often working from plot outlines found among Alger's manuscripts. Altogether some twenty million copies of Alger's books have been printed.

Sources

Scharnhorst, Gary, with Jack Bales. The Lost Life of Horatio Alger, Jr. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985.

Tebbel, John. From Rags to Riches; Horatio Alger, Jr. and the American Dream. New York: Macmillan, 1963.

Allen, James Lane (1849–1925) essayist, poet, short-story writer, novelist

A native of Kentucky, James Lane Allen taught school there until 1880, when he took up a literary career. In addition to essays, he published short stories, such as the LOCAL COLOR sketches that appeared in HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE in the 1880s, later collected and published as The Blue-Grass Region of Kentucky (1892), and the Romantic (see ROMANTICISM) stories that constitute the collection Flute and Violin (1891). The relationship of man to nature is the burden of his best-known works, the novels The Kentucky Cardinal (1895) and its sequels, Aftermath (1896) and The Choir Invisible (1897). Later in his career he wrote realistic novels about farm life, such as his A Summer in Arcady (1896); a prose poem about the new ice age, The Last Christmas Tree (1914); and the CIVIL WAR novella The Sword of Youth (1915).

Source

Bottorff, William K. James Lane Allen. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Allibone, Samuel Austin (1816–1889) bibliographer

Born in Philadelphia, S. Austin Allibone was a bibliographer who compiled the important three-volume reference work A Critical Dictionary of English Literature and British and American Authors, which was published between 1858 and 1871. In 1879 he became the head of the Lenox Library, established in New York City by the philanthropist James Lenox to house his collection of early printed works, Bibles, and bibliographical studies. The Lenox Library was later incorporated into the New York Public Library.

Altgeld, John Peter (1847–1902) public figure

Born in Germany, John Peter Altgeld immigrated to the United States with his parents when he was a child; the family settled in Ohio. Although he received little formal education, he succeeded in reading law and becoming first an attorney and, in 1886, a judge of the Superior Court of Cook County, Illinois. His election to this position probably owed something to his publication in 1884 of Our Penal Machinery and Its Many Victims, in which he argued that American criminal justice discriminates against the poor.

In 1892 Altgeld was elected governor of Illinois, and during his four-year term he pardoned three anarchists convicted for their part in the Haymarket Square Riot of 1886. This act, together with his opposition to the use of federal troops during the Pullman strike of 1894 and his support for populist politician William Jennings Bryan (1860–1925), earned Altgeld a reputation as a radical and cost him reelection. For some writers, however, Altgeld remained a hero. Vachel Lindsay made Altgeld the subject of his poem “The Eagle That Is Forgotten” (1913), and novelist Howard Fast based the protagonist of his novel The American (1946) on Altgeld.

Source

Ginger, Ray. Altgeld's America; The Lincoln Ideal Versus Changing Realities. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1958.

The American by Henry James (The Atlantic Monthly, June 1876–May 1877; Boston: Osgood, 1877) novel

Henry James began writing The American shortly after his permanent relocation to Europe at the end of 1875; installments of the novel began appearing in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in June 1876, before James had completed it. The title character is Christopher Newman, a man who has become rich manufacturing washtubs. In Paris, Newman decides to marry Claire de Cintre, a young widow from an aristocratic family. He encounters much resistance from her family, however, because he is a businessman. Eventually, he is able to win Claire's approval, as well as the support of her brother, but the parents refuse to allow the courtship to proceed.

One of James's so-called international novels, which explore contrasts between American and European attitudes, The American depicts French society as governed by traditional notions of class that strike Newman as unfair and undemocratic. The novel is one of James's early works, and it reflects the influences of both REALISM and ROMANTICISM.

Source

Banta, Martha, ed. New Essays on The American. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

—Brett Barney

American Dictionary of the English Language

by Noah Webster (2 volumes, New York: S. Converse, 1828) dictionary

Following the publication of his Compendious Dictionary of the English Language (1806), Webster began work on his seventy-thousand-word, two-volume American Dictionary of the English Language. After restudying Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, Webster went on to learn some twenty languages. He consulted up to thirty dictionaries in his research of the origin of each word.

Superseding Samuel Johnson's A Dictionary of the English Language (1755), Webster's 1828 reference went toe to toe with Joseph Worcester's Comprehensive Pronouncing and Explanatory Dictionary of the English Language (1830) in what came to be known as the “War of the Dictionaries.” But while the literary elite favored Worcester's purist approach to the language, Webster's emphasis on American usage—and his inclusion of some five thousand words new to any English-language dictionary—won the day. In 1841 Webster published a revised version of his dictionary, nearly doubling the number of entries. After Webster died in 1843 brothers George and Charles Merriam purchased the rights to his dictionary.

American Folklore Society (1888– )

Based in Arlington, Virginia, this organization is devoted to the study of all aspects of American folklife, from family traditions to ethnic conflicts. Since its inception it has published the quarterly Journal of American Folklore. The group encompasses several branches, some of which have documented valuable information about Native Americans and African Americans. The society has worked for more than a century to study and conserve American folklore as well as to promote public policies that advance cultural diversity.

Source

The American Folklore Newsletter. El Paso: Published at the University of Texas at El Paso for the American Folklore Society, 1972–1982.

The American Monthly Magazine (1829–1831) periodical

Several significant magazines have borne this title or variations on it. The American Magazine, or, A Monthly View of the Political State of the British Colonies (1741) was the first magazine published in the colonies and lasted for only three issues. In 1788 Noah Webster edited an American Magazine that lasted for twelve issues; it was New York City's first monthly.

Nathaniel Parker WILLIS published an American Monthly Magazine in Boston from 1829 to 1831. Modeled on London's New Monthly Magazine, this periodical was devoted to entertainment; it featured stories, reviews, and humorous essays contributed by such writers as Park BENJAMIN and Lydia SIGOURNEY. The satirical tone of the magazine offended some proper Bostonians, and in 1831 Willis joined the New York Mirror as associate editor, taking his American Monthly subscription list with him.

Henry William Herbert started his American Monthly Magazine in New York in 1833 as a competitor to the newly founded KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE. Charles Fenno HOFFMAN joined Herbert in the second year, and together the two wrote much of the magazine's contents. In 1835 Benjamin took over from Herbert, but the former's attempt to publish the magazine in Boston and Philadelphia as well as in New York failed. In its last few years, what had been a variety magazine gradually turned into a political review, with pieces supporting the Whig Party contributed by Horace GREELEY. In 1838 it ceased publication altogether. FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY also later bore the title American Magazine.

Source

Huntzicker, William. The Popular Press, 1833–1865. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

"The American Scholar" by Ralph Waldo

Emerson (1837) address

Ralph Waldo EMERSON first delivered this lecture to the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard on August 31, 1837. In what Oliver Wendell HOLMES called "our intellectual Declaration of Independence," Emerson exhorted his audience of native intellectuals to rouse and lead American society into mental independence and self-reliance. He identified the scholar as the "delegated intellect . . . he is Man Thinking." Emerson charged that the scholar's job, as the finest product of American society, was to lead his people out of their bondage to old cultures and away from the "popular cry" of received wisdom and everyday modes of thought.

The address proved to be immensely popular, and it firmly established Emerson as a leader of the intellectual fermentation then brewing in New England. In its idealistic call for native leaders, it remains a classic piece of American rhetoric.

Source

Sealts, Merton M. Emerson on the Scholar. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1992.

Andrews, Stephen Pearl (1812–1886) linguist, political writer

A religious and political freethinker, Stephen Pearl Andrews was also a brilliant linguist. In his book The Science of Society (1851) Andrews developed a social theory he labeled "Pantarchy," a method of organizing society using anarchic principles. He also developed his own universal language, which he called "Alwato," a kind of early Esperanto. He was instrumental in helping the feminist Victoria WOODHULL and her sister Tennessee Celeste Claflin establish their radical periodical, Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly, in 1870. Andrews also published several instructional texts about shorthand.

Source

Stern, Madeleine B. The Pantarch: A Biography of Stephen Pearl Andrews. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1968.

"Annabel Lee" by Edgar Allan Poe (1849) poem

One of Edgar Allan POE's most famous poems, "Annabel Lee" was first published in his New York Daily Tribune obituary on October 9, 1849. Morbidity is reflected in this tale of a doomed childhood romance: the poetic persona claims that Annabel Lee was carried away by angels envious of her purity, and he swears to remain devotedly at "her tomb by the sounding sea." Rufus GRISWOLD, who first anthologized the poem in his Poets and Poetry of America (1850), claimed it was Poe's final work.

Source

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Collected Works of Edgar Allan Poe, volume 1, edited by Thomas Ollive Mabbott. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1969.

—Robin Rudy Smith

Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906) feminist reformer, historian

Born into a Massachusetts Quaker family, Susan Brownell Anthony was exposed from birth to ideas of human equality and ABOLITIONISM. When financial reverses forced her to leave her teaching position and return to the family farm in Rochester, New York, her family responded by supporting her interest in working for social reform.

Anthony joined the TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT, but after she was denied permission to speak at a temperance convention because she was a woman, she turned to abolitionism in 1852. After passage of the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863, she took up the cause of women's issues such as suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM), labor reform, and the adoption of equitable marriage laws.

Anthony pursued her goals largely through public speaking. She was a commanding rhetorician, and for fifty years she traveled the country lecturing audiences on the need for equal rights. In partnership with Elizabeth Cady STANTON, Anthony founded the National Woman Suffrage Association in 1869 and was the second president (1892–1900) of its offshoot, the National American Woman Suffrage Association. She joined with Stanton and Matilda Gage in writing the first three volumes of the History of Woman Suffrage (1881–1886) and contributed to volume four. The six-volume series was completed by Ida Husted Harper (1851–1931) between 1900 and 1922.

Sources

Anthony, Susan B. Failure Is Impossible: Susan B. Anthony in Her Own Words, edited by Lynn Sherr. New York: Times Books, 1995.

Barry, Kathleen. Susan B. Anthony: A Biography of a Singular Feminist. New York: New York University Press, 1988.

Dubois, Ellen Carol, ed. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony: Correspondence, Writings, Speeches. New York: Schocken Books, 1981.

Anti-Rent War (1839–1854)

When Stephen Van Rensselaer, a Hudson River landholder, died in 1839, his heirs attempted to collect back rent from tenants on his estate. The tenants forcibly resisted, turning back a sheriff's posse that had been sent to evict them. The revolt against the system of "patroonship"—perpetual leases dating from the time of Dutch and English rule—spread quickly as Anti-Rent Associations were formed throughout north central New York State. The level of violence also escalated as tenants who were dressed as Indians harassed landlords and their agents. When a deputy sheriff was killed in Delaware County, New York, in 1845, Governor William H. Seward declared a state of emergency and called on the militia. The rent resisters then turned to the political process to redress their grievances, helping to elect a Whig governor, John Young, and pressuring the legislature to pass a law prohibiting long-term leases. The movement forced the breakup of large estates as worried landowners sold off their holdings. James Fenimore COOPER used the Anti-Rent Wars as a backdrop for his Littlepage Manuscripts trilogy: Satanstoe (1846), The Chainbearer (1846), and The Redskins (1846).

Sources

Christman, Henry. Tin Horns and Calico: A Decisive Episode in the Emergence of Democracy. New York: Holt, 1945.

Ellis, D. M. Landlords and Farmers in the Hudson-Mohawk Region, 1790–1850. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1967.

Apess, William (1798–1839) memoirist, minister

And while you ask yourselves, "What do they, the Indians, want?" you have only to look at the unjust laws made for them and say, "They want what I want," in order to make men of them, good and wholesome citizens.

—Eulogy on King Philip (1836)

Minister, author, and advocate of Native American rights, William Apess was born near Colrain, Massachusetts, to parents of Indian, white, and possibly African American descent. His father was a shoemaker, and his mother may have been a slave. Both parents identified themselves as Pequots, a Native people who had experienced especially cruel treatment at the hands of white settlers.

In A Son of the Forest (1829) Apess describes being put, at a young age, in the care of his maternal grandparents, alcoholics who neglected and beat him. At the age of four, following one particularly brutal incident, Apess was removed from the house and indentured to a neighbor, Mr. Furman, whom Apess recalled as poor but kind. While in the Furman household he attended school for six winters—his only formal education. At the age of eleven, Apess tried to run away and his indentures were sold, first to one member of New England's social elite and then, shortly after, to another, Judge William Williams of New London, Connecticut. For several years Apess had been attending Methodist meetings, and a particularly spiritual experience on May 15, 1813, effected the conversion that profoundly shaped the remainder of his life. The Williamses, who were Congregationalists, objected to Apess's Methodist affiliation, so he ran away to New York City.

In the spring of 1817 Apess returned to Connecticut, where he reconnected with the Methodist church. He was baptized in 1818 and began a career as an itinerant preacher. On December 16, 1821, he married Mary Wood of Salem, Connecticut. They had at least three children. The family relocated to Providence, Rhode Island, and Apess was ordained a Methodist minister in 1829. A Son of the Forest, the first full-length American Indian autobiography to be published, appeared the same year. A significantly revised second edition appeared in 1831, as did The Increase of the Kingdom of Christ: A Sermon.

The Experiences of Five Christian Indians of the Pequot Tribe (1833) is a collection of conversion narratives (including Apess's) that also includes the important essay, "An Indian's Looking-Glass for the White Man." This moving appeal for whites' fair treatment of Native Americans cites past injustices and urges Christians, specifically, to benevolence: "I would ask you if you would like to be disenfranchised from all your rights, merely because your skin is white, and for no other crime?" Calling on his readers to abide by the golden rule of "Love Thy Neighbor," Apess cites "John in the Epistles [who] says, 'He who loveth God, loveth his brother also.'"

Apess's 1836 sermon at Boston's Odeon was published as Eulogy on King Philip . . . (1836). After a series of financial and personal setbacks, Apess moved to New York City. His death of apoplexy on April 8, 1839 may have been due to dangerous medical treatments, or it may have been brought on by overindulgence in alcohol, "that bane of comfort and happiness" that he had long identified as one of the whites' most cruelly effective weapons against his people.

Sources

Konkle, Maureen. Writing Indian Nations: Native Intellectuals and the Politics of Historiography, 1827–1863. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.

Velikova, Roumiana. "'Philip, King of the Pequots': The History of an Error," Early American Literature, 37 (June 2002): 311–335.

Warrior, Robert. "Eulogy on William Apess: Speculations on His New York Death," Studies in American Indian Literatures, 16 (Summer 2004): 1–13.

—Brett Barney

D. Appleton & Company (1825– ) publishing house

The publishing house of D. Appleton and Company had its beginnings in the general store that Daniel Appleton opened in New York City in 1825, after having maintained similar stores in Massachusetts. Appleton devoted a large part of his store to books and soon came to be known primarily as a bookseller. In 1830 his son William joined the business, and in 1831 the company published its first book, Crumbs from the Master's Table, a collection of Bible verses. Though the company had published only its third book by 1832, Daniel and William Appleton had firmly established themselves as publishers by the end of the decade. When William officially partnered with his father in 1838, the business was named D. Appleton and Company.

D. Appleton and Company published in a variety of fields, including literature, and it emerged as a premier publisher in several areas. Appleton began publishing textbooks early on, and these remained a major source of the company's revenue throughout the century. Following its success in the United States, Appleton began publishing Spanish-language textbooks for Central and South America, a nearly unprecedented move for a U.S. publisher. Science books also came to constitute a significant portion of D. Appleton's catalogue, and the firm became a leading scientific publisher in the United States. Under the editorship of Edward L. Youmans, Appleton was responsible for introducing many scientific topics to an American audience; the house published American editions of Charles Darwin, Thomas Huxley, Herbert Spencer, and John Tyndall. The firm also established itself as a publisher of medical texts beginning in the 1850s. Though not best-known for its literary publications, Appleton developed relationships with American and British authors as well. Most notably, D. Appleton began in the 1850s to publish the works of William Cullen BRYANT, who became an important author on the Appleton list.

By the 1850s, D. Appleton was in the top tier of American publishers. In 1854 the company purchased the Society Library building in New York to house its offices and retail business. In 1857 the first volume of the company's sixteen-volume American Cyclopaedia appeared, further cementing Appleton's position as a major publisher. In the following decades, tens of thousands of Cyclopaedia sets were sold. In 1872 D. Appleton issued an updated edition, newly illustrated and with additional entries.

D. Appleton's success was based in part on the post-CIVIL WAR publishing boom. In 1869 the company started its first periodical, APPLETON'S JOURNAL, and Popular Science Monthly followed in 1872. Like other publishers, Appleton participated in the proliferation of literature about the Civil War; notable among their titles was a military history of Ulysses S. Grant and biographies of William T. Sherman and Philip H. Sheridan. Like HARPER AND BROTHERS, however, the firm ran into financial trouble in the 1890s. At the beginning of the twentieth century the company was bankrupt, but—also like Harper and Brothers—D. Appleton was successfully reorganized.

Source

Overton, Grant Martin. Portrait of a Publisher: The First Hundred Years of the House of Appleton, 1825–1925. New York: Appleton, 1925.

—Elizabeth Lorange

Appleton's Journal (1869–1881) periodical

Originally a weekly magazine devoted to literature and current events, after 1872 Appleton's Journal of Popular Literature, Science and Art began, under the editorship of O. B. Bunch, to commission illustrations by prominent artists to accompany the publication of original fiction by writers such as Thomas Bangs THORPE. Other contributors included Julian HAWTHORNE, Rebecca Harding DAVIS, John Burroughs, and Brander MATTHEWS. Beginning in 1876, the magazine became a monthly, and in its last three years it primarily reprinted pieces taken from foreign periodicals.

The Arena (1889–1901) periodical

This Boston monthly, edited by Benjamin O. Flower, was concerned with issues of social and economic reform. Like many other general circulation periodicals of the time it combined a sociopolitical agenda with literature; appropriately, The Arena chose to publish works by realists (see REALISM) such as Hamlin GARLAND.

Source

Flower, B. O. Progressive Men, Women, and Movements of the Past Twenty-Five Years. Boston: The New Arena, 1914; Westport, Conn.: Hyperion, 1975.

Arnold, George (1834–1865) poet

A member of the group of self-styled bohemians that frequently met at the Pfaff's Cellar, a tavern in New York City, George Arnold was a poet and humorist who specialized in burlesquing others. He published under many pseudonyms—often in magazines—and it was only after his early death that his poems were collected and edited by the drama critic William Winter as Drift: A Sea-Shore Idyll and Other Poems (1866) and Poems, Grave and Gay (1867).

Source

Arnold, George. The Poems of George Arnold. Boston: Osgood, 1880.

Arp, Bill

See SMITH, CHARLES H.

Arthur, T. S. (1809–1885) propagandist, novelist

The TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT to ban alcoholic beverages reached its zenith in the 1850s, and Timothy Shay Arthur was one of its most prolific and successful propagandists. Over a million copies of his one hundred or so tracts were circulated. He edited several magazines devoted to the abolition of alcohol, and his novel TEN NIGHTS IN A BAR-ROOM AND WHAT I SAW THERE (1854) was adapted for the stage in 1858 with great success by William W. Pratt.

Source

Epstein, Barbara. The Politics of Domesticity: Women, Evangelism, and Temperance in Nineteenth-Century America. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1981.

"The Aspern Papers" by Henry James (1888) short story

In this short story by Henry JAMES, first published in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, the unnamed narrator is a scholar and critic obsessed with the early-nineteenth-century poet Jeffrey Aspern (James's fictional creation, based on Percy Bysshe Shelley). The scholar arrives in Venice with the aim of tricking Aspern's muse and sometime lover, Juliana Bordereau, into turning over her letters from Aspern. Toward this end he poses as a prospective lodger in the house that the now elderly woman shares with her spinster niece, Tita. As the story evolves, the narrator must balance his lust for Aspern's letters with his own sense of decorum and humanity; Tita must balance her obsession for the narrator with her devotion to her aunt; and Miss Bordereau must balance her hatred of scholars with her love for her niece. The result is an engaging tale in which all three characters use subtle machinations in attempts to achieve their individual desires.

Sources

Dewey, Joseph, and Brooke Horvath, eds. "The Finer Thread, the Tighter Weave": Essays on the Short Fiction of Henry James. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 2001.

James, Henry. Tales of Henry James, selected and edited by Christof Wegelin and Henry B. Wonham. New York: Norton, 2003.

—King Adkins

The Atlantic Monthly (1857– ) periodical

Founded in Boston by the publisher Moses Dresser Phillips and several prominent writers, The Atlantic Monthly was from the outset a product of the New England literary elite. Its name was bestowed by Oliver Wendell HOLMES, who also contributed his AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE series over many years. James Russell LOWELL was another early contributor who also served as editor during the magazine's first four years. In 1859 The Atlantic was sold to publishing firm TICKNOR & FIELDS. Lowell got the magazine off to an excellent start by soliciting work from writers such as Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, John Greenleaf WHITTIER, and Harriet Beecher STOWE. The magazine's focus was squarely on New England during this period, and it was only when James T. FIELDS took over as editor in 1862 that The Atlantic Monthly began to broaden its scope, still concentrating on thoughtful poems and stories, but also adding essays on general topics in both the arts and sciences, including advice about health care. William Dean HOWELLS assumed the editor's chair in 1871 and began publishing regional authors from all over the country: Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Bret HARTE, Mary N. MURFREE, and Paul Hamilton HAYNE were among his contributors. Howells also added new departments devoted to science, music, and education, and he introduced book reviews to the magazine's pages.

The Atlantic Monthly remained largely a literary periodical, however, until Ellery Sedgwick, the magazine's eighth editor, took over in 1909, emphasizing economic, political, social, and scientific aspects of the American scene, thereby greatly increasing circulation. The magazine has more or less maintained its original identity, continuing into the twenty-first century as one of the sole surviving literary periodicals from this period.

Source

Sedgwick, Ellery. The Atlantic Monthly, 1857–1909: Yankee Humanism at High Tide and Ebb. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994.

Audubon, John James (1785–1851) naturalist artist, writer

My thoughts were ever and anon turning toward [birds] as the objects of my greatest delight. In short . . . I seldom passed a day without drawing a bird, or noting something respecting its habit.

—Scribner's (March 1893)

Born in Santo Domingo (now Haiti), John James Audubon was the son of a French naval officer and a Creole woman. After studying art in France with the great historical painter and portraitist Jacques-Louis David, in 1804 Audubon went to live at his father's estate, Mill Grove, near Philadelphia. It was there that he began to observe birds and conduct the first bird-banding experiments in America in order to track ornithological behavior.

In 1808 Audubon married Lucy Bakewell and moved to Kentucky, which he used as a base from which to travel to the American frontier. There he began the series of avian portraits that culminated in his masterwork, The Birds of America (1827–1838). In the interim Audubon depended greatly on the financial support of his wife, who ran a private school in Louisiana, where the family had moved in 1820. It proved difficult for him to find a publisher in the United States, but a trip to England in 1826 resulted in publication of Birds of America in elephant-folio size (approximately 14 by 23 inches), with accompanying text written by Audubon and the Scottish naturalist William McGillivray.

Audubon was also a keen observer of American frontier life. Delineations of American Scenery and Character (1926) and Audubon's America (1940) contain extracts from his journals that reveal a gift for narrative. His portraits of birds, however, remain his main contribution to American intellectual history.

Source

Rhodes, Richard. John James Audubon: The Making of an American. New York: Knopf, 2004.

The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table

by Oliver Wendell Holmes (Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1858)

essay collection

This collection of discursive essays by Oliver Wendell HOLMES grew out of two works of the same name that Holmes had published in The New-England Magazine (1831–1832). The later series takes the form of a continuing conversation among a stock set of characters (such as the Schoolmistress, the Divinity Student, and the Poor Relation) around the breakfast table of an imaginary boardinghouse. This loose format allowed Holmes to comment amusingly on a wide range of topics and even permitted him to interject poems, some of which—“The Deacon’s Masterpiece” and “The Chambered Nautilus,” for example—gained recognition independently for their artistry.

Source

Dowling, William C. Oliver Wendell Holmes in Paris: Medicine, Theology, and the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 2006.

Absalom, Absalom! by William Faulkner (New York: Random House, 1936) novel

Absalom, Absalom!, published the same year as Margaret Mitchell's GONE WITH THE WIND, is also a Civil War novel but so complex in structure and extended in time as to defy the category. Regarded by many critics as William FAULKNER's masterpiece, Absalom, Absalom! is at once an historical novel about a Southern family, before, during, and after the Civil War, and a treatise on the nature of storytelling and history itself.

At the center is the character of Thomas Sutpen, a poor white born in the mountains of western Virginia in 1807 whose family moved to the Tidewater region, where he discovered his lack of social status in the strictly regimented racial and class structure of the aristocratic plantation culture. A humiliating experience—he is ordered to use the back door, or servant's entrance, of a plantation house instead of the front door—spurs him to a grand “design”: to acquire great wealth and create his own plantation dynasty.

His pursuit of this design leads to the West Indies and then to YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, Mississippi, where he establishes a plantation, marries, and fathers two children, Henry and Judith. His design goes awry when Judith becomes engaged to Charles Bon, a college friend of Henry's, and the Civil War breaks out, threatening their lives and economic security.

Revelations about the Sutpen family motives and histories are delayed by the rhetorical structure of the novel: Faulkner employs characters who were fully developed years earlier (see THE SOUND AND THE FURY, 1929), Quentin Compson and his father, not to advance but to retard the narrative. They tell the remembered story of the Sutpens to each other. Moreover, Quentin, elaborating on the nature of the South and its peculiar history in conversation with his Harvard roommate, Canadian Shreve McCannon, further delays resolution. And Rosa Coldfield, Thomas Sutpen's spinster sister-in-law and onetime bride-to-be (his hoped-for dynasty being otherwise defunct), narrates at length and without knowledge or comprehension. As the novel opens in September 1909, Quentin has been summoned to Miss Rosa's house because someone has been hiding out at Sutpen's house, and she needs Quentin to take her there that night so that she can see for herself.

In the first half of the book, Quentin is mainly a listener, as Miss Rosa and his father tell what they know about Sutpen. But several questions remain unanswered. Why, for instance, did Henry repudiate his right to the family plantation at Christmas 1860, just prior to the war? After the war was over, why did he so need to prevent Bon's marrying his sister that he shot him? And just who (or what) is it that Rosa believes is still living at the house?

Answers to these questions come in the second half of the book, which takes place in Quentin's room at Harvard the following January of 1910. He has just received a letter from his father informing him of Miss Rosa's death. This revelation prompts him and his roommate, Shreve, to begin worrying out the details of the Sutpen story. Whereas earlier Quentin had been a passive listener of the tale, now he must become an active teller of the tale, even embellishing where necessary to make the story fit known facts.

What he and Shreve ultimately determine is that Charles Bon is Sutpen's son by his first wife in the West Indies, repudiated by Sutpen upon the discovery of her inherited trace of Negro blood. This racial “taint” being incompatible with Sutpen's design, he put wife and son aside in order to start fresh in Mississippi. Henry, having disdained his plantation inheritance, killed Bon, his heretofore friend, to prevent his sister's marriage to her racially mixed half brother—Judith's defiant nature and passion for Bon making murder the necessary resolution. The story thus reiterates in microcosm the tragic history of the South concerning relations between whites and blacks, a legacy that continued to haunt the region decades after emancipation.

Sources

Hobson, Fred, ed. William Faulkner's Absalom, Absalom!: A Casebook. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Kinney, Arthur F. Critical Essays on William Faulkner: The Sutpen Family. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Parker, Robert Dale. Absalom, Absalom!: The Questioning of Fictions. New York: Twayne, 1991.

—John B. Padgett

Accent (1940–1960) periodical

Published at the University of Illinois, this LITTLE MAGAZINE published both new and established authors. An important literary quarterly, it featured the work of Irwin Shaw, Kay BOYLE, Katherine Anne PORTER, Wallace STEVENS, and E. E. CUMMINGS, as well as literary criticism by Kenneth Burke and David Daiches. The Accent Anthology was published in 1946. Accent remains an important source for understanding the development of literary MODERNISM in America and of how influential critics began to analyze it.

Adams, Andy (1859–1935) novelist, short-story writer

Adams was one of only a handful of cowboy writers to have gained recognition for their literary achievements. Born in Indiana, he moved to Texas to become a cowboy, later moving on to Colorado to work as a miner. It was in Colorado that he took up writing, publishing his semi-autobiographical account of a Texas cattle drive, The Log of a Cowboy, in 1903. While Log dealt primarily with the adventure of the undertaking, The Outlet (1905) considered the cattle drive as a business proposition, exploring the forces behind the movement of live-stock to the railhead by providing enduring portraits of venal congressional lobbyists and greedy railroad operators. Adams also published a collection of stories about frontier life, Cattle Brands (1906), and a novel about a Texas cattle rancher, Reed Anthony, Cowman: An Autobiography (1907).

Source

Hudson, Wilson Mathis. Andy Adams: Storyteller and Novelist of the Great Plains. Austin, Tex.: Steck-Vaughn, 1967.

Addams, Jane (1860–1935) social reformer

Addams's landmark autobiography, Twenty Years at Hull-House (1910), details many of the experiences that made her one of the most significant social reformers of the nineteenth century. Addams founded Hull-House in Chicago in 1889. At this meeting place for political and civic groups and neighborhood gathering place, Addams lectured on and lobbied for social reform through "settlement," whereby social workers took up residence among the urban poor in order to serve these communities' needs. Addams also worked for international peace, publishing such works as Democracy and Social Ethics (1902) and Peace and Bread in Time of War (1922). Her activism earned her the reputation as a radical and also a Nobel Peace Prize in 1931.

Sources

Brown, Victoria Bissell. The Education of Jane Addams. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Davis, Allen F. American Heroine: The Life and Legend of Jane Addams. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.

Trolander, Judith Ann. "Settlement House Movement," in Women's Studies Encyclopedia, vol. 3, edited by Helen Tierney. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991, pp. 405–407.

The Adding Machine by Elmer Rice (produced 1923) play

The Adding Machine, written by Elmer RICE, is one of the most enduring examples of American expressionist drama (see EXPRESSIONISM), marked by a dark comic tone and distortions of character, setting, and language. Featuring the innovative set designs of Lee Simonson, the drama premiered on March 19, 1923, and ran for seventy-two performances at the Garrick Theatre in New York.

This nightmarish, episodic play chronicles the journey of Mr. Zero, an aging, neurotic actuary who kills his boss after learning that he is being replaced by an adding machine. After his trial and execution, Mr. Zero briefly experiences a blissful afterlife with his office mate on Earth, whose secret love for him led her to commit suicide to join him. But Mr. Zero's puritanical values force him to reject their relationship. At the end of the play Mr. Zero, who has found a new job adding numbers in heaven, is informed by his boss that he possesses the soul of an eternal slave and must return to Earth to continue his dreary fate. Through his parable, Rice explores the dehumanization of humankind by technology and the plight of the masses who are slaves to their own puritanical perspectives.

Source

Rice, Elmer. The Adding Machine. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Page, 1923.

—Kimberly M. Jew

African American Literature

Although there were many notable African Americans writing and speaking out in the early years of the twentieth century—including major figures such as Booker T. WASHINGTON, W. E. B. DU BOIS, and Charles Waddell CHESNUTT—it is important to note that the advancement of African American literature depended more on the development of the black audience than on the efforts of any single individual. In the 1910s African Americans were benefiting from employment opportunities afforded by WORLD WAR I, and black soldiers were returning from the war with a new sense of their capacities and a desire to be recognized as full citizens. During these years African Americans were engaged in the beginning of a Great Migration from the rural South to the urban North that would last for decades. In the South blacks had limited opportunities, and many lived off the land, often sharecropping small parcels of land they did not own, a practice that made it impossible to accumulate wealth. In Northern cities, though blacks still suffered economic oppression and experienced bigotry, there were opportunities for education and a heightened sense of the possibilities of life.

A key figure in this transition period was James Weldon JOHNSON, a poet and novelist. His AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN EX-COLORED MAN (1912) explored a theme of “passing” that became central in African American literature. The unnamed narrator of the novel discovers that he can pass for white and thus fully integrate himself into American society. But passing also means forsaking his identity as an African American, giving up his people and his past. Passing inherently poses a question of authenticity, of how to achieve a fulfilling identity within an oppressive society—a question that all African American writers faced in one way or another. The idea of passing also raised a question of literary style; that is, should the African American write white, so to speak, or develop a style distinctively associated with his race? This much-debated issue also is connected to the question of whether African American literature itself should be viewed separately or as part of the mainstream of American literature.

Johnson’s novel was followed in the 1920s by a flood of poetry, fiction, and plays by a group of writers who collectively became known as the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Countee CULLEN and Claude MCKAY used the traditional verse forms of English literature to express the plight of African Americans—their frustration and rage over not being accorded their full civil rights and respect as American citizens. At the same time, both poets took pride in their people and the beauty of black life. Their celebration of African American culture did not merely bolster a people; it also elicited respect from white writers such as Carl VAN VECHTEN and Eugene O’NEILL. These and other white writers created works of literature exploring the nature of African American life, dramatizing both its promise and its peril.

McKay’s novel Home to Harlem (1928) also helped focus attention on the “black metropolis” as a literary and cultural capital, the place to be to hear the best jazz in the country and to meet thinkers such as Alain LOCKE, whose nonfiction book The New Negro (1925) demonstrated how much African Americans had contributed to world culture. Locke suggested that through their virtues and talents African Americans created a kind of mystique, a glamour that attracted whites to Harlem’s Cotton Club and the Savoy Ballroom. For Locke, what was new was an emerging boldness and creativity in African American culture. The New Negro was breaking the stereotype of the passive African American that had become familiar during the Reconstruction period.

The greatest figure to emerge out of the Harlem Renaissance was Langston HUGHES. In poems such as “THE NEGRO SPEAKS OF RIVERS,” Hughes celebrated the grandeur of African American history. He also tapped the folklore of his people, creating a kind of common man in Jesse B. Semple (“Simple”), the hero of a series of short stories, some of which were transformed into plays. As a creative writer as well as an autobiographer and an anthologist, Hughes did as much as any other single figure to foster the development of African American literature.

Hughes’s legacy might be compared with that of Du Bois, whose book THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK (1903) ranks with Johnson’s novel as a precursor of the Harlem Renaissance. Du Bois believed in the indigenous strength of African American culture, and as historian, sociologist, novelist, editor, political agitator, and educator he sustained and promoted African American literature. Du Bois was a strong supporter of Hughes, McKay, and others, and he published their work in the THE CRISIS, the organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

A one-time collaborator with Hughes and the most prolific female African American writer of the Harlem Renaissance, Zora Neale HURSTON contributed to the growing interest in the folktales and folk wisdom of African American culture. Her Mules and Men (1935), for example, detailed the lifestyles of rural blacks and introduced an anthropological study of the hoodoo culture of African Americans in New Orleans. Hurston, whose contributions to African American literature were neglected for many years, was rediscovered in the 1970s and became an important model for a new generation of African American women writers.

By 1940, when the energy of the Harlem Renaissance had dissipated, new African American writers such as Richard WRIGHT, Melvin B. TOLSON, and Gwendolyn BROOKS were producing novels, short stories, and poetry that explored the joy and heartbreak of African American life—but with little of the Renaissance’s sense of campaigning for a “New Negro.” Indeed, Wright in his acclaimed novel NATIVE SON (1940) portrayed a brutal urban environment that emasculated African American men. Brooks, on the other hand, while not ignoring the grimness of African American lives, also evoked their energy, determination, and wit.

The tradition of autobiography, begun with nineteenth-century slave narratives and continued in the twentieth century with books such as Wright’s BLACK BOY (1945), has particularly strengthened African American literature, and a good deal of African American literature since Wright has examined the tensions between separateness and integration that Johnson first explored in Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man.

Sources

- De Santis, Christopher, ed. Langston Hughes: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 315. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thompson Gale, 2005.
- De Weever, Jacqueline. Mythmaking and Metaphor in Black Women's Fiction. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Gibson, Donald B. The Politics of Literary Expression: A Study of Major Black Writers. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Stepito, Robert. From Behind the Veil: A Study of Afro-American Narrative. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Agee, James (1909–1955) novelist, poet, movie critic

Agee is best known for his book about sharecroppers in the GREAT DEPRESSION, the classic LET US NOW PRAISE FAMOUS MEN (1941), illustrated with photographs by Walker Evans. He was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, and educated at Harvard.

Agee's first book, Permit Me Voyage (1934), published in the YALE SERIES OF YOUNGER POETS, exemplified his intense commitment to style. His collaboration with Evans grew out of a FORTUNE magazine assignment, which sent him to Alabama to document the life of tenant farmer families. This book also shows Agee's lyricism and profound sensitivity to the agrarian life.

In 1939 Agee began work as a book reviewer for Time. Beginning in 1941, he reviewed movies, quickly establishing himself as one of the country's best critics and raising the reviewing of film to a higher level. His deep interest in motion pictures is evident in reviews that appeared in The Nation (1942–1948). Agee's work also appeared in journals such as PARTISAN REVIEW and Sight and Sound. Extending his range, Agee worked on movie scripts, including an adaptation of Stephen CRANE's classic short story, "The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky" (1948), and C. S. Forester's The African Queen (1951). In 1951 he published his first novel, The Morning Watch. His second autobiographical novel, A Death in the Family, published after his death in 1957, enhanced his reputation and won a PULITZER PRIZE in 1958. Responding to his father's death, Agee writes of it as a family event, as a series of revelations told with sensitivity. His Collected Poems was published in 1968.

Sources

- Bergreen, Laurence. James Agee: A Life. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1984.
- Kramer, Victor. James Agee. Boston: Twayne, 1975.
- Lofaro, Michael, ed. James Agee: Reconsiderations. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.
- Madden, David, ed. Remembering James Agee. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997.

The Age of Innocence by Edith Wharton (New York & London: Appleton, 1920) novel

An informed look at the moneyed class and of the elite that governed the social life of New York in the 1870s, this fictional treatment of the setting of WHARTON's youth won a PULITZER PRIZE.

Newland Archer, a sophisticated member of New York City's elite, notices Countess Ellen Olenska at the opera. Intrigued, he finds out that she has just left her Polish husband—scandalous behavior for a woman from a good New York family. Archer is engaged to May Welland, but it is Ellen who has captured his imagination. She seems to represent a larger world than that of the provincial New York that harbors and yet inhibits Archer.

Archer's feelings are complicated when a partner at his law firm directs him to handle Olenska's case—she wishes to divorce her husband. Archer is delegated to talk her out of the legal action, since her family disapproves of such a public exposure of her failed marriage. Archer does his job, convincing Ellen that is better to remain married even if society's rules seem too narrow.

Disturbed by his own advice, Archer evades any more contact with Ellen and presses May to marry him sooner than planned. Yet, Archer cannot stay away from Ellen and tells her she is the woman he would have married if they had been free to do so. Ellen, clearly in love with Archer, nevertheless reminds him that his own actions have made it impossible for them to be together.

Archer does his duty and marries May. Yet, he cannot forsake Ellen, and when he sees her again, he tries to arrange some sort of relationship. But Ellen is steadfast in her refusal to consider Newland's implied proposition that they become lovers.

Thirty years later, after the death of his wife, Archer is in Paris with his son, who has arranged for his father to meet Ellen. But Archer finds that once he is just outside her apartment he cannot enter. Newland learns from his son that May had long known about his interest in Ellen. A stunned Archer stands staring at Ellen's balcony, concluding, "It's more real to me here than if I went up."

Sources

- Lewis, R. W. B. Edith Wharton: A Biography. New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1975.
- Tuttleton, James W. The Novel of Manners in America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1972, pp. 122–140.

Agrarians

The Agrarians were twelve Southern writers who published I'LL TAKE MY STAND (1930), a collection of essays that argued for the superiority of southern agrarian life over modern, urban culture. The group included Allen TATE, John Crowe RANSOM, Robert Penn WARREN, Donald DAVIDSON, John Gould Fletcher, Stark YOUNG, and Andrew LYTLE, most of whom had also been associated with a literary movement called THE FUGITIVES. I'll Take My Stand was sharply critical of northern industrialism and capitalism and the exploitation of labor. The book argued that southern ways not only were more humane but also created conditions more propitious for the imagination. To maintain this argument, the Agrarians downplayed or rationalized the legacy of slavery and of sharecropping. The history of bigotry in the South received little attention—a fact that later bothered Warren, one of the younger Agrarians, who later repudiated some of the positions on race and politics he had taken in I'll Take My Stand. The group was at its most cohesive from 1928 to 1935. Thereafter, many of its members, including Warren, Tate, and Ransom, found academic employment in the North. Davidson and others remained in the South and stuck by their early views.

Sources

- Conkin, Paul K. The Southern Agrarians. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1988.
- Duncan, Christopher M. Fugitive Theory: Political Theory, The Southern Agrarians, and America. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2000.

Ah, Wilderness! by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1933) play

The only comedy written by Eugene O'NEILL, Ah, Wilderness! is a richly imagined, atmospheric depiction of the world of O'Neill's adolescence, set in a small Connecticut town on the Fourth of July weekend of 1906. O'Neill contrasts the adolescent Richard Miller's first experience of romantic love with the happy marriage of his parents, Nat and Essie Miller, and the troubled relationship of Nat's unmarried sister and Essie's brother. Although the use of guilt in relationships is a subtle theme, the play O'Neill called a "Nostalgic Comedy" can be seen as presenting the family life he wished he had experienced and serves as a complement to Long Day's Journey Into Night (produced 1956), a tragedy based on his family set six years after Ah, Wilderness!. Neither work is accurate as autobiography, but both manifest the conflicts within O'Neill regarding his family dynamics, conflicts that are at the foundation of many of his plays.

The four-act Ah, Wilderness!, with George M. Cohan playing Nat Miller, was produced by the THEATRE GUILD at the Guild Theatre, where it opened on October 2, 1933, for 289 performances. The production was critically applauded as a departure from O'Neill's usually grim tragic voice, with George Jean NATHAN proclaiming it "the tenderest and most amusing comedy of boyhood in the American Drama." O'Neill planned a darker sequel to Ah, Wilderness!, set in the aftermath of WORLD WAR I, in which an embittered Nat is unable to cope with a rapidly changing world, and Richard, returning from the war, grapples with profound emotional and physical scars. He never completed this sequel, but an outline of its plot was found among his papers.

Source

- O'Neill, Eugene. Ah, Wilderness! New York: Random House, 1933.

—James Fisher

Aiken, Conrad (1889–1973) poet, novelist, short-story writer, essayist, autobiographer

Give my love to the world.

—Aiken's chosen epitaph for his tombstone in Savannah, Georgia

Born in Savannah, Georgia, Conrad Aiken was sent to live with relatives in New Bedford, Massachusetts, after his father murdered Aiken's mother and then committed suicide. The ten-year-old Aiken, who discovered the bodies, was separated from his siblings, who were adopted, while he was taken in by an aunt. Aiken attended Harvard and married Jessie McDonald in 1912.

Although he preferred writing poetry, Aiken supported himself with essays, short stories, and novels. He lived in England from 1914 to 1930, when he returned to the United States. Aiken left his first wife to marry Clarissa Lorenz in 1930, but this second marriage was also undermined by his affairs. Guilt and quests for salvation haunted his work thereafter. In 1937 Aiken married painter Mary Hoover and found the happiness that informed his subsequent writings. From 1950 to 1952 he served as Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress.

Aiken's work featured psychological exploration. He wrote in virtually every poetic form, writing both long and short poems, exploring musical structures, myths, and the modern consciousness. From 1915 to 1923 Aiken composed a sequence of long poems, subtitled "symphonies," which he considered musical movements of a single work: The Jig of Forslin (1916), The Charnel House (1918), Senlin: A Biography (1918), The House of Dust (1920), and The Pilgrimage of Festus (1923). In 1949 the "movements" were published together as The Divine Pilgrim. Preludes for Memnon (1931) and Time in the Rock: Preludes to Definition (1936) are considered his greatest achievements. Fugues rather than symphonies, these long poems layer stanzas with superimposed themes reiterated and reinforced in variations. Other notable poetry collections are And in the Human Heart (1940), Brownstone Eclogues (1942), The Kid (1947), and Thee (1967).

As a prose writer, Aiken wrote short stories, including the much-anthologized "Silent Snow, Secret Snow," as well as novels. His first novel, Blue Voyage (1927), is the stream of consciousness of a manic-depressive protagonist who is a neurotic artist and womanizer. Great Circle (1933) concerns a man who suffers a severe trauma at age eleven and copes with the emotional consequences. King Coffin (1935) portrays an affluent aesthete who decides to commit a random murder just to see if he can get away with it. A Heart for the Gods of Mexico (1939) is based on Aiken's adventures in Mexico with Mary Hoover, and his friend, the author Malcolm Lowry. Aiken also wrote many literary essays, and a stream-of-consciousness autobiography, Ushant (1952).

Aiken was an innovator in both poetry and prose fiction. His work anticipated styles and genres that later were utilized by other writers. Although Aiken won a PULITZER PRIZE for Selected Poems (1929), his work in the 1920s and 1930s was underappreciated. The worth of his verse and fiction was more apparent after WORLD WAR II, when psychological readings of literary art were more prevalent. Aiken enjoyed a surge of popularity in the 1950s and 1960s when his work was acclaimed by many of the Beat writers.

Sources

Bonnell, F. W., and F. C. Bonnell, eds. Conrad Aiken: A Bibliography. San Marino, Calif.: Huntington Library, 1982.

Butscher, Edward. Conrad Aiken. Athens: Georgia University Press, 1988.

Hoffman, Frederick. Conrad Aiken. New York: Twayne, 1962.

—David G. Izzo

Algonquin Round Table

The Algonquin Round Table referred to a group of writers—Alexander WOOLLCOTT, Dorothy PARKER, and Robert Benchley, among others—who met at the Algonquin Hotel in New York City and traded barbs, quips, and jokes. These writers were associated with the THE NEW YORKER and did much to earn that magazine its fame for wit and humor. They exemplified the boisterous, cynical temperament of New York City in the 1920s, and furthered the tendency to regard writers as public personalities.

Sources

Bryan, III, J. Merry Gentlemen (And One Lady). New York: Atheneum, 1985.

Drennan, Robert E., ed. The Algonquin Wits. New York: Citadel Press, 1968.

Algren, Nelson (1909–1981) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

I submit that literature is made upon any occasion that a challenge is put to the legal apparatus by conscience in touch with humanity.

—Chicago: City on the Make (1951)

Born Nelson Ahlgren Abraham in Detroit on March 28, 1909, Algren grew up in a working-class family in Chicago, the city with which he is most closely identified. An indifferent student, he graduated from high school in 1928 and entered the University of Illinois to major in journalism. Completing his degree in 1931, Algren quickly discovered that the GREAT DEPRESSION made finding a job difficult, and his on-the-road search for employment turned into tramping and odd-jobbing across the country. Algren was jailed for vagrancy and theft, acquiring the experiences that radicalized his thinking and fueled both his first and fourth novels.

Returning to Chicago, Algren began attending meetings of the John Reed Club (the literary arm of the American Communist Party) and published his first novel, Somebody in Boots (1935). Eventually, he found work with the FEDERAL WRITERS' PROJECT before being drafted in 1943. By this time, he had published a second novel, Never Come Morning (1942), which attracted the attention of the French writer/philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre and of Ernest HEMINGWAY, who found it "about the best book to come out of Chicago."

After his discharge, Algren returned to Chicago, and resumed writing: the stories collected as The Neon Wilderness (1947) and the novel The Man with the Golden Arm (1949). As America entered the Cold War, however, Algren grew increasingly angered by the country's hysteria and conformity, lashing out against America's ills in essays and earning himself canceled publication contracts, surveillance by the FBI, and attacks from establishment literary critics who found his poetic realism and championing of America's underclass sentimental and anachronistic. He concluded that serious fiction was not wanted any longer and after publishing the novel A Walk on the Wild Side in 1956 for years devoted himself to writing primarily for magazines—the results of which came to fill three volumes—until a request for an article on boxer Rubin Carter grew into a book. Algren died of a heart attack at his home in Sag Harbor, Long Island.

With the publication of his first two novels, Algren earned a place in American literature as a leftist writer of proletarian protest fiction. Somebody in Boots follows a drifter through his often horrific adventures in Depression-era America and into a life of petty crime; Never Come Morning concerns an inner-city teenager whose dream of becoming a champion boxer is destroyed when he is arrested for murder. By the time he wrote the second novel, the didacticism and overt Marxism characterizing Somebody in Boots had been set aside. However, the story collection The Neon Wilderness and The Man with the Golden Arm, his masterpiece about the life and death of a morphine addict, continued (as did all of his work) to mine Algren's signature subject matter: the sympathetic portrayal of America's marginalized citizens and society's refusal to take responsibility for its underclass. Both books exhibit a poetic prose style and an often comic realism.

After completing Chicago: City on the Make (1951), a bittersweet examination of the city he both loved and hated, and Nonconformity: Writing on Writing, a controversial meditation on the writer's proper response to America's postwar failures that remained unpublished until 1996, Algren almost inadvertently produced his second major work of fiction, A Walk on the Wild Side, when a revision of Somebody in Boots grew so extensive that it resulted in an entirely new novel. The picaresque story of Dove Linkhorn's often absurd misadventures in Depression-era New Orleans, A Walk on the Wild Side was the book Algren considered his best.

The work Algren produced for magazines during the twenty years following the publication of A Walk on the Wild Side—equal parts fiction and nonfiction—was collected in the travel books Who Lost an American? (1963) and Notes from a Sea Diary: Hemingway All the Way (1965) and the miscellany The Last Carousel (1973). In the mid 1970s his research into the story of Rubin Carter resulted in a final novel of documentary realism, The Devil's Stocking, published posthumously in 1983.

Algren's reputation has fallen since the years immediately following the publication of The Man with the Golden Arm. In part, this decline is because for almost two decades Algren gave up on writing novels. Also, the sort of fiction he wrote—poetic, often comic, but typically realistic stories offering implicit social criticism and sympathy for America's down-and-out citizens—was out of fashion. Seeing himself in a literary tradition that extended from Walt Whitman and Herman Melville through writers such as Stephen CRANE, Theodore DREISER, and Sherwood ANDERSON to Richard WRIGHT and himself, Algren came to speak of himself as “the tin whistle of American letters.”

Sources

- Brucoli, Matthew J., with Judith Baughman. Nelson Algren: A Descriptive Bibliography. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1985.
- Donohue, H. E. F. Conversations with Nelson Algren. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Drew, Bettina. Nelson Algren: A Life on the Wild Side. New York: Putnam, 1989.
- Horvath, Brooke. Understanding Nelson Algren. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005.

—Brooke Horvath

All the Sad Young Men by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1926) short-story collection

F. Scott FITZGERALD's third volume of magazine stories, All the Sad Young Men followed THE GREAT GATSBY. It includes the great novelette “The Rich Boy” and three stories from the Gatsby cluster of short stories related to the novel: “WINTER DREAMS,” “Absolution,” and “The Sensible Thing.”

Source

- Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.
- Morris Colden

Altamont setting

Altamont in the state of Catawba provides the setting for Thomas WOLFE's apprentice play, Welcome to Our City (1923), and his first two novels, LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL (1929) and OF TIME AND THE RIVER (1935). He closely patterned this fictionalized locale on his own hometown, Asheville, North Carolina. Altamont is among the half-dozen most richly documented communities in American literature.

Source

- Kennedy, Richard S. The Window of Memory: The Literary Career of Thomas Wolfe. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967.

—S. Zebulon Baker

Allen, Hervey (1889–1949) fiction writer, poet

Born in Pittsburgh, Hervey Allen earned a B.S. in economics at the University of Pittsburgh in 1915. He served in the U.S. Army during World War I and was wounded in action. After the war he wrote poetry and taught at Columbia University and Vassar College, where he completed his popular biography of Israfel: The Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe (1926). Though Allen wrote four other novels and several books of poetry, he is best known for his long historical novel Anthony Adverse (1933), which sold three million copies over the next thirty years.

Source

- Stuart E. Knee, Hervey Allen (1889–1949): A Literary Historian in America. Lewiston, New York: E. Mellen Press, 1988.

The Ambassadors by Henry James (New York & London: Harper, 1903) novel

In this novel Henry James explores one of his most characteristic themes: the interactions of America and Europe. Lambert Strether, an American editor, is one of a succession of “ambassadors” sent by the wealthy and widowed Mrs. Newsome to retrieve her son Chad from Paris. Strether, who is engaged to marry Mrs. Newsome, stands to gain from the successful completion of his mission, but instead he too falls under France's spell and comes to believe that Chad's relationship with the attractive Mme. de Vionnet is strictly platonic. Mrs. Newsome cancels her engagement to Strether. Even after Strether discovers that Chad and Mme. de Vionnet are indeed lovers, he feels that Chad's exposure to the sophisticated, civilizing influence of the Old World has changed Chad for the better, and he supports the younger man's decision to stay. Strether implores, “Live all you can; it's a mistake not to.” In the end Strether himself does go back to America, although in doing so he is obliged to give up his attachment to Maria Gostrey, an American expatriate living in Paris. James considered The Ambassadors his best book.

Sources

Beidler, Paul G. Frames in James: The Tragic Muse, The Turn of the Screw, What Maisie Knew, and The Ambassadors. Victoria, B.C.: University of Victoria, 1993.

Johnson, Courtney. Henry James and the Evolution of Consciousness: A Study of The Ambassadors. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1987.

American Academy of Arts and Letters

(1898– )

Founded as part of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, the Academy promotes the best in literature. Based in New York City, it began with seven writers, including William Dean Howells and Mark Twain, and is now composed of fifty members.

American Caravan (1927–1936) periodical

This annual volume was edited by Van Wyck Brooks, Lewis MUMFORD, and others. Its main mission was to promote and encourage great contemporary literature.

American Literature (1929– ) periodical

Founded by Jay B. Hubbell, this academic journal of literary criticism is published by Duke University Press. In addition to articles on American authors and literary movements, the journal includes reviews of new books on American literature and maintains an up-to-date bibliography of current research. In recent years literary criticism has replaced scholarly material.

The American Mercury (1924–1980) periodical

The American Mercury first appeared in January 1924, published by ALFRED A. KNOPE. It was partly owned by co-editors H. L. MENCKEN and George Jean NATHAN, who previously had the same roles with THE SMART SET. The new magazine was intended to give more space to social and political matters than did the old one. Mencken's agenda was to expand his satirical attacks on the American scene, in his own voice and indirectly through essayists such as Emma Goldman and Margaret Sanger. The race issue was frequently discussed, and Mencken gave more opportunities to black writers than any other white editor of his time. Literature by Theodore DREISER, F. Scott FITZGERALD, Sinclair LEWIS, Sherwood ANDERSON, William FAULKNER, and Carl SANDBURG also appeared in the Mercury. It was the most influential journal of the 1920s. Mencken became sole editor in 1925 and stepped down with the December 1933 issue; Knopf sold the magazine in 1935. The Mercury retained much of its distinction under Lawrence E. Spivak. Later owners turned it into a right-wing periodical before its demise in spring 1980.

Source

Singleton, M. K. H. L. Mencken and the American Mercury Adventure. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1962.

—Richard Schrader

American Scholar (1932– ) periodical

Published by Phi Beta Kappa, this magazine appeals to a broad-based audience of intellectuals. Articles on social, literary, and historical matters are written in a style suited to nonspecialists.

American Spectator (1932–1937) periodical

This monthly literary magazine was founded by the drama critic George Jean NATHAN. In its prime it published the best of contemporary American writers, including Eugene O'NEILL, James Branch CABELL, Theodore DREISER, and Sherwood ANDERSON. When the magazine was sold in 1935, it became a bimonthly, and the spirit that animated it disappeared.

An American Tragedy by Theodore Dreiser (New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925) novel

An American Tragedy—the title implies that there are other American tragedies—is neatly organized into three parts. The book is the fullest presentation of American society Theodore DREISER offers, from street people, to working-class youths, to the leisured money class of upstate New York. It is the most comprehensive statement of Dreiser's naturalistic vision of America. The mass of details, unified by the main character, Clyde Griffiths (who is connected to all of them), are split into two-thirds action and one-third judgment.

Book 1 takes place in Kansas City, in which the poor, hapless Griffiths, a bellboy in half-conscious rebellion against his repressive, missionary family, mixes with a group of youths who steal a car and kill a child in a joyride. He flees. By book 2 he is in Lycurgus, New York, working in his wealthy uncle's collar factory.

His circumstances have changed; however, the pattern remains. Attracted to Roberta Alden who works under him, he coerces her into a sexual relationship. Subsequently he falls for the wealthy Sondra Finchley. In this novel, to a greater extent than in SISTER CARRIE (1900), Dreiser emphasizes the allure of surfaces, such as fine clothes. Clyde envies men "in evening suit, dress shirt, high hat, bow tie, white kid gloves and patent leather shoes." "To be able to wear such a suit with such ease and air!" Sondra Finchley's world is described with fatal, glittering allure. Dreiser's empathy ensures that a reader is as torn as the hero between the alternatives of conventional morality and eagerness to seize a dream of elegance and opportunity.

When he finds that Roberta is pregnant, he is tempted “to decamp as in the instance of the slain child in Kansas City” but resolves to work through his dilemma. He wants to rid himself of Roberta Alden and takes her out in a row-boat, where, as Dreiser presents it, her drowning happens. In a series of sentence fragments, in which Clyde’s agency is unspecified, the event occurs: “Yet . . . pushing at her with so much vehemence as not only to strike her lips and nose and chin with it, but to throw her back sideways toward the left wale which caused the boat to careen to the very edge.”

Book 3 concerns the trial of Clyde Griffiths, in which Dreiser shows the ways in which the American court system filters out all understanding of what it wants to condemn. The extent to which the society that surrounds Clyde is complicit in his actions is borne upon the reader even as Clyde Griffiths himself has no sense that he has committed a crime. Indeed, as a person Clyde has no interior, no volition. Thus the force of the title: the tragedy lies in the lack of self under the American economic and social system. Over the course of almost a thousand pages, details accrete to give weight to this deterministic, naturalistic view.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Theodore Dreiser’s An American Tragedy. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.

Pizer, Donald, ed. Critical Essays on Theodore Dreiser. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Swanberg, W. A. Dreiser. New York: Scribners, 1965.

—Roger Lathbury

Anderson, Margaret (1886–1973) editor

Margaret Anderson was the founder and editor of THE LITTLE REVIEW, one of the most significant of the literary LITTLE MAGAZINES. She ran the magazine from 1914 to 1929 in an uncompromising fashion, interested only in great literature, which she took to be one of the supreme reasons for living. She published Sherwood ANDERSON, Vachel LINDSAY, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and other important authors, and is remembered for serializing installments of James Joyce’s Ulysses (1922).

Source

Anderson, Margaret. My Thirty Years War. New York: Covici, Friede, 1930.

Anderson, Maxwell (1888–1959) playwright, poet

Maxwell Anderson won the PULITZER PRIZE for Both Your Houses (produced 1933), a political satire about a young congressman who is defeated by a corrupt system. His most famous work, in collaboration with Laurence STALLINGS, is WHAT PRICE GLORY (produced 1924), which probed WORLD WAR I combat with considerable realism. His verse dramas Elizabeth the Queen (produced 1930) and Mary of Scotland (produced 1933) are also admired. WINTERSET, based on the famous SACCO-VANZETTI CASE, examines the immigrant milieu with psychological penetration and compassion.

Sources

Shivers, Alfred S. The Life of Maxwell Anderson. New York: Stein & Day, 1983.

Shivers. Maxwell Anderson: An Annotated Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Works. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1985.

Anderson, Sherwood (1876–1941) novelist, short-story writer

In my stories I simply stayed at home, among my own people, wherever I happened to be, people in my own street. I think I must, very early, have realized that this was my milieu, that is to say, common everyday American lives.

—Anderson to George Freitag, August 27, 1938

Sherwood Anderson, circa 1920

Dust jacket for the 1919 collection of linked short stories that are centered on small-town life and the maturation of George Willard

Sherwood Anderson was born in Camden, Ohio, and his family moved from one small town to another as he was growing up. When he was eight his family settled in Clyde, Ohio, which became the inspiration for much of his greatest fiction. His family was extremely poor, a fact reflected in his many compassionate stories and novels about the underprivileged. But Anderson also believed in the American dream. He ran a paint factory, married, and lived a conventional life in Elyria, Ohio. In 1912 Anderson walked away from his mail-order paint business and his family and moved to Chicago.

In Chicago, Anderson wrote advertising copy and met a group of authors, including Carl Sandburg, Edgar Lee Masters, and Harriet Monroe, who encouraged him in his writing career. Anderson began writing a series of short sketches of residents of his Chicago boardinghouse, transforming them into characters in a fictional town that he called Winesburg; these stories were later collected in his most enduring work, Winesburg, Ohio (1919). His first novel, Windy McPherson's Son, was published in 1916, and for the next twenty years Anderson published a new volume of fiction, poetry, or nonfiction almost every year.

Anderson married four times and lived in Ohio, Chicago, Paris, and New Orleans before finally settling in Troutdale, Virginia, where he purchased two small newspapers in 1927 and began another career. He served as mentor to several young authors, including Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner.

"I have had the notion that nothing from my pen should be published that could not be read aloud in the presence of a cornfield," Anderson once wrote in a letter to another author. Looking back at his provincial childhood with mingled nostalgia and disgust, he wrote novels and short stories focusing on the changes brought by rapid industrialization. Rejecting the realism of William Dean Howells as overly genteel, he strove for a gritty naturalism that recognized the buried passions motivating human behavior.

Windy McPherson's Son follows a small-town boy who moves to the city to make his fortune. When financial success fails to satisfy him, he abandons business to "spend his life seeking truth," but each new truth he discovers results in further dissatisfaction. Anderson's other novels likewise seek a satisfying purpose for human existence: Marching Men (1917) finds beauty, power, and transcendence in the actions of thousands of men marching in unison, while Many Marriages (1923) seeks meaning in sexual passion. His most coherent novel, Poor White (1920), subverts the Horatio Alger myth by suggesting that success frees people from one form of drudgery only to enslave them to another.

Anderson's two volumes of poetry—Mid-American Chants (1918) and A New Testament (1927)—similarly explore the human struggle to find significance in the face of rapid industrialization. "Out of the mould at the river's edge I moulded myself a god, / A grotesque little god with a twisted face," wrote Anderson in "American Spring Song." His works are populated by grotesque characters (mostly men) who strive to reinvent themselves and reshape their surroundings but find themselves thwarted by meager materials. This tendency is apparent in both his short stories and his novels.

Anderson published three more collections of short stories: Horses and Men (1923), The Triumph of the Egg (1921), and Death in the Woods (1933). His more-successful short stories, such as "The Egg," "I Want to Know Why," and "Death in the Woods," focus on young men learning about the universality of death and suffering. Anderson's exploration of the futility of human endeavors finds its most nuanced treatment, however, in Winesburg, Ohio. These linked short stories can be read separately, but together they form a collage of impressions of life in Winesburg, where passion is thwarted and dreams are denied. Linking the stories is the young reporter, George Willard, who collects the villagers' tales of alienation and carries them with him when he finally leaves Winesburg to reinvent himself in the big city.

Anderson's skill at reinventing himself is evident in his creative use of autobiographical material in his fiction and nonfiction. Although much of his fiction draws from life, he made two attempts at writing the story of his childhood: A Story Teller's Story (1924), an autobiography, and Tar: A Midwest Childhood (1926), an autobiographical novel. He also published several collections of essays and journalism and three novels that moved far from his midwestern roots: Dark Laughter (1925), Beyond Desire (1932), and Kit Brandon (1936). While these novels attempt some interesting experiments in narrative method, today they are largely forgotten.

Sherwood Anderson's reputation rests firmly on Winesburg, Ohio and the two short stories that frequently appear in anthologies: "The Egg" and "Death in the Woods." His sexual frankness, considered shocking in 1919 when Winesburg was published, now seems rather tame; however, Anderson's exploration of the passions motivating human behavior opened a door for later authors. Most influential was his rejection of typical heroic protagonists in favor of characters he called "grotesques," whose devotion to a single idea twisted their lives into self-absorbed, sour little bundles with only occasional flashes of sweetness.

—Bev Hogue

Principal Books by Anderson

- Windy McPherson's Son*. New York: Lane, 1916. Revised edition, New York: Huebsch, 1922.
- Marching Men*. New York: Lane, 1917.
- Mid-American Chants*. New York: Lane, 1918.
- Winesburg, Ohio: A Group of Tales of Ohio Small Town Life*. New York: Huebsch, 1919.
- Poor White*. New York: Huebsch, 1920.
- The Triumph of the Egg: A Book of Impressions from American Life in Tales and Poems*. New York: Huebsch, 1921.
- Horses and Men: Tales, Long and Short, from Our American Life*. New York: Huebsch, 1923.
- Many Marriages*. New York: Huebsch, 1923.
- A Story Teller's Story: The Tale of an American Writer's Journey through His Own Imaginative World and through the World of Facts, with Many of His Experiences and Impressions among Other Writers Told in Many Notes—in Four Books—and an Epilogue*. New York: Huebsch, 1924.
- Dark Laughter*. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.
- The Modern Writer*. San Francisco: Lantern Press, 1925.
- Sherwood Anderson's Notebook: Containing Articles Written During the Author's Life as a Story Teller and Notes of his Impressions from Life Scattered through the Book*. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926.
- Tar: A Midwest Childhood*. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926.
- A New Testament*. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.
- Hello Towns!* New York: Liveright, 1929.
- Nearer the Grass Roots*. San Francisco: Westgate Press, 1929.
- The American County Fair*. New York: Random House, 1930.
- Perhaps Women*. New York: Liveright, 1931.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE EGG

A BOOK OF IMPRESSIONS
FROM AMERICAN LIFE
IN TALES AND POEMS

BY

SHERWOOD ANDERSON

IN CLAY BY

TENNESSEE MITCHELL

In the fields
Seeds on the air floating.
In the towns
Black smoke for a shroud.
In my breast
Understanding awake.
—Mid-American Chants.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY EUGENE HUTCHINSON

NEW YORK B. W. HUEBSCH, INC. MCMXXI

Title page for Anderson's 1921 book, a varied collection of fiction, poetry, and photographs in which his subjects struggle to understand their lives and feelings of isolation

- Beyond Desire*. New York: Liveright, 1932.
- Death in the Woods and Other Stories*. New York: Liveright, 1933.
- No Swank*. Philadelphia: Centaur, 1934.
- Puzzled America*. New York & London: Scribners, 1935.
- Kit Brandon: A Portrait*. New York & London: Scribners, 1936.
- Plays, Winesburg and Others*. New York & London: Scribners, 1937.
- A Writer's Conception of Realism*. Olivet, Mich.: Olivet College, 1939.
- Home Town*. New York: Alliance, 1940.
- Sherwood Anderson's Memoirs*. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1942.
- Selected Short Stories of Sherwood Anderson*. New York: Editions for the Armed Services, 1944.

- The Sherwood Anderson Reader*, edited by Paul Rosenfeld. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1947.
- The Portable Sherwood Anderson*, edited by Horace Gregory. New York: Viking, 1949; revised, 1972.
- Sherwood Anderson: Short Stories*, edited by Maxwell Geismar. New York: Hill & Wang, 1962.
- Return to Winesburg: Selections from Four Years of Writing for a Country Newspaper*, edited by Ray Lewis White. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967.
- The Buck Fever Papers*, edited by Welford Dunaway Taylor. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1971.
- The "Writer's Book,"* edited by Martha Mulroy Curry. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1975.
- France and Sherwood Anderson: Paris Notebook, 1921*, edited by Michael Fanning. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1976.
- Sherwood Anderson: The Writer at His Craft*, edited by Jack Salzman, David D. Anderson, and Kichinosuke Ohashi. Mamaroneck, N.Y.: Appel, 1979.
- The Sherwood Anderson Diaries, 1936–1941*, edited by Hilbert H. Campbell. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.
- Sherwood Anderson: Early Writings*, edited by Ray Lewis White. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1989.

Studying Sherwood Anderson

The student seeking to understand Sherwood Anderson's complicated career should begin with WINESBURG, OHIO (1919), which introduces thematic concerns and narrative techniques Anderson explored throughout his life. In the Norton Critical Edition of Winesburg, Ohio (New York: Norton, 1996), Charles Modlin and Ray Lewis White supplement the text with excerpts from Anderson's letters and memoirs as well as reviews and critical essays. In New Essays on Winesburg, Ohio (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990), editor John C. Crowley assembles critical essays approaching Winesburg from a variety of theoretical standpoints. Ray Lewis White's Winesburg, Ohio: An Exploration (Boston: Twayne, 1990) provides an accessible analysis of the cultural and thematic issues informing Winesburg along with helpful biographical and bibliographical information. White's useful contributions to Anderson studies also includes The Merrill Studies in Winesburg, Ohio (Columbus: Merrill, 1971), which features a collection of readers' responses as well as an analysis of Anderson's process of composing, editing, and publishing the book.

Winesburg, Ohio also features prominently in books more generally exploring Anderson's life and works, including two important studies by David D. Anderson: Critical Essays on Sherwood Anderson (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981) and Sherwood Anderson: An Introduction and Interpretation (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1967), which characterizes Anderson's entire oeuvre as the autobiography of Everyman during an age of industrialization.

Students seeking to broaden their understanding of Anderson's career will want to read his short stories, especially the frequently anthologized stories "The Egg" and "Death in the Woods." THE TRIUMPH OF THE EGG (1921) is an important book, demonstrating Anderson's eclectic approach to literature, mingling poetry, fiction, essays, and photographs. Of the early novels, POOR WHITE (1920) situates readers in Anderson's world while subtly satirizing the conventions of popular sentimental fiction, and Many Marriages (1923) explores the stultifying social conventions against which Anderson rebelled. Among the later novels, most notable is Beyond Desire (1932), Anderson's attempt to experiment with narrative form in order to achieve political ends; it is enriched by the wealth of gritty detail Anderson gathered during his travels around the South in the 1930s, when his interest in the effects of industrialization informed both his fiction and his journalism.

Anderson's criticism and journalism opens a window on American culture. His reflections on other authors appear in Sherwood Anderson's Notebooks (1926). Hello Towns! (1929) is a quirky collection of his late journalism. Sherwood Anderson: Early Writings, edited by Ray Lewis White (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1989), includes his early advertising writing. A sampling of contemporary authors' responses to Anderson appears in The Achievement of Sherwood Anderson: Essays in Criticism (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1966).

White's Sherwood Anderson: A Reference Guide (Boston: Hall, 1977) is a useful annotated bibliography of secondary sources through the mid 1970s. The website of the Sherwood Anderson Foundation (<<http://sherwoodandersonfoundation.org/>>) includes useful information about Anderson's life and work as well as some archived issues of The Sherwood Anderson Review (formerly The Winesburg Eagle). Walter Rideout's two-volume Sherwood Anderson: A Writer in America (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2006) is the most extensively researched and up-to-date biography. Kim Townsend's Sherwood Anderson (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1987) explores connections between Anderson's writing and his life. William A. Sutton's The Road to Winesburg: A Mosaic of the Imaginative Life of Sherwood Anderson (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1972) focuses on Anderson's life before Winesburg. Indeed, Winesburg, Ohio acts as the alpha and omega of Anderson studies: it is the place where everything begins and to which everyone returns in the end.

—Bev Hogue

Anna Christie by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1921) play
Anna Christie, which opened on November 2, 1921 at the Vanderbilt Theatre for 177 performances, won Eugene O'NEILL a PULITZER PRIZE. At Johnny-the-Priest's bar, seaman Chris Christopherson awaits his daughter, Anna, whom he has not seen since he left her as a child to be raised on a Midwestern farm. Believing such a life has preserved Anna from "dat ole davil sea,” which has destroyed men in his family for generations, Chris is slow to recognize that Anna has been sexually corrupted and works as a prostitute. Anna confesses her sordid past when a rescued shipwrecked sailor, Mat Burke, proposes marriage. The eventual reconciliation of Chris and Mat with Anna is tempered by their abandonment of her, as both men sign up for long hitches at sea as a result of their initial disappointment. The moody, atmospheric Anna Christie, which in 1930 became Greta Garbo’s first “talkie,” is among the most often revived of O’Neill’s early plays.

Source

O’Neill, Eugene. Anna Christie. (New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922.

—James Fisher

Appointment in Samarra by John O’Hara (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934) novel

John O’HARA’s first novel documents the life and death of Julian English, the hard-drinking proprietor of a Cadillac dealership, from Christmas Eve to December 26, 1930. It is the end of the first year of the Depression, and Julian’s business is in trouble—mainly because of his mismanagement. The setting is GIBBSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA, based on O’Hara’s hometown, Pottsville, about which he wrote throughout his career.

Early in the novel Julian throws a drink in Harry Reilly’s face at a country-club party, starting a chain of events that result in Julian’s suicide when he realizes how insecure his position in Gibbsville is. On Christmas night Julian gets drunk at a roadhouse where he attempts to seduce the mistress of bootlegger Ed Charney. This public humiliation of his wife, Caroline, alienates his friends and causes her to move out of their home. On the 26th he gets into a brawl at the Gibbsville Club. The theme of Appointment in Samarra is social exclusion: Julian English cannot cope with the prospect of rejection and isolation. The title of the novel refers to an Arab story about the inescapability of an appointment with death. Julian English is doomed by social forces, as well as his weak character.

The main subject of Appointment in Samarra is Gibbsville. The novel is a carefully documented examination of the social structure in a small eastern city and the people who belong to the classes. Although O’Hara has been labeled a chronicler of upper-class behavior, the cast of characters includes a small-time racketeer, Al Grecco, and working-class people; the novel opens and closes with the middle-class Fliegler, whose livelihood is endangered by Julian’s irresponsibility. O’Hara’s treatment of sexual activity in this novel was considered daring at the time.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J., ed. John O’Hara: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 324. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2006.

O’Hara, John. Gibbsville, PA, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli, New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

Armory Show (1913) historical event

The “Armory Show” is the common name given to a seminal event in the art world, the international exhibition of painting and sculpture held at the 69th Regiment Armory in New York City. This event marked the introduction of modern art to America, with a display of some 1,600 artworks representing then-current European avant-garde movements such as cubism, futurism, fauvism, and EXPRESSIONISM. Perhaps the most controversial piece in the show was Marcel Duchamp’s cubist-futurist canvas, Nude Descending a Staircase, which depicts a continuous action through a series of overlapping images. Singled out at the time by critics as a prime example of all that was decadent about the European art scene, this painting attracted enormous public attention, which in turn helped pave the way for public acceptance of new American art inspired by the exhibit. The influence of the Armory Show extended beyond painting and sculpture to American literature, where aspects of expressionism can be seen in the psychological orientation of such twentieth-century works as the poetry of T. S. ELIOT and the plays of Eugene O’NEILL.

Source

Brown, Milton. The Story of the Armory Show. New York: Abbeville Press, 1988.

Arnow, Harriet (1908–1986) novelist

Harriet Arnow went to Berea College to become a teacher, but she soon yearned to write. She wrote a series of novels about her native region, the most famous of which is The Dollmaker (1954). The novel describes an Appalachian woman and her family, whose lives embody the pain and confusion that occurred during the mass migration of more than seven million people from rural Appalachia to northern cities in the 1940s to seek employment. Arnow herself experienced this migration as she moved from Louisville to Cincinnati to Detroit.

Source

Chung, Haeja K., ed. Harriet Simpson Arnow: Critical Essays on Her Work. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1995.

Arrowsmith by Sinclair Lewis (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1925) novel

In Sinclair LEWIS’s ninth novel, young doctor Martin Arrowsmith seeks to dedicate himself to the highest ideals of service to humanity in the medical and scientific professions.

His career takes him from low-paying country doctoring in Wheatsylvania, North Dakota, to the Nautilus, Iowa, Public Health Department, assisting the sloganeering sanitation fanatic Dr. Almus Pickerbaugh; to the Rouncefield Clinic, a money-extracting surgical assembly line run by the suave Dr. Angus Duer; to the McGurk Institute of Biology, a well-endowed temple of pure research dedicated to the higher profits of the drug industry. At McGurk, Arrowsmith works with his idol, the incorruptible Max Gottlieb, who embodies the truth-seeking integrity of the scientific method. Arrowsmith's loyal, unglamorous wife, Leora, is the only other human he really loves. He faces his greatest scientific and moral challenges while testing his vaccine on a Caribbean island swept by the bubonic plague, where Leora perishes. Unlike other Lewis protagonists, Martin is a successful rebel, capable of enduring loneliness to preserve his integrity and achieve his goals. He leaves his second wife, a wealthy society figure, to devote himself to pure research. With its strong story line, well-researched backgrounds, and realistic characters, Arrowsmith is Lewis's best attempt at a straightforward novel. Its critique of medicine for profit remains strikingly apt today. The novel was awarded a PULITZER PRIZE, but Lewis in a letter declined the award in part because he objected to its nonliterary criteria, as it was supposed to be given to the novel "which shall best present the wholesome atmosphere of American life, and the highest standard of American manners and manhood."

Sources

Lingeman, Richard. Sinclair Lewis: Rebel from Main Street. New York: Random House, 2002.

Rosenberg, Charles E. "Martin Arrowsmith: The Scientist as Hero" in Sinclair Lewis, edited by Harold Bloom. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.

—Richard Lingeman

Arsenic and Old Lace by Joseph Kesselring (produced 1941) play

Playwright Joseph Kesselring had his only Broadway hit with Arsenic and Old Lace, a macabre farce that opened at the Fulton Theatre on January 10, 1941, and ran for 1,444 performances. In the play Abby and Martha Brewster are two sweet little old ladies who serve poisoned wine to their lonely old gentlemen boarders as a Christian act of mercy. Other Brewsters involved in the action are the genially deranged Teddy, who believes himself to be Teddy Roosevelt and buries the corpses in the basement; Jonathan, an escaped murderer on the lam who uncannily resembles horror-movie actor Boris Karloff (who actually played the role in the original production); and Mortimer, seemingly the only sane member of the family, who searches for a way to avoid turning his serial-murdering aunts into the police. Arsenic and Old Lace became a classic 1944 movie and has endured on professional and amateur stages.

Source

Kesselring, Joseph. Arsenic and Old Lace. New York: Random House, 1941.

—James Fisher

As I Lay Dying by William Faulkner (New York: Random House, 1930) novel

William FAULKNER's fifth novel focuses on Addie Bundren, whose wish to be buried in the town where she grew up leads her family on an arduous journey to grant her request. The black comedy is narrated in stream-of-consciousness style through fifty-nine monologues by fifteen different narrators, mostly members of the Bundren family: the shiftless father, Anse, who views the trip to town as an opportunity to purchase some teeth; the eldest son, Cash, a carpenter, who shows his love for his dying mother by building her coffin outside her deathbed window; another son, Jewel, who must trade his beloved horse for a mule team for the wagon; a daughter, Dewey Dell, who hopes to terminate an unwanted pregnancy while in town; and the youngest son, Vardaman, whose grief and confusion about his mother's death leads to the shortest monologue in the book: "My mother is a fish." The most prolific narrator is Darl, the second-oldest son, who has unusual perceptive abilities but is committed to an insane asylum for setting fire to a barn in a futile attempt to end their ridiculous journey, a ten-day ordeal in July without the aid of embalming. Faulkner regarded the novel as a tour de force, and critics have mostly agreed, seeing it as both a high-modernist masterpiece (see MODERNISM) and a fitting recipient for postmodern critical approaches such as Deconstructionism, particularly in Addie Bundren's single monologue, in which she ponders, among other things, the power of language to shape meaning: "I discovered that words are no good, that they dont fit even what they are trying to say at."

Sources

Cox, Dianne L., ed. William Faulkner's As I Lay Dying: A Critical Casebook. New York: Garland, 1985.

Luce, Dianne C. Annotations to William Faulkner's As I Lay Dying. New York: Garland, 1990.

Wadlington, Warwick. As I Lay Dying: Stories Out of Stories. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Wright, Austin M. Recalcitrance, Faulkner, and the Professors: A Critical Fiction. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1990.

—John B. Padgett

Ash-Wednesday by T. S. Eliot (London: Faber & Faber, 1930) poem

Ash-Wednesday is composed of six lyrics, three of which—"Salutation," "Perch'io Non Spero," and "Som de L'Escalina"—were published separately before the 1930 appearance of all six as a single poem. In the Christian religion, Ash Wednesday is the holiday that inaugurates the season of Lent, forty days of repentance ending with Easter. The Ash Wednesday/Easter sequence represents both the death and resurrection of Christ and the imitation of that process in the life of a Christian. The theme of the poem is the struggle involved in denying one's self and turning toward God. Begun soon after Eliot's baptism, the poem is his most personal in that it openly commemorates the most important turning point in his own life. The title "Salutation" is a public greeting announcing his new life; it is also the first of a series of allusions to Dante's Vita Nuova (New Life: an account of spiritual rebirth) and Purgatorio (Purgatory: an account of voluntary submission to purgation as part of the ascent toward union with the divine). The theme of the poem is reflected in its structure. The first lines—"Because I do not hope to turn again"—initiate a turning, circling motion that, in alternation with intervals of hovering and stillness, is sustained throughout. The first, third, and fifth lyrics describe movement, at once circular and vertical—turning, climbing stairs. The second and fourth project stillness—first in a garden, then a desert. The sixth lyric circles back to the opening lines and ends with a prayer.

Sources

Manganiello, Dominic. T. S. Eliot and Dante. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

Timmerman, John H. T. S. Eliot's Ariel Poems: The Poetics of Recovery. Lewisburg: Bucknell University Press, 1994.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Atherton, Gertrude (1857–1948) novelist, short-story writer, biographer

Gertrude Atherton's first important work was The Californians (1898), which announced her enduring interest in California—its people and geography, past and present. She also published California: An Intimate History (1914). Atherton was a wide-ranging writer who wrote on many different themes. The Conqueror (1902) is a fictional biography of Alexander Hamilton that has been praised for its innovative form. Her novel, Black Oxen (1923), with its emphasis on the sexual nature of life, became popular and controversial. She deals with her own work in Adventures of a Novelist (1932), which has been praised for its remarkable candor. Her female characters tend to be restless and unconventional, perhaps reflecting her own eleven years of an unhappy marriage.

Sources

Leider, Emily Wortis. California's Daughter: Gertrude Atherton and Her Times. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1991.

McClure, Charlotte S. Gertrude Atherton. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Auden, W. H. (1907–1973) poet, critic

Although Wystan Hugh Auden was born in England and is considered an English poet, he immigrated to the United States in 1939 and became an American citizen in 1946. Educated at Oxford, he became for the Left in England and the United States the example of a great poet who was also a progressive in political matters—opposing W. B. Yeats, T. S. ELIOT, and Ezra POUND. Auden served as a consultant to the YALE SERIES OF YOUNGER POETS, which became a means of recognizing and furthering the careers of several generations of American poets. He also edited the influential anthology The Faber Book of Modern American Verse (1956). He was a part of the New York literary scene and taught and gave readings at many American universities and colleges. The Age of Anxiety (1947), a collection of essays, won a PULITZER PRIZE. His Collected Poems appeared in 1976.

A brilliant essayist, Auden helped to define the modern age for the Anglo-American community, emphasizing both the social and political commitment of the writer as well as his dedication to the highest literary standards. His most notable nonfiction volumes include The Enchafed Flood (1950), The Dyer's Hand and Other Essays (1962), Selected Essays (1964), and Forewords and Afterwords (1973).

Auden's most noteworthy plays are The Dog Beneath the Skin (produced 1936) and The Ascent of F6 (produced 1937)—both written with Christopher ISHERWOOD, who accompanied Auden on his journey to America, becoming part of the flourishing expatriate community in southern California during WORLD WAR II.

Sources

McDiarmid, Lucy. Auden's Apologies for Poetry. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990.

Mendelson, Edward. Later Auden. London: Faber & Faber, 1999.

Austin, Mary Hunter (1868–1934) novelist, poet, short-story writer, playwright, essayist

Mary Hunter's affinity for the natural world began, she said, at the age of five when she talked to God beneath a walnut tree in her backyard in Illinois. In 1888 she moved with her family to California, where she and her mother and brother homesteaded in the southern San Joaquin Valley. Her record of the journey from Los Angeles to the homestead, One Hundred Miles on Horseback, was published in 1950.

In 1891 Hunter married fellow homesteader Stafford Austin. The couple's life among Native Americans in the Mojave Desert inspired Austin to write The Land of Little Rain, a collection of nature essays published in 1903. She moved to Carmel, California, where she became associated with Jack LONDON and George STERLING and continued her desert trilogy with The Flock (1906) and Lost Borders (1909).

Austin was profoundly interested in the women's movement. Her play about a female shaman, The Arrow-Maker, premiered in New York in 1911. She wrote an autobiographical novel, A Woman of Genius (1912), about a woman who attempts to escape her restricted existence by immersing herself in the theater. She also wrote an overtly feminist novel, No. 26 Jayne Street (1920), set in New York City.

In 1924 Austin moved permanently to Santa Fe, New Mexico, where she became deeply involved in the struggle for aboriginal rights and the preservation of Indian and Spanish folk art. Her later works include The Land of Journey's Ending (1924) and her final novel, Starry Adventure (1931), in which the New Mexican landscape is the main focus.

Sources

Fink, Augusta. I-Mary: A Biography of Mary Austin. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1983.

Graulich, Melody, and Elizabeth Klimasmith, eds. Exploring Lost Borders: Critical Essays on Mary Austin. Reno: University of Nevada Press, 1999.

Langigan, Esther F. Mary Austin: Song of a Maverick. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989.

Authors League of America (1912– )

The Authors League, which includes the Authors' Guild and the Dramatists' Guild, is dedicated to protecting the rights of authors. The League is active in examining issues related to authors' copyright, publishers' contracts, the development of the literary marketplace, innovations in electronic publishing, and other legal and societal developments that have an impact on the livelihood and integrity of the writing profession.

The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas by Gertrude Stein (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1933) prose

The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas offers an insider's view of the Left Bank expatriate community of artists and writers in which Gertrude STEIN and her life partner, Alice B. TOKLAS, were central figures. With its publication, the fifty-nine-year-old Stein achieved popular success with an American audience for the first time in her career; the best-seller was a Book-of-the-Month Club selection and laid the groundwork for Stein's triumphant American lecture tour in fall 1934 through spring 1935.

Alternately classified as a novel, a memoir, or simply a narrative, The Autobiography uses the chatty voice of "Alice" to recount the many interesting people Stein and Toklas met and the experiences they shared in nearly twenty-five years of living abroad together, only revealing the "true author" in the final paragraph of the text. Despite the assumptions generated by its title and its use of the names of real people, The Autobiography is Stein's fictionalized account of the lives of geniuses and their wives, told through the narrative consciousness of Alice.

When the text was published, people who recognized themselves in it reacted with emotions ranging from amusement to anger. Some critics dismiss the text as a joke or a trick, as self-aggrandizement or as selling out. General consensus is that the text serves as a good example of modernist narrative experimentation, employing an innovative rhetorical strategy that allows Stein to speak through the voice of her companion. The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas remains one of Stein's most accessible and popular texts.

Sources

Rabin, Jessica. Surviving the Crossing: (Im)migration, Ethnicity and Gender in Willa Cather, Gertrude Stein, and Nella Larsen. New York: Routledge, 2004.

Wagner-Martin, Linda. "Favored Strangers": Gertrude Stein and Her Family. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1995.

—Jessica G. Rabin

The Autobiography of an Ex-Colored Man by James Weldon Johnson (Boston: Sherman, French, 1912) novel

James Weldon JOHNSON's provocative account of an African American man who tries to "pass" as white is one of the formative novels of the African American experience. The work was first published anonymously, which enhanced its appeal as a story from a person who had been compelled to live in disguise, hiding his origins and identity. The theme of the novel, a dual or double consciousness, and the narrator's statement that he is much more keenly aware of what white people think than white people are aware of the thinking of African Americans, introduces themes that were later developed in classics of African American literature such as Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man (1952).

The narrator of the novel is the child of a white southern father and a light-skinned African American woman. He grows up in a small Connecticut town, where he early on exhibits great talent as a pianist. The narrator resolves to attend a Negro college; but after his money is stolen he is forced to take a job in a cigar factory among African Americans of varying backgrounds, beliefs, and shades of color. When the factory closes, the narrator heads for New York City and a bohemian life. He finds a job as a ragtime musician, is befriended by a white patron, tours Europe, and decides to adapt his knowledge of African American music into traditional European art forms. A trip south, where he witnesses a lynching, drives him to repudiate his artistic commitment and to return to New York City. There he passes for white, determined never to suffer the outrages against blacks that he has witnessed. On the white side of the color line he raises a family in the full knowledge that he has repudiated his ancestry. Johnson did not acknowledge authorship of the novel until 1927.

Source

Sundquist, Eric. The Hammers of Creation: Folk Culture in Modern African-American Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992.

The Awakening by Kate Chopin (Chicago & New York: Herbert S. Stone, 1899) novel

Kate Chopin's 1899 novel The Awakening shocked contemporary readers with its stark portrayal of female sexuality, infidelity, and suicide. As a middle-class woman who rebels against the repressive, elite French Creole society of New Orleans, heroine Edna Pontellier poses a threat to the social mores of the day. Her love for her businessman husband having faded, Edna is initially stirred by affection for Robert Lebrun. As his awareness grows of the inevitable result of their relationship, Lebrun leaves New Orleans, and Edna finds solace in a relationship with Alcée Arobin. She seeks to satisfy her passionate urges but finds herself confused by the conflicting emotions she feels at the pleasures of an adulterous relationship. Seeking a tangible connection with another human being, Edna discovers that the pull of desire instead leads to sadness, solitude, and despair. The Awakening was condemned by reviewers as "unwholesome" and was largely neglected until the 1960s, when it was recognized as a classic of American literature.

Sources

Beer, Janet, and Elizabeth Nolan, eds. Kate Chopin's The Awakening: A Sourcebook. London: Routledge, 2004.

Chopin, Kate. The Awakening: An Authoritative Text, Contexts, Criticism, edited by Margaret Culley. New York: Norton, 1976.

—Meg A. Amstutz

Abbey, Edward (1927–1989) novelist, essayist

Edward Abbey was born and raised in the Allegheny Mountains of Pennsylvania and was educated at the University of New Mexico. Primarily a nature writer—he preferred to be called a writer of “personal histories”—he employed wit in his response to the outdoors and also in his assessments of human responsibilities to nature. Abbey described his experience as a park ranger in Utah in Desert Solitaire (1968). His feeling for mountain life is reflected in Appalachian Wilderness (1970). Following the publication of Slickrock: The Canyon Country of Southeast Utah (1971), Cactus Country (1973), The Journey Home (1977), and Down the River (1982), his later essays were collected in Beyond the Wall (1984) and One Life at a Time, Please (1988). Abbey also wrote eight novels, each reflective of his tendency toward autobiography.

Sources

Cahalan, James M. Edward Abbey: A Life. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2001.

Loeffler, Jack. Adventures with Ed: A Portrait of Abbey. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2002.

Ronald, Ann. The New West of Edward Abbey. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1982.

Abish, Walter (1931– ) novelist, poet

Born in Vienna, Austria, Walter Abish became a United States citizen in 1960. From 1979 to 1988 he taught English at Columbia University. Often called a Postmodernist (see POSTMODERNISM), Abish writes experimental novels. In Alphabetical Africa (1974), for example, every word of the first chapter begins with the letter a. In 1981, Abish's How German Is It (1980), a novel about an American of German extraction who returns home to investigate his father's wartime death, won the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD for Fiction. He has also published poetry, including Duel Site (1970), and short-story collections, including Minds Meet (1975) and In the Future Perfect (1977). Eclipse Fever (1993) is a novel about Mexico and other Third World countries. In 2004 Abish published an autobiography, Double Vision.

Sources

Shatsky, Joel, and Michael Taub, eds. Contemporary Jewish-American Novelists: A Bio-Critical Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Tanner, Tony. “Present Imperfect: A Note on the Work of Walter Abish,” Granta (Autumn 1979): 65–71.

Abstract Expressionism

An art movement begun in the United States in the 1940s by Jackson Pollock, Arshile Gorky, Franz Kline, Willem de Kooning, and Mark Rothko, Abstract Expressionism favored the use of intense color and texture. Paint was applied to the canvas in dynamic slashes, stripes, and splotches that prompted art critic Harold Rosenberg to call it “action painting.” The most memorable image of the Abstract Expressionist or action painter was that of Jackson Pollock heaving gobs of paint at a canvas. The result seemed spontaneous, yet the paintings often had an exquisite sense of composition, of a surface of intricate layers formed by countless decisions the painter had made in his “attack” on the canvas. To the eye tutored in representational painting and classical composition, Abstract Expressionist art seemed merely chaotic. In fact, it reflected an anarchic impulse governed by a sense of form and style.

In literature, writers such as William S. BURROUGHS, Allen GINSBERG, and others of the BEAT Generation used Abstract Expressionist techniques in their work. Abstract expressionist compositions consist of fragments, or disjointed and plotless narratives. Frank O'HARA and the NEW YORK SCHOOL OF POETS also were inspired by Abstract Expressionist painters.

Sources

Auping, Michael. Abstract Expressionism: The Critical Developments. New York: Abrams in association with Albright-Knox Art Gallery, 1987.

Hobbs, Robert Carleton, and Gail Levin. Abstract Expressionism: The Formative Years. Ithaca, N.Y.: Herbert F. Johnson Museum of Art, Cornell University, 1978.

Sandler, Irving. The Triumph of American Painting: A History of Abstract Expressionism. New York: Praeger, 1970.

Academic Novel

The college campus, with its petty political intrigues, its colorful professoriat, and its befuddled, sex-obsessed student body, has been a favorite setting for novelists. Owen Johnson's Stover at Yale (1912) was an early example, but the most famous early college novel was F. Scott Fitzgerald's This Side of Paradise (1920), which introduced Amory Blaine and his observations on Princeton life. Yet, whereas early-twentieth-century writers such as Fitzgerald and Thomas Wolfe depicted university life from a student perspective within the larger rubric of the bildungsroman, or the "novel of education," toward the end of WORLD WAR II the perspective of the academic novel began to shift to the professoriat. This shift was largely a result of the rise of M.F.A. programs, which led many American writers to accept teaching positions as professors of creative writing. Mary MCCARTHY's The Groves of Academe (1952), which is set during the era of McCarthyism, and Vladimir NABOKOV's Pnin (1957), about a Russian émigré, both provide satirical glimpses of faculty life in the buttoned-down world of the 1950s.

Philip ROTH's first novel, Letting Go (1962), addresses the ethical struggles of two young couples negotiating their way through graduate school in Chicago in the 1950s. Alison LURIE's Love and Friendship (1962) takes the perspective of a dissatisfied faculty wife. John BARTH's cult classic Giles Goat-Boy (1966) playfully transforms the political intrigues at an imaginary institution named New Tammany College into a metaphor for the nuclear stand-off between the United States and the Soviet Union during the COLD WAR.

In the 1970s, academic novels began to deal more forthrightly with the political turmoil and the sexual openness that had characterized campus life in the previous decade.

Gail GODWIN's The Odd Woman (1974) focuses on feminist academics, while Roth's The Professor of Desire (1977) and its follow-up, The Ghost Writer (1979), present academic protagonists who are so steeped in the study and practice of literature that they sometimes cannot determine if they are real people, characters in a novel—or both.

The advent of literary theory and the ascent of political correctness and identity politics are all reflected in a string of academic novels of the 1980s and 1990s, including Amanda Cross's Death in a Tenured Position (1981), Don DELILLO's WHITE NOISE (1985), and Ishmael REED's Japanese by Spring (1993). Two comic novels from the late 1990s, Jane SMILEY's Moo (1995) and Richard Russo's Straight Man (1997), take a satiric swipe at the political backbiting, personality clashes, and squabbling that characterize contemporary campus life.

The effect of academic life on students was explored in Donna Tartt's The Secret History (1992) and in Tom Wolfe's satirical novel I Am Charlotte Simmons (2004). Several so-called chic-lit novels told semi-autobiographical stories about college life. The most notorious was How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild, and Got a Life (2006) by a young Harvard student ostensibly chronicling her time at Harvard. The book was withdrawn from circulation when it was shown to have been partly plagiarized from Megan McCafferty's Sloppy Firsts (2001) and Second Helpings (2003), both of which are about high-school life.

Source

Showalter, Elaine. Faculty Towers: The Academic Novel and Its Discontents. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.

—Marshall Boswell

The Accidental Tourist by Anne Tyler (New York: Knopf, 1985) novel

Anne TYLER's eighth novel, The Accidental Tourist, proved to be the breakthrough success that catapulted Tyler to the top of the best-seller lists after fifteen years of unflagging productivity. Like most of her work, this novel is a finely observed domestic drama about a marriage haunted by loss.

The hero of the novel, Macon Leary, is an obsessively neat and controlling travel writer who hates travel and foreign locales. His marriage to his wife, Sarah, has gone sour after the death of their son, Ethan, and when Sarah divorces Macon, he moves in with his similarly neurotic family, bringing with him his son's temperamental dog, Edward. Macon soon calls in a dog trainer named Muriel, and the rest of the novel traces Muriel's efforts to help Macon cope with the loss of both his son and his marriage. The book won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD.

—Marshall Boswell

Acker, Kathy (1948–1997) novelist

Born and raised in New York City, Kathy Acker studied under poet Jerome Rothenberg. Her early work was published by small, independent presses as she negotiated the literary milieu of New York City in the 1960s. Some critics view her as a feminist writer while others have found her graphic treatment of sex and violence—quite aside from any moral or political agenda—her most notable and provocative contribution to contemporary literature. Critical opinion of her work is sharply divided. Her novels include I Dreamt I Was a Nymphomaniac: Imagining (1974), Blood and Guts in High School (1984), In Memoriam to Identity (1990), and Pussy, King of the Pirates (1996). She was awarded a Pushcart Prize for her novel New York City in 1979 (1981).

Acker has been compared with William S. BURROUGHS because of her pornographic and surrealistic subject matter and style. Acker described her style and methods as the creation of a world. “If political content comes through it’s not because I sat down with a political agenda for this book. I don’t write in order to say this is what should be . . . I just basically wanted to do a girl’s version of Treasure Island. . .”

Source

Scholder, Amy, Carla Harryman, and Avital Ronell, eds. Lust for Life: On the Writings of Kathy Acker. London & New York: Verso, 2006.

The Activists

A San Francisco writers’ group established in 1936, the Activists were devoted to studying the relationship between language and emotion in poetry. The group, which originally included the poets Robert Horan, Jeanne McGahey, and Rosalie Moore, thrived under the inspiration of Professor Lawrence Hart, who edited and commented on a selection of their work in the May 1951 issue of Poetry magazine. From 1950 to 1955 the Activists published their own magazine, Number.

Source

The Lawrence Hart Institute: The “Activist” Poets <<http://www.lawrencehart.org/>> (viewed April 19, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Adams, Alice (1926–1999) novelist, short-story writer

I came from the kind of intellectual background that made writing seem like the most praiseworthy thing to do, so there was never anything else.

—Interview (1980)

Best known for her sensitive portraits of strong modern women—both Southerners and contemporary Californians—Alice Adams was born in Fredericksburg, Virginia, to Nicholson Barney, a college professor, and Agatha Erskine, a writer. The author of eleven novels and five short-story collections, Adams attracted a wide-ranging readership over the course of three decades of steady productivity. Her most popular novels include Listening to Billie (1978), Superior Women (1984), Second Chances (1988), Caroline’s Daughters (1991), and A Southern Exposure (1995), a sequel to which, After the War (2000), appeared posthumously. In 2002 her long-time publisher, Alfred A. Knopf, published The Stories of Alice Adams, which includes fifty-three stories selected from her previous collections. Adams died in San Francisco, where much of her fiction is set.

Source

Upton, Lee. “Changing the Past: Alice Adams’ Revisionary Nostalgia.” Studies in Short Fiction, 26 (Winter 1989): 33–41.

The Adventures of Augie March by Saul Bellow

(New York: Viking, 1953) novel

This picaresque novel, Saul BELLOW’s third in less than a decade, marked an abrupt shift not only in Bellow’s own style but also in the direction of American fiction after WORLD WAR II. The novel is the first-person account of the tumultuous life of a Chicago man named Augie March, who is “adopted” by a vast assortment of “big personalities, destiny molders, and heavy-water brains, Machiavellis and wizard evildoers, big-wheels and imposers-upon, absolutists.” The cast of characters includes his fierce immigrant grandmother, Grandma Lausch, his two brothers, Simon and George, as well as such “big personalities” as Willie Einhorn, a Chicago street mogul in charge of a complex underground empire, and Mintouchian, a cynical American lawyer. Augie moves from one “big personality” to the next, finding and losing love and taking instruction as he goes along, broadening his concept of life’s possibilities and becoming ever more “hipped on superabundance.”

Nothing in Bellow’s two previous novels—Dangling Man (1944) and The Victim (1947)—quite prepared readers for the freewheeling vigor of Augie March. Whereas those early works, written under the spell of such European Modernists as Franz Kafka and Thomas Mann, were concise, intellectually dense works focusing on the psychological underpinnings of modern-day alienation, Augie March was expansive, looking back to the poetry of Walt Whitman and forward to the spirited excesses of such BEAT writers as Jack KEROUAC and Lawrence FERLINGHETTI. In the same way that Augie’s adventures place him under the influence of both gangsters and intellectuals, the book’s prose mixes intellectual heft with jazz-like improvisation.

Of equal importance was both Bellow’s and Augie’s status as Jews. In the book’s opening sentence, Augie declares himself, first and foremost, an “American, Chicago born.”

Similarly, Bellow's hero functions as a Jewish hero operating squarely within the mainstream of American experience. Bellow, himself the son of Russian Jewish immigrants, has often remarked on the incongruity of his own childhood, with its competing demands of the Chicago streets and the intellectual aspirations conferred upon him by his hopeful parents. In locating a style that mixed both elements into a seamless whole, Bellow landed upon a means by which later Jewish and immigrant artists could stake their claim to the American mainstream while simultaneously maintaining their status as outsiders looking in, an approach that would be particularly important to the work of Philip ROTH. The book won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and identified Bellow as one of the more significant American writers of the postwar period.

Source

Pifer, Ellen. Saul Bellow, Against the Grain. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.

—Marshall Boswell

African American Literature

In the first half of the twentieth century, African American literature was dominated by the artists associated with the Harlem Renaissance. These seminal figures, including Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and Claude McKay, sought to balance their artfully articulated critique of America's racist social order with a positive celebration of black life and black creativity. Richard Wright's 1940 novel Native Son marked a decisive break with that tradition. The story of an African American man named Bigger Thomas who is convicted of the accidental murder of an affluent white woman, Wright's incendiary novel employed the naturalistic techniques of John Dos Passos and Theodore Dreiser to level an uncompromising indictment of American racism. The first novel by a black American to be chosen by the Book-of-the-Month Club, Native Son became an instant classic, and changed the direction of African American literature.

Wright's two most prominent successors, James BALDWIN and Ralph ELLISON, carried forward Wright's critique of American racism while distancing themselves in specific ways from their predecessor's grim, naturalistic vision. Baldwin famously linked Native Son with Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, arguing that Wright's Bigger Thomas ultimately functioned as an anti-Uncle Tom figure, an obverse, but no less harmful, stereotype of black identity that served to confirm white assumptions about black behavior. Baldwin declared his complicated debt to and rejection of Wright in his first novel, GO TELL IT ON THE MOUNTAIN (1953), a lyrical autobiographical novel about a young man's struggle with his sternly religious stepfather and his own sexual identity.

Ellison's INVISIBLE MAN (1952) preserves Wright's uncompromising disavowal of American racism but uses humor, irony, and symbolism to mount a critique in what Ellison describes as a "blues" mode, which he called an "impulse to keep the painful details and episodes of a brutal existence alive in one's aching consciousness, to finger its jagged grain, and to transcend it, not by the consolations of philosophy, but by squeezing from it near-comic, near-tragic lyricism," in his essay about Wright's autobiography, Black Boy (1945), titled "Richard Wright's Blues" (1945).

The postwar period also witnessed an explosion of African American poets, chief among them being Gwendolyn Brooks, whose first book, A Street in Bronzeville, appeared in 1945. With the publication of her Annie Allen (1949), Brooks became the first African American woman to win the Pulitzer Prize. In the 1960s she joined fellow African American poet Amiri BARAKA to help spearhead the BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT, which sought to promote African American expression unfiltered through white modes. She also published a trio of books with Dudley Randall's BROADSIDE PRESS, which was the main publishing venue for artists associated with the Black Arts Movement and which also brought poet Nikki GIOVANNI to national attention.

In the revolutionary climate of the 1960s, particularly in view of the Civil Rights Movement and the rise of Black Power, Black Studies departments began to spring up on college classes throughout the United States, inspiring a new desire for black texts. Zora Neale Hurston's 1937 novel Their Eyes Were Watching God returned to print in the late 1960s and created a renewed interest in other female African American writers, including Paule MARSHALL, Margaret WALKER and Alice WALKER (both of whom are also accomplished poets), Maya ANGELOU, Toni MORRISON, Toni Cade BAMBARA, and others. Margaret WALKER's JUBILEE (1966) was an historical novel about a persevering female slave named Vvry who makes the transition from slavery to freedom in the late nineteenth century. Alice Walker's groundbreaking early work, including the story collection In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1973), and the novel Meridian (1976), focuses on the particular plight of black women, and sets the groundwork for her later identification as what she termed womanist, that is, black feminist. Toni Morrison's first novel, THE BLUEST EYE (1970), published against the background of the "Black is Beautiful" movement of the late 1960s, explores the pernicious effect of dominant white notions of beauty on the self-esteem of a young African American girl whose fondest wish is to be given blue eyes.

These novelists were joined during this period by a cluster of African American memoirists. The most famous works in this genre include Baldwin's NOTES OF A NATIVE SON (1955), Malcolm X and Alex HALEY's THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MALCOLM X (1965), Claude BROWN's Manchild in the Promised Land (1965), Eldridge CLEAVER's Soul on Ice (1968), and Angelou's I KNOW WHY THE CAGED BIRD SINGS (1969).

Meanwhile, Lorraine HANSBERRY helped transform American drama when she won—at the age of twenty-eight—the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for her 1959 play A Raisin in the Sun, now an American classic.

The 1980s were marked by a string of triumphs among African Americans. Playwright August WILSON brought to Broadway four plays that have since become staples of American theater: Ma Rainey's Black Bottom (produced 1984), Fences (produced 1985), Joe Turner's Come and Gone (produced 1986), and The Piano Lesson (produced 1987). Just as Wilson's career was taking off, Alice Walker's The Color Purple (1982) won both the Pulitzer Prize and the National Book Award. Walker became a celebrity as well as the target of stern criticism by several African American male authors, most notably Ishmael REED, who complained publicly that her portrait of male characters was sexist and demeaning. Toni Morrison's BELOVED (1987) was overlooked by the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD but won the 1988 Pulitzer Prize after a group of prominent writers wrote a public letter complaining about the earlier oversight. A dense, kaleidoscopic novel about a runaway slave who murders her own child, Beloved has become an American classic and was recently voted by the New York Times Book Review as the most important novel published in the last twenty-five years. After her follow-up novel, Jazz (1992), solidified her critical standing, Morrison made history in 1993 by being the first African American woman to win the Nobel Prize in literature. The only other novel by an African American on the New York Times list was Edward P. Jones's Pulitzer Prize-winning novel The Known World (2003), about a free black, slave-owning family in the South during the Civil War.

Sources

Bell, Bernard W. The Afro-American Novel and Its Traditions. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1987.

Inge, Harris, Maurice Duke, and Jackson R. Bryer, eds. Black American Writers: Bibliographical Essay, Volume 2: Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, James Baldwin, and Amiri Baraka. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1978.

Evans, Mari, ed. Black Women Writers (1950–1980): A Critical Evaluation. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1983.

—Marshall Boswell

Albee, Edward (1928– ) playwright

Your sympathy disarms me . . . your . . . your compassion makes me weep! Large, salty, unscientific tears!

—Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1962)

Born in Washington, D.C., Edward Albee was adopted as an infant by Reed Albee, a producer and theater owner, and his wife. He grew up in Manhattan and in Westchester County,

Edward Albee

New York, attending the Lawrenceville School in New Jersey and then graduating in 1946 from the Choate School in Connecticut, where he began writing fiction. After an unsatisfactory year at Trinity College and a stint in the U.S. Army, Albee settled in Greenwich Village and worked at various odd jobs. After attempting to write poetry, he took Thornton Wilder's advice and turned to plays. After several apprentice works, he wrote, in three weeks, his first professionally produced play; THE ZOO STORY, a one-act drama, was produced in 1959. The Zoo Story takes place on a bench in Manhattan's Central Park, where an aggressive young loner attempts to goad a self-satisfied middle-class publisher out of his complacency, finally resorting to an act of suicidal violence. Although The Zoo Story is written in a naturalistic style, Albee experimented early with surrealism and other antirealistic devices, which characterize his later works, in such plays as The Sandbox (produced 1960) and The American Dream (produced 1961), in which generically named characters parody American middle-class values and express unease with conventional life. Albee's first play produced on Broadway, WHO'S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOOLF? (produced 1962), was very successful. It ran for 664 performances and won five Tony Awards, including best play, among other honors. This intense drama about a cynical college professor, George, his vituperative wife, Martha, and their ability to draw a young couple into their marital conflicts, employs a typical Albee strategy, revealing how apparently normal, well-adjusted characters harbor the same tensions as the anxiety-laden misfits they confront.

Front page of the program for the first Broadway production of Albee's play, which won five Tony Awards

Albee won the first of his three Pulitzer Prizes for A Delicate Balance (produced 1966), in which a dysfunctional family scene is interrupted by a couple from next door who ask to be taken in because they fear some inexpressible danger. He also won a Pulitzer Prize for Seascape (produced 1975), in which a couple contemplating retirement are confronted by a married pair of talking lizards; and the 1994 Pulitzer for Three Tall Women (produced 1991), in which three ladies, one old, one middle-aged, and one young, in fact incarnations of the same person at different stages in her life, discuss who enjoys herself more. Albee successfully integrates the naturalistic and romantic traditions of the American theater.

Albee has produced several plays that are adaptations of stories and novels by other writers, including The Ballad of the Sad Café (produced 1963, from Carson McCULLERS's story), Malcolm (produced 1966, from James PURDY's novel), and Lolita (produced 1981, from Vladimir NABOKOV's novel).

His later plays include The Lady from Dubuque (produced 1980), The Man Who Had Three Arms (produced 1982), and Marriage Play (produced 1987), none of which were critical successes. In 1998 he produced The Play About the Baby, which was followed by his 2002 production Occupant. The same year Albee scored another critical success with The Goat, or Who is Sylvia? (produced 2002). The play, relying on classical allusions, tells the story of a man who, concerned about his son's homosexuality, falls in love with a goat. The play won the Tony, Drama Desk, New York Drama Critics Circle, and the Outer Critics Circle awards for best play of the year. With 309 performances it was Albee's second-longest-running Broadway play.

In 2005, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? was revived for Broadway; Kathleen Turner, Bill Irwin, David Harbour, and Mireille Enos starred in the production. That same year Albee won a special Tony Award for lifetime achievement.

Principal Books by Albee

The Zoo Story, The Death of Bessie Smith, The Sandbox. New York: Coward-McCann, 1960.

The American Dream. New York: Coward-McCann, 1961.

Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? New York: Atheneum, 1962.

Tiny Alice. New York: Atheneum, 1965.

A Delicate Balance. New York: Atheneum, 1966.

Box and Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-Tung: Two Inter-Related Plays. New York: Atheneum, 1969.

All Over. New York: Atheneum, 1971.

Seascape. New York: Atheneum, 1975.

Counting the Ways and Listening, Two Plays. New York: Atheneum, 1977.

The Lady from Dubuque. New York: Atheneum, 1980.

Selected Plays of Edward Albee. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1987.

The Sandbox and The Death of Bessie Smith (with Fam and Yam). New York: Plume, 1988.

Finding the Sun. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1994.

Edward Albee's Marriage Play. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1995.

Three Tall Women. New York: Dutton, 1995.

Fragments: A Sit-Around. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1995.

Tony Rosenthal, by Albee and Sam Hunter. New York: Rizzoli, 2000.

The Play About the Baby. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 2002.

Studying Edward Albee

Albee's best-known play is Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? As Anne Paolucci notes, "it is, in Albee's repertory, what Long Day's Journey into Night is in O'Neill's." Because it shares many traits with his other works—the blend of absurdity and realism, satiric humor, verbal play and overall wit—the play is a good place to start reading Albee's work. Likewise, Paolucci's interpretation in her From Tension to Tonic (Wilmington, Del.: Begehot Council, 2000) gives students the most-informed criticism.

Mel Gussow's biography, Edward Albee: A Singular Journey (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999), is a superior guide not only to Albee's life and development as a playwright but also to the work itself and his reception. Gussow artfully weaves Albee's thoughts and interpretations of his work, taken from his approximately eighty interviews, into the chronicle. He also integrates critical reception and interpretation into the biography. Overall, the biography is an excellent companion to Albee's plays.

Like Gussow's biography, Edward Albee: A Casebook, edited by Bruce Mann (New York: Routledge, 2003), reevaluates the playwright in light of his later plays, Three Tall Women in particular, which Albee wrote following the death of his mother, who largely disinherited him in the final months of her life. This collection of essays addresses nearly all of Albee's plays but primarily through the lens of his revival in the 1990s. The essays, like most about Albee, also nod toward Albee's controversial place in American theater as a playwright who has battled as much or more consternation as praise throughout his career. Perhaps most notable is an overview essay by Paolucci on Albee's career with an analysis of The Man Who Had Three Arms.

A sea of criticism exists on Albee, but a few key sources can help students navigate it. One of these sources is Scott Giantvalley's Edward Albee: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987), which provides an annotated bibliography of early criticism. Matthew Roudané's Understanding Edward Albee (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1987) is an excellent introduction to the early work. For more-recent criticism, one is left to some 160 critical works cited since then in the MLA bibliography as of spring 2007. One should, furthermore, take the author's comments on his plays into consideration. Most critical companions include at least one interview, and Conversations with Edward Albee, edited by Philip C. Kolin (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988), sheds light on his motivations and agendas. Albee's essays are also collected in a volume titled Stretching My Mind (New York: Carroll & Graf, 2006). The essays range from his opinions on sociopolitical matters to his influence by playwrights such as Samuel Beckett, Eugène Ionesco, and Sam SHEPARD.

In addition to a thorough bibliography and gloss of Albee's career, Critical Essays on Edward Albee, edited by Philip Kolin and J. Madison Davis (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1986), offers, for the first time, the German reviews of the first productions of Zoo Story and The Death of Bessie Smith—plays first performed in Germany. Edward Albee, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2001), also remains a significant source for gaining an understanding of Albee's earlier plays and especially for insight into Albee's place in American theater. The Cambridge Companion to Edward Albee, edited by Stephen Bottoms (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005), includes an interview and a dozen essays spanning Albee's entire career.

—Student Guide by Brian Ray

Alexander, Meena (1951– ) poet, novelist, essayist

Meena Alexander was born in Allahabad, India, but her family soon moved to Khartoum, Egypt. After earning a Ph.D. in England at Nottingham University in 1973, she came to the United States as a professor of English and creative writing at Hunter College and at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York. Both a volume of her poetry, The Bird's Bright Ring (1976), and her novel Nampally Road (1971) reflect her sensitivity to the way women have been violated and hurt. The Storm (1989) is a memoir that evokes Alexander's feeling for her grandmother, as does another memoir, House of a Thousand Doors (1988). Although much of her work is set in India, Alexander clearly has the modern world as a whole in mind as she raises important questions about culture, politics, and the status of women and families. These themes coalesce in Fault Lines: A Memoir (1993), which is her most careful exploration of her identity as a woman. In 2002 Alexander won the PEN Open Book Award, PEN/Faulkner Foundation for Illiterate Heart. She was also awarded the Imbongi Yesizwe Poetry International Award and the Fulbright Senior Scholar Award. Her most recent published work is Indian Love Poems (2005).

Sources

Alexander, Meena. "Observing Ourselves among Others: Interview with Meena Alexander," in Between the Lines: South Asians and Post Coloniality, edited by Deepika Bahri and Mary Vasudeva. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1996, pp. 35–53.

Young, Jeffrey. "Creating a Life through Education." Chronicle of Higher Education, 43 (March 14, 1997): 8–9.

Alexie, Sherman (1966– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet

You throw in a couple of birds and four directions and corn pollen and it's Native American literature, when it has nothing to do with the day-to-day lives of Indians. I want my literature to concern the daily lives of Indians. I think most Native American literature is so obsessed with nature that I don't think it has any useful purpose. It has more to do with the lyric tradition of European Americans than it does with indigenous cultures.

—Interview (2001)

One of the best-known and most flamboyant Native American writers of his generation, Sherman Alexie, a native Spokane/Coeur d'Alene tribal member, grew up on the Spokane Indian Reservation in Wellpinit, Washington. His work depicts the pervasive poverty, despair, and alcoholism of Native American reservation life against a backdrop of contemporary American pop culture. His stories, poems, and novels mix pain and anger with black humor and irony.

Born to Sherman Joseph and Lillian Agnes, Alexie spent much of his childhood alone with his mother, who supported the family by selling hand-sewn quilts and working at the Wellpinit Trading Post. At the age of six months he underwent an operation to remove water from his brain. His doctors predicted the operation would render him mentally handicapped, but Alexie recovered, though not without repercussions; he suffered from seizures throughout his growing-up years. At the same time, his illness gave him ample opportunity to indulge in wide reading, so by 1980 he had transferred out of the reservation school to the mostly white Reardon High School, where he did well enough to earn admission to Gonzaga University in Spokane. Two years later he transferred to Washington State University, where he began publishing a succession of poems and short stories in the student literary magazine.

Alexie's first published book, The Business of Fancydancing (1992), a collection of stories and poems, sets the tone for much of his subsequent work. The many Native American characters in the book deal with the despair and drudgery of reservation life with the same blend of anger, resignation, and fortitude that Alexie has characteristically employed. His acclaimed short-story collections include The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1993), The Toughest Indian in the World (2000), and Ten Little Indians (2003). In 2005 he won the O. Henry Award for his short story "What You Pawn I Will Redeem."

His novels include Reservation Blues (1995), winner of both the Murray Morgan Prize and the Before Columbus Foundation's American Book Award, and Indian Killer (1996), a racially charged literary thriller about a Native American serial killer. Alexie's screenplay for the motion picture Smoke Signals was widely praised, winning both the Audience Award and the Filmmakers Trophy at the 1998 Sundance Film Festival.

Sources

Brill de Ramirez, Susan Berry. Contemporary American Indian Literatures & the Oral Tradition. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1999.

Official Sherman Alexie website: <<http://www.fallsapart.com/>> (viewed May 10, 2007).

All the King's Men by Robert Penn Warren (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1946) novel

Robert Penn Warren's third published novel, All the King's Men evolved from a five-act drama, Proud Flesh, into a double-narrative novel. The dramatic version focused on Willie Stark, a Southern politician who was ultimately corrupted by power, only to realize too late that the end does not justify the means nor the loss of familial relationships. The title, from the children's verse "Humpty Dumpty," intimates the completeness of Stark's fall. The other story in the novel belongs to the narrator, Jack Burden, a student of history, for whom Stark becomes a surrogate whose pragmatic action clashes with the principles of idealism ingrained during his youth. Burden becomes a character who has learned about the relationship of past-present-future and about the meaning of love—parental, fraternal, and sacramental.

The setting is a Southern state, unnamed but generally accepted as Louisiana, from the 1920s to 1939, just prior to the start of World War II. Stark's political career has strong parallels to Huey P. Long's career in the 1930s, but Warren said repeatedly that Long provided only a backdrop to the Machiavellian antics of Stark's power politics. Warren wrote in 1953, "The book . . . was never intended to be a book about politics. Politics merely provided the framework story in which the deeper concerns, whatever their final significance, might work themselves out." For Stark, the end clearly justifies the means as he deals with corruption, sin, guilt, and redemption in his own life.

Sources

Beebe, Maurice, and Leslie A. Field, eds. Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men: A Critical Handbook. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1966.

Grimshaw, James A., Jr., and James A. Perkins, eds. Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men: Three Stage Versions. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2000.

Warren, Robert Penn. All the King's Men, Restored Edition, edited by Noel Polk. New York: Harcourt, 2001.

—James A. Grimshaw Jr.

All the Pretty Horses by Cormac McCarthy (New York: Knopf, 1992) novel

Cormac McCarthy's sixth novel, All the Pretty Horses, proved to be the most successful of McCarthy's works to that time. Set in Mexico and the American West in the late 1940s, the novel dramatizes the coming-of-age of sixteen-year-old John Grady Cole as he doggedly pursues an authentic cowboy existence, crossing the border into Mexico with his sidekick Lacey Rawlins and an expert marksman named Jimmy Blevins, whom they encounter along the way.

McCarthy's early novels, particularly Suttree (1979) and Blood Meridian (1985), had already established him as a major American writer whose stoic, violent novels had critics comparing him to Ernest Hemingway and William Faulkner. All the Pretty Horses, while certainly violent and bleak—particularly in the account of Grady's experience in the Encantata prison—marked a new phase in McCarthy's writing. Working with Knopf editor Gary Fisketjon, McCarthy managed to streamline his storytelling, while his clear affection for his heroic, teenage protagonist translated directly to broader reader appeal. Although primarily a bildungsroman concerned with the educative power of violence, the novel also expresses a deep-rooted nostalgia for the old ways of the rural West, which, in the story's mid-century setting, are rapidly being eradicated: McCarthy's narrator declares that John Grady is "likely becoming something of an extinct species himself."

The book won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1993 and became a best-seller. It is the first of a trio of novels McCarthy calls "The Border Trilogy": All the Pretty Horses, The Crossing (1994), and Cities of the Plain (1998).

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Cormac McCarthy's All the Pretty Horses. New York: Chelsea House, 2004.

Arnold, Edwin T., and Dianne C. Luce, eds. A Cormac McCarthy Companion: The Border Trilogy. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001.

—Marshall Boswell

Allen, Paula Gunn (1939 – ) poet, fiction writer, literary scholar

Born in Albuquerque, New Mexico, to a family of Laguna Pueblo, Sioux, and Lebanese heritage, Paula Allen grew up among the Laguna and Aroma Pueblo communities in Dauber, New Mexico. She earned a Ph.D. in American studies from the University of New Mexico in 1975 and has taught at San Francisco State University, the University of New Mexico, the University of California, and other schools. She has won several fellowships and prizes, including a National Endowment for the Arts Fellowship for Writing in 1978 and the Native American Prize for Literature in 1990. Among American literary influences she lists Gertrude Stein, the BEATS, Adrienne RICH, Audre LORDE, and Denise LEVERTOV. She studied writing with Robert CREELEY. In her introduction to The Sacred Hoop: Recovering the Feminine in American Indian Traditions (1986) she came out as a lesbian. Her poetry collections include Shadow Country (1982), Wyrds (1987), and Skin and Bones (1988). The Woman Who Owned the Shadows (1983) focuses on Ephanie, a woman of mixed race who also has to come to terms with her lesbianism. In Grandmothers of the Light (1991) Allen draws on myths and stories that form a woman's "spiritual tradition." Allen also has edited anthologies: Studies in American Indian Literature: Critical Essays and Course Designs (1983) and a collection of short stories by Native American women, Spider Woman's Granddaughters (1989), which in 1990 won an AMERICAN BOOK AWARD. Her most recent work is the biography Pocahontas: Medicine Woman, Spy, Entrepreneur, Diplomat (2003). Allen has campaigned actively as a feminist and speaker for gay and lesbian rights.

Sources

Bruchac, Joseph. Survival This Way: Interviews with American Indian Poets. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1987.

Keating, Analouise. Women Reading Women Writing. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1996.

Allison, Dorothy (1949– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet, essayist

Born in Greenville, South Carolina, Dorothy Allison has described her early life as mean, violent, and terrifying. Self-identified as a lesbian novelist, Allison won critical acclaim for her novel about a young girl in rural South Carolina, Bastard out of Carolina (1992), which was a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD finalist. She attracted early attention for her poetry, including The Women Who Hate Me (1983), and for her first collection of short stories, Trash (1988). Skin: Talking about Sex, Class, and Culture (1994) is a collection of essays. Her other novels include Cavedweller (1998). Two or Three Things I Know for Sure (1995) is a memoir of her harsh South Carolina upbringing. Allison has been praised for the strong first-person voice of her narratives. She has also affirmed that being "queer" is an integral part of her identity as a writer.

Sources

Drabelle, Dennis. "No Friends of Dorothy," Advocate (March 9, 1993): 66–67.

Miller, Laura. "The Salon Interview: Dorothy Allison," Salon: <http://www.salon.com/books/int/1998/03/cov\_si\_31intb.html> (viewed May 10, 2007).

Alther, Lisa (1944– ) novelist

Born in Kingsport, Tennessee, in 1944, Lisa Alther graduated from Wellesley College in 1966 and, after a short stint working for a publishing firm, moved to Vermont, where she began writing her first novel, the breakout hit Kinflicks (1976). The novel quickly established Alther as a witty, gifted writer in the FEMINIST mode. This autobiographical bildungsroman tells the rollicking story of Ginny Babcock, starting with her childhood in Hullsport, Tennessee, and continuing through her adventures at a posh northeastern college and her experience as a liberated woman in the 1960s. Whereas Kinflicks is told in the first person, in a sardonic voice that earned comparisons to J. D. SALINGER'S THE CATCHER IN THE RYE (1951), Alther's second novel, Original Sins (1981), features five Southerners, each of whom is navigating through the tumultuous 1960s and 1970s. Her subsequent books—including Other Women (1984), Bedrock (1990), and Five Minutes in Heaven (1995)—have focused on homosexual themes.

Sources

Ferguson, Mary Anne. "Lisa Alther: The Irony of Return?" Southern Quarterly, 21 (Summer 1983): 103–115.

Hall, Joan Lord. "Symbiosis and Separation in Lisa Alther's Kinflicks." Arizona Quarterly, 38 (Winter 1982): 336–346.

—Marshall Boswell

Alvarez, Julia (1950– ) novelist, poet, children's writer

*I believe stories have this power—they enter us, they transport us, they change things inside us . . .
we come out of a great book as a different person from the person we were when we began reading it.*

—Convocation speech,
Appalachian State University
(1997)

Julia Alvarez is the author of six novels, five books for children or young adults, four books of poetry, and a collection of personal essays called Something to Declare (1998). Shortly after her birth in New York City, Alvarez's family moved back to the Dominican Republic. She spent the majority of her childhood there, until 1960, when, because of her father's involvement with an attempt to overthrow the dictatorship of Rafael L. Trujillo, the family moved back to New York for safety. Alvarez points to the shock of returning to the United States as the central reason she became a writer, as she found comfort in books during the difficult transition.

She received her B.A. from Middlebury College in 1971 and her M.F.A. from Syracuse University in 1975, and she taught English both in high school and at the university level afterward.

Alvarez's first and best-known novel, How the Garcia Girls Lost Their Accents (1991), recounts the experience of the four Garcia sisters who immigrate to New York from the Dominican Republic. It is a study of the women's existence in a cultural borderland, reflective of Alvarez's own dual identities as a Dominican American. In the Time of the Butterflies (1994) is an historical novel based on the lives of the Mirabal sisters, founders of the anti-Trujillo resistance movement, who were murdered three months after the Alvarez family fled to New York. Her young adult novels—How Tia Lola Came to Visit Stay (2001), Before We Were Free (2002), and Finding Miracles (2004)—similarly deal with immigration from Latin America. Alvarez's poetry tends to touch on issues of immigration, womanhood, and language. In the title poem of The Other Side/El Otro Lado (1995), she writes, "There is nothing left to cry for, / nothing left but the story / of our family's grand adventure / from one language to another." The Woman I Kept to Myself (2004) is a collection of seventy-five introspective poems, each with thirty lines. Alvarez is writer-in-residence at Middlebury College.

Source

Serias, Silvio. Julia Alvarez: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.

—Anna Teekell

The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay
by Michael Chabon (New York: Random House, 2000) novel

Winner of the 2001 Pulitzer Prize in literature, Michael CHABON's third novel is the story of two comic-book artists in 1940s New York, Brooklyn-born Sammy Clay, and his Czechoslovakian cousin, Joe Kavalier, who has been smuggled out of Nazi-held Prague by an escape artist who bears a strong resemblance to Harry Houdini. The two artists conceive a comic-book superhero named the Escapist and quickly rise to the top of the comic-book industry against the backdrop of WORLD WAR II.

Chabon modeled the ascent of Sammy and Joe on that of two actual comic artists, illustrator Joe Shuster and writer Jerome Siegel, the Jewish creators of Superman, who, like Chabon's fictional characters, faced anti-Semitism that led to their loss of royalties. The novel is encyclopedic in its treatment of the comic-book industry, which Chabon uses to explore the confluence of creativity and commerce, art and escapism. Chabon has also cast his story as a hero quest in accordance with the archetypal formulas laid out by Joseph CAMPBELL in The Hero with a Thousand Faces. Written in lyrical prose that has earned him comparisons to John UPDIKE and Vladimir NABOKOV, the book is an ambitious attempt to merge the conventions of literature with the escapist pleasures of comic books.

Source

Behlman, Lee. "The Escapist: Fantasy, Folklore, and the Pleasures of the Comic Book in Recent Jewish American Holocaust Fiction," Shofar: An Interdisciplinary Journal of Jewish Studies, 22 (Spring 2004): 56–71.

—Marshall Boswell

American Book Award

Established in 1978, the American Book Awards are given annually to writers, editors, critics, and educators whose work has helped advance the country's appreciation of its multi-racial, multiethnic, and multicultural diversity. The award was established by the Before Columbus Foundation (BCF), a nonprofit organization founded in 1976 and made up of authors, editors, and publishers who seek to redefine the public's understanding of mainstream American literature so it better reflects the country's multicultural population.

The BCF awards between fifteen and twenty American Book Awards each year. In addition, the BCF also gives out a Lifetime Achievement Award, a Walter and Lillian Lowenfels Criticism Award, an Educator Award, a Children's Book Award, and an Editor/Publisher Award. Past winners have included James WELCH (1987, for Fools Crow), Toni MORRISON (1988, for BELOVED), William KENNEDY (1984, for O Albany!), Sandra CISNEROS (1985, for The House on Mango Street), Frank CHIN (1982, for Chickencoop Chinaman and Year of the Dragon; 1989, for Chinaman Pacific and Frisco R.R. Co.; 2000, for lifetime achievement), Terry McMILLAN (1987, for Mama), and Toni Cade Bambara (1981, for The Salt Eaters).

Source

Reed, Ishmael, Kathryn Trueblood, and Shawn Wong, eds. The Before Columbus Foundation Fiction Anthology: Selections from the American Book Awards, 1980–1990. New York: Norton, 1992.

—Marshall Boswell

American Buffalo by David Mamet (produced 1975) play

David MAMET's first play, American Buffalo, made its premiere at the Goodman Theatre Stage Two in Chicago, Illinois, in November 1975. It introduced Mamet to theatergoing audiences and won both the Drama Critics Circle Award and the Obie Award. The play is a tense, dialogue-driven set piece about three "business" associates who plot, but fail to pull off, a robbery of rare American coins—specifically "buffalo-head" nickels.

Early viewers of the play were struck by the originality and electric verve of Mamet's dialogue. The characters speak in terse, highly stylized "street" rhythms, talk over one another, fall into tense silences, and start up again. Mamet was praised for the intensity with which he attacked his theme—the corrosive effects of contemporary business ethos and the elusive lure of the American dream. The play's small, all-male cast highlights Mamet's focused concern with the complexities and contradictions of masculinity when isolated from a more integrated social context. American Buffalo has remained one of Mamet's most successful stage productions.

Sources

Carrol, Dennis. David Mamet. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987.

Mamet, David. American Buffalo. New York: Grove, 1977.

—Marshall Boswell

American Literary Scholarship (1964– ) periodical

Published by Duke University, this annual volume contains commentary on the year's scholarly publications on major American authors such as Ralph Waldo Emerson, Herman Melville, and Ezra Pound. Scholarly articles and books are discussed in analytical bibliographical essays, emphasizing the most important research and literary criticism.

American Pastoral by Philip Roth (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997) novel

Philip ROTH's sixteenth novel, twenty-third book, and winner of the 1993 Pulitzer Prize, American Pastoral examines the impact of the 1960s counterculture on a blond innocent named Swede Levov and on the United States writ large. The novel also marks the reemergence of Roth's fictional alter ego, Nathan Zuckerman, last seen writing a scathing afterword to Roth's 1988 autobiography, The Facts.

In an uncharacteristic fit of nostalgia, Zuckerman attends his fortieth high-school reunion, where he encounters Jerry Levov, the brother of his high-school hero, Swede. As Jerry reconstructs the life of Swede, Zuckerman realizes that his idealized version of Swede's life does not match the difficulties Swede has endured. A study of dark alter egos, anger, rage, and disorder, the novel became a critical success and, later, a best-seller.

Roth's biggest success since the early 1970s, the book occasioned a positive critical reappraisal of Roth's career up to that point. The novel introduces two other novels in a series that Roth calls The American Trilogy: I Married a Communist (1998) and The Human Stain (2000). As American Pastoral examines the Vietnam era and the Watergate scandal, the other two novels explore the McCarthy-era Red Scare and the Clinton impeachment, respectively.

Source

Halio, Jay L., and Ben Siegel, eds. Philip Roth's Later Novels. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005.

—Marshall Boswell

American Poetry Review (1972– ) periodical

American Poetry Review was founded in 1972 by Stephen Berg in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. During the first five years of its existence, the tabloid-style newspaper relied on inexpensive publication costs and the generosity of supporters, but by the mid 1980s the journal had evolved into a relatively stable venture that, in the two subsequent decades, significantly expanded its circulation and national visibility. Since its inception, the journal has been dedicated to publishing a range of poetry, interviews, reviews, and translations that aims to articulate, as Stanley Kunitz observed in 1973, an "enthusiasm for poetry rather than the promotion of any specific school or clique."

—Tod Marshall

American Quarterly (1951– ) periodical

The official journal of the American Studies Association, American Quarterly was founded in 1951 at Johns Hopkins University. The journal publishes multidisciplinary articles that explore American cultural issues. More recently the journal has focused increasingly on essays devoted to issues of diversity and the role of the United States in the larger global community.

—Marshall Boswell

Ammons, A. R. (1926–2001) poet, essayist

I am seeing: I am looking to make arrangements:

—“The Ridge Farm” (1987)

Archie Randolph, or A. R., Ammons was the foremost Romantic poet of the postwar period. His acerbic, lucid work belongs within an American tradition of Romanticism and transcendentalism that begins with Ralph Waldo Emerson and Walt Whitman, and continues into the twentieth century with the work of William Carlos Williams and Wallace Stevens.

Ammons was born in Whiteville, North Carolina, to W. M. Ammons and Lucy Della McKee Ammons, who ran a small tobacco farm. Ammons was the only surviving son, as his two male siblings both died at early ages. (A daughter also died before Ammons was born.) Ammons spent his childhood and adolescence working on the farm, then he served in the South Pacific during WORLD WAR II. He received his B.A. from Wake Forest College in 1949 and took graduate courses at the University of California, Berkeley, before leaving in 1952 to move to New Jersey with his wife, Phyllis Plumbo. In 1964 he accepted a one-year teaching position at Cornell University in Ithaca, New York, and remained at Cornell until his death in 2001.

His first major work was his third collection, Corsons Inlet: A Book of Poems (1965); the title poem is now an American classic. In 1972 he published Collected Poems, 1951–1971 (1972), which won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD; and two years later he received the BOLLINGEN PRIZE for Sphere: The Form of a Motion (1974). His other major works include Tape for the Turn of the Year (1965), Coast of Trees (1981, winner of the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD for poetry), and his career-culminating long poem, Garbage (1993), another National Book Award winner. This book-length work, composed entirely of unrhymed iambic couplets, mounts a witty, philosophically astute defense of the supremacy of material reality. As Ammons asserts, it is “a scientific poem, / asserting that nature models values, that we / have invented little (copied), reflections of / possibilities already here.” Elsewhere, taking on the Poststructuralists, he argues that “our language is something to write home about: / but it is not the world: grooming does for / baboons most of what words do for us.”

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. A. R. Ammons: Bloom's Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.

Gilbert, Roger, and David Burak, eds. Considering the Radiance: Essays on the Poems of A. R. Ammons. New York: Norton, 2005.

—Marshall Boswell

Anaya, Rudolfo (1937– ) novelist

Rudolfo Anaya was born in Pastura, New Mexico, of Mexican American parents and educated at the University of New Mexico; he received his M.A. degree in 1969. His first novel, Bless Me Ultima (1972), made his reputation. It deals with the social implications of the atomic blast at White Sands, New Mexico. His later work, including Heart of Aztlán (1976) and Tortuga (1979), has been associated with the school of magical realism, a term often used for fiction set in a realistic locale—sometimes described in meticulous historical terms—and yet full of characters and incidents that defy cause-and-effect explanations. His work deeply probes the past of the Southwest, which becomes at once a mythical and a physical reality. Anaya has been active in promoting Chicano literature. He published Cuentos Chicanos: A Short Story Anthology in 1984. His other novels include Albuquerque (1992), Zia Summer (1995), Jalamanta (1996), and Rio Grande Fall (1996). His short stories have been collected in The Silence of the Llano (1982). Later works include Serafina's Stories (2004) and Jemez Spring (2005).

Sources

Dick, Bruce, and Silvio Sirias, eds. Conversations with Rudolfo Anaya. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Vasallo, Paul, ed. The Magic of Words: Rudolfo Anaya and His Writings. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1982.

Anderson, Robert (1917– ) playwright

A New York City native who studied at Harvard, receiving his A.B. and M.A., Robert Woodruff Anderson served in the United States Naval Reserve in WORLD WAR II and turned his experience into a play, Come Marching Home (produced 1946). Perhaps because it dealt with the public life of the main character, the play lacks the focus on individual relationships that characterized Anderson's later plays. His two most important and best-known plays are Tea and Sympathy (1953), a moving depiction of a young boy accused of homosexuality, and I Never Sang for My Father (1968), a melancholy drama of a father-son conflict. Anderson's screenplay for the latter won him an Academy Award nomination in 1970.

Source

Adler, Thomas P. Robert Anderson. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Angelou, Maya (1928– ) autobiographer, poet

*Lift up your eyes upon
The day breaking for you.
Give birth again
To the dream.*

—“On the Pulse of Morning” (1993)

Maya Angelou was born Marguerite Johnson in St. Louis, Missouri. Her parents divorced when she was three, and she was brought up by her grandmother in dreadfully racist Stamps, Arkansas. At the age of seven, during a visit with her mother in St. Louis, she was raped by her mother's boyfriend, who was beaten to death by uncles when Maya revealed the rapist's name. She was so distraught by this outcome that she refused to speak for the next five years, and did not regain her voice until she was thirteen and living again with her grandmother in Stamps. After graduating from the eighth grade she joined her mother in San Francisco. Shortly thereafter her father took her and her siblings into his custody, but Maya soon ran away, returning to her mother's care just before graduating from high school, by which time she had already given birth to her first son. These facts form the basis for her first and most famous autobiography, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings (1970). When she was thirty, she joined the Harlem Writers Guild, where she met James BALDWIN and Paule MARSHALL. She was encouraged to tell her life story by Judy Feiffer, the wife of cartoonist Jules Feiffer. I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and has become a classic of American literature for its lyrical style, its candor about a young woman's life, and its grappling with issues of African American identity. Angelou has published several more volumes of autobiography that deal with her life as a mature woman: Gather Together in My Name (1974), Singin' and Swingin' and Gettin' Merry Like Christmas (1976), The Heart of a Woman (1981), All God's Children Need Traveling Shoes (1986), and A Song Flung up to Heaven (2002). She has also published poetry, including Just Give Me a Cool Drink 'fore I Diie (1971), which won the Pulitzer Prize; Oh Pray My Wings Are Gonna Fit Me Well (1975); And Still I Rise (1978); and I Shall Not Be Moved (1990). In 1977 Angelou received an Emmy nomination for her role in the television dramatization of Alex HALEY's ROOTS, and she has been awarded some thirty honorary degrees. President William J. Clinton commissioned her to write "On the Pulse of Morning," which she read at his 1993 inauguration.

Sources

Angelou, Maya. Conversations with Maya Angelou, edited by Jeffrey M. Elliott. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989.
 Bloom, Harold, ed. Maya Angelou. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2001.
 Lupton, Mary Jane. Maya Angelou: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.
 Official Maya Angelou website: <<http://www.mayaangelou.com>> (viewed December 18, 2006).

Angels in America by Tony Kushner (part one, Millennium Approaches, produced 1990; part two, Perestroika, produced 1992) play

Tony KUSHNER's two-part play, Angels in America: A Gay Fantasia on National Themes, is a seven-hour drama about AIDS and the lack of government intervention during the early years of the epidemic. The play's main character is Prior Walter, a gay man living in Manhattan, who is one of the first to contract AIDS at a time when the disease is mysterious and treatment options are few. The play also follows the fates of a group of characters in Prior's orbit, particularly his former lover, Louis, who still loves Prior but who cannot bring himself to deal with Prior's illness; and Joe, a Republican Mormon who struggles with his own closeted homosexuality. The complete play appeared on Broadway in 1993, and was presented as a six-hour program on HBO in 2003.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Tony Kushner. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.
 Fisher, James. The Theater of Tony Kushner. Oxford: Routledge, 2002.
 Kushner, Tony. Angels in America, Part I: Millennium Approaches. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1993.
 Kushner. Angels in America, Part II: Perestroika. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1994.

—Marshall Boswell

Antrim, Donald (1958– ) novelist, memoirist

Selected by The New Yorker in June 1999 as one of the "20 writers for the 21st Century," Donald Antrim was born in New York in 1958. His first novel, Elect Mr. Robinson for a Better World (1993), is a slim but replete absurdist satire of civic duty and contemporary chaos that earned him comparisons to Donald BARTHELME and Don DELILLO. The follow-up, The Hundred Brothers (1997), is another brief but burgeoning work of surreal whimsy, about a hundred contentious brothers preparing for an annual meal. The novel was nominated for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. His most recent works include The Verificationist (2000), which chronicles a psychologist's out-of-body experience while dining in a pancake house, and The Afterlife (2006), a searing memoir about his relationship with his alcoholic mother.

Source

Bolt, Thomas. "Donald Antrim," BOMB, 58 (Winter 1997): 26–29.

—Marshall Boswell

Apple, Max (1941– ) novelist, memoirist, screenwriter

Max Apple was born in Grand Rapids, Michigan, in 1941 and received both his B.A. and Ph.D. degrees from the University of Michigan (in 1963 and 1970, respectively). He first came to prominence with his 1976 short-story collection, The Oranging of America, the title piece from which features as its protagonist hotel mogul Howard Johnson, who travels the country waiting for his sixth sense to tell him where to erect the next Howard Johnson's hotel franchise. Apple is the author of five additional books, including two memoirs, I Love Gootie: My Grandmother's Story (1998) and Roommates: My Grandfather's Story (1994), the latter of which was made into a successful motion picture for which Apple wrote the screenplay. He taught for twenty-nine years at Rice University before moving to the University of Pennsylvania in 2001 to begin teaching at the Kelly Writers House.

Sources

Hundley, Patrick D. "Triggering the Imagination: An Interview with Max Apple," Southwest Review, 64 (Summer 1979): 230–237.

Wilde, Alan. "Max Apple and the American Nightmare," Critique: Studies in Contemporary Fiction, 30 (Fall 1988): 27–47.

—Marshall Boswell

Arendt, Hannah (1906–1975) essayist, political philosopher

Hannah Arendt was born in Hanover, Germany, and educated at Marburg University, where she studied under the philosopher Martin Heidegger. Arendt fled from the Nazis and immigrated to the United States in 1941. Sensitive to the complexities of the modern world, she became one of a forceful group of European thinkers who found refuge in America, especially in New York and Los Angeles. Arendt was befriended by the New York Intellectuals, particularly by Alfred KAZIN, whose work was influenced by hers, and by Mary McCARTHY, who became Arendt's confidante and promoter. Arendt wrote on the nature of totalitarianism for periodicals such as Partisan Review and in her books Origins of Totalitarianism (1951) and The Human Condition (1958). Her book Eichmann in Jerusalem (1963) grew out of a series of reports for The New Yorker. The work sparked enormous controversy and debate after she coined the phrase "banality of evil" to characterize the Nazi official Adolf Eichmann's rather bland and seemingly matter-of-fact defense of his crimes that he was merely carrying out orders from his superiors. She also became a center of controversy for suggesting that the Jews of Europe did not do enough to forestall the Holocaust.

Sources

Hinchman, Lewis P., and Sandra K. Hinchman, eds. Hannah Arendt: Critical Essays. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

Kristeva, Julia. Hannah Arendt, translated by Ross Guberman. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Young-Bruehl, Elisabeth. Hannah Arendt: For Love of the World. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1982.

Ariel by Sylvia Plath (London: Faber & Faber, 1965; New York: Harper & Row, 1966)

Published posthumously following the poet's suicide, Ariel is one of American literature's most significant works of CONFESSIONAL POETRY. The poems express, with cool, controlled violence, the poet's anguish and rage about the stultifying trap of motherhood, her father's death, and her own suicidal depression.

Plath began writing poetry seriously after her marriage to English poet Ted Hughes, whom she had met while on a Fulbright scholarship to Cambridge University in 1955. In 1960, while teaching at Smith College, her alma mater, she completed her first collection, The Colossus (1960). She then returned to England with Hughes, during which time she suffered a miscarriage, an appendectomy, and a difficult second pregnancy. In the final months before her suicide, she wrote the forty-three poems that make up Ariel. According to Robert LOWELL, a friend and mentor who wrote the book's original introduction, Plath sometimes wrote two or three poems in a day.

Several of the individual pieces in Ariel have become part of the American poetic canon. "Lady Lazarus" deals frankly with her two prior suicide attempts while eerily broadcasting a third. "Dying / is an art," she writes, "like everything else. / I do it extremely well." "Cut" and "Lesbos" provide lurid and unforgettable portraits of female domestic ennui, while "Daddy," the collection's most notorious poem, makes invidious comparisons between the loss of her domineering German father and the Holocaust.

Source

Wagner, Linda W., ed. Critical Essays on Sylvia Plath. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Ashbery, John (1927– ) poet

Chiefly his reflection, of which the portrait

Is the reflection, of which the portrait

Is the reflection once removed.

The glass chose to reflect only what he saw

Which was enough for his purpose: his image. . . .

—Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror (1975)

Over the last half-century John Ashbery has gone from being a leading member of the New York School of Poets to being hailed as the father of Postmodern poetry.

Born in Rochester, New York, Ashbery grew up in a mostly rural area near Lake Ontario. He received his B.A. from Harvard in 1949 and received his M.A. from Columbia University two years later. His master's thesis analyzed the work of English Modernist novelist Henry Green, whose lean, dialogue-driven novels have exerted a powerful influence on such postwar novelists as William GADDIS and John UPDIKE. After spending 1955 to 1957 in France on a Fulbright fellowship, Ashbery returned to Paris in 1958 and remained there until 1965, writing art criticism for Art Forum and the Herald Tribune.

During this period Ashbery produced his influential early poems, which were collected in such volumes as Some Trees (1956) and The Tennis Court Oath (1962). In these poems, Ashbery drew upon his interest in Abstract Expressionist painting, particularly that of Jackson Pollock, Willem de Kooning, and Mark Rothko (see ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM). Like those painters, Ashbery sought to create fresh new vistas of meaning via juxtaposition and disjunction. This early work allied him to the work of the New York School of Poets, which also included Frank O'HARA and Kenneth KOCH.

Ashbery decisively transcended his early categorization with his triumphant 1975 collection SELF-PORTRAIT IN A CONVEX MIRROR, the title piece from which has become one of the signature Postmodern poems in the American literary canon. The poem's title refers to a painting by sixteenth-century Italian painter Francesco Parmigianino, whose own self-portrait retains the distortions produced by the convex mirror via which he views his face. Similarly, Ashbery explores the degrees to which representation distorts, and renders inaccessible, the thing represented. The book went on to win the Pulitzer Prize, the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD.

Ashbery has built upon that triumph, and has emerged as one of the key American poets of the postwar period. He cites the work of W. H. Auden and Wallace Stevens as key influences, while many of his professional readers see his work as conterminous with that of such postwar theorists as Jacques Derrida and Jacques Lacan. His poems often explore the shifting instability of the interior, and just as often foreground the act of representation itself. Critics have also described his musical, opaque work as dreamlike in its apparent illogic.

His major works after Self-Portrait include his collection Houseboat Days (1977), the long poem "A Wave" (1984, the eponymous collection won the Lenore Marshall Poetry Prize, and his stream-of-consciousness epic Flow Chart (1991). His Selected Poems was published in 1984. During the academic year 1989–1990 he was appointed the Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard University, a position formerly held by T. S. Eliot, Thornton Wilder, Igor Stravinsky, E. E. Cummings, Aaron Copeland, Jorge Luis Borges, and others. The six lectures Ashbery delivered during that tenure have been collected in Other Traditions (2000). His twenty-third collection of poetry, Where Shall I Wander, was published in 2005, as was his Selected Prose.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. John Ashbery: A Comprehensive Research and Study Guide. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Shapiro, David. John Ashbery: An Introduction to the Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1979.

Vincent, John Emil. John Ashbery and You: His Later Books. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2007.

—Marshall Boswell

Asian American Literature

In the years following WORLD WAR II, Asian American literature revealed a stark split between the writings of artists with roots in China and those of Japanese ancestry. The internment of more than ten thousand Japanese Americans following the 1941 bombing of Pearl Harbor was the decisive event shaping many Japanese Americans' ambivalent response to their double-voiced position in the postwar American landscape. One of the most significant Asian American novels of the this period, John OKADA's No-No Boy (1957), recounts the identity crisis of a young man named Ichiro following his internment in a prison camp after having answered "no" to two questions regarding his willingness to serve as a U.S. soldier in World War II. Conversely, Monica Sone's 1953 memoir, Nisei Daughter (that is, daughter of first-generation immigrants), tempers its anger about her own experience in a Seattle internment camp with a more accommodating call for assimilation.

Much of the work produced by Chinese American writers in the immediate postwar period continued the tradition of the "Chinatown book" of the earlier part of the century. This genre of writing comprised fiction, autobiography, and reportage that detailed the conditions of Chinese family life in segregated Chinese communities throughout the United States. Two of the more prominent memoirs in this genre are Pardee Lowe's Father and Glorious Descendant (1943) and Jade Snow Wong's Fifth Chinese Daughter (1950), both of which were regarded by their white publishers as autobiographical works by "loyal minorities." Similarly, such fictional works as Lin Yutang's Chinatown Family (1948) and C. Y. Lee's Flower Drum Song (1957) provided vivid, if also somewhat idealized, portraits of the Chinese American family experience. Louis CHU's Eat a Bowl of Tea (1961) suggested a shift in sensibilities as it depicted the twilight years of the Chinatown "Bachelor Society" of the 1940s and 1950s, which comprised married immigrants who worked as waiters and laundrymen and sent their earnings back to their wives in China.

In 1974 this tidy demarcation of Asian Americans into two neatly proscribed units was decisively exploded by the publication of Aiiieeeee! An Anthology of Asian American Writers, edited by Frank Chin, Jeffrey Paul Chan, Lawson Inada, and Shawn Wong. In the introduction the editors explained their choice of a title with these words:

Our anthology is exclusively Asian American. That means Filipino, Chinese, and Japanese Americans, American born and raised, who got their China and Japan from the radio, off the silver screen, from television, out of comic books, from the pushers of white American culture that pictured the yellow man as something that when wounded, sad, or angry, or swearing, or wondering whined, shouted, or screamed “aiiiieee!” Asian America, so long ignored and forcibly excluded from creative participation in American culture, is wounded, sad, angry, swearing, and wondering, and this is his AIIIEEEEE!!!

Published in the wake of the civil rights movement but also amid increasing interest in literature focusing on ethnic differences, Aiiieeeee! introduced many readers for the first time to the complexities and agonies of the Asian American experience. The anthology also inaugurated a new spirit of openness and political engagement among Asian American writers, who now felt they had a voice and a directive to redress narrow racist assumptions about their unique American journey.

This new air of political engagement and frankness was best typified by the work of Maxine Hong KINGSTON, whose first book, The Woman Warrior: Memoirs of a Girlhood among Ghosts (1976), was a bitter but elegant account of the author’s childhood experiences as a Chinese American. The book won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, and, almost overnight, changed the face of Asian American literature. Her subsequent works, the sequel China Men (1980) and the novel The Tripmaster Monkey (1989), were equally successful, winning the National Book Critics Circle Award and the PEN West Award for fiction, respectively. Another California native, Amy TAN, made her publishing debut in 1989 with THE JOY LUCK CLUB, a best-selling novel about Chinese mothers and their more-assimilated daughters. Tan followed this triumph with a run of best-sellers that includes The Kitchen God’s Wife (1991), The Hundred Secret Senses (1995), and The Bonesetter’s Daughter (2001), all of which in various ways explore the complexities of Asian American assimilation within the broad umbrella of mother-daughter relationships. In 1995 Tan and Kingston were joined by Chang-rae LEE, whose debut novel, Native Speaker, a complex novel about a Korean American living in New York City who must come to terms not only with his divided cultural identity but also his clandestine life as a spy, won the PEN/Hemingway Award, the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD, and the ALA Book of the Year Award. Ha JIN won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for his lyrical novel, Waiting (1999), a tightly woven story about a married Chinese army doctor’s unconsummated love for another woman.

Several prominent Asian American dramatists emerged in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and as such helped transform American theater. David HWANG’s FOB, which appeared in 1978, followed a group of Chinese immigrants “fresh off the boat” as they try to assimilate into American culture. In 1988 Hwang won a Tony Award after the extraordinary success of M. Butterfly, which later became an equally successful motion picture. Other prominent Asian American playwrights from the same generation include R. A. Shiomi, Wakako Yamauchi, and Philip Gotanda.

Eric Chock’s poetry collection Ten Thousand Wishes (1978), like Kingston’s groundbreaking memoir, helped inaugurate a new interest in Asian American poets, and was quickly followed by such works as Fay Chiang’s In the City of Contradictions (1979), Amy Ling’s Chinamerica Reflections (1984), and David MURA’s After We Lost Our Way (1989). Perhaps the most celebrated new Asian American poet is Li-Young LEE, whose second collection, The City in Which I Love You (1990), was the 1990 Lamont Poetry Selection.

The Asian American Writers Workshop, a nonprofit arts organization, was established in 1991 in New York City, and in 1998 it initiated a set of annual literary awards in the general categories of fiction, poetry, nonfiction, and drama. The first Asian American Book Festival was held in Los Angeles in May 2007.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Asian-American Writers. New York: Chelsea House, 1999.
- Chicago Public Library. Asian American Writers: A Selected List: <http://chipublib.org/001hwlc/litlists/asian\_american.html> (viewed May 20, 2007).
- Chin, Frank, Jeffery Paul Chan, Lawson F. Inada, and Shawn H. Wong, eds. Aiiieeeee! An Anthology of Asian American Writers. Washington D.C.: Howard University Press, 1974.
- Kim, Elaine H. Asian American Literature: An Introduction to the Writings and Their Social Context. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1982.
- Trudeau, Lawrence, ed. Asian American Literature: Reviews and Criticisms of Works by American Writers of Asian Descent. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Asimov, Isaac (1920–1992) novelist

One can easily gain the reputation of being an eccentric or to use a more professional word, “a nut.” Now it is all right for me to be a nut; I have been one for many, many years now, and I am used to it.

—MLA forum (1968)

By the time Isaac Asimov was three he had moved with his family from Russia to Brooklyn, where his father opened a candy store. Asimov went to high school in Brooklyn and studied chemistry at Columbia University, earning a Ph.D. in 1948. He worked as a chemist in the navy during WORLD WAR II and taught afterward at Boston University’s School of Medicine, where he became an associate professor in 1955.

Asimov began writing science fiction in the late 1930s. In 1950 he published his first science-fiction novel, Pebble in the Sky, and by 1958 he was writing full-time. He produced well over four hundred books, including nonfiction titles such as the New Intelligent Man's Guide to Science. He is best known for his science-fiction Foundation Trilogy, loosely based on the history of the Roman Empire.

Like many genre writers, Asimov constructed intricate, well-made plots but rarely explored human character or psychology to any great degree. His work emphasizes how worlds are constructed, maintained, and destroyed. Among his noteworthy books are I, Robot (1950), Foundation (1951), Foundation and Empire (1952), Second Foundation (1953), The Martian Way, and Other Stories (1955), Fantastic Voyage (1966), Buy Jupiter and Other Stories (1975), The Bicentennial Man and Other Stories (1976), Foundation's Edge (1982), Foundation and Earth (1986), Prelude to Foundation (1988), and Robot Visions (1990). Asimov expanded the range of subjects in science fiction, grounding the genre in modern science. He also wrote several children's books, including David Starr: Space Ranger (1952), Lucky Starr and the Rings of Saturn (1958), and Limericks for Children (1984). His autobiography, It's Been a Good Life (2002), was edited from a 2,100-page draft manuscript by his second wife, Janet Asimov.

Sources

- Asimov, Janet. Notes for a Memoir: On Isaac Asimov, Life, and Writing. Amherst: Prometheus, 2006.
- Gunn, James E. Isaac Asimov: The Foundations of Science Fiction. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Touponce, William F. Isaac Asimov. Boston: Twayne, 1991.
- White, Michael. Asimov: The Unauthorised Life. London: Millennium, 1994.

The Assistant by Bernard Malamud (New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1957) novel

Bernard MALAMUD's second novel chronicles the spiritual redemption of a Catholic thief who falls under the positive influence of a benevolent Jewish storekeeper named Morris Bober and his lovely daughter, Helen.

Not long after Morris's struggling store is robbed, a hungry young man named Frank Alpine appears at Morris's doorstep looking for work. Although Morris does not offer Frank a job, he soon learns that Frank has been living in the store's basement, stealing milk and bread each morning. When Morris suffers a head injury one day while dragging in milk canisters, Frank takes over the store and substantially improves business. Eventually, the reader learns that Frank was one of the robbers from earlier in the novel. Frank hopes to compensate for his transgression by working gratis at the store. Further complications arise when Frank falls in love with Helen. One night, after Frank saves Helen from nearly being raped, he assaults her as well, and Morris dismisses him from the store. After Morris dies shortly thereafter, Frank takes over the store, helps pay for Helen's college tuition, and, on the book's final page, has himself circumcised and becomes a Jew.

Malamud has famously said, "All men are Jews." As such, Morris Bober remains Malamud's most memorable Jewish Everyman, a long-suffering schlemiel whose dignity in the face of hardship functions as a moral example for Gentile and Jew alike. With its brisk storytelling and fable-like simplicity of theme, The Assistant is a characteristic work of Malamud's rich corpus.

Source

- Helterman, Jeffrey. Understanding Bernard Malamud. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1985.

—Marshall Boswell

Auchincloss, Louis (1917– ) novelist

I've written about the headmaster of a New England school, a world famous psychologist, about an embezzler. I've written about the things in my lifetime that have had an impact on the culture.

—Interview (2004)

Louis Auchincloss was born in Lawrence, New York, and educated at private schools. He attended Yale University and graduated from the University of Virginia law school in 1941. He served in the navy during WORLD WAR II, but otherwise has lived in New York City, practicing law and writing. Auchincloss writes about the descendants of the New World aristocrats that Edith Wharton and Henry James portrayed in their fiction. Like Wharton, Auchincloss has an anthropological interest in people's manners and in their codes of behavior. His approach to psychology differs from James's in that his main focus seems to be the story rather than the consciousness of its narrator. Auchincloss's twenty-nine novels include Portrait in Brownstone (1962), The Rector of Justin (1964), Diary of a Yuppie (1986), Three Lives (1993), and East Side Story (2004). His highly regarded short stories are collected in fourteen volumes, including The Romantic Egoists (1954), The Winthrop Covenant (1967), and Manhattan Monologues (2002). He has written about other writers in Edith Wharton (1961), Ellen Glasgow (1964), Henry Adams (1971), and Reading Henry James (1975). Auchincloss's A Writer's Capital (1974) tells the story of his life in terms of his literary career, and his handling of dual careers in law and literature is recounted in Life, Law, and Letters: Essays and Sketches (1979). His twenty-three volumes of nonfiction include biographies of Richelieu (1972), J. P. Morgan (1990), Woodrow Wilson (2000), and Theodore Roosevelt (2001).

Sources

- Gelderman, Carol W. Louis Auchincloss: A Writer's Life. New York: Crown, 1993.
- Parsell, David B. Louis Auchincloss. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

The Autobiography of Malcolm X by Malcolm X with Alex Haley (New York: Grove, 1965)
autobiography

Published to great public interest immediately following Malcolm X's assassination in 1965, his autobiography, as shaped by Alex HALEY, is less an account of one man's life than an epic story of mythic transformation. Forty years after it first appeared, it remains a timely and incendiary work of cultural analysis, offering an account of white racism that is militant and provocative.

The book opens with an account of Malcolm's pregnant mother being harassed by the Ku Klux Klan. From there, the book is unremitting in its details of the hero's struggle against the racist structure of American culture. His father, a Baptist preacher and outspoken proponent of Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association, is violently murdered by a white mob, and Malcolm is soon placed in a white foster home, only to end up in juvenile detention. The book continues to chronicle Malcolm's experiences as a street hustler, a convict, a Harlem zoot-suiter, a jailhouse convert to the Nation of Islam, and a prominent black nationalist.

Alex Haley, the book's ostensible author, constructed the narrative from extensive interviews he held with Malcolm X, and yet Haley goes beyond mere transcription. Rather, Haley reconstructs Malcolm's life into an archetypal hero quest. Malcolm X emerges from the book's pages as a flawed but heroic figure of dynamic contradiction and genuine passion. The book assiduously traces Malcolm's striking intellectual transformation, as he moves from mere distrust of whites to militant hatred according to the doctrines of the Nation of Islam. By the end of the book, after detailing his extensive travels throughout the Islamic world, Malcolm reveals himself to be a thoughtful, sophisticated, and more tolerant critic of American racism. What's more, Haley informs the book with a novelistic, narrative flair. The sections set in Harlem, in particular, recall, in both setting and tone, the New York sections in Ralph ELLISON's novel, INVISIBLE MAN (1952). Similarly, the section devoted to Malcolm's "religious awakening," which occurred while he was serving a ten-year prison term for burglary, recalls famous religious-conversion narratives from the past, particularly The Confessions of St. Augustine.

The book remains a significant portrait of a conflicted, protean, and searching American. The book also complicates the conventional wisdom whereby Malcolm X is viewed as the violent antithesis to Martin Luther King and his tradition of "passive resistance." The final sections, which are haunted by brooding premonitions of Malcolm's own murder, also signal a potentially fruitful future hauntingly cut short. Near the end of the book, Malcolm proclaims, "I would just like to study. I mean ranging study, because I have a wide-open mind."

Source

Bloom, Harold, ed. Alex Haley and Malcolm X's Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Chelsea House, 1996.

—Marshall Boswell

B

Bache, Benjamin Franklin (1769–1798) editor

Newspaper editor Benjamin Bache was the son of Richard and Sarah Franklin Bache and the grandson of Benjamin FRANKLIN. Born in Philadelphia in 1769, Bache traveled to Europe with his grandfather in 1776 and attended school in both Paris and Geneva. He returned to the newly independent United States in 1785 and enrolled in the University of Pennsylvania. Known to his family as “Benny,” he was often referred to by friends and enemies alike as “Lightning Rod, Junior,” a salute to his grandfather and a comment on his fiery style.

In 1790 the twenty-one-year-old Bache established a newspaper, the General Advertiser (1790–1794). He published a continuation of the same paper, subtitled the AURORA, from 1794 to 1798. Bache was quickly acknowledged as one of the most innovative, powerful, and controversial journalists of the day.

An ardent supporter of Thomas JEFFERSON, Bache attacked the FEDERALIST leadership in the pages of his newspaper, criticizing both President George WASHINGTON and his successor, John ADAMS, whom he called “Bonny Johnny.” In his editorials he condemned the Jay Treaty of 1794, negotiated to prevent war with Great Britain, and praised the activities of “Citizen Genet” (Edmund-Charles Genet; 1763–1834), a French diplomat who defied Washington in order to recruit American military and naval supporters for the French revolutionary cause. Bache frequently published articles by Thomas Jefferson and James MADISON, giving the Democratic-Republicans an outlet for their views on a wide variety of political topics. Bache’s characterization of the Federalists as the moneyed aristocracy determined to betray the people and their French allies did little to ease the political tensions of the decade.

Bache’s coverage of political news set a standard for other editors. He was the first to report in depth on the congressional debates. The extreme partisanship of his editorials, however, contrasted with his integrity as a news reporter; he filled his editorial pages with letters to the editor that he himself wrote. The Federalists acknowledged the threat he posed and threw their support behind William Cobbett (1763–1835), whose Porcupine’s Gazette was founded to present their perspective in the press. Bache’s unswerving support of France despite revelations that French officials had demanded bribes from the American diplomats in Paris lost him advertisers during the last years of his editorship of the Aurora. He was assaulted twice, and his printing shop was attacked by a rock-throwing mob.

As Bache’s popularity fell, Federalists moved to silence him. On the day the Sedition Act of 1798 was introduced in the Senate, Federalists ordered his arrest for “libelling the President & the Executive Government, in a manner tending to excite sedition.” Before the trial could take place, however, Bache contracted the yellow fever that was raging in Philadelphia. He died after a six-day illness, leaving behind his wife, Margaret Hartman Markoe Bache, and their young son, Franklin.

Works

Bache, Benjamin Franklin. Remarks Occasioned by the Late Conduct of Mr. Washington, as President of the United States. Philadelphia: Printed for Benjamin Franklin Bache, 1797; Early American Imprints, 31759.

Bache. Truth Will Out! The Foul Charges of the Tories against the Editor of the Aurora Repelled by Positive Proof and Plain Truth, and His Base Calumniators Put to Shame. . . . Philadelphia, 1798; Chicago: Library Resources, 1970.

Sources

Pasley, Jeffrey L. The Tyranny of Printers: Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Smith, Jeffery Alan. Franklin and Bache: Envisioning the Enlightened Republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Tagg, James. Benjamin Franklin Bache and the Philadelphia Aurora. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.

Backus, Isaac (1724–1806) historian, minister

Isaac Backus was born into a prosperous family in Norwich, Connecticut. As a boy he worked on the family farm and attended a local school. When the GREAT AWAKENING swept across the colony, Backus was one of the most enthusiastic converts to the New Light faith. He abandoned the Congregationalist Church and formed a separate congregation, where he preached for the first time in 1747. In 1748 he became pastor of a SEPARATIST church in Titicut, Maine. He married Susanna Mason in 1750 and had a family of eight children.

In 1751 Backus became a Baptist, and in 1756 he helped form the First Baptist Church of Middleborough, Massachusetts. He served as pastor of this church for the rest of his life, emerging as the leading Baptist spokesperson in the colony. As the AMERICAN REVOLUTION began, Backus urged John ADAMS and other Massachusetts delegates to the First Continental Congress to speak out against an established church in the new nation. An untiring preacher, Backus traveled more than one thousand miles a year to deliver nearly two hundred sermons annually, earning him the nickname, “pulpit of the American Revolution.”

Backus’s History of New England, with Particular Reference to the Denomination of Christians Called Baptists (1777, 1784, 1796) is a scholarly three-volume work on New England in the colonial period. In sermons such as An Appeal to the Public for Religious Liberty, against the Oppressions of the Present Day (1773) and The Doctrine of Sovereign Grace Opened and Vindicated (1771), Backus helped to explain and define the Baptist faith and presented his views on adult baptism, the separation of church and state, and the meaning of grace. Backus concludes An Appeal to the Public for Religious Liberty:

Has it not been plainly proved, that so far as any man gratifies his own inclinations, without regard to the universal law of equity, so far he is in bondage? so that it is impossible for any one to tyrannize over others, without thereby becoming a miserable slave himself: a slave to raging lusts, and a slave to guilty fears of what will be the consequence.

Backus’s tendency toward tolerance has often been compared to that of Roger WILLIAMS. A critic of clergy with “pretended knowledge,” Backus argued that a college education alone did not qualify a man for the pulpit, and he defended the right of laypeople to interpret religious issues themselves. Backus died on November 20, 1806.

Works

Backus, Isaac. A History of New England, with Particular Reference to the Baptists. 3 volumes. Boston: Printed by Edward Draper, 1777–1796; revised 1871; New York: Arno, 1969; Early American Imprints, 15240.

Backus. Isaac Backus on Church, State, and Calvinism: Pamphlets, 1754–1789, edited by William G. McLoughlin. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1968.

Backus. The Diary of Isaac Backus. 3 volumes, edited by McLoughlin. Providence, R.I.: Brown University Press, 1979.

Sources

Grenz, Stanley. Isaac Backus—Puritan and Baptist: His Place in History, His Thought, and Their Implications for Modern Baptist Theology. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1983.

McLoughlin, William Gerald. Isaac Backus and the American Pietistic Tradition, edited by Oscar Handlin. Boston: Little, Brown, 1967.

Ballad

A ballad is a song or a poem that presents a dramatic narrative of a heroic character or a significant cultural event, sometimes with musical accompaniment. It may also refer to a light song to accompany a dance. These songs may be further categorized as “folk ballads,” which relate popular tales about common people, or as “romantic ballads,” which tell of love and courtship. Ballad verses in song may evolve and be revised over time with a standardized refrain or chorus. Ballads composed for song, moreover, differ from poetry in its written form; the ballad stanza or ballad meter traditionally consists of four lines (a quatrain) and an abcb rhyming pattern with alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines. As songs, ballads were initially passed along through oral culture and later transcribed and printed. Lucy Terry’s (1730–1821) “Bars Fight,” which depicts a Native American attack on Bars, an area outside of Deerfield, Massachusetts, in 1746 during King George’s War (1744–1748), circulated orally in Vermont until its publication in 1855. In heroic tones, Terry’s ballad begins by establishing the date of the event, “August ’twas the twenty-fifth / Seventeen hundred forty-six,” and then recalls the attack:

*The Indians did in ambush lay,
Some very valiant men to slay,
The names of whom I’ll not leave out.
Samuel Allen like a hero fout.*

Altogether, five people died, one escaped, and Samuel Allen was “taken and carried to Canada.” As with other ballads, “Bars Fight” marks a significant event and, in this particular case, commemorates a town’s loss. Lucy Terry’s “Bars Fight” is also the first known poem by an African American.

Printed as broadsides or appearing in pamphlets, gazettes, and newspapers, ballads became especially popular during the REVOLUTIONARY WAR. The “Ballad of Nathan Hale” (1776), for example, recounts the young soldier’s daring attempt to penetrate enemy lines as General WASHINGTON had requested. Having obtained the information he sought, Hale was captured on his return and questioned by General Howe. When Hale admitted to his mission, the response was swift: “They took him and bound him and bore him away.” Hale’s execution was then set for early the next morning:

*Five minutes were given, short moments, no more,
For him to repent; for him to repent.
He pray’d for his mother, he ask’d not another.*

Another popular Revolutionary War ballad was Francis HOPKINSON’s “The Battle of the Kegs” (1778), set to the tune of “Yankee Doodle,” which describes the Americans’ use of kegs as floating mines, on January 5, 1778. Designed to explode when fired upon, these kegs proved to be successful weapons, “Such feats did they perform that day / Upon these wicked kegs, sir.” The ballad ultimately praises the rebels’ actions, suggesting “That years to come, if they get home, / They’ll make their boasts and brags, sir.” As these examples suggest, ballads honored and commemorated important people and significant events in early America.

Sources

Branham, Robert J. Sweet Freedom’s Song: “My Country” ’Tis of Thee and Democracy in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.

Dugaw, Dianne. The Anglo-American Ballad: A Folklore Casebook. New York: Garland, 1995.

Popular Songs In American History <<http://www.contemplator.com/america/>> (viewed August 18, 2006).

Wilentz, Sean, and Greil Marcus. The Rose & the Briar: Death, Love and Liberty in the American Ballad. New York: Norton, 2005.

Ballard, Martha Moore (1735–1812) diarist

Martha Moore Ballard, a midwife and journal keeper, was born in Oxford, Massachusetts, the daughter of Dorothy and Elijah Moore. Her family valued education for their sons and produced two of the town’s first college graduates; the extent of Martha Moore’s formal education, however, is not known. In 1754, at the age of nineteen, Moore married Ephraim Ballard, a miller and surveyor, and by 1777 she had begun her long career as a midwife and pharmacist in rural Maine.

Although it is possible that Ballard began to keep a record of her activities before 1785, the only known surviving daybook or journal covers the years 1785–1812. Ballard’s daybook was conceived in functional terms, as a means of tracking patients, accounts, tasks, and seasonal household activities. What emerges, however, is an amalgam of several genres. In its meticulous notation of the day and weather, it served as an ALMANAC. As a personal journal, its entries almost always contain the record of places and persons Ballard visited during the day. The book was also a ledger in which she recorded dollar amounts for fees paid or owed in the margins. Finally, the author’s consistent descriptions of symptoms, diagnoses, treatments, and outcomes suggest that she may have been creating an experience-based reference book for her own use.

The daybook contains few complete sentences, and, although personal anecdotes about her family do creep into the record, there is little that reveals Ballard’s emotional or spiritual life. Her language suggests that, as a writer, she was more interested in content than style. An entry from January 6, 1796 concisely conveys a day’s activity:

1 6 At Capt Moses Springers. Mr Swetlands Child Expird. Clear and Pleasant. I washt and washt my kitchen. Was Calld at 9 hour Evening to see the wife of Capt moses Springer who is not so well as Shee could wish. Her husband is gone a trip to Boston. I tarried there all night. Slept some after 1 o Clock.

Ballard’s journal reveals the growing tensions between local male physicians and local female midwives, provides insight into the sexual moral standards in the community, and explains the way in which seasonal changes affected family work patterns. The record of her personal grievances offers an intimate look at the discord that is possible within a frontier family. Specifically, her journal provides a firsthand account of the daily life of white women in eighteenth- and early-nineteenth-century America. Martha Ballard died in May 1812 in Augusta, Maine.

Works

Ballard, Martha. The Diary of Martha Ballard, 1785–1812, edited by Robert R. McCausland and Cynthia MacAlman. Camden, Maine: Picton Press, 1992.

Martha Ballard’s Diary Online: <<http://www.dohistory.org/diary/index.html>> (viewed August 9, 2006).

Source

Ulrich, Laurel T. A Midwife’s Tale: The Life of Martha Ballard, Based on Her Diary, 1785–1812. New York: Knopf, 1990.

Banneker, Benjamin (1731–1806) almanac writer

Benjamin Banneker, a mathematician and astronomer who was primarily self-taught, was born November 9, 1731, in Ellicott's Mills, Maryland. A free black who found support for his talent from the surrounding liberal white Maryland society, Banneker was the grandson of an indentured servant, Molly Welsh, who preferred to be transported to Maryland rather than serve time in an English prison for stealing a pail of milk. When Welsh's term of service ended, she bought a farm and two slaves. She promptly freed the slaves and married one of them. His name was Bannaka, and he said that he had been a prince in his African homeland. Mary, the oldest daughter of Molly Welsh and Bannaka, married a freed slave, Robert, who took the name Robert Banneker. When Robert died in 1737, his oldest son, Benjamin Banneker, inherited his farm, where he lived as a free citizen and a bachelor for most of his life.

Banneker was twenty-two when he took apart a pocket watch, examined its internal mechanisms, and proceeded to construct a wooden clock that chimed the hours and kept time for fifty years. He taught himself to play the flute and the violin, and in his fifties he studied math and astronomy, borrowing books from a friend named George Ellicott. Ellicott recommended that Banneker be appointed surveying assistant of the District of Columbia in 1791. It was Banneker's study of mathematics and astronomy that led him to create his famous ALMANAC, the Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia Almanac and Ephemeris (1791–1802). One of his publishers was a leading Philadelphia abolitionist who, along with the Quaker Ellicott family, helped bring Banneker into the circle of the Maryland Society for the Abolition of Slavery.

In 1791 Banneker sent his almanac to then Secretary of State, Thomas JEFFERSON, along with a letter opposing the continuation of slavery. The letter, dated August 19, 1791, addresses the mistreatment of Africans who have suffered the "abuse and censure of the world" and appeals to Jefferson's sense of justice and the "indispensible duty of those, who maintain for themselves the rights of human nature, and who possess the obligations of Christianity, to extend their power and influence to the relief of every part of the human race, from whatever burden or oppression they may unjustly labor under." In presenting his argument, Banneker evokes the recent struggle for independence: "Sir, suffer me to recal to your mind that time, in which the arms and tyranny of the British crown were exerted, with every powerful effort, in order to reduce you to a state of servitude: look back, I entreat you, on the variety of dangers to which you were exposed; reflect on that time, in which every human aid appeared unavailable."

Jefferson responded: "no body wishes more than I do to see such proofs as you exhibit, that nature has given to our black brethren, talents equal to those of the other colours of men, & that the appearance of a want of them is owing merely to the degraded condition of their existence both in Africa & America." Jefferson sent the almanac to Monsieur de Condorcet, Secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, establishing Banneker's reputation in Europe. Benjamin Banneker died October 25, 1806 in Baltimore, Maryland.

Works

Banneker, Benjamin. Benjamin Banneker's Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia Almanack and Ephemeris, for the Year of Our Lord, 1792. Baltimore: Printed by William Goddard and James Angell, 1791; Early American Imprints, 23148.

The Virginia Almanack, for the Year of Our Lord, 1794 . . . Calculated by that Ingenious Self Taught Astronomer Benjamin Banneker, a Black Man. . . Petersburg, Va.: Printed by William Prentis, 1793; New York: Readex Microprint, 1985.

Sources

Bedini, Silvio A. The Life of Benjamin Banneker: The First African-American Man of Science; revised and enlarged, Baltimore: Maryland Historical Society, 1999.

Cerami, Charles A. Benjamin Banneker: Surveyor, Astronomer, Publisher, Patriot. New York: Wiley, 2002.

Barlow, Joel (1754–1812) poet, merchant, diplomat

*I sing the sweets I know, the charms I feel,
My morning incense and my evening meal —
The sweets of Hasty Pudding.*

—The Hasty-Pudding (1793)

A member of the CONNECTICUT WITS, Joel Barlow was a Yale graduate who became a skilled diplomat and a Jeffersonian Republican. Barlow was born on March 24, 1754 in Redding, Connecticut, to Samuel Barlow, a yeoman farmer, and Esther Hull, his second wife. The fourth of five children from this marriage, Barlow was a student at the local school of the Reverend Nathaniel Bartlett. In 1772, he enrolled in Moor's Indian School, the college preparatory academy directed by Eleazar Wheelock (1711–1779), who found Barlow to be a "middling scholar" possessed of "sober, regular, and good Behavior." Barlow enrolled at Dartmouth College in August 1774, but when his father died shortly thereafter, a modest annuity of about £100 made it possible for Barlow to transfer to Yale College. In the summer of 1775, Barlow's mother died. His studies were again interrupted when war broke out. At the call of the governor of Connecticut, in response to a request by General WASHINGTON, Barlow volunteered to defend Long Island and New York City. The British won the Battle of Long Island, and Barlow returned to Yale, but the exigencies of war forced Yale to send him and others to Glastonbury, near Hartford. When he graduated in 1778, he had completed only four months of his senior curriculum.

Encouraged by fellow students John TRUMBULL and Timothy DWIGHT, Barlow began to write poetry at Yale. He wrote

Portrait of Joel Barlow, 1807, by his friend poems mocking a snowball fight and the undergraduate diet. Barlow was named class poet, and at the college commencement on July 23, 1778 he read The Prospect of Peace, which was immediately published in pamphlet form by a local New Haven printer, Joseph Buckminster. Written in heroic couplets, the poem portrayed America as an exceptional land with a bright future. Undecided about his career path, Barlow tried teaching but returned to Yale to study theology instead. After receiving a master's degree in 1779, Barlow served as chaplain for the Third Massachusetts Brigade from 1780 to 1783. In January 1781, Barlow married Ruth Baldwin in Kensington, Connecticut. In 1779 he wrote to a former tutor at Yale that "the discovery of America made an important revolution in the history of mankind," and "served the purpose of displaying knowledge, liberty, and religion . . . perhaps as much as any human transaction." These ideas became central to Barlow's The Vision of Columbus (1787), a nine-book epic poem about America.
Charles William Peale

Barlow's The Vision of Columbus, a work eight years in the making and composed of five thousand lines of heroic couplets, was finally published in 1787. It depicted a prosperous America where accomplishments in the sciences and philosophy would result in high moral standards and material abundance. The purpose of the poem, Barlow's preface explained, was to tell about the past, present, and future of America and to encourage "the love of national liberty." In the work an angel rescues an imprisoned Christopher COLUMBUS and takes him on a journey, recounting his voyages, describing the development of colonial and Revolutionary America, and predicting a prosperous national future. The poem had an impressive subscription list of 769 names, including King Louis XVI of France (to whom it was dedicated), the Marquis de Lafayette (1757–1834), Benjamin FRANKLIN, George WASHINGTON, Alexander HAMILTON, and approximately two hundred members of the Revolutionary Army. Reviews of The Vision were positive, and Barlow's poem advanced the idea that America was destined to become a transcendent place of peace and prosperity.

The Vision of Columbus opened new prospects for Barlow. In 1788, he became an agent for the Scioto Land Company and sailed for Paris. When the company turned out to be fraudulent, Barlow, though not legally responsible, was stranded in Europe. He began to immerse himself in politics, associating with liberal, pro-Revolutionaries, including Thomas PAINE, Richard Price (1723–1791), Joseph Priestley (1733–1804), Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797), William Godwin (1756–1836), and General Lafayette. During the next seventeen years, Barlow became a persuasive pamphleteer and successful merchant. His Advice to the Privileged Orders in the Several States of Europe Resulting from the Necessity and Propriety of a General Revolution in the Principle of Government (1792–1793), a reply to Edmund Burke's (1729–1797) aristocratic and monarchistic Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), espoused the virtues of the American and French Revolutions. A subsequent work endorsing the French Revolution, A Letter to the National Convention of France, on the Defects in the Constitution of 1791, and the Extent of the Amendments Which Ought to Be Applied (1792), earned Barlow honorary citizenship in France.

In 1793, during an unsuccessful campaign for a seat in the French National Assembly, Barlow was offered his native dish of hasty pudding (or cornmeal mush). The gift prompted the nostalgic, mock-heroic The Hasty-Pudding, which was published in France in 1793 and then in America in 1796. The poem is divided into three cantos of heroic couplets and traces the cultivation, preparation, and eating of this native New England dish: "First in your bowl the milk abundant take, / Then drop with care along the silver lake / Your flakes of pudding; here at first will hide / Their little bulk beneath the swelling tide." The Hasty-Pudding is judged to be one of Barlow's best works.

Barlow returned to America in 1804 after seventeen years abroad. In Prospectus of a National Institution, to Be Established in the United States (1806), he called for the creation of an institution, backed by the federal government, to "combine the two great objects, research and instruction." Although Thomas JEFFERSON and James MADISON urged Barlow to write the history of the United States and offered

Title page for the revised edition of Joel Barlow's epic poem encouraging "true and useful ideas of glory" for Americans him exclusive access to primary materials, Barlow turned his attention instead to The Columbiad (1807), a significantly revised version of The Vision of Columbus.

Barlow expanded the poem from 4,700 lines to 8,350 lines, emphasizing his deistic beliefs and embrace of Jeffersonian Republicanism. Dedicated to his good friend Robert Fulton, who assisted with the engravings, The Columbiad was published in an elaborate, ornately constructed, illustrated volume that cost $10,000 to publish and sold for $20.00 a copy, an exorbitant price for the day. The Columbiad blended exuberance for scientific achievement with millennial hopes for America. Though it was neither an artistic or financial success, the poem has subsequently been valued more for its craft than for its content. Barlow included fewer explicit Christian references than he had in the previous work. For example, the Christian trinity became a "holy triad" of "EQUALITY, FREE ELECTION, and FEDERAL BAND," and he replaced the angel who guided Columbus with the mythological figure of Hesper, the genius of the Western world. Much of the rest of the poem, however, was similar to The Vision of Columbus, including the characters and the scenes. He also developed some of the books, particularly the ones on the Revolutionary War.

In 1811 he was appointed minister to France and urged by President Madison and Secretary of State James Monroe to negotiate a treaty with Napoleon. After twenty-three days and 1,400 miles traveling through war-ravaged Europe, Barlow waited two weeks for Napoleon, who allegedly passed by in the night fearing assassination by his own troops. Written during this interval, Barlow's antiwar poem "Advice to a Raven in Russia," completed in 1812, expresses a passion not often evident in his other material. It begins with the speaker questioning the raven: "Black fool, why winter here? These frozen skies, / Worn by your wings and deafened by your cries, / Should warn you hence, where milder suns invite." When the carnage increases, Napoleon's legacy is made clear: "War after war his hungry soul requires, / State after state shall sink beneath his fires." Of Napoleon he tells the raven, "He'll make you deserts and he'll bring you blood." This was Barlow's last poem. He died of pneumonia in Zarnowiec (near Krakow), Poland, on December 24, 1812.

Work

Barlow, Joel. The Works of Joel Barlow, 2 volumes. Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1970.

Sources

Bernstein, Samuel. Joel Barlow: A Connecticut Yankee in an Age of Revolution. Cliff Island, Maine: Ultima Thule Press, 1985.
Ford, Arthur L. Joel Barlow. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Recommended Writings

The Vision of Columbus (1787)
The Hasty-Pudding (1796)
The Columbiad (1807)
Advice to a Raven in Russia (1812)

Studying Joel Barlow

Joel Barlow is celebrated primarily as a poet, although he also served in the REVOLUTIONARY WAR and had interests in many areas, including positions as a lawyer, journalist, real estate agent, merchant, and diplomat. His multibook poems celebrating America's founding are cast in an epic style, such as the 5,000-line The Vision of Columbus (1787) and the 8,350-line The Columbiad (1807). Poems addressing more-specific social and political issues are equally lyrical and passionate, such as his patriotic poem delivered as Yale class poet, The Prospect of Peace (1778); the politically charged The Conspiracy of Kings; A Poem: Addressed to the Inhabitants of Europe from Another World (1792); and the sharply critical poem about Napoleon, Advice to a Raven in Russia (1812). Although Barlow favored the grand theme and lengthier verse, he is best known for his nostalgic homage to corn pudding, The Hasty-Pudding (1793).

Students interested in Barlow's life should begin with James Woodress's A Yankee's Odyssey: The Life of Joel Barlow (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1958). Students interested in Barlow's life as a diplomat should consult Bernstein's Joel Barlow: A Connecticut Yankee in an Age of Revolution. For historical and critical contexts, see Emory Elliott's Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic 1725–1810 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982) and William C. Dowling's Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990). For a recently released reproduction of the Columbiad and a study of Barlow as an epic poet, see Steven Blakemore's Joel Barlow's Columbiad: A Bicentennial Reading (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2007). Those interested in more-advanced study should examine the Joel Barlow papers housed at the Houghton Library, Harvard College Library, Harvard University. Selected poems by Barlow are included on The Academy of American Poets website (<<http://www.poets.org>> viewed May 15, 2007).

Barnard, John (1681–1770) minister

John Barnard, a Congregationalist minister, was the son of John and Esther Barnard, a couple who guided their son toward the ministry. Born November 6, 1681, he became not only a minister but also one recognized for his outstanding ability to sermonize—a talent that has secured his legacy to this day. Barnard was a precocious child and tutored other children in grammar school. He entered HARVARD in 1696, graduating in 1700.

His sermons show him to be a man who believed in the power of human reason and in the wisdom of moderation in all aspects of life. His philosophy, he said, was “zeal guided by knowledge, tempered with prudence, and accomplished with charity.” In The Hazard and the Unprofitableness of Losing a Soul for the Sake of Gaining the World (1712), a sermon preached to the Massachusetts assembly on the day of the governor's election, Barnard reminded the political leaders that although government comes from God, the form it takes is based on human choice. Only a government based on reason and understanding, he argued, was a godly government.

In his election sermon of 1734, The Throne Established by Righteousness, he presaged ENLIGHTENMENT theory of government as a contract between rulers and the people. He maintained that government was ordained by God and must be implemented by the people. Political positions must go to those with ability and merit—“able men”—who would ensure that the laws were good for the community.

The strain of Protestantism to which the MATHER family belonged taught that human beings could do nothing by way of good works to achieve their own salvation from sin and eternal damnation. In their view Barnard's undue emphasis on good works as a path to salvation spread a dangerous and potentially heretical idea. Barnard believed that the temporary animosity of the powerful Mather family was blocking his career. Stymied in his efforts to attain his own church, Barnard took a post as chaplain to New England's 1707 expedition against the French at Port Royal, Canada and then spent some years as the chaplain aboard a ship sailing the Caribbean. In 1716 he found a permanent post at the church in Marblehead, Massachusetts, a post he held until his death. There, in 1719, he married Anna Woodbury.

When the GREAT AWAKENING swept over NEW ENGLAND, Barnard kept his Marblehead congregation within the Old Light or anti-evangelical fold. He urged his congregation to temper their enthusiasm with reason. His own sermons were characterized by his commitment to reason, and his message remained constant: in a godly community, the people, the church, and the government cooperated to encourage and reward hard work, frugality, and useful labor and to suppress idleness, waste, fraud, deceit and dishonesty. Barnard set an example of this Protestant ethic, working in his spare time as a carpenter and shipbuilder. He died January 24, 1770.

Works

Barnard, John. The Nature and Manner of Man's Blessing God; with Our Obligations Thereto. Boston: Printed by T. Crump for Samuel Gerrish, 1717; Early American Imprints, 1865.

Barnard. A Proof of Jesus Christ His Being the Ancient Promised Messiah. . . . Boston: Printed by J. Draper, 1756; Early American Imprints, 7616.

Barnard. The Religion of Antichrist: or, Notes on the Book of the Revelation of John, and other Prophecies; Respecting the Rise, Reign, Religion, and Ruin, of the Man of Sin. London: John Chater, 1770. Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1985.

Bartram, John (1699–1777) botanist

John Bartram, the first native-born American botanist, was born March 23, 1699, in Marple, Pennsylvania, to William Bartram and Elizabeth Hunt, QUAKER farmers. The death of his mother in 1701 and the remarriage and relocation of his father left Bartram in the care of his grandmother and his uncle Isaac Bartram. Although he departed from the more orthodox strain of Quakerism by rejecting pacifism, Bartram remained a practicing Quaker his entire life. He publicly declared his strong opposition to slavery by freeing his own slaves. Bartram's place in American letters was secured through his scientific explorations and his correspondence and through several important books describing the plant and animal life of the North American eastern seaboard. In 1723 Bartram married Mary Maris, with whom he had two sons. He was widowed in 1727 and married Anne Mendenhall in 1729; the couple had nine children, including a third son, William (see William BARTRAM), who continued Bartram's botanical studies.

A successful farmer, Bartram sold the farm he had inherited from his uncle in 1728 and purchased 102 acres along the Schuylkill River in Kingsessing, near Philadelphia. He used this land as his home and as a test farm for his experiments in hybridizing. Lacking a formal education, Bartram was primarily a self-taught botanist. He had obtained a basic knowledge of science by working as a physician and pharmacist, and early in his career he had become interested in plants that had medicinal qualities.

In 1733 Bartram initiated what would become a long-term correspondence with the English botanist Peter Collinson (1694–1768). Although they never met, Bartram and Collinson became friends and constantly exchanged information and seeds through the mail. Seeds provided by Bartram to Collinson served as the first source of native American plants to English and continental greenhouses. The information he provided in his letters to Collinson found its way to the leading scientists and botanists in England and continental Europe, and his correspondence grew to include the Swedish botanist Carolus Linnaeus (1707–1778). Bartram's home in Kingsessing also became a major site for visitors interested in botany and science, including Benjamin FRANKLIN and George WASHINGTON.

Bartram frequently took field trips during which he collected specimens of plant life. His trips to the Blue Ridge Mountains, the Catskills, and the Pennsylvania frontier stimulated his scientific interests, which expanded to include animal life, insects, fossils, and geology. Bartram summarized his findings in a two-volume report, Observations on the Inhabitants, Climate, Soil, Rivers, Productions, Animals, and Other Matters Worthy of Notice (1751).

He received a number of formal honors for his work as a botanist. In 1743 he became a member of the American Philosophical Society. Through the agency of his friend Collinson, Bartram was appointed botanist to King George III in 1765, with an annual stipend of £50. Bartram justified the appointment by making an important collecting trip to Florida. The results of this trip were published in A Description of East Florida (1769). As the leading American authority on natural science, Bartram also had a major influence on the advent and conduct of the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION. Bartram proposed the expedition to Benjamin Franklin, who passed it on to Thomas JEFFERSON. The expedition seems to have followed Bartram's methods for collecting samples in the field. Bartram died at his home in Kingsessing in 1777.

Works

Bartram, John. Travels in Pensilvania and Canada. London: Printed for J. Whiston and B. White, 1751; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1966.

Bartram. The Correspondence of John Bartram, 1734–1777, edited by Edmund Berkeley and Dorothy Smith Berkeley. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1992.

Sources

Hoffman, Nancy E. and John C. Van Horne. America's Curious Botanist: A Tercentennial Reappraisal of John Bartram, 1699–1777. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 2004.

Irmscher, Christoph. The Poetics of Natural History: From John Bartram to William James. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1999.

Slaughter, Thomas P. The Natures of John and William Bartram. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Bartram, William (1739–1823) botanist, ethnographer

William Bartram was born in Kingsessing, Pennsylvania, to the botanist John BARTRAM, and Ann Mendenhall Bartram, John's second wife. Following his father's death in 1777, William Bartram became a partner in Kingsessing with his older brother John, who inherited the estate. William remained unmarried and, like his father, was a devoted QUAKER. He became a well-known botanist, although his career as a scientist was delayed by a brief stint as a merchant. Educated at the Academy of Philadelphia, William also received intensive training in botany and the natural sciences from his father at the family estate in Kingsessing.

The elder Bartram took his son on numerous field trips, including an excursion to the St. John's River in Florida. By 1773 William Bartram was conducting independent collecting trips in the Southeast, during which he compiled a list of over two hundred native birds. Bartram continued his father's relationship with the English botanist Peter Collinson (1694–1768) and resumed his father's practice of providing Collinson with botanical samples. Collinson also eagerly collected the drawings of plants that Bartram made during his field trips.

During his collection trips as a botanist, Bartram befriended several Native American groups in the Southeast. He took advantage of his close proximity to observe their customs and published his findings in Observations on the Creek and Cherokee Indians (1789; published, 1853) and Travels through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida (1791). Adopting the language of both traveler and scientist, Bartram begins this extensive study: "THIS world, as a glorious apartment of the boundless palace of the sovereign Creator, is furnished with an infinite variety of animated scenes, inexpressibly beautiful and pleasing, equally free to the inspection and enjoyment of all his creatures." Bartram's descriptions of the American Indians he encountered were widely used by authors in Britain and continental Europe and are still consulted by historians and others who seek to know more about the Native Americans of the Atlantic seaboard during the early national period.

Bartram also contributed botanical writings to B. S. Barton's Philadelphia Medical and Physical Journal. In addition to his research Bartram became a member of the American Philosophical Society in 1786 and was one of the first members elected to the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, which was founded in 1812. William Bartram died at his home in Philadelphia on July 22, 1823.

Works

Bartram, William. Travels through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida. Philadelphia: Printed by James and Johnson, 1791; Early American Imprints, 23159, 23160.

Bartram. Travels, and Other Writings, edited by Thomas P. Slaughter. New York: Library of America, 1996.

Sources

Cashin, Edwin J. William Bartram and the American Revolution on the Southern Frontier. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

Magee, Judith. The Art and Science of William Bartram. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2007.

Slaughter, Thomas P. The Natures of John and William Bartram. New York: Knopf, 1996.

The Bay Psalm Book by John Cotton and others

(Cambridge, Mass.: Stephen Day, 1640) poems

Initially published in 1640 by Stephen DAY as The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre, the first book printed in English in the British colonies was more commonly known as The Bay Psalm Book. It was produced by a group of PURITAN ministers from the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY, including John COTTON, and reflected the clergymen's concern for making worship accessible and relevant to the colonists. The sermons stressed the importance of maintaining faith. The Bay Psalm Book, small in size, was easily portable, and its lessons could be repeated to safeguard the individual from the dangers and temptations of life. The introduction recognizes the problems of remaining faithful and values education as a way to maintain the cultural and religious ideals of a community.

Along with its importance as an example of early colonial printing, The Bay Psalm Book serves as an example of the Puritan critique of the ANGLICAN CHURCH. One inscription on the cover reads: "Whereunto is prefixed a discourse declaring not only the lawfulness, but also the necessity of the heavenly ordinance of singing Scripture psalmes in the churches of God." The Puritan ministers believed that the adaptation of the psalms into meter would facilitate group singing. More important, The Bay Psalm Book was intended to replace the existing Anglican text in common use throughout the English world. In keeping with its anti-Anglican focus, The Bay Psalm Book used a literal translation of the original Hebrew text contained in the Old Testament, producing a text in diametric opposition to the poeticism of the Anglican version. "If therefore the verses are not always so smooth and elegant as some may desire or expect," Cotton wrote in the preface, "let them consider that God's Altar needs not our polishings."

The original version of The Bay Psalm Book, which sold about 1,700 copies, was widely used throughout the seventeenth century. The authors repeatedly asserted that closeness to the Scriptures was more important than poetic stylishness:

We have therefore done our endeavor to make a plain and familiar translation of the psalms and words of David into English metre, and have not so much as presumed to paraphrase to give the sense of his meaning in other words; we have therefore attended herein as our chief guide the original, shunning all additions, except such as even the best translators of them in prose supply, avoiding all material detractions from words or sense.

The Bay Psalm Book achieved considerable recognition in its time, with copies reaching both England and Scotland. The book met with significant competition during the eighteenth century, however, when dissenting sects began to challenge the Puritan establishment. This challenge included a break from the Puritan emphasis on literal translations of the Hebrew text; and other emerging influences on English literature, such as neo-classicism, added to the declining use of The Bay Psalm Book.

In response, a number of attempts were made to revive interest in the Puritan version by revising or updating the text. In 1752 John BARNARD introduced a notable revision of The Bay Psalm Book, called A New Version of the Psalms of David, that yielded to the new literary fashions, thereby omitting many of the original Puritan literary devices. Other revisions were produced as well, but the popularity of The Bay Psalm Book continued to decline in the face of competition from new collections of American psalmody.

Sources

Haraszti, Zoltan. The Enigma of the Bay Psalm Book. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956.

Winship, George Parker. The Cambridge Press, 1638–1692: A Re-examination of the Evidence Concerning the Bay Psalm Book and the Eliot Indian Bible as Well as Other Contemporary Books and People. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1945.

Belknap, Jeremy (1744–1798) historian

Jeremy Belknap distinguished himself among early American historians with his three-volume The History of New Hampshire (1784, 1791, 1792). Belknap's reliance on original documents, eyewitness accounts, and personal observations set his collection apart from works by contemporary historians who interpreted developments and achievements as a manifestation of God's wishes. Belknap's volumes remain the most thorough study of the history and geography of early New Hampshire.

Belknap was born in Boston on June 4, 1744 to Joseph Belknap, a leather dresser and furrier, and Sarah Byles Belknap. As a young student he attended Latin Grammar School in Boston, and before he turned fifteen he entered HARVARD COLLEGE. After graduation from Harvard in 1762, Belknap taught school and studied theology at Milton, Massachusetts, and then in Portsmouth and Greenland, New Hampshire. In 1767 he was ordained a minister in the Congregational Church of Dover, New Hampshire. That same year he married Ruth Eliot of Boston.

In Dover, Belknap began to gather material for his study of New Hampshire. He conducted research at Dartmouth College in 1774 and journeyed to the White Mountains in 1784. Much of his research consisted of firsthand accounts. Belknap's first volume, an historical narrative of New Hampshire from 1623 to 1725, was published in Philadelphia in 1784. Belknap documented events such as the trials of early settlement around Dover, Indian raids, and problems relating to the establishment of social and legal order in the colony. Though sales of the first volume were disappointing, due in part to postwar depression, Belknap pressed on for the publication of volume two. In 1785 he solicited the New Hampshire General Court for financial support for his efforts. The legislative body offered only verbal encouragement and a suit of clothes.

Belknap's conflict with leaders from the Dover Congregational Church caused him to resign from the parish in 1786. In April of the following year, he took a position as minister of the Federal Street Church in Boston. He resumed work on volume two even though he needed $200 for expenses. Belknap continued to seek financial aid from the New Hampshire legislature and eventually received a grant of £50—roughly $200—in February 1791.

The second volume of The History of New Hampshire was published in 1791 in Boston. Relying largely on eyewitness accounts, Belknap concentrated on the terms of Governor Benning Wentworth (1696–1770). Belknap also examined the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and revealed his slant toward the PATRIOT cause. The third volume, published in 1792 in Boston, included a geographical description of the state. His observations were thorough and based on scientific data. The three-volume compendium was published as a set in Boston in 1792.

Belknap's literary output increased while he was in Boston. In June 1787 he began contributing to the Columbian Magazine. The nine articles he submitted to the magazine formed the basis of The Foresters, An American Tale (1792), an anonymously published allegory about early American settlement, the American Revolution, and the framing of the CONSTITUTION. In The Foresters, Belknap criticized the corruption of the English, the Old World, and American LOYALISTS. The book sold well throughout the 1790s.

Belknap was a member of the American Philosophical Society and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He helped found the MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY in 1791 and served as its first corresponding secretary. In 1794 Belknap published the first volume of American Biography, a collection of essays on noteworthy people. The second volume was published in 1798, the year of his death.

Works

Belknap, Jeremy. The History of New-Hampshire, 3 volumes. Various publishers, 1784–1792.

Belknap. The Foresters, An American Tale; Being a Sequel to the History of John Bull, the Clothier. Boston: Printed by I. Thomas & E. T. Andrews, 1792; revised and enlarged, 1796; Early American Imprints, 24086, 30051.

Sources

Kirsch, George B. Jeremy Belknap: A Biography. New York: Arno, 1982.

Lawson, Russell M. The American Plutarch: Jeremy Belknap and the Historian's Dialogue with the Past. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998.

Bell, Robert (circa 1732–1784) bookseller, publisher, pamphleteer

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, and trained as a bookbinder, Robert Bell worked with varying success as a journeyman in Berwick-upon-Tweed, England, and as an independent craftsman and bookseller in Dublin, Ireland. He immigrated to Pennsylvania sometime around 1766, following the path of his former employer. Bell succeeded in the colonies, quickly establishing himself as a leading BOOKSELLER in Philadelphia. His importance as a bookseller and publisher is underscored by his inclusion in the History of Printing in America (1810), Isaiah THOMAS's authoritative study of the colonial publishing industry.

Like many other colonial booksellers, Bell played an important role in the expansion of the American media. Specializing in book auctions, Bell traveled the East Coast purchasing and reselling entire libraries along with smaller lots of books. He was also a successful publisher. Among his more important publications was an early edition of William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England (1762), which Bell published in 1771–1772; it was the first comprehensive codification of English common law and a major influence on American law in the postrevolutionary era. In 1776 Bell published the first edition of Thomas PAINE's widely read Common Sense, which served as one of the most important texts of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The British occupation of Philadelphia did nothing to deter Bell's aggressive distribution of books. Bell's circulating library continued to function during the occupation, finding eager customers among the British officer corps.

After the Revolution he actively promoted the wide distribution of books. His pamphlet Bell's Memorial on the Free Sale of Books (1784) argued that access to reading material represented a fundamental element of a free society. He followed this with a second pamphlet, Bell's Address to Every Free-Man (1784), which attacked the Pennsylvania assembly's new restrictions on the auctioning of books. Bell continued to conduct auctions outside Pennsylvania. He died from an illness in Richmond, Virginia, while en route to one of these auctions.

Works

Tucker, Josiah. The True Interest of Britain, Set Forth in Regard to the Colonies to . . . Which Is Added by the Printer, a Few More Words, on the Freedom of the Press in America. Philadelphia: Robert Bell, 1776.

Bell, Robert. Address to Every Free-Man but Especially to the Free Citizens of Pennsylvania Concerning a Tyrannical Embargo Now Laid upon the Free-Sale of Books by Auction. Philadelphia: Printed by R. Bell, 1784; Early American Imprints, 18345, 18346.

Source

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers . . ., 2 volumes. Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1810; second edition, Albany, New York: Printed by J. Munsell, 1874; reprinted and edited by Marcus A. McCorison, New York: Weathervane, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 21483.

Benezet, Anthony (1713–1784) pamphleteer, educator

Anthony Benezet was the son of French Huguenots Jean Etienne and Judith Benezet. He was born in Picardy, in the city of Saint-Quentin, France, on January 31, 1713, but religious persecution drove his family to Holland when he was two years old. From there the family journeyed to England and eventually to the city of Philadelphia in 1731. Although Benezet had little formal education, between 1754 and 1784 he published more than ten important PAMPHLETS on slavery and earned a national reputation for his humanitarianism.

Benezet became a QUAKER following his marriage to Joyce Marriot of New Jersey in 1736. Although he worked as the manager of the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, Benezet's primary career was in education. He was an innovator in his field, establishing both a school for poor African American boys and, in 1755, a school for girls. He was involved in a variety of reforms and social causes including the abolition of slavery, pacifism, assistance to the Acadian refugees who settled in Philadelphia, and temperance. In 1775 Benezet founded the first antislavery society in America.

Benezet's An Epistle of Caution and Advice, Concerning the Buying and Keeping of Slaves (1754) was credited with helping to persuade the Quakers to repudiate slavery. In his 1766 pamphlet A Caution and Warning to Great-Britain and her Colonies, in a Short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions, Benezet warned of the consequences that would follow a slave rebellion. He urged his readers to recognize that African Americans were humane, hard-working men and women who did not deserve brutal treatment. Quakers printed two thousand copies of this pamphlet and distributed them in England and in the colonies, hoping to persuade the British government to end the slave trade. In 1771 Benezet published a book-length pamphlet, Some Historical Account of Guinea; Its Situation, Produce and the General Disposition of Its Inhabitants, describing the civilization of this African region and documenting the horrors of the slave trade and its effect upon African cultures. In 1781 he published Short Observations on Slavery based on his many years teaching African American students. Benezet insisted that black Americans were not inferior to whites in their intellectual capacity.

The impact of Benezet's work was considerable. He played an important role in shaping Quaker abolitionism and influenced the outcome of the landmark Somersett case (1772), which ended slavery in England. He also shaped educational instruction—writing eight primers, grammar books, and spelling books for use in American classrooms—and wrote tracts on Indian culture and on the history of the Quakers. Anthony Benezet died May 3, 1784, in Philadelphia.

Works

Benezet, Anthony. A Caution and Warning to Great-Britain and Her Colonies, in a Short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions. Philadelphia: Printed by Henry Miller, 1766; Early American Imprints, 10240, 10555.

Benezet. The Mighty Destroyer Displayed, in Some Account of the Dreadful Havock Made by the Mistaken Use as Well as Abuse of Distilled Spirituous Liquors. Philadelphia: Printed by Joseph Crukshank, 1774; Early American Imprints, 16203.

Benezet. A First Book for Children. Philadelphia: Printed by Joseph Crukshank, 1778; Early American Imprints, 15736, 25157.

Benezet. Notes on the Slave Trade. 1780; Early American Imprints, 17095, 17838.

Sources

Benezet, Anthony. Anthony Benezet: From the Original Memoir, edited by Wilson Armistead. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1859; Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1971.

Brendlinger, Irv A. To Be Silent . . . Would be Criminal: The Anti-slavery Influence and Writings of Anthony Benezet. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2006.

Brookes, George S. Friend Anthony Benezet. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1937.

Beverley, Robert (circa 1673–1722) historian

Robert Beverley was born in Middlesex County, Virginia, the son of a member of the colony's tobacco-planter elite. As his father's heir, Beverley inherited a plantation in Gloucester County and six thousand additional acres in King and Queen County. Upon his marriage to Ursula Byrd, Beverley built an estate on his King and Queen property. His young wife died in childbirth soon after the marriage, and Beverley never remarried.

In 1696 Beverley's social status in the community was acknowledged with his appointment as clerk of the General Court, clerk of the Council, and clerk of the General Assembly. He served as a burgess, or assemblyman, in JAMESTOWN from 1699 to 1706. His politics differed from those of his father: Major Beverley had strongly supported the royal governor in opposing the backcountry revolt known as Bacon's Rebellion in 1676, but in the early eighteenth century Robert Beverley criticized the royal governor for plotting against the liberties of Virginians. Governor Francis Nicholson responded to Beverley's opposition by removing him from office as clerk of the King and Queen County court. Soon after this controversy, Beverley retired from politics. He spent his time cultivating wine grapes on his estate and working on a history of Virginia.

The History and Present State of Virginia was first published in 1705, and a revised edition appeared in 1722. An admirer of John SMITH's historical narrative of the early years of the colony, Beverley drew heavily on that work for his own. He signed his history "A Native & Inhabitant of the Place," suggesting his perspective was that of a native of the New World rather than the Old. In The History he insisted that he was neither "civilized" nor a "cavalier" but "an Indian." Contrary to the notion that Indians were barbaric, made popular by William BRADFORD and other colonial historians, Beverley portrayed them as people of nature, with a moral code that diverged from English morality. Beverley was proud of the improvements to the land that English settlers had made, and he credited the Indians with preparing the land for those who came afterward. Beverley demonstrated the importance of the Native American experience in the colony's development.

The History is divided into four parts: the first is a history of the English in Virginia; the second describes American geography and the "natural productions" that the English found on their arrival in the region; the third provides an account of the Indians, their religion, customs, and political organization; and the fourth examines English political institutions in the colony and improvements to the land made by the colonists. Beverley made clear that English customs, institutions, and laws were superior to those of the primitive natives, yet he refused to dismiss native culture as irrelevant. In fact, Beverley sustained ambivalence throughout his history between the absolute benefits of civilization—even if that civilization boasted wise laws and honest government—and a pastoral world governed only by the laws of nature. Beverley died in 1722, shortly after completing his revision of The History and Present State of Virginia.

Works

Beverley, Robert (attributed). An Essay upon the Government of the English Plantations on the Continent of America. London: R. Parker, 1701. Edited by Louis B. Wright. New York: Arno, 1972.

Beverley. The History and Present State of Virginia, in Four Parts. London: R. Parker, 1705. Edited by Wright. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1947.

Source

Sweet, Timothy. American Georgics: Economy and Environment in Early American Literature. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

Biddle, Nicholas (1786–1844) statesman, writer

A writer, banker, and statesman, Nicholas Biddle was born January 8, 1786 in Philadelphia, the son of Charles Biddle, a prominent QUAKER merchant and politician, and Hannah Shepard, the daughter of a North Carolina family. Biddle attended the University of Pennsylvania at age ten and at thirteen was sent to the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University) for additional study. He graduated in 1801 as the valedictorian of his class, returning to Philadelphia to study law. In 1804, at the age of eighteen, Biddle accepted the position of secretary to John Armstrong (1758–1843), the U.S. minister to France. Biddle used his position as an opportunity to travel widely in Europe. He returned to Philadelphia as one of the best-educated and most-traveled young Americans of his time. Admitted to the bar in 1809, Biddle became a successful lawyer and, later, a state legislator in both the assembly and the senate. He married Jane Craig in 1811, and together they had six children, one of whom died in childhood.

A nationalist, Biddle actively supported the WAR OF 1812, writing his state's response to the antiwar resolutions of the Hartford Convention. Biddle's close relationship with President James Monroe (1758–1831) gained him an appointment as director of the Second Bank of the United States. Unhappy with the Bank's policies, Biddle resigned his position in 1821. He accepted the presidency of the Bank in 1822, a position he held until 1839 (Second Bank became the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania in 1836). Biddle's financial policies were highly successful, but the Bank had powerful enemies who attacked both the need for and the constitutionality of the Bank. Embroiled in this conflict, Biddle became a target for the Bank's most vigorous opponent, Andrew Jackson. Defeated by the Jacksonians in his attempt to recharter the Bank during the so-called Bank War, Biddle resigned in 1839.

Throughout his career in finance and statesmanship, Nicholas Biddle was an active intellectual and a writer. In 1809 Biddle became a member of the Tuesday Club, one of Philadelphia's leading intellectual societies. Under the sponsorship of Joseph DENNIE, publisher of the Port Folio, the leading literary journal of the time and the first periodical devoted to American literature, the Tuesday Club served as a gathering place for Philadelphia's intellectual community. During this period Biddle wrote some articles on the fine arts. In 1812 he briefly served as the editor of the Port Folio. While Biddle was known for his prose, he was also a poet. His "Ode to Bogle," written on July 16, 1829, was a mock eulogy of Philadelphian Robert Bogle, an African American who was both a public waiter (caterer) and an undertaker, whose services were well respected. Dedicated to his four-year-old granddaughter, Meta Craig Biddle, the poem praises Bogle's "cakes and wine" and imagines this final tribute:

*Nor less, stupendous man! Thy power
In festal than in funeral hour,
When gas and beauty's blended rays
Set hearts and ball-rooms in a blaze.*

In 1810, at the request of William CLARK, Biddle began editing the journals, statements, and notes compiled during the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION. He later surrendered the job to Paul Allen, a journalist, in order to concentrate on his responsibilities as a state legislator. The final product included Biddle's narrative history and only an abridged version of the original journals.

Through his wife, Biddle inherited the Craig estate, Andalusia, along the Delaware River. After his resignation as president of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, Biddle retired to Andalusia, turning the estate into a center of intellectual life. He died at Andalusia following an extended illness, on February 27, 1844.

Works

- Lewis, Meriwether. History of the Expedition under the Command of Captains Lewis and Clark, 2 volumes, edited by Nicholas Biddle and Paul Allen. Philadelphia: Bradford & Inskeep / New York: A. H. Inskeep, 1814; New York: Heritage, 1962.
- Biddle, Nicholas. Eulogium on Thomas Jefferson. Philadelphia, R. H. Small, 1827; Early American Imprints, second series, 28183.
- Biddle. The Correspondence of Nicholas Biddle Dealing with National Affairs, 1807–1844, edited by Reginald C. McGrane. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1919.
- Biddle. Nicholas Biddle in Greece: The Journals and Letters of 1806, edited by R. A. McNeal. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.

Sources

- Govan, Thomas P. Nicholas Biddle, Nationalist and Public Banker, 1786–1844. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1959.

- Remini, Robert Vincent. Andrew Jackson and the Bank War: A Study in the Growth of Presidential Power. New York: Norton, 1967.

Blair, James (circa 1655–1743) minister, essayist

Anglican minister and founder of the College of William and Mary, James Blair was born in 1655 or 1656 in Scotland. Raised in a ministerial household—his father Robert Blair was a minister in Banffshire, Scotland—Blair naturally gravitated toward a career in the clergy. He prepared for the ministry by completing bachelor's and master's degrees at the University of Edinburgh in 1669 and 1673, respectively, and was ordained in 1679 in the Church of Scotland. He served as rector in Edinburgh until 1682, when he refused to sign the test oath, one of numerous efforts enforced by King James II in an attempt to suppress resistance in Scotland.

Deprived of his career in Britain, Blair left for Virginia in 1685, where he became the minister of Henrico parish in the frontier region of the colony. In 1687 he married Sarah Harrison. Two years later he was appointed representative or commissary for the bishop of London in Virginia, a position he held until his death in 1743.

As commissary, Blair began his quest to establish a college in Virginia, a concept that met with the approval of the colony's governing elite. He journeyed to England in 1691, where he met with some resistance. A friend presented the idea to the queen, who assisted Blair in gaining an audience with King William. Blair returned to Virginia in 1693 with the king's approval and with sufficient funds to establish the College of William and Mary. Accordingly, he was appointed as the first president of the newly chartered institution, a lifetime position. Blair took his new responsibility seriously, overseeing the fundraising and building programs that established the original campus for the college.

In 1694 Blair entered the ranks of Virginia's political elite with an appointment to the Royal Council. The following year he was appointed rector of the James City parish, the most prestigious clerical position in the colony. From the beginning Blair became an important member of the opposition. In 1697 he challenged the authority of the governor, Sir Edmund Andros (1637–1714). Traveling once again to England, he joined forces with the philosopher John Locke (1632–1704) and co-authored an anti-Andros essay, "Some of the Chief Grievances of the Present Constitution of Virginia with an Essay towards the Remedies Thereof." That same year he contributed to a longer assessment of colonial government in Virginia, "An Account of the Present State and Government of Virginia." This second essay was formally published in 1727 as The Present State of Virginia, and the College. The two essays, combined with Blair's personal appearance before the Board of Trade in England, succeeded in gaining Andros's recall.

Blair had a similar confrontation with Andros's successor, Sir Francis Nicholson (1655–1728). Nicholson and Blair were friends, but the friendship ended when Nicholson claimed the right to appoint ministers, a power that would have a direct effect on Blair's authority as commissary. Once again Blair succeeded in forcing the governor's recall. Blair's political battles ended with the recall of Alexander Spotswood (1676–1740), the third governor to fall victim to his political machinations.

In the midst of the political clamor, Blair was able to maintain his concentration when it came to clerical matters. He was a devoted minister, both in James City and in Williamsburg, a position he assumed in 1710. He was an accomplished author of sermons; in 1722–1723 he published Our Saviour's Divine Sermon on the Mount, a five-volume collection consisting of 177 sermons that he had preached over a fourteen-year period (1707–1721). An expanded second edition was published in 1740. He died on April 18, 1743.

Works

Blair, James. Our Saviour's Divine Sermon on the Mount. . . , 5 volumes. London: Printed for J. Brotherton, 1722; enlarged edition, 4 volumes. London: Printed for J. Brotherton & J. Oswald, 1740; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1986.

Blair, Henry Hartwell, and Edward Chilton. The Present State of Virginia, and the College. London: J. Wyat, 1727; Williamsburg, Va.: Colonial Williamsburg, 1940.

Source

Rouse, Parke. James Blair of Virginia. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1971.

Bland, Richard (1710–1776) pamphleteer

Richard Bland was born into Virginia's planter class on May 6, 1710. He was a leading expert in colonial legal history and one of the most important defenders of American liberties in the House of Burgesses before the era of Patrick HENRY and Thomas JEFFERSON. Respected and acknowledged as one of the first colonists to examine the relationship between Britain and the colonies, he served in the Virginia assembly for thirty-three years, from 1742 until 1775.

Bland's The Colonel Dismounted; or the Rector Vindicated (1764) joins James OTIS's The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved, published in the same year, as the first salvos in the battle of words over the rights of the colonists within the British empire. In The Colonel Dismounted, Bland attempted to distinguish between internal and external government, a distinction that would limit the authority of Parliament and the king. In this PAMPHLET, Bland expressed optimism that British authorities would never attempt to overstep their boundaries because they understood their role as "guardians of the rights and liberties of mankind." When Parliament passed the STAMP ACT, Bland condemned the tax in An Inquiry into the Rights of the British Colonies (1766). Recognizing that his views could brand him as a traitor, Bland nevertheless put his own name on the title page. The pamphlet reveals the tension he felt between maintaining loyalty to the empire and opposing injustice. Bland allows for Britain's superiority over the colonies, yet counters this by insisting that the colonists have rights. He argues that the colonists must follow procedures and lay their complaints before the king—but they must resist if they are ignored. Newtonian science, he argued, could not justify a vision of Great Britain as the "centre of Attraction to the Colonies." Instead, like natural bodies lying close to each other in space, the Mother Country and her colonies must be cemented by mutual interests. Bland was one of the first colonists to recognize and voice the idea that the shared interests of the colonies might be more powerful than the mutual interests of Britain and America. Richard Bland died October 26, 1776.

Works

Bland, Richard. A Fragment on the Pistole Fee, Claimed by the Governor of Virginia, edited by Worthington Chauncey Ford. 1753; Brooklyn, N.Y.: Historical Printing Club, 1891; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1979.

Bland. A Letter to the Clergy of Virginia, in Which the Conduct of the General-Assembly Is Vindicated, against the Reflexions Contained in a Letter to the Lords of Trade and Plantations, from the Lord-Bishop of London. . . . Williamsburg, Va.: Printed by William Hunter, 1760; Early American Imprints, 8551.

Common Sense (pseud. Richard Bland). The Colonel Dismounted; or, The Rector Vindicated. In a Letter Addressed to His Reverence: Containing a Dissertation upon the Constitution of the Colony. Williamsburg, Va.: Printed by J. Royle, 1764.

Source

Detweiler, Robert. Richard Bland and the Origins of the Revolution in Virginia, edited by Edward M. Riley. Yorktown: Virginia Independence Bicentennial Commission, 1981.

Bleecker, Ann Eliza Schuyler (1752–1783) poet, letter writer, novelist, essayist

I wept and sigh'd, but sorrow chain'd my tongue. . . .
—“Written in the Retreat from Burgoyne”
(1777; published 1793)

Early American poet and writer, Ann Eliza Schuyler was born around October 1752 in New York City to Brandt and Margareta Van Wyck Schuyler. Her father was a wealthy merchant who died before Anna was born. The youngest of six children, Anna Eliza was raised in an aristocratic household where she studied the arts and literature and was especially encouraged to develop her talent for poetry. On March 21, 1769, when Anna was seventeen, she married John J. Bleecker, a lawyer and member of a prominent Dutch family. The couple initially settled in Poughkeepsie, New York, and then relocated to Tomhanick, near Albany, a frontier settlement twenty miles to the north, on lands that John Bleecker had inherited. For the next eight years, the Bleeckers enjoyed a simple, rural life, during which Anna Bleecker wrote verse. This idyllic life was shattered by the sudden evasion of British troops in 1777; with an attack on the Bleecker household looming, and with her husband away on business, Anna fled with her two young children, Margaretta and Abella. Upon defeat of Burgoyne's army on October 17, 1777, the Bleecker family returned to their Tomhanick home. In 1781, however, the family suffered more hardship when John Bleecker was temporarily taken captive by British troops. The trauma of these collective events affected Anna Bleecker emotionally—she suffered from depression—and according to her daughter, Margaretta V. Faugères, Bleecker destroyed much of her own writing.

When writing, Bleecker adopted the name Ann, and drew upon her losses: "Written in the Retreat from Burgoyne," dated October 29, 1777, recounts the sorrows of Abella's death: "But soon my lov'd Abella hung her head, / From her soft cheek the bright carnation fled" (ll. 23–24). Again, in the poem "Lines to Grief," Bleecker confronts her sorrows:

COME Grief, and sing a solemn dirge
Beneath this midnight shade;
From central darkness now emerge,
And tread the lonely glade.

In addition to poetry, Bleecker wrote letters and was the author of two historical narratives, "The History of Maria Kittle" (1797) and "Henry and Anne" (circa 1783). Although "The History of Maria Kittle" has often been cited as a fictitious CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE, Sharon M. Harris explains that "the narrative is, in fact, based on the real-life events in the life of Maria Kittle (or 'Kittlehuyn') and her family, who had lived in the same region as Bleecker." Written in the style of a SENTIMENTAL NOVEL, which emphasizes emotion while offering moral guidance, the book is framed as a letter addressed to her sister, Susan Ten Eyck. Dated "Tomhanick, December, 1779," the letter begins: "Dear Susan, However fond of novels and romances you may be, the unfortunate adventures of my neighbours, who died yesterday, will make you despise that fiction. . . ." The narrator then relates Maria Kittle's "unhappy history."

The History of Maria Kittle (1777–1780) was serialized in the New-York Magazine, September 1790–January 1791 and then later reprinted as a complete work in a collection edited by her daughter, Margaretta V. Faugères, in The Posthumous Works of Ann Eliza Bleecker in Prose and Verse (1793). Ann Eliza Bleecker died November 23, 1783.

Works

Bleecker, Ann Eliza. The Posthumous Works of Ann Eliza Bleecker in Prose and Verse. To Which Is Added, A Collection of Essays, Prose and Verse, by Margaretta V. Faugères. New York: Printed by T. & J. Swords, 1793.

Bleecker. The History of Maria Kittle. Hartford, Conn.: Printed by Elisha Babcock, 1797.

Sources

Giffen, Allison. "'Till Grief Melodious Grow': The Poems and Letters of Ann Eliza Bleecker," Early American Literature, 28, no. 3 (1993): 222–241.

Harris, Sharon M. Women's Early American Historical Narratives. New York: Penguin, 2003.

The Blockheads; or, The Affrighted Officers

anonymous (1776) play

Historians and literary critics are divided over authorship of this play, an anti-British SATIRE published anonymously in Boston in 1776. Some attribute The Blockheads to Mercy Otis WARREN, an important Revolutionary-era playwright, poet, and political critic. Warren never claimed credit for the play, but this was a common practice for her and for other political writers of this period. Critics who contest attribution to Warren argue that the farce is too vulgar to have been written by a woman of her station.

The Blockheads is an example of PATRIOT propaganda written during the early phase of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Like many of the political plays published during this period, The Blockheads was never intended to be performed. Instead, it received wide circulation as a PAMPHLET.

Written as a one-act play, The Blockheads was published soon after the British and LOYALIST evacuation of Boston. In this sense it celebrated the Patriot victory in the siege of Boston. It also was intended to serve as a parody of an earlier play, The Blockade of Boston, which was written anonymously and staged by the British officer corps during the occupation and siege of the city. Although no manuscript survives of The Blockade of Boston, contemporary accounts describe it as an unadorned anti-Patriot satire in which the Patriot army and its commander, George WASHINGTON, were thoroughly ridiculed. Patriot leaders attributed The Blockade to British General John BURGOYNE, who was a noted playwright in London. The Blockheads repeated this accusation as part of the overall farce, but no evidence exists that connects The Blockade to Burgoyne.

The Blockheads treats the British as an impotent army of occupation. Exhorted by their incompetent officers to make a stand against the rebels, the reluctant soldiers reply: "We had much rather fight for a good pudding." The Loyalists, in turn, are depicted as their disappointed supporters who have gambled on the wrong side. "A friend to government," the Loyalist Simple curses, "d-m connection!—my family ruin'd—myself a despis'd old fool."

Sources

- Brown, Jared. The Theatre in America During the Revolution. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Douglas, Krystan V. "A Question of Authorship: Mercy Otis Warren and The Blockheads," Theatre Survey, 30 (May and November 1989): 85–92.
- Richards, Jeffrey H. Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Richards. Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage, 1607–1789. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1991.
- Trumpets Sounding: Propaganda Plays of the American Revolution*, edited by Norman Philbrick. New York: B. Blom, 1972.
- Warren, Mercy Otis. The Plays and Poems of Mercy Otis Warren: Facsimile Reproductions, edited by Benjamin Franklin V. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1980.

The Bloody Tenent of Persecution by Roger

Williams (London, 1644) treatise

While in London trying to obtain a patent (or CHARTER) for Providence Plantation, Roger WILLIAMS wrote The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience. Printed on July 15 and published anonymously, this tract advocates freedom of conscience and was part of a series of direct responses to Puritan leader John COTTON, who supported religious persecution. Williams frames his treatise as a dialogue between Truth and Peace, who have become fugitives in a world where religious beliefs and personal expression are repressed. In their clandestine conference, Truth and Peace assert that intellectual freedom and religious tolerance must be sanctioned by government. The dialogue focuses first on freedom of thought and then turns to the question of government domain, asserting that as most members are part of the unregenerate, government has no rule over spiritual matters. Cotton refuted Williams's tract in The Bloody Tenent, Washed, and Made White in the Bloud of the Lambe (1647).

Source

Gaustad, Edwin S. Roger Williams. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Booksellers

Booksellers, or merchants who engaged in the importation, publication, and sale of books and other printed material, played various important roles in the literary life of the American colonies and the early Republic. At the retail level booksellers offered imported and locally published books and PAMPHLETS for sale in shops and through direct delivery.

Published literature was obtained through two sources. Booksellers served as direct importers of British and, less frequently, French publications. In some cases they acted as brokers for British authors and publishers and as import agents for important colonial customers. Booksellers also distributed books, pamphlets, and magazines published in the colonies. This was often done through a system of reciprocal exchange between booksellers, printers, and authors. Phillis WHEATLEY sold her collection of poetry, Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773) by promoting the book herself and arranging for distribution through a network of established booksellers. Noah WEBSTER contracted Isaiah THOMAS, a prominent newspaper publisher and printer in Massachusetts, to print and distribute two of his books on the English language.

American literary tastes favored books and magazines published in England, and this tendency, coupled with the high cost of domestic printing, fostered a thriving import business. Costs were offset by the decline of transatlantic shipping expenses and to an extent by limited copyright laws, which allowed American publishers to print British literature without compensating the author or the British publisher. As a result, many American booksellers undertook some level of domestic publication, using an independent printer for production but maintaining control over distribution and frequently over the copyright. The first copyright law enacted by Congress in 1790 offered little protection for foreign authors, and the reprinting of English publications without the permission of the author or original publisher continued into the nineteenth century.

Throughout the colonial period booksellers significantly influenced colonial tastes in literature, and their influence increased during the period following the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. From the 1760s to the 1780s, Robert BELL's bookstore in Philadelphia served as an intellectual salon and commercial center by providing a meeting place for authors, publishers, and readers. Another Philadelphia bookseller, the Dickens Bookstore, offered a similar environment. Over time the Dickens clientele evolved into the Tuesday Club, a prominent intellectual society founded by Joseph DENNIE.

Literary culture thrived during the early Republic, stimulating growth among the book trades. Booksellers and printers began the evolution from merchants and crafts into the formalized book trades, responding to the increasing demand for books and magazines as a consumer commodity and therefore to the increasing commercial success of domestic publication.

Sources

- Amory, Hugh. Bibliography and the Book Trades Studies in the Print Culture of Early New England, edited by David D. Hall. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- A History of the Book in America, Volume 1, The Colonial Book in the Atlantic World*, edited by Amory and Hall. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Warner, Michael. The Letters of the Republic: Publication and the Public Sphere in Eighteenth-Century America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Zboray, Ronald J., and Mary Saracino Zboray. "The Boston Book Trade, 1789–1850: A Statistical and Geographical Analysis," in Entrepreneurs: The Boston Business Community, 1700–1850, edited by Conrad E. Wright and Katheryn P. Viens. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1997, 211–267.

Boston Athenaeum (1805– )

The term athenaeum makes direct reference to Athena, the ancient Greek goddess of wisdom and the arts and sciences. The first athenaea were established in ancient Rome for the study of the fine arts. In the American form, athenaea refers to voluntary organizations of individuals who were interested in studying science, literature, and the arts. These organizations emerged in the United States during the early nineteenth century as part of a larger movement to establish centers of learning and education. For the most part, the American athenaea operated as private intellectual institutions and membership libraries. Among the earliest and most successful of these institutions were the Redwood Library in Newport, Rhode Island; the Salem Athenaeum in Massachusetts; the Athenaeum of Philadelphia; and the Boston Athenaeum.

The Boston Athenaeum, which continues to flourish, was the largest and most influential of these early independent libraries. It was formally established in 1807 by the members of the Anthology Society. Also known as the Society of Gentlemen, the Anthology Society represented a group of fourteen amateur intellectuals, including William Emerson, the father of the nineteenth-century writer Ralph Waldo Emerson. Organized in 1803 as the editorial board for The Monthly Anthology and Boston Review, the Anthology Society conceived of the Athenaeum in 1805 as a reference library and reading room for their own use. When it opened in 1807, the library had been reconceived as a membership library, open to subscribers in a manner similar to the Lyceum of Liverpool in England.

Originally housed at the Anthology Society's meeting room on Congress Street, the Athenaeum was moved later that year to quarters on Tremont Street. Searching for a permanent location, the trustees purchased the Rufus Armory House adjacent to the King's Chapel Burial grounds on Boston Common in 1809. The expanding collection of books and art, which was the result of frequent purchases and donations, created the need for additional space. In 1822 the Athenaeum was relocated to a mansion on Pearl Street donated by James Perkins, a trustee of the library. In 1827 a formal art gallery was added. A permanent building was constructed on Beacon Street during the middle of the nineteenth century. This building featured a sculpture garden on the ground floor, an enlarged library on the second floor, and a third floor specifically designed as an art gallery with skylights. Renovation during the early twentieth century added two additional floors.

As evidenced by the need for constant expansion, the library and art gallery experienced immediate and sustained success. By 1851 the Boston Athenaeum was the center of the intellectual community in Boston and was one of the largest libraries in the United States. The Athenaeum's success was largely due to aggressive recruitment of new members. Women were granted membership beginning in 1829, and there was an aggressive program for recruiting new male members. The founders published and distributed a newsletter, The Memoir, to promote the benefits of membership, emphasizing the library's commitment to developing one of the finest and broadest collections of literature and art. Among the Athenaeum's most important and publicized acquisitions was a set of four hundred books from George WASHINGTON's library, which was purchased from a private dealer in 1849. This purchase saved the collection from falling into private hands, which may have resulted in dispersal.

The Boston Athenaeum continues to flourish at its Beacon Street location. Although it continues to offer membership, the Boston Athenaeum serves the general public as a major center for exhibitions, book loans, and research in literature, art, and history.

Sources

Breisch, Kenneth A. Henry Hobson Richardson and the Small Public Library in America: A Study in Typology. Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1997.

Fifty Books in the Collection of the Boston Athenæum. Boston: The Boston Athenaeum, 1994.

Hoyle, Pamela, Jonathan P. Harding, and Rosemary Booth. A Climate for Art: The History of the Boston Athenaeum Gallery, 1827–1873. Boston: The Boston Athenaeum, 1980.

Story, Ronald. "Class and Culture in Boston: The Athenaeum, 1807–1860," American Quarterly, 27 (May 1975): 178–199.

Wentworth, Michael, with Elizabeth Lamb Clark. The Boston Library Society, 1794–1994: An Exhibition of Portraits, Views, and Materials Related to the Foundation of the Society and Some of Its Early Members. Boston: The Boston Athenaeum, 1995.

Boston Evening-Post (1731–1758) periodical

The Weekly Rehearsal, founded by Jeremiah Gridley on September 21, 1731 and printed by John Draper, was renamed the Boston Evening-Post in 1735 and ran until 1758 under the direction of Thomas Fleet (1685–1758), who began printing the periodical with the August 21, 1732 issue of the Weekly Rehearsal. The Post published mostly news about England and Europe with advertisements for goods ranging from dishware to hand tools. As was typical for a colonial newspaper, the Post also printed essays, poems, and satirical pieces.

Source

Clark, Charles E. The Public Prints: The Newspaper in Anglo-American Culture, 1665–1740. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

The Boston Gazette* (1719–1741) periodical

The Boston Gazette was established in 1719 by William Brooker as a competitor to John Campbell's (1653–1728) Boston News-Letter (established 1704). Campbell's newspaper had been an outgrowth of his position as official postmaster. Brooker expected to assume control of the News-Letter when he replaced Campbell as postmaster in 1704. However, Campbell refused to turn the paper over and converted the News-Letter into a private venture. Believing that the market in Boston could sustain two newspapers, Brooker established the Gazette, contracting with James Franklin (1697–1735), Benjamin Franklin's older brother, for the actual printing. The Gazette became the official organ for the royal government, while the News-Letter retained its status as the first commercial paper published in the colonies. Brooker's estimate of the market was correct. Both papers flourished, and a competition emerged for readership. The News-Letter tended to favor the position of the assembly, and the Gazette assumed a role as the governor's voice. Borrowing the format of the News-Letter, the Gazette continued to emphasize business news and features copied from London newspapers. Brooker, however, introduced some significant improvements, adding up-to-date prices on agricultural and imported commodities and introducing symbols and images to improve the appearance of the paper. Accordingly, the Gazette experienced broader circulation among the city's merchants.

In September 1720 the paper was turned over to Brooker's successor as postmaster, Philip Musgrave. This pattern was repeated for five additional successions. Printers Benjamin Edes and John Gill assumed control of the Gazette in 1755, renamed it the Boston Gazette, or, Country Journal, and discontinued its role as the official paper for the colonial government. With the journal no longer confined to commercial news and reprinted features, the editors of the Gazette wrote their own features and solicited additional editorials from readers. The paper continued to appeal to merchants and lawyers but was repositioned as the voice of the opposition faction.

Samuel Adams played an early and important role in shaping the editorial content of the Gazette. An early advocate of colonial rights and a prolific writer of letters and editorials, Adams used the Gazette as a platform to spread his increasingly revolutionary ideology. With Adams as the principal writer, the Gazette became the primary voice for the Patriot leadership. Edes, who was also a leading member of the Sons of Liberty, Joseph Warren (1741–1775), James Otis Jr., and John Adams contributed similar essays to the paper.

The content of these essays changed dramatically after the enactment of the Stamp Act in 1765. Using various pseudonyms, Adams and his allies attacked both the colonial administration and the English Parliament. The Gazette flourished as the leading organ for the Patriot cause. Its circulation exceeded two thousand copies in the years leading up to the Revolution, and Edes and Gill became the primary printers of Patriot pamphlets and broadsides.

From this point forward the Gazette became a medium for anti-British propaganda, enflaming public sentiment by reporting every incident of English repression and celebrating the anniversaries of notable events. On March 12, 1770, the Gazette devoted itself to reporting the so-called Boston Massacre, complete with black mourning borders and an engraving of four large coffins representing the four Patriots who had died. In 1774, writing under a pseudonym, John Adams used the Gazette to launch a series of essays opposing a series of Loyalist articles published by Daniel Leonard (1740–1829) (also writing under a pseudonym) in the Massachusetts Gazette and Boston News-Letter.

With a price on his head and facing possible arrest during the British occupation of Boston, Benjamin Edes fled the city in 1775, relocating to Watertown, Massachusetts, where he was appointed as the official printer for the Provincial Congress. With this move, Edes's partnership with John Gill, who had chosen to remain in the city, was effectively ended. Edes ran the Gazette from Watertown as a newspaper in exile until the British evacuation of Boston in 1776. He continued to operate the Gazette with the help of his sons after his return to Boston. In 1794 Edes resumed sole control, publishing the Gazette until 1798, when he became too ill to continue.

Sources

- Breen, T. H. The Marketplace of Revolution: How Consumer Politics Shaped American Independence. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Pasley, Jeffrey L. The Tyranny of Printers: Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Boston News-Letter* (1704–1776) periodical

The Boston News-Letter was established and edited by John Campbell (1653–1728), who served as Boston's postmaster from 1702 to 1718. Beginning with the news of Monday, April 17, 1704, this weekly newsletter provided colonists with the news of England and Europe. According to the MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY, these first issues of the Boston News-Letter included reprints from the London Flying Post and London Gazette. By 1718, news from Europe was so considerable that the Boston News-Letter was printing information about events that had taken place thirteen months beforehand. The Boston News-Letter was the main colonial newspaper until 1719, with a weekly run of six hundred copies, and it retains the distinction of being the first continuously published colonial newspaper.

In 1723, Campbell sold the Boston News-Letter to its printer, Bartholomew Green (1666–1732), the son of printer Samuel Green (1615–1702). Green expanded reporting on local news, with less emphasis on foreign news. Upon his death the paper continued under the management of Green's son-in-law, John Draper (1702–1762), who then passed the printer duties onto his son Richard Draper (circa 1727–1774). Upon his death the widowed Margaret Draper (fl. 1750–1807) assumed publisher's duties. As Charles E. Clark explains, the Green family and its descendants continued to publish newspapers until 1845 in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Maryland, and Virginia. The Boston News-Letter has the further distinction of being one of the few papers to survive into the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Its final issue appeared in February 1776.

Source

Clark, Charles E. The Public Prints: The Newspaper in Anglo-American Culture, 1665–1740. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Boucher, Jonathan (1738–1804) minister

Jonathan Boucher was born March 12, 1738 in Blencogo, England, the son of James Boucher, a shoemaker and tavern keeper, and Ann Barnes. Following a formal education with Reverend Joseph Ritson, Boucher became usher at St. Bees School. There he met his lifelong mentor, Reverend John James, who after several years recommended the twenty-one-year-old Boucher to tutor the sons of Captain Edward Dixon in Port Royal, Virginia. In 1759 Boucher immigrated to Virginia, where he later accepted an offer to become a priest in the local parish. He traveled to England for ordination in 1762, apparently leaving some significant debts in his wake. Following his ordination, Boucher returned to Hanover parish in Virginia, where he served as minister until 1764. That same year Boucher accepted a position as rector of St. Mary's parish. He purchased a small plantation, which he ran as a farm and as a boarding school for the sons of the Virginia gentry. Boucher's pupils included John Parke Custis (1754–1781), the son of Martha Washington (1731–1802) and George WASHINGTON's stepson.

Conscious of his dependence on the Virginia gentry, Boucher actively supported the early protests against taxation, which included opposition to the STAMP ACT and the Townshend duties (1767). In 1770 he relocated to Annapolis, Maryland, where he became active in local culture and colonial politics. Boucher was an avid supporter of the local theater and a member of the local literary circle. Boucher also cultivated a close relationship with Robert Eden (1741–1784), the royal governor, and his family. He used this relationship to secure the position of chaplain to the lower house of the colonial legislature. Boucher also became one of Eden's advisers as colonial politics became increasingly heated.

In 1774 Boucher began to actively support the LOYALIST cause, using his weekly sermons to argue that loyalty to the crown was a religious obligation. In turn, Boucher became a prominent target for the local PATRIOT organizations, which singled him out to be burned in effigy. In 1775 Boucher and his wife Nelly left the colonies for England under severe pressure from the local committee of safety. Nelly Boucher died in 1784, and Boucher married Mary Foreman in 1787. Neither of these marriages produced any children. Boucher and his third wife, Elizabeth Hodgson James, had eight children.

Boucher was very successful after he returned to his native England, where he established himself as a vicar, tutor, and author. He became the rector of Paddington Parish in London in 1776 and was appointed assistant secretary to the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts in 1779. He remained an active Tory and author. In 1797 Boucher published a collection of his loyalist sermons, A View of the Causes and Consequences of the American Revolution. Boucher's writings include a memoir of his colonial experience, Reminiscences of an American Loyalist, 1738–1789 (1797); and A Supplement to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language; Or, A Glossary of Obsolete and Provincial Words (1807), revised as Boucher's Glossary of Archaic and Provincial Words (1832–1833), which he promoted as a supplement to the leading dictionaries of the English language. Boucher served as rector of Epsom Parish until his death on April 27, 1804.

Works

Boucher, Jonathan. Reminiscences of an American Loyalist, 1738–1789, Being the Autobiography of the Revd. Jonathan Boucher, Rector of Annapolis in Maryland and Afterwards Vicar of Epsom, Surrey, England: N.p., 1797; Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1967.

Boucher. A View of the Causes and Consequences of the American Revolution; in Thirteen Discourses, Preached in North America Between the Years 1763 and 1775: with an Historical Preface. London: Printed for G. G. and J. Robinson, 1797; New York: Russell & Russell, 1967.

Boucher. Letters of Jonathan Boucher to George Washington. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Historical Printing Club, 1899.

Sources

Nelson, John K. A Blessed Company: Parishes, Parsons, and Parishioners in Anglican Virginia, 1690–1776. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Zimmer, Anne Y. Jonathan Boucher, Loyalist in Exile. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1978.

Bowers, Bathsheba (circa 1672–1718) theologian

Born in Charlestown, Massachusetts on June 4, 1671, Bathsheba Bowers was the third of twelve children of Benanuel and Elizabeth Dunster Bowers. When local Puritan officials found Bowers's parents and her two older sisters guilty of Quakerism, the family sent Bathsheba and three other sisters to safety in Philadelphia. Bowers thus grew up in the new QUAKER stronghold of Pennsylvania, where she carved out a solitary and eccentric life for herself. She built a tiny home and filled it with books. The only furniture was a table; the only tableware was a cup. Never married, she spent her days reading, writing, and tending her garden, which the locals called Bathsheba's Bower. Her niece, Ann Bolton, reported that Bowers kept books, or personal journals, which Bolton assumed had been written by her aunt, each filled with reports of dreams, visions, and a variety of romantic musings about beasts that filled the heavens.

Bowers's major work was her account of what she called the "Dealings of god" with her soul. In An Alarm Sounded to Prepare the Inhabitants of the World to Meet the Lord in the Way of His Judgments (1709), Bowers characterizes her life as a tale of "Spiritual Warfair" that ends with an ultimate acceptance of God's will. As a child, she reports in this autobiography, she was terrified by the thought of death and by the possibility of damnation. As a young woman, however, pride led her astray, into love of luxury, reading romances, and trivial sociality. This changed when, at nineteen, she came down with such a "violent fever" that she "thought now was the time that I had from my Infancy feared: now I must dye, and to Hell I must go, as the reward of my Pride." Her recovery from this long bout of illness led to a conversion that left her overcome "with a divine Sweetness," and, like Job, she realized that God acts "for Reasons known to himself." Her conversion resulted in a firm commitment to Quakerism and a growing belief that she must become a Quaker preacher. The prospect of standing before an audience terrified her, however, and a new round of torment and uncertainty followed. This crisis was not resolved until she had a vivid vision of a descent into hell and then a sudden rescue to a great height where God promised to guide her as she preached.

Like most Quaker spiritual narratives, Bowers's traces her path to her acceptance of Quaker doctrine. Also, like most Quaker narratives, An Alarm emphasizes mysticism, perfectionism, and the necessity of denying the will. Some Pennsylvania Quakers doubted that Bowers was a legitimate member of their Society, since, according to her niece, Bowers was "so wild in her Notions it was hard to find out what religion she really was of." Bowers spent her last eleven years of life as a Quaker preacher in South Carolina.

Work

Bowers, Bathsheba. An Alarm Sounded to Prepare the Inhabitants of the World to Meet the Lord in the Way of His Judgments. New York: Printed by William Bradford, 1709; Early American Imprints, 1383.

Brackenridge, Hugh Henry (1748–1816) novelist, poet, editor, essayist

Hugh Henry Brackenridge was born in 1748 in Kintyre, Scotland, and immigrated with his family to the Pennsylvania frontier in 1753. He developed an early affinity for the great satirists Lucian, Horace, Miguel de Cervantes, and Jonathan Swift. Having mastered Latin and Greek by the age of thirteen, Brackenridge began teaching when he was fifteen. In 1768 he enrolled in the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University), where he was inspired by the college president John Witherspoon (1723–1794) to embrace democratic idealism and to become a founder of the Whig Society on campus. With his friends James MADISON and Philip FRENEAU, Brackenridge launched a PAMPHLET war against the campus Tory society. The two groups often exchanged blows as well as words.

In 1770 Brackenridge and Freneau wrote one of the earliest American novels, "Father Bombo's Pilgrimage to Mecca." While little of the manuscript remains, its satirical style and literary devices are characteristic of Brackenridge's later novels. On September 25, 1771, Brackenridge and Freneau presented "The Rising Glory of America," a poem about the Princeton commencement. The verse celebrated America's destiny and the triumph of the New World over the Old in science, art, and commerce.

Having taught for four years in Maryland, Brackenridge returned to Princeton in 1774 for postgraduate work. He wrote several plays memorializing the American soldiers at war. In 1777 he enlisted in George WASHINGTON's army as a chaplain, and although he had never been ordained, he took the pulpit to preach political sermons against the British. The following year he published a collection of these sermons in Six Political Discourses Founded on the Scripture (1778).

In 1779 Brackenridge went to Philadelphia, where he used his life savings of £1,000 to finance a new journal. The United States Magazine featured Freneau's poetry and Brackenridge's fiction about the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. When the magazine failed less than a year later, Brackenridge abandoned publishing for the legal profession. He passed the bar in 1780 and moved to Pittsburgh.

In 1786 he helped establish the Pittsburgh Gazette, in which he published articles designed to advance his emerging political career. Brackenridge was elected to the state assembly but was rejected as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1787. He helped open a bookstore and was a cofounder of the Pittsburgh Academy (later the University of Pittsburgh).

Despite his social conservatism, Brackenridge retained a liberal political perspective. He opposed President Washington's pro-British policies in the 1790s and was sympathetic to the Pennsylvania farmers who protested the federal government's excise tax on locally produced liquor. As the possibility of violence grew, Brackenridge took on the role of peacemaker, siding with the "Whiskey Rebels" but urging them to negotiate rather than make war on the United States. When his peacemaking turned both the rebels and the government against him, Brackenridge wrote a 361-page defense. His Incidents of the Insurrection in the Western Parts of Pennsylvania, in the Year 1794 (1795) was a powerful account of the revolt, with insights into mob mentality and the fragility of democracy on the frontier.

It was also a moving portrayal of the author as a man forced to choose between committing treason and supporting the best interests of his neighbors. Incidents is a serious examination of an individual dilemma, devoid of the satiric voice typically associated with Brackenridge.

In 1804, after Brackenridge had been appointed justice to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, attacks on the state judiciary climaxed in efforts to impeach three justices. Brackenridge insisted on standing trial with his colleagues and was acquitted. In 1814 he published Law Miscellanies, about the need to adopt British precedents in American courts.

Brackenridge's epic Modern Chivalry was published in four volumes (1792–1797). One of the most widely read books in the early Republic, Chivalry recounts the travels of Captain John Farrago, a Jeffersonian, gentleman, and farmer, and his servant, Teague O'Regan, an ambitious but illiterate Irish immigrant. Together these men roam the country, observing human nature and the workings of the new Republic. Although Farrago is educated and cultured, it is Teague who wins the hearts of the "backwoods democracy." Ignorant of the law and political theory, Teague is elected to office and accepted as a minister, lawyer, and professor.

For Brackenridge, who still endorsed democracy, the fate of Farrago and Teague epitomized the dangers of a democratic society: the tyranny of an ignorant majority was a peril as great as the tyranny of an educated few. Ironically, Teague was at home in a democracy while Farrago was a misfit, leading an incongruous life as an erudite gentleman in a frontier world. Brackenridge died June 25, 1816.

Works

Brackenridge, Hugh Henry. Modern Chivalry. Philadelphia: John M'Culloch, 1792; revised, Philadelphia: J. Conrad, 1804–1805; Early American Imprints, 24142, 24143.

Brackenridge. Incidents of the Insurrection in the Western Parts of Pennsylvania, in the Year 1794. 1795. Edited by Daniel Marder. New Haven, Conn.: College and University Press, 1972; Early American Imprints, 28332.

Brackenridge. Law Miscellanies. Philadelphia: P. Byrne, 1814; New York: Arno, 1972; Early American Imprints, second series, 30978.

Sources

Marder, Daniel. Hugh Henry Brackenridge. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Newlin, Claude Milton. The Life and Writings of Hugh Henry Brackenridge. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1932.

Bradford, Andrew (1686–1742) printer, journalist

Andrew Bradford was born in Philadelphia into a family already well established as printers. His father, William Bradford (1663–1752), learned the trade in London, where he married Elizabeth Sowle, the daughter of his master. In 1685 the Bradford family immigrated to Philadelphia under the sponsorship of the QUAKER government, bringing with them printing supplies and a press. William Bradford's attempts to operate a free press earned the displeasure of the Quaker authorities. Tried and acquitted of sedition, Bradford moved his family and his business to New York. The business was successful, and Bradford became the official printer for the colony.

Andrew Bradford trained as a printer under his father in New York, and by 1711 he was in partnership with his father as a master printer. In 1712 Andrew returned to Philadelphia, which had been without a steady printer since William Bradford's departure. He was immediately successful, serving as the unofficial printer for the provincial government, publishing books with his father, and establishing himself as a BOOKSELLER and merchant of imported goods.

On December 22, 1719, Andrew Bradford and his partner John Copson, a bookseller, began publication of the AMERICAN WEEKLY MERCURY, the third newspaper published in the British colonies and the first published in Philadelphia. The elder Bradford had an interest in the Mercury as well, securing New York advertisers for his son and, beginning in 1725, sharing news features with his own paper, the NEW-YORK GAZETTE. Copson left the business in 1721, and in 1739 Bradford ended the partnership with his father, becoming sole publisher.

Andrew Bradford's success led to his appointment in 1720 as the official printer for Pennsylvania. His appointment did not ease his relationship with the Quaker authorities. In 1722 Bradford was officially reprimanded for publishing a PAMPHLET and an editorial that were highly critical of the colonial government. Refusing to yield to official pressure, Andrew became a vocal advocate for freedom of the press. He published a number of editorials in the Mercury supporting James Franklin (1697–1735), who was resisting similar attempts to censor his Boston newspaper, the NEW-ENGLAND COURANT.

Andrew Bradford continued to succeed, despite occasional friction with local officials and competition from new printers, including James Franklin's younger brother, Benjamin FRANKLIN. Using the Mercury as a foundation, Bradford became prominent in local politics, serving on the city council. He also became one of the wealthiest citizens of Philadelphia, investing in real estate and in a variety of business ventures not related to printing or journalism. He was married twice during this period, first to Dorcas Boels, who died circa 1740, and then to Cornelia Smith.

In 1741 Bradford established the American Magazine; or, A Monthly View of the Political State of the British Colonies, the first publication of this type in the British colonies. The magazine, an early imitation of London's Gentleman's Magazine, failed after three issues, but it suggested new possibilities that would be fulfilled by other printers in the near future. Bradford died in Philadelphia on November 24, 1742. The Mercury outlived him, operating until 1746 under the management of his wife, Cornelia.

Works

The Young Man's Companion: in Four Parts. New York: Printed and sold by William and Andrew Bradford, 1710; Early American Imprints, 39517.

The American Weekly Mercury. Philadelphia: Andrew Bradford and John Capson, 1719–1723; reprint, 4 volumes. Philadelphia: Colonial Society of Pennsylvania, 1908; Early American Imprints.

The American Magazine; or, A Monthly View of the Political State of the British Colonies. Philadelphia: Printed by A. Bradford, 1741; New York: Columbia University Press, 1937.

Sources

De Armond, Anna Janney. Andrew Bradford, Colonial Journalist. New York: Greenwood Press, 1949.

Hedgpeeth Williams, Julie. The Significance of the Printed Word in Early America: Colonists' Thoughts on the Role of the Press. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Jones, Horatio Gates. An Address Delivered at the Annual Meeting of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: King & Baird, 1869; republished as Andrew Bradford. New York: Arno, 1970.

Remer, Rosalind. Printers and Men of Capital: Philadelphia Book Publishers in the New Republic. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1996.

Bradford, Cornelia Smith (?–1755) printer, journalist

Little is known of the early life of Cornelia Smith Bradford. She was born into a prosperous family in New York City, and in 1740 married Andrew BRADFORD, son of the noted Philadelphia printer William Bradford (1663–1752). When Andrew Bradford died in November 1742, he left his widow his printing press, ironworks, and real estate. Although Cornelia Bradford was financially secure, she took over the operations of her late husband's newspaper, the AMERICAN WEEKLY MERCURY. Bradford then edited and printed the magazine from 1742 to 1749. She also operated a printing shop and general store, offering goods imported from England, such as stationery, books, furniture, clothing, and medicine.

Bradford was among the few women printers and journalists of her day. Of thirty-two female printers before 1820, she was the second to enter the field. She was the third of eleven women known to have supported themselves as printers prior to the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Although her print-shop activities following the demise of the newspaper were restricted to bookbinding and the printing of ALMANACS, she continued to operate an independent business until 1751. Cornelia Bradford died in May 1755.

Works

The American Magazine; or, A Monthly View of the Political State of the British Colonies. Philadelphia: Printed by A. Bradford, 1741; New York: Columbia University Press, 1937.

The American Weekly Mercury. Philadelphia: Cornelia Bradford, 1742–1749; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Barlow, Marjorie Dana. Notes on Women Printers in Colonial America and the United States, 1639–1975. New York: University Press of Virginia, 1976.

De Armond, Anna Janney. Andrew Bradford, Colonial Journalist. New York: Greenwood Press, 1949.

Bradford, John (1749–1830) journalist, publisher

John Bradford was born in Virginia on June 6, 1749. The son of Daniel and Alice Morgan Bradford, John married Eliza James in 1771 and, like his father, worked as a surveyor in western Virginia. Following service in the militia during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, Bradford worked in Kentucky as a surveyor from 1779 until late 1780 or early 1781.

He returned to Kentucky as a surveyor in 1782. As he had on his earlier assignment, Bradford used this as an opportunity to locate and purchase land. By the end of his second assignment he had accumulated more than 7,900 acres in partnership with one of his brothers. Bradford and his family moved to Kentucky permanently in 1785, settling near Lexington.

Later that year Bradford joined the movement to separate Kentucky from Virginia and to form a new state from the former western territory. The statehood committee recognized the need for a press capable of promoting the cause among the general public. Anticipating a monopoly on government printing contracts, Bradford volunteered to establish the first printing shop in Kentucky. He sent his brother Fielding to Pittsburgh to train as a printer and to purchase the necessary equipment and supplies.

The first issue of the Kentucky Gazette was published on August 11, 1787, in a temporary shop in the Lexington courthouse. From the beginning the Gazette promoted the cause of separation and statehood. Over time the paper added features that were similar to those carried by other American newspapers in the postrevolutionary period. Essays, advertising, and literature appeared among regional articles about Kentucky.

From 1788 on Bradford ran the newspaper as the sole proprietor and editor, reflecting a Republican (or Jeffersonian) political perspective. Republicans, led by the future President Thomas JEFFERSON, generally preferred to bring middle-class men into political leadership; the FEDERALISTS generally favored wealthy merchants and large landowners over the Republican base of smaller storekeepers, wholesalers, and landowners. It is not surprising that the newspaper advocated Republican views. The territory was dominated by small landowners trying to separate from Virginia, a state politically dominated by the owners of great estates. Bradford therefore flourished as a public printer, receiving the majority of assignments of publishing state notices and laws for the next decade. He also succeeded as a commercial publisher, printing the first books published in Kentucky, including the first edition of the Kentucky Almanac (1788). In 1802 he purchased the Kentucky Herald, one of his principal competitors, merged it with the Gazette, and turned the business over to his son Daniel. The paper was sold in 1809 but returned to family control in 1814, when it was purchased by Bradford's son Fielding. In the meantime, Daniel Bradford had established a second newspaper, the Lexington Public Advertiser. Bradford's other three sons also followed their father into the printing business, establishing newspapers and publishing companies throughout the South.

During this time John Bradford remained active in real estate and in government affairs. He served in a number of elected and appointed positions and also played a leading role in establishing many of the state's first public institutions, including Transylvania University, the library and hospital in Lexington, and the postal service.

Bradford returned to the newspaper business at the age of seventy-one, assuming editorial responsibility for the Public Advertiser. In 1825 he became the editor of the Gazette, which was no longer under his family's control. During his second stint with the Gazette, Bradford produced his most notable pieces of journalism: "Notes on Kentucky" was a series of sixty-two articles published from 1826 to 1829 that chronicled the early history of the state. Bradford died March 21, 1830.

Works

The Kentucky Almanac for the Year of Our Lord 1820. Lexington: Printed by Thomas Smith, 1819; Early American Imprints, second series, 48418.

Bradford, John. The Voice of the Frontier: John Bradford's Notes on Kentucky, edited by Thomas D. Clark. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1993.

Sources

Brewer, Fredric. John Bradford: Pioneer Kentucky Printer. Bloomington, Ind.: F. Brewer, 1995.

Coleman, J. Winston. John Bradford, Esq.: Pioneer Kentucky Printer and Historian. Lexington, Ky.: Winburn, 1950.

Bradford, William (1590–1657) historian

Our fathers were Englishmen which came over this great ocean, and were ready to perish in this wilderness.
—History of Plymouth Plantation (1630)

William Bradford was born in March 1590 in Austerfield, England, to William and Alice Hanson Bradford. After the death of his father his mother remarried, and young William was raised by his uncles, Thomas Bradford and Robert Bradford, who wanted him to become a farmer. After an encounter with the nonconformist preacher Richard Clyfton, however, Bradford took a different path. Leaving his uncles' care, Bradford joined Clyfton's SEPARATIST church in the small village of Scrooby. There Bradford met Separatist leaders William Brewster (1567–1644) and John Robinson (circa 1575–1625), the two most influential figures in his life. Fleeing royal threats, the Scrooby congregation decamped to Amsterdam with other Separatists in 1608. There, in 1613, Bradford married Dorothy May, daughter of a member of the English Church in Amsterdam. The couple had one child, John, who stayed in Holland when his father's Separatist group—known as the Pilgrims—left for America. Father and son were reunited about seven years later, but Dorothy Bradford did not live to see her son in America. William remarried, and with his second wife, Alice Carpenter Southworth, had three additional children. Throughout his thirty-seven years in America, Bradford retained leadership of the Separatist colony, serving as governor thirty-one times. In his personal writings and in his formal histories, he typically refers to himself as "the governor."

William Bradford's literary standing rests upon his two-volume history of PLYMOUTH COLONY, which he began writing in 1630. The first volume of HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION focuses on the Pilgrims' experiences before their migration to America. The second volume narrates the history of the plantation from the Pilgrims' arrival in 1620 until 1646. Bradford appears to have completed the first book. His sources for the latter included his letter book, in which he kept copies of his correspondence almost a quarter of the entire manuscript, in 1630 and worked on the second book from 1646 to 1650, and probably a diary.

In his History, Bradford describes the Reformation as a clash between saints and Satan. The word of God leads men to truth and rectitude and thus to progress; yet, Satan attempts to infiltrate the community of good men by exploiting their pride and ambition. Despite the powerful influence of scripture, human advancement is not inevitable.

In his writing Bradford moves from the general to the specific. He starts with the Continental Reformation, discusses the English Reformation, and ends with religious disputes in northern England. His framework allows a shift from an emphasis on overarching spiritual forces to one on the will of men. The first book ends with the Pilgrims led by God—and by necessity—to a place they have named Plymouth. Bradford writes that on December 25, 1620, the refugees "began to erect the first house for common use to receive them and their goods."

The second book treats the Pilgrims as people facing the demands of settlement and the difficulties of maintaining a spiritual community. Bradford carefully assesses individual motives and material conditions. His hero in the second book is the “covenanted community,” and the villains are ambitious men whose selfishness undermines communalism. These men travel with the Pilgrims on the MAYFLOWER, sent by the London Adventurers who support the colony. Bradford does not openly condemn them but relies on descriptive vignettes to sway the reader’s opinion of them. The response of the Pilgrims is to allow the sinners a chance to repent.

Bradford does not end his history of the colony with a formal conclusion. His last words are “Anno 1647” and “Anno 1648”—which prompted the historian Peter Gay to write, “And so, Bradford ends his history in silence.” He died May 9, 1657.

Work

Bradford, William. History of Plymouth Plantation, edited by Charles Deane. Boston: Little, Brown, 1856; edited by Samuel Eliot Morison. New York: Knopf, 1952.

Sources

Anderson, Douglas. William Bradford’s Books: Of Plimmoth Plantation and the Printed Word. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Gay, Peter. A Loss of Mastery: Puritan Historians in Colonial America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966.

Philbrick, Nathaniel. Mayflower: A Story of Courage, Community, and War. New York: Viking, 2006.

Bradstreet, Anne (circa 1612–1672) poet

If ever two were one, then surely we.

If ever man were lov’d by wife, then thee.

—“To My Dear and Loving Husband” (1678)

Anne Bradstreet, a classically educated Puritan poet, composed works about family, history, and death, culture and nature, spirituality and theology, and the tension between faith and doubt. The first published poet in the New World, Bradstreet wrote meditations on society and expressions of self-examination. In keeping with both her spiritual commitment and the social expectations of her seventeenth-century world, Bradstreet composed her poetry in addition to attending to the duties of her household and family. Her earliest dated poem, “Upon a Fit of Sickness, Anno. 1632,” is notable because it raises a recurring theme throughout her work: the tension between a love of worldly things and a desire to yield to the will of God.

Anne Dudley was born around 1612 in Northampton, England, the daughter of Dorothy Yorke and Thomas Dudley, an influential Puritan leader and steward to the earl of Lincoln at Sempringham. Her father’s position allowed Anne access to the earl’s extensive library, so that from the age of seven, with her father’s encouragement, she was tutored and educated in the Elizabethan tradition. Anne studied a wide variety of classical and modern authors including Homer, Ovid, Livy, Shakespeare, Milton, Hobbes, Spenser, and Sidney, along with the French Protestant poet, Guillaume du Bartas. As the child of devout Puritans, she was also well versed in the Geneva Bible—a translation of the Bible published in Geneva (New Testament, 1557; Old Testament, 1560) by Protestant scholars in exile from England.

Around 1628, Anne Dudley married Simon Bradstreet (1603–1697), a colonial leader, and assistant to her father as steward of the Earl of Sempringham’s estate. As part of John Winthrop’s migration to the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY, the Dudley and Bradstreet families left England on the AR-BELLA in July 1630, arriving in Salem after a three-month Atlantic crossing. The Bradstreets moved from Salem, Massachusetts, to Charlestown, eventually settling in Andover in 1645. By then, the couple had six children. They had two more children, in 1648 and 1652. Simon Bradstreet served as governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony from 1679 to 1686 and from 1689 to 1692.

Aware of her own mortality—as most colonial women who endured childbirth inevitably were—Bradstreet, whose health was generally weak, apparently felt an intense attachment to the world around her. She was deeply devoted to her husband and children and saw her primary role as caregiver and spouse. Her husband, children, and grandchildren are often the subjects of her poetry.

Bradstreet’s poetry displays a sophisticated range of style and content, including formal “debate poems,” such as “A Dialogue between Old England and New” and “The Flesh and the Spirit,” classical homage, such as “In Honour of that High and Mighty Princess, Queen ELIZABETH,” and reflective poems, such as “Contemplations.” Several of Bradstreet’s poems are notable for their erotic content. Using Elizabethan sonnets as models, Bradstreet expressed her sexual desire for Simon in a poem written during one of his many long absences:

My chilled limbs now nummed lye forlorn;

Return, return sweet Sol from Capricorn;

In this dead time, alas, what can I more

Than view those fruits through which thy heat I bore?

Bradstreet and her publishers were aware of the risqué nature of such a poem; the subtitle of the volume in which it appeared assured the readers that all the poems were written by “a Gentlewoman.”

In “The Prologue” to Bradstreet’s The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America (1650; the only volume of her poems published during her lifetime), she addresses her place in the poetic continuum: “To sing of wars, of captains, and of kings, / Of cities founded, commonwealth begun, / For my mean pen are too superior things.” While acknowledging the presumed place for a female poet, Bradstreet notes, “I am obnoxious to each carping tongue / Who says my hand a needle better fits." She then laments her position as a female poet: "If what I do prove well, it won't advance, / They'll say it's stol'n, or else it was by chance."

Manuscript page from Anne Bradstreet's "Meditations Divine and Morall," 1664, which she gave her son. It was unpublished during her lifetime.

The most ambitious poems in this volume are the quaternions, poems composed of four parts: "The Four Humors of Man," "The Four Elements," "The Four Ages of Man," and "The Four Seasons." These poems underscored her familiarity with classical literature and ancient societies, with Greek metaphysics and medieval and Renaissance cosmology. A revised and enlarged volume, generally considered a richer collection, was printed posthumously in 1678, six years after her death.

Works

- Bradstreet, Anne. The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America. By a Gentlewoman in Those Parts. London: Stephen Bowtell, 1650; Early American Imprints, 244; republished as The Tenth Muse (1650) and from the Manuscripts: Meditations Divine and Morall. . . . Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1974.
- Bradstreet. The Works of Anne Bradstreet, edited by Jeannine Hensley. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Bradstreet. A Woman's Inner World: Selected Poetry and Prose of Anne Bradstreet, edited by Adelaide P. Amore. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1982.

Sources

- Cowell, Pattie and Ann Stanford, eds. Critical Essays on Anne Bradstreet. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983.
- Craig, Raymond A., comp. A Concordance to the Complete Works of Anne Bradstreet. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000.
- Martin, Wendy. An American Triptych: Anne Bradstreet, Emily Dickinson, Adrienne Rich. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Rosenmeier, Rosamond. Anne Bradstreet Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1991.
- White, Elizabeth Wade. Anne Bradstreet, "The Tenth Muse." New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Recommended Writings

- The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America* (1650)
- "Before the Birth of One of Her Children" (1678)
- "Meditations Divine and Morall" (1950?)

Studying Anne Bradstreet

Anne Bradstreet was the first poet and first woman from colonial America whose work was published. Although Bradstreet did not seek a public audience nor publication, her poems attracted keen interest when they appeared in print after her brother-in-law brought a manuscript to England, without her knowledge, and had the poems printed in London with the title The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung up in America (1650). Students interested in Bradstreet will find a rich field of study that addresses poetics, religion, women's lives, and historical conditions in early America. Bradstreet's poems cover conventional topics of Renaissance poetry and personal subjects, a range that invites numerous scholarly investigations. The Tenth Muse, for example, includes a set of poems with four speakers, known as quaternions, poems addressing social and political issues, a poem honoring her father, and elegies to Sir Philip Sidney and to Queen Elizabeth and to the subject of poetry itself. A second collection of Bradstreet's poems, published after her death, Several Poems Compiled with Great Variety of Wit and Learning . . . (1678) includes poems written in the tradition of the dialogue, such as "The Flesh and the Spirit"—and personal reflections on motherhood, marriage, and artistry, many written in rhyming heroic couplets that reflect Bradstreet's classical training. For standard editions of Bradstreet's poetry, students should consult The Works of Anne Bradstreet, edited by Jeannine Hensley (Cambridge, Mass., Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1967) and The Complete Works of Anne Bradstreet, edited by Joseph R. McElrath Jr. and Allan P. Robb (Boston: Twayne, 1981).

Students interested in understanding Anne Bradstreet's life within the context of her Puritan, NEW ENGLAND culture should begin with biographies such as Elizabeth Wade White's Anne Bradstreet: "The Tenth Muse" (New York: Oxford University Press, 1971) and Ann Stanford's Anne Brad- street: The Worldly Puritan: An Introduction to Her Poetry (New York: Burt Franklin, 1974). For studies focusing on Bradstreet's poetry, see Critical Essays on Anne Bradstreet, edited by Pattie Cowell and Ann Stanford (Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1983) and Wendy Martin's An American Triptych: Anne Bradstreet, Emily Dickinson, Adrienne Rich (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984). For more-general studies of Puritan poetry, students should consider Jeffrey Hammond's Sinful Self, Saintly Self: The Puritan Experience of Poetry (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993); William J. Scheick's Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998) and Scheick's Seventeenth-Century American Poetry: A Reference Guide (Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1977); Robert Daly's God's Altar: The World and the Flesh in Puritan Poetry (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978); Ivy Schweitzer's The Work of Self-Representation: Lyric Poetry in Colonial New England (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991); and Amy M. E. Morris's Popular Measures: Poetry and Church Order in Seventeenth-Century Massachusetts (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005). Students interested in studying the historical background and conventions of seventeenth-century poetry might consult Peter White and Harrison T. Meserole's Puritan Poets and Poetics: Seventeenth-Century American Poetry in Theory and Practice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985) and the more-advanced work, David S. Shields's Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990). Bibliographical and reference sources include Raymond F. Dolle's Anne Bradstreet, A Reference Guide (Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1990) and Raymond A. Craig's A Concordance to the Complete Works of Anne Bradstreet (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000). For selected Bradstreet poetry available as electronic sources, see The Academy of American Poets (<<http://www.poets.org>> viewed May 15, 2007) and Fire and Ice: Puritan and Reformed Writings (<<http://www.puritansermons.com/poetry/anneindx.htm>> viewed May 15, 2007).

Bray, Thomas (1656–1730) propagandist, missionary

Thomas Bray was born in 1656 at Marton in Shropshire, England. Nothing is known about his parents and early childhood. Following his education at Oswestry School, Bray earned his bachelor's degree from Oxford University in 1678 and a master's degree in 1693. He was ordained an Anglican clergyman and gained significant experience in England as a priest, curate, family chaplain, and rector. In 1695 the ANGLICAN CHURCH sent Reverend Bray to the colonies in response to concerns over church conditions and management. Bray reported his findings in A Memorial, Representing the State of Religion, on the Continent of North-America (1700), which called for more episcopal oversight. Bray began with a general overview: "And it is to represent to You, the present State of Religion . . . when, as many Thousands are in a happy Disposition to embrace it, so Infidelity and Heresie seem to make their utmost Efforts to withdraw, and to fix those People at the greatest distance from it.”

Bray then offers specifics on the spiritual condition of each state, noting that, while Pennsylvania and the Carolinas seem to be in fairly good shape, Maryland and Rhode Island appear to be cause for concern. He explains: “In ROAD-ISLAND, for want of a Clergy, many of the Inhabitants are said to be sunk downright into Atheism.” In general, colonies with large QUAKER and Papist populations attract Bray’s greatest focus. He was most pleased with the colony of Newfoundland, an Anglican stronghold, and with this as his model, Bray provided a detailed plan for improving church conditions and propagation in America.

In 1695 Bray was chosen to serve in Maryland, which had been established as a Catholic colony. There he began an aggressive program to establish and expand the Church of England. He recruited missionaries to serve in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other colonies. Bray also established approximately thirty libraries for the clergy and the communities, sixteen of which were in Maryland. With the aid of his superiors in England, Bray organized the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in 1699 and two years later established the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG).

Bray returned to England in 1702 as an official of the SPG. He continued to advocate the established church and the episcopacy in the colonies, which made him a target for Quaker attacks. Despite this he won approval for an act to revise the religious laws in Maryland. He also became active in early reform campaigns, encouraging the development of libraries, charity schools, and hospitals. Bray wrote several works concerning his activities in America: “A General View of English Colonies in America with Respect to Religion” (1698); A Memorial, Representing the State of Religion, on the Continent of North-America (1700); and The Acts of Dr. Bray’s Visitation, Held at Annapolis [sic] in Mary-land (1700). The last two works were based on Bray’s circular letters to the Anglican clergy in Maryland. Bray died February 15, 1730, in London.

Works

- Bray, Thomas. An Essay Towards Promoting All Necessary and Useful Knowledge, Both Divine and Human. London: Printed by E. Holt for Robert Clavel, 1697; Boston: G. K. Hall, 1967.
- Bray. A Memorial Representing the Present State of Religion, on the Continent of North-America. London: Printed by William Downing, 1700; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1977.
- Bray. A Short Account of the Several Kinds of Societies, Set Up of Late Years, for Carrying on the Reformation of Manners, and for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge. London: Printed by J. Brudewell, 1700; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1961.

Bray. Rev. Thomas Bray: His Life and Selected Works Relating to Maryland. Maryland Historical Society, 1901; New York: Arno, 1972.

The Reverend Thomas Bray D.D., 1656–1730 . . . A Selection from His Papers together with a Group of American Manuscripts. New York: H. P. Kraus, 1978.

Sources

- Doll, Peter M. Revolution, Religion and National Identity: Imperial Anglicanism in British North America, 1745–1795. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2000.
- Laugher, Charles T. Thomas Bray’s Grand Design: Libraries of the Church of England in America, 1695–1785. Chicago: American Library Association, 1973.

Brewster, Martha Wadsworth (fl. 1725–1757) poet

Little is known about the life of Martha Wadsworth Brewster. She was the daughter of Joseph and Lydia Brown Wadsworth. Town records prove that she lived in Lebanon, Connecticut, but she may have spent part of her life in Goshen, Massachusetts. She was married to Oliver Brewster by 1732, and the couple had two children, Ruby and Wadsworth.

Brewster’s Poems on Divers Subjects (1757), published in New London, Connecticut, was one of only four volumes of poetry published by women during the colonial period. Poems contains seventeen poems, four acrostics, several letters, and a prose description of a dream about Brewster’s father. Most of the poems deal with traditional religious and domestic themes, but in poems like “To the Memory of That Worthy Man Lieut. Nathaneal Burt of Springfield” and “Braddock’s Defeat, July 9, 1755,” Brewster writes about military events and the violence of warfare, both of which were radical topics for an eighteenth-century female poet.

Brewster was aware, like Anne BRADSTREET, that “women were not expected to speak,” and she made her apology in the preface to Poems:

*Pardon her bold Attempt who has reveal’d her thoughts to view, more fit to be Conceal’d;
Since thus to do was urged Vehemently,
Yet most no doubt will call it Vanity*

Brewster faced accusations that she had “borrowed” her verse from contemporary male poets, and to defend herself, she agreed to extemporaneously translate a passage from the Scriptures into verse. She wrote a twenty-eight-line poem on II Chronicles 6:16–17, and included the translation in Poems.

Work

- Brewster, Martha. Poems on Divers Subjects. New London, Conn.: Printed by John Green, 1757; Early American Imprints, 7855.

Source

Scheick, William J. Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Brown, Charles Brockden (1771–1810) novelist, editor

"My wife!" I exclaimed: "O God! Make me not the butcher of my wife!"

—Wieland (1798)

Charles Brockden Brown successfully adapted the European GOTHIC ROMANCE to the American landscape by setting his tales in a romanticized wilderness, emphasizing the decaying natural world and haunted habitations. Brown was born in Philadelphia on January 17, 1771, the son of Elijah Brown, a QUAKER merchant, and Mary Armitt Brown. At the age of eleven, Brown attended the Friends' Public Latin School in Philadelphia where he studied with Robert Proud (1728–1813). Upon graduating in 1787, Brown trained to be an attorney, but found himself unsuited to its practice. He could not, he said, defend those whom he believed to be guilty. Thus he gave his legal studies up to pursue a career as a writer.

In his relatively short life, Brown became one of the New Republic's most significant writers, influencing the English writers John Keats (1795–1821), Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822), and William Godwin (1756–1836). He was admired by other Americans, including William DUNLAP and the nineteenth-century writers William Ellery Channing (1780–1842), Richard Henry Dana Jr. (1815–1882), James Fenimore Cooper (1789–1851), Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849), and Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804–1864).

During his most productive years, between 1796 and 1800, Brown divided his time between Philadelphia and New York. He had been a member of the literary and artistic circle of the New York FRIENDLY CLUB since the early 1790s. He published four novels during this period and, in addition, co-founded and edited The Monthly Magazine, and American Review (1799–1800). Brown's stay in New York ended in tragedy, however, when a yellow fever epidemic struck the city in 1798, killing his closest friend and housemate, Dr. Elihu Hubbard. Brown remained to care for his friend and eventually contracted the disease himself. The theme of moral choice in the midst of plague and death became a central theme in several of Brown's novels.

In 1800 Brown left New York, returning to his childhood home of Philadelphia. He continued to write, producing two new novels. He found American society in the early nineteenth century unable to support his profession, however, and soon after returning to his hometown, Brown began work in his brother's mercantile importing firm.

Brown's fiction has a strong intellectual quality. His Alcuin: A Dialogue (1798) is an extended conversation between a married woman and a young man which addresses the institution of marriage and women's traditional gender roles. Ormond; or, the Secret Witness (1799) engages the radical ideas of English writers such as Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797). Brown creates several strong female characters, among them Constantia, a woman who digs graves in the middle of the night in order to provide decent burial for plague victims. When the title character, Ormond, attempts to rape Constantia, she arms herself with a knife and kills him in self-defense.

C. B. Brown

Charles Brockden Brown

WIELAND; OR, THE TRANSFORMATION, set in Mettigen, Pennsylvania, is a Gothic romance that examines the unexpected pitfalls of an intense commitment to a set of religious beliefs, as religious fanaticism leads to madness and murder. Another Gothic romance, Edgar Huntly; or, Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker (1799), explores how a life based on principles, in this case radical benevolent principles, can leave personal disasters in its wake. Brown's Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793 (1799–1800) looks at the ways that selfish action and pure motives can overlap, coexisting in the character of a man who seems on the surface to be open, innocent, and high-minded, but whose every deed advances his own interests. Like Ormond, Arthur Mervyn is written in the style of literary realism.

By 1803 Brown's interest seems to have shifted away from fiction that explored personal morality to essays that explored contemporary political issues. He published pamphlets on current events, taking a strong stand in favor of national expansion and adopting a critical stance against President Thomas JEFFERSON. Brown edited The Literary Magazine, and American Register from 1803 to 1807. He married Elizabeth Linn in 1804, and the couple had four children. When the Literary Magazine failed, Brown created The American Register, or General Repository of History, Politics, and Science, which ran from 1807 until his death in 1810. He died of tuberculosis in Philadelphia on February 22, 1810.

Works

Brown, Charles Brockden. Wieland; Or the Transformation. An American Tale. New York: Printed by T. & J. Swords for H. Caritat, 1798; Early American Imprints, 33461, 35247. Edited by Emory Elliott. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Brown. The Novels and Related Works of Charles Brockden Brown, 6 volumes, edited by Sydney J. Krause, Alexander Cowie, and S. W. Reid. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1977–1987.

Sources

Barnard, Philip, Mark Kamrath, and Stephen Shapiro, eds. Revising Charles Brockden Brown: Culture, Politics, and Sexuality in the Early Republic. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2004.

The Charles Brockden Brown Electronic Archive and Scholarly Edition (<<http://www.brockdenbrown.ucf.edu/index.php>> viewed August 24, 2006).

Christophersen, Bill. The Apparition in the Glass: Charles Brockden Brown's American Gothic. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993.

Kafer, Peter. Charles Brockden Brown's Revolution and the Birth of American Gothic. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Ringe, Donald A. Charles Brockden Brown. Revised edition. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Watts, Steven. The Romance of Real Life: Charles Brockden Brown and the Origins of American Culture. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Recommended Writings

Wieland; Or the Transformation (1798)

Ormond; or the Secret Witness (1799)

Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793 (1799–1800)

Edgar Huntly; or Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker (1799)

Clara Howard; in a Series of Letters (1801)

Studying Charles Brockden Brown

Charles Brockden Brown wrote six novels, largely in a Gothic, Romantic style, with intricate plots and hauntingly psychological themes. In addition, Brown was a highly influential editor, founder, and publisher of literary magazines and journals. Brown also wrote political PAMPHLETS and essays and was a member of the FRIENDLY CLUB, a New York–based literary group with interests in social reform, particularly those of British reformers William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft. Although financial reward eluded him, Brown was well known in literary circles during his lifetime, and as one of the first American writers of GOTHIC ROMANCE, Brown was an important literary influence on authors such as Edgar Allan Poe and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

For an authoritative scholarly edition of Brown's novels, see The Novels and Related Works of Charles Brockden Brown, 6 volumes, edited by Sydney J. Krause, Alexander Cowie, and S. W. Reid (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1977–1987). Students interested in studying Brown's Gothic style should begin with Norman S. Grabo's The Coincidental Art of Charles Brockden Brown (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981); Bill Christophersen's The Apparition in the Glass: Charles Brockden Brown's American Gothic (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993); Peter Kafer's Charles Brockden Brown's Revolution and the Birth of American Gothic (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004). For a general biography of Brown, see Donald A. Ringe's Charles Brockden Brown, revised edition (Boston: Twayne, 1991) and Steven Watts's The Romance of Real Life: Charles Brockden Brown and the Origins of American Culture (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994). Students interested in more-advanced study should consult Revising Charles Brockden Brown: Culture, Politics, and Sexuality in the Early Republic, edited by Philip Barnard, Mark Kamrath, and Stephen Shapiro (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2004). To learn more about Brown's newspaper and editorial work, see Scott Slawinski's Validating Bachelorhood: Audience, Patriarchy, and Charles Brockden Brown's Editorship of the Monthly Magazine and American Review (New York: Routledge, 2005) and Michael Cody's Charles Brockden Brown and The Literary Magazine: Cultural Journalism in the Early American Republic (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004). Students interested in learning more about the Friendly Club and Brown's association with this social and literary group, see Bryan Waterman's Republic of Intellect: The Friendly Club of New York City and the Making of American Literature (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2007). For electronic sources, see The Charles Brockden Brown Electronic Archive and Scholarly Edition,

Title page for Brown's novel about a religious fanatic who murders his family, believing to have been so instructed by God a project dedicated to publishing the uncollected writings of Charles Brockden Brown, with additional links and secondary sources (<<http://www.brockdenbrown.ucf.edu/>> viewed April 24, 2007).

Brown, William Hill (1765–1793) novelist, poet, playwright

“... as I bent my pensive step towards Bellevue, I had leisure to animadvert on the fatal tendency of SEDUCTION.”

—The Power of Sympathy (1789)

William Hill Brown was born in November 1765 in Boston, Massachusetts, the son of a renowned clock maker, Gawen Brown, and his third wife, Elizabeth Hill Adams Brown. William was one of thirteen siblings, only one of whom, a sister, shared both of his parents. Catherine Byles, a half sister of Gawen Brown's second wife, encouraged William's early interest in literature, and he began to write poetry and prose, and to associate with literary friends, including the poet Robert Treat Paine Jr. (1773–1811). In 1792 Brown left NEW ENGLAND and joined his sister Elizabeth and her new husband in North Carolina. There Brown studied law and pursued a literary career.

Recognized during his lifetime for his verse and plays, Brown was the author of the first American novel, The Power of Sympathy; or, the Triumph of Nature (1789), which was published anonymously when the author was in his early twenties. The novel was a roman à clef of a contemporary scandal involving a well-known Massachusetts couple, Perez and Sarah Morton, and the suicide of Sarah's sister Fanny Aphorpe. For many years the novel was attributed to Sarah Morton. It was not until the end of the nineteenth century that authorship was attributed to Brown.

Published in the United States, The Power of Sympathy is a novel of sensibility modeled on the English novelist Samuel Richardson's Pamela and Clarissa and on the German writer Goethe's The Sorrows of Young Werther. From Richardson, Brown took the idea of a seduction plot, but the hero of the novel is inspired by the character of Werther. In fact, Brown's hero commits suicide with a copy of Goethe's Sorrows opened beside him. Brown also draws on the English writer Laurence Sterne (1713–1768), author of Tristram Shandy, for a defense of sentimentality.

The central theme of the novel is the necessity of balancing feelings and reason. The plot, revealed in a series of letters, revolves around Harrington and Harriot, lovers who discover they have the same father. While they continue to have erotic feelings for one another, they realize they cannot consummate their relationship. Before taking his own life, Harrington declares that their epitaph must read “in their lives they loved, but were unhappy—in death they sleep undivided.”

Ira and Isabella (1807), published fourteen years after Brown's death, satirizes his first novel. Unlike his Power of Sympathy, which he claimed on the title page had been “founded in fact,” Ira and Isabella was “founded on fiction.” In this version of half-siblings in love, Ira and Isabella decide to consummate their love. Both of Brown's novels are characterized by hyperbole and by plots that sometimes strain credulity, but they are the work of a serious writer who appreciated the psychological potential of the novel.

Brown's contemporaries knew him as a poet, since The Power of Sympathy appeared anonymously and Ira and Isabella was not published in his lifetime. His most popular poem was a thirteen-stanza celebration of the ratification of the U.S. CONSTITUTION by his home state of Massachusetts, called "Yankee Song." The poem provides a patriotic roll call of those who helped win ratification, and Brown interjects a refreshing touch of humor by making fun of the northern dialect. William Hill Brown died at the age of twenty-eight, on September 2, 1793.

Works

Brown, William Hill. The Power of Sympathy: or, The Triumph of Nature. Boston: Printed by Isaiah Thomas and Company, 1789; Early American Imprints, 21979.

Brown. Selected Poems and Verse Fables, 1784–1793, edited by Richard Walser. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1982.

Sources

Barnes, Elizabeth. States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.

Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Samuels, Shirley. Romances of the Republic: Women, the Family, and Violence in the Literature of the Early American Nation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Stern, Julia A. The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Buell, Abel (1742–1822) printer

Abel Buell was born in Killingworth, Connecticut in 1742. Trained originally as a silversmith, Buell used this skill and a talent for engraving to convert five-shilling Connecticut notes into five-pound notes. Arrested and convicted of counterfeiting in 1764, Buell was sentenced to branding, imprisonment, and confiscation of his property. When he was released from jail a few months later, he invented a machine that could cut and polish precious stones. His success as an inventor encouraged public officials to restore his civic rights.

Buell manufactured and sold the first type font to be created by an American. His success came at a time when U.S. printers were dependent on Britain for all of their supplies, including ink, paper, presses, and type. The British government had recognized this and had included printing supplies in their new system of taxes. Like those imposed by the earlier STAMP ACT, British taxes on printer's supplies aroused fear that the British would censor the press. Buell's new type was initially purchased in 1769 by Benjamin EDES and John GILL of Boston, publishers of the BOSTON GAZETTE. The same year Buell received a grant from the Connecticut assembly to build one of the first American type foundries, in Hartford, Connecticut.

Beginning in 1770 Buell focused his attention on the technique of copper engraving, using the plates to print a variety of images but specializing in maps. In 1784 he printed the first map of the new United States, based on the boundaries negotiated under the Peace of Paris (1783). Buell ranks among the earliest and most active American entrepreneurs of technology. He died in 1822.

Sources

Wroth, Lawrence C. Abel Buell of Connecticut: Silversmith, Type-founder, and Engraver. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1926.

Wroth. The Colonial Printer. Portland, Maine: Southworth-Anthoensen Press, 1938.

Burr, Esther Edwards (1732–1758) correspondent

Esther Edwards Burr is best known for her correspondence with her friend Sarah Prince of Boston, Massachusetts. The letters took the form of a personal journal that chronicled daily life in America; from 1754 to 1757 Burr recorded the ordinary events of her life, reactions to novels she had read, accounts of personal encounters, responses to questions raised by her friend, and reflections on her own life. She also corresponded with a network of literary women, including Hannah GRIFFITS, Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON, Annis Boudinot STOCKTON, Rebecca Moore Smith, Elizabeth Norris, Anna Young Smith, Mary Read, and Susanna WRIGHT.

Burr was the third of eleven children born to Sarah Pierrepont and Jonathan EDWARDS in Northampton, Massachusetts. In 1752 she married Reverend Aaron Burr, the second president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University). Her marriage and move to New Jersey separated her geographically from friends and family, but she remained in contact with them by writing letters.

Although writing as a cultural and literary endeavor for women was not outwardly encouraged, especially in a professional sense, women were active letter writers and journal keepers. Genteel women, in fact, maintained extensive epistolary networks. For spiritually minded women, such as Burr, letters and journals reinforced the act of self-examination. As with other eighteenth century women, Burr's letter writing, moreover, afforded her an opportunity to converse with well-read women. Her public voice emerged when she expanded her conversation beyond reporting on her children and domestic affairs. In a letter written in 1755, she analyzed the English novels Pamela and Clarissa, popular in her day for the inclusion of pious and moral standards appropriate to eighteenth-century colonial America. Burr discussed the moral assumptions of the author, Samuel Richardson (1689–1761), concluding, "I am quite angry with [the author]. He has degraded our sex more horridly, to go and represent such virtue as Pamela, falling in love with Mr. B in the midst of such foul and abominable actions."

Burr's commitment to her husband and to her friend Sarah (whom she called "Fidelia" in her journal) seemed to her to present a religious dilemma. She wrote, "My heart is on the World and not on God.” When Aaron was absent on business for the college, she communicated her fears and trials to Sarah. She also expressed disappointment when she found out that Sarah would not be able to visit her in Princeton: “—To my great grief you tell me not to expect you this spring so I give you up for this World, but hope to meet you in a better.” Finally, when Mr. Ewing, a Princeton tutor, claimed that women could not know of real friendship, Burr defended her friendship with Sarah in a debate that lasted for an hour. She recognized and accepted the expectations of her Puritan traditions, but she also mitigated the effects of those constraints through her written exchanges with women friends.

Burr had two children, Sally and Aaron; her son was elected third vice president of the United States in 1800. Her husband died in 1757, and Esther died in the spring of 1758 of an unknown cause. Her journal is among the earliest written records of women in colonial life.

Work

Burr, Esther Edwards. The Journal of Esther Edwards Burr, 1754–1757, edited by Carol F. Karlsen and Laurie Crumpacker. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1984.

Sources

Harde, Roxanne. “‘I Don’t like Strangers on the Sabbath’: Theology and Subjectivity in the Journal of Esther Edwards Burr,” Legacy A Journal of American Women Writers, 19, no. 1 (2002): 18–25.

Scheick, William J. Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Burroughs, Stephen (1765–1840) fiction writer

Stephen Burroughs’s reputation rests on the stories of his exploits, both real and imagined, which made him a folk hero, or antihero, in NEW ENGLAND. Burroughs claimed that he often heard tales of his exploits from strangers. His reputation was that of a larger-than-life social rebel, similar to a later era’s Wild Bill Cody or Wyatt Earp.

Burroughs had a keen eye for social SATIRE and a talent for making unsavory characters into heroes. While awaiting trial for counterfeiting, Burroughs amused himself and his friends by writing Stephen Burrough’s [sic] Sermon: Delivered at Rutland, on a Hay-Mow (1798?). Using biblical language, Burroughs satirized the moral outrage of the residents of a small Massachusetts community when they realize that their beloved “Pastor Davis” is a fraud.

Burroughs’s Memoirs of the Notorious Stephen Burroughs (1798) seems to have been a combined attempt by Burroughs to set the record straight regarding what he considered to be false accusations about his assumed identities and charges of counterfeiting, and to profit from his notoriety. The book was enormously popular; by 1900 it had been printed almost thirty times. Memoirs owes more to the secular genre of “rogue histories” than to the Puritan execution confessions. Although most rogue histories claim to edify the reader and demonstrate the “wages of sin,” their appeal lies in their titillating details. Accordingly, Burroughs makes no pretense that his Memoirs will educate or inspire. In describing his misconduct as a young man he claims that neither a character flaw nor the will of God are to blame; the “one continued course of tumult, revolution, and vexation” that was his life was the result of people who oppressed him.

In the first half of Memoirs, Burroughs describes his experiences as a thief, his misbehavior in college, and how he later defrauded unsuspecting communities. He describes his six-month career as a pastor in a small Massachusetts town, preaching sermons he had stolen from his father. In the second half of the book, Burroughs recounts, among other things, his arrest in 1785, his three years in jail, his attempts at escape, and the punishments he received.

Stephen Burroughs grew up in Hanover, New Hampshire. Characterized as “volatile and impatient” by those who knew him, Burroughs rebelled against the harsh Puritan upbringing imposed on him by his father, the Reverend Eden Burroughs. Stephen is said to have run away from home at the age of fourteen, joined the army, deserted, and returned to enroll at Dartmouth. Abandoning college, he went to sea as a privateer’s man. On his return he enhanced his reputation as a rascal and a rogue by adopting a variety of new identities, sometimes posing as a schoolteacher but more often as a preacher.

At the age of twenty Burroughs was arrested in Springfield, Massachusetts, for passing counterfeit money and was sentenced to three years in jail. When he emerged from prison he appeared to be a reformed man. Two years later, however, he was again arrested, this time on three counts of rape. These charges were reduced to “open, gross, lewd and lascivious conduct,” for which Burroughs again served time in jail. His prison term ended when he escaped from the Worcester jail and fled to Long Island with his family. He abandoned his wife and children in Long Island and went to Georgia, where he posed as an experienced schoolteacher and worked as a surveyor of Indian lands.

In 1796 Burroughs showed up at his father’s farm in Hanover. He hoped to remain there while he prepared his memoirs for publication, but a fight with his father forced him to move on to Canada. He appears to have supported himself there by resorting once again to counterfeiting. At some point in his life in Canada, Burroughs underwent a genuine moral transformation, becoming a Catholic and opening a school for boys in his home. Loved by his students and well respected by his neighbors, Burroughs died peacefully in 1840.

Work

Burroughs, Stephen. Memoirs of Stephen Burroughs. Hanover, New Hampshire: Printed by Benjamin True, 1798; Northeastern University Press, 1988; Early American Imprints, 33478.

Sources

- Cebula, Larry. "A Counterfeit Identity: The Notorious Life of Stephen Burroughs," Historian, 64 (2002): 316–333.
- Jones, Christopher W. "Praying Upon Truth: The Memoirs of Stephen Burroughs and the Picaresque," Early American Literature, 30 (1995): 32–50.
- Williams, Daniel E. "In Defense of Self: Author and Authority in the Memoirs of Stephen Burroughs," Early American Literature, 25 (1990): 96–122.

Byles, Mather (1707–1788) minister, poet, editor

Mather Byles was born in Massachusetts on March 15, 1707, the son of Josias (or possibly Josiah) Byles, a saddler from England, and Elizabeth (Mather) Greenough, the daughter of Increase MATHER and sister of Cotton MATHER. The Mathers had a significant and early influence on Byles, whose father died the year after his birth. Following the traditional path of the colonial elite, Byles was educated at the Boston Latin School and at HARVARD, where he earned his bachelor's degree in 1725 and his master's degree in 1728. He was ordained in 1732 as minister of the Hollis Street Congregational Church. The following year he married Anna Gale. She died in 1744, leaving Byles with six children. Byles married his second wife, Rebecca Tailer, in 1747; this marriage produced three children.

Byles had established himself as a scholar of literature, a journalist, and a poet prior to his ordination. In 1727 he served as editor of the NEW-ENGLAND WEEKLY JOURNAL, contributing essays and some of his most notable poems, including "Eternity" (1727) and "The Conflagration" (1729). Byles studied the work of other poets and corresponded with important English authors, including Alexander Pope, who served as a major influence. Byles, however, eschewed ribaldry and SATIRE, modeling the content of his own poetry instead on the instructional tradition of Puritan literature. In 1727 he collaborated with Reverend John Adams (1704–1740) and Matthew Adams (ca. 1694–1753) to produce a series of instructional poems and essays, which were published in the New England Weekly Journal under the collective title "Speculations."

As the self-appointed poet of the Old Lights, Protestants, who opposed the GREAT AWAKENING, Byles became a primary target of Joseph GREEN, a popular poet and wit. Green countered Byles's seriousness with parodies that simultaneously insulted the quality of Byles's writing and his assumptions of literary stature. Byles persisted in the face of this criticism, and in 1744 he published a collection of poetry, Poems on Several Occasions. From that point forward Byles focused on his theological writings, the first of which had been published in 1729.

A theological moderate, Byles was conservative as a politician. He opposed the PATRIOT cause and remained an ardent LOYALIST throughout the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Following the British evacuation of Boston, Byles was dismissed from his position as a minister and declared banished from Massachusetts. He avoided actual banishment when his sentence was reduced to house arrest for two years. Byles retired permanently from the public scene in Boston. He died July 5, 1788.

Works

- Byles, Mather. Works, 19 volumes. 1727–1761; Compiled by Benjamin Franklin V. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1978.
- Byles. Poems on Several Occasions. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland & T. Green, 1744; New York: Columbia University Press, 1940; Early American Imprints, 5355.

Sources

- Eaton, Arthur W. The Famous Mather Byles: The Noted Boston Tory Preacher, Poet, and Wit, 1707–1788. 1914; Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1971.
- Giles, Paul. Transatlantic Insurrections: British Culture and the Formation of American Literature, 1730–1860. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Morris, Amy M. E. Popular Measures: Poetry and Church Order in Seventeenth-Century Massachusetts. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005.

Byrd, William, II (1674–1744) historian, diarist

These [settlers] found the first adventurers in a very starving condition, but relieved their wants with the fresh supply they brought with them. From Kiquotan they extended themselves as far as James-town, where, like true Englishmen, they built a church that cost no more than fifty pounds, and a tavern that cost five hundred.

—The History of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina (1728)

The diaries of William Byrd establish him as a major literary figure of eighteenth-century colonial America. They provide observations on Native Americans, folklore, sexual mores, medicine, food, and religion in colonial Virginia. Byrd was born on March 28, 1674 on the family's Virginia plantation, near modern day Richmond, the son of Mary Horsmanden Filmer and William Byrd. Seven-year-old William was sent to England in 1681 to be educated at the Felsted Grammar School in Essex. He studied law at the Middle Temple and was admitted to the bar in 1695. With the support of aristocratic friends, Byrd was elected to the Royal Society. He returned to Virginia in 1696, and almost immediately began a political career in the House of Burgesses. He remained politically active throughout his life, throwing his support behind measures that increased Virginia's autonomy from the

W Byrd

Portrait of William Byrd, circa 1704–1708, from the school of Godfrey Kneller

Crown. Despite his roots in the colony, Byrd nevertheless frequently returned to England both for business and pleasure.

In 1705, Following his father's death, Byrd returned to Virginia to oversee the family's twenty-six thousand acre estate at Westove. On May 4, 1706 Byrd married Lucy Parke (1688–1716), daughter of the governor of the Leeward Islands. Lucy brought Byrd considerable real property, but that property carried considerable debt as well. As a result, Byrd was chronically land rich and cash poor, a condition common among the tobacco elite. His search for sources of ready cash prompted many of the adventures he meticulously recorded in his diaries.

In the early years of his marriage, Byrd kept his diary in shorthand. It was published in 1941 as The Secret Diary of William Byrd of Westover, 1709–1712, and offered the reader minute details of the planter class's habits and activities, including prayer, diet, exercise, sexual manners, and family relationships.

A second diary, begun after Lucy Parke died of smallpox in 1716, recounted Byrd's efforts in London to find a new, wealthy wife and thus rescue himself from financial insecurity. The London Diary (published in 1958) detailed his regular business rounds, social gatherings, and chocolate drinking between 1717 and 1721, as well as his sexual relationships. In 1724, after repeated failed attempts to marry, Byrd secured a union with Maria Taylor in London. Although Maria's family was respectable, she brought Byrd no financial relief. Byrd returned to Virginia with his new wife and soon began his second family. In addition to his two daughters by Lucy Parke, Byrd fathered a son, William III, and four more daughters with Maria Taylor.

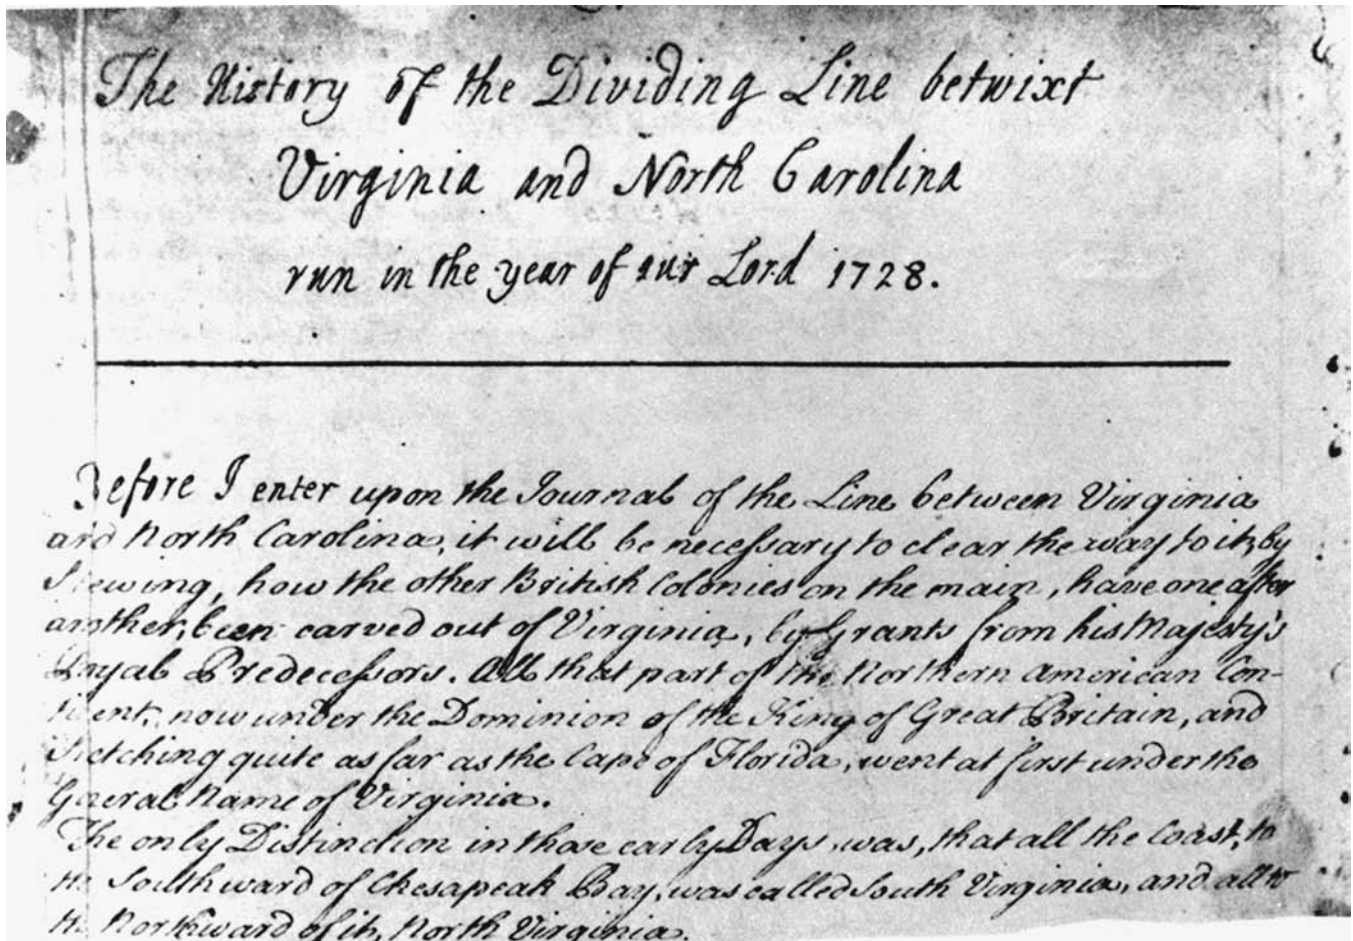

While in London, Byrd might have written the anonymous PAMPHLET that appeared in 1721. Titled A Discourse Concerning Plague, With Some Preservatives Against It, the pamphlet, signed a "Lover of Mankind," extols the alleged medicinal qualities of tobacco, and suggests an author eager to find new markets for Virginia's major crop. The pamphlet also conforms to Byrd's writing style. If Byrd was actually the author, this pamphlet is the only item in his large body of work that was published during his lifetime.

In 1728 Byrd agreed to head a Virginia commission to investigate a border dispute with North Carolina. His journal of this experience, The History of the Dividing Lines betwixt Virginia and North Carolina (published in 1841) is filled with geographic and ethnographic details about the southern backcountry. Byrd's patrician values are evident in his disdain for what he calls the crudeness of backwoods settlers, Indians, and even the other members of the commission. Byrd's journal offers a few surprising comments, including the suggestion that frontier whites and Indians would improve their lives if they intermarried.

Byrd also used the expedition to the border as the basis for a second piece, The Secret History of the Line, published in 1929 by William K. Boyd, was probably written for the amusement of a small group of his friends. The Secret History is a SATIRE in which his fellow commissioners have such names as "Meanwell" and "Firebrand." Byrd characterizes his own personality by giving himself the pseudonym "Steddy": "I have one infirmity," Steddy notes, "never to venture anything unfinished out of my hands."

Byrd's final diary spans the years 1739 to 1741, when the nearly seventy-year-old planter continued to indulge in life-long pastimes, such as reading and sex. He died three years after the end of this diary and was buried in the garden of his Westover plantation. Despite his constant complaints about and schemes for acquiring wealth, Byrd boasted one of the largest estates in the colony, with almost two hundred thousand acres of Virginia real estate, including what is now part of the cities of Richmond and Petersburg. His library held over 3,600 volumes, which made it one of colonial America's largest collections. Byrd's literary legacy includes diaries, journals, papers, letters, histories, and accounts of his travels that stylistically seem to foreshadow the novel.

First page of the manuscript for Byrd's narrative that provides the best-known account of eighteenth-century backwoods life

Works

- Byrd, William. The Secret Diary of William Byrd of Westover, 1709–1712, edited by Louis B. Wright and Marion Tinling. Richmond, Va.: Dietz Press, 1941; New York: Putnam, 1963.
- Byrd. Another Secret Diary of William Byrd of Westover, 1739–1741, with Letters & Literary Exercises, 1696–1726, edited by Maude H. Woodfin and Tinling. Richmond, Va.: Dietz Press, 1942.
- Byrd. Prose Works: Narratives of a Colonial Virginian, edited by Louis B. Wright. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1966.
- Byrd. William Byrd's Histories of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina. 1866. New York: Dover Publications, 1967.
- Byrd. The Commonplace Book of William Byrd II of Westover, edited by Kevin Berland, Jan Kirsten Gilliam, and Kenneth A. Lockridge. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Documenting the American South, The Westover Manuscripts: Containing The History of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina. . . . <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/nc/byrd/byrd.html>> (viewed August 25, 2006).

Sources

- Ausband, Stephen C. Byrd's Line: A Natural History. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2002.
- Hayes, Kevin J. The Library of William Byrd of Westover. Madison, Wis.: Madison House, 1997.
- Lockridge, Kenneth A. The Diary and Life of William Byrd II of Virginia, 1674–1744. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Recommended Writings

- Histories of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina* (1866)
- The Secret Diary of William Byrd, 1709–1712* (1941)
- Another Secret Diary, 1739–1741* (1942)

Studying William Byrd II

William Byrd II was a wealthy landowner from Virginia who chronicled his travels and surveyor's work in both a conventional journal and in a private diary. His Histories of the Dividing Line betwixt Virginia and North Carolina (1866) thus includes an official account and a more informal "Secret History," fashioned in the style of restoration comedy and SATIRE. Byrd was also an extensive diarist; he kept one diary from 1709 to 1712 and another from 1739 to 1741. The authoritative biography and study of Byrd's diaries is Kenneth Lockridge's The Diary, and Life, of William Byrd II of Virginia, 1674–1744 (Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1987). Another biography to consider is Pierre Marambaud's William Byrd of Westover, 1674–1744 (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1971). In addition to his record keeping and personal diaries, Byrd maintained one of the largest libraries in colonial America. To learn more about his library, students should read Kevin J. Hayes's The Library of William Byrd of Westover (Madison, Wis: Madison House, 1997). Students interested in Byrd's views on nature should consider Stephen C. Ausband's Byrd's Line: A Natural History (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2002). Those interested in Byrd's views on women should consult Kenneth A. Lockridge's On the Sources of Patriarchal Rage: The Commonplace Books of William Byrd and Thomas Jefferson and the Gendering of Power in the Eighteenth Century (New York: New York University Press, 1992). For an electronic source of The History of the Dividing Line, see Byrd and Edmund Ruffin's The Westover Manuscripts Containing The History of the Dividing Line Betwixt Virginia and North Carolina; A Journey to the Land of Eden, A.D. 1733; and A Progress to the Mines. . . . (Chapel Hill: Academic Affairs Library, University of North Carolina, 2001: <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/nc/byrd/menu.html>> viewed May 15, 2007). For studies of Westover, the Byrd family home, see "The James River Plantations" (<<http://www.jamesriverplantations.org/Westover.html>> viewed May 15, 2007) and "The House that Byrd Built" (<<http://www.britishempire.co.uk/biography/byrdwilliam.htm>> viewed May 15, 2007).

Bagby, George William (1828–1883) journalist, humorist

A Virginia journalist, George William Bagby edited the SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER from 1860 to 1864. He is best remembered, however, for the “Mozis Addums” letters, a series of humorous newspaper pieces dating from 1859 in which Bagby posed as an unlettered commoner. In that year Bagby half-humorously committed himself to “The Unkind but Complete Destruction” of John Esten COOKE, the author of highly romanticized tales about antebellum Virginia characteristic of what was referred to as the magnolias and moonlight school of Southern literature. Bagby himself gave way to nostalgia in the wake of the CIVIL WAR. His sketch “The Old Virginia Gentleman” (1877) presented a sentimental and idealized picture of antebellum life in his native state that rivaled Cooke at his most romantic.

Source

King, Joseph Leonard. Dr. George William Bagby: A Study of Virginian Literature, 1850–1880. New York: Columbia University Press, 1927.

Bailey, James Montgomery (1841–1894)
journalist, humorist

Known as the “Danbury-News Man,” James Montgomery Bailey was a journalist widely considered to be the father of the humorous newspaper column. After the CIVIL WAR he bought the Danbury Times and later merged it with the Jeffersonian to form the Danbury News. He wrote a series of articles for his paper that dealt with current events in a light-handed—if not lighthearted—fashion. The popular articles were later reprinted in well-received collections.

Source

Riley, Sam G. The American Newspaper Columnist. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998.

Baldwin, Joseph Glover (1815–1864) humorist, essayist

Born in Virginia, Baldwin was a lawyer who is most remembered for the SOUTHWESTERN HUMOR of his first book, The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi (1853). Baldwin’s mother tutored him when he was not in school, and by the time he was twenty-one he had completed law school and was licensed to begin practice. He worked briefly as a journalist for two Virginia newspapers, The Advocate and The Richmond Whig. Many of the sketches in Flush Times were first published in the SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER. The material for them came from Baldwin’s experiences as a lawyer during the 1830s and 1840s in Mississippi and Alabama, then part of the Southwestern frontier. Like his contemporaries Thomas Bangs THORPE and Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Baldwin used satire to address the challenges of the Southern frontier. Unlike many Southwestern humorists, Baldwin typically eschewed dialect and employed well-educated and articulate narrators, most often lawyers.

Sources

Baldwin, Joseph Glover. The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi, edited by James H. Justus. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

Wimsatt, Mary Ann. "Bench and Bar: Baldwin's Lawyerly Humor," in The Humor of the Old South, edited by M. Thomas Inge and Edward J. Piacentino. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001, pp. 187–198.

—Elizabeth Leverton

Ballou, Maturin Murray (1820–1895) editor, novelist

Maturin Ballou was the son of Hosea Ballou, a prolific Universalist author, who founded three Universalist journals and trained his son as a publisher and writer. The younger Ballou became a publisher himself as partner in F. Gleason's Publishing Hall and The United States Publishing Company, specializing in popular fiction. He published what were apparently the first DIME NOVELS, prescribing plots to a stable of writers, and sometimes writing potboiler novels under the pseudonym Lieutenant Murray. He published at various times the journals Flag of Our Country, Gleason's Pictorial Drawing Room Companion, and Ballou's Dollar Monthly. In 1872 he was one of the founders and the first editor of the Boston Globe. Ballou's last books were accounts of his worldwide travels.

Bandelier, Adolph F. (1840–1914) archaeologist, novelist

Born in Berne, Switzerland, Adolph F. Bandelier immigrated with his family to the United States when he was eight years old. He became a pioneering archaeologist and anthropologist, work that influenced his writing career. His scholastic endeavors included an unpublished translation of Fernando Alvarado Tezozomac's Chronica Mexicana (1598) and scholarly articles on the pre-Columbian cultures of the Southwest. Bandelier's popular books included his only novel, The Delight Makers (1890), concerning the prehistoric Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, and The Gilded Man (1893), an account of the search for El Dorado, the mythical lost City of Gold. Between 1892 and 1903 Bandelier continued his archaeological work in Peru and Bolivia, returning to the United States to take up museum curatorships and teaching positions in New York and Washington, D.C. The Bandelier National Monument, a collection of prehistoric Indian ruins near Santa Fe, New Mexico, was established in his honor in 1913.

Source

Lange, Charles H. Bandelier: The Life and Adventures of Adolph Bandelier. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1996.

Bangs, John Kendrick (1862–1922) humorist

Born in Yonkers, New York, and educated at Columbia University, John Kendrick Bangs was the editor of the American humor magazine Puck from 1904 to 1905. In addition to editing several other magazines, he published more than thirty books of poetry, stories, and plays covering a wide range of subjects. He is best remembered for his collections of extravagantly humorous tales such as Tiddlywink Tales (1891), The Idiot (1895), and A Houseboat on the Styx (1896).

Source

Bangs, Francis Hyde. John Kendrick Bangs, Humorist of the Nineties: The Story of an American Editor–Author–Lecturer and His Associations. New York: Knopf, 1941.

Barnum, P. T. (1810–1891) showman, memoirist

Born in Connecticut, Phineas Taylor Barnum worked a variety of jobs (salesman, boardinghouse manager) before discovering his true métier. In 1835 he bought and exhibited the octogenarian Joice Heth, a slave who claimed that she was 161 years old and had been George Washington's nurse. In 1842 he opened his American Museum in New York City, where he exhibited such curiosities as the "Fiji mermaid" (created by joining the upper half of a monkey with the stuffed lower half of a fish), the three-foot-tall man he called "General Tom Thumb," and the Siamese twins Chang and Eng. The museum also hosted sideshows and stage entertainment, becoming famous for its extravagant publicity. In 1844 Barnum began to build an international reputation as a showman when he toured with Tom Thumb; this reputation was enhanced when he managed the American tour of the "Swedish nightingale," the singer Jenny Lind.

Barnum's fame led him into politics when he retired from show business in 1855. He served as mayor of Bridgeport, Connecticut, as well as in the state legislature. Barnum was not a successful politician, however, and ill-advised business ventures drove him back into show business. He reopened his museum, and in 1871 he organized a circus, which he advertised as "the greatest show on earth." In 1881 Barnum's circus merged with that of his arch competitor, James A. Bailey. The Barnum & Bailey Circus continued for a generation after Barnum's death.

Barnum first published his Life of P. T. Barnum, Written by Himself in 1855; it was frequently revised and reprinted. He also wrote The Humbugs of the World (1865), Struggles and Triumphs (1869), and Money Getting (1883). The inventor of modern American show business, Barnum was extremely popular and influential in his day. He appeared in works of fiction, including Herman MELVILLE's Mardi (1849).

Sources

Barnum, P. T. The Life of P. T. Barnum. New York: Redfield, 1855; Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Cook, James W., ed. The Colossal P. T. Barnum Reader: Nothing Else Like It in the Universe. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2005.

Harris, Neal. Humbug: The Art of P. T. Barnum. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.

Barr, Amelia Edith Huddleston (1831–1919)
novelist

Born in Lancashire, England, Amelia Edith Huddleston Barr came to the United States in 1853 with her husband. The couple spent several years in Texas during its days as a republic. In 1870, after her husband's death, Barr moved with her three daughters to New York City, where she began writing for newspapers and started a career as a novelist. She specialized in historical fiction aimed at the general reader. Among the best known of her more than sixty volumes of fiction are Jan Vedder's Wife (1885), set in the Shetland Islands; The Bow of Orange Ribbon (1886), set in New York before the Revolutionary War; and Remember the Alamo (1888), set in Texas where she lived during the late 1850s and early 1860s.

"Bartleby, the Scrivener" by Herman Melville
 (1853) short story

One of the most celebrated pieces of short fiction written by Herman MELVILLE, "Bartleby, the Scrivener: A Story of Wall Street" was published in two parts in PUTNAM'S MONTHLY in November and December 1853. The story concerns the work habits of Bartleby, a scribe who is hired by the narrator, a Wall Street lawyer. Bartleby, whose job is that of a human copying machine, goes about his work in a thorough and precise way until one day, when his kindly boss asks him to help proof-read a document. Bartleby replies without rancor, "I would prefer not to," a position he refuses to alter. The story traces Bartleby's movements after he is fired.

"Bartleby" has been interpreted variously as a barely veiled autobiographical account of Melville's own failed literary career and subsequent job as a civil servant at the Custom-House near Wall Street; as an allegory about the fundamental loneliness of existence; and as a narrative of insanity (Bartleby's) or of self-satisfied obtuseness (the lawyer's)—or both.

Sources

Inge, M. Thomas, ed. Bartleby the Inscrutable: A Collection of Commentary on Herman Melville's Tale "Bartleby the Scrivener." Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1979.

Johnson, Claudia D. Understanding Melville's Short Fiction: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005.

Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1866) poetry collection

Herman MELVILLE's first published collection of poems, Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War sold poorly and was generally seen as a failure when it was first published. Today, however, along with Walt WHITMAN's DRUM-TAPS, it is regarded as one of the few enduring volumes that emerged from the enormous poetic output that reckoned with the American CIVIL WAR. Less personal than Drum-

Taps, Battle-Pieces chronicles the war from John Brown's raid on Harper's Ferry in October 1859 through Abraham Lincoln's assassination in April 1865. Many of these poems by Melville focus on specific historical incidents and explore themes of technology, repression, and militaristic idealism. Although Melville was a fierce opponent of slavery, few of the seventy-two poems in Battle-Pieces deal directly with slaves, and his prose "Supplement" to the collection advocated a nonvindictive reconciliation between North and South—a position generally unpopular with Melville's literary audience. With their abundance of slant rhymes and their uneven metrical structures, Melville's poems were formally radical for their day, even as the ideological position he assumed was seen by many as too conservative.

—Matt Miller

Bayou Folk by Kate Chopin (Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1894) short-story collection

Kate CHOPIN's first collection of short stories, Bayou Folk earned the Louisiana writer national recognition as a writer of LOCAL COLOR fiction. These twenty-three stories focus on rural life in Louisiana, many of them featuring distinctive regional dialect. Much of Chopin's work shows Creole, Cajun, and African American influences, while her characters explore the ways in which they can challenge their social customs and socioeconomic conditions. "Désirée's Baby" explores attitudes toward miscegenation when a husband and wife, both believing themselves to be white, have a mixed-race child. Other well-known stories in this collection include "In Sabine" and "At the 'Cadian Ball." In the latter Chopin explores women's expressions of sexual desire—a treatment that has contributed to the author's reputation as a feminist writer.

Sources

Petry, Ann Hall, ed. Critical Essays on Kate Chopin. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Toth, Emily. Unveiling Kate Chopin. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

—Y. P. Renfro

Beadle, Erastus (1821–1894) publisher

Widely remembered as the father of the DIME NOVEL, Erastus Beadle began his career publishing songbooks and game manuals that cost ten cents. In 1860 he published Ann S. Stephens's MALAESKA, the Indian Wife of the White Hunter, which he advertised as "a dollar book for a dime." Reportedly, the book sold three hundred thousand copies the first year after publication. Hundreds of novels concerning frontier adventures written by the likes of "Buffalo Bill" Cody and Fred Whittaker followed. After 1880 Beadle turned to books about train robbers and detectives, and the dime novel gained a reputation for sensationalism.

Sources

- Denning, Michael. Mechanic Accents: Dime Novels and Working-Class Culture in America. New York: Verso, 1987.
- Sullivan, Larry E., and Lydia Cushman Schurman, eds. Pioneers, Passionate Ladies, and Private Eyes: Dime Novels, Series Books, and Paperbacks. New York: Haworth, 1996.

Beecher, Catharine Esther (1800–1878) essayist

Born in East Hampton, New York, the daughter of the prominent clergyman Lyman Beecher and the older sister of the future novelist Harriet Beecher Stowe, Catharine Beecher became an educator. After teaching in New London, Connecticut, for two years, in 1824 she and her sister, Harriet, opened a school for girls that became Hartford Female Seminary. In 1832 she opened the Western Female Academy in Cincinnati, Ohio, and subsequently, similar institutions in Quincy, Illinois; Milwaukee, Wisconsin; and Burlington, Iowa. The founder of the American Women's Educational Association in 1852, Beecher was a proponent of liberal education for women but an opponent of female suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM). An ardent abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM), she published An Essay on Slavery and Abolitionism in 1837. She is also famous for the housewives' handbooks she wrote with her sister, most importantly, The American Woman's Home (1869) and the New Housekeeper's Manual (1873).

Sources

- Leavitt, Sarah Abigail. From Catharine Beecher to Martha Stewart: A Cultural History of Domestic Advice. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Sklar, Kathryn Kish. Catharine Beecher: A Study in American Domesticity. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Tonkovich, Nicole. Domesticity with a Difference: The Nonfiction of Catharine Beecher, Sarah J. Hale, Fanny Fern, and Margaret Fuller. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Beecher, Henry Ward (1813–1887) theologian, writer, editor

Born in Litchfield, Connecticut, Henry Ward Beecher was the son of Lyman Beecher and the brother of Catharine Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe. After graduating from Amherst College and attending Lane Theological Seminary, he began his clerical career in Indiana before taking the pulpit of the Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn, New York, in 1847. A celebrated orator and lecturer, he was prominent in the antislavery and women's suffrage movements and was an exponent of the doctrine of evolution. In addition to editing The Independent and the Christian Union, he published The Life of Jesus, the Christ (1871); Evolution and Religion (1885); and a sentimental novel, Norwood; or, Village Life in New England (1867). His sermons were also published and widely distributed.

Sources

- Applegate, Debby. The Most Famous Man in America: The Biography of Henry Ward Beecher. New York: Doubleday, 2006.
- Ryan, Halford Ross. Henry Ward Beecher: Peripatetic Preacher. New York: Greenwood Press, 1990.

Belasco, David (1853–1931) playwright

Born in San Francisco to Portuguese Jewish shopkeepers, David Belasco spent his life in the theater. His father had been a performer in British pantomimes, and the family associated with theater performers in San Francisco and Victoria, British Columbia, where they lived for several years before moving back to San Francisco in 1865. Belasco began writing and acting at an early age; he performed in a production of Richard III at age eleven and by 1872 he had written fifteen plays. In 1873 he married Cecilia Loverich and worked briefly for melodrama writer Dion Boucicault. In the first of many collaborations, Belasco cowrote several successful plays with James A. Herne. By the time he became stage manager at the Madison Square Theatre in New York in 1882, he had worked the gamut of other theater-related jobs, from prompter to director. A few years later, at the Lyceum Theatre, he worked as both stage manager and acting teacher.

By the mid 1890s Belasco had begun producing his own plays (usually written collaboratively) as vehicles for a series of actors he had groomed under his own very demanding regimen. He had also developed a reputation for productions that combined melodramatic action with elaborate and innovative lighting and other techniques of stagecraft to produce highly realistic effects. The Heart of Maryland (produced 1895), a CIVIL WAR-era love story, ran for 229 performances in New York. Shortly after the turn of the century Belasco cowrote and produced Madame Butterfly (produced 1900), which Giacomo Puccini used as the basis for his 1904 opera. The Girl of the Golden West (produced 1905) was also adapted as a Puccini opera, Fanfulla del West (produced 1910), starring Enrico Caruso.

Belasco's melodramas made him wealthy and famous, but his work has never been considered important literature. His attitude toward writing as strictly a pragmatic part of producing popular entertainment is revealed by his explanation that "playwright" is "the proper term" for a dramatic writer: "A wright takes the materials he finds to his hand and builds or forms them into a coherent shape. He makes nothing; he only puts them together more or less deftly." Despite recognition late in his life for his contribution to the theater (including honors from the Society of Arts and Sciences and the French Legion of Honor), by the time Belasco died the methods on which he had built his career and reputation were considered obsolete.

Sources

- Marker, Lise-Lone. David Belasco: Naturalism in the American Theatre. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.

Timberlake, Craig. The Bishop of Broadway: The Life and Work of David Belasco. New York: Library Publishers, 1954.

—Brett Barney

Bellamy, Edward (1850–1898) novelist

Born in Massachusetts, Edward Bellamy came from a long line of New England ministers. He himself eschewed theology, choosing instead to study law, although he never practiced. After a period working as a journalist Bellamy began writing fiction, first short stories that appeared in magazines and then Six to One: A Nantucket Idyl (1878), a novel that grew out of a trip to Hawaii the previous year. A novel based on Shays's Rebellion, The Duke of Stockbridge, was published serially in 1879. Dr. Heidenhoff's Process (1880) and Miss Ludington's Sister (1884) reflect the influence of Nathaniel Hawthorne and Bellamy's interest in psychic phenomena.

In 1888 Bellamy published Looking Backward, a utopian romance that depicts a future society under a system of state socialism. The novel sold nearly a million copies over the next ten years. It was imitated by others and influenced the founding of the Populist Party, whose platform in the 1892 election incorporated many principles enunciated in the novel. In the wake of its success, Bellamy campaigned for social reform. He lectured widely, and in 1891 he founded the weekly New Nation, which he edited. Shortly after finishing Equality (1897), a sequel to Looking Backward, Bellamy succumbed to tuberculosis.

Sources

Bowman, Sylvia E. Edward Bellamy. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Patai, Deborah, ed. Looking Backward: 1888–1888: Essays on Edward Bellamy. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.

Ben-Hur by Lew Wallace (New York & London: Harper, 1880) novel

One of the most popular novels in American literature, Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ was written by soldier, statesman, history buff, and literary hobbyist Lew Wallace. The novel follows Judah Ben-Hur, a young Jew, through a life filled with adventure and emotion. Betrayed by a former friend, Messala, Ben-Hur endures slavery, raises himself through meritorious service, exacts revenge, and, after several faith-promoting personal encounters with Jesus, becomes a Christian convert. Although Wallace's style in Ben-Hur strikes most twenty-first-century readers as turgid, the author's extensive research and passion for history give the novel a charm that has endured: Ben-Hur has remained in print continuously since its publication more than 125 years ago and has inspired two extremely successful and highly regarded motion pictures.

—Brett Barney

"Benito Cereno" by Herman Melville (1855)

short story

Published in 1855, during the contentious period leading up to the CIVIL WAR, "Benito Cereno" provided commentary on what its creator Herman MELVILLE called "the power of blackness," the power that derives from human depravity and original sin. This story opens with Delano, captain of the seal ship Bachelor's Delight, spotting a ship in trouble in a desolate area off the southern coast of Chile. In an attempt to offer help, the captain and a small crew of his men row over to the San Dominick, a ship captained by the Spaniard Don Benito Cereno, whose cargo is a group of Senegalese slaves. Although Delano manages unwittingly to rescue Cereno, Delano fails to realize until the last moment that a mutiny is taking place, and the story leaves it to the reader to interpret the efficacy of his kindly, optimistic assumptions about human behavior. The story has been read as an allegory in which Melville cautions about dangers of underestimating the effects of slavery.

Sources

Burkholder, Robert E., ed. Critical Essays on Herman Melville's "Benito Cereno". New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Johnson, Claudia D. Understanding Melville's Short Fiction: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005.

Benjamin, Park (1809–1864) journalist

Born in British Guiana, Park Benjamin came to the United States at the age of four. After studying law at both Harvard and Yale, and being admitted to the bar in both Massachusetts and Connecticut, he turned to a career in literature. He joined the editorial board of The New-England Magazine in December 1834 and within three months was both owner and editor when other principals left. Benjamin began publishing early stories by Nathaniel Hawthorne before merging his magazine with THE AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE in 1835, sharing editorial duties with Charles Fenno Hoffman.

Benjamin is best known for the newspaper he founded in 1839, The New World. Because of the near absence of international COPYRIGHT laws, this weekly, which lasted until 1845, reprinted works by British authors without paying them or their estates. Benjamin was notorious for his journalistic excesses, which eventually landed him among those whom James Fenimore Cooper successfully sued for libel. (Benjamin called Cooper "a superlative dolt.") After he sold The New World in December 1848, Benjamin continued to be an active force in literary circles as an author, editor, lecturer, and literary agent.

Source

Hoover, Merle Montgomery. Park Benjamin, Poet & Editor. New York: Columbia University Press, 1948.

Bernard, William Bayle (1807–1875) playwright

In the 1830s William Bayle Bernard was one of the most popular playwrights in America, responsible for more than one hundred theatrical successes. He is notable for having popularized the rural eccentric in plays such as The Dumb Bell (produced 1831) and The Kentuckian; or, A Trip to New York (produced 1833). In 1832 he became one of the first to adapt Washington IRVING's "RIP VAN WINKLE" for the stage.

Bierce, Ambrose (1842–1914?) journalist, short-story writer, poet

Mausoleum, n. The final and funniest folly of the rich.
—The Cynic's Word Book (1906)

Ambrose Bierce was born in Ohio and reared in Indiana. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in the Union army during the first month of the CIVIL WAR, which became the subject of some of his tales and sketches. After the war he remained in the military for two years, traveling to California, where he settled briefly and began publishing short works in various publications, notably in Overland Monthly, edited by Bret HARTE. In 1872 Bierce went to England for three years, where his bitter, savagely witty, short pieces were collected in The Fiend's Delight (1873), Nuggets and Dust Panned out in California (1873), and Cobwebs from an Empty Shell (1874), all first published in London.

Bierce returned to San Francisco in 1875, and he was soon regarded as one of the most influential writers on the West Coast. After a failed business venture, he became editor of the satirical San Francisco weekly The Wasp, where he published material later collected in his books. His most important book during this period was Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (1891), a collection that has been said by reviewers to share Edgar Allan POE's macabre sensibility. Bierce's prose is marked by surprise endings and strange twists; his descriptions of characters and scenes exhibit a journalistic REALISM. Can Such Things Be? (1893) continues the mood of Tales of Soldiers; Bierce once again alternates between authentic California and Civil War scenes, between phantasmagoric and horrifying episodes, lacing both with black humor.

In 1897 Bierce moved to Washington, D.C., to work for the Hearst newspapers. There he wrote The Cynic's Word Book (1906), later enlarged as The Devil's Dictionary (1911), which suggested how far removed his sensibility was from his moralistic, genteel contemporaries. Bierce's fierce criticism of contemporary society was expressed in his fables and in his essays, collected in Fantastic Fables (1899) and Shadow on the Dial (1909)—much in the way that Mark Twain's (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) social awareness influenced his work. Bierce was also a deft poet, producing satirical volumes of verse, including Black Beetles in Amber (1892) and Shapes of Clay (1903).

Ambrose Bierce

Between 1909 and 1912, Bierce edited his collected works, published in twelve volumes. Having completed that task and having grown weary of the United States, he moved to Mexico during the Mexican Revolution, saying he planned to observe the progress of Pancho Villa's war. Bierce's last letter from Mexico was written on December 26, 1913, and he was probably killed on January 11, 1914 in the battle of Ojinaga, though speculation about the circumstances of his death has occupied Bierce scholars for nearly a century.

Principal Books by Bierce

The Fiend's Delight, as Dod Grile. New York: A. L. Luyster, 1873.
Nuggets and Dust Panned Out in California, as Dod Grile. London: Chatto & Windus, 1873.

Cobwebs from an Empty Skull, as Dod Grile. London & New York: Routledge, 1874.

The Dance of Death, by Bierce and Thomas A. Harcourt, as William Herman. San Francisco: Privately printed, 1877; corrected and enlarged edition, San Francisco: Henry Keller, 1877.

Tales of Soldiers and Civilians. San Francisco: E. L. G. Steele, 1891; republished as In the Midst of Life. London: Chatto & Windus, 1892; revised and enlarged edition, New York & London: Putnam, 1898.

Black Beetles in Amber. San Francisco & New York: Western Authors Publishing, 1892.

Can Such Things Be? New York: Cassell, 1893.

Fantastic Fables. New York & London: Putnam, 1899.

Shapes of Clay. San Francisco: W. E. Wood, 1903.

The Cynic's Word Book. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Page, 1906; enlarged as The Devil's Dictionary, volume 7 of The Collected Works of Ambrose Bierce. New York & Washington, D.C.: Neale, 1911.

A Son of the Gods and A Horseman in the Sky. San Francisco: Elder, 1907.

The Shadow on the Dial and Other Essays, edited by S. O. Howes. San Francisco: A. M. Robertson, 1909; revised as Antepenultima, volume 11 of The Collected Works of Ambrose Bierce. New York & Washington, D.C.: Neale, 1912.

Write It Right: A Blacklist of Literary Faults. New York & Washington, D.C.: Neale, 1909.

The Collected Works of Ambrose Bierce, 12 volumes. New York & Washington, D.C.: Neale, 1909–1912 comprises 1) Ashes of the Beacon, The Land Beyond the Blow, For the Ahkoond, John Smith, Liberator, Bits of Autobiography; 2) In the Midst of Life; 3) Can Such Things Be?, The Ways of Ghosts, Soldier-Folk, Some Haunted Houses; 4) Shapes of Clay, Some Antemortem Epitaphs, The Scrap Heap; 5) Black Beetles in Amber, The Mummery, On Stone; 6) The Monk and the Hangman's Daughter, Fantastic Fables, Aesopus Emendatus, Old Saws with New Teeth, Fables in Rhyme; 7) The Devil's Dictionary; 8) Negligible Tales, The Parenticide Club, The Fourth Estate, The Ocean Wave, "On with the Dance!", Epigrams; 9) Tangential Views; 10) The Opinionator, The Reviewer, The Controversialist, The Timorous Reporter, The March Hare; 11) Antepenultima; 12) In Motley, Kings of Beasts, Two Administrations, Miscellaneous.

Battlefields and Ghosts, edited by Hartley E. Jackson and James D. Hart. Palo Alto, Cal.: Harvest Press, 1931.

The Ambrose Bierce Satanic Reader, edited by Hopkins. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1968.

Ambrose Bierce: Skepticism and Dissent: Selected Journalism from 1898–1901, edited by Lawrence I. Berkove. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Delmas, 1980.

Poems of Ambrose Bierce, edited by M. E. Grenander. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1995.

The Short Fiction of Ambrose Bierce, edited by S. T. Joshi, Lawrence I. Berkove, and David E. Schultz. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006.

Studying Ambrose Bierce

Ambrose Bierce is known primarily as a journalist, short-story writer, and poet. His best-known book is the highly regarded Cynic's Word Book (1906) enlarged as The Devil's Dictionary (1911). It demonstrates the wit and cynicism for which Bierce is known. A representative selection of his journalism is provided in Ambrose Bierce: Skepticism and Dissent: Selected Journalism from 1898–1901 (1980). The Short Fiction of Ambrose Bierce, a three-volume, 1250-page edition is the best source for Bierce's short stories, but An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge and Other Stories (London: Penguin, 1995) will satisfy all but the most devoted students. M.E. Grenander's Poems of Ambrose Bierce (1995) is the best place to begin study of his poetry.

Caricature of Bierce published in the satirical weekly, The Wasp, early 1890s, which he had formerly edited. The caption reads: "Ambrose Bierce Literary Dissector. The terror of aspiring bards of the wild and woolly West."

The best guide to the Bierce canon is Ambrose Bierce: An Annotated Bibliography of Primary Sources (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999) by Joshi. The Ambrose Bierce Project, under the general editorship of Craig A. Warren (<www.ambrosebierce.org> viewed August 27, 2007), provides online a good primary and secondary bibliography, with links to web-based texts of many of his stories.

Partly because of the mystery attendant to Bierce's death, he has attracted a full complement of biographers. Richard O'Connor's Ambrose Bierce: A Biography (Boston: Little, Brown, 1967) and Roy Morris Jr.'s Ambrose Bierce: Alone in Bad Company (New York: Crown, 1996) will suit the purposes of most students. Joshi and Schultz have also edited A Much Misunderstood Man: Selected Letters of Ambrose Bierce (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2003).

M.E. Grenander's Ambrose Bierce (New York: Twayne, 1971) is a reliable basic guide to Bierce's work. Cathy Davidson's Critical Essays on Ambrose Bierce (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982) provides a range of critical responses. Student seeking a fuller critical study of his work should consult Davidson's The Experimental Fictions of Ambrose Bierce: Structuring the Ineffable (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1984). Donald T. Blume's Ambrose Bierce's Civilians and Soldiers in Context (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2003) is a study of the ways in which Bierce's journalism informed his fiction, namely Tales of Soldiers and Civilians. David M. Owens's The Devil's Topographer: Ambrose Bierce and the American War Story (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006) is a study of the relationship between Bierce's twenty-two Civil War stories and his personal war experience.

"The Big Bear of Arkansas" by Thomas Bangs

Thorpe (1841) short story

This story, written by Thomas Bangs THORPE, a humorist of the Old Southwest, is considered a classic of the TALL-TALE genre. A story within a story, "The Big Bear of Arkansas" is told by a storyteller to a group of passengers aboard a Mississippi steamboat. The storyteller, who claims he is the best bear hunter in Arkansas, tells a drawn-out tale about his numerous futile attempts to kill an apparently "unhunnable bear." The story, which first appeared in the journal SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, was later reprinted in Thorpe's collection The Hive of the Bee Hunter (1854). It proved to be a long-lived and influential work, and it probably played a part in William Faulkner's writing of his own ursine hunting story, "The Bear."

Source

Rickels, Milton. Thomas Bangs Thorpe, Humorist of the Old Southwest. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1962.

Bigelow, John (1817–1911) historian, editor, biographer

Born in Malden, New York, John Bigelow was admitted to the New York bar before joining with William Cullen BRYANT in owning and editing the New York Evening Post from 1848 to 1861. On the Evening Post Bigelow maintained a free-soil and free-trade editorial stance, and in 1856 he published a campaign biography for Free Soil Party presidential candidate John C. Frémont. Beginning in 1861, he spent several years as a diplomat in France, where he influenced the French government not to support the Confederacy during the CIVIL WAR.

While in Paris, Bigelow located the manuscript of Benjamin Franklin's Autobiography, which Bigelow edited for publication in 1868. In later years he published several histories and biographies, including a biography of William Cullen

Bryant and an autobiography, the five-volume Retrospections of an Active Life (1909–1913).

Source

Clapp, Margaret. Forgotten First Citizen, John Bigelow. Boston: Little, Brown, 1947.

The Biglow Papers by James Russell Lowell (first series: New York: Putnam, 1848; second series: Boston: Osgood, 1867) poetry collection

Introduced with a letter from the fictional Ezekiel Biglow to the editor of the Boston Courier on June 17, 1846, The Biglow Papers are written in the "Yankee" dialect of Ezekiel's son, Hosea, a Massachusetts farmer. The principal target of the satirical poems is the perceived proslavery motivation behind the Mexican War. Although Lowell had not originally planned to write an entire series, the success of the first letter/poem caused him to see satire as "a weapon instead of the mere fencing stick [he] had supposed," and eight more poems in the same vein followed. When these were collected for book publication, Lowell added long prose commentaries in the learned (and pedantic) voice of Reverend Homer Wilbur, the book's ostensible editor. Besides the overt antislavery message of The Biglow Papers (see ABOLITIONISM), Lowell also saw the work as an effort of literary nationalism, its dialect chosen deliberately as an antidote to what he saw as "the great vice of American writing and speaking"—which he identified as "a studied want of simplicity."

The CIVIL WAR prompted Lowell to undertake a second series of The Biglow Papers for THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, a journal he had cofounded and which he edited. As Lowell himself recognized, these later poems (1862–1865) are less successful, lacking the freshness of the first series. Overall, however, The Biglow Papers are considered Lowell's masterpiece and an important early example of literary use of dialect.

Source

Lowell, James Russell. The Biglow Papers, First Series: A Critical Edition, edited by Thomas Wortham. De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1977.

—Brett Barney

Billings, Josh

See SHAW, HENRY WHEELER.

Bird, Robert Montgomery (1806–1854) playwright, novelist

Born in Delaware and educated at the University of Pennsylvania, where he received his M.D. in 1827, Robert Montgomery Bird supposedly gave up his medical practice owing to a reluctance to charge his patients fees. He taught at the Pennsylvania Medical College from 1841 to 1843, but most of his adult life was devoted to writing. Starting out as a dramatist, he wrote a number of tragedies and comedies about Philadelphia before writing several prize-winning verse dramas for his friend, the actor Edwin Forrest. These included The Gladiator (produced 1831), Bird's most popular play; and The Broker of Bogota (produced 1834), considered to be his best. The two friends later had a falling-out, and because Forrest, who had purchased and produced several of Bird's plays, refused to relinquish his copyright claims, Bird turned to novel writing.

Bird's training as a dramatist helped make his novels—many of them historical romances—both popular and remunerative. Calavar (1834) and its sequel, The Infidel (1835), concern the Spanish conquest of Mexico, and The Hawks of Hawk Hollow (1835) is set during the Revolutionary War. Bird set what is considered his best novel, Nick of the Woods (1837), in the aftermath of the American Revolution and created in it a memorable hero with a split personality. In this book Bird portrayed Indians not as noble savages, as James Fenimore Cooper had done in The Last of the Mohicans (1826), but as savages.

Ill health eventually forced Bird to give up writing, but in 1847 he came out of retirement to work as literary editor of the Philadelphia North American, a position he held until his death.

Source

Dahl, Curtis. Robert Montgomery Bird. New York: Twayne, 1963.

"The Birth-Mark" by Nathaniel Hawthorne (1843) short story

First published in Pioneer Magazine, Nathaniel Hawthorne's short story "The Birth-Mark" is an allegorical tale about a scientist, Aylmer, and his beautiful wife, Georgiana. Georgiana's one physical flaw is a small birthmark on her cheek that resembles a hand. Aylmer, disturbed by the mark, decides to remove it using his scientific expertise. Experimenting with a range of concoctions, many of his own creation, he finally creates an effective potion: The birthmark fades, but Georgiana's life fades with it. Now physically perfect, Georgiana is dead. With its portrayal of obsession and its exploration of the tension between beauty and science, "The Birth-Mark" is one of Hawthorne's most evocative tales—and one of his most exemplary.

Sources

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Mosses from an Old Manse, 2 volumes. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

Hawthorne. Nathaniel Hawthorne's Tales, edited by James McIntosh. New York: Norton, 1987.

—Julie M. Cox

"The Black Cat" by Edgar Allan Poe (1843) short story
Written in late 1842, Edgar Allan Poe's "The Black Cat" was published in the United States Saturday Post (later The Saturday Evening Post) on August 19, 1843. As with one of his other famous short stories, "The Tell-Tale Heart," Poe achieves a psychological realism through the use of a first-person narrator who is crazed, alcoholic, and homicidal. Blending aspects of horror, Gothic, and supernatural fiction, the story directly plays off early American superstitions regarding witchcraft. Noteworthy characteristics include Poe's use of violence against animals and women and his ability to take readers into the mind of a man who slowly becomes a pathological murderer.

—M. A. Schueth

Black Hawk (1767–1838) memoirist

An American Indian leader of the Fox and Sac (or Sauk) tribes, Black Hawk was born in a Sac village near what is now Rock Island, Illinois. During the War of 1812 he fought on the side of the British and denounced the Treaty of 1804, which provided that the Fox and Sac should give up their lands and be removed west of the Mississippi River. Black Hawk actively resisted removal and in 1832 returned to Illinois with four hundred of his men. He made peaceful overtures to the federal government, but when one of his emissaries was shot in cold blood, Black Hawk made war on frontier settlements in what has come to be known as the Black Hawk War (1832). Defeated in battle at the Bad Axe River, Black Hawk surrendered, was briefly imprisoned, and was allowed to return to the remnants of his tribe that remained in Iowa. In his 1833 Autobiography, he defended his actions and parsed the illegality of the Treaty of 1804.

Sources

Black Hawk. Black Hawk's Autobiography, edited by Roger L. Nichols. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1999.

Trask, Kerry A. Black Hawk: The Battle for the Heart of America. New York: Holt, 2006.

The Blithedale Romance by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1852) novel

The inspiration for The Blithedale Romance came from Hawthorne's participation in George Ripley's utopian community, Brook Farm. The novel takes a critical look at so-called utopian societies and at mankind in general. Through his depiction of a community called Blithedale, Hawthorne examines the self-serving and manipulative "philanthropy" of Hollingsworth, a character who, unable to move beyond a simplistic desire for money, represents a dim view of humanity. After seducing a resident of the commune for her money, Hollingsworth declares his love for another. Additional characterizations of human duplicity include Hawthorne's exploration of the differences between one's "public self" and one's "private self," represented by the ways contrasting characters act while they are at Blithedale versus their conduct when they are moving in the larger society. Hawthorne also exposes the classism of the group's members.

—Nicole de Fee

Bloomer, Amelia (1818–1894) journalist

Born in Homer, New York, Amelia Bloomer was a reformer dedicated to the frequently aligned causes of SUFFRAGISM and the TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT. Bloomer contributed pseudonymous articles to local newspapers using both male and female names, and from 1848 to 1854 she edited The Lily, published in Seneca Falls, New York; initially a temperance organ, the journal became the first to be devoted to women's suffrage. In 1851 Bloomer began wearing a short skirt with long trousers; she advertised these "Bloomers," as they became known, to the public in the pages of The Lily.

Sources

Bloomer, Dexter C., ed. Life and Writings of Amelia Bloomer. New York: Schocken Books, 1975.

Gathey, Charles Neilson. The Bloomer Girls. London: Femina Books, 1967.

Bly, Nellie

See COCHRAN, ELIZABETH

Boker, George Henry (1823–1890) playwright, poet

Born in Philadelphia and educated at Princeton University, George Henry Boker originally intended to practice law. Instead he chose to travel abroad and to write. After publishing a volume of poetry, he took up playwriting. He wrote romantic and heroic tragedies, many of them in verse in the style of the Elizabethans. Only one play, Francesca da Rimini (produced 1855), was a genuine success. The play was based on the story of Paolo and Francesca in Dante's Inferno. Boker also served with distinction as minister to Turkey, from 1871 to 1875, and to Russia, from 1875 to 1878.

Source

Evans, Oliver H. George Henry Boker. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

The Bostonians by Henry James (London & New York: Macmillan, 1886) novel

First published in 1885–1886 in THE CENTURY MAGAZINE, and the longest of Henry James's works set in America, The Bostonian was the first novel in what is traditionally seen as the middle phase of James's three-part career. Turning from the contrasting of Europe and the United States that is characteristic of his earlier works—DAISY MILLER (1878) and THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY (1882), for example—James focuses on social activism and its relationship to personal interaction, producing what he called "a very American tale." The novel's setting alternates between New York and Boston, two important centers of the women's movement. Verena Tarrant, a talented but shallow budding women's rights activist, is pulled in two directions, between Basil Ransom, who wants her to abandon her activism and devote herself to him, and Basil's cousin, Olive Chancellor, who wants Tarrant to renounce men and marriage and to join her in absolute devotion to the women's movement.

Unpopular both in serial and monograph publication, The Bostonians was also eventually dismissed by James himself; he omitted it from the twenty-three-volume New York Edition of his works (1907–1909). Recent critics, however, have found much to admire in the novel. Feminist critics have especially been drawn to the richness of the novel's depiction of a close same-sex relationship.

—Brett Barney

Boucicault, Dion (1820?–1890) playwright

Born Dionysius Lardner Boursiquot in Dublin, Dion Boucicault was educated in London, where he began acting and writing plays. He made his London debut in 1839 using the name Lee Moreton, but by 1841, when his comedy London Assurance played successfully at Covent Garden, he had changed his name to Dion Boucicault. After his first wife died under mysterious circumstances in the 1840s in France, Boucicault married the actress Agnes Robertson, who was the adopted daughter of the actor Charles Kean. Together they came to America in 1853, and Boucicault continued to act and to write plays.

Boucicault's first significant production in the United States was Grimaldi, or The Life of an Actress (produced 1855), in which he and his wife both appeared. His first stay in this country lasted until 1860, when he returned to work on the English stage; he returned to the United States a decade later and stayed until his death. Altogether Boucicault wrote or adapted more than three hundred farces, comedies, and melodramas. Many were marked by sensationalism, such as a rescue from a burning building in The Poor of New York (produced 1857), a burning ship in The Octoroon; or, Life in Louisiana (produced 1859), and an underwater rescue in The Colleen Bawn; or, The Brides of Garyowen (produced 1860). Over time he began to specialize in plays with Irish settings, such as Arrah-na-Pogue; or, The Wickling Widow (produced 1864).

Boucicault was one of the most energetic and popular playwrights of his day. He continued to act throughout his career, and he inaugurated the use of a touring company for a single play. He was also instrumental in working for change in the copyright law to protect plays from falling into the public domain after they were performed, lobbying Congress assiduously until it passed an amendment to the copyright law in 1856. Boucicault's final years were spent as an acting teacher at a drama school founded by the New York theater impresario A. M. Palmer.

Sources

Greene, Nicholas. The Politics of Irish Drama: Plays in Context from Boucicault to Friel. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Hogan, Robert G. Dion Boucicault. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Molin, Sven Eric, and Robin Goodfellow, eds. Dion Boucicault, the Shaughraun: A Documentary Life, Letters and Selected Works. Newark, Del.: Proscenium, 1979.

Boudinot, Elias (circa 1804–1839) editor

The man later known as Elias Boudinot was born Gallegina ("Buck") Watie in what is now northwestern Georgia. At about age nine he was sent to a nearby mission for schooling; he later continued his education at another mission school in Cornwall, Connecticut. It was upon his arrival there that Watie adopted the name Elias Boudinot in honor of a school benefactor. Following his marriage in 1826 to a white woman, Harriet Ruggles Gold, Boudinot was appointed by the General Council of the Cherokee Nation to tour the eastern United States to solicit donations for an academy and press equipment. His speech in Philadelphia, published as "An Address to the Whites," demonstrates a rhetorical sophistication. His abilities as a mediator between languages and cultures are evident in the Cherokee New Testament that he cotranslated and edited for the bilingual Cherokee Phoenix.

Under increasing pressure from white encroachment following passage of the 1830 Indian Removal Act, Boudinot and a few other Cherokees signed the Treaty of New Echota in 1835. In 1838–1839 the Cherokees were forced from their ancestral lands under the terms of this treaty, to relocate to Indian Territory in present-day Oklahoma. Thousands died during this march, now known as the Trail of Tears. In reprisal for what most Cherokees viewed as traitorous and unauthorized collusion in the Cherokee removal, Boudinot and two of his relatives were killed by mobs.

Source

Boudinot, Elias. Cherokee Editor: The Writings of Elias Boudinot, edited by Theda Perdue. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1983.

—Brett Barney

Boyesen, Hjalmar Hjorth (1848–1895) novelist, philologist

Born in Norway and educated at the universities of Leipzig in Germany and Christiania in Norway, Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen came to the United States in 1869, intending only to visit.

He stayed, first becoming the editor of the Norwegian weekly Fremad, published in Chicago, and later a professor of German at Cornell and Columbia Universities.

Although Boyesen published scholarly works on German and Scandinavian literature, he is remembered primarily as a novelist. His first success as a writer of fiction came with a ROMANCE about Norwegian life, Gunnar (1874), which appeared in serial form in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. William Dean HOWELLS, the editor of The Atlantic, encouraged Boyesen to write more. Howells's dedication to REALISM also influenced Boyesen, who turned his back on the ROMANTICISM of Gunnar to write The Mammon of Unrighteousness (1891), a realistic urban novel about the conflict between two brothers, one an amoral politician and the other a social idealist. The Golden Calf (1892) concerns a man's loss of innocence resulting from his desire for money and fame, and The Social Strugglers (1893), the last of the four novels on which Boyesen's reputation rests, is a lighter critique of society. Boyesen also wrote several popular works intended for juvenile readers, such as Boyhood in Norway (1892).

Sources

Eckstein, Neil Truman. The Marginal Man as Novelist: The Norwegian-American Writers, H. H. Boyesen and O. E. Rølvaag, as Critics of American Institutions. New York: Garland, 1990.

Fredrickson, Robert S. Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

"Brahma" by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1857) poem

The theme of Ralph Waldo EMERSON's sixteen-line poem is the Hindu concept of "Brahma" or the universal spirit, similar to Emerson's own idea of "the Over-Soul" explored in his other writings. The poem, which appeared in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in November 1857, echoes lines from the Hindu spiritual text, the Bhagavad-Gita, as when Emerson propounds the belief that there is no beginning and no end in life: "I keep and pass and turn again." The universal spirit dwells within all; therefore, there is no separation between the individual and the spirit. In the last line of the poem, Emerson urges the "lover of good" to "turn thy back on heaven" and "find" the truth of Brahma.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Bread and Cheese Club (circa 1822–circa 1827)

This informal social club was formed by James Fenimore COOPER and his circle of friends, including the inventor Samuel F. B. Morse and the banker and poet Fitz-Greene HALLECK. Membership was limited to thirty-five, and the club met variously at Washington Hall and the City Hotel, both located in Manhattan. In 1827 some members seceded and formed the Literary Club and the Sketch Club, members of which later formed the Century Club.

Briggs, Charles Frederick (1804–1877) novelist, editor

Charles Frederick Briggs published at least two autobiographical novels: The Adventures of Harry Franco (1839), based on the experience of a Wall Street financial panic; and Working a Passage (1844), which grew out of his adventures at sea. In 1845 he founded the Broadway Journal, which was eventually taken over—and shut down—by Edgar Allan Poe. Briggs went on to do editorial work at PUTNAM'S MONTHLY, THE NEW YORK TIMES, and the Brooklyn Union. The Trappings of Tom Pepper; or, The Results of Romancing (1847–1850) might also be Briggs's work.

Brinton, Daniel Garrison (1837–1899) physician, archaeologist, ethnologist

Born in Thornbury, Pennsylvania, to an influential Quaker family, Daniel Garrison Brinton received his B.A. from Yale (1858). Two years at Jefferson Medical College were followed by a year's study in Europe. After serving as a CIVIL WAR surgeon (1862–1865), Brinton married Sarah Tillson. The couple had two children. Brinton's lifelong interest in indigenous cultures led early to Notes on the Floridian Peninsula (1859). His influential Myths of the New World (1868) categorized myth and popularized the "trickster" term in ethnology. Brinton left medicine in the 1870s but continued to edit the weekly Medical and Surgical Reporter (1874–1887). Though health problems persisted, Brinton was a pioneer scholar of Native languages and literatures, an influential leader of learned societies, and the first university professor of anthropology in North America. Brinton believed in a single origin of humankind (monogeny), yet, like many early anthropologists, he also believed whites/Europeans had evolved to a superior status. He edited six of the eight volumes in the Library of Aboriginal American Literature (1882–1890). His international reputation was eclipsed by Franz Boas, who emphasized fieldwork and targeted Brinton to critique the idea of social evolution.

—Elizabeth McNeil

Brook Farm

An experimental farm in Roxbury, Massachusetts, the Brook Farm Institute of Agriculture and Education grew out of the ideals of the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB, which began the farm in an attempt to put their social theories to work. Founded by the Unitarian minister George RIPLEY in 1841, the community had as its goal the attainment of self-sufficiency through manual labor and the promotion of higher aspects of human culture through moral and intellectual education. The farm was initially financed by a joint-stock company holding 24 shares, each valued at $500.

Brook Farm was visited by many of the day's leading intellectuals, such as Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Margaret FULLER. Due to the agricultural inexperience of members such as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Charles A. Dana, and Isaac Hecker, farming at Brook Farm failed miserably. In 1843 the community came under the influence of Albert Brisbane and FOURIERISM, and in 1844 the farm was changed to a phalanx (a Fourierist economic unit). As a center of Fourierism, Brook Farm issued the journals The Phalanx (1843–1845) and Harbinger (1845).

When the uncompleted and uninsured central building of the farm burned down in 1846, the community disbanded. Emerson referred to Brook Farm as "the Age of Reason in a patty-pan," and Hawthorne's novel THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE (1852) revealed the hypocrisy he found at the heart of such a utopian living community.

Sources

Delano, Sterling F. Brook Farm: The Dark Side of Utopia. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.

Francis, Richard. Transcendental Utopias: Individual and Community at Brook Farm, Fruitlands, and Walden. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997.

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle (1841–1955) newspaper

Founded by Henry C. Murphy, this decidedly Democratic daily was edited by Walt WHITMAN from March 1846 to January 1848. Other literary notables who served on its staff were journalist and memoirist Edward W. Bok and journalist and broadcaster H. V. Kaltenborn. With the exception of a brief suspension in 1861 owing to the paper's proslavery editorial posture, The Brooklyn Daily Eagle published continuously until 1955.

Source

Schroth, Raymond A. The Eagle and Brooklyn: A Community Newspaper, 1841–1955. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1974.

Brooks, Maria Gowen (circa 1795–1845) poet

The writer whom Rufus Wilmot GRISWOLD eulogized as "unmatched among the poets of her sex" was born Abigail Gowen in Medford, Massachusetts. Gowen early displayed a knack for memorizing poetry. When her father died, she became first the ward and then, at about age fifteen, the wife of John Brooks, a man several times her age. Brooks began writing poetry after moving to Portland, Maine. Soon thereafter she took Mary Abigail Brooks as her legal name but began referring to herself as Maria Gowen Brooks. She published her first book, a poetry collection titled Judith, Esther, and Other Poems, by a Lover of Fine Arts, in 1820. After her husband died and she inherited a Cuban plantation, Brooks published the first part of her long poem Zóphiël; or, the Bride of Seven (1825), inspired by the Apocryphal Book of Tobit. Traveling to Europe, Brooks met and impressed Washington IRVING and especially English poet Robert Southey, who helped arrange the 1832 publication of Zóphiël in its entirety. Brooks's only other publication was the romantic novel Idomen: or, the Vale of Yumuri (1843), which first appeared serially in the Boston Evening Gazette in 1838.

Source

Low, Dennis. The Literary Protégées of the Lake Poets. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2006.

—Brett Barney

Brown, William Wells (1814?–1884) novelist

Born into slavery in Kentucky, William Wells Brown worked for the abolitionist printer Elijah Lovejoy in St. Louis, Missouri. Eventually, Brown moved to Ohio, where he gained his freedom and worked with the Underground Railroad. His autobiographical Narrative (1847), published two years after Frederick DOUGLASS'S NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS (1845), propelled Brown to prominence in the abolitionist movement. In 1856 Brown successfully dramatized his autobiographical narrative and produced a successor volume, Experience; or How to Give a Northern Man a Backbone. His novel Clotel; or, The President's Daughter (1853), was first published in England and is believed to be the first novel published in book form by an African American. The story it purports to tell is of Thomas Jefferson's daughter, a mulatto born of one of the president's slaves; seemingly, it was more truth than fiction. When it was published in the United States, it appeared as Clotel; A Tale of the Southern States (1864). Brown also published a book of poetry, a play, and an homage, The Black Man: His Antecedents, His Genius, and His Achievements (1863), later expanded and republished as The Rising Son (1873).

Sources

Brown, William Wells. From Fugitive Slave to Free Man: The Autobiographies of William Wells Brown, edited by William L. Andrews. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2003.

Whelchel, L. H. My Chains Fell Off: William Wells Brown, Fugitive Abolitionist. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1985.

Browne, Charles Farrar (1834–1867) journalist, lecturer

Born in Waterford, Maine, Charles Farrar Browne began his journalistic career at age thirteen when, after his father's death, he became a printer. After working on the CARPET-

BAG, a weekly humor magazine edited by B. P. SHILLABER, and several other midwestern newspapers, Browne settled in Ohio, where his writing for the Toledo Commercial attracted the attention of the editors at the Cleveland Plain Dealer, who invited Browne to write a humor column for their paper. Browne responded in 1858 by submitting the first of a series of "Artemus Ward Letters," written in Yankee dialect in the persona of a savvy but nearly illiterate showman. The bad grammar and wild misspellings of this Down East character made Browne's reputation, and by the time he resigned from the Plain Dealer (he had eventually risen to the position of city editor), his name was synonymous with his character's. Thereafter, Browne was known as Artemus Ward.

Browne went from Cleveland to New York City, where he joined the staff of VANITY FAIR in 1860 and became managing editor in the summer of 1861. The next year the first of his four Artemus Ward books was published, and Browne established a reputation as a popular humorous lecturer, traveling around the United States in the guise of Artemus Ward. In 1866 he went to London, where he wrote a series of Artemus Ward letters for the English humor magazine Punch. Less than a year later he died of tuberculosis at the age of thirty-two.

Sources

Austin, James C. Artemus Ward. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Pullen, John J. Comic Relief: The Life and Laughter of Artemus Ward, 1834–1867. Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1983.

Brownson, Orestes Augustus (1803–1876) theologian, editor, novelist

Born in Stockbridge, Vermont, Orestes Augustus Brownson was a self-educated theologian who was raised a Puritan, joined the Presbyterian Church, left to become a Universalist, and in 1836 founded his own church, the Society for Christian Union and Progress. After converting to Roman Catholicism in 1844, he was branded a heretic for attempting to organize an American Catholic Church.

A longtime supporter of socialistic schemes such as the short-lived Workingmen's Party and BROOK FARM, Brownson eventually joined the Democratic Party. In 1838 he established the Boston Quarterly Review (1838), later called the Democratic Review (1842–1844). Soon, however, he renounced the Democratic Party in favor of an extremely conservative republicanism.

The Democratic Review was only one of the magazines Brownson founded as a mouthpiece for his views. When the editorial board of the Democratic Review grew weary of Brownson's tirades, he started Brownson's Quarterly Review, which lasted from 1844 to 1864 and was briefly revived from 1873 to 1875. Brownson also published several books, including autobiographical and novelistic treatments of his various religious conversions, as well as The Spirit-Rapper (1854), an attack on spiritualism, and such polemics as The American Republic (1865). His Complete Works were published in twenty volumes between 1882 and 1887.

Sources

Gilhooley, Leonard, ed. No Divided Allegiance: Essays in Brownson's Thought. New York: Fordham University Press, 1980.
 Herrera, R. A. Orestes Brownson: A Sign of Contradiction. Wilmington, Del.: Intercollegiate Studies, 1999.
 Lapati, Americo D. Orestes A. Brownson. New York: Twayne, 1965.
 Orestes Brownson Society: <<http://orestesbrownson.com>> (viewed September 20, 2006).

Bryant, William Cullen (1794–1878) poet, journalist

*He who, from zone to zone,
 Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
 In the long way that I must tread alone,
 Will lead my steps aright.*
 —“To a Waterfowl” (1818)

Born in Cummington, Massachusetts, William Cullen Bryant was educated at Williams College. At the age of thirteen he wrote The Embargo (1808), an attack on Thomas Jefferson's administration. By about 1815 he had written his best-known poems, “THANATOPSIS” and “TO A WATERFOWL,” but postponed their publication while he pursued a legal career, which he abandoned in 1825.

Bryant's emergence as a major poet began in 1821 with the publication of Poems. By 1825 he had solidified his reputation with such poems as “A Forest Hymn,” “Monument Mountain,” and “An Indian at the Burial Place of His Fathers.” Bryant's poetry fused a feeling for nature and the past with a firm moral message that his readers found uplifting. He continued to write poetry until the mid 1830s, publishing a new collection of Poems in 1832, but his output waned, and none of his later work matches the fresh diction and descriptions of his earlier work. His later collections include The Fountain and Other Poems (1842), A Forest Hymn (1860), Among the Trees (1874), and The Flood of Years (1878).

Bryant's best work is in the romantic tradition (see ROMANTICISM). He was heavily influenced by William Wordsworth's depictions of nature, although Bryant took a very American tack in explicitly invoking God and avoiding the charges of pantheism and paganism that dogged the English Romantics. At his best Bryant expresses a sturdy melancholy over the fleeting nature of life and the human effort to comprehend existence. His work has been praised for its elegant simplicity and dignity, which has been deemed “Doric restraint.”

Bryant had a successful career as a newspaper editor and public-opinion shaper. He became co-editor of the New-York Review and Athenaeum Magazine in 1825. By 1827 he was joint editor of the New York Evening Post, and in 1829 he became editor in chief. Although a force in the Democratic Party, he eventually turned to Abraham Lincoln and the Republicans because of their opposition to slavery.

Sources

Brodwin, Stanley, and Michael D'Innocenzo, eds. William Cullen Bryant and his America: Centennial Conference Proceedings, 1878–1978. New York: AMS Press, 1983.
 Brown, Charles H. William Cullen Bryant. New York: Scribners, 1971.
 Krapf, Norman, ed. Under Open Sky: Poets on William Cullen Bryant. New York: Fordham University Press, 1986.
 McLean, Albert F. William Cullen Bryant. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Bunner, H. C. (1855–1896) editor, short-story writer

Born in Oswego, New York, Henry C. Bunner became editor of the American humor magazine Puck one year after its establishment in 1877, and he remained on the staff of the magazine until he died. Puck arguably shaped the remainder of Bunner's literary career, which resulted mostly in the production of short stories, anecdotal tales, and humorous poems. The most famous of his productions is “Short Sixes”: Stories to Be Read While the Candle Burns (1891).

Source

Jensen, Gerard Edward. The Life and Letters of Henry Cuyler Bunner. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1939.

Buntline, Ned

See JUDSON, E. Z. C.

Burnett, Frances Hodgson (1849–1924) writer of children's literature

English by birth, Frances Hodgson Burnett came to the United States in 1865 and settled in Tennessee with her parents. She began writing at the age of seventeen and had her first literary success with That Lass o' Lowrie's (1877), a novel set in the Lancashire coal-mining region. Burnett is chiefly remembered, however, for her children's books, two of which have become perennial favorites: Little Lord Fauntleroy (1886) and The Secret Garden (1911). The first of these proved to be a great success when she adapted it for the stage in 1888; it also made COPYRIGHT history in England when she successfully stopped an unauthorized stage version. During her career Burnett published over fifty books and wrote or collaborated on a dozen plays.

Sources

Bixler, Phyllis. Frances Hodgson Burnett. Boston: Twayne, 1984.
 Thwaite, Ann. Waiting for the Party: The Life of Frances Hodgson Burnett, 1849–1924. London: Secker & Warburg, 1974.

Babbitt by Sinclair Lewis (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1922) novel

Sinclair LEWIS's satirical portrait of an American businessman and of middle-class midwestern life in the 1920s centers on George Follansbee Babbitt, a successful realtor. Babbitt thinks of himself as an average American. He lives in Zenith, a midwestern city. He is a faithful, if not romantic, husband. He has three children, a nice home, and all the modern conveniences. He believes in progress, and that society is gradually improving. Yet, he feels frustrated, imagining he has never done a daring thing in his life. He has a fantasy that he is visited by a "fairy child," a young, desirable woman who appreciates the dashing true self hidden behind Babbitt's dull exterior.

After his closest friend, Paul Riesling, shoots his wife and is sent to prison, Babbitt abandons propriety and has an affair. The prospect of a new, truly risky career disturbs him. When his wife has an attack of appendicitis, he recovers his affection for her and reconciles himself to his middle-class life. He realizes, however, that something is missing, and he urges his son to pursue a less conventional course. "Do not be bound by Zenith," he tells Ted, "tell 'em to go to the Devil!"

So effective was Lewis's portrayal of Babbitt as a type that the name became synonymous with American boosterism that touted material well-being over any sort of spiritual, intellectual, or sensual satisfaction. Certainly, Lewis satirizes American complacency, but his vivid characterization of Babbitt makes the character a human being, not simply the target of social criticism.

Sources

Grebstein, Sheldon. Sinclair Lewis. New York: Twayne, 1962.

Lingeman, Richard. Sinclair Lewis: Rebel from Main Street. New York: Random House, 2002.

Schorer, Mark, ed. Sinclair Lewis: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1962.

Babbitt, Irving (1865–1933) critic

Irving Babbitt graduated from Harvard and was a professor at Williams College, then at Harvard University, from 1894 to 1933. He promulgated the idea of a NEW HUMANISM, which rejected the Romanticism of the nineteenth century and argued for a return to classical values such as an appreciation of literary form. His most important work is Rousseau and Romanticism (1919), which presents his most effective argument against relying on intense emotion and personal feeling rather than on tradition.

Source

Panichas, George. The Critical Legacy of Irving Babbitt: An Appreciation. Wilmington, Del.: ISI Books, 1999.

"Babylon Revisited" by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1931) short story

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD's most widely taught short story, "Babylon Revisited" was first published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST and collected in TAPS AT REVEILLE (1935). The setting is Paris following the 1929 stock-market crash. American expatriate Charlie Wales, whose dissipations had led to the death of his wife, has returned to reclaim custody of his daughter, Honoria, from his sister-in-law, who detests him. As a reformed alcoholic and a successful businessman he believes that he deserves his daughter and forgiveness. But his quest is spoiled by the inopportune appearance of two drunken friends from the old days.

"Babylon Revisited" is a story about responsibility, guilt, and dissipation: ". . . the snow of twenty-nine wasn't real snow. If you didn't want it to be snow, you just paid some money."

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.
—Matthew J. Brucoli

Bacheller, Irving (1859–1950) journalist, novelist

Irving Bacheller graduated from St. Lawrence University in 1882 and founded the first newspaper syndicate in the nation in 1884. In addition to autobiographical works, he published A Man for the Ages (1919), a tale about Abraham Lincoln, and novels concerning early American life. The most famous of his works is Eben Holden (1900), the popular story of a homely hired man who aides an orphan. It placed Bacheller in the so-called B'Gosh school of novelists such as Edward Noyes Westcott (1846–1898) who developed memorable characters of the folk-philosopher type.

Source

Hanna, Alfred Jackson. A Bibliography of the Writings of Irving Bacheller. Winter Park, Fla.: Rollins College Press, 1939.

Barnes, Djuna (1892–1982) novelist, essayist, poet, playwright

Djuna Barnes was educated at home in a small New York town by her father and mother and was heavily influenced by her grandmother's feminism and mysticism. In 1912, three years after an arranged marriage, she escaped to New York City. There she published her first book of poems, The Book of Repulsive Women (1915). The PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS performed her early plays. But it was not until publication of A Book (1923) that she became widely known in avant-garde circles and among critics. In the 1920s she settled in Europe, where she wrote Ryder (1928) and NIGHTWOOD (1936), two novels that explore the elastic nature of human sexuality and identity. Barnes tended to write about lesbians and sexually ambiguous characters. Her prose is often as elusive as some poetry. She returned to Greenwich Village in the 1930s but produced little work and lived as a recluse, although her verse play The Antiphon (1958) is considered a major work that deals with the family in a tragic context.

Sources

Barry, Alyce, ed. Interviews: Djuna Barnes. Washington, D.C.: Sun and Moon Press, 1985.

Broe, Mary Lynn, ed. Silence and Power: A Reevaluation of Djuna Barnes. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1991.

Barry, Philip (1896–1949) playwright, novelist

I always wanted to make my mark with plays like John, The Joyous Season and Here Come the Clowns, but the critics wouldn't have it. So they decide that The Philadelphia Story, which took three weeks to write, is a hit and Here Come the Clowns, which represents two years' work, is a failure. How do you explain it? How does anyone explain it?

—quoted in Emmet Lavery,
"The World of Philip Barry"

Philip Barry was born to Irish Catholic parents in Rochester, New York, as the youngest of four children. He graduated from Yale in 1919 and subsequently attended George Pierce Baker's famous "English 47" playwriting workshop at Harvard. Rejected from the military because of his poor eyesight, Barry interrupted his studies during WORLD WAR I to take a job at the State Department, which led him to work at the U.S. Embassy in London; he later briefly worked in advertising in New York. In 1922 he married Ellen Semple. The couple had two sons, Philip Jr. and Jonathan; a daughter, Mary Ellen, died in infancy. The Barrys were part of fashionable society in New York and often spent time in southern France and Florida.

Professor Baker encouraged Barry to write on contemporary American life, and while at Harvard, Barry wrote the comedy You and I. The play won the Herndon Prize and was a hit on Broadway in 1923. Barry continued to write comedies, such as The Youngest (produced 1924), In a Garden (produced 1925), and White Wings (produced 1926), finding particular success with Paris Bound (produced 1927), HOLIDAY (produced 1928), and The Animal Kingdom (produced 1932). During the late 1920s and for most of the 1930s, Barry experimented with writing serious dramas with psychological, philosophical, and religious themes. Among them are John (produced 1927) and his first collaboration with the THEATRE GUILD, Hotel Universe (produced 1930). His serious work also included Tomorrow and Tomorrow (produced 1931), Bright Star (produced 1935), and Here Come the Clowns (produced 1938), which was adapted from his novel War in Heaven (1938). With the exception of Tomorrow and Tomorrow, Barry's non-comic plays were commercial failures. He returned to writing comedy with his most successful play, THE PHILADELPHIA STORY, which was staged in 1939 by the Theatre Guild, with Katharine Hepburn in the leading role, and ran for 417 performances before it went on tour. The Guild continued producing Barry's work until the end of his life. During WORLD WAR II, Barry wrote a patriotic play with music, Liberty Jones (produced 1941), which flopped, and the comedies Without Love (produced 1942) and Foolish Notion (produced 1945). When Barry died of a heart attack in 1949, he left behind Second Threshold, an unfinished drama that was later completed by Robert E. Sherwood and produced in 1951. Common themes in Barry's work are the nature of marriage and the rebellion of an imaginative young person against the conservatism of an older generation. Another frequent subject is the relationship between a father and his daughter, a theme that was motivated by Barry's loss of his own daughter in 1934.

During his lifetime, Barry was celebrated for his comedies of manners. Holiday and The Philadelphia Story were made into successful motion pictures starring Katharine Hepburn, and Barry is still primarily known for those two works. Some early critics, such as Barrett H. Clark, faulted him for embracing the comedic form rather than focusing exclusively on writing serious dramas, but contemporary scholars recognize the social critique embedded in Barry's comic plays about high society—of which he himself was a part.

Sources

Barry, Philip. States of Grace: Eight Plays by Philip Barry, edited by Brendan Gill. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1975.

Hamm, Gerald. "The Drama of Philip Barry," dissertation. University of Pennsylvania, 1948.

Roppolo, Joseph P. Philip Barry. New York: Twayne, 1965.

—Claudia Wilsch Case

The Basil Duke Lee Stories by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1928–1929) short stories

F. SCOTT FITZGERALD published eight loosely connected autobiographical stories about Basil Duke Lee in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. They trace the character's career from his midwestern boyhood through eastern prep school and into Yale. Basil is a bright, ambitious boy who learns to control his egotistical behavior. Fitzgerald collected "The Scandal Detective," "The Freshest Boy," "He Thinks He's Wonderful," "The Captured Shadow," and "The Perfect Life" in Taps at Reveille (1935).

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Basil and Josephine Stories, edited by Jackson R. Bryer and John Kuel. New York: Scribners, 1973.

—Morris Colden

Bassett, John Spencer (1867–1928) historian

John Spencer Bassett was a history professor at Trinity College (now Duke University) from 1893 to 1906 and at Smith College from 1906 to 1928. In 1901 he founded the important literary journal SOUTH ATLANTIC QUARTERLY. In addition to editing The Writings of "Colonel William Byrd, of Westover, in Virginia, Esqr" (1901) and the seven-volume Correspondence of Andrew Jackson (1926–1935), Bassett published important historical works, including The Federalist System, 1789–1801 (1906) and The Life of Andrew Jackson (1911).

Baum, L. Frank (1856–1919) children's author, journalist, playwright, songwriter

When the children have had enough of them [the Oz books], I hope they will let me know, and then I'll try to write something different.

—The Scarecrow of Oz (1915)

Educated at Peekskill Military Academy, Lyman Frank Baum worked in a variety of fields, including managing his father's poultry farm and as a journalist, before he achieved lasting fame as a children's author. Prior to the publication of his The Wonderful Wizard of Oz (1900), Baum had several children's books to his credit, including Mother Goose in Prose (1897)—the first book illustrated by Maxfield Parrish—and Father Goose: His Book (1899).

Baum was a prolific author who created a series of books for children under various pseudonyms, including Floyd Akers, Laura Bancroft, Edith Van Dyne, Schuyler Staunton, and John Estes Cooke. He also wrote plays, many under the pseudonym Louis F. Baum that were based on Oz characters, and was a songwriter. The Oz books, blending magic with Kansas realities, were his most popular and enduring works. Baum wrote at least thirteen more Oz titles in the series, and his publishers continued the series with other authors to extend the Oz canon to forty books. The popularity of the series increased even more with the release of the classic 1939 MGM movie The Wizard of Oz.

Sources

Baum, Frank J., and Russell P. McFall. To Please a Child: A Biography of L. Frank Baum, Royal Historian of Oz. Chicago: Reilly & Lee, 1961.

Riley, Michael O. Oz and Beyond: The Fantasy World of L. Frank Baum. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1997.

Rogers, Katherine M. L. Frank Baum, Creator of Oz: A Biography. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2002.

—Martin J. Manning

Beach, Sylvia (1887–1962) bookseller, publisher

Sylvia Beach opened her famous bookshop, Shakespeare & Co., patronized by James Joyce and Ernest HEMINGWAY, in 1919. At no. 12 Rue de l'Odeon in Paris, she stocked the work of the great modernist writers (see MODERNISM) and welcomed the visits of young new writers in the 1920s. She published Joyce's Ulysses in 1922 at a time when its publication in the United States was blocked (the book was deemed pornographic) and when the book confronted other legal challenges in Europe.

Sources

Beach, Sylvia. Shakespeare & Company. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.
Fitch, Noel Riley. Sylvia Beach and the Lost Generation: A History of Literary Paris in the Twenties and Thirties. New York: Norton, 1983.

Beer, Thomas (1889–1940) novelist, short-story writer, biographer

Thomas Beer graduated from Yale University and served in WORLD WAR I before taking up a writing career. He wrote three novels: The Fair Rewards (1922), concerning a New York theater impresario; Sandoval (1924), which he called “a romance of bad manners” set in the New York of the 1870s; and The Road to Heaven (1928), a romance about rural life. Beer was also known for his humorous short stories, collected in Mrs. Egg and Other Barbarians (1933). His biography Stephen Crane (1923)—perhaps based on details Beer manufactured—helped establish CRANE's reputation. Beer's interest in turn-of-the-century American life is evident in his literary and historical survey The Mauve Decade (1926), which provided the 1890s with a memorable name.

Behrman, S. N. (1893–1973) playwright, screenwriter

Samuel Nathaniel Behrman graduated from Harvard and studied with Brander Matthews at Columbia University. He began his career by working as a book reviewer and writing short fiction for such publications as THE SMART SET, THE NEW REPUBLIC, and THE NEW YORK TIMES. After serving as press agent for Broadway producer Jed Harris, Behrman completed an unsuccessful play, The Man Who Forgot (produced 1926), in collaboration with Owen Davis. The next year, he scored his first major Broadway hit with his witty, sophisticated comedy, The Second Man, produced by the THEATRE GUILD. The play achieved a long run and became a successful London production starring Noel Coward.

From the 1920s into the 1960s Behrman was known for his intellectual comedies exploring the morals, fashions, and psychological complexities of the privileged class. Typically seeking fulfillment, either through worldly attainment or love, Behrman's characters are driven by conflicts between the materialistic demands of contemporary life and the pursuit of individual happiness. His sympathetic characters are typically tolerant persons confronted by opportunists or fanatics who test their moral fiber. Behrman's subsequent plays that achieved critical and commercial success include Serena Blandish (produced 1929), Brief Moment (produced 1931),

Biography (produced 1932), End of Summer (produced 1936), and his most enduring work, No Time for Comedy (produced 1939), which starred Katharine Cornell and Laurence Olivier in its original Broadway production. He also wrote acclaimed screenplays for movies such as Liliom (1930), Tess of the Storm Country (1932), Queen Christina (1933), Anna Karenina (1935), and Waterloo Bridge (1940). In 1954 he collaborated with Joshua Logan to adapt Marcel Pagnol's stories into the hit musical Fanny (1954). In later years, Behrman published novels, short stories, and biographical sketches of the celebrities he knew from Broadway and Hollywood, as well as Portrait of Max (1960), an admired biography of Max Beerbohm.

Sources

Behrman, S. N. People In a Diary. Boston, Mass: Little, Brown, 1972.
Gross, Robert F. S. N. Behrman: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992.
Reed, Kenneth. S. N. Behrman. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1975.
James Fisher

Benét, Stephen Vincent (1898–1943) poet, novelist, short-story writer, dramatist, librettist

*American muse, whose strong and diverse heart
So many men have tried to understand
But only made it smaller with their art,
Because you are as various as your land. . . .*

—“Invocation,” John Brown's Body (1928)

Born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, to Frances and Colonel James Walker Benét, a career soldier, Stephen Vincent Benét earned a B.A. from Yale in 1919 and an M.A. there in 1920. In 1921 he married Rosemary Carr, who became his collaborator on editorial projects. Benét received a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1926, which allowed him to devote his time to researching and writing JOHN BROWN'S BODY (1928). This Civil War epic combined accurate history with eloquent verse and became a best-seller. In the 1930s Benét focused his attention on social issues. In 1933 he became editor of the Yale Younger Poets Series. His “THE DEVIL AND DANIEL WEBSTER,” first published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST in 1936, is among the most widely reprinted short stories in American literature. After WORLD WAR II began, he wrote patriotic radio scripts. Benét died of a heart attack on 16 March 1943, while he was working on WESTERN STAR (1943), an epic poem on the westward migration of the nation. The published portion of the poem, which covered the colonial era, earned a PULITZER PRIZE for Benét.

Benét received good reviews for his first published volume of verse, Five Men and Pompey (1915), and a second volume, Young Adventure (1918). His first novel, The Beginning of Wisdom, was published in 1921. By 1926 Benét had published three more novels, Young People's Pride (1922), Jean Huguenot (1923), and Spanish Bayonet (1926); two volumes of poems, Heavens and Earth (1920) and Tiger Joy (1925); and many short stories. Benét's short stories showed versatility as he wrote historical, social, and fantasy-science fiction tales.

John Brown's Body has been identified as the first American verse epic and chronicles the five years of the Civil War with well-defined portraits of Brown, Abraham Lincoln, and Robert E. Lee, as well as of fictional slaves, farmers, soldiers, and families. James Shore's Daughter (1934) is considered his most mature and ambitious novel. The verse in Burning City (1936) was aimed at the ills in American society during the Depression.

In the 1920s Benét received critical praise but not commercial success, which he finally achieved with John Brown's Body. His critical and popular acceptance remained strong from the 1930s through the 1950s. After his death he became associated with only his patriotic writing, and the years of previous work were overlooked. Benét's reputation has not recovered.

Sources

Fenton, Charles. Selected Letters of Stephen Vincent Benét. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1960.

Fenton. Stephen Vincent Benét. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1958.

Izzo, David Garrett, and Lincoln Konkle. Stephen Vincent Benét: Essays on His Life and Work. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003.

Stroud, Parry. Stephen Vincent Benét. New York: Twayne, 1962.
David G. Izzo

Berlin, Irving (1888–1989) lyricist

Emotionally, he honestly absorbs the vibrations emanating from the people, manners, and life of his time, and, in turn, gives these impressions back to the world—simplified, clarified, glorified.

—Jerome Kern, quoted in Alexander Woollcott,
The Story of Irving Berlin (1925)

Born Israel Beilin in Russia, Irving Berlin came to America with his family in 1893 and settled into the poverty of New York's Lower East Side. After the death of his father, a cantor, "Izzy" Beilin left home, eventually finding a job as a singing waiter in a Chinatown saloon. There, in 1907, he wrote lyrics to his first published song, "Marie from Sunny Italy," and renamed himself on the sheet music "Irving Berlin."

He quickly became the most prolific and successful songwriter on Tin Pan Alley, the nickname for the area around

Broadway and 28th Street where many sheet-music publishers had their offices. Teaching himself to play piano in the key of F-sharp, but unable to read music, Berlin nevertheless produced hit after hit, many in the popular "ragtime" style, culminating in the extraordinary success of "Alexander's Ragtime Band" in 1911. In 1913 he married the singer Dorothy Goetz, who died shortly after their honeymoon. Berlin tried to assuage his grief by writing "When I Lost You," one of his first romantic ballads.

He moved up from Tin Pan Alley to Broadway in 1914 when he wrote the score for Watch Your Step! and then wrote songs for several editions of Florenz Ziegfeld's annual Follies, including "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody." Drafted into the army in 1918, Berlin wrote "Oh! How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning." Stationed at Camp Upton on Long Island, he produced his first show, Yip, Yip, Yaphank, an all-soldier benefit that played on Broadway. Berlin formed his own music-publishing firm, and in 1921, he and producer Sam Harris built the Music Box Theatre, for which Berlin wrote such songs as "Say It with Music," "All Alone," and "What'll I Do?" that were featured in the theater's annual revues.

In 1924 he met socialite Ellin Mackay, whose wealthy Catholic family opposed their relationship; two years later, to much ballyhoo, the couple eloped. As a wedding present, Berlin gave his disinherited bride the ballad, "Always." Another ballad, "Blue Skies," inspired by the birth of his first child, was featured in The Jazz Singer, the 1927 movie that turned Hollywood from "silents" to "talkies." Berlin was one of the first songwriters to write for movie musicals, creating such rhythmic numbers as the title song for Puttin' on the Ritz (1930).

For the rest of his career he alternated between Broadway and Hollywood movies, but by the 1960s, he resented the changes in popular music that displaced his kind of songwriting. A man given to depression over fears of losing his talent, he grew more reclusive. Although tributes were heaped upon him, particularly on the occasion of his hundredth birthday, Berlin ignored the accolades.

During the course of his career, Irving Berlin published 899 songs, most of which were hits, many enduring as classic "standards." Beginning in 1914, he wrote songs primarily for stage musicals, and by the early 1930s he wrote almost exclusively for musical shows and movies. Berlin was most comfortable with the loose revue format of unconnected songs and sketches, and for the best of these, As Thousands Cheer (1933), he wrote "Heat Wave," "Supper Time," and "Easter Parade." In Hollywood he wrote songs for several movies starring Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, such as Top Hat (1935), which featured "Cheek to Cheek." For Holiday Inn (1942) Berlin created "White Christmas" for Bing Crosby. Movies such as Easter Parade (1948), starring Astaire and Judy Garland, showcased his older songs, but Berlin wrote new ones as well, such as "Steppin' Out with My Baby" and "A Couple of Swells."

Deeply patriotic, Berlin offered “God Bless America” to Kate Smith in 1938 when she asked him for a “peace” song for a world on the brink of war. In 1942 he wrote another all-soldier revue, This Is the Army, which toured the battlefields of Europe and the Pacific, its highlight being Berlin, in his World War I uniform, singing “Oh! How I Hate to Get Up in the Morning.” In these same years Broadway turned to the “book” show, where songs had to be integrated into story and character, and Berlin created his greatest score for Annie Get Your Gun (1946), which featured Ethel Merman performing such songs as “You Can’t Get a Man with a Gun,” “They Say It’s Wonderful,” and “There’s No Business Like Show Business.”

As one of the few major songwriters of his era who wrote both words and music, Berlin could weave intricate patterns between music and lyrics, as he did in several “contrapuntal” songs—where two melodies and two sets of lyrics play against one another—such as “You’re Just in Love” from Call Me Madam (1950). Yet, such sophistication is always at the service of a simple, emotional immediacy that is the hallmark of an Irving Berlin song.

Other songwriters almost universally regarded Irving Berlin, given the volume and variety of his output, as the greatest American songwriter of the twentieth century. Alec Wilder named Berlin as “the best all-round, over-all songwriter America has ever had.” To George Gershwin, Berlin was “the greatest American song composer,” while Cole Porter called Berlin “the greatest songwriter of all time.” When Jerome Kern was asked to define Berlin’s place in American music, he said, “Irving Berlin has no ‘place’ in American music—Irving Berlin IS American music.”

Sources

- Barrett, Mary Ellin. Irving Berlin: A Daughter’s Memoir. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994.
- Bergreen, Laurence. As Thousands Cheer: The Life of Irving Berlin. New York: Viking, 1990.
- Berlin, Irving. The Complete Lyrics of Irving Berlin, edited by Robert Kimball and Linda Emmet. New York: Knopf, 2001.
- Furia, Philip, with Graham Wood. Irving Berlin: A Life in Song. New York: Schirmer, 1998.

—Philip Furia

Best-Sellers

In 1895 THE BOOKMAN began publishing a list of “Books in Demand” at selected bookstores in major metropolitan areas. “Books in Demand” was changed in 1903 to “The Six Best Sellers,” and this categorization was quickly adopted by other literary periodicals, giving rise to a marketing phenomenon.

Sources

- Elson, Ruth Miller. Myths and Mores in American Best Sellers, 1865–1965. New York: Garland, 1985.

Reep, Diana C. The Rescue and Romance: Popular Novels Before World War I. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1982.

Bibliographical Society of America (1904– )

The Bibliographical Society of America was originally an outgrowth of the Bibliographical Society of Chicago (1899–1904). Founded in 1904 and incorporated in 1927, the society has as its mission the promotion of bibliographical research with an emphasis on American materials. Membership is open both to institutions and individuals. It publishes a journal, The Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, and monographs on bibliographical subjects.

The Big Sleep by Raymond Chandler (New York: Knopf, 1939) novel

The Big Sleep was Raymond CHANDLER’s first detective novel, and it established him as one of the leading American hard-boiled detective writers. In the story private detective Philip Marlowe is hired by General Sternwood, a wealthy Los Angeles oilman, to quash a blackmail attempt against one of his daughters. The case takes Marlowe into a seedy world of gambling and pornography, and he soon finds himself investigating several murders. The many plot strands all seem to tie back to the disappearance of a bootlegger named Rusty Regan, the husband of Sternwood’s eldest daughter and a man the general liked and admired.

The artistry in the novel is not in the way that Chandler unfolds the plot, which has loose ends and has confused readers, but rather in the way he establishes mood and character through a succession of powerful scenes. The novel is set in and around Los Angeles in the late 1930s, and setting plays an essential part in the story. While General Sternwood represents the city’s powerful moneyed classes as well as the older order of traditional values, his two daughters, Carmen Sternwood and Vivian Regan, are representatives of a new order, and their wealth links them to the underworld of crime and violence. Vivian is a patron of illegal gambling casinos. Carmen uses her sexuality to control men and turns murderous if they reject her. The two daughters are involved with an array of shady characters, notably Arthur Gwynn Geiger, who runs a pornography operation, and Eddie Mars, who operates a gambling club inside an elegant Victorian mansion. Police detective Bernie Ohls and Norris, the Sternwoods’ butler, are men of integrity—rarities in Marlowe’s world.

The predominant themes of The Big Sleep are the pervasiveness of corruption in modern society and the struggle of an honest man to maintain his code of conduct within that society. In the opening scene of the novel, Marlowe associates himself with a questing knight, and this chivalric image is consistent with his actions throughout the story, in which he loyally serves General Sternwood. Midway through the case, however, Marlowe looks at a chessboard in his apartment and comments, "Knights had no meaning in this game. It wasn't a game for knights." Rather than exposing the truth of Rusty Regan's murder and the other crimes that follow, Marlowe in the end helps the police and the Sternwood daughters cover it up. The best he can do is help protect the pride of old General Sternwood "in the thought that his blood is not poison, and that although his two little girls are a trifle wild, as many nice girls are these days, they are not perverts and killers." Marlowe can only tell himself that death can no longer bother Regan: "You just slept the big sleep, not caring about the nastiness of how you died or where you fell. Me, I was part of the nastiness now."

The Big Sleep introduces the moral illness of modern Los Angeles and documents Philip Marlowe's struggles to make a difference within that world, themes that Chandler expanded in the rest of the seven Marlowe novels. The Big Sleep sold only a few thousand copies when it was first published in 1939 and received virtually no critical notice. But it has never been out of print, selling millions of copies and being translated into dozens of languages.

Source

Moss, Robert F., ed. Raymond Chandler: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 253. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/The Gale Group, 2002.

—Robert F. Moss

"Big Two-Hearted River" by Ernest Hemingway (1925) short story

One of Ernest HEMINGWAY's strongest Nick Adams stories, originally published in This Quarter and collected in IN OUR TIME (1925), "Big Two-Hearted River" illustrates what Hemingway called his "iceberg theory" because much that gives further meaning to the narrative lies beneath its surface. Nick, whose fragile emotions can tolerate few challenges, returns to a long-missed, familiar country, where he camps and trout fishes while selectively exposing himself to more-difficult demands of fishing as he gradually extends his emotional boundaries. Carefully in control and "not wanting to rush his sensations," Nick chooses not to fish a nearby swamp that would be "a tragic adventure." Nevertheless, he believes there will "be plenty of days coming when he could fish the swamp." Commenting about the story, Hemingway said that Nick's condition was caused by his war experiences that he as author had deliberately omitted.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on Ernest Hemingway. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2002.
Reynolds, Michael. Hemingway: The Paris Years. Cambridge, Mass.: Blackwell, 1989.

—John C. Unrue

Billy Budd by Herman Melville, Billy Budd, and Other Prose Pieces, edited by Raymond Weaver, volume 13 of the Constable Standard Edition of Melville's Complete Works (London, Bombay & Sydney: Constable, 1924) novella

Herman Melville's last work of prose fiction, Billy Budd was first published thirty-three years after the author's death in 1891. Its publication in 1924 was a key event in the Melville revival during the Twenties. Melville had worked on the novella during the last five years of his life and left a much-revised manuscript in a nearly finished state. Perhaps inspired by the Somers mutiny, in which three sailors were hanged without a proper court-martial, the story grew out of his poem, "Billy in the Darbies," which Melville appended to the story.

Billy Budd was Melville's final literary attempt to reconcile good and evil. His original manuscript was re-edited and republished in 1962, an edition that provides a more accurate representation of the text than did the first edition.

Sources

Critical Essays on Melville's Billy Budd, Sailor. Introduction by Robert Milder. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.

Melville, Herman. Billy Budd, Sailor: An Inside Narrative, reading text and genetic text prepared by Harrison Hayford and Merton M. Sealts Jr. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Parker, Hershel. Reading Billy Budd. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1990.

Black Boy by Richard Wright (New York & London: Harper, 1945) autobiography

Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth is both a brutally honest depiction of the first nineteen years of Richard WRIGHT's life and a searing indictment of what he calls "the ethics of living Jim Crow." Born in Jackson, Mississippi, Wright experienced a harsh family life marked by the degradation of poverty and racism. His mother beat him again when he came home bloodied from a fight with whites—her severity an indication of how much she feared that her son would not conform to a white world. But counterbalancing the horrors is Wright's growing self-consciousness, a painful but productive awareness of his identity and limitation as a Southern black boy under Jim Crow. His maturation culminates in the final chapter's stirring assertions of Wright's literary goals and the concurrent need for his departure from the South with which the narrative concludes.

Already among the country's most prominent writers because of his achievement in Native Son (1940), Wright with the publication of his autobiography became recognized as an honest chronicler of race, region, and identity. But Black Boy, originally titled "American Hunger," represents only the first part of Wright's autobiography; the second section was published after Wright's death as American Hunger (1977). The latter portion had been suppressed when the Book-of-the-Month Club declined to distribute the entire book, particularly its indictment of northern racism.

Source

Andrews, William L., and Douglas Taylor, eds. Richard Wright's Black Boy (American Hunger): A Casebook. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

—Ben Railton

Black Mask (1920–1951) periodical

Black Mask was a PULP MAGAZINE (so called because of its cheap paper) founded by H. L. MENCKEN and George Jean NATHAN, who sold it within six months. The first issue was April 1920; the magazine was published monthly (except in 1923 and 1924, when it was semi-monthly). Specializing in short stories of adventure and romance in the beginning, Black Mask soon became known for its crime stories marked by tough-talking heroes and gratuitous violence. The magazine began to achieve distinction when Joseph T. Shaw became editor in November 1926. During his ten-year tenure as editor, Shaw encouraged writers of hard-boiled detective fiction and published Dashiell HAMMETT, Erle Stanley GARDNER, Raymond CHANDLER, Horace MCCOY, Paul Cain, and Raoul Whitfield. The magazine continued publication until 1951 with steadily declining circulation and quality after Shaw. The Black Mask school refers to the writers who, during Shaw's editorship, published quality hard-boiled fiction—that is, works depicting hardened heroes, often private detectives, guided by a personal code of conduct in the conflicts with streetwise criminals.

Sources

Hagemann, E. R. A Comprehensive Index to Black Mask, 1920–1951. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1982.

Nolan, William F., ed. The Black Mask Boys: Masters of the Hard-Boiled School of Detective Fiction. New York & London: Mysterious Press, 1985.

—Richard Layman

Blackmur, R. P. (1904–1965) editor, critic, poet

The influential editor of the literary magazine Hound and Horn, R. P. Blackmur is best known for his literary criticism. His early essays on writers were admired as examples of the NEW CRITICISM. His critical works include The Double Agent (1935), Language as Gesture (1952), and Value in Modern Poetry (1957). He was also a respected poet. His best-known book of poems is From Jordan's Delight (1937).

Sources

Fraser, Russell A. A Mingled Yarn: The Life of R. P. Blackmur. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1981.

Pannick, Gerald J. Richard Palmer Blackmur. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

The Black Riders and Other Lines by Stephen

Crane (Boston: Copeland & Day, 1895) poetry
The Black Riders and Other Lines (1895), Stephen CRANE's first collection of poetry, consists of sixty-eight free-verse epigrams. Many of them dramatize two views of the human condition: on the one hand, a speaker attempts to make sense of a universe in which a wrathful God has created human beings with natural desires that they are punished for expressing; in other poems, God is a merciful, forgiving Creator empathizing with the plight of humanity. Despite a pessimistic depiction of the human plight, the speaker discovers that an adherence to one's own inner values, as well as kindness and compassion for others, gives some small level of meaning to life.

When the book was published by the avant-garde firm Copeland & Day, it created a stir because of its contents and appearance. The covers were cream-colored with the title in black letters and an orchid design that stretched across the front and rear covers. Each poem—or “lines,” as Crane called them—was printed separately in black capital letters at the top of a page. In contrast to much of the poetry written at the time, which was thoroughly conventional and genteel, Crane's verse was stark and iconoclastic. By calling them lines, he clearly was proclaiming that he was not a poet in the traditional sense of the word.

Source

Hoffman, Daniel G. The Poetry of Stephen Crane. New York: Columbia University Press, 1957.

—Paul Sorrentino

Bogan, Louise (1897–1970) poet

Louise Bogan left Boston University in 1916 to marry and followed her husband during World War I to Panama, where they had a daughter. After her husband died in 1920, Bogan settled in New York. She published her first book of poetry, Body of This Death, in 1923. After publishing another volume of poetry, Dark Summer (1929), she became poetry critic for THE NEW YORKER, a position she held from 1931 to 1969. Throughout this period she published several more volumes of poetry and of poetry criticism. Her work is notable for its epigrammatic quality: she favors compact forms in which she explores the ambiguity of human psychology. The fullest collection of her poems is The Blue Estuaries: Poems 1923–1968 (1968).

Source

Collins, Martha, ed. Critical Essays on Louise Bogan. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1984.

Boni and Liveright (1917–1933) publishing house

Boni and Liveright began publishing in 1917 with The MODERN LIBRARY series of inexpensive classics, but the firm became known in the 1920s for its willingness to take chances on new authors and experimental books. Its list included Theodore DREISER (AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY), Eugene O'NEILL, Ezra POUND, E. E. CUMMINGS, T. S. ELIOT (THE WASTE LAND), Hart CRANE, Djuna BARNES, Sherwood ANDERSON, Ernest HEMINGWAY's first American book (IN OUR TIME), and William FAULKNER's first novel (Soldiers' Pay). Boni & Liveright also published Sigmund Freud's A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis (1920) and Hendrik Willem Van Loon's The Story of Mankind (1921), which were profitable and influential. Horace LIVERIGHT, the owner, lost money playing the stock market and producing plays; in 1930 he lost control of his company.

Source

Egleston, Charles. The House of Boni & Liveright, 1917–1933: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 288. Detroit: Bruccoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2004.

—Morris Colden

Bonner, Marita (1899–1971) playwright, essayist, short-story writer

Marita Bonner contributed poems, short stories, and essays to prominent publications of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, such as CRISIS and Opportunity. Bonner published her first short story, "The Hands," in 1925; other stories, "The Prison-Bound" and "Nothing New," followed in 1926. Her autobiographical essay, "On Being Young—A Woman—and Colored," won first place in a literary contest sponsored by Crisis in 1925. Most of Bonner's work, including her plays—The Pot Maker: A Play to Be Read (1927), The Purple Flower (1928), and Exit, an Illusion: A One-Act Play (1929)—focuses on issues concerning colorism, passing, race relations, and segregation.

Source

Flynn, Joyce, and Joyce O. Stricklin, eds. Frye Street and Environs: the Collected Works of Marita Bonner. Boston: Beacon, 1987.

—KaaVonia Hinton

Bontemps, Arna (1902–1973) novelist, writer of children's literature, critic, anthologist

Arna Wendell Bontemps was born in Louisiana and was educated at the University of Chicago. He was part of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. His most celebrated novel is Black Thunder (1936), based on a slave revolt in Virginia in 1800, written in a direct and descriptive style that avoids psychol-ogizing. Another novel, Drums at Dusk (1939), depicts the slave revolt of blacks in Haiti and emphasizes the power of a people to help themselves. His most important nonfiction is Story of the Negro (1948). Sam Patch (1951), which he wrote with Jack CONROY, is his best children's book.

Bontemps's work as critic and anthologist helped to establish the canon of African American literature. His important collections include The Book of Negro Folklore (1958), which he edited with his friend Langston HUGHES, American Negro Poetry (1963), and The Harlem Renaissance Remembered (1972), which includes his memoir of the period. The Arna Bontemps–Langston Hughes Letters, 1925–1967 appeared in 1980.

Source

Jones, Kirkland C. Renaissance Man from Louisiana: A Biography of Arna Wendell Bontemps. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992.

Book Clubs

The modern American book club began in 1926 with the founding of the Book-of-the-Month Club. The founder, Harry Scherman, thought American readers would enjoy receiving books at home that were chosen by a board of distinguished literary judges. The club had more than a million subscribers by the end of the 1920s. Other book clubs, including the Literary Guild, proliferated—some created by publishers such as Doubleday—despite booksellers' initial objections that book clubs posed unfair competition. By the 1950s book-club sales may have accounted for close to one-third of all book sales in the United States. Book clubs have experienced declining membership because of competition from Internet booksellers and superstore chains. Niche or speciality book clubs—such as the Mystery Book Club and the History Book Club—have found new ways to attract readers with well-defined interests.

The Bookman (1895–1933) periodical

Originally edited by Harry Thurston Peck (1856–1914), a Columbia University Latin professor, this monthly magazine was modeled along the lines of its English counterpart with the same name. The mission of the magazine was to provide modern American writers with a forum, although English authors were frequent contributors. Primarily a journal of criticism and literature, The Bookman sometimes published lively debates between English and American authors, as when, for example, the English authors Rebecca West and Hugh Walpole took issue with H. L. MENCKEN's view of American culture at home and abroad. After The Bookman folded in 1933, its last editor, Seward Collins, founded The American Review.

Source

Rascoe, Burton. A Bookman's Daybook. New York: Liveright, 1929.

Boston by Upton Sinclair (New York: Boni, 1928) novel
Boston, a two-volume fictional account of the SACCO-VANZETTI case, represents Upton SINCLAIR's efforts to portray Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti as victims of injustices. Sacco and Vanzetti were Italian anarchists who were tried and executed for the murder of two men in a 1920 holdup. Although both men had alibis, they were found guilty, a result that some historians speculate was caused by anti-Italian and political prejudices. The main character is Cornelia Thornwell, a member of Boston's social elite who rebels against other members of her class and is a supporter of Sacco and Vanzetti.

Source

Dembo, L. S. "The Socialist and the Socialite Heroes of Upton Sinclair," in Toward a New American Literary History: Essays in Honor of Arlin Turner, edited by Louis J. Budd, Edwin H. Cady, and Carl L. Anderson. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1980, pp. 164–180.

—Crystal McCage

Bowles, Jane (1917–1973) short-story writer, novelist, playwright

Born Jane Sydney Auer in New York City, Bowles was sent to Switzerland at fifteen for treatment of tuberculosis. Her meeting with the French novelist Louis Ferdinand Celine, whose work she was then reading, confirmed her desire to become a writer. She took up residence in New York and pursued the literary life in Greenwich Village. She met artists of all kinds and in 1938, when she had just turned twenty-one, she married the composer and writer PAUL BOWLES. The couple traveled in Central and South America and Mexico, where she wrote her first novel, Two Serious Ladies (1943). The novel has been cited for its evocation of a "woman's sensibility." Although the Bowleses remained married, she pursued many lesbian relationships. She also influenced several male writers, including John Ashbery, Tennessee WILLIAMS, and Truman Capote. Her most notable play is In the Summer House (1948), a penetrating study of two women. Between the late 1940s and 1960s the Bowleses lived in Morocco, both pursuing their writing and engaging in affairs with others. During the latter part of this period Jane Bowles's health began to fail as a series of strokes left her partially immobilized and blind. In 1966, with the help of her husband, she was able to publish Plain Pleasures, a collection of short stories. At the same time her Collected Works was published in the United States. My Sister's Hand in Mine (1978) is an expanded edition of her collected works.

Sources

Dillon, Millicent. A Little Original Sin: The Life and Work of Jane Bowles. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1981.

Skerl, Jennie, ed. A Tawdry Place of Salvation: The Art of Jane Bowles. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997.

Bowles, Paul (1910–1999) novelist

Sent to the University of Virginia, Paul Bowles twice fled to Paris, where Gertrude STEIN was his mentor. In his early career as a composer, he wrote scores for ballets, chamber groups and orchestras, movies, and plays. In 1931 he studied music in Europe with the American composer Aaron Copland. He married Jane Auer in 1938 and JANE BOWLES's novel Two Serious Ladies (1943) inspired him to pursue a literary career. Although Jane and Paul Bowles experienced periods of estrangement, they maintained their sense of collaboration and mutual support. Something of their relationship is captured in Bowles's most famous work, The Sheltering Sky (1949), a novel. Bowles, whose work has sometimes been called existential, settled in Morocco in the 1940s and became the center of a network of artists who lived in or visited the country in the decades that followed. He explored isolated individuals—Europeans and Americans in a Moroccan setting—who are bereft of love and feel isolated and alienated. His Collected Stories 1939–1976 appeared in 1979 and Next to Nothing: Collected Poems 1926–1977 was published in 1981. Bowles was also a successful translator. His translation of Jean-Paul Sartre's play No Exit was a Broadway success in 1946. His interest in Moroccan literature is evident in such works as his translation of Moroccan authors, Five Eyes: Stories (1979).

Sources

Carr, Virginia Spencer. Paul Bowles: A Life. New York: Scribner, 2004.

Dillon, Millicent. You Are Not I: A Portrait of Paul Bowles. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

Miller, Jeffrey. Paul Bowles: A Descriptive Bibliography. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Black Sparrow, 1986.

Pulsifer, Gary, ed. Paul Bowles by His Friends. London: Peter Owen, 1992.

Boyle, Kay (1903–1992) novelist, short-story writer, poet, memoirist

The product of a well-read mother and a wayward father, Kay Boyle spent much of her youth traveling around the United States and Europe. She had little formal schooling, although she did study music and architecture in Cincinnati. Without a degree, she got a job in 1922 as assistant to the Australian poet Lola Ridge, the New York editor of Broom magazine, which published Boyle's early poetry. Boyle married in 1923, and she and her husband, Richard Braut, a Frenchman, moved to Paris, where she had an affair with Ernest Walsh, editor of This Quarter. She had a daughter with Walsh and published poetry in his journal as well as in the avant-garde magazine transition. Wedding Day and Other Stories appeared in 1930 and her first novel, Plagued by the Nightingale, in 1931. After Boyle separated from Brault and Walsh died, Boyle made a home for herself among the expatriate Parisian community. In 1931 she married the writer Laurence Vaill, with whom she had three children. The family stayed in France until 1941, when Boyle divorced Vaill and married Joseph von Frankenstein, an Austrian baron. After WORLD WAR II he worked in Germany, and Boyle became a correspondent for THE NEW YORKER. They had two children, and he died in 1963. Boyle then spent several years in the United States actively protesting the Vietnam War. By 1979 she had retired to San Francisco.

Her work developed no signature style; yet, her integral place among the American writers of her time and her often autobiographical work has proven its worth over many decades. Her novels have been called experimental and lyrical, placing her within the modernist (see MODERNISM) camp of American authors. Her work is also marked by a strongly feminist point of view. She explores the world of expatriates and artists, the institution of marriage, and such issues as nationalism and international politics. She published several short-story collections, including Fifty Stories (1980) and The Crazy Hunter (1993). Words That Must Somehow Be Said: The Selected Essays of Kay Boyle, 1927–1984 appeared in 1985. Her volumes of poetry include Collected Poems (1962), Testament for My Students and Other Poems (1970), and This Is Not a Letter and Other Poems (1985). For children she wrote The Youngest Camel (1939), Pinky, the Cat Who Liked to Sleep (1966), and Pinky in Persia (1968).

Sources

Elkins, Marilyn, ed. Critical Essays on Kay Boyle. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.
Mellen, Joan. Kay Boyle: Author of Herself. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1994.

The Bridge by Hart Crane (Paris: Black Sun Press, 1930; New York: Liveright, 1930) poem

In The Bridge Hart CRANE attempted to recover the ambitious vision of America that Walt Whitman sought to capture in Leaves of Grass. Divided into eight sections, comprised of fifteen separate poems, The Bridge is one of the most important and critically disputed products of American MODERNISM, the literary and cultural period following World War I characterized by grand philosophical themes and bold innovations in language as evidenced in the works of such poets as T. S. ELIOT, Wallace STEVENS, Ezra POUND, and William Carlos WILLIAMS. Critics generally use the term epic when discussing The Bridge, for Crane was clearly experimenting with the form, just as did Eliot in THE WASTE LAND (1922), Pound in THE CANTOS (1919–1959), and Williams in Pater- son (1946–1951, 1958). In his epic Crane strove to offer a view of the modern world that offered promise and hope rather than what he termed the “Eliotic despair” found in The Waste Land, which, like The Bridge, uses the modern cityscape as the setting for its themes.

Beginning and climaxing at the Brooklyn Bridge, Crane’s poem moves through time and space, from Columbus’s return voyage from the New World to the Wright brothers’ historic first flight at Cape Hatteras. As with much of Crane’s verse, The Bridge is highly allusive, incorporating references from the Bible as well as from the works of writers such as Dante and William Shakespeare. The concluding stanza of “Van Winkle,” the second part of a section titled “Powhatan’s Daughter” (Pocahontas), displays Crane’s innovative use of wordplay and cultural imagery, as he links the American landscape to The New York Times and the mythic Rip Van Winkle:

*Macadam, gun-grey as the tunny’s belt,
Leaps from Far Rockaway to Golden Gate . . .
Keep hold of that nickel for car-change, Rip, —
Have you got your “Times” — ?
And hurry along, Van Winkle—it’s getting late!*

Crane describes the project in one of his letters as “handling the Myth of America.” His thematic purpose may be more clearly revealed in his brief essay on poetics, “General Aims and Theories,” in which he suggests that in America “are destined to be discovered certain as yet undefined spiritual quantities, perhaps a new hierarchy of faith not to be developed so completely elsewhere. And in this process I like to feel myself as a potential factor.” The Bridge, despite its complexity, density, and the mixed reviews that initially greeted its publication, is Crane’s grand attempt to become that factor in establishing this “new hierarchy of faith,” not in the Judeo-Christian tradition, but in the Transcendental terms that Whitman first established in Leaves of Grass. The legacy of The Bridge as a great American epic poem and that of Crane as a major Modernist poet remain well established in the national poetic tradition.

Sources

Nilsen, Helge Normann. Hart Crane’s Divided Vision: An Analysis of The Bridge. Oslo: Universitets-forlaget, 1980.
Paul, Sherman. Hart’s Bridge. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1972.

—John P. Wargacki

Bromfield, Louis (1896–1956) novelist, journalist, agricultural reformer

Born in Mansfield, Ohio, Louis Bromfield worked as a reporter and studied agriculture and journalism before serving in the U.S. Army Ambulance Service during WORLD WAR I. After the war he moved to New York and began his prolific writing career, earning acclaim for his fiction, nonfiction, and journalism. In 1925 he relocated his wife and family to Senlis, France, remaining there until 1938.

With the first rumblings of WORLD WAR II, Bromfield returned to northwest Ohio, where he reinvented himself as a gentleman farmer. He purchased three farms and combined them to establish Malabar Farm. He wrote articles, essays, speeches, and books promoting the value of scientific farming.

Bromfield's prolific and lucrative career as a writer of novels and movie scripts financed his forays into agriculture, but both his fiction and his agricultural essays were firmly rooted in his agrarian ideals. His earliest novel, The Green Bay Tree (1924), is typical: it follows the fate of a midwestern family struggling to adapt to a town growing dark and dangerous with pollution caused by industrialization and the influx of foreigners. With the frontier tamed, Bromfield's characters seek new worlds to conquer, pursuing political and financial power in a never-ending cycle that destroys the human spirit.

Bromfield continued this saga in a series of novels, earning the PULITZER PRIZE for his third novel, Early Autumn (1926). His travels in Europe and India informed his later novels, including The Rains Came (1937), his most successful book set in India. While his early novels looked at France as an escape from midwestern provincialism, a later novel written in France looks back at his ancestors' agrarian life in Ohio as a source of strength. The Farm (1933) is a sprawling historical novel based largely on his own family's history. "It was from the Farm that they derived their inexhaustible vitality and their physical strength. From the Farm came the hunger for freedom and space which was in all of them."

Bromfield's novels are largely forgotten, while his nonfiction writing has gained new audiences among readers interested in conservation and sustainable agriculture. Pleasant Valley (1945) established the pattern by intermingling folksy sketches of farm life with more polemics about the necessity of choosing appropriate farming methods. Bromfield saw himself as one of a "new race of pioneers" who would restore the land and thereby restore the health of the nation. Bromfield expanded on these themes in Malabar Farm (1948), A New Pattern for a Tired World (1954), and several other collections.

Sources

- Anderson, David D. Louis Bromfield. New York: Twayne, 1964.
- Bratton, Daniel, ed. Yrs, Ever Affly: The Correspondence of Edith Wharton and Louis Bromfield. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.
- Clinker, Keith B. Louis Bromfield: A Bibliography. Mount Vernon, Ohio: Owl Creek, 1992.
- Scott, Ivan. Louis Bromfield, Novelist and Agrarian Reformer. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1998.

—Bev Hogue

Brooks, Gwendolyn (1917–2000) poet

The first African American woman to win a PULITZER PRIZE, Gwendolyn Brooks published more than twenty-five books of frequently anthologized poetry and fiction. Born in Topeka, Kansas, Brooks grew up in and was very much defined by Chicago. Although she traveled widely, she always returned to the South Side of the city. She received all her schooling in Chicago, and her early experiences inform her rendering of black speech patterns and urban life.

Brooks met Langston HUGHES in the early 1930s just after she began to write poetry, and he encouraged her to read the great modernist poets. Following Hughes's advice, she wrote as much as she could and established a poetry column in the African American newspaper CHICAGO DEFENDER.

Her career advanced when she became associated with Harriet MONROE's magazine POETRY. In 1945 she published her first book, A Street in Bronzeville. Her second volume, Annie Allen (1949), won an award from Poetry magazine, and the following year Brooks received the Pulitzer Prize. Many awards, prizes, honors, and prestigious teaching positions followed. Her only novel, Maud Martha, about an African American woman who asserts herself in a racist society, was published in 1953. By the 1960s she had become deeply involved in the Black Arts Movement.

Brooks experimented with virtually every poetic form, although she never left her roots in the African American community or her interest in the impact of urban life on the imagination and language of its inhabitants. Poems such as "We Real Cool" and "The Blackstone Rangers" reflect Brooks's sure grasp of contemporary idioms and social issues. Although published successfully by Harper & Row, which brought out her Selected Poems in 1963, she turned to the black-owned Broadside Press in Detroit to publish her poetry collections Riot (1969), Family Pictures (1970), and Aloneness (1971) as well as her autobiography Report from Part One (1972).

Sources

- Kent, George E. A Life of Gwendolyn Brooks. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990.
- Wright, Stephen Caldwell, ed. On Gwendolyn Brooks: Reliant Contemplation. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Brown, Sterling (1901–1989) poet, critic, anthologist

Sterling Allen Brown was born into the African American middle class of Washington, D.C. His father was a distinguished pastor and theologian. He went to Williams College, where he made Phi Beta Kappa and graduated cum laude, and earned an M.A. degree in English at Harvard. In a series of appointments at black colleges in the 1920s (Virginia Seminary and College, Lincoln University, and Fisk) Brown explored the origins and development of African American folklore, which led to his most impressive poetry collection, Southern Road (1932); his books of criticism The Negro in American Fiction (1937) and Negro Poetry and Drama (1937); and the anthology The Negro Caravan: Writings by American Negroes (1941), which he edited with Arthur P. Davis and Ulysses Lee, the most complete collection of black literary work up to that time. The Collected Poems of Sterling A. Brown was published in 1980.

Sources

Gabbin, Joanne V. Sterling Brown: Building the Black Aesthetic Tradition. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1985.
 Sanders, Mark A. Afro-Modernist Aesthetics and The Poetry of Sterling A. Brown. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1999.

Buck, Pearl S. (1892–1973) novelist, short-story writer

The first American woman to win the Nobel Prize in literature (1938), Pearl S. Buck also won the PULITZER PRIZE for The Good Earth (1931). Born as Pearl Sydenstricker in West Virginia, she was taken by her missionary parents to China when she was an infant. She returned to the United States in 1910 and attended Randolph-Macon Woman's College. After her marriage to John Buck, she returned to China and taught in Nanking from 1921 to 1931, during which period she earned an M.A. from Cornell University. She returned to the United States permanently in 1934 and the next year divorced her husband and married Richard Walsh, the president of the John Day publishing company. Throughout her life, she remained committed to the Asian culture and founded several organizations to provide greater health care and opportunities for Asian children. Her speeches and writings helped to educate citizens on the impact to Asia of the twentieth century's world wars and America's increasingly global economy.

While Buck's first book, East Wind: West Wind (1930), which consisted of two short stories, was popular, she made her reputation with her second book and first novel, The Good Earth, which with its sequels, Sons (1932) and A House Divided (1935), trace a single Chinese family through several generations. Buck depicted a culture almost entirely unknown to her American audience. In 1936 she published biographies of her mother, The Exile, and her father, Fighting Angel.

Many of Buck's books have a Chinese setting and portray the East in a sympathetic and dramatic light. While her work sold well and her efforts to promote world understanding were admired, literary critics often scoffed at her as a serious writer and questioned the appropriateness of awarding her a Nobel Prize.

Her many books include The First Wife and Other Stories (1933), Dragon Seed (1942), What America Means to Me (1943), Pavilion of Women (1946), My Several Worlds (1954),

Letter from Peking (1957), Stories of China (1964), and The Good Dead, and Other Stories of Asia, Past and Present (1969). She published more than a hundred books, including plays and books for children.

Sources

Conn, Peter. Pearl S. Buck: A Cultural Biography. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
 Doyle, Paul A. Pearl S. Buck. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

—L. Michelle Baker

Bulosan, Carlos (1913–1956) poet, autobiographer

A Filipino-American, Bulosan learned English in the Philippines before he immigrated to the United States in 1930. He settled in Los Angeles and furthered his education through his reading at the public library. His first book was the poetry collection Letter from America (1942). His most famous work is the semi-autobiographical novel America Is in the Heart (1946), which tells of the brutal experiences of a Filipino immigrant.

Source

Evangelista, Susan. Carlos Bulosan and His Poetry: A Biography and Anthology. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1985.

Burrill, Mary Powell (1881–1946) playwright

Born in Washington, D.C., Mary Powell Burrill was educated at prestigious Dunbar High, the first high school for African Americans, and at Emerson College. She became a teacher of dramatics, English, and speech at Dunbar, where she remained until her retirement in 1944. Burrill directed plays that were well received by the community. In 1919 she published two one-act plays in support of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Birth Control League: Aftermath, a drama that depicts the reactions of a black World War I veteran to his father's lynching, appeared in The Liberator; They That Sit in Darkness, which tells the story of an African American girl who is forced to give up her plans to attend college when her mother dies after giving birth to her tenth child, was published in Margaret Sanger's Birth Control Review. Aftermath was produced by the Krigwa Players Little Negro Theatre in association with the Worker's Drama League, Manhattan, at the National Little Theater Tournament in New York on May 8, 1928.

Sources

Brown-Guillory, Elizabeth. Their Place on the Stage: Black Women Playwrights in America. New York: Praeger Press, 1988.
 Burrill, Mary Powell. "Aftermath (1919)," in A Century of Plays By American Women, edited by Rachel France. New York: Richards Rosen Press, 1979, pp. 55–61.

Hull, Gloria T. Color, Sex and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.

—Patricia A. Young

Burroughs, Edgar Rice (1875–1950) novelist, short-story writer

I wrote this story because I needed the money it might bring, and not from motives of sentiment . . . although I became very much interested in it while writing.

—Edgar Rice Burroughs on writing
“Under the Moons of Mars”

The Chicago-born Burroughs attended military school in Michigan but did not receive a college education. He published his first story, “Under the Moons of Mars,” in All-Story magazine in 1912 under the nom de plume “Normal Bean,” and found lasting success later the same year and in the same periodical with “Tarzan of the Apes.” Over the next thirty years Burroughs became a hugely popular adventure writer. He was the first writer to incorporate in order to protect his earnings, his name, and his reputation.

Burroughs’s “Under the Moons of Mars” was published as a book, A Princess of Mars, in 1917, and was followed by ten sequels. He was also well known for his two other major science-fiction series: the seven-book “Pellucidar” series, which began with At the Earth’s Core (1922), and the five-book Venus series, beginning with Pirates of Venus (1934). Burroughs’s most popular work is the Tarzan series. Following Tarzan of the Apes, which was published as a book in 1914, Burroughs wrote twenty-three sequels, one of which, Tarzan at the Earth’s Core (1930), is also part of the “Pellucidar” series. Commenting on the phenomenal success of the Tarzan character, Burroughs wrote in a 1918 article, “Tarzan always represents individual freedom . . . which is always present with us. There is not a man or woman who occasionally does not like to get away into a more or less primitive wilderness where he is ‘monarch of all he surveys.’” Other works by Burroughs include The Land That Time Forgot (1924) and The Moon Maid (1926).

Burroughs has had a lasting popularity with the reading public—his books have appeared in many editions, reprints, and translations around the world—but the critical reception has not been favorable. Burroughs’s racism, his willingness to use formulaic plots, and his focus on profit rather than on craft or literary depth have contributed to a general academic and critical disdain for his works.

Sources

Burroughs, Edgar Rice. Brother Men: The Correspondence of Edgar Rice Burroughs and Herbert T. Weston, edited by Matt Cohen. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2005.

Holtsmark, Erling B. Edgar Rice Burroughs. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Porges, Irwin. Edgar Rice Burroughs: The Man Who Created Tarzan. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press, 1975.

—Christopher Sutch

Bury the Dead by Irwin Shaw (produced 1936) play

This one-act anti-war drama was Irwin Shaw’s most acclaimed work for the stage. The setting is a war-torn field where graves are being prepared for soldiers killed during the “Second Year of War That Is to Begin Tomorrow” and the conceit is simple and powerful: six of the dead arise to argue against the horror and waste of war. Although shocked officers insist that “Wars can be fought and won only when the dead are buried and forgotten,” the dead soldiers will not be silenced and compellingly argue against the folly of war. Bury the Dead was first produced at the Ethel Barrymore Theatre on April 18, 1936, where it subsequently ran for ninety-seven performances. Shaw did not name a particular war in the play, choosing instead to implicate all such conflicts, but he was clearly inspired by the carnage of WORLD WAR I and the prospect of the SPANISH CIVIL WAR, which began later that year.

Sources

Shaw, Irwin. Bury the Dead. New York: Random House, 1936.

—James Fisher

Butterfield 8 by John O’Hara (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935) novel

Butterfield 8 is John O’HARA’s second novel and his only roman à clef: Gloria Wandrous is based on Starr Faithfull whose 1931 death was unsolved. Gloria—like Starr—is a heavy-drinking, promiscuous young woman who was sexually abused as a child. She is a regular in the New York speak-easies. The novel relates Gloria’s involvement with Weston Liggett, an upper-class older man, and provides an explanation for her accidental death. The title refers to a Manhattan telephone number, and Butterfield 8 functions as a social history of Prohibition New York.

—Morris Colden

Baker, Nicholson (1957– ) novelist, essayist

I don't feel as if I'm a description machine cranking myself slowly in one direction, fixing on something, spitting out a description of it, and then moving on to the next thing. What it feels like is that, instead, I have some pressing point I want to make about the coils of a toaster.

—Interview (1996)

Nicholson Baker's comic novels exaggerate the importance of the unimportant. A dedicated miniaturist, Baker writes intensely compressed novels steeped in quirky details and surprising minutiae. Similarly, his essays, which appear regularly in The New Yorker and The Atlantic Monthly, often meditate at great lyrical length on such insignificant everyday objects as toenail clippers and plastic model airplanes.

A native New Yorker, Baker originally intended to become a professional musician and even attended the Eastman School of Music from 1974 through 1975. By the time he graduated from Haverford College in 1980, however, his linguistic gifts had shifted his focus. For most of the 1980s he worked variously as a computer technical writer and an oil analyst, experiences that contributed to the quirky technical proficiency of his work. During this time he also began working seriously on his own fiction.

Baker's first novel, The Mezzanine (1988), chronicles the interior ruminations of an everyman named Howie, who spends an uneventful lunch hour buying shoelaces. In place of a plot, Baker structures the novel around Howie's detailed observations of the contemporary world around him. Similarly, Baker's second novel, Room Temperature (1990), focuses on the obsessive reflections of a young father as he waits for his baby daughter to finish a bottle of milk. The entire novel takes place in twenty minutes.

For his third book, Baker turned his microscopic gaze onto himself. U and I (1991) is a nonfiction account of Baker's ongoing interest in the work of John UPDIKE (the U of the title). However, the book is not a work of literary scholarship; rather, it casually chronicles what Baker remembers of Updike's influence on his work.

Baker shot to the top of the best-seller lists with his fourth book, the erotic novel Vox (1992), another concise, quirky volume, which details a lengthy, sexually charged phone conversation between a man and a woman. He soon followed Vox with another erotic work, Fermata (1994), which draws heavily on Baker's knowledge of music. The title refers to the musical term for a silent rest. Similarly, the narrator of the novel, Arno Stine, magically stops time in such a way that he can examine, minutely, the bodies of the frozen women around him. The book received mixed reviews, with some critics dismissing the work as adolescent and voyeuristic.

Baker's next work was a collection of essays and book reviews, The Size of Thoughts: Essays and Other Lumber (1996), which was followed by another novel, The Everlasting Story of Nory (1998), a meditation on childhood as seen through the eyes of a precocious nine-year-old girl named Eleanor Winslow, the Nory of the title. An essay on the passing of library index cards, which Baker published in The New Yorker, served as the basis for his follow-up work of nonfiction, the polemical Double Fold: Libraries and the Assault on Paper (2001), in which Baker angrily denounces the ongoing transition away from "paper" to such recent technologies as microfilm and microfiche. The book won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD.

In A Box of Matches (2003) Baker returns to the miniaturist mode of The Mezzanine, while in Checkpoint (2004) he chronicles an incendiary conversation between two high-school friends, one of whom wants to assassinate President George W. Bush. The book compelled one critic to wonder if Baker might be singled out by the U.S. Justice Department as a national security threat, though in fact the novel failed to create much of a stir. A selection of Baker's best pieces can be found in Vintage Baker (2004).

Source

Saltzman, Arthur. Understanding Nicholson Baker. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

—Marshall Boswell

Baldwin, James (1924–1987) novelist, essayist

Nothing is more desirable than to be released from an affliction, but nothing is more frightening than to be divested of a crutch.

—Notes of a Native Son (1955)

James Baldwin was born in Harlem on August 2, 1924, to Emma Jones. His stepfather, who adopted him, was a preacher. Baldwin's immersion in the black church and his relationship with his stepfather both influenced his first novel, GO TELL IT ON THE MOUNTAIN (1953). Baldwin's literary influences include novels such as Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) and the works of Charles Dickens. One of the turning points in Baldwin's life came when he met the Harlem Renaissance poet Countee Cullen (1903–1946), his French teacher at Frederick Douglass Junior High School in New York City.

James Baldwin

By the mid 1940s Baldwin was living in Greenwich Village, where he met the novelist Richard Wright (1908–1960). By 1946 Baldwin was writing essays for national magazines. In 1948 he moved to Paris, looking—as Wright had—for an environment in which to write and be free from racism. Baldwin's removal to Paris, however, was also a declaration of independence from his literary influences, including Wright, whose novel Native Son (1940) Baldwin criticized in Notes of a Native Son (1955). Baldwin rejected Wright's naturalism for a more supple form of literary narrative often associated with the stylistic and psychological complexities of Henry James (1843–1916).

Baldwin returned to the United States in 1957 to report on the Civil Rights movement. His essays, collected in Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son (1961) and The Fire Next Time (1963), transformed Baldwin into a national spokesman on matters of race. At the same time the essays were so eloquent and polished that they enhanced Baldwin's literary reputation. He wrote with enormous authority, melding his experience with the history of African Americans, while engaging other writers—white and black—in a national dialogue.

None of Baldwin's later work in fiction and nonfiction quite matched the success of his writing in the 1950s and 1960s, when he achieved notoriety with a novel, Another Country (1962), and a play, Blues for Mister Charlie (1964). Baldwin's other novels include Giovanni's Room (1956), Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone (1968), If Beale Street Could Talk (1974), and Just Above My Head (1979). He collected his later essays in No Name in the Street (1972), The Devil Finds Work (1976), The Evidence of Things Not Seen (1985), and The Price of the Ticket (1985).

Principal Books by Baldwin

Go Tell It on the Mountain. New York: Knopf, 1953.

Notes of a Native Son. Boston: Beacon, 1955.

Giovanni's Room. New York: Dial, 1956.

Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son. New York: Dial, 1961.

Another Country. New York: Dial, 1962.

The Fire Next Time. New York: Dial, 1963.

Nothing Personal, photographs by Richard Avedon. New York: Atheneum, 1964.

Blues For Mister Charlie: A Play. New York: Dial, 1964.

Going to Meet the Man. New York: Dial, 1965.

The Amen Corner: A Play. New York: Dial, 1968.

Dust jacket for James Baldwin's first novel, published in 1953

- Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone*. New York: Dial, 1968.
- A Rap on Race*, by Baldwin and Margaret Mead. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1971.
- One Day When I Was Lost: A Scenario Based on Alex Haley's "The Autobiography of Malcolm X."* London: Joseph, 1972; New York: Dial, 1973.
- No Name in The Street*. New York: Dial, 1972.
- If Beale Street Could Talk*. New York: Dial, 1974.
- The Devil Finds Work: An Essay*. New York: Dial, 1976.
- Little Man, Little Man: A Story of Childhood*. New York: Dial, 1976.
- Just Above My Head*. New York: Dial, 1979.
- Jimmy's Blues: Selected Poems*. London: Joseph, 1983; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985.
- The Evidence of Things Not Seen*. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1985.
- The Price of the Ticket: Collected Nonfiction, 1948–1985*. New York: St. Martin's Press/Marek, 1985.
- Gypsy & Other Poems*. Searsmont, Maine: Gehenna Press, 1989.

Studying James Baldwin

The author's major works are collected in two volumes published by Library of America, James Baldwin: Early Novels and Stories (1998), which includes Go Tell It on the Moun- tain, Giovanni's Room, Another Country, and Going to Meet the Man; and James Baldwin: Collected Essays (1998), which includes Notes of a Native Son, Nobody Knows My Name, The Fire Next Time, No Name in the Street, and The Devil Finds Work.

James Baldwin: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980), provides an annotated secondary bibliography that is useful, even though it is more than a quarter of a century out of date. A better resource for students is the Baldwin resources available at <www.literaryhistory.com/20thc/baldwin.htm> and its links. That site provides both primary and secondary citations.

There has been a great deal of interest in Baldwin's life. Fern Marja Eckman's The Furious Passage of James Baldwin (New York: M. Evans, 1966) is the first book-length biography of James Baldwin and primarily examines Baldwin's career as a writer and celebrity. Talking at the Gates: A Life of James Baldwin by James Campbell (New York: Viking,

Dust jacket for Baldwin's second book of essays, 1961, in which he protests against the protest novel, arguing that "the world tends to trap and immobilize you in the role you play."

1991 offers a more nuanced portrait of Baldwin's career, relationships, and writing. Campbell's Exiled in Paris: Richard Wright, James Baldwin, Samuel Beckett and Others on the Left Bank (Berkeley: University of California, 2003) provides insight into Wright and Baldwin's relationship and Baldwin's life in France. David Leeming's James Baldwin: A Biography (New York: Knopf, 1994) closely examines Baldwin's personal life and his politics while including critical perspectives of his work. Two collections of interviews are Conversations with James Baldwin, edited by Fred L. Standley and Louis Pratt (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989) and James Baldwin: The Legacy, edited by Quincy Troupe (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989).

A wide range of scholarship explores Baldwin's work. James Baldwin, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2006), offers critical essays on Baldwin's major works. Critical Essays on James Baldwin, edited by Fred L. Standley and Nancy Burton (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988), is a series of essays that attempt to reconcile Baldwin's life with his artistic development. James Baldwin Now, edited by Dwight A. McBride (New York: New York University Press, 1999), moves past the psychological analyses of many earlier criticisms of Baldwin's work, featuring innovative essays on a wide variety of topics and critical perspectives, including childhood, whiteness, sexuality, and queer theory. This volume also offers an extensive bibliography of criticism on Baldwin. Re-viewing James Baldwin: Things Not Seen, edited by D. Quentin Miller (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 2000), examines Baldwin's lesser-known works.

A collection of Baldwin's papers are housed at the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, New York Public Library, and a collection of his correspondence and early manuscripts are in the James Weldon Johnson Collection, Yale Collection of American Literature, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Yale University.

—Student Guide by Meeghan Kane

Bambara, Toni Cade (1939–1995) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

The job of the writer is to make revolution irresistible.

—Bambara

Toni Cade Bambara's various careers were all infused with social and political activism. She was born in New York City and grew up in New Jersey and in the South. Her mother inspired much of her early efforts to write, as did Bambara's friend Toni MORRISON. After receiving her B.A. from Queens College in 1959 and an M.A. from the City College of the City University of New York in 1964, Bambara taught at City College while publishing stories and articles in such magazines as Essence, Redbook, Negro Digest, Prairie Schooner, Phylon, Ms., Black World, and Liberator. In 1970 she published The Black Woman, an anthology that included works by Alice WALKER, Paule MARSHALL, Nikki GIOVANNI, and other prominent African American women as well as work by her students. A second anthology, Tales and Stories for Black Folks (1971), was aimed specifically at high-school and college students. She published two well-received collections of her own stories, Gorilla, My Love (1972) and The Sea Birds Are Still Alive (1977). Her first novel, The Salt Eaters (1981), won the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD and brought together her lifetime of experiences as a black woman, an educator, and an activist.

Bambara is known as a stylist in the contemporary American short story, bringing to the form a feel for urban life and a use of colloquial language. When she died, Bambara had almost completed a new novel, Those Bones Are Not My Child, which Morrison edited and published in 1999.

Sources

Butler-Evans, Elliott. Race, Gender, and Desire: Narrative Strategies in the Fiction of Toni Cade Bambara, Toni Morrison, and Alice Walker. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.

Tate, Claudia, ed. Black Women Writers at Work. New York: Continuum, 1983.

Banks, Russell (1940– ) novelist, short-story writer

Like Wade I have been ashamed and angry practically since birth and am accustomed to holding both those skewed relations to the world; it makes me, among those who loved him, uniquely qualified to tell his story.

—Affliction (1990)

Russell Banks was born in Newton, Massachusetts, and grew up in New Hampshire and Massachusetts. Earl Banks, a plumber, left his family in 1954; his son has described his father in a June 2003 interview with Richard Klin as “a difficult, complex, intense, and violent and alcoholic man. So he was a big presence, someone to deal with, growing up and in adult life.” In 1989 Russell Banks dedicated his novel Affliction (1990) to the memory of his father, who had died a decade earlier at the age of fifty-three. After a traumatic childhood, Banks attended Colgate for a semester and then, after a hiatus in which he married and then worked in a series of blue-collar jobs, he graduated from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1967. A prolific novelist, Banks taught creative writing at Columbia University, Sarah Lawrence College, and Princeton University. He retired from teaching in 1997.

Working in the realist mode, Banks writes short stories and novels that are often autobiographical—The Relation of My Imprisonment (1983), Affliction, Rule of the Bone (1995), and the majority of his short stories, in collections such as The Angel on the Roof (2000). His short stories employ the same themes as his longer fiction; “Defenseman,” “Firewood,” and “Quality Time,” for instance, return to the figure of the controlling, abusive, and emotionally isolated father whose difficult relations with his children dominate Banks’s fiction. His fiction is also intensely historical and political: Cloud-splitter (1998) is about the abolitionist John Brown, and The Darling (2004) explores its protagonist Hannah Musgrave’s involvement in the radical antiwar movement of the 1960s and early 1970s in the United States.

Banks’s fiction centers on characters whose lives have been marked by violence. Wade Whitehouse, the protagonist of Affliction, repeatedly experiences shame, humiliation, and rage in his hardscrabble life in an economically depressed New Hampshire mill town. The novel is a study of male violence, of the blighted “lives of boys and men . . . who were beaten by their fathers” and who in turn abused their wives and children. The cycle of intermeshed violence depicted in the novel culminates in Wade’s murdering his abusive father, then his friend Jack, a hunter returning at the end of deer season with the trophy buck he has just shot. Affliction demonstrates Banks’s ability to present both the abused and the abuser’s points of view and his fascination with the cycle of familial violence.

Banks is attuned to racial, economic, and political violence as well, not only in his work as president of an international organization devoted to arranging refuge for writers imperiled by strife in their homelands but also in the international scope of his fiction set in such places as Haiti and Liberia.

Source

Niemi, Robert. Russell Banks. New York: Twayne, 1997.

—Jennifer Brady

Baraka, Amiri (1934– ) poet, essayist, novelist, playwright

MY POETRY is whatever I think I am. (Can I be light and weightless as a sail?? Heavy & clunking like 8 black boots.) I CAN BE ANYTHING I CAN. I make a poetry with what I feel is useful & can be saved out of all the garbage of our lives.

—“How You Sound??” (1959)

Born Everett LeRoy (later changed to LeRoi) Jones in Newark, New Jersey, the poet published his early works under his birth name before changing his name in 1968 to Amiri Baraka. Having graduated from Barringer High School, Baraka attended Rutgers and graduated with a B.A. from Howard University in 1953. After a period of enlistment in the U.S. Air Force he settled in New York City, where he studied comparative literature at Columbia University and befriended many avant-garde artists on the Lower East Side. His first collection of poems, Preface to a Twenty-Volume Suicide Note (1964), and two absurdist plays, The Baptism (produced 1961) and The Toilet (produced 1964), reflected the influence of the BEATS and earned him early fame. Soon Baraka turned away from the apolitical Beats, however, as he sought a way to wed his involvement in social issues with his interest in the literary avant-garde.

Baraka solidified his reputation with two provocative plays, Dutchman and The Slave (both produced 1964), and a collection of poems, The Dead Lecturer (1964). These works took on racial themes directly and were products of what came to be called the BLACK AESTHETIC. In these works Baraka wrestled with the problem of being both an artist and a political activist.

In 1965 Baraka founded the Black Arts Repertory Theater and School, signaling a move away from his Greenwich Village roots. A few years later Baraka solidified his spiritual conversion to Islam and his political alignment with militant black nationalism by adopting his new name. Baraka took on a prophetic role aimed at radicalizing African American readers by pointing to the threat of white majority culture. His commitment to art and experiment continued during this time, particularly in his Four Revolutionary Plays (1969), which are in the tradition of Modernist literature.

Baraka remained politically active during this period and declared himself a Marxist-Leninist, publishing works that incorporated his support of Mao Tse-tung, Fidel Castro, and other Communist leaders. Hard Facts (1975), Poetry for the Advanced (1979), and Daggers and Javelins (1984) reflect this mixture of Marxism and black nationalism.

Three major anthologies of Baraka’s work have appeared in recent decades. The LeRoi Jones/Amiri Baraka Reader provides a general cross-section of his poems, essays, stories, and plays up to 1991. His best poems can be found in Transbluency: The Selected Poems of Amiri Baraka/LeRoi Jones (1961–1995), published in 1995, while his most important experimental fiction has been gathered in The Fiction of Leroy Jones/Amiri Baraka, published in 2001.

In 2002 Baraka was appointed second poet laureate of the state of New Jersey. When he refused to resign following public controversy, the position was abolished by the state Senate.

Sources

Benston, Kimberly W. Baraka: The Renegade and the Mask. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1976.

Harris, William J. The Poetry and Poetics of Amiri Baraka: The Jazz Aesthetic. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1985.

Barth, John (1930– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

My feeling about technique in art is that it has about the same value as technique in lovemaking. That is to say, on the one hand, heartfelt ineptitude has its appeal and, on the other hand, so does heartless skill; but what you want is passionate virtuosity.

—Interview (1982)

The unofficial professor emeritus of Postmodern American METAFICTION, John Barth was born in the Tidewater region of Maryland, the setting of nearly all of his fiction. One of a set of opposite-sex twins, Barth began his artistic career as an aspiring musician, and attended the Juilliard School of Music for a brief period. He soon shifted his focus to English literature, and in the early 1950s he began pursuing a master's degree at Johns Hopkins University. While shelving books in the university library as part of his work-study job, he became entranced by story cycles such as The Decameron, The Canterbury Tales, and, particularly, The Arabian Nights. Thus inspired, he began work on an original cycle of one hundred tales set in the Chesapeake Bay area of Maryland. When the project proved unworkable, Barth shifted his attention to a story about suicide and sexual infidelity, which became his first novel, The Floating Opera (1956). By the time that novel had found a publisher, Barth had already produced a companion book, The End of the Road (1958). Now securely launched on his career as a fiction writer, he abandoned his plans for a Ph.D. and began a fifteen-year run of teaching and writing that yielded four major novels, including The Sot-Weed Factor (1960) and Giles Goat-Boy (1966); an innovative story collection, Lost in the Funhouse (1968); and Chimera (1972), a triptych of novellas that earned him a National Book Award.

In "The Literature of Exhaustion," a formative essay published in 1967, Barth described his new approach to writing as a way of turning "the felt ultimacies of our time into material and means for his work." In other words, if, as he suspected, the novel was dead (or "exhausted") as an art form, then one way for contemporary novelists to write "remarkable and original work" would be for them to take as their "implicit theme . . . the difficulty, perhaps unnecessary, of writing original works of literature." Hence, novels and stories in this mode would use exhausted literary conventions self-consciously in order to question and/or rediscover their validity. The stories in Barth's follow-up work, Lost in the Funhouse, put these ideas to direct use. Soon, terms such as POSTMODERNISM and metafiction began to surface to describe what Barth was up to.

In 1973 Barth left his position at SUNY Buffalo, his professional home since 1965, and took up a teaching post in the creative-writing department at Johns Hopkins, where he remained until the end of his teaching career. He arrived there with his second wife, Shelly Rosenberg, a former student whom he had married in 1970. For the rest of the decade he worked on a massive novel titled LETTERS, which finally appeared in 1979 to mixed reviews. This muted response inaugurated a decline in Barth's artistic reputation, which, until that moment, had him placed securely at the forefront of American writers of his generation.

His follow-up novel, Sabbatical: A Romance (1982), a much more unassuming affair, concerned a middle-aged husband and his younger wife who tell stories to each other while on an extended sailing voyage. This basic premise shaped the novels Tidewater Tales (1987) and The Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor (1991); his memoir, Once Upon a Time: A Floating Opera (1995); and On with the Story (1996), a story collection.

Though known primarily as a writer of self-reflexive metafiction, Barth was first associated with the Black Humor school of the 1950s. He has described The Floating Opera as a "nihilist comedy," and its companion piece, The End of the Road, as a "nihilist catastrophe." Both novels express grave doubts about intrinsic meaning, and both flirt with the idea that, as Barth's hero in The Floating Opera puts it, "There's no final reason for living (or for suicide)." This dark, defeatist vision was couched in works conspicuous for their verbal play and structural complexity.

In the early to mid 1960s both The Sot-Weed Factor and Giles Goat-Boy were cult classics, while Barth's theories about metafiction, mythical archetypes, story cycles, and the future of the novel commanded center stage in the theater of literary ideas. Barth's numerous metafictional innovations have left an indelible mark on the work of major contemporary writers such as Don DELILLO, David Foster Wallace, and Richard Powers. Nevertheless, Barth's output following LETTERS has played to an ever smaller audience, perhaps owing to his dogged refusal to abandon his pet concerns, which continue to include story cycles (particularly the Arabian Nights), mythic archetypes, and quest narratives. Though each new novel or story collection displays deep wellsprings of invention and storytelling vigor, a particular Barthian strength, it is unlikely that any of these works—excluding, perhaps, the 650-page epic, Tidewater Tales, his best and most successful post-LETTERS novel and the belated fulfillment of his original desire to create a contemporary story cycle set in his native Maryland—will ever command the attention accorded to his popular books from the 1960s.

Sources

Clavier, Berndt. John Barth and Postmodernism: Spatiality, Travel, Montage. New York: Peter Lang, 2007.

Harris, Charles B. Passionate Virtuosity: The Fiction of John Barth. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983.

The John Barth Information Center. <<http://www.davidlouisdelman.com/barth/>> (viewed January 5, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Barthelme, Donald (1931–1989) short-story writer, novelist

The best way to live is by not knowing what will happen to you at the end of the day.

—Barthelme

Donald Barthelme was born in Philadelphia in 1931 and grew up in Texas, where his father worked as a professor of architecture at the University of Houston. In 1951, while a student at that same university, Barthelme, a journalism major, began publishing his first articles for the Houston Post. After a brief stint in the army late in the Korean War, he returned to Houston to continue his studies, though he never earned his degree. In 1961 he was appointed director of the Contemporary Art Museum in Houston. That same year he published his first story. In 1963 his story "L'Lapse" appeared in The New Yorker, the first of hundreds of pieces that appeared in that magazine over the next three decades. Barthelme married four times and produced two children. His brothers, Frederick Barthelme and Steven Barthelme, are also distinguished fiction writers who, in 2001, collaborated on a memoir about their gambling experiences, Double Down. Donald Barthelme died of cancer in 1989.

Although Barthelme published three well-received novels, Snow White (1967), The Dead Father (1975), and Paradise (1986), plus a posthumous novel, The King (1990), he is best known as a writer of concise, surrealistic, and playful stories that defy literary conventions. Barthelme's stories rarely feature plots and fully developed or "believable" characters. His work depends on juxtaposition and montage with seemingly unrelated images and motifs piled upon one another to create fresh connections. Often the foreground of Barthelme's stories is the language by which they are told. Their tone is ironic, skeptical, and exuberant. His many collections include Come Back Dr. Caligari (1964), Unspeakable Practices, Unspeakable Acts (1968), City Life (1970), Sadness (1972), Amateurs (1976), Great Days (1979), and Overnight to Many Distant Cities (1983). Barthelme's stories were gathered in two omnibus collections, Sixty Stories (1981) and Forty Stories (1987). Also of interest is Not-Knowing: The Essays and Interviews of Donald Barthelme (1997).

Donald Barthelme's jarringly entertaining short stories of the 1960s introduced the techniques and concerns of METAFICTION and POSTMODERNISM to legions of New Yorker readers and helped bring many of these ideas and strategies into the mainstream. His work can be understood as a particularly playful and American take on the experimental work of European writers such as Alain Robbe-Grillet and other proponents of the nouveau roman, or new novel. In other words, Barthelme's work is as much about what it is doing as what it is about. Critic Richard Gilman remarked that Barthelme was "one of a handful of American writers who [worked] to replenish and extend the art of fiction instead of trying to add to the stock of entertainments, visions and human documents that fiction keeps piling up." Although his detractors often regard his work as self-involved and academic, Barthelme's admirers regard him as a trailblazer who helped rediscover what fiction could do.

Sources

Roe, Barbara L. Donald Barthelme: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Trachtenberg, Stanley. Understanding Donald Barthelme. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990.

—Marshall Boswell

Bausch, Richard (1945– ) novelist, short-story writer

Although Richard Bausch has published many critically acclaimed novels, he is best known for his well-constructed, tense, and psychologically acute short stories, which take place in the vast landscape of male desolation and moral ambiguity already charted by such fellow masters of the form as Raymond CARVER, Andre DUBUS, and Richard FORD. The best of Bausch's stories can be found in The Selected Stories of Richard Bausch (1996). His novels include Real Presence (1980); Take Me Back (1981), nominated for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD; The Last Good Time (1984); Violence (1992); Rebel Powers (1993); and Good Evening Mr. and Mrs. America, and All the Ships at Sea (1996). In 2004 he received the PEN/Malamud Award for Excellence in Short Fiction. He has taught creative writing at George Mason University, Wesleyan University, and the University of Memphis.

Source

Lavorata, Ann Marie. "An Interview with Richard Bausch," Five Points: A Journal of Literature and Art, 8, no. 1 (2004): 6–18.

—Matthew Shippe

Baxter, Charles (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet, essayist

Every time I've finished a book, it feels to me as if the washrag has been wrung out. Everything that I know, everything that I've observed or taken down, I've used.

—Interview (2003)

Charles Baxter is the author of novels, collections of short stories, collections of poems, and a book of essays on fiction, Burning Down the House (1997). He was born in Minneapolis, the third son of artistically inclined parents who were friends of Sinclair Lewis. His father died when Baxter was fifteen months old, and three years later his mother married Loring Staples Sr., at whose forty-acre lakeside estate Baxter was reared. Lonely on the vast estate, Baxter turned to Staples's extensive library. At Macalester College in Saint Paul, Baxter became editor of the college literary magazine. Upon his graduation in 1969, he began teaching high school in Pinconning, Michigan. A year later he enrolled in the Ph.D. program at the State University of New York in Buffalo, where, Baxter says, he conscientiously avoided taking creative-writing workshops for fear of criticism. Nonetheless, he published two collections of poems—Chameleon (1970) and The South Dakota Guidebook (1974)—before receiving his Ph.D. in 1974.

Baxter's first collection of short stories, Harmony of the World (1984), was published by the University of Missouri Press. A year later, another short-story collection, Through the Safety Net (1985), was published by Viking. Since then Baxter has published a third collection of poems, Imaginary Paintings and Other Poems (1989); two more short-story collections, A Relative Stranger (1990) and Believers (1997); and four novels, First Light (1987), Shadow Play (1993), The Feast of Love (2000), and Saul and Patsy (2003). Baxter's novels and stories typically investigate the strangeness of Midwestern life, and despite their often nonlinear or episodic structure, tend to be cast in a pure, realistic vein, delving into the minds and voices of everyday people, through whom small events take on universal meaning.

Baxter has taught English at Wayne State University and in the M.F.A. program at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. He is Edelstein-Keller Senior Fellow in Creative Writing at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis.

Sources

Lee, Don. "About Charles Baxter," Ploughshares, 25 (1999): 210–217.

Official Charles Baxter website: <www.charlesbaxter.com> (viewed April 15, 2007).

—Anna Teekell

The Beats

This community of artists, primarily writers, included Jack KEROUAC, Allen GINSBERG, Lawrence FERLINGHETTI, and Gregory CORSO—with other writers such as William S. BURROUGHS and Gary SNYDER also associated with the group. Beat rejections of conformism were most dramatically captured in Ginsberg's "Howl" (1956), Ferlinghetti's jazz-inspired A Coney Island of the Mind (1958), and Kerouac's ON THE ROAD (1955). The Beats celebrated the reckless and romantic gestures of artists who sought a more intense way of living. Anarchists and radical individualists who found company and stimulation in literature and music, they were not so much social rebels as they were disaffected and disaffiliated; they were, in a sense, a club of loners. They were literally "beat" in the sense of having been worn out by conventional society. Ginsberg called them "hipsters" in Howl. They were also, again in Ginsberg's language, "angel-headed": their attraction to drugs and to Eastern philosophy represented their search for transcendental values and their rejection of commercial culture.

As writers, the Beats were experimental. Ferlinghetti used the rhythms of jazz in his poetry and sometimes gave public readings accompanied by jazz musicians. Ginsberg revived Walt Whitman's experimentation with the poetic line and with an expansive poetic voice that Ginsberg used to express a kind of eccentric populism. Unlike the proletarian writers of the 1930s or the activist writers of the 1960s, the Beats turned inward. For the most part they wanted to transform themselves, not society; however, Ginsberg promoted Beat ideas in numerous public events and on television. In On the Road, Kerouac captured the restless, troubadour quality of the Beats, and the spontaneous, episodic nature of their lives and art.

Other Beats pursued a consistent exploration of Buddhism and Asian philosophy as well as an attachment to the natural world that was reminiscent of earlier writers such as Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–1882) and Henry David Thoreau (1817–1862). William S. Burroughs, particularly in his novel NAKED LUNCH (1962; published in 1959 as The Naked Lunch), explored the psychedelic and surrealist consciousness that verged on nihilism—an extreme that was representative of certain Beat writers.

In an earlier generation the Beats would have been called bohemians, in reference to the unconventional lifestyles of these artists who frequented Greenwich Village in New York City and were associated with various avant-garde movements. In the 1950s they sought an alternative way of life in the Village and in the North Beach section of San Francisco, where Ferlinghetti owned a bookstore called City Lights that published Ginsberg and other Beats, as well as other writers of what was sometimes called the San Francisco Renaissance.

Sources

Foster, Edward Halsey. Understanding the Beats. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1992.

Lee, A. Robert, ed. The Beat Generation Writers. London & East Haven, Conn.: Pluto Press, 1996.

Tytell, John. Naked Angels: The Lives & Literature of the Beat Generation. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.

Beattie, Ann (1947– ) short-story writer, novelist

I'm interested in people who ostensibly do have some kind of secure world—my characters are largely employed, largely live together or are married, often have children—on some level they are certainly leading conventional lives. And they're certainly not doing so well at that.

—Interview (1985)

Born an only child in Washington, D.C., Ann Beattie grew up rebelling against the strict rules in her suburban school and life. Since then she has become well known for chronicling the lives of the American generation that came of age in the 1960s. After earning a B.A. from American University in 1969, Beattie enrolled in the Ph.D. program in English at the University of Connecticut. There J. D. O'Hara, her creative-writing professor, encouraged her, and she began submitting her stories to magazines. By 1972 Beattie had left graduate school to pursue writing full-time. She won an award from The Atlantic Monthly in 1973, and a year later her work was published in The New Yorker. She has served as writer-in-residence at Northwestern University and at Harvard University and also spent many years teaching in the M.F.A. program at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

Beattie's stories and novels often hinge on the small details or actions that make up a life. This close attention to detail is what has made Beattie's short-story collections—including Secrets and Surprises (1978), The Burning House (1982), and Perfect Recall (2001)—generally more successful than her novels. Beattie's first novel, Chilly Scenes of Winter (1976), is probably her best known and was adapted as a movie. A volume of selected stories, Park City, was published in 1998. A novel, The Doctor's House, was published in 2003, and a book of stories, Follies, in 2005.

Praised for the sardonic tone of her works, Beattie has been compared to John UPDIKE; these comparisons along with Beattie's consistent publication in The New Yorker have led to her inclusion in the so-called New Yorker School of fiction writing, which emphasizes realistic portrayals of white, middle-class daily life. In stark prose Beattie chronicles the suburban angst of a once-rebellious generation.

Sources

Montresor, Jaye Berman. The Critical Response to Ann Beattie. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.

Murphy, Christina. Ann Beattie. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

—Anna Teekell

Begley, Louis (1933– ) novelist

... I do not believe in unscrambling scrambled eggs. It is contrary to the best interest of one's novel to tell the reader, Look, I imagined this, I really experienced that.

—Interview (2002)

Born Ludwik Begleiter on October 6, 1933, in Stryj, Poland, literary novelist Louis Begley had already distinguished himself as an international corporate lawyer with nearly thirty years' experience before he achieved critical acclaim for his first novel, Wartime Lies (1991), published when he was in his late fifties. This novel, which won both the PEN/ Hemingway First Fiction Award and the Prix Médicis Estranger, draws upon Begley's personal experience as a Polish refugee during WORLD WAR II, as its nine-year-old narrator, a Jewish boy named Maciek, and his sister, Tania, witness Nazi atrocities firsthand. Conversely, Begley's other fiction focuses primarily on disaffected outsiders from the American ruling class. His popular, critically acclaimed books also include The Man Who Was Late (1992), As Max Saw It (1994), and About Schmidt (1996), which was adapted as a movie starring Jack Nicholson. In 2000 Begley published the sequel, Schmidt Delivered. His most-recent novels include Shipwreck (2003), a tale of adultery as told by a literary novelist living in Paris, and Matters of Honor (2007).

Source

Official Louis Begley website: <<http://www.louisbegley.com/>> (viewed May 15, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

The Bell Jar by Sylvia Plath, as Victoria Lucas

(London, Melbourne & Toronto: Heinemann, 1963;

New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1971) novel

This dense, disturbing novel traces the psychological collapse of a gifted young woman as she negotiates the rigid moral codes and gender stereotypes of 1950s America. The novel opens in New York City in the sultry summer of 1953, the same summer during which the Rosenbergs were executed for treason, at the height of the COLD WAR. Esther Greenwood, the novel's college-aged heroine and first-person narrator, has been awarded a scholarship to serve as guest editor at a famous women's fashion magazine. While in New York, she experiences the beginnings of a debilitating depression that ultimately results in a suicide attempt and a recovery that includes electric shock therapy. Among the suggested sources of Esther's depression is her paralyzing dissatisfaction with the available roles offered to her as a woman with artistic ambitions. Forced to choose between the solitary life of an artist, as typified by both the unmarried editor, Jay Cee, and "famous poet" Philomena Guinea—Esther's mentor at the magazine—and a life of domestic drudgery and child-rearing as typified by her bitter, unsatisfied mother, Esther chooses to withdraw entirely. As readers and critics have repeatedly pointed out, Esther Greenwood shares many characteristics with her author, Sylvia PLATH, who served as a guest editor for Mademoiselle magazine in the summer of 1953, and whose own struggle with depression led, famously, to her suicide in 1963.

Plath reportedly began writing The Bell Jar in 1961 when she was living in England with her husband, the English poet Ted Hughes. By the time she finished the manuscript in the fall of 1962, she and Hughes had separated. Keenly aware of the autobiographical nature of the work, Plath originally published the work in England under the pseudonym Victoria Lucas. Just after the novel was published to somewhat mixed reviews, Plath took her life in what was the coldest winter in London since 1813–1814. The novel was subsequently published under Plath's real name. Her fears about its potential to offend the real-life counterparts to her fictional characters was confirmed when a college acquaintance, recognizing herself as the source for a character named Joan, successfully sued for libel.

For all of the autobiographical similarities, The Bell Jar is not a memoir. Plath used her training as a poet to transform her suffering into art, creating a rich and resourceful symbolic structure that gives shape and substance to what would otherwise be a purely private struggle. The novel is particularly rich in womb imagery, suggesting the maternal characteristics of Esther's near death and recovery.

Sources

Kendall, Tim. Sylvia Plath: A Critical Study. London: Faber & Faber, 2001.

Peel, Robin. Writing Back: Sylvia Plath and Cold War Politics. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

Bell, Madison Smartt (1957– ) novelist, short-story writer, musician

I felt released when I discovered urban life, which I didn't know anything about as a literary subject . . . because to that urban landscape and society, I brought a southern literary approach and stylistic conventions and also some attitudes that I got from southern writers.

—Interview (1994)

Although Madison Smartt Bell began his career specializing in Postmodern portraits of misfits, criminals, and apocalyptic outsiders, he has since achieved acclaim not only for his stately novels of modern Southern dislocation but also for his trilogy of historical romances detailing the bloody history of Haiti in the eighteenth century.

Born in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1957, Bell received his B.A. from Princeton University in 1979 and his M.A. from Hollins College in Virginia in 1981. He published his first novel, The Washington Square Ensemble (1983), at the age of twenty-six and then produced a steady stream of novels and short-story collections that include such works as Waiting for the End of the World (1985), Straight Cut (1986), The Year of Silence (1987), and Zero db (1987)—a signature short-story collection from the 1980s. All of these works take place in an edgy urban setting—Bell has since affirmed that his first three novels comprise a “New York Trilogy”—while their preoccupation with city hustlers, religious fanatics, and other social misfits somewhat masks Bell's self-professed adherence to the Southern school of violence and the grotesque that includes such writers as William Faulkner and Flannery O'CONNOR.

In 1986 Bell published in Harper's Magazine “Less Is Less: The Diminishing American Short Story,” an essay that marked something of a turning point in his career. In this essay, Bell rails against the then-popular minimalist mode favored by such writers as Bobbie Ann MASON and Raymond CARVER. Having called for a broader view and a deeper sense of place and difference, Bell put his argument to the test with his follow-up novel, Soldier's Joy (1989), in which a Vietnam veteran in 1970s Nashville deals with rural life and racism in the post-civil rights South. Racial themes appear again in Save Me, Joe Louis (1993), a picaresque tale about a pair of itinerant muggers.

Bell's historical novel about slave rebellion in eighteenth-century Haiti, All Souls' Rising (1995), was a finalist for both the PEN/FAULKNER and the NATIONAL BOOK awards. Master of the Crossroads (2000) and The Stone That the Builder Refused (2004) completed the Haitian trilogy. Lavosier (2005) and Toussaint Louverture (2007), both biographies, followed. A long-time teacher of creative writing, Bell gathered together his ideas about craft and form in Narrative Design: A Writer's Guide to Structure (1997).

Source

Weeks, Mary Louis. “An Interview with Madison Smartt Bell,” Southern Review, 30 (January 1994): 1–12.

—Marshall Boswell

Bellow, Saul (1915–2005) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

We must not permit intellectuals to become our bosses. And we do them no good by letting them run the arts. Should they, when they read novels, find in them only the endorsement of their own opinions? Are we here to play such games?

—Nobel Lecture (1976)

Usually associated with Chicago, Saul Bellow was actually born in Lachine, Quebec, to Russian Jewish immigrants. He lived with his parents, his grandmother, and his older brother in an impoverished neighborhood populated by fellow immigrants from the Ukraine, Romania, Greece, Italy, and Poland. When he was eight, he was hospitalized for six months, and, while convalescing, a visiting missionary gave him the New Testament to read. Bellow later said that this experience inspired him to become a writer. He was also influenced by the rough-and-tumble grittiness of his new neighborhood when in 1924 his father moved the family to Chicago; there he sought to arm himself with a paradoxical blend of intellectual sophistication and tough-minded street smarts that later characterized his best work.

After receiving his B.A. from Northwestern University, Bellow began, but soon abandoned, postgraduate work in anthropology at the University of Wisconsin. He supported his nascent writing career by teaching, and at one point worked for the Works Project Administration. Following a stint in the merchant marines during WORLD WAR II, Bellow returned home to continue teaching and writing. He published his first books in the late 1940s, at the very beginning of the Jewish assimilation that followed World War II. More so than any other writer, Bellow wrote novels that both examined and helped spur that assimilation. His first novel, Dangling Man (1944), was a grim, psychologically acute story about a man waiting to be drafted into the army. Whereas The Dangling Man and his second novel, The Victim

Saul Bellow, 1977

(1947), were directly influenced by European writers such as Thomas Mann, Franz Kafka, and Fyodor Dostoevsky, and demonstrated the same stern, moral engagement and formal decorum of his European models, his third book, THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH (1953), was freewheeling, voracious, and brash—and instantly established Bellow as one of the major writers of his time.

With Augie March, Bellow did more than simply demonstrate his gift for creating memorable characters; he also helped transform American literary culture. Bellow abandons the brooding insularity of his early work in favor of a sprawling, windswept Americanness, to which his hero, Augie March, lays claim in the novel's famous opening sentence: "I am an American, Chicago born—Chicago, that somber city—and go at things as I have taught myself, free-style, and will make the record in my own way." Bellow also found a way in this novel to marry his wide-ranging intellectual training with his interest in mobsters, urban hustlers, gangsters, and other assorted urban rascals still vivid to him from his years running the Chicago streets. Just as important is the book's prose, which is racy, lyrical, and loquacious, and which combines the verbal jazz of American speech with Bellow's own razor-sharp cerebral acuity.

Bellow followed Augie March with a slim, somber novella, SEIZE THE DAY (1956). Three years later Bellow published perhaps his most daring novel, Henderson the Rain King (1959), which was set in a purely imagined Africa (Bellow never visited that continent) and starred Henderson, one of Bellow's most unforgettable and irrepressible heroes. The book successfully reprised the freewheeling comic vivacity of Augie March and became a best-seller. His next novel, Herzog (1964), an intellectual comedy about an academic in the grip of a nervous breakdown, became an even bigger, and more unlikely, best-seller.

Bellow seemed to signal a shift in his political sympathies with Mr. Sammler's Planet (1970), which offered a bitter, critical indictment of the 1960s counterculture. Some critics even called the book racist. Undaunted, Bellow marshaled on, with his next novel, Humboldt's Gift (1975), a loving fictionalized portrait of his friend Delmore Schwartz, returning him to the sprawling comic mode of Augie March and Henderson the Rain King. The book became another big seller, particularly in paperback, as that edition arrived in stores amid the news of Bellow's winning the 1976 Nobel Prize in literature.

Dust jacket for Bellow's 1964 novel, which earned his second National Book Award

Dust jacket for Bellow's 1982 novel, his first after winning the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1976

A mid-seventies trip to Israel became the focus of his travel memoir, To Jerusalem and Back (1976). His work following his receipt of the Nobel Prize was generally greeted with mixed reviews, with many critics noting a decisive turning away from the liberalism of his earlier work. This assessment was solidified when Bellow wrote an admiring foreword to his friend Allan Bloom's critique of academic liberalism, The Closing of the American Mind (1987), which became a surprise blockbuster in the late 1980s. Bellow paid additional homage to Bloom in the form of Ravelstein (2000), a novel whose main character was directly inspired by the flamboyant, spendthrift Bloom.

Bellow's work in the 1980s, including The Dean's December (1987) and More Die of Heartbreak (1987), was characterized by an ever-increasing crankiness and pitched at a diminishing audience. His stature is mainly based on the six novels he produced between 1953 and 1975. Historically, he is also regarded as the unquestionable leader of the Jewish American renaissance of the 1950s; Philip Roth, Bellow's most admiring heir apparent, declared that "The backbone of twentieth-century American literature has been provided by two novelists—William Faulkner and Saul Bellow. Together they are the Melville, Hawthorne, and Twain of the twentieth century." Bellow's conservative turn in the latter part of his career somewhat diminished his reputation, yet he recovered his old exuberance with the publication of Ravelstein. Bellow died in 2005, just shy of ninety.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Bellow

Dangling Man. New York: Vanguard, 1944.

The Victim. New York: Vanguard, 1947.

The Adventures of Augie March. New York: Viking, 1953.

Seize the Day. New York: Viking, 1956.

Henderson the Rain King. New York: Viking, 1959.

Herzog. New York: Viking, 1964.
The Last Analysis: A Play. New York: Viking, 1965.
Mosby's Memoirs and Other Stories. New York: Viking, 1968.
Mr. Sammler's Planet. New York: Viking, 1970.
Humboldt's Gift. New York: Viking, 1975.
To Jerusalem and Back: A Personal Account. New York: Viking, 1976.
The Dean's December. New York: Harper & Row, 1982.
Him with His Foot in His Mouth and Other Stories. New York: Harper & Row, 1984.
More Die of Heartbreak. New York: Morrow, 1987.
A Theft. New York: Penguin, 1989.
The Bellarosa Connection. New York: Penguin, 1989.
Something to Remember Me By: Three Tales. New York: Viking, 1991.
It All Adds Up: From the Dim Past to the Uncertain Future. New York: Viking, 1994.
The Actual. New York: Viking, 1997.
Ravelstein. New York: Viking, 2000.
Collected Stories. New York: Viking, 2001.

Studying Saul Bellow

Bellow's most important novels are collected in two volumes published by Library of America: Novels 1944–1953 (2003), which includes Dangling Man, The Victim, and The Adventures of Augie March; and Novels 1956–1964 (2007), which includes Seize the Day, Henderson the Rain King, and Herzog. Collected Stories (New York: Viking, 2001) comprises thirteen stories chosen by Bellow, including his best-known works in the form. Small Planets: Saul Bellow and the Art of Short Fiction, edited by Gerhard Bach and Gloria Cronin (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 2000) includes essays by Bellow.

For an introduction to the catalogue of Bellow criticism, students should consult The Critical Response to Saul Bellow, edited by Gerhard Bach (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995), which covers Bellow's novels through The Bellarosa Connection (1989) as well as the plays and short fiction. Saul Bellow, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 1986), collects criticism of Bellow's works useful to students.

Examination of Bellow's critique of Modernist thought can be found in Jan Bakker's comparative study of Bellow and Hemingway, Fiction as Survival Study (Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1983). M. A. Quayum's Saul Bellow and American Transcendentalism (New York: Peter Lang, 2004) locates Bellow's optimism as descendant of Emerson. Early studies underscore Bellow's lack of convincing female characterization. Joseph McFadden's The Flight from Women in the Fiction of Saul Bellow (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1980) examines this extensively. More recently, Gloria Cronin has offered a counterview in A Room of His Own: In Search of the Feminine in the Novels of Saul Bellow (New York: Syracuse University Press, 2000). On Jewish identity in a post-Holocaust world, L. H. Goldman's Saul Bellow's Moral Vision: A Critical Study of the Jewish Experience (New York: Irvington, 1983), with its extended analysis of Bellow's work from his first novel through the year he was awarded the Nobel Prize (1976), remains the standard.

"Bigger, wilder and even better than The Adventures of Augie March (his 1954 National Book Award Winner). Henderson is a picaresque hero in the great tradition, full of a bizarre vitality with affinities both to Odysseus and Don Quixote." NEWMARKET

Advertisement for Bellow's 1959 novel, which, he said, marked his maturity as a writer.

For biographical materials, James Atlas's Bellow (New York: Random House, 2000) offers the most comprehensive examination of the author's life and influences, Conversations with Saul Bellow, edited by Gloria L. Cronin and Ben Siegel (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994), collects interviews with the author.

Another valuable resource in Bellow studies is the Saul Bellow Society's semiannual Saul Bellow Journal, dedicated to the author's work. Published since 1982, the journal publishes the most current Bellow scholarship available, and the society's website offers a compendium of introductory and bibliographical materials, including Cronin and Blaine H. Hall's Saul Bellow: An Annotated Bibliography and Research Guide (<<http://www.saulbellow.org>> viewed May 30, 2007).

—Student Guide by Paul Plisiewicz

Beloved by Toni Morrison (New York: Knopf, 1987)
novel

This Pulitzer Prize-winning novel about black life in post-Civil War Ohio is a ghost story, a love story, and a political allegory. Combining historical fact with African folklore and myth, Be-loved juxtaposes scenes of harrowing realism with dream-like sequences of surreal beauty. In 2006 the book was voted the best American novel of the past twenty-five years by a literary panel selected by The New York Times Book Review.

Beloved tells the story of an escaped slave, Sethe, who murders one of her daughters when she learns that her former master has come to take away her children. Best understood as a Romance, as described by Nathaniel Hawthorne in his 1851 preface to The House of the Seven Gables, Beloved is characterized by what Hawthorne called the author's "right" to "mingle the Marvelous" with the "probable and ordinary course of man's experience." The "Marvelous" component in Morrison's novel is the mysterious, ghostly title character, Beloved, a child-like young woman who appears to be the fleshly embodiment of Sethe's deceased daughter. The figure of Beloved becomes a rich symbol not only for Sethe's guilt but also for the wound that our slaveholding past has inflicted on the national psyche.

Source

Marks, Kathleen. Toni Morrison's Beloved and the Apotropaic Imagination. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002.
—Marshall Boswell

Bennett, Michael (1943–1987) playwright, director, dancer, choreographer, producer

Born Michael Bennett DiFiglia to a Catholic father and a Jewish mother, the creator of A Chorus Line (produced 1975) earned his first professional credit as a dancer in Jerome Robbins's 1964 adaptation of West Side Story. His first popular success as a choreographer came in 1968 with Promises, Promises, adapted from Billy Wilder's Academy Award-winning movie The Apartment (1960) and featuring a hit score by Burt Bacharach and Hal David. After working with Katharine Hepburn and Stephen Sondheim, Bennett wrote A Chorus Line, which won nine Tony Awards and the 1976 Pulitzer Prize for drama. His other big hit was a revival of Dreamgirls (produced 1981), a musical based on the career of a girl group strongly reminiscent of Diana Ross and the Supremes. Michael Bennett died in 1987 of complications resulting from AIDS.

Sources

Kelly, Kevin. One Singular Sensation: The Michael Bennett Story. New York: Doubleday, 1990.
Mandelbaum, Ken. A Chorus Line and the Musicals of Michael Bennett. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.
—Marshall Boswell

Berg, Elizabeth (1948– ) novelist

Elizabeth Berg's popular novels explore the tragicomic flux of middle-class life from a distinctly female perspective. Born in St. Paul, Minnesota, Berg attended the University of Minnesota for two years before dropping out. After several years working as a waitress and rock singer, she began working as a critical-care nurse in 1970, a job she quit in 1985. When she was diagnosed with a form of T-cell lymphoma, she began writing in earnest, first for magazines such as Parents and Redbook. Her first novel, Durable Goods (1993), tells the story of two sisters growing up on an army base in the 1960s. Her follow-up novel, Talk before Sleep (1994), draws upon her own experience as a cancer patient. Her other books include two sequels to Durable Goods, Joy School (1997) and True to Form (2002). She has written such best-selling accounts of middle-class life and parental anxiety as What We Keep (1998), Until the Real Thing Comes Along (1999), Never Change (2001), Say When (2003), and The Art of Mending (2004). Her 2006 novel, We Are All Welcome Here, was followed the next year by her Dream When You're Feeling Blue.

—Marshall Boswell

Berger, Thomas (1924– ) novelist

*The Human Beings believe that everything is alive: not only men and animals but also water and earth and stones and also the dead and things from them.
. . . But white men believe that everything is dead:
stones, earth, animals, and people, even their own people. And if, in spite of that, things persist in trying to live, white men will rub them out.*

—Little Big Man (1964)

Berger was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. He attended the University of Cincinnati, where he earned his B.A. in 1948. His novels focus on the dark comedy and absurdity of life. Little Big Man (1964), a satirical novel told by an adopted Cheyenne who survived Custer's Last Stand, remains Berger's best-known work. Crazy in Berlin (1958) began his Reinhart series, about an American GI who has picaresque adventures abroad and at home in the Midwest. The series continued with Reinhart in Love (1962) and Vital Parts (1970). Berger's other novels include Orrie's Story (1990), Meeting Evil (1992), Robert Crews (1994), and The Return of Little Big Man (1999). He is known for parodying literary genres, including the Western (Little Big Man), the true-crime documentary (Killing Time, 1967), Arthurian romance (Arthur Rex, 1978), the spy story (Nowhere, 1985), and the hard-boiled detective novel (Suspects, 1996). His Best Friends: A Novel (2003) was followed by the publication of Adventures of the Artificial Woman (2004), about a man who has the perfect mate fabricated by animatronics.

Sources

Landon, Brooks. Thomas Berger. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
Madden, David W., ed. Critical Essays on Thomas Berger. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.

Bernstein, Charles (1950– ) poet, critic

A prominent member of the L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E P=O=E=T=R=Y group, Charles Bernstein was born in New York City in 1950. He received his A.B. degree from Harvard University in 1972. After many years at the University of Buffalo he began teaching at the University of Pennsylvania. As part of his role in promoting the theoretical approaches of L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E P=O=E=T=R=Y, Bernstein edited the literary journal of the same name from 1978 to 1981. While there is no single definitional rubric for the movement, Bernstein and other writers affiliated with it emphasize the materiality of words while simultaneously denying the primacy of the poetic speaker. Influenced by Gertrude Stein, Louis Zukofsky, and Postmodern literary theory, the movement was important during the late 1970s and 1980s. Bernstein's collections include Parsing (1976), Poetic Justice (1979), and Girly Man (2006). He has also written several books on poetics, including My Way: Speeches and Poems (1999).

Sources

Michael Kelleher, "Charles Bernstein in the 20th Century, A Brief Revue of Poetic Values," Transcendental Friend, 11 (September 1999).
Reinfeld, Linda. Language Poetry: Writing as Rescue. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992.
—Tod Marshall

Berry, Wendell (1934– ) novelist, poet, essayist

From a family that has farmed for five generations in Henry County, Kentucky, and himself a farmer, Wendell Berry examines through this lens not only the subtleties of nature but also the political, philosophical, and technological aspects of rural and urban development. Berry attended the University of Kentucky at Lexington where he earned a B.A. in 1956 and an M.A. in 1957. After studying under Wallace Stegner at Stanford University and teaching briefly at New York University, Berry returned to the region that has colored his writing much in the way that the Deep South influenced the writing of William Faulkner to teach at the University of Kentucky. Berry has been particularly concerned with exploring environmental and ecological themes, and his work is characterized by detailed descriptions of the flora and fauna of rural life. His books include Remembering (1988), a novel; The Discovery of Kentucky (1991), a collection of poetry; and essay collections that include Standing on Earth (1991), Another Turn of the Crank (1995), and Citizenship Papers (2003).

Sources

Angyal, Andrew J. Wendell Berry. New York: Twayne, 1995.
Merchant, Paul, ed. Wendell Berry. Lewiston, Idaho: Confluence Press, 1991.

Berryman, John (1914–1972) poet

Henry is accused of being me and I am accused of being Henry and I deny it and nobody believes me.
—Interview (1968)

Born John Smith in Oklahoma, John Berryman took the name of his stepfather after his own father committed suicide. Berryman earned his A.B. at Columbia University in 1936, and his B.A. at Clare College in Cambridge, England, in 1938. A professor at the University of Minnesota, Berryman was part of a postwar generation of poets that included Robert LOWELL and Randall JARRELL. Berryman's early poetry is traditional, but like both Lowell and Jarrell he later moved toward a more informal, CONFESSIOAL style. Berryman used elements of African American speech patterns in his work. He also employed images that evoked intense feelings of doom.

Berryman's first important collection was Homage to Mistress Bradstreet (1959), poems addressed to Anne Bradstreet, the seventeenth-century Puritan poet. Berryman's later poetry centers on Henry, the poet's surrogate, and his "dream songs"; THE DREAM SONGS (1969) was originally published in two parts, the Pulitzer Prize-winning 77 Dream Songs (1964) and the National Book Award-winning His Toy, His Dream, His Rest (1968). His Collected Poems, 1937–1971 was published in 1989. He also wrote a well-received biography, Stephen Crane (1950), notable for his psychoanalytical probing of the writer's life and work. Berryman committed suicide January 7, 1972.

Sources

Berryman, John. Collected Poems, 1937–1971, edited by Charles Thornbury. New York: Farrar Straus & Giroux, 1989.
Bloom, Harold, ed. John Berryman. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.
Kelly, Richard J., and Alan K. Lathrop. Recovering Berryman: Essays on a Poet. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.
Mariani, Paul. Dreamsong: The Life of John Berryman. New York: Morrow, 1990.

Big Table (1959–1960) periodical

Big Table magazine was founded in 1959 by Paul Carroll, a patron of younger poets and of the avant-garde in general. The first issue consisted of the complete contents of a Winter 1959 issue of Chicago Review that had been suppressed due to charges of obscenity. That issue included early work by Jack KEROUAC, William S. BURROUGHS, and Gregory CORSO. Big Table lasted for only five issues before folding due to legal fees accrued while fighting charges of obscenity in U.S. Federal Court.

—Marshall Boswell

Bishop, Elizabeth (1911–1979) poet

Think of the long trip home.

Should we have stayed at home and thought of here?

—“Questions of Travel” (1965)

Born in Worcester, Massachusetts, Elizabeth Bishop lost her parents at an early age. Her father died shortly after her birth, and a few years later her mother was committed to a mental institution. Maternal aunts in Great Village, Nova Scotia, cared for Bishop in a setting that figures in her prose and poetry. At age seven she was brought back to Worcester to be cared for by paternal grandparents. She never saw her mother again. When Bishop was sixteen, she met the poet Marianne Moore, who became her mentor.

Bishop suffered from bronchitis and asthma in her youth. Having overcome these early illnesses, she traveled extensively after her graduation from Vassar College. She lived in Key West, Florida, on and off from 1939 to 1945. North and South (1946), her first published book of poetry, includes the poem “The Fish” (1940), which recounts her catching a large trout and her inner struggle to decide whether to release it. The poem demonstrates a precise use of descriptive language and a devotion to particulars that has been compared to Marianne Moore’s use of physical details to reveal emotion.

Bishop’s second collection, Poems: North and South—A Cold Spring (1955), won the Pulitzer Prize. The poet Robert LOWELL admired Bishop’s work and helped to advance her career; they maintained a lifelong friendship. In the early 1950s Bishop fell in love with Lota Soares, with whom the poet established a household in Brazil, where they lived for more than a decade, and where Bishop produced some of her finest poetry, including Questions of Travel (1965). After their relationship foundered and Soares committed suicide, Bishop returned for a while to Seattle until, with the help of Lowell, she settled in Massachusetts and took over Lowell’s teaching position at Harvard while he was on sabbatical. In 1970 Bishop won the National Book Award for her Complete Poems (1969). Another book of poems, Geography III, appeared in 1976 to critical acclaim. At the peak of her fame, Bishop died in 1979 of a cerebral aneurysm. Her Complete Poems 1927–1979 was published in 1983.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Elizabeth Bishop. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2002.

Miller, Brett C. Elizabeth Bishop: Life and the Memory of It. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993.

Stevenson, Anne. Five Looks at Elizabeth Bishop. London: Bellew, 1998.

Black Aesthetic

The term black aesthetic originated in the 1960s, during a time when African American literary and art critics called upon black artists to produce work that was reflective of the black experience. A forerunner of the black aesthetic movement, W. E. B. Du Bois explored the unique characteristics of African American culture, especially the development of the spiritual as a musical form, in his The Souls of Black Folk (1903). During the Harlem Renaissance, Claude McKay introduced a militant cry of resistance that became associated with the artist’s search for a revolutionary or protest art. In the poem “If We Must Die,” for example, McKay urges blacks threatened with annihilation to fight back. In the 1930s Richard Wright and other radical African American writers depicted the isolation of African Americans and advocated the revival of folk traditions and programs of international solidarity among African Americans. In the 1950s African American writers such as Lorraine HANSBERRY and Ralph ELLISON took a much more integrationist view of the African American experience. These writers reacted against the evils of segregation and hoped to bring African Americans into the mainstream of the arts in America. Radicals of the 1960s, in turn, rejected Ellison’s universalist bias, believing it had deprived African Americans of the unique features of their culture. Writers such as Amiri BARAKA advocated an aesthetic based on a militant sense of the uniqueness of the black experience and thus on the separateness of black literature. The aesthetic is expressed in John Henrik Clarke’s William Styron’s Nat Turner: Ten Black Writers Respond (1968) and in Addison Gayle Jr.’s The Black Aesthetic (1971).

Sources

Clarke, John Henrik. William Styron’s Nat Turner: Ten Black Writers Respond. Boston: Beacon, 1968.

Gayle, Addison, Jr. The Black Aesthetic. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Martin, Reginald. Ishmael Reed and the New Black Aesthetic Criticisms. Basingstoke, U.K.: Macmillan, 1988.

Black Arts Movement

This term is associated with the BLACK AESTHETIC. The poet and playwright Amiri BARAKA, poet and publisher Dudley Randall, and literary critic Addison Gayle, among others, argued for a view of African American art that was uncontaminated by white prejudices. To the proponents of the Black Arts Movement, art became an act of self-defense against an oppressive white establishment that used “universal” as a code word for white art.

By the 1970s writers such as Ishmael Reed attacked the Black Arts Movement as too restrictive but maintained a consciousness of the ways in which white culture tended to usurp African American cultural forms. Some African American writers, such as Toni MORRISON and Alice WALKER, have sought to create a balance between their desire to inspire the African American community and to write literature that speaks to people of all races.

Source

Jones, LeRoi, and Larry Neal, eds. Black Fire: An Anthology of Afro-American Writing. New York: Morrow, 1968.

Black Mountain Poets

This group of poets led by Charles OLSON at Black Mountain College in North Carolina propounded free-verse forms, what Olson called open or projective poetry. The poem, according to Olson, should be organized and live and breathe like a body. The poets that clustered around Olson and the college's journal, The Black Mountain Review—including Robert CREELEY, Robert DUNCAN, Denise LEVERTOV, Paul Blackburn, Larry Eigner, and Paul Carroll—began to receive significant attention in the 1960s. Later poets associated with the Black Mountain canon include Ed DORN, Joel Oppenheimer, John WIENERS, and Jonathan Williams, all of whom studied under Olson.

Although they took their inspiration from Olson, members of the Black Mountain Poets often disagreed with one another. They represented not so much a united movement in the arts as a collective dedicated to exploring various new forms of contemporary poetry. The Black Mountain Poets extended the works of predecessors such as William Carlos Williams who helped to make American poetry more visual, informal, and reflective of everyday American speech. Black Mountain College was hospitable to the many critics and cultural commentators who visited the college in an attempt to discern how Olson and others were creating their art.

Source

Foster, Edward Halsey. Understanding the Black Mountain Poets. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.

Blood Meridian by Cormac McCarthy (New York: Random House, 1985) novel

Blood Meridian, or The Evening Redness in the West is Cormac MCCARTHY's fifth novel. Ostensibly a Western, Blood Meridian invokes the stock conventions of that genre and revitalizes them via the book's ornate diction, its philosophical heft, and its exhaustive grounding in historical fact. The novel's hero is a fourteen-year-old boy whom the narrator refers to simply as “the kid.” The kid is taken in by a group of violent bounty hunters who have been contracted by a corrupt Mexican governor to collect Indian scalps. The unremitting violence in the book is framed by philosophical discussions between the kid and the Judge in an historically accurate portrait of a lawless, murder-strewn West.

Sources

Owens, Barclay. Cormac McCarthy's Western Novels. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 2000.

Sepich, John Emil. Notes on Blood Meridian. Louisville, Ky.: Bel-larmine College Press, 1993.

—Marshall Boswell

Bloom, Harold (1930– ) literary critic

To fall in love with great poetry when you are young is to be awakened to the self's potential.

—A Map of Misreading (1975)

One of the most prominent and controversial literary critics of the last thirty years, Harold Bloom is best known for his work The Anxiety of Influence (1973), in which he argues that literary greatness is a result of an ongoing Oedipal battle in which writers seek to overcome the influence and artistic debt owed to preceding writers. Bloom was born in the East Bronx in New York City to Orthodox Jewish Russian immigrants. His parents never learned to read English; in the home they spoke Yiddish, and Bloom first read in Yiddish and Hebrew.

Bloom received his B.A. degree in English at Cornell University in 1952 and spent a year at Cambridge University in England before earning his Ph.D. from Yale in 1955, where he has since remained. His first book, Shelley's Mythmaking, was published in 1959. Until 1974 Bloom taught in the Yale English department, where he was eventually made professor of English, but he broke with the department to become the DeVane Professor of Humanities.

Bloom has written thirty-five books of literary or religious theory and criticism, including Jesus and Yahweh: The Names Divine (2005). He has edited fifteen anthologies of poetry, including American Religious Poems (2006). Bloom has also edited and introduced more than five hundred collections of critical essays for the Chelsea House publishing company since 1985. His most important work, presented in The Anxiety of Influence and in A Map of Misreading (1975), centers on his theory that all poetry is a strong misreading and an agonistic, or competitive, response to previous poetry.

In works such as The Western Canon (1994), Shakespeare: The Invention of the Human (1998), Genius: A Mosaic of One Hundred Exemplary Creative Minds (2002), Hamlet:

Poem Unlimited (2003), and Where Shall Wisdom Be Found? (2004) Bloom develops his argument for literary canonicity based on aesthetic splendor, cognitive power, and wisdom. He singles out Shakespeare as the greatest writer of all and speaks against contemporary efforts at revising the canon for ideological reasons, believing that canonicity should be based strictly on aesthetic worthiness. Influenced by Gnosticism, Bloom has also written extensively on religious and theological matters, which he believes, as he writes in Kabbalah and Criticism (1975), are intimately connected with literature.

As a critic, Bloom considers himself a descendant of John Ruskin, Walter Pater, and Northrop Frye. Educated during the heyday of New Criticism, Bloom has nearly always taken aim at popular theoretical orthodoxy, all the while imposing an aesthetic orthodoxy of his own. This position has often placed him at odds with his literary colleagues, especially adherents of Feminism, Marxism, and other forms of cultural theory. Though he was briefly involved in the Deconstructionist movement (see DECONSTRUCTION), resulting in the 1979 book Deconstruction and Criticism with J. Hillis Miller, Paul de Man, and Jacques Derrida, Bloom's own theories of anxiety and aesthetics proved antithetical to Poststructuralist inquiry (see POSTSTRUCTURALISM). His insistence on aesthetics above all has made Bloom a pariah to some cultural theorists but garnered him popularity outside the academy.

Sources

Allen, Graham. Harold Bloom: Poetics of Conflict. New York: Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1994.

Fite, David. Harold Bloom: The Rhetoric of Romantic Vision. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

—Anna Teekell

Blue Highways by William Least Heat-Moon (New York: Little, Brown, 1982) travel memoir

The title of William Least HEAT-MOON's memoir refers to the two-lane byways that are usually colored blue on United States road maps. As such, Blue Highways chronicles Heat-Moon's 1978 journey along these roads. Beginning in Columbia, Missouri, he drove to the east coast, and from there, followed blue highways clockwise along the perimeter of the country. The book combines accounts of people he encounters, many of them eccentric, with a personal account of his own self-discovery. The book also features Heat-Moon's photographs from his journey.

Source

Levin, Jonathan. "Coordinates and Connections: Self, Language, and World in Edward Abbey and William Least Heat-Moon," Contemporary Literature, 41 (Summer 2000): 214–251.

—Marshall Boswell

The Bluest Eye by Toni Morrison (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1970) novel

The 1993 Nobel Prize winner's first novel is a portrait of an impoverished African American family in 1940s Ohio. It is also a complex meditation on black self-hatred amid a culture devoted to white standards of physical beauty.

The novel's main character is eleven-year-old Pecola Breedlove, a timid young African American girl trapped in a disintegrating and poverty-stricken family. Her father, Cholly, is an angry drinker who never knew his mother and whose father did not recognize him when during his adolescence Cholly tracked him down. Her mother, Pauline, works as a domestic servant for an affluent white family, lavishing all of her attention and love on the family's white daughter while ignoring her own daughter. To cope with her plight, Pecola prays for blue eyes in the hope that she can become as beautiful and cherished as the blonde white girls she encounters in motion pictures and in magazines.

Published in 1970 while MORRISON was working as an editor at Random House, the novel reflects the influence of the "Black is Beautiful" movement of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

—Marshall Boswell

Bly, Robert (1926– ) poet

Robert Bly grew up on a farm near Madison, Minnesota. After serving in WORLD WAR II and studying literature at St. Olaf College in Northfield, Minnesota, he went to Harvard, where he met fellow writers John ASHBERRY and John HAWKES. Bly won the National Book Award for The Light Around the Body (1967). By the time his Selected Poems appeared in 1986, he had published more than twenty books of verse. His poetry, marked by stark imagery, has explored political issues, especially a fierce opposition to war. He achieved popular success with Iron John: A Book about Men (1990), which examines the myths of masculinity. In The Sibling Society (1997), Bly criticizes contemporary American adults for behaving like spoiled petulant adolescents. Bly has continued to translate poems and edit the work of others, while producing original poetry geared toward recovering the power of myth and folklore. In his 2001 poetry collection, The Night Abraham Called to the Stars, Bly uses a Middle Eastern lyric form known as the ghazal to reflect on myth, politics, and contemporary culture.

Sources

Davis, William V., ed. Critical Essays on Robert Bly. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Davis, ed. Understanding Robert Bly. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Bohjalian, Chris (1960– ) novelist

Acclaimed for his fifth novel, Midwives (1997), Chris Bohjalian specializes in tales of contemporary domestic tragedy that often incorporate detailed explorations of various alternative medical practices. He was born in White Plains, New York, and studied at Amherst College, from which he graduated in 1982. He moved to Vermont in 1984 and, after several years working as a columnist and advertising executive, began writing at night. He published his first novel, A Killing in the Real World, in 1988. His third novel, Past the Bleachers (1992), tells the story of a young married couple dealing with the death of their son from leukemia. Water Witches (1995) takes place in a drought-ridden ski community saved by a group of “dowsers,” or water witches, while Midwives details a tragic mystery story within the world of home birthing. His other novels of small-town suspicion and alternative medical procedures include The Law of Similars (1999) and Trans-Sister Radio (2000). The Buffalo Soldier (2002) addresses racial themes within the familiar backdrop of a tightly knit but homogeneous New England community. Bohjalian’s later publications include Before You Know Kindness (2004) and The Double Bind (2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Bollingen Prize in Poetry

The Bollingen Prize is awarded biannually for the best book of new verse published within the preceding two years. The award carries a cash prize.

Paul and Mary Conover Mellon established the Bollingen Foundation, which they named in honor of Carl Jung after the town of Bollingen, Switzerland, where he spent part of every year working. The original intent of the foundation was to publish Jung’s work. In 1948 the directors created the Bollingen Prize in Poetry. The first jury, which consisted of fellows from the American Letters of the Library of Congress, awarded the prize to Ezra Pound for his Pisan Cantos (1948). When an outcry ensued over Pound’s pronounced fascist sympathies, the Bollingen Foundation dropped its partnership with the Library of Congress and turned to the Yale University Library for institutional support. The prize was awarded annually until 1963, when it became a biannual award. Winners of the Bollingen Prize include John BERRYMAN, Richard WILBUR, John ASHBURY, Fred CHAPPELL, and Adrienne RICH. In 1961 the Bollingen Foundation established a companion prize for the best work of translation.

In 2007 the cash prize was $100,000.

Source

The Bollingen Prize for Poetry: <<http://beineke.yale.library.edu/bollingen/winner.html>> (viewed May 22, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Booth, Wayne (1921–2005) critic

The author of The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961), Wayne Booth was born in Utah and educated at Brigham Young University and at the University of Chicago. While at Chicago, Booth came under the influence of R. S. Crane and Elder Olson, leading figures of the so-called Chicago School of critics, who rejected the narrow focus of the New Critics in favor of a more holistic approach to reading grounded in Aristotle’s Poetics (see CHICAGO CRITICS).

Booth’s Rhetoric of Fiction is a classic work of the Chicago school. In opposition to the New Critics, who argued that critics should look only at the work itself, Booth demonstrates how all the formal conventions of literary fiction, including point of view and tone, have a direct rhetorical function that goes back to the author or, at the very least, to an implied author. A follow-up work, The Rhetoric of Irony (1974), provides a similarly elegant and lucid analysis of the various ways irony informs the literary novel. Booth’s later work concentrated on ethics and reading.

Source

Antczak, Frederick J. Rhetoric and Pluralism: Legacies of Wayne Booth. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1995.

—Marshall Boswell

Boswell, Robert (1953– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

To attempt to fully name one’s desires is, I think, one of the primary reasons that people write stories. . . .

—Introduction as guest editor of Ploughshares (Winter 1996–1997)

In Robert Boswell’s novels and stories, the unruliness of contemporary family life is further ruffled by the recalcitrance of desire. The second of four children, Boswell was born in Sikeston, Missouri. He graduated with a degree in English and psychology from the University of Arizona, and then he spent several years as a counselor to the mentally and physically disabled in San Diego. In 1981 he returned to the University of Arizona to pursue an M.F.A., which he completed in 1984. In 1985 his thesis, which had become the short-story collection Dancing in the Movies, won the Iowa School of Letters Award; published in 1986, this book established his career.

He quickly followed that book with a semi-autobiographical novel about family life, adultery, and death titled Crooked Hearts (1987). In his second novel, The Geography of Desire (1989), Boswell attempted to write in a magic-realist mode resonant with the work of such Latin American novelists as Carlos Fuentes and Gabriel García Márquez. Boswell returned to more-familiar territory with his best-seller, Mystery Ride (1993), another complex family drama about a troubled teen and her struggling parents that further demonstrated Boswell’s gift for three-dimensional characters. His later novels include American Owned Love (1997) and Century’s Son (2002). The latter is a richly orchestrated novel about a married couple dealing with the suicide of their son. He has also published a second collection of short stories, Living to Be a Hundred (1994), as well as a science-fiction novel published under the pseudonym Shale Aaron, Virtual Death (1995).

Source

Lee, Don. "About Robert Boswell," Ploughshares, 4 (Winter 1996–1997): 216–221.

—Marshall Boswell

Bourjaily, Vance Nye (1922– ) novelist

The Ohio-born Vance Nye Bourjaily was one of a generation of novelists to come of age during WORLD WAR II. He attended Bowdoin College but left school to serve in the war. His first novel, The End of My Life (1947), is an account of a young man's attempt through cynicism to reconcile the realities of war, and his ultimate breakdown. Bourjaily has dedicated more than forty years to teaching creative writing and is a professor in the Louisiana State University M.F.A. program, which he directed for seven years. His Confessions of a Spent Youth (1960) focuses on the romantic adventures of a young man during and after the war. Brill Among the Ruins (1970) is a novel about the turmoil of the 1960s and its impact on a middle-aged man. Bourjaily has also published two nonfiction books about life in the country: The Unnatural Enemy (1963) and Country Matters (1973). His shortest novel, Old Soldier (1990), tells the story of two brothers, one of whom is infected with AIDS.

Source

Aldridge, John W. The Devil in the Fire: Retrospective Essays on American Literature and Culture, 1951–1971. New York: Harper's Magazine Press, 1972.

Boyle, T. Coraghessan (1948– ) novelist, short-story writer

There were a hundred and seven of them, of all ages, shapes, and sizes, from twenty-five- and thirty-year-olds in dresses that looked like they were made of Saran Wrap to a couple of big-beamed older types in pantsuits who could have been somebody's mother—and I mean somebody grown, with a goatee beard and a job at McDonald's.

—"Termination Dust" (2001)

Born Thomas John Boyle (when he was seventeen he took on a new middle name from his mother's side of the family), T. Coraghessan Boyle grew up in Peekskill, New York, the son of Irish immigrant parents. He did not consider literature seriously until he was out of his teens, when he read Thomas PYNCHON and John BARTH. After graduating from SUNY Potsdam in 1968, he taught high-school English until 1972, when he was accepted into the Iowa WRITERS' WORKSHOP, where he studied with Vance BOURJAILY and John IRVING. Boyle earned a Ph.D. there in 1977, with a collection of stories as his dissertation. Those stories were revised and published in 1979 as Descent of Man, which won the St. Lawrence Award for Short Fiction. Since his first collection, he has published several novels—Water Music (1982), Building Prospects (1984), World's End (1988), winner of the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD, East Is East (1990), The Road to Wellville (1993), The Tortilla Curtain (1995), Riven Rock (1998), A Friend of the Earth (2000), Drop City (2003), The Inner Circle (2004), and Talk, Talk (2006). He has also published several short-fiction collections—Greasy Lake and Other Stories (1985), If the River Was Whiskey (1989), Without a Hero (1994), After the Plague (2003), and Tooth and Claw (2005). His stories have been frequently honored.

A careful stylist, Boyle often employs black humor (see HUMOR) and social satire. His work has been called flashy; some critics have described his technique as "pyrotechnical." He is Distinguished Professor of English at the University of Southern California

Source

Utley, Sandye. "All About T. Coraghessan Boyle Resource Center": <<http://www.tcboyle.net/criticism.html>> (viewed May 16, 2007).

Bradbury, Ray (1920– ) novelist, short-story writer

If an idea isn't exciting you shouldn't do it. . . . And if it isn't done quickly you're going to begin to lie. So as quickly as you can, you emotionally react to an idea. That's how I write short stories.

—Interview (2001)

Perhaps America's best-known science-fiction writer, Ray Bradbury grew up in Waukegan, Illinois, a region that remains a defining place in his work, even in stories and novels that seem far removed from the Midwest. Bradbury began his career by publishing in the pulps. His breakthrough came when he urged Christopher ISHERWOOD to read The Martian Chronicles (1950); no devotee of science fiction, Isherwood nevertheless found the book so compelling that he reviewed it and helped spark interest in Bradbury's work. Isherwood showed an early appreciation for what has remained Bradbury's signature style: favoring expressive themes of alienation over the fascination with machinery and inventions that often mark science fiction.

Bradbury's work focuses on an extraordinary range of intellectual, social, and cultural issues. Combining science fiction with social criticism, Bradbury exhibits a skeptical attitude toward technocratic societies and employs a romantic conception of the human imagination. His style is often praised for its lyricism and poetic quality. Like Modernist writers, his theme is often the alienation of the individual from his or her community, family, or society. Because of his Midwest settings, he has also been called a regionalist writer. Several of Bradbury's works have been made into television series or motion pictures, perhaps the most notable movie adaptation being Fahrenheit 451 (1953), which was directed by François Truffaut in 1966.

Although securely established as a novelist—his well-known early novels include Dandelion Wine (1957) and Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962)—Bradbury has published more than twenty-five collections of short stories, including The Cat's Pajamas (2004). Bradbury has also written plays; poetry; and essays, such as his Zen and the Art of Writing and The Joy of Writing: Two Essays (1973) and Bradbury Speaks: Too Soon from the Cave, Too Far from the Stars (2005).

Sources

Reid, Robin Anne. Ray Bradbury: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

Weller, Sam. The Bradbury Chronicles: The Life of Ray Bradbury. New York: Morrow, 2005.

Brautigan, Richard (1935–1984) novelist, short-story writer, poet

All of us have a place in history. Mine is clouds.

—Brautigan

Best known as the author of the 1960s hippie cult classic Trout Fishing in America (1967), Richard Brautigan was born in Tacoma, Washington, in a small, dilapidated shack. In 1955, following his arrest for throwing a rock through the window of a police station, he spent time in a mental hospital in Oregon. He moved to San Francisco in 1958, where he handed out photocopies of his poems on the street and quickly established himself as a leading figure of the San Francisco counterculture. Over the next two decades Brautigan published more than twenty books, writing parodies of the Romance, Western, and mystery genres. After a period of isolation and heavy drinking, Brautigan apparently committed suicide in 1984. His zany, imaginative corpus included stories, poems, and novels such as A Confederate General from Big Sur (1965) and In Watermelon Sugar (1967). His work, which Guy Davenport called reminiscent “of a kind of Thoreau who cannot keep a straight face,” has influenced later writers, including Tom Robbins.

Sources

“Brautigan Bibliography and Archive”: <<http://www.brautigan.net/biography.html>> (viewed January 11, 2007).

Chenetier, Marc. Richard Brautigan. London: Methuen, 1983.

—Marshall Boswell

Broadside Press (1963– ) publishing house

Founded in 1963 by the poet Dudley Randall, this small press was instrumental in disseminating the early work of many distinguished African American writers, including Gwendolyn Brooks, Nikki GIOVANNI, and Sterling Brown. In Detroit, Randall began publishing his own poetry on single sheets of paper called broadsides. Between 1965 and 1977, Broadside published nearly sixty books of poetry, the most concerted effort during that time to sustain the life of poetry, especially among the African American literary community. Unlike larger publishers, Broadside's sole mission was to keep poets in print and to encourage young poets to publish. In 1985 new owners took over Broadside and established it as a non-profit press.

Brodkey, Harold (1930–1996) novelist, short-story writer

Born Aaron Roy Weintraub in Alton, Illinois, Harold Brodkey was adopted by his father's second cousin and renamed. Brodkey's mother died when he was two, and his father became withdrawn and mute. Harold often wrote about this childhood trauma. In 1953 Brodkey moved from Illinois to New York to become a writer. He married, divorced, and then remarried novelist Ellen Schwamm. His short stories began appearing in THE NEW YORKER and were collected in First Love and Other Sorrows (1957). Brodkey published no more books of fiction for nearly thirty years, but built up a mystique about a long-awaited novel in progress. When his novel The Runaway Soul (1991) was published, it was met with mixed reviews, and critics suggested that Brodkey had not fulfilled his promise. Before Brodkey died of AIDS, he wrote a memoir of his illness, This Wild Darkness: The Story of My Death (1996).

Source

Elgrably, Jordan. “Breaking the Language Barrier: A Conversation with Harold Brodkey,” Blue Penny Quarterly (Summer 1996): <<http://ebbs.english.vt.edu/olp/bpq/8/feature/brodkey.html>> (viewed January 12, 2007).

Brown, Claude (1937–2002) autobiographer

Author of the renowned Manchild in the Promised Land (1965), Brown turned the story of his early life into a book, vividly describing his early years in Harlem and the trouble his parents, who were migrants from South Carolina, had adjusting to city ways. Brown became part of a street gang and at age eleven was sent to a reformatory, the Wiltwyck School for Delinquent Boys. As he explains in his autobiography, this institution instilled in him a sense of morality and discipline, although it would be many years before he could bring himself to live by these principles. Brown's autobiography was published the year he graduated from Howard University, and he was favorably compared to James BALDWIN, Ralph ELLISON, and Richard Wright. Brown's work exhibited realism and a gift for the comic. His second book, The Children of Ham (1976), details the plight of blacks in urban settings.

Brown, Larry (1951–2004) novelist, short-story writer, memoirist

Larry Brown's fiction and essays emerge directly from his native Mississippi Delta. He was born in Oxford, Mississippi, to a struggling sharecropper who had been wounded in the Battle of the Bulge. Brown joined the merchant marines in 1970 and, upon his discharge, took a job as a fireman in Oxford. His first novel, Dirty Work (1989), chronicles the struggle of two psychologically damaged VIETNAM WAR veterans. The book received enthusiastic reviews, which helped turn his second novel, Joe (1991), into a minor best-seller. The title character is a poor, violence-prone Southern white man whom Brown informs with a curious but indelible dignity. His three other novels are Father and Son (1996), Fay (2000), and The Rabbit Factory (2003). His popular short-story collections include Facing the Music (1988) and Big Bad Love (1990). He published two works of autobiography, A Late Start (1989) and On Fire (1993).

Sources

Ketchin, Susan. "Larry Brown, Proceeding out of Calamity," in The Christ-Haunted Landscape: Faith and Doubt in Southern Fiction. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.

Watson, Jay, ed. Conversations with Larry Brown. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2007.

—Marshall Boswell

Brown, Rita Mae (1944– ) poet, novelist

Rita Mae Brown grew up in York, Pennsylvania, and in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Her family was poor, and she was encouraged to write from an early age. Educated at the University of Florida, she moved to New York City in 1964, attended New York University, and became involved in the theater, civil rights activism, FEMINISM, and gay and lesbian liberation movements. Brown's first book, The Hand That Cradles the Rock (1971), was a collection of poetry. Her first novel, the autobiographical Rubyfruit Jungle (1973), tells with considerable energy and wit the story of a lesbian's coming-of-age. Brown's work is illustrative of a new generation of writers not bound by the taboos that writers of earlier times, such as Amy Lowell, had to observe when talking about the sex lives of women.

Brown's third novel and second critically acclaimed book, Six of One, appeared in 1978. She has written poetry, screenplays and television scripts, and whimsical mysteries, such as Wish You Were Here (1990) and Sour Puss (2006)—two of the books in a series "cowritten" by her pet cat. Brown is also the author of Starting from Scratch: A Different Kind of Writer's Manual (1988), in which she discusses her views on language, plot construction, dialogue, and the economics of surviving as a writer.

Source

Ward, Carol Marie. Rita Mae Brown. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Buechner, Frederick (1926– ) novelist, poet, memoirist

Frederick Buechner was the oldest of two children. His father committed suicide when Frederick was ten. He graduated from Lawrenceville School in 1943 and went on to attend Princeton University, winning the prestigious Glascock Prize for poetry during his senior year. After the publication of his first novel, A Long Day's Dying (1950), Buechner moved to New York to be a full-time writer. In the late 1950s he began attending Union Theological Seminary. After graduating as an ordained Presbyterian minister, he served as school chaplain at Philips Exeter Academy, where he taught John Irving, who acknowledged Buechner's influence on his writing. Buechner's novels and memoirs following his divinity training comically explore modern existence from an optimistic theological perspective. His most popular works include four novels featuring the evangelical con man, Leo Bebb, collected in 1979 as The Book of Bebb, and Godric (1980), a Pulitzer Prize-nominated fictionalization of the life of medieval Catholic saint Godric of Finchale. Buechner has also written numerous memoirs as well as popular theological studies.

—Marshall Boswell

Bukowski, Charles (1920–1994) poet, novelist

Born in Andernach, Germany, where his father had met and married a German woman, Charles Bukowski moved with his family to Los Angeles in 1922. Bukowski wrote about his traumatic childhood (he was often beaten by his father) in his poems and in an autobiographical novel, Ham on Rye (1982).

In and out of college in the 1940s and leading a life that included heavy drinking in bars, Bukowski also began writing stories. By the 1960s he had established himself as a poet with works such as Flower, Fist and Bestial Wail (1960), Long Shot Poems for Broke Players (1962), and Cold Dogs in the Courtyard (1965). As his titles suggest, his writing is earthy, pungent, and verging on the pornographic, while at the same time revealing considerable humor. Bukowski is just as well known for his fiction, especially for Confessions of a Man Insane Enough to Live with Beasts (1965), which introduced his alter ego, Henry Chinaski, who also appears in the novels Post Office (1971) and Factotum (1975). Bukowski wrote the screenplay for the movie Barfly in 1987. His work and life reflected an outspoken, ornery, and raunchy sensibility that mixed provocatively with his vigorous, eloquent style.

Sources

Cherkovski, Neeli. Hank: The Life of Charles Bukowski. New York: Random House, 1991.

Miles, Barry. Charles Bukowski. London: Virgin, 2005.

Bullins, Ed (1935– ) playwright

Ed Bullins achieved his greatest renown during the 1960s and 1970s as one of the principal playwrights of the BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT. His work is rooted in his early experiences in North Philadelphia, where he experienced street life and gang violence. Bullins dropped out of high school and at one point almost lost his life in a stabbing incident. He decided to leave home and enlisted in the navy. Years later he moved to the West Coast, where he took classes at Los Angeles City College and began to write in 1961. Although he sympathized with revolutionary groups such as the Black Panthers, Bullins was devoted to playwriting as an art. He projected a cycle of twenty plays about African American life, beginning with In the Wine Time (produced 1968) and including The Duplex (produced 1970), The Fabulous Miss Marie (produced 1971), and Home Boy (produced 1976). The Taking of Miss Janie (produced 1975) was one of his most sensitive plays about interracial relationships.

Bullins's early influences include Amiri BARAKA, Eugene O'Neill, and Chester HIMES. Bullins is the author of more than fifty plays. His "A Teacup Full of Roses," written in 1985, and Dr. Geechee and the Blood Junkies: A Modern Hoodoo Horror Yarn (produced 1985), attack the drug culture. Salaam, Huey Newton, Salaam (produced 1991) explores the life of the famous Black Panther leader. Bullins earned his M.F.A. from San Francisco State University in 1994.

Source

Hay, Samuel A. Ed Bullins: A Literary Biography. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1997.

Burroughs, William S. (1914–1997) novelist

William S. Burroughs was born February 15, 1914, and grew up in a socially prominent family in St. Louis, Missouri. He was educated at Harvard and then served in the army during WORLD WAR II until he was released on psychiatric grounds. Burroughs had trouble holding a job, and was a drug addict from 1944 to 1957. His first book, Junkie: Confessions of an Underground Drug Addict (1953), had an enormous impact on BEAT writers such as Jack KEROUAC and Allen GINSBERG. Burroughs was unapologetic about his drug use and presented a view of the addict's life without sentimentality or moralization. His novel Naked Lunch, published in Paris in 1959 (as The Naked Lunch), made him both celebrated and a cult figure. The novel was banned in the United States until 1962, and writers such as Norman MAILER went to court to defend Burroughs's surrealistic book as literature. What impressed Mailer and others was Burroughs's gift for language, which was both hallucinatory and captivating. Burroughs continued in the same style with The Soft Machine (1961), The Ticket that Exploded (1962), Nova Express (1964), Wild Boys: A Book of the Dead (1971), Port of Saints (1973), and Exterminator! (1974). After living in Paris and Tangier for many years, Burroughs returned to the United States, living in New York, California, and finally in Kansas, where he died. His books after 1974 were less avant-garde, although still surrealistic. In Cities of the Red Night (1981), The Place of Dead Roads (1984), and The Western Lands (1987) he explored telepathy, cosmic struggle, time and space travel, and ancient Egypt. Burroughs also wrote screenplays, including The Last Words of Dutch Schultz (1970) and Blade Runner (1979).

Sources

Caveny, Graham. Gentleman Junkie: The Life and Legacy of William S. Burroughs. Boston: Little, Brown, 1998.

Murphy, Timothy S. Wising Up the Marks: The Amodern William Burroughs. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Skerl, Jennie. William S. Burroughs. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Busch, Frederick (1941–2006) novelist

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Frederick Busch received a degree from Columbia University in 1967. His theory of fiction is expressed in his critical study John Hawkes (1973), in which Busch favors innovative, experimental prose. Busch's novels concern familial and parental relationships in Manual Labor (1974), Domestic Particulars (1976), Take This Man (1984), and Long Way from Home (1993). His nonfiction includes A Dangerous Profession: A Book about the Writing Life (2000). Busch died of a heart attack in a New York City hospital on February 23, 2006.

Butler, Octavia (1947–2006) novelist

Octavia Butler was born in Pasadena, California, and educated in Los Angeles. She is one of the few African American women to write science fiction. Her protagonists are often African American women, and her subjects include space travel, telepathy, aliens mating with survivors of a nuclear holocaust on earth, and other inquiries into human identity and the survival of the species. Her novels include Patternmaster (1976), Mind of My Mind (1977), Survivor (1978), Wild Seed (1978), Kindred (1979), Dawn (1987), Adulthood Rites (1988), Imago (1989), and a novel set in California in 2024, Parable of the Sower (1993). Goodchild, and Other Stories appeared in 1995 and another novel, Parable of the Talents, in 1998. Her last published work was Fledgling (2005).

Sources

Barr, Marleen S., ed. Suzy McKee Charnas / Marleen S. Barr. Octavia E. Butler / Ruth Salvaggio. Joan D. Vinge / Richard Law. Mercer Island, Wash.: Starmont House, 1986.

Spaulding, A. Timothy. Re-forming the Past. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2005.

Butler, Robert Olen (1945– ) novelist, short-story writer

My husband . . . is a very fine businessman . . . just as he was when he was in Vietnam. . . . In Vietnam he made much money in the export of duck feathers. This is what inspired my costume on "Let's Make a Deal."
—“The American Couple” (1992)

Robert Olen Butler was born in Granite City, Illinois. He majored in drama at Northwestern University, graduating in 1967, and he earned an M.F.A. in playwriting from the University of Iowa in 1969. In 1971 he enlisted in the army and was taught Vietnamese so that he could serve as a language expert. He remained in Vietnam until 1975 and then returned to the United States, working as an editor in New York, where he began writing novels, which examine the American reaction to the Vietnamese and the response of the Vietnamese to Americans. Distinguished by their sense of authenticity and Butler's meticulous attention to the details of the physical, social, and political environment, these early novels include The Alleys of Eden (1981), Sun Dogs (1982), and On Distant Ground (1985)—loosely considered a Vietnam trilogy. Butler's Pulitzer Prize-winning short-story collection A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain (1992) demonstrated his continuing interest in Vietnamese lifestyles and on aspects of assimilation into American culture.

Butler's early novels were written on his train commutes to work. After the success of On Distant Ground, Butler left his publishing job to teach creative writing at McNeese State University in Louisiana. From his fifth novel, Wabash (1987), which focuses on the Great Depression, to his later publications—including Tabloid Dreams: Stories (1996), Mr. Spaceman (2000), Fair Warning (2002), Had a Good Time (2004), and Severance (2006)—Butler has proved the truth of his remark that to call him a “Vietnam writer” would be as inaccurate as “saying Monet was a lily-pad painter.”

Butler moved to Florida State University in 2000, where he was made the Frances Eppes Professor, holding the Michael Shaara Chair in Creative Writing.

Sources

Nagel, James. “Vietnam Redux: Robert Olen Butler's A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain,” in his The Contemporary American Short-Story Cycle. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001, pp. 223–245.

Orlofsky, Michael. “Historiografiction: The Fictionalization of History in the Short Story,” in The Postmodern Short Story: Forms and Issues, edited by Farhat Iftekharrudin. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003, pp. 47–64.

By Love Possessed by James Gould Cozzens (1957)
novel

James Gould Cozzens's twelfth novel utilizes the elements that defined his best work: the condensed time frame amplified by flashbacks, the integrated structure, the examination of social structure, the main character whose behavior is shaped by his profession.

The protagonist of the novel, Arthur Winner Jr., and every other important character in the novel is motivated by some form of love or passion that overrules the force of reason in their conduct. Winner discovers that Noah Tuttle, the senior partner of his law firm, has misappropriated a large sum of money to save the investors in a failed street railway company. Winner's first reaction is despair; he intends to inform the authorities and thereby ruin Tuttle as well as himself. He is dissuaded by his other partner, Julius Penrose, a tough-minded misanthrope who scorns sentimental behavior; he convinces Winner that some truths should be concealed, by indicating that he has known about Winner's affair with his wife.

By Love Possessed was welcomed with strong praise and large sales; Cozzens's literary stature was elevated. In the counter-reaction that followed he was attacked as reactionary, sexist, biased, and snobbish; his formal sentence structure and challenging vocabulary were ridiculed. James Gould Cozzens's fit readers accord this novel a high place in American literature.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Cabeza de Vaca, Alvar Nuñez (1490?–1557?)
explorer, chronicler

Thus the number went on diminishing. The living dried the flesh of those who died.

—Chapter XXVII: *Relation of Alvar Nuñez
Cabeza de Vaca* (circa 1542)

Of noble descent, explorer Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca was born in Jerez de la Frontera in Andalusia, Spain around 1490 to Francisco de Vera, a legislator, and Teresa Cabeza de Vaca. Drawing from his military service, Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca was second in command on the Pánfilo de Narváez expedition to settle and colonize “La Florida.” The Narváez expedition set sail from Spain in 1527, with five ships and a crew of 600 men, and landed successfully on the east coast of Florida. In November 1528, 242 of the men set off for the Gulf Coast (present day Texas) for further exploration. The journey, however, was cut short by a shipwreck. The ill-equipped, starving men who survived journeyed 1,500 miles across North America, from the central gulf coast to the Pacific. Many died, and others were taken as captives by Native Americans; Cabeza de Vaca and three other men were held captive for six years (in addition to their two years of wandering). Despite these trials, Cabeza de Vaca managed to survive by serving the Natives as a skillful trader of medicinal native plants and herbal cures. In the fall of 1534 Cabeza de Vaca and the others managed to escape and continued toward the coast, a 1,300-mile journey to their final destination of Mexico City. They arrived in July 1536.

In Cabeza de Vaca’s narrative of these events, Relation of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca (circa 1542), he recounts the shipwreck, starvation, captivity, and reunion in terms of a spiritual conversion. Unlike other EXPLORATION NARRATIVES that presume superiority over the native peoples, Cabeza de Vaca’s narrative reveals an acceptance of Native Americans and their culture. His story provides an account of his spiritual realization of God’s providence and records his sincere intent to acculturate and fit into another world. The final episodes before his reunion with the Anglo-Europeans reveal a contrast between “good” and “bad” Christians, so that Cabeza de Vaca’s narrative serves as a cautionary tale in addition to serving as a detailed account of the New World.

Although he had survived a six-year captivity and received initial acceptance upon returning to Spain, Cabeza de Vaca’s further attempts at exploration were problematic. He was passed over for a Florida expedition that Hernando de Soto received instead. Around 1540, when the king sent him to South America as the newly appointed Governor of the La Plata regions, he met with resistance from authorities who apparently disagreed with Cabeza de Vaca’s management style and treatment of the native peoples. In 1543 he was imprisoned, forced to give up his governorship, and sent back to Spain. For the next eight years Cabeza de Vaca was again held in captivity. The details of his last years are unknown, but most records indicate that he moved to Seville after being pardoned in 1552, where he was a merchant and a judge until he died around 1557.

Work

Cabeza de Vaca, Alvar Nuñez. Relation of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, 1871; New 8 1/2 X 11 York: T. W. Field, 1966.

Source

Kreiger, Alex D. We Came Naked and Barefoot: The Journey of Cabeza de Vaca across North America, edited by Margery H. Krieger. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2002.

Calef, Robert (1648–1719) social critic

Robert Calef was born in England in 1648 and came to Massachusetts around 1688. He secured his place in American literature as a critic of the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS with More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700). A merchant, or perhaps a weaver, Calef nevertheless publicly criticized the colony's clergy for its role in the notorious trials of 1692. In particular, he denounced Cotton MATHER for his insistence that demonic possessions could be documented and that they constituted a genuine threat to a Christian community.

Mather's defense of the Salem judges first appeared in THE WONDERS OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD (1692), in which he supported the decision of the judges to admit "spectral evidence" (testimony regarding actions and behavior by the accused that were invisible to all but the alleged victims) at the trials. After the trials, Mather became involved in the cases of two "possessed" women and recorded his efforts to exorcise both Sarah Good and Margaret Rule. His accounts of these exorcisms remained unpublished, but Calef, who twice visited Rule while she was undergoing treatment, somehow gained access to the Rule manuscript. He wrote and circulated his own version of the event, accusing both Mather and his father, Increase MATHER, of pressuring the victim and influencing her report of her symptoms. Furthermore, Calef accused Cotton Mather of engaging in overt sexual behavior such as rubbing Rule's stomach and breasts in order to ease her distress. Enraged, Mather denounced Calef from his pulpit and began a lawsuit against him.

The two men began an extended, and heated, debate through letters. Calef used this correspondence as the basis for his More Wonders of the Invisible World, a collection of accounts, letters, and documents that he completed in 1697. The book is divided into five parts. Part 1 consists of Mather's previously unpublished account of the treatment of Rule, "Another Brand Pluckt out of the Burning, or, More Wonders of the Invisible World." Part 2 offers Calef's own account of the Rule incident and an exchange of letters with Mather and with other correspondents concerning the case. Part 3 includes documents focused on the role of the Reverend Samuel Parish of Salem in the witch trials. Part 4 is made up of letters between Calef and an unknown correspondent. Part 5 provides Calef's account of the Salem trials, using documents that dramatize the suffering of wrongly accused colonists. How Calef acquired many of the documents he used is uncertain, although they may have been provided by enemies of the Mather faction. He does not appear to have falsified any of these documents, but his allegations of sexual misconduct against Mather are unsubstantiated.

Calef had no success finding a local publisher for the volume, since he was an obscure layman, and the Mathers were a powerful clerical family in New England. At last, in 1700, a London printer accepted More Wonders. The response in Massachusetts to Calef's book was dramatic: Increase Mather, then president of HARVARD COLLEGE, ordered a copy of More Wonders to be burned in Harvard Yard. Cotton Mather's congregation rallied around their minister, publishing their own defense of his actions. The damage to Cotton Mather's reputation, however, had been done.

Calef's challenge to the Mathers appears to have been motivated by genuine theological disagreement. Like the Mathers, Calef believed in the existence of witches, but unlike them, he did not believe the Bible had provided clear guidelines for the detection of those who practiced the black arts. Trials such as the ones in Salem, Calef insisted, produced a "deluge of Blood" rather than a protection against Satan. Further, Calef rejected Cotton Mather's estimation of witches' powers and, by extension, Satan's powers, in human society, as it diminished God's powers on earth. Thus, Calef argued, an overconfidence in the ability to detect witches and an overestimation of their powers were equally dangerous to a Christian community.

Calef died in Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1719. His own reputation was apparently undamaged by the long public battle with the Mathers, as he seems to have held several town offices over the course of his residence in the colony.

Work

Calef, Robert. More Wonders of the Invisible World; or, The Wonders of the Invisible World, Display'd in Five Parts . . . ; to Which Is Added, a Postscript Relating to a Book Intituled, The Life of Sir William Phips. London: Printed for N. Hillar & J. Collyer, 1700; Early American Imprints, 30149.

Sources

Hall, David. D., ed. Witch-Hunting in Seventeenth-Century New England: A Documentary History, 1638–1692. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991.

Hill, Frances. A Delusion of Satan: The Full Story of the Salem Witch Trials. New York: Doubleday, 1995.

Norton, Mary Beth. In the Devil's Snare: The Salem Witchcraft Crisis of 1692. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Calvinism

Calvinism is a form of Christianity founded by French theologian John Calvin (1509–1564), who initiated a movement within the Protestant Reformation and organized Martin Luther's beliefs into a work called Institutes of the Christian Religion (1536). Calvinism expressed a belief in divine sovereignty and predestination, and administered civic and moral instructions to its Puritan followers. In early America, Calvinist leaders reinforced these teachings by establishing Congregations and Presbyteries for the education and governance of church members. The five central tenets of Calvinism are outlined in Institutes of the Christian Religion, identified by the acronym TULIP: Total inherited depravity, Unconditional election, Limited atonement, Irresistible grace, and Perseverance of the saints. Emory Elliott provides a definition for each of these five points: “(1) total depravity – the complete corruption of humanity resulting from Original Sin; (2) unconditional election – the predestined salvation or damnation of every individual; (3) limited Atonement – Christ’s gift of life through His death but only for those already predestined for Heaven; (4) irresistible grace – necessary for conversion but which can be neither earned nor refused; (5) perseverance of the saints – the enduring justification and righteousness of the converted.”

Characterized by disciplined moral and religious attitudes and practices, Calvinist ideas significantly influenced early American literature. Notable Puritan writings include: John WINTHROP’s “Model of Christian Charity” (1630) and Journal, 1630–1649 (1790); Samuel SEWALL’s Diary, 1674–1729 (1878) and The Selling of Joseph (1700); Cotton MATHER’s Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), Bonifacius: An Essay . . . to Do Good (1710), and The Wonders of the Invisible World (1692); Jonathan EDWARDS’s sermons and essays; and the poetry of Anne BRADSTREET, Michael WIGGLESWORTH, and Edward TAYLOR.

Sources

- Cohen, Charles Lloyd. God’s Caress: Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Hoffman, Ronald, and Peter J. Albert, eds. Religion in a Revolutionary Age. Charlottesville: Published for the United States Capitol Historical Society by University Press of Virginia, 1994.
- Miller, Perry. Errand into the Wilderness. New York: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1956.

Captivity Narrative

A captivity narrative is a first-person account of being held captive, usually by another culture or nation. In early America, Native Americans took captives for many reasons—for trade, ransom, adoption, or as prisoners. According to Gordon M. Sayre, “The captivity narrative arises out of encounters between unfamiliar people, generally as a result of European imperialism in the Americas and Africa.” The captivity narrative retells a released captive’s experience with several overall intentions: to distance the captive from the experience; to restore his or her reputation by clarifying the record; to justify the experience in regard to an overall, providential plan; and to criticize or exonerate the captors. Captivity narratives also illustrate survival strategies, such as faith and acculturation.

Title page for the tenth edition of Rowlandson’s captivity narrative first published in 1682. Her narrative does not mention her having a gun.

The captivity narrative that reinforces a divine plan is similar to the SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY and the Providence tale, with the captive expressing both hope and despair. In this regard, as Emory Elliott explains, the captivity narrative follows the structure of a JEREMIAD. This formula provides an opportunity for the captive to record moments in which he or she is reflecting “upon the period of his or her life preceding the capture and discovering personal faults that had brought on God’s punishment. During the time of captivity, the repentant victim searches within and vows to return to an earlier piety, a decision that appears to be rewarded when the captive is freed.” One example of a captivity narrative that incorporates characteristics of a spiritual autobiography and a SLAVE NARRATIVE is John MARRANT'S A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black . . . (1785). Olaudah EQUIANO'S THE INTERESTING NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF OLAUDAH EQUIANO (1784) similarly recalls his abduction in Africa and his experience as a slave in America.

Captivity narratives may also be embellished or relayed through a third person. The 1786 "Panther Captivity," written as a letter from Abraham Panther, a pseudonym, to an anonymous male, begins "Dear Sir," and proceeds to retell the discovery of an unnamed "lady" who has been living alone in a cave for nine years. The narrative then shifts to the lady's voice, as she relates a harrowing tale of an attack on her family in Albany, New York, her escape after murdering her captor, and her subsequent years in exile. In another variation the released captive prefers to remain with his or her captors and to assimilate into their culture. Mary JEMISON married into the Seneca tribe, with whom she lived from 1758 to 1833.

Mary White ROWLANDSON, who was abducted during KING PHILIP'S WAR, was released on ransom after eleven weeks and five days in captivity. Written four years after her release, her NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAURATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON draws from the model of the Babylonian captivity in which Israelites as God's chosen people were led into the Promised Land. Rowlandson cites scripture as her guide throughout her ordeal. When her six-year-old-daughter, Sarah, dies from a bullet wound nine days after the attack, Rowlandson notes: "I have thought since of the wonderful goodness of God to me, in preserving me so in the use of my reason and senses in that distressed time." For the Puritan community, in particular, Rowlandson's experience served as both a warning and an affirmation to abide by divine will.

Popular interest in captivity prevailed into the nineteenth century, when captivity narratives were often integrated into fictional plots, such as Catherine Maria Sedgwick's (1789–1867) Hope Leslie; or Early Times in the Massachusetts (1827) and James Fenimore Cooper's (1789–1851) The Last of the Mohicans (1826) and The Prairie (1827). In some cases, the narratives were published as purely fictional accounts, such as the Struggle of Capt. Thomas Keith in America, Including the Manner in Which He, His Wife and Child Were Decoyed by the Indians; Their Temporary Captivity, and Happy Deliverance . . . (1808). The dime novels of the late nineteenth century also incorporated the captivity narrative into highly romanticized, increasingly sensational storylines.

Works

Johnson, Clifton. An Unredeemed Captive: Being the Story of Eunice Williams, Who at the Age of Seven Years, Was Carried Away from Deerfield by the Indians in the Year 1704, and Who Lived Among the Indians in Canada As One of Them the Rest of Her Life. Holyoke, Mass.: Printed by Griffith, Axtell & Cady, 1897.

Marrant, John. A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black, Born in New-York, in North America, Who Went to Preach the Gospel in Nova-Scotia, in the Year 1785. Carmarthen: Printed at the Gomerian office by Z. B. Morris, 1817; Nendeln, Liechtenstein: Kraus, 1972.

Mather, Cotton. A Notable Exploit; wherein, Dux Faemina Facti, in Magnalia Christi Americana: Or, The Ecclesiastical History of New-England. London: Printed for T. Parkhurst, 1702. Edited by Kenneth B. Murdock with the assistance of Elizabeth W. Miller. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1977.

Rowlandson, Mary White. The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together, with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson . . . Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Samuel Green, 1682. Edited by Neal Salisbury. Boston: Bedford, 1997.

Rowlandson and Joseph Rowlandson. A True History of the Captivity & Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson, a Minister's Wife in New-England Wherein Is Set Forth the Cruel and Inhumane Usage She Underwent Amongst the Heathens for Eleven Weeks Time, and Her Deliverance from Them. London: Joseph Poole, 1682. Republished in Life Writings II, edited by Elizabeth Skerpan-Wheeler. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2001.

Seaver, James E. A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison, Carefully Taken from Her Own Words, Nov. 29, 1823. Canandaigua, N.Y.: Printed by J. D. Bemis, 1824; republished as A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Sources

Burnham, Michelle. Captivity and Sentiment: Cultural Exchange in American Literature, 1682–1861. Hanover: University Press of New England, 1997.

Calloway, Colin G. North Country Captives: Selected Narratives of Indian Captivity from Vermont and New Hampshire. Hanover: University Press of New England, 1992.

Derounian-Stodola, Kathryn Zabelle, ed. Women's Indian Captivity Narratives. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Derounian-Stodola, and James Levernier, eds., The Indian Captivity Narrative, 1550–1900. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Elliott, Emory. The Cambridge Introduction to Early American Literature. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Martin, Wendy, ed., Colonial American Travel Narratives. New York: Penguin, 1994.

Sayre, Gordon M., ed. American Captivity Narratives: Olaudah Equiano, Mary Rowlandson, and Others. New York: Houghton, 2000.

VanDerBeets, Richard. The Indian Captivity Narrative: An American Genre. New York: University Press of America, 1984.

Williams, Daniel E. Liberty's Captives: Narratives of Confinement in the Print Culture of the Early Republic. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2006.

Recommended Writings

- Captivity of Hannah Dustan: A Notable Exploit; wherein, Dux Faemina Facti, in Cotton Mather's Magnalia Christi Americana (1702)
- Jemison, Mary. A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison (1824)
- Marrant, John. A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant (1817)
- Rowlandson, Mary White. The Sovereignty & Goodness of God (1682)
- Rowlandson. A True History of the Captivity & Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682)
- Williams, Eunice. An Unredeemed Captive: Being the Story of Eunice Williams (1897)

Studying Captivity Narratives

Students interested in learning more about the genre of captivity narratives should consult Richard VanDerBeets, The Indian Captivity Narrative: An American Genre (New York: University Press of America, 1984); Susan Howe, The Birth-Mark: Unsettling the Wilderness in American Literary History (Hanover: Wesleyan University Press, 1993); David R. Sewell's "So Unstable and Like Mad Men They Were": Language and Interpretation in Early American Captivity Narratives" in A Mixed Race: Ethnicity in Early America, edited by Frank Shuffelton (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993, 39–55); John Saillant's "Remarkably Emancipated from Bondage, Slavery, and Death: An African American Retelling of the Puritan Captivity Narrative, 1820" (Early American Literature, 29 [1994]: 122–140); Michelle Burnham, Captivity and Sentiment: Cultural Exchange in American Literature, 1682–1861 (Hanover: University of New England Press, 1997). Kathryn Zabelle Derounian-Stodola's "Captivity Narratives," in Teaching the Literatures of Early America, edited by Carla Mulford (New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1999, 243–258).

In addition to the above works, see the following for a specific study of captivity narratives and Puritans: Alden T. Vaughan and Edward W. Clark's Puritans Among the Indians: Accounts of Captivity and Redemption, 1676–1724 (Cambridge, Mass: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1981); Tara Fitzpatrick's "The Figure of Captivity: The Cultural Work of the Puritan Captivity Narrative" (American Literary History, 3, no. 1 [1991]: 1–26). For works that focus on the captivity narrative and Native Americans, students should consult James Levernier and Hennig Cohen's The Indians and Their Captives (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1977); Colin G. Calloway's The World Turned Upside Down: Indian Voices from Early America (Boston: St. Martin's Press, 1994), and Michael L. Fickes's "They Could Not Endure That Yoke": The Captivity of Pequot Women and Children after the War of 1637" (New England Quarterly: A Historical Review of New England Life and Letters, 73, no. 1 [2000]: 58–81). Studies that consider women, gender, and the captivity narrative include William J. Scheick's Authority and Female Title page for the account of Mary Jemison's captivity. She lived among the Seneca from 1758 until her death in 1833.

Authorship in Colonial America (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998); Lisa Logan's "Mary Rowlandson's Captivity and the 'Place' of the Woman Subject" (Early American Literature, 28 [1993]: 255–277); June Namias's White Captives: Gender and Ethnicity on the American Frontier (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993); William Henry Foster's The Captors' Narrative: Catholic Women and Their Puritan Men on the Early American Frontier (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2003); Lorraine Carroll's Rhetorical Drag: Gender Impersonation, Captivity, and the Writing of History (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2007); and Teresa Toulouse's The Captive's Position: Female Narrative, Male Identity, and Royal Authority in Colonial New England (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2007).

For information about specific captivity narratives, students should consult, for Hannah Dustan, Wayne Franklin's

"The Bloody Escape of Hannah Dustan: A Cultural Reader" in his American Voice, American Lives (New York: Norton, 1997, 109–130), which provides historical context and nineteenth-century literary responses; Toulouse's "Hannah Dustan's Bodies: Domestic Violence and Third-Generation Male Identity in Cotton Mather's Decennium Luctuosum" in her The Captive's Position, 100–119. For Mary Rowlandson, see David Downing's "'Streams of Scripture Comfort': Mary Rowlandson's Typological Use of the Bible" (Early American Literature, 15 [1980]: 252–259); Kathryn Zabelle Derounian-Stodola's "Puritan Orthodoxy and the 'Survivor Syndrome' in Mary Rowlandson's Indian Captivity Narrative" (Early American Literature, 22, no. 1 [1987]: 82–93); Derounian-Stodola's "The Publication, Promotion, and Distribution of Mary Rowlandson's Indian Captivity Narrative in the Seventeenth Century" (Early American Literature, 23, no. 3 [1988]: 239–261); and Mitchell Robert Breitwieser's American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991). For Eunice Williams consult John Demos's The Unredeemed Captive: A Family Story from Early America (New York: Knopf, 1994) and Evan Haefeli and Kevin Sweeney's Captive Histories: English, French, and Native Narratives of the 1704 Deerfield Raid (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2006). For John WILLIAMS: Rosalie Murphy Baum's "John Williams's Captivity Narrative: A Consideration of Normative Ethnicity," in A Mixed Race: Ethnicity in Early America, edited by Frank Shuffelton (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993, 56–76).

For a print bibliography, see Clara A. Smith's Narratives of Captivity among the Indians of North America: A List of Books and Manuscripts on This Subject in the Edward E. Ayer Collection of the Newberry Library (Chicago, Ill.: Newberry Library, 1912; Detroit: Gale Research, 1974); R. W. G. Vail's The Voice of the Old Frontier (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949); and Alden T. Vaughan's Narratives of North American Indian Captivity: A Selective Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1983).

Carew, Bampfylde-Moore (1693–1758 or 1770) autobiographer

Little is known about the life of Bampfylde-Moore Carew that does not come from his own rollicking, and often fantastic, autobiography. This lack of information only adds to his mystique as one of the most popular weavers of narratives in Colonial America. Carew was the son of the rector of Bickley in Devon, England, and a runaway from home and school at the age of fifteen. He joined a group of wandering gypsies and became a "trickster," or, in modern parlance, a con man. He led a nomadic life, using a variety of hard-luck tales to solicit money from others. Sometimes he posed as a farmer who had lost his livestock in a flood; sometimes he was a tin miner who had contracted a mysterious but debilitating illness in the mines. He also posed as a blacksmith whose shop had burned down, a shipwrecked sailor, a clergyman, a cripple, and, on occasion, a needy old woman with small children to support.

After a brief visit to Newfoundland, Carew returned to England, married, and was elected (he alleged in his An Apology for the Life of Bampfylde-Moore Carew in 1749) "King of the Beggars." His luck ran out, however, and following his arrest, he was banished to the colony of Maryland. He soon escaped, was recaptured, and escaped again. He took refuge among the Indians for a while and then spent time in such colonial cities as Philadelphia, New York, and New London. Returning to England, he was arrested a second time and deported once again to the colonies. Little more is known about his life, and even his date of death is disputed, put at 1758 or 1770.

Carew's first version of what was to become known as The Surprising Adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, King of the Beggars (1812) appeared in 1745 as The Life and Adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, the Noted Devonshire Stroller and Dog-Stealer, supposedly an account told by Carew to its author. In 1749 a second version appeared, this time purportedly written by his publisher's wife under Carew's guidance. Fifty subsequent editions mix these two prototype versions of The Surprising Adventures.

The accuracy of Carew's tales of his rogue days in America is questionable. Claims such as sightings of leopards and lions in the Chesapeake colony of Maryland and the invention of two Indian tribes, one using crossbows and the other whose "very dwarf statute [sic]" was reminiscent of pygmies, suggest a vivid imagination rather than accurate reportage. Many of these fanciful details were added, however, by a variety of editors as they republished the book.

The Carew persona in The Surprising Adventures is a worldly wise traveler whose encounters and journeys make him a good judge of people—a man who can see through deception, even in its most sophisticated form. The moral difference between the deceivers he exposes and himself, says Carew, is that he admits to his deceit and they attempt to hide theirs. In a world of lies and hypocrisy, therefore, he is the more honest man.

Reflective of the eighteenth-century episodic, adventure tale, Carew's book includes frequent, meticulous digressions. In recounting his adventures in Newfoundland, he includes a long, detailed description of curing codfish. In many editions, critical attacks on English novelists are interjected. To a modern reader, the book may seem too predictable, in that Carew's success in deceiving others is never in doubt. Nevertheless, many of the tales of this man who lived by his wits—fooling friends and strangers, rich and poor, and often the same people over and over again—remain entertaining.

Works

Carew, Bampfylde-Moore. The Life and Adventures of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, the Noted Devonshire Stroller and Dog-Stealer; as Related by Himself. . . . Exon: Printed by the Farleys for Joseph Drew, 1745; Early American Imprints, 12708.

Carew. An Apology for the Life of Bampfylde-Moore Carew, . . . Commonly Known throughout the West of England, by the Title of King of the Beggars; . . . The Whole Taken from His Own Mouth. [Sherborne]: Printed by R. Goadby, 1749; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1985.

Sources

Coleman, Julie. History of Cant and Slang Dictionaries. Vol. 1, 1567–1784. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.

Fyvie, John. Noble Dames and Notable Men of the Georgian Era. London: Constable, 1910.

Sorensen, Janet. "Vulgar Tongues: Canting Dictionaries and the Language of the People in Eighteenth-Century Britain," Eighteenth-Century Studies, 37 (2004): 435–454.

Carey, Mathew (1760–1839) printer, poet, pamphleteer
Born in Dublin January 28, 1760, the son of Christopher and Mary Sherridan Carey, Mathew Carey was dropped in infancy by a nurse, leaving him with a limp for the rest of his life. Although Christopher Carey was only a baker, he had won a lucrative contract supplying the British navy. As a result Mathew enjoyed a solid, formal education, including a firm grounding in Latin. Carey was the first Catholic of prominence in the publishing trade in the United States; he also initiated a new school of political economy. He argued that land, worthless in itself, gains all its value from human labor; that primal man, with little knowledge and no tools, begins to cultivate the simple soils of sandy elevations out of necessity and gradually advances to the subjugation of more-fertile and difficult regions; that the real interests of classes and individuals are essentially in accord; that there exists a normal propensity that increases the wages of labor and decreases the rate of profit for capital; and that the happiness and advancement of society depends on its degree of organization and independence. Carey's reputation as a political economist was widely recognized; yet, he was primarily a controversial pamphleteer, a talent he demonstrated at an early age.

As a teenager Mathew Carey began to reveal both his polemical character and his talent for expressing himself. At the age of seventeen he wrote an inflammatory handbill advertising a PAMPHLET he had written, titled To the Roman Catholics of Ireland, which urged Irish Catholics to resist British oppression. As a result of his radical call to arms, Carey was forced to leave the country, not by the British but by a group of conservative Catholics who feared British recriminations and offered a bounty for the author of the pamphlet. Carey's family sent him to Paris in 1779. The young man made good use of his year in exile, printing broadsides on American politics for Benjamin FRANKLIN and beginning a lifelong friendship with Marie Jean Paul Joseph Roche Yves Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de Lafayette (1754–1834).

Returning to Ireland, Carey edited two newspapers, the Freeman's Journal and The Volunteer's Journal, or Irish Herald. In both publications he printed anti-British exhortations. When threatened with imprisonment for producing subversive material, Carey fled to Franklin's home city of Philadelphia, escaping detection by the authorities, legend has it, by dressing as a woman. With financial aid from Lafayette, Carey established a printing office in America, putting out the first edition of Carey's Pennsylvania Evening Herald in 1785. The Herald ran abstracts of political proceedings and carried the debates of the Pennsylvania Assembly, a feature that proved popular with subscribers. Although the politics of the paper were generally conservative, they were decidedly anti-English and pro-Irish.

Trouble arose for Carey almost immediately, this time based on his success. Eleazar Oswald (1755–1795), the publisher of a rival, and less popular, newspaper in Philadelphia, openly ridiculed both Carey's withered leg and his commitment to Ireland. Which insult angered him more is not known, but Carey responded with The Plagi-Scurriliad: A Hudibrastic Poem (1786), a satiric assault on his rival's character. Oswald challenged Carey to a duel; Carey, who had little skill with a pistol, accepted. Oswald managed to fire a shot into Carey's lame leg, compounding the damage done earlier.

In 1786 Carey began publication of The Columbian Magazine, an imitation of England's successful Gentleman's Magazine. It carried foreign and domestic news, poems and historical notes, as well as the publisher's own essays and musings. In one of his essays, Carey projects himself into the future and catalogues his vision of America's possible accomplishments by the year 1850, including settlement of the Mississippi valley, infrastructural advances, and an end to slavery. An ambitious project, the magazine did not succeed and was soon abandoned.

Carey next published The American Museum, an edited collection of previously published essays culled from other sources, including pamphlets. Among its readers were such prominent figures as George WASHINGTON, Benjamin RUSH, John DICKINSON, and Benjamin Franklin, who occasionally contributed material for publication. Franklin's AUTOBIOGRAPHY was first excerpted in The American Museum, as were reprints of Thomas PAINE's Common Sense, antislavery tracts by Anthony BENEZET, and poems by Philip FRENEAU. This venture, like the one that preceded it, was a critical success but a financial failure. When the magazine folded in 1792, Carey lamented, "Never was more labour bestowed on a work, with less reward."

Carey's energies were not entirely absorbed by his printing profession. In 1796 he formed the Hibernian Society for Irish immigrants. He also launched the first Sunday school society in America. As a Catholic he published children's spelling and reading books that were acceptable to the Church and politically enlightening. He filled these books with short passages from the works of William Shakespeare, John Milton, Baron de Montesquieu, and Jonathan Swift. In addition, he continued to produce original writing, including essays and poems, with topics ranging from the lofty—Fragment, Addressed to the Sons and Daughters of Humanity, as a Citizen of the World (1796)—to the profane and humorous—The Porcupiniad, a Hudibrastic or mock epic poem published in 1799 as a scathing reply to rival publisher William Cobbett (1763–1835). Carey's greatest success, however, was in publishing Bibles. Following the advice of his traveling sales agent, Mason Locke WEEMS, Carey produced Bibles that suited popular tastes and consequently sold tens of thousands. Over a span of twenty years, he printed more than two hundred thousand copies of the Bible.

In 1791 Carey married Bridget Flahavan, daughter of a local Irish merchant. The couple had nine children, seven of whom reached adulthood. Two of Carey's children remained linked to his business, and his son Henry Charles eventually took over his enterprises. Carey died from complications after a carriage accident on September 16, 1839.

Works

Carey, Mathew, ed. The American Museum, or Universal Magazine, 1790–1792; Early American Imprints, 20193, 20194, 20195.

Carey. The Plagi-Scurriliad: A Hudibrastic Poem. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by the author, 1796; Early American Imprints, 19540.

Carey. The Porcupiniad, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by the author, 1799. Early American Imprints, 35275–35277.

Carey. The Columbian Spelling and Reading Book Improved, or, An Easy and Alluring Guide to Spelling and Reading. Philadelphia: Printed by the author, 1808–1818; Early American Imprints, 35271.

Carey. Carey's American Pocket Atlas . . . ; with a Brief Description of Each State and Territory; Also, the Census of the Inhabitants of the United States, for 1810; the Exports from the United States for Twenty Years, fourth edition. Philadelphia: Mathew Carey, 1814; Early American Imprints, 30161.

Sources

Bradsher, Earl Lockridge. Mathew Carey, Editor, Author and Publisher: A Study in American Literary Development. New York: Columbia University Press, 1912.

Clarkin, William. Mathew Carey, a Bibliography of His Publications, 1785–1824. New York: Garland, 1984.

Green, James N. Mathew Carey, Publisher and Patriot. Philadelphia: Library Company of Philadelphia, 1985.

Carver, Jonathan (1710–1780) travel writer, geographer

Jonathan Carver's Travels Through the Interior Parts of North America in the Years 1766, 1767, and 1768 (1789) went through many editions and printings. It was translated into French, German, Dutch, and Greek, capturing the imagination of Europeans as well as Americans. The accuracy and originality of the book, however, was controversial. Carver borrowed freely from other published sources, especially from the French explorers who had recorded details about the Great Lakes region long before the Rogers Expedition in the 1760s. He also made liberal use of the writings of James ADAIR of Charleston. Critics had no trouble finding inaccuracies and what they declared to be intentional fabrications throughout the book. Although Carver's work was in keeping with the trends of travel literature that favored increasingly embellished and even fictionalized works, by 1838 American publishers of Travels were advertising it as an entertaining collection of tales rather than a genuine travel account.

Carver's tales of adventure certainly appealed to a young nation committed to westward expansion and ready to create and idolize Western heroes such as Daniel Boone. Travels also gave early voice to the nationalism that peaked in the 1830s and 1840s. Carver made no effort to disguise his main goal, to induce Americans to settle the Great Lakes area. Thus, his book was a type of PROMOTIONAL TRACT much like the colonial recruitment tracts distributed throughout England and the German states during the seventeenth century.

Travels devoted roughly half its attention to the American Indians, covering their origins, physical attributes, clothing, government, rituals, games, marriage customs, and religious beliefs. Carver included an introduction to the language of two Sioux tribes, hoping in this way to make the Native Americans less intimidating. Throughout the book, he stresses natural riches of the region, listing resources from gold and copper to timber forests and furbearing animals. The exploitation of these resources, Carver argues, is not simply an opportunity; it is the patriotic duty of Americans to make better use of this bounty than the French did in their years of dominance. He presents a vision of "mighty kingdoms" emerging from the wilderness, "and stately palaces and solemn temples, with gilded spires reaching the skies."

Jonathan Carver was born April 13, 1710, in Weymouth, Massachusetts, the son of David Carver, a local community leader, and his wife, Hannah Dyer Carver. Little is known about his education and early years. In 1746 Carver married Abigail Robbins; they had seven children. Although he was not a young man when the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR (1754–1763) broke out, Carver joined a Connecticut regiment and took part in the Fort William Henry massacre in 1757. By 1759 Carver had moved to the small town of Montague, Massachusetts, where his family resided.

A civilian once again, Carver attempted to settle down and follow in his father's footsteps as a community leader. He missed the excitement of frontier military life, however, and when the opportunity came to join an expedition to the Northwest, Carver signed on as a cartographer. The expedition, organized by Robert Rogers, made its way west to the Mississippi and upriver to the Falls of St. Anthony. The men spent the winter of 1766–1767 in a Sioux village on the Minnesota River and continued on to Lake Superior in the spring, ultimately exploring much of what later became Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Back in Massachusetts, Carver tried immediately to find a publisher for his account of the expedition. When he had no luck in the colonies, he sailed to England, spending ten years attempting to find a publisher for his Travels through the Interior Parts of North America in the Years 1766, 1767, and 1768. He remained in England permanently, finding work in the literary field and marrying his second wife, Mary Harris, in 1774 without having divorced his first wife in Massachusetts. This second marriage produced a daughter. When Carver's book finally appeared in 1778, he was sixty-eight years old and living in terrible poverty in London. He died two years later, unaware of the popularity and influence his Travels would have. He was survived by his two wives, who may have been unaware that Carver had committed bigamy.

From the beginning, the published edition of Travels met with accusations of plagiarism. Many of Carver's assertions were factually inaccurate, suggesting an active imagination as opposed to scientific observation. The book sold well despite these accusations, going through many editions and translations. Jedidiah MORSE saw enough validity in Travels to use it as a source for his American Geography (1789). Carver's original manuscript was discovered in the British Museum around the turn of the twentieth century; comparisons of the published version to the original manuscript reveal changes inconsistent with Carver's style. Possibly, the publisher made changes. Carver was involved with at least two additional publications. He had a role in the New Universal Traveller (1779) and published an essay on tobacco cultivation. Despite the successful publication and republication of Travels and a government allotment, however, Carver died a pauper.

Works

Carver, Jonathan. Travels through the Interior Parts of North America in the Years 1766, 1767, and 1768. London: Printed for the author and sold by J. Walter, 1778; republished as Three Years Travels through the Interior Parts of North-America. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by Joseph Cruikshank, 1784; Early American Imprints, 18391.

Carver. Journals of Jonathan Carver and Related Documents, 1766–1770. St. Paul: Minnesota Historical Society Press, 1976.

Sources

Gelb, Norman, ed. "Introduction," in Jonathan Carver's Travels through America, 1766–1768: An Eighteenth-Century Explorer's Account of Uncharted America. New York: John Wiley, 1993.

Murphy, Lucy Eldersveld. A Gathering of Rivers: Indians, Metis, and Mining in the Western Great Lakes, 1737–1832. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2000.

The famous "false portrait" of Samuel de Champlain, so ubiquitous as to be accepted as accurate. Actually it is a 1654 engraving based on a portrait of McMichael Particelli d'Emery.

Champlain, Samuel de (1570?–1635) explorer, chronicler, cartographer

The next day we entered the lake, which is of great extent, say eighty or a hundred leagues long, where I saw four or five fine islands, ten, twelve, and fifteen leagues long . . . There are also many rivers falling into the lake, bordered by many fine trees of the same kinds as we have in France, with many vines finer than any I have seen in any other place.

—Champlain describing "Lake Champlain"
The Voyages to the Great River
St. Lawrence, 1608–1612 (1907)

French explorer, cartographer, and trader, Champlain was instrumental in establishing French presence along the St. Lawrence River in the territory known as NEW FRANCE. Samuel de Champlain was born in a village at Brouage, France, around 1570 to Antoine Champlain, a mariner, and Marguerite Le Roy. From his father, Samuel learned the arts of navigation and the sea, and although he served in the military briefly, he was far more inspired to be an explorer. In 1608 Champlain founded a trading post at Quebec and successfully established amicable relations with the Huron. Colin G. Calloway praises Champlain's understanding of ceremonial gift giving as key to his success and to the endurance of these trade alliances. Champlain aligned himself with the Huron and supplied them with firearms that allowed them to defeat the IROQUOIS. Good relations shifted significantly, however, in 1617, when Champlain proposed a more aggressive plan for settlement of New France with 1,200 new colonists and a stronger missionary attitude toward the natives. In 1610, while in France, Champlain married Hélène Boullé, who traveled to Quebec in 1620 and after her husband's death founded the Ursuline Convent at Meaux. Samuel de Champlain died at Quebec on December 25, 1635.

Champlain wrote extensively about his expeditions and travel in three volumes: On the "Sauvages," or Voyages of Samuel de Champlain, of Brouage, Made in New France (1603); The Voyages of Samuel de Champlain (1613); and The Voyages and Discoveries of Mr. Champlain (1619). Gordon Sayre notes that the first two titles employ a "contiguous" narrative to describe "Champlain's hometown and a region in Western France near La Rochelle."

Works

Champlain, Samuel de. The Voyages and Discoveries, 1604–1616, 2 volumes, 1906; republished as Algonquians, Hurons, and Iroquois: Champlain Explores America, 1603–1616, translated by Annie Nettleton Bourne, edited by Edward Gaylord Bourne. Dartmouth, N.S., Canada: Brook House Press, 2000.

Champlain. Voyages of Samuel de Champlain, 1604–1618, edited by W. L. Grant. New York: Scribners, 1907; New York: Barnes & Noble, 1967.

Sources

Calloway, Colin G. New Worlds for All: Indians, Europeans, and the Remaking of Early America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.

Sayre, Gordon. Les Sauvages Américains: Representations of Native Americans in French and English Colonial Literature. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Recommended Writings

On the "Sauvages," or Voyages of Samuel de Champlain, of Brouage, Made in New France (1603)

The Voyages of Mr. Champlain of Xaintonge (1613)

The Voyages and Discoveries of Mr. Champlain (1619)

The Voyages of Western New France (1632)

The Voyages of 1615 (1907)

The Voyages to the Great River St. Lawrence, 1608–1612 (1907)

Studying Samuel de Champlain

Studies about Champlain cover such topics as exploration, French and Canadian history, Native Americans, Jesuit missionaries, and cartography. A good place to start for biographies on Champlain is Samuel Eliot Morison's Samuel de Champlain, Father of New France (Boston: Little, Brown, 1972); another older biography to consider is Morris Bishop's Champlain: The Life of Fortitude (New York: Knopf, 1948). For a history of New France and Champlain, see Samuel Eliot Morison's The European Discovery of America: The Northern Voyages AD 500–1600 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1974); Gordon Sayre's Les Sauvages Américains: Representations of Native Americans in French and English Colonial Literature (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997); Raymonde Litalien, Käthe Roth, and Denis Vaugeois's Champlain: The Birth of French America (Montréal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2004); and Philip Marchand's Ghost Empire: How the French Almost Conquered North America (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2007). For a view of Champlain's explorations from a nineteenth-century perspective, see Francis Parkman's Pioneers of France in the New World (1885; revised and enlarged edition, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996). For studies about Champlain and cartography, see C. E. Heidenreich's Explorations and Mapping of Samuel de Champlain, 1603–1632 (Toronto: B. V. Gutsell, 1976). Students interested in the study of European explorers and Native Americans should consider James Axtell's The Invasion Within: The Contest of Cultures in Colonial North America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985) and Colin G. Calloway's New Worlds for All: Indians, Europeans, and the Remaking of Early America (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997). For electronic primary sources of Champlain's Voyages see the American Journeys website (<<http://www.americanjourneys.org/aj-115/index.asp>> viewed May 15, 2007).

Chapbook

Chapbooks were inexpensively produced books that covered a range of subjects, including adventure and crime stories, jokes and anecdotes, religious tracts and picaresque tales, and history and biography. These "cheap" books were sold by chapmen, traveling salesmen who brought popular literary works to the colonial reader, especially those outside of the mainstream academic culture. Isaiah THOMAS of Wooster, Massachusetts, was one of the largest and best-known printers of chapbooks in early America, especially children's stories, such as: Mother Goose's Melody; or, Sonnets for the Cradle in Two Parts (1794); reproductions of London editions, such as "Children in the Wood"; and abridged versions of works such as Daniel Defoe's (1690–1731) Robinson Crusoe (1719). Extensive chapbook collections may be found in The Boswell Collection of Chapbooks, Harvard University Library; Elizabeth Nesbitt Children's Literature Collection, University of Pittsburgh; and the Lilly Library Chapbook Collection, Indiana University, Bloomington.

Sources

- Cullen, Jim. Popular Culture in American History. Oxford: Blackwell, 2000.
- Davidson, Cathy N. Revolution and The Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986; expanded edition, 2004.
- Elizabeth Nesbitt Children's Literature Collection, University of Pittsburgh, School of Information Science, Pittsburgh, Pa., <<http://www.library.pitt.edu/libraries/is/enroom/chapbooks/chapbookpageindex.htm>> (viewed August 18, 2006).
- Hall, David D. Cultures of Print: Essays in the History of the Book. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.
- Lilly Library Chapbook Collection, Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., <<http://www.indiana.edu/~liblilly/chapbook.shtml>> (viewed August 18, 2006).
- Wolf, Edwin II. The Book Culture of a Colonial American City: Philadelphia Books, Bookmen, and Booksellers. New York: Clarendon Press, 1988.

Charlotte: A Tale of Truth by Susanna Rowson (London: William Lane, 1791; republished as Charlotte Temple, 1797) novel

Susanna Haswell Rowson's Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791) is the story of a fifteen-year-old English girl, Charlotte, who without her parents' knowledge departs Portsmouth, England, for America with the dashing Lieutenant Montraville, who had secretly courted her, and with the calculating Mademoiselle la Rue, Charlotte's teacher and governess. Rather than marry Charlotte once they arrive in America, Montraville abandons her for another woman. Although he maintains contact with Charlotte, she becomes increasingly destitute. The dramatic novel concludes with her father arriving from England to find Charlotte on her deathbed, having given birth to a daughter. A SENTIMENTAL NOVEL, Charlotte Temple emphasizes emotion as a key to knowledge, and affirms virtuous behavior. The narrator alerts her readers: "Oh my dear girls—for to such only am I writing—listen not to the voice of love, unless sanctioned by paternal approbation." One corrective in these "seduced and abandoned" tales was to advocate the importance of female education. The novel was first published in England in 1791 and in America in 1794 as Charlotte. A Tale of Truth. In 1797 the "Third American Edition" was published as Charlotte Temple, a title that was retained in the more than two hundred editions that followed.

Sources

- Barnes, Elizabeth. States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Stern, Julia A. The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Charter

As a literary and legal form, charters represent an important phase of the colonial experience. The tradition of the American charter emerged from royal charters and letters of patent, which granted representatives of the Crown the right to claim foreign territory. The original royal charters were influenced by a papal bull issued by Pope Alexander VI in 1493, authorizing the king and queen of Spain to claim all newly discovered territories not yet claimed by any other Christian state (that is, by Portugal). This papal bull established the concept of the right of discovery, which negated the rights of the indigenous people but insisted on recognition of rights among the "Christian" (European) states. In this sense the papal bull served two purposes. First, it operated as a diplomatic tool, avoiding the danger of competing claims. Second, it legitimized the conquest and attempted conversion of non-Christian people. The Privileges and Prerogatives Granted by Their Catholic Majesties to Christopher Columbus (1492), the original charter issued by King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella of Spain, reflects the concepts initiated by the papal bull.

Following this precedent, King Henry VII of England issued the earliest English charter to explorer John Cabot in 1496, employing similar wording and authorizing Cabot to secure any territory not claimed by "some Christian prince." Beginning in the second half of the sixteenth century, England reinterpreted the concept of right of discovery to include actual possession. This reinterpretation negated, at least from the English perspective, Spanish and French claims to broad territories in North America. The charter granted to Sir Humphrey Gilbert (circa 1537–1583) by Queen Elizabeth in 1578 reflected this reinterpretation, granting Gilbert the right to "inhabit and possess all remote and heathen lands not in the actual possession of any Christian prince." The charter issued to Sir Walter Raleigh (circa 1553–1618) in 1584 charges him with the right and responsibility for securing territory "not actually possessed of any Christian Prince, nor inhabited by Christian People."

The "Charter to Sir Walter Raleigh: 1584" reflected a second evolution in colonial charters, outlining the rights and obligations of private enterprise in the colony within the larger sphere of English rule. Raleigh and "his heirs and assigne" were granted the right to exploit for private profit all land and resources, including the authority to employ military action wherever needed. In exchange, the colony was expected to remain loyal to the English Crown and to observe the acts and laws of Parliament, as far as was practical.

These changes—the right to private possession coupled to permanent allegiance to the Crown and Parliament—established the basis for future English colonial charters. They also reflected the emerging strategy for the English imperial system: exploration, possession, and exploitation without any significant investment on the part of the English state. Private enterprise was to furnish the capital and the manpower for colonization and was to be compensated with land and resources. In return, the English government would benefit from the trade that would ensue. Although Raleigh's enterprise failed, the strategy succeeded. The rights and obligations of settlement were incorporated in various forms into subsequent colonial charters, including the first (1606), second (1609), and third (1612) charters of Virginia and the Charter of the Massachusetts Bay Company (1629).

The reinterpretation of the right of discovery and the new strategy for colonial management also influenced the charters issued by other governments, including the Dutch and the Swedes, who were also in direct conflict with the earlier colonial claims initiated by the Spanish and the French. Some influences originating in the English charters are evident in the Charter of the Dutch West India Company (1621) and in the Charter of Privileges . . . to the Newly Established Swedish South Company (1626). However, compared with the English, the charters issued by the Netherlands and Sweden included significantly more detailed instructions concerning the management and organization of the companies and the colonies and what benefits would accrue to the mother countries. This facet of the colonial charter had little impact on the English approach to colonization in North America.

The English strategy of avoiding the expense of direct involvement in colonization—often referred to as benevolent or salutary neglect—largely succeeded. By yielding immediate control, England reaped the benefits of trade with little in the way of administrative expense. This strategy began to demonstrate its long-term flaws during and immediately following the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR. Faced with demands for increased revenue through taxes and with reorganization of the imperial system, the American colonists cited the tradition and precedent of the colonial charters as one argument against direct intervention on the part of Parliament. Colonial leaders argued that the charters granted colonial residents the rights of Englishmen. At the same time, the charters allowed the colonies to make their own laws and maintain their own governments, as long as those laws were not contrary to English law.

As interpreted by the colonists, the prerogative framework of the colonial charters allowed for semi-autonomy and a pick-and-choose approach to English law and procedure. William Blackstone (1723–1780) fundamentally agreed with this interpretation in his Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–1769). Revived and invoked by the colonists in opposition to increased taxation and control from England, the charters influenced the politics and language of protest and rebellion. John ADAMS referred to the colonial charters in the series of essays he wrote as “Novanglus” (1774), which argued in favor of colonial semi-autonomy from Parliament. To some extent the charters served as a reference point—the original social contract—that the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE declared null and void.

Sources

Davis, Andrew McFarland. Corporations in the Days of the Colony. Cambridge, Mass.: John Wilson & Son University Press, 1894.

MacDonald, William, ed. Documentary Source Book of American History, 1606–1926. New York: Burt Franklin, 1968.

Chauncy, Charles (1705–1787) minister, theologian

Charles Chauncy was the most influential clergyman in eighteenth-century America outside of his nemesis, Jonathan EDWARDS. A member of the Boston elite, Chauncy, born January 1, 1705, secured his place in American literature through extensive sermonizing. His father, also Charles Chauncy, was a prosperous Boston merchant; his mother, Sarah Walley Chauncy, was the daughter of a Colonial Massachusetts Supreme Court justice. His great-grandfather, another Charles Chauncy, had served as the second president of HARVARD COLLEGE. Not surprisingly, Chauncy was prepared from an early age for an education at Harvard. He received his bachelor's degree from Harvard in 1721 and his master's in 1724. In 1742 he added a doctor of divinity degree from Edinburgh University. Chauncy married Elizabeth Hirst in 1727. He was married twice more, to Elizabeth Townsend in 1738 and to Mary Stoddard in 1760.

Chauncy was ordained a minister in 1727 and was subsequently appointed to the First Church in Boston. His ministerial career was notable for its stability and consistency. He remained an active minister or cominister for the balance of his life and reputedly owed his longevity and vigor to a steady diet, regular exercise, and an early bedtime.

In contrast, Chauncy's career as a theologian was typified by heated religious and political controversies. Chauncy opposed the religious revivalism and enthusiasm of the GREAT AWAKENING and its two principal proponents, Edwards and George WHITEFIELD. Viewing revivalism as artificial excess, Chauncy supported a more liberal Congregational church built on a belief in the benevolence of God. He made his theological opinions clear in several writings, including Enthusiasm Described and Caution'd Against (1742), A Letter to the Reverend Mr. George Whitefield (1745), and The Benevolence of the Deity (1784).

Like many Congregational ministers in New England, Chauncy was a strong supporter of the PATRIOT cause during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. He was proud of the colonies' accomplishments, offering a boastful prediction in 1772 that they would emerge in twenty-five years as “the greatest Empire on Earth.” Impressed by Chauncy’s comment, John ADAMS recorded it as part of his diary entry for December 16, 1772. Chauncy’s patriotic ideology was also firmly grounded in his determined opposition to any attempt, real or imagined, on the part of the British to force an episcopacy (government of Anglican bishops) on the colonies. The episcopacy was a policy favored by the royal government and therefore by many supporters of the LOYALIST cause. At one level it was viewed as an attempt to establish the Anglican Church and in the process to reduce the influence of CONGREGATIONALISM. At another level, the bishops portended a return to Catholicism. Chauncy’s personal views on this issue are spelled out in clear and concise language in his Dudleian Lecture, The Validity of Presbyterian Ordination Asserted and Maintained (1762) and A Compleat View of Episcopacy (1771).

Works

- Chauncy, Charles. Enthusiasm Described and Caution’d Against. Boston: Printed by J. Draper for S. Eliot & J. Blanchard, 1742; Early American Imprints, 4912.
- Chauncy. The Validity of Presbyterian Ordination Asserted and Maintained. Boston: Printed and sold by Richard Draper and Thomas Leverett, 1762; Early American Imprints, 9089.
- Chauncy. A Compleat View of Episcopacy. Boston: Printed by Daniel Kneeland for Thomas Leverett, 1771; Early American Imprints, 12009.

Sources

- Corrigan, John. The Hidden Balance: Religion and the Social Theories of Charles Chauncy and Jonathan Mayhew. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Griffin, Edward M. Old Brick, Charles Chauncy of Boston, 1705–1787. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1980.
- Wells, Colin. The Devil and Doctor Dwight: Satire and Theology in the Early American Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Cheever, Ezekiel (1615–1708) educator, essayist

Ezekiel Cheever’s most notable literary achievement was his beginner’s Latin grammar, A Short Introduction to the Latin Tongue, for the Use of the Lower Forms in the Latin School (1709), one of the earliest American schoolbooks. Initially developed for Cheever’s students at New Haven, it sold twenty editions between 1709 and 1785 and was republished in 1838. Cheever also wrote widely on religious subjects. Three of these essays survive from a 1757 edition, Scripture Prophecies Explained. Cheever has been credited with some Latin compositions, including a selection of poetry, but his authorship of these pieces has been challenged by several scholars.

Cheever was born January 25, 1615, in London, the son of William Cheever, a spinner. Ezekiel managed to transcend the social and economic limitations of his laborer background and attain a classical education, beginning with a formal preparatory education at Christ’s Hospital. A more intensive education in the classics followed, at Emmanuel College, Cambridge which served as an unofficial academic center for the Puritans in England.

Prepared for a career as a schoolmaster or minister, in 1637 Cheever left England for Boston. In 1638 he accepted a position as master of the public school in New Haven, Connecticut. From the beginning, Cheever’s life in New Haven was a model of success. During his first year there, he married a local woman and became a signer of the Plantation Covenant, which established the Congregational Church in New Haven. His school quickly gained a solid reputation for academic excellence, producing one especially notable student, poet Michael WIGGLESWORTH. In addition to serving as the schoolmaster, Cheever was appointed as a deputy to the General Court in 1646 and served occasionally as the minister of the First Church.

Cheever experienced some controversy in New Haven. In 1649 he opposed the prevailing New Haven leadership, who retaliated by accusing him of neglect of duty and improper behavior before the church. Cheever defended himself brilliantly, but the costs of his defense were high. Recently widowed, he quit the colony the following year, leaving for Ipswich, Massachusetts.

In Ipswich, Cheever repeated his earlier success at New Haven. From 1650 to 1661, he taught at Ipswich’s Free School, establishing a colonywide reputation for academic excellence. At the same time, he became an important member of the community, exercising substantial influence over town affairs. He married Ellen Lathrop in 1652.

For unknown reasons Cheever left Ipswich in 1661 for Charlestown, Massachusetts. Once again he became a schoolmaster, teaching in Charlestown for the next nine years but with minimal success. Unlike in New Haven and Ipswich, the academic environment at Charlestown was highly competitive, and Cheever had difficulty attracting enough students to make a satisfactory income.

Cheever’s position improved significantly in 1671, when he became master of the prestigious Boston Latin School, which served as a preparatory academy for HARVARD COLLEGE. His salary was immediately doubled, and he gained the use of the school building for his personal needs. Over the next thirty-eight years Cheever developed a reputation for academic rigor that was unequaled by any of his contemporaries. He also developed a reputation as a firm disciplinarian. Among his more celebrated students at the Boston Latin School were Cotton MATHER, Benjamin COLMAN, and John BARNARD.

Ezekiel Cheever died in Boston August 21, 1708. His funeral sermon was delivered by Cotton Mather.

Work

- Cheever, Ezekiel. A Short Introduction to the Latin Tongue, for the Use of the Lower Forms in the Latin School. Boston: Printed by B. Green, 1709; Early American Imprints, 1384.

Source

Handlin, Lillian. "Dissent in a Small Community," New England Quarterly, 58 (1985): 193–220.

Clark, William (1770–1838) explorer

William Clark's journey with Meriwether LEWIS from 1804 to 1806 took their expedition from the Louisiana Territory to the Pacific Coast. Clark is noted for his compositions during this trip. His maps, observations, and drawings provided valuable additions to the final collection of journals documenting what has come to be known as the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION. As valuable as these journals were, complete publication was delayed for nearly a century. Nicholas BIDDLE edited and published some of the information from the journals in an abbreviated form in 1814 as the History of the Expedition under the Command of Lewis and Clark. A more thorough edition was published under the same title in 1893. Edited by Elliott Coues (1842–1899), this edition included four volumes of data. The complete text of the journals was finally published as eight volumes between 1904 and 1905 by R. G. Thwaites under the title The Original Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition.

Clark had a varied career as a professional soldier, explorer, and territorial governor. He was born August 1, 1770, in Caroline County, Virginia, the ninth child of John Clark, a member of the planter elite, and Ann Rogers Clark. Clark's career was the product of three major influences. Although he had no formal education, he was raised to be a Virginia gentleman within a plantation environment. His early training stressed horsemanship, marksmanship, boldness, and personal honor. The AMERICAN REVOLUTION provided a second influence, helping to instill an early sense of nationalism. In 1784 the family relocated to a new plantation near Louisville, Kentucky, introducing Clark to life on the frontier. These three influences—"manly" skills, nationalism, and the frontier—are clearly reflected in Clark's military, scientific, and political career.

In 1789 Clark joined the Kentucky militia, which was actively engaged in suppressing Indian attacks on settlers. Between 1793 and 1795 he fought as a lieutenant in the army under General Anthony Wayne (1745–1796), who commanded the campaign against the Native Americans in the Ohio Valley. Under Wayne, Clark specialized as an intelligence officer and as an emissary to the Spanish fort on the Mississippi. However, he resigned his commission in 1796 to become a merchant in the booming frontier center of Louisville.

Clark's military career resurfaced because of Meriwether Lewis, who had served with Clark under General Wayne. Lewis had been placed in command of a federal expedition, actively sponsored by President Thomas JEFFERSON, to explore the newly purchased Louisiana Territory and, if possible, to find the Northwest Passage to the Pacific. Valuing his colleague's skills as a frontiersman, fighter, and emissary, Lewis invited Clark to join him as coleader of the expedition.

The expedition, called the Corps of Discovery, left St. Louis in May 1804. Using a combination of water and overland routes, Lewis and Clark traversed the width of the western part of the continent, reaching the Pacific coast near the end of 1805. The expedition returned to St. Louis in September 1806. Clark's responsibilities during the arduous and dangerous journey were initially focused on cartography. His efforts produced a series of maps covering the vast territory to the west and north of the established United States. These maps proved valuable to future settlement and served as important adjuncts in diplomatic negotiations with the British and Spanish. The maps also provided conclusive proof that the Northwest Passage to the Pacific did not exist.

Along with Lewis and several other members of the party, Clark maintained a log or journal throughout the expedition. Clark's notations contributed important observations on American Indian culture and on plant and animal life. The following account was written by Clark on December 3, 1805:

A fair windey morning wind from the East, the men Sent after an Elk yesterday returnd. with an Elk which revived the Sperits of my men verry much, I am unwell and cannot Eate, the flesh O! how disagreeable my Situation, a plenty of meat and incaple of eateing any— an Indian Canoe Came down with 8 Indians in it from the upper village, I gave a fish hook for a fiew Wap-e-to roots, which I eate in a little Elk Supe, The Indians proceeded on down. wind Contines to blow, and Serjt. Pryor & Gibson who went to hunt yesterday has not returnd. as yet I marked my name & the day of the month and year on a large Pine tree on this Peninsella & by land 'Capt William Clark <November> December 3rd 1805. By Land. U States in 1804 & 1805'—

The expedition secured Clark's career, allowing him a measure of stability. In 1808 he married Julia Hancock; the marriage produced four children. Clark also became an important resource for Jefferson. Dispatched on many missions to the frontier, he advocated consistent and fair treatment of the Indians, a position that was opposed by most settlers and traders.

In 1813 Clark was appointed territorial governor of Missouri, a position that included a commission as brigadier general in the territorial militia and responsibility for maintaining peaceful relations between the Native Americans and the settlers. Pressure for land and massive migration westward negated Clark's policies regarding American Indians and contributed to his defeat in 1820 in the first gubernatorial elections for the new state of Missouri.

From 1820 forward, Clark's career was limited to appointments as superintendent of Indian affairs and surveyor-general for Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas. His first wife died in 1820, and Clark married Harriet Kennerly Radford the following year; this union produced one child. The Clarks returned to the St. Louis area in 1829. Harriet Clark died at the end of 1831; William Clark died September 1, 1838.

Work

Clark, William, and Meriwether Lewis. The Definitive Journals of Lewis & Clark, 12 volumes, edited by Gary E. Moulton and others. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1986–2001.

Sources

Ambrose, Stephen E. Undaunted Courage: Meriwether Lewis, Thomas Jefferson, and the Opening of the American West. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Seefeldt, Douglas, Jeffrey L. Hantman, and Peter S. Onuf, eds. Across the Continent: Jefferson, Lewis and Clark, and the Making of America. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2005.

Steffen, Jerome O. William Clark: Jeffersonian Man on the Frontier. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1977.

Classical Literature

Serving as the core curriculum in England and the colonies, the classics had a direct influence on the development of American literature. William BRADFORD'S HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION, the earliest formal history of the Puritans in New England, borrows directly from several ancient historians, including Herodotus (484–circa 420 B.C.) and Thucydides (460?–circa 404 B.C.), both Greek, and Tacitus (56–circa 120), who was Roman. Bradford wrote about the events of early Puritan settlement as having a great overriding purpose. References to Greek and Roman history were common in the hundreds of PAMPHLETS published during the Revolutionary era. Reflecting the neoclassical taste of the ENLIGHTENMENT, writers in the Revolutionary Era and in the NEW REPUBLIC emulated the balanced, measured style of classical writings. In one pamphlet, A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law (1765), John ADAMS argued that the experiences of ancient Greece and Rome should be used as models of democracy and tyranny. Adams's thorough familiarity with the classics is underscored in his voluminous correspondence, which is liberally spiced with references to Greek and Roman history, drama, and poetry. Similar appeals to the classics can be found in the correspondence and writings of Adams's contemporaries, including Elbridge Gerry (1744–1814), Alexander HAMILTON, Thomas JEFFERSON, and George WASHINGTON.

Greek and Roman history continued to inform American politics after the American Revolution, serving as evidence for FEDERALIST arguments in favor of and ANTI-FEDERALIST arguments in opposition to the CONSTITUTION. Both sides invoked the experience of Greece and Rome—in triumph and decline—as an important lesson for the new American republic.

The classics had an equal influence on drama and poetry during the colonial era and the early Republic. Charles WOODMASON'S poem "Indico" (1757) is a georgic poem—that is, a poem dealing with farming or rural life. "Indico" celebrates and therefore promotes agriculture in South Carolina. The georgic is most often associated with Virgil (70–19 B.C.), whose works include many poems that celebrate agrarian life.

Mercy Otis WARREN, a noted critic and poet from Massachusetts, borrowed directly from the classics in both form and content. Her poetry employed several classical genres, including the elegiac and the epic forms. An example of Warren's classical borrowings can be found in "The Squabble of the Sea Nymphs; or, the Sacrifice of the Tuscaroroes" (1774). Warren skillfully adapts the classical epic and classical mythology to celebrate the Boston Tea Party and at the same time to satirize the British. Like many other authors, Warren made liberal use of classical themes and references in her writings as a form of shorthand to communicate broader and more complex ideas. In The Adulateur (1773), a satirical play, Warren borrowed from Roman history to name her characters, knowing that an educated readership could easily distinguish good from evil.

After the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, American authors responded to independence and the new understanding of nationalism with epic poems intended to legitimize the new republic in a manner commensurate with the republics of Greece and Rome. These authors frequently turned to the epic form employed by Homer (fl. 9th or 8th century B.C.) in the Iliad and Virgil in the Aeneid (circa 30 B.C.). An early example of the American epic can be found in Timothy DWIGHT'S "Columbia" (1783). The most notable of American epic was Joel BARLOW'S The Columbiad (1807). Originally published in 1787 in a shorter version, The Vision of Columbus, Barlow expanded the poem to celebrate the greatness of America, using Christopher COLUMBUS to fill the required role of the hero. In an earlier effort at epic poetry, Barlow, as a member of the CONNECTICUT WITS, had a share in writing The Anarchiad (1786–1787), a satirical attack on French philosophy and on Europe in general.

Classical literature was not, however, limited to authors. The ability to read the classics in their original language and to use them fluently in speech and in writing offered the most direct evidence of education and status. Accordingly, knowledge of the classics was often equated with individual ability and merit. Classical references served not only as a sign of status but also as a secret language in the private conversations and public dialogues of the elite. Participants in elite conversations in the courtroom, legislature, COFFEEHOUSES, and newspapers and at private gatherings frequently referenced classical characters and concepts, quoting liberally from the original Latin and Greek. Listeners signaled their understanding with an appropriate response from the same or some other classical source.

Access to a classical education offered the best foundation for public and private conversation at this level. Access to a private library well equipped with the classics was also vital. In this sense, men dominated conversations that referenced the classics. However, some elite women succeeded in gaining access to this field of knowledge. Anne BRADSTREET's poetry demonstrates a thorough knowledge of the classics, gained largely through independent readings in her father's extensive library. Mercy Otis Warren attended her brother's tutoring sessions in Latin and continued to expand her knowledge of the classics through independent reading.

Source

Shields, John. The American Aeneas: Classical Origins of the American Self. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2001.

Coffeehouses

The coffeehouse provided a gathering place in the towns and cities of early America for merchants and local clientele to conduct business, to debate political issues, and to discuss social events. Modeled after the London coffeehouse, the first one to appear in British America was established in 1638 in Boston. Frequented mostly by men, coffeehouses were considered less raucous than taverns and thus more suited to business transactions. Similar to taverns and social clubs, the coffeehouse encouraged sociability. Ships' captains convened there, and letters were exchanged. As David S. Shields explains, the coffeehouse was "a space devoted to free conversation, sense, and sobriety." In his travel account, Itinerarium (1744), Dr. Alexander HAMILTON describes time spent at "the coffee house" in Philadelphia, and marks the differences between the coffeehouse as a place for conversation and the tavern as a place for dining and drinking. While in New York on September 4, 1744, Hamilton records that he "sauntered about sometime in the coffee house where were some rattling fellows playing att backgammon, and some deeper headed politicians att the game of chess."

Some of the better-known coffeehouses were Philadelphia's Carpenter's Coffeehouse, established by Samuel Carpenter in 1684; Boston's Crown Coffee House, established by Thomas Selby in 1714; Second London Coffeehouse, established in 1753; Philadelphia's Old London Coffee House, established by William Bradford in 1755; New London, Connecticut's City Coffee House, established by Thomas Allen in 1785; New York City's Tontine Coffee House, circa 1792; and Charleston's French Coffeehouse, circa 1800.

Sources

Salinger, Sharon V. Taverns and Drinking in Early America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.

Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Thompson, Peter. Rum Punch and Revolution: Taverngoing and Public Life in Eighteenth-Century Philadelphia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

Colden, Cadwallader (1688–1776) historian

Cadwallader Colden was born February 7, 1688, in Ireland, the son of a Presbyterian minister, and raised in Berwickshire, Scotland. Hoping that Cadwallader would follow in his footsteps, his father sent him to Edinburgh University. There, however, Colden discovered that he preferred medicine to theology, and after his graduation he went to London to continue his studies. In 1710 he moved to Philadelphia, practicing medicine and dabbling in business for the next five years. In 1715 Colden returned to Scotland. When he came back to Philadelphia, he brought his new bride, Alice Christie Colden, with him; the couple had eight children.

In 1718 Colden met and was befriended by New York governor Robert Hunter who encouraged Colden to move to New York, arranging positions for him as master of chancery and surveyor-general. As surveyor-general, Colden was able to travel widely among the region's Native American nations. He found the Mohawk culture particularly intriguing, and he spent much of the early part of the 1720s writing The History of the Five Indian Nations Depending on the Province of New-York in America (1727). As a colonial bureaucrat Colden intended this study to carry political consequences; he hoped to spur both the English officials and the IROQUOIS to recognize that they were natural allies. Toward this end Colden asserted that the Iroquois possessed a social consciousness and political structures that hearkened back to ancient Rome. He also linked Iroquois rhetorical methods to Lockean principles. "Each Nation is an Absolute Republic," Colden declared, and although he thought that the Iroquois suffered from an excess of "that cruel Passion Revenge," he held out the hope that exposure to the English might correct this flaw.

The History of the Five Indian Nations is a valuable resource for details on many aspects of early-eighteenth-century American Indian culture. For example, Colden was one of the first writers to talk about the peculiar circumstances affecting so-called white Indians, those English captives who were ransomed after living among Indian captors for sustained periods. Colden notes, "The English had as much Difficulty to persuade the People, that had been taken Prisoner by the French Indians, to leave the Indian Manner of living, though no People enjoy more Liberty, and live in greater Plenty, than the common inhabitants of New-York do."

Despite his many talents and interests, Colden had a personality that won him few friends and admirers in New York political or social circles. When his career in government ended, he devoted most of his time to a long-standing interest in botanical research, carrying on a correspondence with several noted European scientists, including Swedish botanist and explorer Carolus Linnaeus (1707–1778). Colden also spent time encouraging his daughter Jane's interest in botany; she eventually became a respected botanist in her own right. Colden died September 28, 1776, as the AMERICAN REVOLUTION was beginning.

Work

Colden, Cadwallader. The History of the Five Indian Nations Depending on the Province of New-York in America. New York: Printed by William Bradford, 1727; Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1964; Early American Imprints, 2849.

Sources

Hoermann, Alfred R. Cadwallader Colden: A Figure of the American Enlightenment. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Keys, Alice Mapelsden. Cadwallader Colden: A Representative Eighteenth Century Official. New York: Columbia University Press, 1906; New York: AMS Press, 1967.

Colman, Benjamin (1673–1747) minister, treatise writer, poet

Benjamin Colman was born in Boston on October 19, 1673, the second son of Elizabeth and William Colman. As a child Benjamin was deeply influenced by his pious mother, who encouraged him to pursue a clerical life. He attended the Boston Latin School and HARVARD COLLEGE, receiving his master's degree in 1695. Upon graduation he sailed for England, but he was captured by pirates and imprisoned for several months. Gaining his freedom, Colman arrived at last in England, sick and without funds. Protestant dissenters took him in and found him a pulpit in Bath. He spent four years in England, where he was exposed to the world of poets and artists and instructed in gentility by poet Elizabeth Singer. In 1699 he returned to Boston to become the minister of the Brattle Street Church. On June 8, 1700 he married Jane Clark, and they had two daughters, Jane and Abigail. Two other marriages followed.

Colman enjoyed a long and successful career as a Boston clergyman, bringing an urbane, witty, and eloquent style to the pulpit of the Brattle Street Church. Noted for both his sermons and his work on church doctrine, Colman was, contemporaries reported, "grand and polite" as he read his sermons. Yet, he was a spokesman for a newer, more liberal dissenting tradition in the church. With Thomas Brattle (1658–1713) and other like-minded reformers, he is said to have written The Gospel Order Revived (1700), which introduced such innovations as the baptism of all children, communion to any who desired it, and the election of ministers by all members of the church, including women. This liberal stance earned Colman the enmity of traditionalists such as

Increase MATHER. (Eventually the two camps reconciled, and Colman preached the funeral sermons for both Increase and Cotton MATHER.)

Colman's most famous treatise, Practical Discourses on the Parable of the Ten Virgins (1707), was a 423-page commentary based on the first thirteen verses of Matthew 25, which reviews the main doctrines of Calvinism: preparation, repentance, conversion, election, judgment, and redemption. Rather than dwell on the evils of sin, however, Colman's Practical Discourses focuses on the beauty of Christ and the comforting safe haven he provides for those believers who, "like espoused virgins . . . shall be expecting, desiring, waiting, and preparing for the coming of our Lord." A prolific writer, Colman published nearly ninety works, not only on religious themes but also on patriotism, medical issues, and the value of charity. Written in a plain style, Colman's works are marked by a lyric tone.

Colman's interaction with the literati of English society prompted him to encourage belles lettres in America. He sought to establish polite rather than rowdy masculine conversations and entertainments in public gathering places such as taverns. Combining belles lettres with Christianity, he engaged friends and acquaintances in elegant spiritual discussions in parlors and college classrooms. He wrote what modern literary scholar Sacvan Bercovitch called "poetry of the religious sublime," including A Poem on Elijah's Translation (1707), which had a profound impact on the literary endeavors of the next generation of NEW ENGLAND poets. Yet, he also wrote lighter poems for his children and poems honoring friends such as his old mentor, Elizabeth Singer.

The death of Colman's twenty-seven-year-old daughter, poet Jane Colman TURELL, had a devastating effect on her father. His funeral sermon, Reliquiae Turellae et Lachrymae Paternae (The Father's Tears over his Daughter's Remains) (1735) is a poignant tribute to a young woman whom Colman had encouraged to pursue her literary talents. This tragedy marred the otherwise genial and comfortable life of a man who once quipped that "Melancholy People commonly make drooping Christians." Benjamin Colman died in 1747 at age seventy-three.

Works

Colman, Benjamin. A Poem on Elijah's Translation, Occasioned by the Death of the Reverend and Learned Mr. Samuel Willard. Boston: Printed by B. Green for Benjamin Eliot, 1707; Early American Imprints, 1295, 1329.

Colman. A Discourse on the Incomprehensibleness of God in Four Sermons. Preached at the Lecture in Boston, A.D. 1714. Boston: Printed by B. Green for Samuel Gerrish, 1715; Early American Imprints, 1734.

Colman. Reliquiae Turellae et Lachrymae Paternae; The Father's Tears over his Daughter's Remains: Two Sermons Preach'd at Medford, April 6. Boston: S. Kneeland & T. Green, 1735; Early American Imprints, 3888.

Colman. Practical Discourses on the Parable of the Ten Virgins: Being a Serious Call and Admonition to Watchfulness and Diligence in Preparing for Death and Judgment, second edition. Boston: Printed by Rogers & Fowle, 1747; Early American Imprints, 1602, 5921.

Sources

Toulouse, Teresa. The Art of Prophesying: New England Sermons and the Shaping of Belief. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

Turell, Ebenezer. The Life and Character of the Reverend Benjamin Colman, D.D. Boston: Printed and sold by Rogers & Fowler, 1749; Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1972.

Columbus, Christopher (1451–1506) explorer, chronicler

Christopher Columbus made four voyages to the New World from 1492 to 1502. His journals and letters provide the first glimpse of Anglo-European contact with North America as he explored the Bahamas, Cuba, and Hispaniola (now Haiti and the Dominican Republic). Columbus kept detailed records of his discoveries of the land and plants and of his impressions of and experiences with the Native tribes. Driven by his desire to find a trade route to Asia and by an evangelical desire to spread Catholicism there, he meticulously recorded these moments of initial contact as he described what appeared to him to be a new Eden.

Christopher Columbus's journal from his first voyage, presented to Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand in 1493, is now lost, but what has survived is an account written by Fray Bartolomé de las Casas (1474–1566) in the 1530s. Titled The Diario of Christopher Columbus's First Voyage to America, 1492–1493, the account is an abstraction of Columbus's original, presented as part summary and part quoted material in Castilian with Portuguese spellings or in Latin. The only other existing primary source is a letter from Columbus to the court of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, addressed to Lord Raphael Sanchez, Treasurer, March 15, 1493, in which he writes "It is a desirable land and, once seen, is never to be relinquished; and in it, although of all I have taken possession for their Highnesses and all are more richly supplied than I know or could tell, I hold them all for their Highnesses, which they may dispose of as absolutely as of the realms of Castile." Throughout the Diario, Columbus confirms his belief in the existence of a passage through the landmasses he had discovered. It also shows Columbus as a deeply religious man who hoped to "harvest the souls" as much as the treasures of what he called the New World. The Diario entries are subsequently rich with Catholic imagery, invocations, and devotions.

Columbus wrote of the New World with enthusiasm and hope, describing animals, vegetation, natural resources, and climate with a uniform level of urgency and excitement. Of the Caribbean islands he writes: "[they] are exceedingly fertile . . . surrounded with many bays, spacious, very secure, and surpassing any that I have ever seen." If he sometimes exaggerates, he never fabricates, providing the reader with an honest reaction to the wonders he has seen.

Very little is known about the early life of Christopher Columbus (Cristoforo Colombo or Christóbal Colón). The secrecy surrounding his childhood and background appears to have been created by Columbus himself, although his motives are not clear. Some scholars believe it may have been his desire to hide a Jewish ancestry. Others speculate that he was ashamed of his modest Genoese roots. It is generally accepted that Columbus was born in Genoa in 1451 to Domenico Colombo and his wife, Susanna Fontanarossa. Columbus's father and grandfather were master weavers; his brothers were wool carders. Columbus, who went to sea at the age of fourteen, was largely self-educated.

Columbus was peripatetic in the years before 1480. He lived in Lisbon for a time, earning his living making nautical charts with his brother Bartolomé. He also lived in Madeira, visited equatorial Africa, and frequently returned to Genoa on business. In 1478 he married Felipa Perestrelo e Moniz, daughter of a noble Portuguese family that ruled one of the Madeira Islands. The couple had one son, Diego. Columbus had another son, Fernando, by a mistress.

Columbus read widely in geography, philosophy, theology, and history. His interest in finding a western route to Asia was sparked by Pierre d'Ailly's Imago Mundi and Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini's Historia Rerum Ubique Gestarum as well as the travel accounts of Marco Polo. Although most Europeans knew the world was round, Columbus set for himself the task of harnessing ancient knowledge to calculate the distance of a westward route to the east. In the end, his calculations were dramatically inaccurate.

Efforts to convince John II of Portugal to support a voyage to the East failed. For eight years afterward, Columbus pressed both Spain and Portugal for funding. At last Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain decided to finance Columbus's proposal. He and his crew of ninety departed from Palos, Spain, on August 3, 1492, taking only enough provisions for a voyage based on his erroneous calculations. Almost twelve weeks later, the expedition sighted the island Columbus called San Salvador. After some months of exploration, Christopher Columbus returned triumphantly to Spain, bringing several Native Americans (whom he called "Indians") and a little gold to present to the court. He expected to return the next time with considerably more. Two further voyages, in 1493 and 1498, yielded nothing but disappointments. Indeed, the third expedition ended when colonists at Santo Domingo returned Columbus to Spain in chains. The last voyage began in 1502. By then, Columbus was suffering from malaria and arthritis, yet he spent nine months exploring the coast of Central America, in search of a passageway to Asia. Defeated, he returned to Spain in 1504 and spent his last two years of life pursuing legal claims against the Spanish Crown for failing to deliver the titles and awards he insisted had been promised to him.

Works

- Columbus, Christopher. The Columbus Papers: The Barcelona Letter of 1493, the Landfall Controversy, and the Indian Tribes. Translated by Lucia Graves. New York: Macmillan, 1991.
- Columbus. The Diario of Christopher Columbus's First Voyage to America, 1492–1493. Abstracted by Fray Bartolomé de las Casas; translated by Oliver Dunn and James E. Kelley Jr. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1989.
- Columbus. Journal of the First Voyage of Christopher Columbus, edited and translated by B.W. Ife, Westminster, England: Aris & Phillips, 1990.
- Columbus. The Log of Christopher Columbus. Translated by Robert H. Fuson, Camden, Maine: International Marine Publishing, 1987.
- Columbus. Select Documents Illustrating the Four Voyages of Columbus, Including Those Contained in R.H. Major's Select Letters of Christopher Columbus. Hakluyt Society, Works, Second Series. Nendeln, Liechtenstein: Kraus Reprint, 1967.
- Columbus. The Voyage of Christopher Columbus: Columbus's Own Journal of Discovery, edited and translated by John Cummins. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
- Henige, David. In Search of Columbus: The Sources for the First Voyage. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1991.

Sources

- Kadir, Djelal. Columbus and the Ends of the Earth: Europe's Prophetic Rhetoric as Conquering Ideology. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992.
- Koning, Hans. Columbus: His Enterprise: Exploding the Myth. New York: Monthly Review Press, 1991.
- Morison, Samuel Eliot. Admiral of the Ocean Sea: A Life of Christopher Columbus. Boston: Little, Brown, 1942.
- Sale, Kirkpatrick. The Conquest of Paradise: Christopher Columbus and the Columbian Legacy. New York: Knopf, 1990.
- Traboulay, David M. Columbus and Las Casas: The Conquest and Christianization of America, 1492–1566. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1994.

Commonplace Book

A commonplace book is a personal collection of quotations and ideas from notable works of prose or verse for memorization, inspiration, or education. From their origins in ancient Greece and Rome, commonplace books were organized under different classification systems and given various headings. During the Renaissance, Desiderius Erasmus (1466?–1536), and in the Enlightenment, John Locke (1632–1704), each developed methods for commonplaceing. In eighteenth-century America, Thomas JEFFERSON kept extensive commonplace books divided into the topics “legal” and “literary,” in which, according to the Library of Congress, Jefferson wrote “extracted quotations from a wide variety of books that were either assigned by his teachers or that caught his inquiring eye.” Other well-known commonplace books include those of William BYRD II, which covers events from 1721 to 1726, and John Leacock (1729–1802). Intended for personal use, commonplace books were not printed or sold. Instead, they served as important collections for memorabilia and family history and were often given away as gifts. Women's commonplace books from early America provide an especially rich source of primary materials that were not otherwise printed. For example, Milcah Martha MOORE's commonplace book included 126 entries by sixteen authors, many of whom were women, and Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON's commonplace book included poems by Susanna Wright (1697–1784) and Hannah GRIFFITHS and prose entries, some of which were copied from Fergusson's own travel journal from a trip to England (1765).

Sources

- Havens, Earle. Commonplace Books: A History of Manuscripts and Printed Books from Antiquity to the Twentieth Century. New Haven, Conn.: Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library, 2001.
- Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Congregationalism

Congregationalism involves a church structure in which members elect officers, rather than have them appointed. The PILGRIMS who migrated in 1620 to Plymouth in the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY established the first congregations in America. Each congregation was to be self-governing and independent, without bishops and presbyteries. Congregationalism evolved further in 1648 when the Cambridge Platform, which established principles of church government and discipline, was approved. In 1708 the passage of the Saybrook Platform by Connecticut Congregationists allowed for a more centralized church government.

Congregationalism contributed significantly to the evangelical movement during the GREAT AWAKENING.

Sources

- Bercovitch, Sacvan. The Puritan Origins of the American Self. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975.
- Bremer, Francis J. The Puritan Experiment: New England Society from Bradford to Edwards. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1976.
- Conforti, Joseph A. Saints and Strangers: New England in British North America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.

Valeri, Mark R. Law and Providence in Joseph Bellamy's New England: The Origins of the New Divinity in Revolutionary America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Connecticut Wits

During the 1780s, a group of Hartford writers, all Yale graduates, began collaborating on verse and prose works addressing various local controversies. Initially called “The Wicked Wits,” the group (also called the Hartford Wits) was dedicated to modernizing the Yale curriculum and declaring the autonomy of American letters. In the end, the Wits’ NEW ENGLAND heritage made them considerably conservative intellectually and spiritually; they rejected both egalitarianism and DEISM, remaining Calvinist in their beliefs and elitist in their politics.

The members, including John TRUMBULL, Joel BARLOW, Timothy DWIGHT, Richard Alsop (1761–1815), and David HUMPHREYS, hoped to reform the Yale college curriculum, which, as Trumbull noted, promoted an uncritical worship of the classics. In part one of his The Progress of Dulness (1772) Trumbull urged:

*Give ancient arts their real due,
Explain their faults, and beauties too;
Teach where to imitate, and mend,
And point their uses and their end.*

The Wits’ main goal, however, was to produce poetry that advanced America’s literary independence from England by taking as its subject American history and society. Composed in rhymed couplets, and favoring iambic tetrameter, the group’s patriotic verses are typified by Trumbull’s M’Fingal (1775), which satirized the LOYALISTS of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. But the Wits’ patriotism did not embrace an expansion of democracy, and M’Fingal contains as many diatribes against the mob as it does against the Loyalists. Similarly, the Wits condemned the threat of social leveling implicit in SHAYS’S REBELLION in Massachusetts in 1786. David Humphreys expressed the Wits’ contempt for the entrance of ordinary men into politics or poetry:

*Who cannot write, yet handles pens,
Are apt to hurt themselves and friends,
Though others use them well, yet fools
Should never meddle with edge tools.*

John Trumbull, author of M’Fingal, which ridiculed British Loyalists

Economic as well as social traditionalists, the Wits opposed capitalist developments such as factories and endorsed a vision of an industrious, contented agricultural society. Only Barlow developed a more liberal political and poetical stance, eventually supporting the French Revolution and praising the new tenets of free enterprise.

The Connecticut Wits’ most notable collaboration was a mock-heroic epic, The Anarchiad: A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Substantial Night (1786–1787), directed against Daniel Shays and the general political unrest that followed the war. It was published as a “series of satiric papers on American antiquities,” as Leon Howard describes it, “based upon the ‘discovery’ of an ancient prophetic manuscript.” The Anarchiad also warned against the chaos that would envelop the new nation if the strong central government envisioned by the FEDERALISTS was not established. In The Echo (1791–1805), the Wits satirized contemporary newspaper style and what they saw as the dangerous ideals of the French Revolution.

Works

Alsop, Richard, and Theodore Dwight. The Echo, with Other Poems. New York: Printed at the Porcupine Press by Pasquin Petronius, 1807; Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Literature House, 1970.

Franklin, Benjamin, comp. The Poetry of the Minor Connecticut Wits, edited by Benjamin Franklin V. Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars’ Facsimiles and Reprints, 1970.

Franklin, comp. The Prose of the Minor Connecticut Wits, 3 volumes, edited by Benjamin Franklin V. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars’ Facsimiles and Reprints, 1974.

following curious Piece of Antiquity may afford innocent diversion to those who understand it.

1.

AND it came to pass on the third day of the tenth month, that there went forth a decree from Naphtali the son of Zebulon, that all the captives throughout his dominions should depart for a little season, into the land of their nativity, to buy themselves some bread.

2.

For it was so, that in the days of Naphtali, there was no bread in all that country round about, insomuch that there was a famine throughout all the land of Naphtali.

3.

Now Naphtali was a great man and eat much bread, insomuch that the famine was very sore.

4.

Moreover there were beans in great abundance in that land; so that Naphtali said, peradventure my captives that are in this land, will eat the beans thereof.

5.

Howbeit, the captives were accustomed to eat beans in their own country; therefore they murmured against the hand of their master, saying, give us some bread.

6.

Wherefore Naphtali assembled all the sons of his captivity, and lift up his voice in the midst of them, and said, O ye sons of my captivity here ye the words of Naphtali.

7.

Forasmuch as the famine is sore in the land, insomuch there is hardly bread enough for me and my household:

8.

Wherefore ye sons of the captivity of Naphtali, behold you may return to your houses in the land of your nativity, where ye can get some bread, lest ye die.

9.

Nevertheless when ye shall hear the voice of my decree in the land of your fathers, saying unto you return into the land of Naphtali.

10.

Then it shall come to pass, that ye shall return and sojourn again in the land of captivity.

Thus was it done according to all the words of Naphtali.

January, 16, 1777

Portrait of Timothy Dwight by his brother-in-law, William Dunlop, while Dwight was a student at Yale. Reverend Dwight later became president of Yale College.

Parrington, Vernon Louis, ed. The Connecticut Wits. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1926.

Humphreys, David, Joel Barlow, John Trumbull, and others. The Anarchiad: A New England Poem . . ., edited in 1861 by Luther G. Riggs. New Haven: Published by Thomas H. Pease, 1861; Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1967.

Trumbull, John. The Poetical Works of John Trumbull . . . Containing M'Fingal. . . Hartford: Printed for Samuel G. Goodrich, by Lincoln & Stone, 1820.

Sources

Dowling, William C. Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990.

Horton, James D. The Connecticut Wits: A Brief Sketch of the Lives and Works of Timothy Dwight, Joel Barlow, and John Trumbull. Hartford, Conn.: Privately printed, 1931.

Recommended Writings

The Anarchiad: A New England Poem (1786–1787)

Barlow

The Prospect of Peace (1778)

Poem, Spoken at the Public Commencement at Yale College (1781)

The Vision of Columbus (1787)

The Hasty-Pudding (1793)

The Columbiad (1807)

Advice to a Raven in Russia (1812)

Dwight

"America: Or, a Poem on the Settlement of the British Colonies; Addressed to Friends of Freedom, and Their Country" (1780)

The Conquest of Canaan; a Poem, in Eleven Books (1785)

The Triumph of Infidelity (1788)

Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts (1794)

Trumbull

His Father and Mother Said of Him; How He Went to College, and What He Learned There . . . How Afterwards He Became a Great Man and Wore a Wig; and How Any Body Else May Do the Same. . . (1772)

The Progress of Dulness. . . (1773)

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem, in Four Cantos (1782)

Studying the Connecticut Wits

For a general background on the Connecticut Wits, see Leon Howard's The Connecticut Wits (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1943); Everett H. Emerson's American Literature, 1764–1789: The Revolutionary Years (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1977); Emory Elliott's Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic 1725–1810 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982); and William C. Dowling's Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990).

Students interested in studying the individual poets, see for Joel BARLOW, James Woodress's A Yankee's Odyssey: The Life of Joel Barlow (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1958) and Lewis Ford's Joel Barlow (New York: Twayne, 1971). For research on Timothy DWIGHT, see Kenneth Silverman's Timothy Dwight (New York: Twayne, 1969) and Colin Wells's The Devil and Doctor Dwight: Satire and Theology in the Early American Republic (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002). For John TRUMBULL, see Alexander Cowie's John Trumbull, Connecticut Wit (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1936); Victor E. Gimmestad's John Trumbull (New York: Twayne, 1974); and Irma B. Jaffe's John Trumbull, Patriot-Artist of the American Revolution (Boston: New York Graphic Society, 1975).

Constitution (1789)

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

Thus begins the document that established America's present form of government. The origins of the Constitution lay in the failure of the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION to establish a viable form of government for the thirteen states. The failure of the Articles to convey to Congress the ability to regulate commerce or raise taxes without the voluntary assent of the states made it impossible to provide for national defense or end interstate commercial conflict, which kept the economy stagnant after the end of the Revolutionary War.

A stagnant economy, the weakness of Congress in the face of SHAYS'S REBELLION, and Native American resistance to Western settlers in 1786 all combined to generate an interest among the states for a reworking of the Articles of Confederation. An initial meeting, the Annapolis Convention, held in September 1786, was a failure, attracting only New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Congress endorsed a subsequent meeting in Philadelphia in May 1787, however, to which all the states except Rhode Island sent delegates.

The Constitutional Convention quickly agreed to abandon the Articles of Confederation and draft a new plan of government. Several plans were put forward. The Virginia Plan called for legislative representation in both houses of Congress to be based on population. This satisfied only the larger states. The New Jersey Plan, which called for equal representation among the states, was the primary hope of the smaller states. Its fiercest proponent, Luther Martin of Maryland, declared that the "states have a right to an equality of representation. This is secured to us by our present articles of confederation; we are in possession of this right." Roger Sherman of Connecticut eventually proposed equal representation in the Senate and proportional representation in the House of Representatives; that proposal was, in turn, amended to stipulate that slaves counted as three-fifths of a person for these purposes.

With regard to slavery and commerce, northern and southern states reached a compromise in which the North allowed the continuation of the slave trade for twenty years and the South agreed to a simple majority instead of a two-thirds majority in the regulation of commerce. The major concerns of the South were the protection of slavery and the protection of export trade from federal taxes.

As a result of these compromises and others, the delegates approved a new Constitution on September 17, 1787 and submitted it to the Confederation Congress. The congress was to submit the new document for ratification by special conventions in each state. Ratification by nine states would establish the new government. On December 3, 1787, Delaware was the first to vote yes. New Hampshire became the ninth to accept the Constitution, on June 21, 1788. Rhode Island was the last to ratify, on May 29, 1790. Between Delaware's ratification and New Hampshire's, the crucial battle between the Constitution's supporters, the FEDERALISTS, and its opponents, the ANTI-FEDERALISTS, was waged. Anti-federalists feared the overarching power of the federal government and demanded a Bill of Rights to protect individual liberties. Some Anti-federalists also feared the loss of state power, either from personal motives or from a sincere belief that the states offered the most representative level of government.

Popular support for the Constitution was increased in late 1787 when Alexander HAMILTON, John JAY, and James MADISON published a series of letters justifying it. These letters eventually became known as THE FEDERALIST. One of the most effective of these political essays was Madison's essay number 10, which argued that

Among the numerous advantages promised by a well constructed Union, none deserves to be more accurately developed than its tendency to break and control the violence of faction. . . . The smaller the society, the fewer probably will be the distinct parties and interests composing it; the fewer the distinct parties and interests, the more frequently will a majority be found of the same party; and the smaller the number of individuals composing a majority, and the smaller the compass within which they are placed, the more easily will they concert and execute their plans of oppression. Extend the sphere, and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests; you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of other citizens; or if such a common motive exists, it will be more difficult for all who feel it to discover their own strength, and to act in unison with each other. . . .

After the Constitution became law, Madison worked to amend it with the inclusion of a bill of rights, which many states had made a condition of their ratification. By December 1791 the first ten amendments that became known as the Bill of Rights had acquired the approval of three-fourths of the state legislatures and became law.

Briefly, the Constitution included the following foundational points. Article 1 established the House of Representatives, the Senate, term limits, and introduced the vice president as leader of the Senate. It also explained how bills became law and detailed the specific powers of Congress. The most important Congressional powers were "to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defense and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; . . ." Congress could also regulate commerce, coin money, and prohibit the states from making their own money or declaring war. Article 2 created the executive branch of government, provided for its election, and defined the powers of the president. Among those powers was the right to serve as commander in chief of the armed forces, to make treaties, and to nominate judges, all with the approval of the Senate. Article 3 established the judiciary, with the Supreme Court as the highest court of the land, and set the terms of judges and defined the crime of treason. Article 4 ensured that all states respected each other's laws and that citizens would be treated equally in all states. It established the rules of admission for new states and ensured a republican form of government in each new state.

Article 5 detailed the amendment process. Article 6 ensured that the United States would assume all debts entered into by the United States under the Articles of Confederation and that the Constitution was the supreme law of the country. Article 7 detailed the ratification procedure for the Constitution.

The Bill of Rights ensured that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.” It also declared that “A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.” It provided that no person could be held for a serious crime without a grand-jury indictment, and guaranteed a speedy trial. Finally, the Bill of Rights states that “the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.”

Sources

- Beard, Charles. An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States. New York: Macmillan, 1913; Union, N.J.: Lawbook Exchange, 2001.
- Beeman, Richard, Stephen Botein, and Edward C. Carter II, eds. Beyond Confederation: Origins of the Constitution and American National Identity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.
- Main, Jackson Turner. The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution, 1781–1788. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1961.
- Morris, Richard B. The Forging of the Union, 1781–1789. New York: Harper & Row, 1987.
- Vile, John R. A Companion to the United States Constitution and Its Amendments. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1993.

The Contrast by Royall Tyler (1790) play

Written and produced in 1787, Royall TYLER’s The Contrast, A Comedy in Five Acts was the first play written by an American to be professionally produced in America. The Contrast emphasizes American simplicity over British pretense. The cast includes: Jonathan, a rustic Yankee; Colonel Henry Manly, a virtuous, Revolutionary War veteran; Billy Dimple, an English dandy; Maria, a sentimental heroine; Letitia, a light-headed female; Van Rough, Maria’s father and a man of practicality; and other contrasting characters. The characters’ humorous interaction juxtaposes the honest, simple ways of Americans and the corruption and indulgence of the British. The Contrast opened April 16, 1787, at the John Street Theatre to successful reviews, particularly regarding the performance of Thomas Wignell (1753–1803) as Jonathan. Unusual for its day, The Contrast was performed four times in one month.

Source

- Richards, Jeffrey H. Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Tyler, Royall. The Contrast. Philadelphia: Prichard & Hall, 1790.

Cook, Ebenezer (circa 1667–circa 1732) merchant, poet

*The Planter old did thus me greet:
 “Whether you come from Goal or Colledge,
 “You’re welcome to my certain Knowledge;
 “And if you please all Night to stay,
 “My Son shall put you in the way.
 Which offer I most kindly took,
 And for a Seat did round me look. . . .*
 —The Sot-Weed Factor (1708)

Ebenezer Cook (or Cooke) was probably born in London around 1667, but the exact date and place of his birth are unknown. His parents, Andrew and Anne Bowyer Cooke, were married in London on August 1, 1665. While the details of Cook’s early life are not known, records indicate that he received a good education in England, entered the mercantile business in London, and, like his father, became a tobacco factor (merchant). The first known record of Cook in colonial America places him in Maryland around 1694, where he assisted his father in the tobacco trade at “Cook’s Point” on the Choptank River in Maryland. He also practiced law while in Maryland and served as a land agent from around 1720 to 1722. In 1726 Cook was influential in bringing a viable printing press to Maryland when he convinced London printer William Parks to set up a shop in Annapolis.

Parks printed several of Cook’s poems, the most famous of which was The Sot-Weed Factor: Or, a Voyage to Maryland (1708). In the poem Cook draws upon both his plantation and his mercantile experience, as he satirizes the unrealistic expectations of a naïve, impoverished British sot-weed factor (tobacco merchant) who journeys to Maryland with hopes of instant fortune. The main character reluctantly embarks for America: “I took my leave of Albion’s Rocks: / With heavy Heart. . . .” He is then portrayed throughout the poem as one of the Englishmen who has fancied himself superior to the rustic colonial farmer—but who is far less sophisticated than he might have wished.

Each of the 712 lines of The Sot-Weed is composed of eight syllables and follows an unstressed/stressed rhythm, and every two lines rhyme. This form, with its meter of iambic tetrameter in rhyming couplets, is known as Hudibrastic verse, named for British poet Samuel Butler (1612–1680) whose Hudibras (1663–1678) satirized Puritanism. Hudibrastic verse adopts a mock epic tone, uses grotesque imagery, and burlesques characters to mock their self-important or naïve attitudes. J. A. Leo Lemay describes how “the ludicrous rhymes and breathless, awkward, iambic tetrameter rhythm compliment the satirical, exaggerated, outraged, and burlesque tone” of Cook’s “double-edged satire” that critiques both the American and the Englishman. Cook even signed his name as the poet laureate of Maryland as a further indication of his playful style.

Cook’s portrait of a “disgruntled merchant adventurer,” as Robert D. Arner describes the poem’s main character, is also a commentary on the greed associated with the New World. After a series of encounters with American colonists, Native Americans, and other merchants, the beleaguered sot-weed factor is exploited and cheated and returns to England humiliated and disillusioned:

*Raging with Grief, full speed I ran,
To joyn the Fleet at Kicketan;
Embarqu’d and waiting for a Wind,
I left this dreadful Curse behind.*

The Sot-Weed Factor offers a lively, critical view of early America from a planter’s and a merchant’s point of view, while also illustrating the style of satire that was popular in Cook’s day. Cook’s Sotweed Redivivus: Or the Planters Looking-Glass, with 540 lines separated into three Cantos (or sections), was printed by William Parks in 1730. Also written in Hudibrastic verse, this poem’s sot-weed factor focuses his ire on a generally degrading state of business, agriculture, and morality, particularly associated with slavery, as he both criticizes and advises his audience.

Cook also wrote memorial poems in the elegiac style. In “An ELOGY on the Death of Thomas Bordley, Esq.” (October 1726) and “An Elegy on the Death of the Honorable Nicholas Lowe” (December 24, 1728) Cook combined an elegiac tone with a critical view of his subject. In 1731 Cook’s “The History of Colonel Nathaniel Bacon’s Rebellion in Virginia” was printed in The Maryland Muse. This 442-line poem recounts the battles waged by Colonel Nathaniel Bacon’s militia against the British governor Sir William Berkeley in 1676. As with the more popular The Sot-Weed Factor, Cook portrays colonial America as a dangerous, immoral place with criminals and scoundrels waiting to take advantage of the unsuspecting and the innocent.

Cook’s last poems, dated 1732, “An Elegy on the Death of the Honourable William Lock, Esq.” and “In Memory of the Honble Benedict Leonard Calvert Esqr. Lieutenant Governor in the Province of Maryland” follow the tradition of the elegy, honoring the virtues of their subjects and assuring their future resting-places. Records of Ebenezer Cook fall away after 1732, the probable year of his death.

Works

The Sot-Weed Factor, Or a Voyage to Maryland . . . by Eben. Cook,
Gent. London: B. Bragg, 1708.

Sotweed Redivivus: Or the Planters Looking-Glass . . . by E. C.
Gent. Annapolis: Printed by William Parks, 1730; Early American Imprints, 3266.

Sources

Lemay, J. A. Leo. Men of Letters in Colonial Maryland. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1972.

Shields, David S. Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

The Coquette; or, the History of Eliza Wharton

by Hannah Webster Foster (Boston: Samuel Etheridge, 1797) novel

The Coquette; or, the History of Eliza Wharton is a SENTIMENTAL NOVEL written as a series of seventy-four letters that trace the seduction of Eliza Wharton. Correspondents discuss Eliza’s decision to dismiss the attentions of the conservative, steady Reverend Boyer in favor of the exciting Peter Sanford. The novel emphasizes themes about marriage, women’s education, virtue, and happiness, and as with other “seduced and abandoned” novels, asks the reader to ponder Eliza Wharton’s situation and to consider education and a virtuous life to be more wholesome alternatives. The Coquette is thought to be based on the real-life tragedy of poet Elizabeth Whitman, who died after giving birth to a stillborn child at the Bell Tavern in Danvers, Massachusetts, as reported in the Salem Mercury on July 29, 1788.

Sources

Barnes, Elizabeth. States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.

Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Cotton, John (1584–1652) minister

We entered into a covenant with the Lord, and one with another, to follow after the Lord in the purity of his worship.

—The Way of Congregational Churches Cleared (1648)

John Cotton was the first “teacher” at the First Church of Boston and NEW ENGLAND’s leading intellectual. He is well known as both a preacher and a writer. Cotton played a crucial role in the development and justification of the New England Way of the Congregational Church in the early years of the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY and was thus important in the formation of early Puritan culture.

Born December 4, 1584, in Derby, Derbyshire, England, Cotton was the son of Roland Cotton, a lawyer, and Mary Hurlbert. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, at age eighteen and was a fellow at Emmanuel College until 1612. He served as vicar of St. Botolph’s Church in Lincolnshire from 1612 until his departure for New England in 1633. He married Elisabeth Horrocks in 1613; had no children. Elisabeth died in 1631, and in 1632 he married Sarah Hawkrigge Story, by whom he had six children.

Cotton's interest in the New World can be traced to a sermon, Gods Promise to His Plantation, which he wrote in 1630 for the founding members of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. In the sermon, he expressed his belief in the special destiny of the colony: "The placing of a people in this or that country is from the appointment of the Lord. . . . Where there is a vacant place, there is liberty for the sons of Adam or Noah to come and inhabit, though they neither buy it nor ask their leaves. . . ." This firm belief in the right to colonize, combined with the mounting pressure in England for religious conformity, led Cotton to immigrate to New England. Soon after his arrival he was appointed the first teacher of the First Church of Boston. His fame came, however, through his publications. Early sermons include The Way of Life (1641), Christ the Fountain of Life (1651), An Exposition upon the Thirteenth Chapter of the Revelation (1655), and The Powring Out of the Seven Vials (1642).

From 1636 to 1638 Cotton became involved in a religious conflict known as the Antinomian controversy (see ANTINOMANISM). The Antinomians dismissed the importance of good works as evidence of salvation and argued that individuals could acquire God's grace without the help of ministers. Although Cotton was opposed by most ministers and government officials, he survived the controversy by distinguishing his own views from the "blasphemous" views of the Antinomians in a publication titled A Conference Mr. Cotton Held at Boston (1646). His New Covenant (1654) also outlined his views on Antinomianism, and he made a final response to his critics in The Way of Congregational Churches Cleared (1648).

Cotton was a leading spokesman for the Congregational Church, its governance procedures, and its theology. The True Constitution of a Particular Visible Church, Proved by Scripture (1642) and The Way of the Churches of Christ in New-England (1645) provided detailed descriptions of how New England CONGREGATIONALISM worked and the roles of the colonists within the church.

Cotton engaged in an exchange with Roger WILLIAMS, who was banished from the colony in 1635 for his belief in the separation of church and state. Williams's THE BLOODY TENENT OF PERSECUTION (1644), Cotton's reply The Bloody Tenent, Washed, and Made White in the Bloud of the Lambe (1647), and Williams's final rejoinder The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody (1652) are key works addressing the controversy. Throughout, Cotton argues that a public dissenter at odds with the generally held views of the community should expect to be punished.

Cotton died December 23, 1652, in Boston. He was the first of many influential ministers within a family that included Cotton MATHER, his grandson, and Increase MATHER, his son-in-law.

Works

Cotton, John. Gods Promise to His Plantations. London: Printed by W. Jones for J. Bellamy, 1634; Boston: Printed by Samuel Green, 1686; Early American Imprints, 402.

Cotton. The Bloody Tenent, Washed, and Made White in the Bloud of the Lambe. London: Printed by M. Symmons for H. Allen, 1647; New York: Arno, 1972.

Cotton. The Correspondence of John Cotton, edited by Sargent Bush Jr. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Sources

Emerson, Everett. John Cotton, revised edition. Boston: Twayne, 1965, 1990.

Hall, David D., ed. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1968; second edition, edited by David D. Hall. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.

Webster, Tom. Godly Clergy in Early Stuart England: The Caroline Puritan Movement, 1620–1643. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Ziff, Larzer. The Career of John Cotton: Puritanism and the American Experience. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1962.

Ziff. John Cotton on the Churches of New England. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1968.

Crèvecoeur, J. Hector St. John de (1735–1813) essayist

We are all animated with a spirit of an industry which is unfettered and unrestrained, because each person works for himself. . . . We have no princes for whom we toil, starve, and bleed; we are the most perfect society now existing in the world. Here man is free as he ought to be, nor is this pleasing equality so transitory as many others are.

—Letters from an American Farmer (1782)

J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur was one of the first writers to investigate the notion of the American Dream. In Letters from an American Farmer (1782), Crèvecoeur provides information about the New World, describes American religious diversity, and celebrates American innocence and plainness while trying to answer the important question, What is an American? It was largely due to his description of the wonderful productiveness of the land that several hundred of his countrymen immigrated to America. But as D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930) once wrote of Crèvecoeur, "was more concerned with a perfect society and his own manipulation thereof, than with growing carrots." It is as an early theorist of American life that Crèvecoeur is recognized today.

J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur was born Michel-Guillaume Jean de Crèvecoeur in Caen, France, in 1731. At the age of nineteen he moved to England and from there, in 1755, he immigrated to Canada, serving in the military during the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR. In 1769, he settled on a farm in Orange County, New York. In 1780, in the midst of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, Crèvecoeur attempted to return to France to resolve some of his business affairs, but the British arrested him on suspicion of being a spy. After several months of imprisonment, he was freed and allowed to sail for his homeland. Three years later Crèvecoeur came back to America and served as the French consul in New York City. During his time there, he assisted local Catholics in the founding of St. Peter's, the first Catholic church in the city. In 1790 Crèvecoeur returned once more to France, where he remained until his death in 1813.

In 1782 Crèvecoeur published a collection of twelve essays reflecting on the nature of American society. Part fable, part travel narrative, history, and fiction, Letters from an American Farmer is presented as a series of letters from James the Farmer to a fictional recipient in Europe, Mr. F. B. In these letters, James describe the land, peoples, and industry, from the northern, middle, and southern colonies, into the western territories. Although the Letters were widely read by his European audience, they were virtually unread by eighteenth-century Americans.

The idealized images of America that were presented in the letters resonated strongly with associations of an ideal democracy. In letter three, "What Is an American?" Crèvecoeur expresses his open admiration for the American settlers whose industry transformed the Atlantic coastline into "fair cities, substantial villages, extensive fields, an immense country filled with decent houses, good roads, orchards, meadows, and bridges where an hundred years ago all was wild, woody, and uncultivated!" The men and women who worked this transformation, says Crèvecoeur, created more than a new landscape and a thriving economy; they created a new society. "Here," he notes, are "no aristocratical families, no courts, no kings, no bishops, no ecclesiastical dominion, no invisible power giving to a few a very visible one. . . . The rich and the poor are not so far removed from each other as they are in Europe." From a mix of "English, Scotch, Irish, French, Dutch, Germans, and Swedes" a new culture has emerged; "What, then, is the American, this new man?" Crèvecoeur asks his reader:

He is either an European or the descendent of an European; hence that strange mixture of blood, which you will find in no other country. . . . He is an American, who, leaving behind him all his ancient prejudices and manners, receives new ones from the new mode of life he has embraced, the new government he obeys, and the new rank he holds. . . . Here individuals of all nations are melted into a new race of men, whose labors and posterity will one day cause great changes in the world.

Crèvecoeur's image of the American melting pot has been perpetuated in American literature and political rhetoric. Crèvecoeur's Letters promoted the image of America as an egalitarian asylum founded on agrarian ideals.

Works

Crèvecoeur, J. Hector St. John de. Letters from an American Farmer, edited by Susan Manning. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 1997; Early American Imprints, 25357, 33582.

Crèvecoeur. Letters from an American Farmer; and, Sketches of Eighteenth-Century America, edited by Albert E. Stone. Harmondsworth, U.K. & New York: Penguin, 1981.

Crèvecoeur. More Letters from the American Farmer: An Edition of the Essays in English Left Unpublished by Crèvecoeur, edited by Dennis D. Moore. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995.

Sources

Allen, Gay Wilson, and Roger Asselineau. St. John de Crèvecoeur: The Life of an American Farmer. New York: Viking, 1987.

Kunkle, Julia Post Mitchell. St. Jean de Crèvecoeur. New York: Columbia University Press, 1916.

Crocker, Hannah Mather (1752–1829) historian, letter writer, essayist

America though as yet but young in the arts and sciences, will not long remain in the back ground, as she can now claim the birthright of many respectable female writers, both in prose and verse.

—Chapter IV, Observations on the Real Rights of Women (1818)

Hannah Mather Crocker wrote on the importance of women's education, anticipating the start of the women's rights movement in the NEW REPUBLIC. Born June 27, 1752 in Boston, Massachusetts, to Samuel Mather and Hannah Hutchinson Mather, Hannah was a descendent of the famous Mather family, with Richard MATHER, Increase MATHER, and Cotton MATHER as her paternal grandfathers. Hannah Mather married Joseph Crocker in 1779, and the couple had ten children. As an historian and advocate of women's rights and education, Crocker drew upon contemporary models to situate women's heritage within biblical and heroic traditions. In a style that resembles a collection of excerpts, as in a COMMONPLACE BOOK, Crocker inserts frequent passages from scripture and other sources to build her argument that an educated, fairly treated woman will benefit society as a whole and enhance its virtuous state. Crocker's first printed work, A Series of Letters on Free Masonry (1815), was a defense of the Society of Freemasons, particularly for their support of women's education. As Constance J. Post explains, Crocker was the "founder of a female Masonic society in the year before her marriage." Hannah Mather Crocker died July 11, 1829 in Roxbury, Massachusetts.

Works

Crocker, Hannah Mather. A Series of Letters on Free Masonry. Boston: Printed by John Eliot, 1815; Early American Imprints, second series, 34477, 35899.

Crocker. The School of Reform, or Seaman's Safe Pilot to the Cape of Good Hope. Boston: Printed by John Eliot, 1816; Early American Imprints, second series, 37362.

Crocker. Observations on the Real Rights of Women, with Their Appropriate Duties, Agreeable to Scripture, Reason and Common Sense. Boston: Printed for the author, 1818.

Source

Harris, Sharon M. Women's Early American Historical Narratives. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la (circa 1648–1695) poet, playwright

To the degree that one is chosen as the target for acclaim, to that same measure, envy trails in close pursuit, with perfect aim.

—“Number 48: In Reply to a Gentleman from Peru, Who Sent Her Clay Vessels While Suggesting She Would Better Be a Man” (1670)

Born Juana Ramírez de Asbaje, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz wrote poetry and plays that addressed topics such as gender, class, and spirituality. Exact dates regarding the life of Sor Juana are uncertain; some biographers date her birth from 1648, while others place it in 1651. Most agree that she was born in November in San Miguel de Nepantla, Mexico, to Pedro Manuel de Asbaje, a Basque landowner, and Isabel Ramírez, a criolla, native-born of Spanish ancestry. Sor Juana's baptism took place on December 2, and she was registered as “a daughter of the church” because her parents were not formally married. She learned to read at the age of three and became proficient in Latin as a child. Sor Juana was frequently admonished for reading books in her grandfather's library, a large collection of Pedro Ramírez de Santillana. In 1661 she moved to Mexico City, and from 1664 to 1666 she served as a lady-in-waiting of the marquesa de Mancera in the viceroy's palace. While at court, Sor Juana's intellectual knowledge was publicly examined by forty of the most knowledgeable men, a demonstration that reinforced her extraordinary intellect.

On August 14, 1667 Sor Juana took the veil of the convent of the Discalced Carmelites of St. Joseph. Although she left on November 18 due to an illness, she entered the convent of the Order of San Jeronimo on February 24, 1669, at the age of twenty-one and remained there until her death. Sor Juana Inés's decision to become a nun was measured against a secular alternative:

I became a nun because although I knew the religious state in life had many things (I mean the accessory things, not the formal ones) that were repugnant to my nature, nevertheless, owing to my total disinclination to marriage, it was the most fitting and suitable state I could elect, anxious as I was to assure my salvation.

This passage comes from Sor Juana's epistolary autobiography, Repuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz (Response, Answer, or Reply, in the English title). In this series of letters Sor Juana writes to a fictitious Sor Filotea, a pseudonym taken up by the Bishop of Puebla, Don Manuel Fernandez, who had responded to Sor Juana's critique of a sermon. The Reply exemplifies two of the main tenets reflected in Sor Juana's life, according to Gerard Flynn: “her own inclination towards letters and women's freedom to cultivate them.” Though she is clearly disciplined and self-motivated, Sor Juana regrets not having the chance to study in a school setting with others: “My only teacher was a mute book, my only fellow student an inkwell without feeling.”

In 1692 the letters were circulated and read in manuscript and received various responses. Some praised her literary skills, while others, such as her confessor, Antonio Núñez de Miranda, disapproved. In addition to being known for her letters, Sor Juana was renowned in her day as a poet and a scholar. Between 1669 and 1690 she built up a library of four thousand volumes. As Susan Castillo explains, Sor Juana's “literary production was extensive and diverse,” and she was particularly skilled in the loa, “a brief preface, often written in dialogue, to a morality play or comedy, which serves the function of introducing themes of a longer play.” For her poetry she was honorably referred to as “the Phoenix of Mexico” and “the Tenth Muse.”

Following the circulation of the Reply in the late 1600s, Sor Juana renounced all of her possessions, sold her musical and scientific instruments and her vast library, and gave the money to the poor. In her remaining years, she was devoted to the church and to self-examination. Sor Juana died in Mexico City while attending to elderly nuns during an epidemic. She received the last sacraments on April 17, 1695.

Works

Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la. The Answer / La Respuesta: Including a Selection of Poems, edited and translated by Electa Arenal and Amanda Powell. New York: Feminist Press, 1994.

Cruz. Poems, Protest, and a Dream, translated by Dorothy Sayers Peden. New York: Penguin, 1997.

Sources

Castillo, Susan. Colonial Encounters in New World Writing, 1500–1786: Performing America. London & New York: Routledge, 2006.

Flynn, Gerard. Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Merrim, Stephanie. Early Modern Women's Writing and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1999.

Cable, George Washington (1844–1925) short story writer, novelist, historian

Père Jerome: “Why did they make that law? Well, they made it to keep the two races separate.”

Madame Delphine: “They do not want to keep us separated; no, no! But they do want to keep us despised!”

—From “Madame Delphine,” in Old Creole Days (1883)

Born in New Orleans, George Washington Cable joined the Confederate army at age eighteen in 1862 and served until the end of the CIVIL WAR, an experience that later served as the foundation for his novel The Cavalier (1901). After the war Cable worked as a cotton wholesaler and then as a surveyor for an engineering expedition. He was obliged to quit working for two years, however, when he contracted malaria. During this time he began publishing a weekly column of humor sketches in the New Orleans Picayune under the pen name “Drop Shot.”

After leaving the newspaper, Cable immersed himself in New Orleans history and culture and began publishing a series of stories about his hometown in SCRIBNER’S MONTHLY. Seven of these tales were collected and published as OLD CREOLE DAYS in 1879, his first real literary success. A year later Cable published his first novel, The Grandissimes, which described nineteenth-century Creole life; the book demonstrated his mastery of Creole and slave dialects and helped to solidify his reputation as a local colorist (see LOCAL COLOR). Other novels and stories of the antebellum South followed, as well as a history, The Creoles of Louisiana (1884), and The Silent South (1885), a collection of essays arguing for legal reform and a clearing of the “moral debris” left by slavery. Both of these works made Cable so unpopular in his native South that he moved to Massachusetts, where he continued to work for reform and to write about social problems in such pamphlets as The Negro Question (1888) and The Southern Struggle for Pure Government (1890).

Sources

Cleman, John. George Washington Cable Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Rubin, Louis D. George W. Cable: The Life and Times of a Southern Heretic. New York: Pegasus, 1969.

The Carpet-Bag (1851–1853) periodical

Founded in 1851, this humorous weekly was published in Boston and edited by B. P. SHILLABER, who contributed sketches about the fictitious “Mrs. Partington,” famous for her misuse of English. The first published works by Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Artemus Ward (Charles Farrar BROWNE), and John Phoenix (G. H. Derby), all appeared in issues of The Carpet-Bag.

Cary, Alice (1820–1871) and Phoebe Cary

(1824–1871) poets, short-story writers

Sisters born in Ohio to farmers Robert Cary and Elizabeth Jessup, Alice and Phoebe Cary spent their personal and public lives closely linked. After establishing a regional reputation in Ohio periodicals, they reached a national audience with Rufus GRISWOLD’S 1849 anthology, The Female Poets of America; with poems and sketches published in the NATIONAL ERA; and with a favorably reviewed collection, Poems by Alice and Phoebe Cary (1850).

The poems in Phoebe Cary's Poems and Parodies (1851) are mostly conventional, but her parodies of works by Edgar Allan POE, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, and William Wordsworth are noteworthy. Wordsworth's poem, "Lucy," which begins, "She dwelt among the untrodden ways," is parodied in Cary's "Jacob," which features a witty female-centered inversion: the male title character "dwelt among 'apartments let,'" while the female speaker laments his marriage: "But he has got a wife,—and O! / The difference to me!"

The Cary sisters shared a home in New York for almost twenty years, and Alice Cary's writing provided income for both sisters. Their rising reputation rests mostly on her achievements. The poem "An Order for a Picture," praised by Poe, describes adult remorse over a childhood act of cruelty to a nest of birds.

Alice Cary's enduring literary contribution is Clovernook (1852), a collection of regional sketches (See LOCAL COLOR) that John Greenleaf WHITTIER said bore the "true stamp of genius." The stories, narrated by an adult but drawing on the perspective of a sensitive young child, often describe cruel or unfeeling adults visiting emotional trauma on children. "Uncle Christopher" and "The Sisters" are typical of the sketches. In the former, Uncle Christopher commands Mark, a young boy, to drown a kitten. Mark instead hides the kitten in the well and feeds it. Eventually, Mark falls into the well and drowns. "The Sisters" is probably based autobiographically on Alice's older sister, Rhoda. In it, the fictional older sister Rebecca is discovered to have what the narrator calls a "harmless liking" of a recently deceased schoolteacher. Rebecca's mother, Mrs. Hadly, "regards all innocent amusements in the young as indiscreet," and the harsh consequences of the parents' anger lead to Rebecca's rapid physical decline and death.

In her preface Cary suggests of her Ohio sketches that "there is surely as much in the simple manners, and the little histories every day revealed, to interest us in humanity, as there can be in those old empires. . . ." In a reassessment of Clovernook's place in literary history, Marjorie Pryse and Judith Fetterley have proposed that regionalism as a "coherent tradition of women's writing in the second half of the nineteenth century" begins with this work.

Among the works that have yet to receive serious consideration are Phoebe Cary's Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love (1868) and Alice Cary's Lyra and Other Poems (1852), Hagar, A Story of To-day (1852), Clovernook Children (1854), Poems (1855), Married Not Mated; or, How They Lived at Woodside and Throckmorton Hall (1856), Ballads, Lyrics and Hymns (1866), Snow-Berries (1867), and A Lover's Diary (1868). Shortly after their deaths, Mary Clemmer Ames, whose biography remains the standard account, also edited collections of their poems and ballads.

Sources

Cary, Alice. Clovernook Sketches and Other Stories, edited by Judith Fetterley. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1987.

Cary, Alice, and Phoebe Cary. The Poems of Alice and Phoebe Cary. Michigan Historical Reprint Series. Ann Arbor: Scholarly Publishing Office, University of Michigan Library, 2005.

Fetterley, and Marjorie Pryse. Writing Out of Place: Regionalism, Women, and American Literary Culture. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.

—Wesley Raabe

"Casey at the Bat" by Ernest Lawrence Thayer (1888) poem

Ernest Lawrence Thayer's "Casey at the Bat: A Ballad for the Nation Sung in 1888" was first published in the San Francisco Examiner on June 3, 1888. Baseball had risen from humble origins in the early nineteenth century to "the national pastime" by the end of the century, and in his narrative poem Thayer, a humor columnist, satirized America's baseball obsession. The poem opens in the bottom of a game's ninth inning, with the hometown Mudville team losing. Casey is their last hope for a win. Thayer recounts the hero's turn at bat, the umpire's calls, the reaction of the crowd, and the outcome of the game. The heart of the poem is the description of "mighty Casey"—haughty and disdainful—and the crowd's passionate support for their hero.

—Vicky Gailey

"The Cask of Amontillado" by Edgar Allan Poe (1846) short story

One of several works by Edgar Allan POE involving the horror of being buried alive, "The Cask of Amontillado" was first published in GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK. Set in Italy, the story concerns the relationship between Montresor, the narrator, and Fortunato, a man who has slighted him. Montresor plots to murder Fortunato by exploiting his weakness for wine, saying that he has what could be amontillado, a Spanish sherry, and requesting Fortunato's expertise in identifying the wine. The two wander through a deep cellar until they come at last to the niche where Montresor says the amontillado lies. When Fortunato enters, however, Montresor quickly chains him to the wall and begins walling up the niche, entombing his companion alive. "The Cask of Amontillado" is often anthologized for use in literature and creative-writing courses as an example of a "complete story," one in which all the components are working together to create a singular effect during the story's narrative (see "THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMPOSITION").

Sources

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Selected Writings of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Gary Richard Thompson. New York: Norton, 2004.
Poe. The Works of the Late Edgar Allan Poe. New York: J. S. Redfield, 1850.

—E. N. S.

"The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County"

by Samuel L. Clemens (1865) short story
Published in The New York Saturday Press, "The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" by Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) is a popular, humorous TALL TALE inspired by Twain's travels. Structurally, it is a frame tale, a story with one narrative that is told within another narrative. The first narrative (the "outer frame") recalls an encounter with the elderly, loquacious storyteller, Simon Wheeler, who uses vernacular language (see DIALECT OR VERNACULAR WRITING) to tell a long-winded, fantastical yarn (the "inner frame") with no apparent connection to the first narrator's request. Twain's use of irony, LOCAL COLOR, and references to popular political figures illustrate the clash between the erudite, cultured Eastern section of the United States and the rough and tough Western frontier.

Source

Krause, S. J., "The Art and Satire of Twain's 'Jumping Frog' Story," American Quarterly, vol. 16 (Winter 1964): 562–576.

—Jayanti Tamm

The Century Magazine (1881–1930) periodical

In 1881 management difficulties led to a change of the ownership and name of what had been SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY. The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine was similar in design to its predecessor, and remained in competition with Harper's New Monthly (see HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE). Under the editorship of Richard Watson GILDER, who held that position from 1881 to 1909, The Century Magazine increased its emphasis on public affairs—featuring, for example, a long series on the CIVIL WAR that included contributions from George McClellan, Ulysses S. Grant, and other military heroes. The magazine also serialized important novels, such as William Dean HOWELLS'S THE RISE OF SILAS LAPHAM and Henry JAMES'S THE BOSTONIANS. The magazine reached its highest circulation in 1890, and in 1930 it merged with The Forum.

A Century of Dishonor by Helen Hunt Jackson (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1881) nonfiction

Indian rights advocate Helen Hunt Jackson's A Century of Dishonor; a Sketch of the United States Government's Dealings with Some of the Indian Tribes is a book-length exposé condemning the injustice of the United States government's American Indian policies. Using government documents as evidence, Jackson's carefully researched polemic reveals a history of Euro-American injustices against the Delaware, Cheyenne, Sioux, Poncas, Nez Perce, Winnebago, and Cherokee Indians. Jackson details broken treaties as well as massacres by whites, highlighting especially attacks on unprotected Indian women and children. Accounts from the Cherokee "Trail of Tears," the flight of Chief Joseph, and the Sand Creek Massacre fuel her denunciation of white injustice and violence. Jackson adopts an accusatory tone, as when she writes that "[t]he robbery, the cruelty which were done under the cloak of this hundred years of treaty-making and treaty-breaking, are greater than can be told." Jackson hoped that if U.S. citizens and lawmakers were aware of these atrocities their sympathy would bring about Indian-policy reform. A Century of Dishonor served as the basis for Jackson's protest novel Ramona (1884) and resulted in her appointment to a federal commission to examine the conditions of the Mission Indians in California.

Source

Jackson, Helen Hunt. A Century of Dishonor; a Sketch of the United States Government's Dealings with Some of the Indian Tribes. 1881. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1995.

—Randi Lynn Tanglen

"The Chambered Nautilus" (1858) poem

One of the most popular poems of the nineteenth century, and the work for which Oliver Wendell Holmes is best known, "The Chambered Nautilus" first appeared in the February 1858 ATLANTIC MONTHLY. The nautilus is a shelled mollusk whose growth is only stopped by death. Employing the conceit of listening to a seashell, Holmes proclaims a "heavenly message" which, often interpreted as advancing an anti-Calvinist position, equally accommodates various readings that emphasize the importance of perpetual growth and freedom from the past—an idea communicated through the intricate verse form itself, which Holmes designed to be without precedent in the English language.

Source

Holmes, Oliver Wendell. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1858.

—C. Love

Channing, Edward T. (1790–1856) editor, professor
Edward T. Channing was briefly editor of the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW before becoming a lecturer in rhetoric and oratory at Harvard in 1819. In both of these roles, Channing, although not a writer himself, had an impact on the development of New England literary culture in the first half of the nineteenth century. He was credited as a major influence on numerous Harvard-trained young men who went on to significant careers as speakers and authors, such as Ralph Waldo EMERSON, James Russell LOWELL, and Henry David THOREAU. A collection of Channing's Lectures Read to the Seniors in Harvard College was published in 1856 after his death.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Channing, William Ellery (1817–1901) essayist, poet

*On woman: "The flower upon the country's sterile face."
—Poems of Sixty-five Years (1902)*

The nephew of the Unitarian minister of the same name, William Ellery Channing was born in Boston. After three months at Harvard he moved west, where he tried farming in Illinois and journalism in Cincinnati before returning to Massachusetts and settling in Concord, near the home of Ralph Waldo EMERSON. Married to Ellen Fuller, the sister of the writer Margaret FULLER, Channing belonged to a coterie of Concord writers and transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). He was especially close to Henry David THOREAU and in 1873 published the first biography of him, Thoreau: The Poet-Naturalist. With Memorial Verses. Channing wrote for magazines and newspapers and also published poetry. Thoreau referred to Channing's style as "sublimoslipshod," alluding to Channing's transcendentalist bias toward natural expression.

Sources

Hudspeth, Robert N. Ellery Channing. New York: Twayne, 1973.

McGill, Frederick T. Channing of Concord: A Life of William Ellery Channing II. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1967.

Chapman, Maria Weston (1806–1885) essayist, poet, editor

Maria Weston Chapman was born in Massachusetts and worked as an editor for the abolitionist and pacifist newspapers THE LIBERATOR and The Non-Resistant (see ABOLITIONISM). Between 1839 and 1858 she edited the antislavery GIFT BOOK THE LIBERTY BELL. She also edited the autobiography of the British abolitionist Harriet Martineau in 1877. Chapman's antislavery poetry appeared in her Songs of the Free and Hymns of Christian Freedom (1836). Chapman was also the author of several influential abolitionist tracts and stories, including Right and Wrong in Massachusetts (1839), Pinda, a True Tale (1840), and How Can I Help Abolish Slavery? (1855).

Source

Taylor, Clare. Women of the Anti-Slavery Movement: The Weston Sisters. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

—Holly M. Kent

Chautauqua

An outgrowth of the LYCEUM MOVEMENT in adult education, CHAUTAUQUA was conceived in 1873 by Lewis Miller (1829–1899), a philanthropist and inventor. In 1874 Miller invited the Methodist bishop John Heyl Vincent (1832–1920) to join him in creating an institution—now called the Sunday-School Teachers' Assembly—which would integrate secular with religious training. The program was developed at a defunct campsite on Lake Chautauqua. Initially attended by forty students, the program grew into a worldwide adult education program offering on-site lectures, recreation, entertainment, correspondence courses, and a book club (the first in America). Other communities around the country were inspired to imitate the institute's success, and by 1900 some 150 "chautauquas" had been organized in rural settings. At the peak of its popularity, the Chautauqua movement was a powerful cultural force for disseminating the arts and information on such diverse topics as women's suffrage and soil conservation. After 1924 the movement began to decline.

Sources

Canning, Charlotte M. The Most American Thing in America: Circuit Chautauqua As Performance. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2005.

Gould, Joseph E. The Chautauqua Movement: An Episode in the Continuing American Revolution. New York: State University of New York, 1961.

Chesnut, Mary Boykin (1823–1886) diarist

The daughter of a South Carolina statesman, Mary Boykin attended private schools in Camden and in Charleston. In 1840 she married James Chesnut Jr., a prominent planter and senator who supported the Confederacy. Mary Boykin Chesnut was thirty-seven years old when she began her journal chronicling the CIVIL WAR. Her diary of some four hundred thousand words covers the period from February 15, 1861 to August 2, 1865, but it is not a day-by-day account. Her husband served as a staff officer and aide to General P. G. T. Beauregard, and she frequently accompanied him on his military travels. As a result, she witnessed pivotal events such as the siege of Fort Sumter (1861) and General William Tecumseh Sherman's March to the Sea (1864). After the war she began to revise her journal, highlighting daily life and Confederate leadership during the conflict. Her observations, which are considered by many to be quite perceptive, were published as A Diary from Dixie (1905); this posthumous publication was a bowdlerized edition. The complete text, edited by historian C. Vann Woodward, was published as Mary Chesnut's Civil War in 1981; it won the Pulitzer Prize in U.S. history the following year.

Sources

DeCredico, Mary A. Mary Boykin Chesnut: A Confederate Woman's Life. Madison, Wis.: Madison House, 1996.

Muhlenfeld, Elisabeth. Mary Boykin Chesnut: A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Child, Lydia Maria (1802–1880) novelist, short-story writer, essayist, historian, journalist, poet

Reader, I beseech you not to throw down this volume as soon as you have glanced at the title. Read it, if your prejudices will allow, for the very truth's sake: —If I have the most trifling claims upon your good will, for an hour's amusement to yourself, or benefit to your children, read it for my sake. . . . Read it, from sheer curiosity to see what a woman (who had much better attend to her household concerns) will say upon such a subject: —Read it, on any terms, and my purpose will be gained.

—Preface to An Appeal in Favor of that Class of Americans Called Africans (1833)

Lydia Maria Child (née Francis), one of America's first professional women writers, repeatedly risked reputation and livelihood to support causes including religious tolerance and the rights of African Americans, women, and Native Americans. The daughter of a Medford, Massachusetts, baker, Francis attended local schools, and, at a time when women had little access to higher education, she augmented her education by reading books from friends' and relatives' libraries. In 1814, after her mother's death, Francis moved to the frontier village of Norridgewock to live with her sister Mary, from whom Francis learned the domestic and child-care skills featured in her most profitable works. While residing with her sister, she witnessed debates over Missouri and Maine's paired entry into the Union as slave and free states, and observed the plight of the Abenaki and Penobscot Indians, driven to the margins of their historic lands by European settlers.

In 1821 Francis joined the household of her brother and first intellectual mentor, Convers Francis Jr., the pastor of a Unitarian church in Watertown, Massachusetts (see UNITARIANISM). In 1824 she drew on her frontier experience and her reading of English novelists, especially Sir Walter Scott, to write the historical novel HOBOMOK. Welcomed by her contemporaries as a distinctly American work, Hobomok introduced themes—including defiance of Calvinist orthodoxy and endorsement of interracial marriage—that recur in her later writing. Evenings in New England, a children's book that similarly adapted English models to American themes, appeared in 1824.

Lydia Maria Child

The success of Evenings in New England influenced Francis's appointment as editor of The Juvenile Miscellany, a pioneering children's magazine that endeared her to a generation and contributed largely to her income from 1826 until 1834, when protests over her antislavery writings forced her resignation. Her reputation as the author of Hobomok gained her entrée into Boston's literary circles, where she met David Lee Child, editor of the Massachusetts Journal; the couple married in 1828. David respected Lydia Maria's intellect, and he supported her commitment to political causes, but his practice of contracting debts he could not repay and his overall lack of financial acumen—which contrasted strongly with his wife's frugality and keen understanding of the literary marketplace—strained their marriage. Lydia Maria eventually achieved as much financial independence as contemporary law allowed by placing her finances in the hands of another male trustee.

During the early years of their marriage, Child's commercially profitable ventures included her editorship with The Juvenile Miscellany and the publication of two popular advice books, The Frugal Housewife (1829) and The Mother's Book (1831). She also edited literary columns for her husband's Massachusetts Journal while writing fiction and nonfiction that increasingly focused on social issues. Short stories incorporating Native American themes preceded her first overtly political work, The First Settlers of New England (1828), a children's history protesting Indian removal.

In the preface to An Appeal in Favor of That Class of Americans Called Africans (1833), Child used her literary reputation to urge loyal readers to support the abolition of slavery and the extension of full civil rights to African Americans. Recruited into the antislavery movement by William Lloyd GARRISON, an admirer of her contributions to the Massachusetts Journal, Child in turn recruited key figures through her Appeal, including Wendell Phillips, Thomas Wentworth HIGGINSON, and Charles Sumner. Her reputation among more-conservative readers, however, suffered, as did sales of the Miscellany and her domestic works. During the next decade Child completed A History of the Condition of Women, in Various Ages and Nations (1835), a groundbreaking work that included a subtle advocacy of women's rights; Child's friend Margaret FULLER, among others, later worked to make Child's sentiments more explicit.

In 1836 Child published a transcendentalist novel, Philothea (1836; see TRANSCENDENTALISM), which was followed by her last domestic-advice book, The Family Nurse (1837). Child increasingly focused on abolitionist works, including Authentic Anecdotes of American Slavery (1835) and The Antislavery Catechism (1836).

In 1841 she became editor of the National Anti-Slavery Standard. Her "Letters from New York" inaugurated a new genre, the descriptive sketch incorporating social commentary, later adopted by writers such as Fuller and Fanny Fern (See Sara Payson Willis PARTON). During this period Child also published some of her most influential antislavery stories, including "The Black Saxons" (1841), "The Quadroons" (1842), and "Slavery's Pleasant Homes" (1843). These stories along with others reprinted in Fact and Fiction (1846) and several of her "Letters" examining prostitution reflected Child's increasing awareness of the effect on women of the sexual double standard, particularly the sexual vulnerability of slave women. This awareness informed Child's sensitive editing of Harriet JACOBS's INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A SLAVE GIRL (1861), as well as her Reconstruction-era novel, A Romance of the Republic (1867), which, like Hobomok, uses the story of an interracial family to envision a multiracial future for America (albeit one in which people of non-European descent adopt European ways). After Child resigned as editor of the Standard in 1843, she continued to publish antislavery works, notably The Freedmen's Book (1865), an anthology combining Child's biographical and fictional sketches of African Americans with works by writers such as Frances E. W. HARPER, Phillis Wheatley, and Frederick DOUGLASS.

Child's writing was curtailed in the last decades of her life by caring for her husband, who died in 1874. Nevertheless, she published political works, including An Appeal for the Indians (1868), and articles supporting women's suffrage, civil rights for African Americans, and Indian rights. She also returned to an interest in similarities among religions, following The Progress of Religious Ideas (1855) with Aspirations of the World (1878), a thematic collection drawn from Hindu and Buddhist writings, Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and works by recent authors such as Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Thomas Carlyle. Like The Progress of Religious Ideas, Child's Aspirations met with support from a few sympathetic readers, and silence or disapproval from most periodicals and many of Child's more-orthodox friends.

Child's last published work was an August 1879 tribute to Garrison, who had died the preceding May. When Child died in October 1880, she was eulogized by surviving contemporaries and the children of her dead comrades, who reminded the public that she was not only the author of domestic treatises, but also a pioneering novelist, journalist and abolitionist.

—Catherine E. Saunders

Principal Books by Child

Hobomok, A Tale of Early Times, as an American Lady. Boston: Cummings, Hilliard, 1824.

Evenings in New England. Intended for Juvenile Amusement and Instruction, as an American Lady. Boston: Cummings, Hilliard, 1824.

The Rebels, or Boston before the Revolution, as the author of Hobomok. Boston: Cummings, Hilliard, 1825.

Emily Parker, or Impulse, Not Principle. Intended for Young Persons, as the author of Evenings in New England and editor of The Juvenile Miscellany. Boston: Bowles & Dearborn, 1827.

Biographical Sketches of Great and Good Men. Designed for the Amusement and Instruction of Young Persons, as the editor of The Miscellany. Boston: Putnam & Hunt / Philadelphia: Thomas T. Ash, 1828.

"The Church in the Wilderness," in The Legendary, edited by Nathaniel P. Willis. Boston: Samuel G. Goodrich, 1828, pp. 1–23.

The First Settlers of New-England: or, Conquest of the Pequods, Narragansets and Pokanokets: As Related by a Mother to Her Children, and Designed for the Instruction of Youth, as a Lady of Massachusetts. Boston: Munroe & Francis / New York: Charles S. Francis, 1829.

"The St. Domingo Orphans," Juvenile Miscellany, new series 5 (Sept. 1830): 81–94.

ANTI-SLAVERY PUBLICATIONS

FOR SALE BY
CHARLES WHIPPLE,
 NEWBURYPORT.

Those who know very little about Slavery, and wish to examine for themselves, will do well to read

AN APPEAL IN FAVOR OF THAT CLASS OF AMERICANS CALLED AFRICANS; By Mrs. CHILD. Likewise, LECTURES ON SLAVERY; by Rev. AMOS A. PHELPS. The appendix to this latter work shows plainly that insurrections and murders have always been more or less frequent in slave States, years and years before Anti-Slavery Societies were heard of.

Those who wish to know something of slave laws, will do well to read

STROUD'S COMPENDIUM OF THE SLAVE LAWS. Likewise, THE DESPOTISM OF FREEDOM; by D. L. CHILD.

Those who are convinced that Slavery is wicked and pernicious, but have cherished the idea that Colonization may be a remedy, will do well to read

JAY'S INQUIRY INTO THE COMPARATIVE MERITS OF THE COLONIZATION AND ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETIES. Likewise, Mr. BIRNEY'S FIRST LETTER ON COLONIZATION.

BESIDES THE ABOVE, C. WHIPPLE HAS FOR SALE,

Mrs. CHILD'S "OASIS," her "EVILS OF SLAVERY AND CURE OF SLAVERY," and her "AUTHENTIC ANECDOTES OF AMERICAN SLAVERY."

Rev. JOHN RANKIN'S LETTERS TO A SLAVEHOLDING BROTHER, on American Slavery.

THE NEGRO'S FRIEND; a series of English Tracts, with Engravings.

THE SLAVE'S FRIEND; a series of neat and interesting books for Children, with Engravings. Price one cent.

LECTURES ON SLAVERY. By Rev. BENJAMIN GODWIN, D. D., author of Lectures on Atheism. Enlarged edition.

J. Q. ADAMS'S FOURTH OF JULY ORATION.

Rev. DAVID ROOT'S FAST DAY SERMON ON SLAVERY.

MEMOIR AND POEMS OF PHILLIS WHEATLEY, a native of Africa, and a Slave.

THOMES & KIMBALL'S EMANCIPATION IN THE WEST INDIES.

 Anti-Slavery Libraries replenished or supplied on the most favorable terms.

An advertisement, circa 1838, for Child's books supporting abolition

"Jumbo and Zairee," Juvenile Miscellany, new series 5 (Jan. 1831): 285–299.

The Frugal Housewife. Dedicated to Those Who Are Not Ashamed of Economy, as the author of Hobomok. Boston: Marsh & Capen/Carter & Hendee, 1829; revised and enlarged edition, Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1830; republished as The American Frugal Housewife, Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1832.

The Little Girl's Own Book. Boston: Carter, Hendee & Babcock, 1831; enlarged edition, Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1834.

"Mary French and Susan Easton," Juvenile Miscellany, third series, 6 (May 1834): 186–202.

The Mother's Book. Boston: Carter, Hendee & Babcock / Baltimore: Charles Carter, 1831; revised and enlarged edition, New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: Joseph H. Francis, 1844.

Front cover for a facsimile of Child's 1844 manual intended to instruct women in the basics of domesticity

- The Coronal. A Collection of Miscellaneous Pieces, Written at Various Times.* Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1832.
- The Biographies of Madame de Staël, and Madame Roland*, volume 1 of Ladies' Family Library. Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1832; revised and enlarged as Memoires of Madame de Staël, and of Madame Roland. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1847.
- The Biographies of Lady Russell and Madame Guyon*, volume 2 of Ladies' Family Library. Boston: Carter & Hendee, 1832.
- Good Wives*, volume 3 of Ladies' Family Library. Boston: Carter, Hendee, 1833; republished as Biographies of Good Wives. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1846; republished as Celebrated Women; or, Biographies of Good Wives. New York: C. S. Francis, 1861; republished as

- Married Women: Biographies of Good Wives*. New York: C. S. Francis, 1871.
- An Appeal in Favor of That Class of Americans Called Africans*. Boston: Allen & Ticknor, 1833.
- The History of the Condition of Women, in Various Ages and Nations*, 2 volumes, volumes 4 and 5 of Ladies' Family Library. Boston: John Allen, 1835; revised and republished as Brief History of the Condition of Women, in Various Ages and Nations. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1845.
- Anti-Slavery Catechism*. Newburyport, Mass.: Charles Whipple, 1836.
- The Evils of Slavery, and the Cure of Slavery. The First Proved by the Opinions of Southerners Themselves, the Last Shown by Historical Evidence*. Newburyport, Mass.: Charles Whipple, 1836.
- Philothea. A Romance*. Boston: Otis, Broaders, 1836; republished as Philothea: A Grecian Romance. New York: C. S. Francis, 1845.
- The Family Nurse; or Companion of The Frugal Housewife*. Boston: Charles J. Hendee, 1837.
- "Slavery's Pleasant Homes: A Faithful Sketch" (1842). The Liberty Bell, Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Fair, 1843, 147–160.
- Letters from New-York* [first series]. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: James Munroe, 1843.
- Flowers for Children. I. For Children Eight or Nine Years Old*. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1844; republished as The Christ-Child, and Other Stories. Boston: Lothrop / Dover, N.H.: G. T. Day, 1869.
- Flowers for Children. II. For Children from Four to Six Years Old*. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1844; republished as Good Little Mitty, and Other Stories. Boston: Lothrop / Dover, N.H.: G. T. Day, 1869.
- Letters from New-York. Second Series*. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1845.
- Fact and Fiction: A Collection of Stories*. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1846; republished as The Children of Mount Ida, and Other Stories. New York: C. S. Francis, 1871.
- Flowers for Children. III. For Children of Eleven and Twelve Years of Age*. New York: C. S. Francis / Boston: J. H. Francis, 1847; republished as Making Something, and Other Stories. Boston: Lothrop / Dover, N.H.: G. T. Day, 1869.
- Sketches from Real Life. I. The Power of Kindness. II. Home and Politics*. Philadelphia: Hazard & Mitchell, 1850; republished as The Power of Kindness; and Other Stories. Philadelphia: Hazard, 1853.
- The Children's Gems. The Brother and Sister: And Other Stories*, anonymous. Philadelphia: New Church Book Store, 1852.
- Isaac T. Hopper: A True Life*. Boston: John P. Jewett / Cleveland: Jewett, Proctor & Worthington, 1853.
- The Progress of Religious Ideas, Through Successive Ages*, 3 volumes. New York: C. S. Francis, 1855.
- A New Flowers for Children. For Children from Eight to Twelve Years Old*. New York: C. S. Francis, 1856.
- Autumnal Leaves: Tales and Sketches in Prose and Rhyme*. New York & Boston: C. S. Francis, 1857.

Correspondence between Lydia Maria Child and Gov. Wise and Mrs. Mason of Virginia. Boston: American Anti-Slavery Society, 1860.

The Right Way The Safe Way, Proved by Emancipation in the British West Indies, and Elsewhere. New York, 1860; enlarged, 1862.

The Duty of Disobedience to the Fugitive Slave Act: An Appeal to the Legislators of Massachusetts. Boston: American Anti-Slavery Society, 1860.

The Freedmen's Book, edited, with contributions, by Child. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865.

A Romance of the Republic. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1867.

An Appeal for the Indians. New York: Wm. P. Tomlinson, 1868.

Aspirations of the World. A Chain of Opals, edited, with an introduction, by Child. Boston: Roberts, 1878.

Studying Lydia Maria Child

Despite her popularity in the nineteenth century, much of Child's work vanished from print in the years after her death. Renewed interest in Child, sparked by the rise of women's studies, was signaled by the publication of a microfilm edition of her Collected Correspondence (New York: Kraus microform) in 1980, her Selected Letters in book form (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press) in 1982, and a reprint edition of Hobomok, edited by Carolyn L. Karcher (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986), including selections from Child's other writings on Indians, as part of the Rutgers University Press American Women Writers series. The Rutgers volume, along with A Lydia Maria Child Reader (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1997), also edited by Karcher, the preeminent modern scholar of Child, are the best starting points for a study of her work.

Additional modern reprints of Child's work include An Appeal in Favor of That Class of Americans called Africans, edited by Karcher (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996), and Letters from New York, edited by Bruce Mills (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1998), a series of reprints of antislavery works from the Cornell University Library and facsimile editions of Child's domestic writings from Applewood Press. Students will have to obtain some of Child's most important works in reprints of the original editions, published in the 1960s and 1970s or in electronic format, lacking scholarly introductions. Several of her works, including Philothea and A Romance of the Republic, are available through the University of Virginia Library's Early American Fiction Collection (<<http://etext.virginia.edu/eaf/authors/lmfc.htm>> viewed July 23, 2007). A selection of Child's antislavery writings for THE LIBERTY BELL, including "Slavery's Pleasant Homes," "The Black Saxons," and "The Quadroons," with a useful critical headnote and bibliography by Kathy Davis, can be found in the Online Archive of Nineteenth-Century U.S. Women's Writing, edited by Glynis Carr (<<http://www.facstaff.bucknell.edu/gcarr/19cUSWW/LB/>> viewed July 23, 2007).

Recent scholarly biographies of Child include Karcher's The First Woman in the Republic: A Cultural Biography of Lydia Maria Child (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1994) and Deborah Pickman Clifford's Crusader for Freedom: A Life of Lydia Maria Child (Boston: Beacon, 1992). Jean Fagan Yellin places Child's antislavery works in their cultural context in Women and Sisters: The Antislavery Feminists in American Culture (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989), and she discusses Child's relationship with Harriet Jacobs in Harriet Jacobs: A Life (New York: Basic Civitas Books, 2004). Eve Allegra Raimon examines the connections between Child's antislavery fiction and William Wells Brown's Clotel—the first edition of which borrowed passages from "The Quadroons"—in The Tragic Mulatta Revisited: Race and Nationalism in Nineteenth-Century Antislavery Fiction (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2004).

A Lydia Maria Child Reader includes a bibliography of secondary works about Child and the subjects on which she wrote; for more-recent scholarship, students should consult the MLA International Bibliography.

— Student Guide by Catherine E. Saunders

"The Children's Hour" by Henry Wadsworth

Longfellow (1860) poem

Originally published in September 1860 in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, this poem of ten quatrains by Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW depicts the poet's three young daughters during their nightly ritual of descending to "raid" his study before bed. The poem's sentimental subject and clichéd phrases have caused some critics to dismiss it, and Henry JAMES satirized it in his story "The Point of View" (1883). Yet, the poem will remain interesting as an early American portrait of the affectionate relationship enjoyed by a father and his daughters, as well as for its suggestion that the door to Longfellow's study remained open, both literally and figuratively, to the intrusions of his family.

Source

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth. Tales of a Wayside Inn. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1863.

—C. Love

Chivers, Thomas Holley (1809–1858) poet

A native of Georgia, Thomas Holley Chivers was trained as a physician but devoted himself instead to poetry. His first published poem, The Path of Sorrow (1832), chronicled his unhappy first marriage. His Conrad and Eudora (1834) was one of many works created by various authors during the period that relied on the incidents surrounding the murder that became known as the Kentucky Tragedy.

Chivers is remembered for his connection with Edgar Allan POE during the 1840s. Poe accused Chivers of having plagiarized his Eonchs of Ruby (1851), a charge Chivers countered with accusations of his own. In fact, many believe that Chivers's poem "Isadore," among other poems, greatly influenced Poe's later verses "THE RAVEN" and "Ulalume." After the death of his children, Chivers became increasingly interested in mysticism, an interest reflected in his Search after Truth; or, A New Revelation of the Psycho-Physiological Nature of Man (1848).

Sources

Lombard, Charles M. Thomas Holley Chivers. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Watts, Charles Henry. Thomas Holley Chivers, His Literary Career and His Poetry. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1956.

Chopin, Kate (1851–1904) novelist, short-story writer

Edna had found her old bathing suit still hanging, faded, upon its accustomed peg.

She put it on, leaving her clothing in the bath-house. But when she was there beside the sea, absolutely alone, she cast the unpleasant, pricking garments from her, and for the first time in her life she stood naked in the open air. . . .

—The Awakening (1899)

Born in St. Louis, Missouri, Kate Chopin (born Katherine O'Flaherty) lost her father to a railroad accident when she was five years old. Raised in a wealthy household by her widowed mother (who never remarried), grandmother, and great-grandmother (both of them also widowed), Kate was well educated, graduating from the St. Louis Academy of the Sacred Heart in 1868. Two years later she married Oscar Chopin, the son of a Louisiana cotton planter, and moved with him to New Orleans.

During the nine years the Chopins lived in the Crescent City, Kate bore five sons and grew increasingly familiar with the Creole and Cajun cultures. In 1879, after Oscar Chopin's cotton-trading business failed, the family moved to Cloutierville, a tiny village in north Louisiana, where Oscar ran a general store and Kate had the last of her children, a girl. Oscar died of malaria in 1882, leaving Kate deeply in debt. After making an attempt to continue her husband's business, Chopin returned in 1884 to St. Louis with her six children.

Back in her hometown, Chopin began writing stories about Louisiana, the first of which appeared in 1889. Her first novel, At Fault, appeared in 1890, but she became a force in the LOCAL COLOR movement when her stories were collected and published as BAYOU FOLK (1894) and A Night in Acadie (1897). Her second novel, The Awakening (1899), the tale of a married woman's sexual rebirth, shocked critics and ended her literary career. After Chopin's death in 1904 of a cerebral hemorrhage, she was forgotten until the 1960s when her work was rediscovered and widely acknowledged.

Kate O'Flaherty, age eighteen, two years before she married Oscar Chopin

Principal Books by Chopin

At Fault. St. Louis: Privately printed, 1890.

Bayou Folk. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1894.

A Night in Acadie. Chicago: Way & Williams, 1897.

The Awakening. Chicago & New York: Herbert S. Stone, 1899.

The Complete Works of Kate Chopin, 2 volumes, edited by Per Seyersted. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.

A Kate Chopin Miscellany, edited by Seyersted and Emily Toth. Natchitoches, La.: Northwestern State University Press, 1979.

Kate Chopin's Private Papers, edited by Seyersted and Toth. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Studying Kate Chopin

Given her tendencies toward Romantic methods of composition—selecting subjects that presented themselves unbidden and distrusting her abilities to improve works through revision—Kate Chopin's accomplishments as a writer of realistic fiction are noteworthy. The works on which her reputation rest were produced during a span of about a dozen years near the end of her foreshortened life and display a remarkably high (if not absolutely consistent) level of artistry. After publishing her first novel, At Fault (1890), at her own expense and having a second novel rejected by publishers, Chopin gained a national audience with the publication of short stories in large-circulation periodicals such as Youth's Companion and Vogue. The peak of Chopin's critical success among her contemporaries came with the publication of two volumes of short stories: Bayou Folk (1894) and A Night in Acadie (1897). With their Louisiana settings and use of patois, both were greeted warmly as masterful examples of LOCAL COLOR writing. The Awakening (1899), however, elicited much negative criticism, and Chopin published no further novels or story collections. For much of the twentieth century, her reputation among literary critics was slight and rested almost entirely upon her short fiction. In recent decades, however, The Awakening has achieved recognition as a groundbreaking novel in its treatment, among other things, of the multitude of forces that impinge upon a woman's choices. This novel is now almost universally regarded as Chopin's masterpiece.

The standard edition of Chopin's works is the two-volume The Complete Works of Kate Chopin, edited by Per Seyersted (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969). Another excellent edition is the Library of America's Complete Novels and Short Stories, edited by Sandra K. Gilbert (New York: Library of America, 2002). Among the several scholarly editions of Chopin's most famous novel are The Awakening: Complete, Authoritative Text with Biographical and Historical Contexts, Critical History, and Essays from Five Contemporary Perspectives edited by Nancy A. Walker (Boston: St. Martin's Press, 1993) and The Awakening: An Authoritative Text, Biographical and Historical Contexts, Criticism, second edition, edited by Margaret Culley (New York: Norton, 1994). Emily Toth edited A Vocation and a Voice (New York: Penguin, 1991), the collection of short stories whose publication was cancelled following the negative reactions to The Awakening. Students with an interest in Chopin's unpublished writing, diaries, and correspondence should consult two volumes edited by Seyersted and Toth: A Kate Chopin Miscellany (Natchitoches, Louisiana: Northwestern State University Press, 1979) and Kate Chopin's Private Papers (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998).

A surprising—one might even say disproportionate—amount of critical attention has been given to Chopin's biography. Among the many good biographies available, Toth's Unveiling Kate Chopin: The Centennial Story (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999) is especially recommended. Seyersted's Kate Chopin: A Critical Biography (Oslo: University of Oslo Press, 1969) is an excellent critical biography, as is Toth's earlier Kate Chopin: A Life of the Author of "The Awakening" (New York: Morrow, 1990). Other useful biographical sources are Barbara C. Ewell's, Kate Chopin (New York: Ungar, 1986) and Nancy A. Walker's, Kate Chopin: A Literary Life (New York: Palgrave, 2001).

For critical treatments of The Awakening, students are directed to Wendy Martin, ed., New Essays on "The Awaken- ing" (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); Joyce Dyer's The Awakening: A Novel of Beginnings (New York: Twayne, 1993); and Kate Chopin's The Awakening: A Sourcebook, edited by Janet Beer and Elizabeth Nolan (Routledge: London & New York, 2004). Other good critical assessments of Chopin's work include Kate Chopin Reconsidered: Beyond the Bayou, edited by Lynda Boren and Sara deSaussure Davis (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992); Critical Essays on Kate Chopin, edited by Alice Hall Petry (New York: G. K. Hall, 1996); Robert C. Evans, Kate Chopin's Short Fiction: A Critical Companion (West Cornwall, Conn.: Locust Hill Press, 2001). For bibliographies of Chopin scholarship, students should consult Marlene Springer's Edith Wharton and Kate Chopin: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1976) and Kate Chopin: An Annotated Bibliography of Critical Works, edited by Susan Disheroon Green, David Caudle, and Emily Toth (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999). For the most recent work, students can supplement these with the annual listings in the MLA International Bibliography and in American Literary Scholarship, edited by David J. Nordloh, and others.

Chopin, age 26, and her sons: Fred, George, Jean, Oscar, 1877. She later had another son and a daughter before her husband died in 1882.

"Civil Disobedience" by Henry DavidThoreau (1849) essay

Henry David THOREAU spent the night of January 26, 1848, in the Concord, Massachusetts, jail after refusing to pay a poll tax as a gesture of his opposition to the Mexican War. The experience resulted in this essay, first delivered as the lecture "The Relation of the Individual to the State" and then published in May 1849 under the title "Resistance to Civil Government" in Elizabeth Palmer PEABODY's periodical Aesthetic Papers. After Thoreau's death in 1862, the essay was reprinted under the title "Civil Disobedience."

Thoreau took his notions of civil disobedience performed in the service of individual liberty from his readings of such founding fathers as Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) and Thomas Paine (1737–1809). Although Thoreau's essay slipped into obscurity after his death, in the twentieth century it served as an influential precedent with pioneers of civil rights, such as the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–1968) in the United States and Mohandas K. Gandhi (1869–1948) in India. Notions such as "That government is best which governs least" and "We must be men first and subjects afterwards" have made their way into the American consciousness, contributing to the not uncommon belief that individuals have a right—even a duty—to resist unjust government actions.

Source

Thoreau, Henry David. Walden; and, Civil Disobedience: Complete Texts with Introduction, Historical Contexts, Critical Essays, edited by Paul Lauter. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

Civil War (1861–1865)

The four years of open warfare between the northern and southern states over slavery and the balance of federal and state power were the culmination of tensions that had been present since the nation's founding. The impact of the Civil War on American literature is incalculable. The twentieth-century American poet Robert Penn Warren wrote, "The Civil War is, for the American imagination, the great single event of our history." As a humanistic endeavor, literature is a means for exploring and understanding the human condition, and the Civil War has had profound effects upon the human condition.

About three million soldiers—10 percent of the total U.S. population, including women and children—served in the Union and Confederate armies. About 620,000 persons—2 percent of the population—died, a total greater than for any other war in U.S. history. Property losses were also staggering. In the South alone the total property value went from a prewar estimate of $7.2 billion to just over $2 billion in 1870. That approximately one-third of the region's wealth before the war was embodied in human slaves makes the human impact of the war all the more poignant.

On a superficial level, the war's impact on American literature is most visible in its use as a conceptual divider of particular significance. Thus, we speak of "antebellum" or "postbellum" literature and we take courses in such things as "American literature since the Civil War." Likewise, of the regional appellations given to writers, "Northern" and "Southern" have special significance.

Behind these habits of speech and thinking lie important historical realities. Although it is often observed that prominent writers such as Henry JAMES and William Dean HOWELLS studiously avoided direct involvement, many other writers did see combat. Among these are George Washington CABLE, John William DE FOREST, Sidney LANIER, Ambrose BIERCE, Albion W. TOURGÉE, Lew WALLACE, and John Esten COOKE. Theodore Winthrop was killed in battle. Many writers who didn't take up arms were involved in other important ways. Louisa May ALCOTT, Walt WHITMAN, and Harriet JACOBS were nurses; Frederick DOUGLASS, William Wells BROWN, and George COPWAY were recruiters; James REDPATH, Erastus BEADLE, and Augusta Jane EVANS supplied books to soldiers.

Almost from the moment fighting began, the Civil War became a popular topic in literature across all genres. Along with a stream of slave narratives and pro- and antislavery novels, noteworthy examples include Henry TIMROD's patriotic poems in support of the Confederacy (for example, "ETHNOGENESIS" [1861], "THE COTTON BOLL" [1862], and "Ode" [1866]); Edward Everett HALE's story "THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY," written to rally Union support; Abraham Lincoln's GETTYSBURG ADDRESS, commemorating soldiers killed in the war's deadliest battle; and Julia Ward HOWE's "Battle Hymn of the Republic," a poem inspired by the author's visit to a Union army camp. In addition to these are a multitude of other less familiar works. According to one count, two hundred short stories about the war appeared between 1861 and 1865 in HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MONTHLY alone.

More significant to an historical understanding of Civil War literature are two other groups of works: those that appeared before fighting began but that took part in the conflicts the war represents, and those that appeared in the decades following the war and that helped to record, memorialize, and interpret it. Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN is famously (perhaps, apocryphally) responsible for helping to precipitate the war. Slave narratives by such writers as Frederick DOUGLASS and Harriet JACOBS, antislavery novels such as Richard HILDRETH's The White Slave, and the various abolitionist writings of Lydia Maria CHILD, Sojourner TRUTH, William Lloyd GARRISON, the GRIMKE sisters, Frances E. W. HARPER, Maria W. CHAPMAN, and Martin DELANY helped to create a political and social climate in which toleration of slavery ceased to be an option.

While slavery lay at the root of the conflict, the Civil War was not simply a struggle between those desiring to perpetuate slavery on one side and those desiring to end it on the other. Among Union supporters, considerable disagreement existed over such things as whether slavery should be immediately abolished or gradually phased out, whether the expansion of slavery should be curtailed for the slaves' sakes or for the sakes of white workers whose labor value would otherwise be undercut, and whether blacks, once freed, should remain in the U. S. or be "resettled" in Africa. Likewise, supporters of the Confederacy disagreed over whether slavery was a necessary evil or a positive good, whether slavery should be permanently or only temporarily protected, and whether energies should be focused on defending state sovereignty or on preserving slavery.

Among the prominent themes in the writings of Confederate Southerners are the healthfulness and benevolence of the region's agrarianism, its valuable tradition of honor, and the exploitation of the poor in the North's industrial economy. Significant antiabolitionist works include the novels of John Pendleton KENNEDY, William Gilmore SIMMS, and Caroline Lee HENTZ.

Significant postbellum work includes Whitman's poetry—influenced, he declared, by the Civil War—the "centre" around which his LEAVES OF GRASS revolved, and Herman MELVILLE's collection of poems, BATTLE-PIECES AND ASPECTS OF THE WAR. Fictional treatments include John Townsend TROWBRIDGE's Cudjo's Cave (1864), De Forest's MISS RAVENEL'S CONVERSION (1867), Lanier's Tiger-Lilies (1867); Tourgée's Toinette (1874), George Washington Cable's Dr. Sevier (1885), Harold Frederic's The Copperhead (1893), Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage (1895), and Mary N. MURFREE's The Storm Center (1905).

The Civil War fueled the speed of industrialization and influenced the growth of networks for communication and book distribution, created new opportunities for blacks and women, and gave impetus to the development of LOCAL COLOR and REALISM. The war forever altered the conditions under which literature in America is produced.

Sources

- Aaron, Daniel. The Unwritten War: American Writers and the Civil War. New York: Knopf, 1973.
- Blight, David W. Race and Reunion: The Civil War in American Memory. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press, 2001.
- Diffley, Kahthlee, ed. To Live and Die: Collected Stories of the Civil War, 1861–1876. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Lively, Robert Alexander. Fiction Fights the Civil War: An Unfinished Chapter in the Literary History of the American People. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1957.
- Madden, David, and Peggy Bach, eds. Classics of Civil War Fiction. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991.
- Wilson, Edmund. Patriotic Gore: Studies in the Literature of the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1962.

—Brett Barney

Clapp, Henry (1814–1875) journalist, novelist

Henry Clapp was a New York journalist who founded the Saturday Press in 1858. Often writing under the pen name "Figaro," he championed such avant-garde works as Walt WHITMAN's LEAVES OF GRASS and earned the sobriquet "The King of Bohemia." He also translated the works of Charles Fourier (see FOURIERISM) and wrote novels, including The Pioneer; or, Leaves from an Editor's Portfolio (1846). He was a regular at Pfaff's Cellar, the Greenwich Village literary tavern.

Clarel by Herman Melville (New York: Putnam, 1876)

poem

The longest epic poem in American literature, Herman MELVILLE's Clarel centers on the pilgrimage of the title character, a young American who travels the Holy Land in the midst of his own spiritual crisis. In a literal reversal of Christ's path through life, Clarel wanders from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, meeting and journeying with characters of various worldviews. Eventually, he falls in love with Ruth, a Jewish girl. Steeped in religious symbolism, Clarel represents a deep questioning of both the author's religious faith and that of the broader society in the years after the American CIVIL WAR and the publication of Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859). The four-section, 150-canto poem was Melville's last published work. A commercial failure, Clarel was generally unknown until the Melville critical revival of the 1920s.

—Joshua Matthews

Clarke, James Freeman (1810–1888) editor,

biographer

Born in Hanover, New Hampshire, James Freeman Clarke became a militant leader of the transcendentalist movement (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). After graduating from Harvard Divinity School and being ordained as a Unitarian minister, Clarke assumed the pulpit of a church in Louisville, Kentucky, where he also helped to establish and edit the Unitarian periodical THE WESTERN MESSENGER. Returning to Boston in 1841, he helped found the Church of the Disciples and served as a professor at his alma mater. Clarke became a member of the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB and collaborated with Ralph Waldo EMERSON and William Henry Channing in a memoir of Margaret FULLER. A committed activist on behalf of ABOLITIONISM and SUFFRAGISM, Clarke wrote several texts that were highly influential in their day, including Ten Great Religions (1871–1883), Essentials and Non-Essentials in Religion (1877), and Self-Culture (1880).

Source

- Bolster, Arthur S. James Freeman Clarke: Disciple to Advancing Truth. Boston: Beacon, 1954.

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne (1835–1910) novelist, journalist

Tom appeared on the sidewalk with a bucket of whitewash and a long-handled brush. He surveyed the fence, and all gladness left him. . . . Life to him seemed hollow, and existence but a burden.

—The Adventures of Tom Sawyer (1876)

Samuel Langhorne Clemens, also known as Mark Twain, was born in Florida, Missouri, and reared by a father who believed in frontier values and the American Dream. A land speculator always looking for a big profit, John Clemens settled his family in Hannibal, Missouri, where Clemens grew up in surroundings similar to those he created in his American classics THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER (1876) and ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884). From an early age Clemens worked in publishing, first as a printer's apprentice and then as a journeyman printer at various newspapers in the East and Midwest. By the mid 1850s he was a Mississippi Riverboat pilot, an experience he wrote about in LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI (1883).

The CIVIL WAR stopped traffic on the Mississippi, and Clemens and his brother headed west to make their fortune, an adventure Twain describes in ROUGHING IT (1872). In 1862, when he began working for the Territorial Enterprise newspaper in Virginia City, Nevada, Clemens adopted his pen name, Mark Twain. His first pieces were characterized by frontier humor, later collected in Mark Twain of the Enterprise (1957). By the early 1860s Twain had made friends with writers such as Artemus Ward (Charles Farrar BROWNE) and Bret HARTE and had made his own reputation with the publication of The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County and Other Sketches (1867). He also turned his travels to the Sandwich Islands, the Mediterranean, and the Holy Land into popular lectures and then a book, THE INNOCENTS ABROAD (1869).

In 1870 Twain married and settled in Hartford, Connecticut. This move into genteel society did not inhibit his frontier sensibility, although his darker vision of politics and of human nature began to develop in this period. With Charles Dudley WARNER he produced THE GILDED AGE (1873), a satire on the post-Civil War period that portrayed a country corrupted by the enormous sums spent and invested during the war. Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn, on the other hand, dealt with the pre-Civil War period and drew heavily on Twain's memories of his own childhood. These nostalgic, deceptively complex novels examined how the quest for civilization and even gentility challenged frontier values. Huckleberry Finn, the more ambitious of the two, is a novel of discovery that attacks social conventions, particularly racial attitudes, that deny individual expressions of morality.

Samuel Langhorne Clemens

Twain's consciousness of the tremendous disparity between rich and poor is evident in his fantasy novel THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER (1881). His growing concern about what it meant to be civilized is reflected in A CONNECTICUT YANKEE IN KING ARTHUR'S COURT (1889). In the latter work he burlesqued the very idea of civilization, pointing out the ridiculousness not only of medieval values but of the equally absurd principles of his provincial Yankee.

Poor financial investments forced Twain back on to the lecture circuit in the 1890s. Out of this renewed period of travel he produced Following the Equator (1897), which lacked the ebullience of his earlier travel narratives and marked the emergence of a more troubled sensibility. Twain's creative energy in this period seemed to diminish as he turned out sequels such as Tom Sawyer Abroad (1894) and Tom Sawyer, Detective (1896). Twain's maturing explorations of the fate of civilization are evident in his The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson (1894) and especially in Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc (1896). After 1898, when Twain had finally achieved financial stability, his pessimism and his art coalesced in three brilliant works: "The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg" (1899), What Is Man? (1906), and The Mysterious Stranger (1916). Twain deliberately set his last book aside for posthumous publication.

Twain's last years before his death in 1910 were spent organizing his legacy in the form of his memoirs and an authorized biography. Albert Bigelow Paine's authorized biography appeared in three volumes in 1912, Twain's Letters in 1917, and his Autobiography in 1924.

Principal Books by Clemens

The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County, and Other Sketches. New York: C. H. Webb, 1867.
The Innocents Abroad, or the New Pilgrims' Progress. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1869.
Mark Twain's (Burlesque) Autobiography and First Romance. New York: Sheldon, 1871.
Roughing It, augmented edition. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1872—comprises "Roughing It" and The Innocents at Home.
A Curious Dream; and Other Sketches. London: Routledge, 1872.
The Gilded Age: A Tale of Today, 3 volumes, by Twain and Charles Dudley Warner. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1873.
Mark Twain's Sketches, New and Old. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1875.
The Adventures of Tom Sawyer. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1876.
A True Story, and The Recent Carnival of Crime. Boston: Osgood, 1877.
Punch, Brothers Punch! And Other Sketches. New York: Slote, Woodman, 1878.

One of 174 illustrations by E. W. Kemble for the first American edition of Adventures of Huckleberry Finn

A Tramp Abroad. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1880.
 "1601" Conversation, As It Was by the Social Fireside, in the Time of the Tudors. Cleveland, 1880.
The Prince and the Pauper. Boston: Osgood, 1882.
The Stolen White Elephant, Etc. Boston: Osgood, 1882.
Life on the Mississippi. Hartford, Conn.: Osgood, 1883—includes Old Times on the Mississippi.
The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. London: Chatto & Windus, 1884; republished as Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. New York: Webster, 1885.
A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court. New York: Webster, 1889.
The American Claimant. New York: Webster, 1892.
Merry Tales. New York: Webster, 1892.
The £1,000,000 Bank-Note and Other New Stories. New York: Webster, 1893.
Tom Sawyer Abroad by Huck Finn. New York: Webster, 1894.
The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson and the Comedy of Those Extraordinary Twins. Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1894.

One of 200 illustrations by True Williams from first edition of The Adventures of Tom Sawyer

- Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc by the Sieur Louis de Conte.* New York: Harper, 1896.
- Tom Sawyer Abroad, Tom Sawyer, Detective, and Other Tales.* New York: Harper, 1896.
- How to Tell a Story and Other Essays.* New York: Harper, 1897.
- Following the Equator.* Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1897.
- The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg and Other Stories and Essays.* New York & London: Harper, 1900.
- A Double Barreled Detective Story.* New York & London: Harper, 1902.
- A Dog's Tale.* New York & London: Harper, 1904.
- Extracts from Adam's Diary Translated from the Original MS.* New York & London: Harper, 1904.
- King Leopold's Soliloquy: A Defense of His Congo Rule.* Boston: P. R. Warren, 1905.
- Eve's Diary Translated from the Original MS.* London & New York: Harper, 1906.

- What Is Man?* New York: De Vinne Press, 1906; enlarged as What Is Man? And Other Essays. New York & London: Harper, 1917.
- The $30,000 Bequest and Other Stories.* New York & London: Harper, 1906.
- Christian Science with Notes Containing Corrections to Date.* New York & London: Harper, 1907.
- A Horse's Tale.* New York & London: Harper, 1907.
- Is Shakespeare Dead?* New York & London: Harper, 1909.
- Extract from Captain Stormfield's Visit to Heaven.* New York & London: Harper, 1909.
- The Mysterious Stranger.* New York: Harper, 1916.

Letters

- Mark Twain-Howells Letters*, edited by Henry Nash Smith and William M. Gibson. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press, 1960.
- Letters to His Publishers, 1867-1894*, edited by Hamlin Hill. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967.
- Correspondence with Henry Huttleston Rogers, 1893-1909*, edited by Lewis Leary. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1969.
- Mark Twain's Letters*, volume 1, 1853-1866, edited by Edgar M. Branch, Michael B. Frank, and Kenneth M. Sanderson; volume 2, 1867-1868, edited by Harriet E. Smith and Richard Bucci; volume 3, 1869, edited by Victor Fischer and Frank; volume 4, 1870-1871, edited by Fischer and Frank; volume 5, 1872-1873, edited by Lin Salamo and Smith; volume 6, 1874-1875, edited by Frank and Smith. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988-1995.

Studying Samuel Langhorne Clemens

Samuel Clemens was driven, partly by temperament and partly by financial necessity, to write. Among his published works are short-story collections, novels, travel narratives, and plays. Ernest Hemingway famously claimed that Adventures of Huckleberry Finn is the book from which "all modern American literature comes." Whether or not it is America's greatest novel, Huckleberry Finn is almost unanimously judged as Clemens's masterpiece. It is, therefore, the recommended starting point. Connecticut Yankee is Clemens's best historical romance and one of his best social satires. Pudd'nhead Wilson offers Clemens's most fully realized female character and deals with racial and identity issues that shed light on Clemens's other depictions of African Americans. The Prince and the Pauper is not a major work, but it introduces many themes prominent in Clemens's works. Innocents Abroad is Clemens's most accomplished work of travel writing, though many will find Roughing It more interesting for its depictions of the West and of such minorities as Hawaiians, Mormons, and Chinese. It also contains some of his best humorous tales. Life on the Mississippi offers an extensive portrait of Clemens's early years and of the river that figures prominently in his works. Those interested in the scattered but trenchant passages on religion and metaphysics ics in Innocents Abroad, Huckleberry Finn, and Connecticut Yankee should also see the posthumously published The Mysterious Stranger and “What Is Man?” and Other Philosophical Writings (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973).

All of Clemens's most popular works are available in various good editions. Foremost are those issued by the Mark Twain Project as The Works of Mark Twain (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1967– ). The less expensive annotated editions derived from them—The Mark Twain Library series—are also recommended. Other excellent editions include the twenty-nine volumes of The Oxford Mark Twain (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996), which combine the texts of first editions with interpretive essays by eminent scholars and writers, and the Library of America editions: Mississippi Writings, edited by Guy Cardwell (1982); The Innocents Abroad, Roughing It, edited by Cardwell (1984); Historical Romances, edited by Susan K. Harris (1994); and The Gilded Age and Later Novels, edited by Hamlin Hill (2002). Important compilations of shorter works are Library of America's two-volume Tales, Sketches, Speeches, & Essays, edited by Louis J. Budd (1992); Tales, Speeches, Essays, and Sketches, edited by Tom Quirk (New York: Penguin, 1994); Life As I Find It: A Treasury of Mark Twain Rarities, edited by Charles Neider (New York: Cooper Square Press, 2000); and The Best Short Stories of Mark Twain, edited by Lawrence I. Berkove (New York: Modern Library, 2004).

Clemens's life has been chronicled frequently. No single biography is definitive, and students should consult several in combination. Albert Bigelow Paine's three-volume Mark Twain, a Biography (New York: Harper, 1912) both benefited and suffered from Clemens's collaboration. Justin Kaplan's Mr. Clemens and Mark Twain (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1966) won the Pulitzer Prize. Everett Emerson's Mark Twain: A Literary Life (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000) is the best critical biography. Louis J. Budd's Our Mark Twain: The Making of His Public Personality (1983) excels at analyzing Clemens's famous persona. For an intimate look at Clemens, students should consult Mark Twain: The Complete Interviews, edited by Gary Scharnhorst (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2006). Two good short biographies are Connie Ann Kirk's Mark Twain: A Biography (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004) and Larzer Ziff's Mark Twain Lives and Legacies Series (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004). For transcripts of Clemens's speeches, see Mark Twain Speaking, edited by Paul Fatout (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1976).

Students can gain a sense of trends in Clemens scholarship by consulting a good, recent essay anthology. Especially recommended are The Cambridge Companion to Mark Twain, edited by Forrest G. Robinson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); A Historical Guide to Mark Twain, edited by Shelley Fisher Fishkin (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002); and A Companion to Mark Twain, edited by Peter Messent and Louis J. Budd (Blackwell, 2005). Stephen Railton's Mark Twain: A Short Introduction is an excellent general introduction to Clemens's major works. Those interested in Huckleberry Finn are advised to consult Huck Finn, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004) or One Hundred Years of “Huckleberry Finn,” edited by Robert Sattelmeyer and J. Donald Crowley (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1985). Students interested in the novel's racial content are advised to begin with Constructing Mark Twain: New Directions in Scholarship, edited by Laura E. Skandera Trombley and Michael J. Kiskis (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001). Other essential works on the topic are Satire or Evasion?: Black Perspectives on “Huckleberry Finn,” edited by James S. Leonard and others (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992) and Terrell Dempsey's Searching for Jim: Slavery in Sam Clemens's World (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2003). Peter Messent's The Short Works of Mark Twain: A Critical Study (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001) furnishes a fine introduction to Clemens's humorous short stories. A more general study of Clemens's humor should begin with James M. Cox's Mark Twain: The Fate of Humor (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1966; Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2002) and Mark Twain's Humor: Critical Essays, edited by David E. E. Sloane (New York: Garland, 1993). Louis J. Budd's Mark Twain: Social Philosopher (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1962; Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001) is a lucid chronological account of the evolution of Clemens's thinking on social issues.

The best single bibliography of criticism is Thomas Asa Tenney's Mark Twain: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977), which is supplemented yearly in American Literary Realism and in the Mark Twain Circular. Alan Gribben's “Mark Twain” chapter in the annual American Literary Scholarship provides a comprehensive survey of the year's scholarship. Fishkin's Historical Guide and Emerson's biography, mentioned above, include ample and well-chosen selective bibliographies.

The Mark Twain Encyclopedia, edited by J. R. LeMaster and James D. Wilson (New York: Garland, 1993) is an authoritative and comprehensive general reference. R. Kent Rasmussen's Mark Twain A to Z (New York: Facts On File, 1995) is similar and also recommended. Stephen Railton's Mark Twain in His Times website (<<http://etext.virginia.edu/railton/index2.html>> viewed July 24, 2007) provides a wealth of texts and images from contemporary sources.

—Student Guide by Brett Barney

Cochran, Elizabeth (1867–1922) journalist

Born in Pennsylvania, Elizabeth Cochran attended the Indiana State Normal School for a semester when she was fifteen years old before being forced by financial difficulties to drop out, thus ending her formal education. In 1885 she responded to a column in the Pittsburgh Dispatch by writing a letter to the editor; she was subsequently offered a position as a reporter. After she had written two articles, one supporting the rights of poor women, and one suggesting that divorce could be eliminated if certain types of men were not allowed to marry, she took the name of a character from a Stephen Foster song—Nellie Bly—as her pseudonym, and set about pursuing the sort of sensational exposés that made her reputation.

Bly interested Joseph PULITZER's New York World in a series about conditions in the city mental hospital and, feigning madness, had herself committed. She published her observations in Ten Days in a Mad House (1887), which led to the city appropriation of $3 million for institutional improvements.

Bly also took on prisons, factories, nursing homes, politics, and domestic employment as subjects for investigation before the advent of the muckraking movement. Perhaps Bly's most renowned exploit was her besting, in 1889, of the fictitious record set by Phineas Fogg in Jules Verne's Around the World in Eighty Days (1873), a feat she recollected in Nellie Bly's Book: Around the World in Seventy-Two Days (1890).

Sources

Davidson, Sue. Getting the Real Story: Nellie Bly and Ida B. Wells. Seattle, Wash.: Seal Press, 1992.

Ehrlich, Elizabeth. Nellie Bly. New York: Chelsea House, 1989.

Kroeger, Brooke. Nellie Bly: Daredevil, Reporter, Feminist. New York: Times Books, 1994.

The Confidence-Man by Herman Melville (New York: Dix, Edwards / London: Longman, 1857) novel

The last novel Herman Melville wrote before abandoning professional authorship, The Confidence-Man: His Masquerade describes a group of people as they travel down the Mississippi River on April Fool's Day—also the day on which the book was published. The steamboat is named the Fidèle (faithful, true), yet the book's theme is more directly expressed by a placard above the barber's shop: "No Trust." Various untrustworthy characters—many of whom are apparently the title figure in different disguises—spend the journey swindling other passengers, preying on their optimism, good will, and desire to trust.

This ambitious comic novel presents a number of difficulties for readers, among which are a narrative style that often prohibits the straightforward identification of characters, an inconclusive ending, and a profoundly pessimistic vision. Though it evinces Melville's mastery of his craft, the novel failed both critically and commercially, further alienating the audience that had been drawn to his early, popular adventure stories, TYPEE (1846) and OMOO (1847). After the failure of The Confidence-Man, almost thirty years passed before Melville again wrote prose fiction at all, and never again for publication. More-recent readers have seen the novel as a rich, prescient, and even impressively contemporary book.

Source

Cook, Jonathan A. Satirical Apocalypse: An Anatomy of Melville's The Confidence-Man. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

—Perry Trolard

A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court by Samuel L. Clemens (New York: Webster, 1889) novel

One of the earliest known examples of time travel in literature, Mark Twain's (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court tells of Hank Morgan, a nineteenth-century American who finds himself transported back to medieval England. Believing himself to be "the best-educated man in the kingdom by a matter of thirteen hundred years," Morgan exploits his advanced technological knowledge to become "The Boss" of all Camelot. Through the narrator's observations and escapades, Twain sets his wit on the institutions of chivalry, slavery, monarchy, and the Roman Catholic Church. He subtly pokes fun at his own century as well when the narrator's anachronistic attempts to civilize his medieval counterparts lead to the dubious modern improvements of advertising, guns, and explosives.

Source

Twain, Mark. A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court: An Authoritative Text, Backgrounds and Sources, Composition and Publication, Criticism, edited by Allison E. Ensor. New York: Norton, 1982.

—Jennifer Cooper

Cooke, John Esten (1830–1886) novelist, biographer, historian

The younger brother of the literary critic Philip Pendleton Cooke, John Esten Cooke was likewise a scion of the Old South and a member of the elite group known as First Families of Virginia. Cooke made his name as the author of romances set in colonial Virginia and was inspired largely by the novels of James Fenimore COOPER; Leather Stocking and Silk (1854), concerning a Virginia frontiersman, is the most obvious of these.

Related by marriage to the Confederate general J. E. B. Stuart, Cooke also served with the Confederate army during the CIVIL WAR. While not actively involved in military campaigns, he used this period to write his Life of Stonewall Jackson (1863). Earlier he had published a biography of Thomas Jefferson (1854), and he continued his career as a biographer with A Life of Gen. Robert E. Lee (1871) and a biography of Samuel J. Tilden (1876). The sentimentality in Cooke's fiction made him highly popular in his day. In later times, his Virginia: A History of the People (1883) has been regarded his most successful work.

Sources

- Beatty, John Owen. John Esten Cooke, Virginian. New York: Columbia University Press, 1922; Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1965.
- Bratton, Mary Jo Jackson. John Esten Cooke: The Young Writer and the Old South, 1830–1861. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.

Cooke, Rose Terry (1827–1892) short-story writer, poet, novelist

... [A]dmited into the free-masonry of married women, she discovered how few among them were more than household drudges . . . who rose up to labor and lay down in sleepless exhaustion, and some whose days were a constant terror to them from the intemperate brutes to whom they had intrusted their happiness. . . .

—“How Celia Changed Her Mind” (1891)

Rose Terry Cooke, one of the most acclaimed of the New England regionalists (see LOCAL COLOR), was born on a farm near Hartford, Connecticut. Her parents were from well-respected New England families dating back to the 1600s, but they were not particularly successful in their own right, and the family moved in with Cooke's paternal grandmother, Terry, when Cooke was six. She received her literary education from her mother and obtained a domestic education suitable for a young woman of her class at Catharine BEECHER's Hartford Female Seminary. Cooke was graduated at sixteen, at which time, greatly influenced by her mother, she underwent a religious conversion and became a lifelong member of the Congregational Church.

Cooke spent several years as a teacher and governess, eventually returning to Hartford to take care of both her deceased sister's children and her own parents until their deaths. In 1848 Cooke received from her uncle an inheritance that allowed her to spend some time writing while taking care of her domestic duties. Her first love was poetry, but she soon discovered that writing fiction was more profitable and so turned to the short story, publishing her first piece in PUTNAM'S MONTHLY in 1855. Later, after her reputation had grown, she was invited to publish the lead piece of fiction, “Sally Parson's Duty,” in the initial issue of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY (November 1857), edited by James Russell LOWELL. She published more than one hundred stories during her lifetime, both in the prestigious Atlantic Monthly and in the nearly as prestigious HARPER'S MONTHLY.

Cooke created memorable characters of plain, ordinary people rather than of the privileged class, and her use of realistic details led her to be classed as a local colorist. She is also one of the first authors to use dialect in her storytelling. Her rich sense of humor is revealed in her fiction, and she was known for her “old maid” heroines who prized their independence over marriage. One of her best stories, “How Celia Changed Her Mind,” demonstrates Cooke's view that even though the single life can be lonely and difficult, marriage to a tightfisted, dictatorial man is worse than the independence of spinsterhood.

Because of her well-known spinster theme, Cooke surprised her family and friends when, at the age of forty-six, she was married to Rollin H. Cooke, a widower with two children, who was sixteen years younger than she. With her new family she settled first in Winsted, Connecticut. Rollin Cooke was never able to become the successful business man he wished to be, and Cooke eventually lost her inheritance and savings trying to save him and his father from financial ruin. When she began writing strictly for money to support her family her critical reputation suffered. Always in weak health, she died from influenza in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, after rejoining her husband there, having failed to find work in Boston.

Sources

- Donovan, Josephine. New England Local Color Literature: A Women's Tradition. New York: Ungar, 1953.
- Kleitzi, Katherine. “Essence of New England: The Portraits of Rose Terry Cooke,” American Transcendental Quarterly, 47–48 (1980): 127–139.
- Newlyn, Evelyn. “Rose Terry Cooke and the Children of the Sphinx,” Regionalism and the Female Imagination, 4 (1979): 49–57.
- Walker, Cheryl. “Rose Terry Cooke,” Legacy, 9, 2 (1992): 143–149.
- Vicki Martin

Cooper, Anna Julia (1858–1964) educator, essayist, activist

“Only the Black Woman can say ‘when and where I enter, in the quiet, undisputed dignity of my womanhood, without violence and without suing or special patronage, then and there the whole Negro race enters with me.’”

—A Voice from the South (1892)

Born into slavery in Raleigh, North Carolina, Anna Julia Haywood was the daughter of Hannah Stanley Haywood and (she later assumed) her white owner. In 1868, at the age of nine, Anna received a scholarship to St. Augustine's Normal School and Collegiate Institute, a North Carolina school for training teachers to educate newly freed slaves. Cooper fought to be able to take a “Gentleman's Course” and was finally admitted; the course was taught by a thirty-year-old Bahamian-born theology teacher named George Cooper. On June 21, 1877, he and eighteen-year-old Haywood married, both vowing to serve their race as ministers and teachers. Their brief marriage ended with George Cooper's premature death in 1879; Anna Julia Cooper never remarried.

After earning her bachelor's degree at Oberlin College in 1885, Cooper returned to St. Augustine's, where she taught Greek, Latin, and mathematics. Two years later she accepted a position as science and mathematics teacher at the elite M Street Colored High School in Washington, D.C. She was made principal in 1901. Despite successfully working to gain accreditation for the school, Cooper was forced to resign in 1906 over her refusal to lower curriculum standards and for allowing a male teacher to board at her home. She taught briefly at Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Missouri, before returning to M Street School as a Latin teacher in 1910.

In 1925, at the age of sixty-seven, Cooper became the fourth African American woman to earn a doctorate, writing a dissertation on the importance of slavery to the French Revolution. Past the age of seventy when she retired from M Street School, Cooper then served for two decades as president of Frelinghuysen University, a school dedicated to working-class blacks in Washington, D.C.

In 1892 Cooper helped organize the Colored Woman's League of Washington, D.C. She was one of four African American women to address the Women's Congress of Representative Women at the Chicago World's Fair in 1893, and she spoke in London at the 1900 Pan-African Conference organized by W. E. B. Du Bois. Other organizations in which she was involved include the National Conference of Colored Women, the Colored Women's YWCA, and Camp Fire Girls.

In A Voice from the South: By a Black Woman of the South (1892), the collection of essays that forms the basis of her literary reputation, Cooper dealt with issues such as racism, imperialism, and the intrinsic prejudice of white women's organizations. Cooper focused particular attention on the education and elevation of black women, arguing that these were crucial for racial uplift. She also translated into modern French a medieval French epic and wrote a book about Angelina and Sarah GRIMKE. When Cooper died at her home in Washington, she was 105.

Sources

Carby, Hazel. Reconstructing Womanhood: The Emergence of the Afro-American Woman Novelist. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro-American Women Writers, 1746–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. New York: G. K. Hall, 1988.

Washington, Mary Helen. "Introduction," in A Voice from the South, by a Black Woman of the South by Anna Julia Cooper. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

—Lynette D. Myles

Portrait of James Fenimore Cooper by Mathew Brady, circa 1850

Cooper, James Fenimore (1789–1851) novelist

James Fenimore Cooper was born in Burlington, New Jersey. His father, William, subsequently moved the family to Cooperstown, New York, west of Albany. James was educated in local schools and then was sent to Yale, from which he was expelled in 1806. After five years at sea he married, settling first in Cooperstown in 1814 and then on a farm in Scarsdale in 1817.

Cooper claimed he could write a better novel of manners than what he was reading at the time, and he published his first novel, Precaution, in 1820. His 1821 novel, The Spy, drew in part on his seagoing adventures and on his grasp of the American scene. He returned to this material in The Pilot (1823), again seeking to show that he could write better fiction than that of his British contemporaries, particularly Sir Walter Scott's The Pirate (1822).

Cooper's literary reputation was founded with The Pioneers (1823), the first of his LEATHER-STOCKING TALES, featuring the adventures of Natty Bumppo. In The Last of the Mohicans (1826), The Prairie (1827), The Pathfinder (1840), and The Deerslayer (1841), Cooper extended the myth of the Western hero, scornful of Eastern effiteness and contemptuous of settlers who were spoiling the land and defiling nature. Cooper drew on his childhood memories of Cooperstown and borrowed character traits from his father, a leading citizen who came into conflict with the pioneer stock and who resented the destruction of the wilderness and the values of independence and discipline it represented. Cooper's view of the Indians in these novels reflects the myths of the noble savage and of the primitive, violent society that white civilization was eradicating. Part nostalgia, part a realistic evocation of the frontier, Cooper's novels remain an enduring portrait of a world in transition and of the ambivalent feelings that change stimulates.

By the mid 1820s Cooper had established himself as the outstanding American novelist of his day. Although Washington IRVING had become the first American author to be widely read in Europe, Cooper was the first to concentrate almost exclusively on the American landscape and its history, vying with Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832) and other European novelists for preeminence in the English-speaking world.

Although Cooper had planned to write a series of novels about the American past—beginning with Lionel Lincoln (1825), set in Boston during the Revolutionary War—he returned instead to material that grew out of his sea experiences: The Red Rover (1827), The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish (1829), and The Water-Witch (1830). A proponent of democracy, he published a trilogy of novels—The Bravo (1831), The Heidenmauer (1832), and The Headsman (1833)—disparaging the cult of the Middle Ages that Scott and other Romantics (see ROMANTICISM) had popularized.

Cooper, who was away from the United States for most of the period between 1826 and 1833, wrote as a representative American, defending the country's values in books such as Notions of the Americans (1828) and Letter of J. Fenimore Cooper to Gen. Lafayette, on the Expenditure of the United States of America (1831). These works argued for the superiority of republican government over the monarchies of the past.

On his return home in 1833, Cooper found that much had changed. He reacted violently against a culture that he thought had become greedier and coarser. Public life seemed corrupt and without manners. He emerged in a series of books as a bitter conservative, a satirist, and an alarmist who believed that democracy was degenerating into mob rule. During this contentious decade of the 1830s he devoted himself almost exclusively to nonfiction, producing A Letter to His Countrymen (1834), Gleanings in Europe (six volumes; two on France and two on England, published in 1837, and two on Italy, 1838), and The American Democrat (1838). Toward the end of the decade he returned to fiction that reinforced his elitist views, including Homeward Bound (1838) and Home as Found (1838).

Often attacked in the press, Cooper launched several successful lawsuits, winning judgments for libel. Even so, his literary activity did not slow. In 1839 he published The History of the Navy of the United States of America; continued his Leather-Stocking series; and wrote histories of Christopher

Title page for a later edition of Cooper's 1842 novel with illustrations by the respected artist who illustrated some twenty-five classic works for Charles Scribner's Sons

Columbus, Mercedes of Castile (1840), and of the British navy, The Two Admirals (1842).

In the mid 1840s Cooper returned to the setting of upstate New York that he knew so well, producing several novels, including Satanstoe (1845), The Chainbearer (1845), and Ravenstoe; or, The Redskins (1846). In these works he dramatized the conflicts over landownership and the growing divide between those who owned and those who worked the land.

By the late 1840s Cooper had returned to the historical romance, publishing Jack Tier (1848), The Oak Openings (1848), and The Sea Lions (1849). These later novels demonstrated his strong gift for narrative and for the authentic details of life at sea. His last novel, The Ways of the Hour (1850), has often been cited as foreshadowing the modern mystery novel.

Cooper was a prolific writer with a talent for inventing stirring dramatic incidents. His powerful descriptions, especially of the landscapes in The Pioneers and The Prairie, evinced a profound engagement with nature and the human connection to it. The positive and negative aspects of land development—and of civilization itself—are treated in Cooper's fiction and in his nonfiction. His evocation of the

Illustration of Chingachgook, Natty, Duncan & David, by F. O. C. Darley from 1859 edition of The Last of the Mohicans

American myth of progress and its attendant periods of corruption pointed out a cycle repeated in the works of many twentieth-century American authors.

Principal Books by Cooper

- Precaution*, anonymous. New York: A. T. Goodrich, 1820.
The Spy: A Tale of the Neutral Ground, anonymous. New York: Wiley & Halsted, 1821.
The Pioneers; or, The Sources of the Susquehanna: A Descriptive Tale. New York: Charles Wiley, 1823.
Tales for Fifteen; or, Imagination and Heart, as Jane Morgan. New York: Charles Wiley, 1823.
The Pilot: A Tale of the Sea. New York: Charles Wiley, 1823.
Lionel Lincoln; or, The Leaguer of Boston. New York: Charles Wiley, 1825.
The Last of the Mohicans: A Narrative of 1757. Philadelphia: H. C. Carey & I. Lea, 1826.
The Prairie. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Carey, 1827.
The Red Rover. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Carey, 1828.
Notions of the Americans: Picked up by a Travelling Bachelor. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Carey, 1828.
The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Carey, 1829.
The Water Witch; or, The Skimmer of the Seas. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1830.
The Bravo. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1831.

- The Heidenmauer; or, The Benedictines: A Legend of the Rhine*. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1832.
The Headsman; or, The Abbaye des Vignerons. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1833.
A Letter to His Countrymen. New York: John Wiley, 1834.
The Monikins. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1835.
Hints on Manning the Navy. New York: West & Trow, 1836.
Sketches of Switzerland. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1836.
Sketches of Switzerland . . . Part Second. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1836.
Gleanings in Europe. France. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837.
Gleanings in Europe. England. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837.
Gleanings in Europe. Italy. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1838.
The American Democrat; or, Hints on the Social and Civic Relations of the United States of America. Cooperstown, N.Y.: H. & E. Phinney, 1838.
Homeward Bound; or, The Chase: A Tale of the Sea. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1838.
Home As Found. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1838.
The Chronicles of Cooperstown. Cooperstown, N.Y.: H. & E. Phinney, 1838.
The History of the Navy of the United States of America. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1839.
The Pathfinder; or, The Inland Sea. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1840.
Mercedes of Castille; or, The Voyage to Cathay. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1840.
The Deerslayer; or, The First War-Path. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1841.
The Two Admirals. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1842.
The Wing-and-Wing, or, Le Feu-Follet. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1842.
Le Mouchoir: An Autobiographical Romance. New York: Wilson, 1843.
The Battle of Lake Erie, or Answers to Messrs. Burges, Duer, and Mackenzie. Cooperstown, N.Y.: H. & E. Phinney, 1843.
Wyandotté; or The Huttred Knoll. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1843.
Ned Myers; or, A Life Before the Mast. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1843.
Afloat and Ashore, or, The Adventures of Miles Wallingford. Philadelphia: Published by the Author, 1844.
Afloat and Ashore, or, The Adventures of Miles Wallingford . . . in Four Volumes, Volumes 3 and 4. Philadelphia: Published by the Author, 1844.
Satanstoe; or, The Littlepage Manuscripts. A Tale of the Colony. New York: Burgess, Stringer, 1845.
The Chainbearer; or, The Littlepage Manuscripts. New York: Burgess, Stringer, 1845.

Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers. Philadelphia: Carey & Hart, 1846.

The Redskins; or, Indian and Injin: Being the Conclusion of the Littlepage Manuscripts. New York: Burgess & Stringer, 1846.

The Crater; or Vulcan's Peak. A Tale of the Pacific. New York: Burgess, Stringer, 1847.

Jack Tier; or, The Florida Reef. New York: Burgess, Stringer, 1848.

The Oak Openings; or, The Bee-Hunter. New York: Burgess, Stringer, 1848.

The Sea Lions; or, The Lost Sealers. New York: Stringer & Townsend, 1849.

The Ways of the Hour. New York: Putnam, 1850.

Studying James Fenimore Cooper

James Fenimore Cooper published novels, short stories, plays, and nonfiction books between 1820 and 1850. His first two novels—Precaution (1820) and The Spy (1821)—appeared anonymously. These early novels, which were more successful in England than in the United States, prompted a great deal of interest in Cooper and encouraged him to publish five more novels by 1826, including the iconic The Last of the Mohicans (see LEATHER-STOCKING TALES). In a move that marks an important shift in his view of the United States, Cooper in 1826 took his family to Europe and settled in Paris. Upon his return to the United States in 1833, he published A Letter to His Countrymen, in which he defended the policies of President Andrew Jackson and declared his retirement as a novelist—a resolution he later recanted; Cooper became embroiled in current political debates of the times, and his subsequent novels are interesting for what they reveal about his views of America and American citizens. Cooper's tales of Natty Bumppo in the five Leather-Stocking novels are the most famous of his publications. Definitive editions of most of Cooper's works are now available in The Writings of James Fenimore Cooper, an ongoing project begun under the editorship of James Franklin Beard and published by the State University of New York Press. The series is now edited by Lance Schachterle, and new volumes are being published by AMS Press.

A study of Cooper should begin with Alan Frank Dyer's James Fenimore Cooper: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism (New York: Greenwood Press, 1991) and A Descriptive Bibliography of the Writings of James Fenimore Cooper, edited by Robert Spiller and Philip Blackburn (New York: R. R. Bowker, 1934; New York: Burt Franklin, 1968). These two bibliographies can be supplemented with collections of Cooper's correspondence, including Correspondence of James Fenimore Cooper, edited by his grandson James (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1922), and the six-volume Letters and Journals of James Fenimore Cooper, edited by James Franklin Beard (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1960–1968). For an intimate portrayal of Cooper, students should consult Pages and Pictures from the Writings of James Fenimore Cooper (New York: Townsend, 1861), published by his daughter, Susan Fenimore Cooper. The first of Wayne Franklin's two-volume scholarly biography has recently appeared under the title James Fenimore Cooper: The Early Years; the second volume is scheduled for publication in 2010.

Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) and D. H. Lawrence wrote two notable discussions of Cooper's novels; these essays form a useful juxtaposition for beginning students. In the July 1895 North American Review (vol. 161), Twain published "Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses," criticizing Cooper's literary style by pointing out logistical contradictions within his The Deerslayer and The Last of the Mohicans. However, in Studies of Classic American Literature (New York: Thomas Seltzer, 1923), Lawrence discusses Cooper's literary merits and illustrates his influence on the nineteenth-century American novel and specifically on the novelists Nathaniel HAWTHORNE and Herman MELVILLE.

Overviews of critical discussions of Cooper and his novels include Robert E. Spiller's Fenimore Cooper: Critic of His Times (New York: Russell & Russell, 1963); George Dekker and John P. McWilliams's Fenimore Cooper: The Critical Heritage (London: Routledge, 1973); Robert Clark's James Fenimore Cooper: New Critical Essays (Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble, 1985); Robert Emmet Long's James Fenimore Cooper (New York: Continuum Publishing Company, 1990); and W. M. Verhoeven's James Fenimore Cooper: New Historical and Literary Contexts (Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1993). Students interested in Cooper's sea fiction should consult Thomas Philbrick's James Fenimore Cooper and the Development of American Sea Fiction (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1961).

In terms of recent scholarship, McWilliams's The Last of the Mohicans: Civil Savagery and Savage Civility (New York: Twayne, 1995) provides an introduction to Cooper through a careful analysis of the best known of The Leather-Stocking Tales, but students should also consult the MLA International Bibliography for current critical discussions.

—Student Guide by Christina Ann Roberts

Cooper, Susan Fenimore (1813–1894) nature writer, fiction writer, essayist

Susan Cooper, the daughter of James Fenimore COOPER, was an accomplished writer in many genres. Her first published work was the ROMANCE Ellinor Wyllys (1844). Her first and best-known work of nature writing, Rural Hours, was published in 1850—four years before THOREAU's WALDEN. In that work, Cooper employs the style of a journal to recount the passage of one year in the Otsego Lake region of New York. She meditates on plant and animal life, as well as on the relationship of humans to the natural environment. Cooper had no formal training as a naturalist, but she revealed a mature understanding in the book. For the next forty years Cooper worked on various writing projects, including philanthropic and educational pieces, fiction, essays, and editorial tasks. She also contributed introductions to posthumous editions of her father's novels for publication by HOUGHTON-MIFFLIN. Throughout the late 1860s and 1870s, Cooper published frequently in periodicals, and in 1878 she returned to nature writing with a series of four essays, "Otsego Leaves," in APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Her last published piece of nature writing, "A Lament for the Birds," appeared in HARPER'S MONTHLY in 1893.

Source

Johnson, Rochelle, and Daniel J. Patterson, eds. Susan Fenimore Cooper: New Essays on Rural Hours and Other Works. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

—Elizabeth Lorange

Copway, George (1818–1869) autobiographer, nonfiction writer

Also known as Kahgegagahbowh, George Copway was born near present-day Trenton, Ontario, and passed his first years in a traditional Ojibway way of life. After his family's conversion to Christianity, he worked with the Methodists, first as an interpreter and later as a preacher, among the Lake Superior Ojibwa and at Indian missions in Minnesota and in southern Ontario. When his first book was published in 1847 he became a celebrity. The Life, History, and Travels of Kah-ge-gah-bowh (George Copway) went through six editions within a year and led to his popularity as a lecturer in the eastern United States. He cultivated friendships with many literary figures, including Washington IRVING, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, James Fenimore COOPER, and Francis PARKMAN. Although his autobiography's subtitle suggested that Copway was a tribal chief and minister, he had been expelled by the Methodist Canadian Conference and had never been a chief. Copway's celebrity quickly faded, but before it did he published a pamphlet proposing an autonomous Indian state in present-day South Dakota, Organization of a New Indian Territory, East of the Missouri River (1850); an Ojibwa history, The Traditional History and Characteristic Sketches of the Ojibway Nation (1850); and a book of European travel sketches, Running Sketches of Men and Places, in England, France, Germany, Belgium, and Scotland (1851). Details of his later life are scarce, though he is known to have worked to recruit Canadian Indians for the Union army during the CIVIL WAR. He died at a Roman Catholic mission near Montreal.

Source

Smith, Donald B. "The Life of George Copway or Kah-ge-gah-bowh (1818–1869)—and a Review of His Writings," Journal of Canadian Studies, 23 (Fall 1988): 5–38.

—Brett Barney

Copyright

The concept of copyright in the United States derives from the Constitution, Article 1, Section 8, Clause 8, which states that the Congress shall have power "To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries." The first United States law governing copyright or the exclusive right to publish a work was the Copyright Act of 1790, which granted to American authors copyright for a period of fourteen years (to be extended another fourteen if the author was still living). Foreign authors were not protected, so American publishers were under no legal obligations to them. As a result, popular British books such as Walter Scott's Waverly novels were often printed and distributed simultaneously by several different American firms, none of whom were required to pay for the work. American authors contended, with some justification, that not only did this circumstance rob foreign authors of deserved remuneration for artistic labor but it also placed American writers in a handicapped position in the marketplace. Washington IRVING was one of the first proponents of an Anglo-American copyright agreement, writing in 1819 that the American public's impression of his SKETCH BOOK as overpriced was the result of "competition with republished English works for which the Booksellers have not to pay anything to the authors."

That cheap reprints of foreign literature retarded the development of a healthy American literary culture was an idea that writers throughout the next decades frequently expressed, despite the fact that Irving and others after him had shown that an international copyright law wasn't a requirement for earning a living as a professional author. Writing in 1828, after a string of successful novels, James Fenimore COOPER declared, "The fact that an American publisher can get an English work without money, must, for a few years longer, . . . have a tendency to repress a national literature." The lack of a British-American agreement created another difficulty for American authors: copyright law in England required that works be first published in that country. Cooper was not alone in thinking that the lack of an international copyright agreement would be soon remedied. For various reasons, however, no new agreement was reached, even though support for copyright reform continued to build. In 1843 the American Copyright Club was established, with an executive committee that included William Cullen BRYANT as president and Evert DUYNCKINCK as a secretary. The Club actively recruited members and petitioned Congress, but to little effect.

In the absence of significant legal intervention, a set of strategies was developed for making the most of the gaps in copyright protection. These measures had important effects on the course of literary development. American authors, for their part, customarily sent the printed sheets to England, where their books were made up and offered for sale slightly in advance of their U.S. debut; thus, it became possible to secure copyright in both countries. A handful of publishers, HARPER & BROTHERS most prominent among them, built successful operations largely on the basis of the ability to publish popular British authors cheaply. Indeed, the first issue of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE in 1850 proclaimed the editors' intentions to "transfer to its pages as rapidly as they may be issued" works by popular British authors such as Charles Dickens and Edward Bulwer-Lytton. By that time, however, some publishers who had been damaged by cutthroat competition had joined in calling for an international agreement. The eventual passage of the International Copyright Convention in 1891, in fact, owed much to the efforts of the publisher George H. Putnam, whose American Copyright League, founded in 1884, was instrumental in persuading Congress to take action. Authors and others were already by that time arguing for further changes to copyright laws, and a series of changes enacted in 1909, 1976, and 1998 granted copyright for increasing periods of time.

Sources

- Barnes, James J. Authors, Publishers, and Politicians: The Quest for an Anglo-American Copyright Agreement 1815–1854. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1974.
- Buinicki, Martin T. Authorship and the Discourse of Literary Property Rights in Nineteenth-Century America. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Nowell-Smith, Simon. International Copyright Law and the Publisher in the Reign of Queen Victoria. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1968.

—Brett Barney

"The Cotton Boll" by Henry Timrod (1862) poem

Like "ETHNOGENESIS," written a few months before, this ode by Henry TIMROD extols the virtues of the Confederate South. One of Timrod's most elaborately constructed poems, "The Cotton Boll" narrates a scene of reverie in which the poetic persona relaxes under a tree while contemplating the ripe boll he holds. In it he sees not only a commodity that binds the world's lands but also a kind of talisman with the power to conjure a vision of the entire southern region. Whereas "Ethnogenesis" had expressed unalloyed optimism, "The Cotton Boll" betrays a trace of unease at the prospect of the war's tribulations. These concerns are allayed, though, by an appeal to the omnipotence of God, who will assist the South in thwarting Northern aggression. The poem pays tribute to the "Poet of 'The Woodlands,'" William Gilmore SIMMS, as one who had earlier depicted the South's virtues.

Source

- Timrod, Henry. The Poems of Henry Timrod. New York: Hale, 1873.

—Brett Barney

Crackerbarrel Humor

Named for the cracker barrels customarily found in New England general stores that served as gathering places for locals to exchange gossip and witticisms, this rural brand of vernacular humor was originally associated with Yankee cunning and idiomatic speech. Literary practitioners of the genre include the Nova Scotia native Thomas Chandler Haliburton (1796–1865), whose creation Sam Slick, a Yankee peddler, embodied the energy and wisdom that came to be associated with the genre. The satiric verses published in James Russell LOWELL's The Biglow Papers (1846, 1867), although dedicated to such serious topics as the Mexican War and slavery, were written largely in Yankee dialect and helped introduce the American reading public to nonstandard English. Riddled with solecisms and malapropisms, crackerbarrel humor was nevertheless down-to-earth, homely, and wise. Ultimately the term was applied to rustic, commonsense humor delivered in any regional idiom.

Sources

- Blair, Walter. Native American Humor. San Francisco: Chandler, 1960.
- McGlinchey, Claire. James Russell Lowell. New York: Twayne, 1967.
- Rourke, Constance. American Humor: A Study of the National Character. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1959.
- Wagenknecht, Edward. James Russell Lowell: Portrait of a Many-Sided Man. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Craddock, Charles Egbert

See MURFREE, MARY NOAILLES.

Crawford, F. Marion (1854–1909) novelist, short-story writer, dramatist

The son of noted sculptor Thomas Crawford (1813–1857) and the nephew of Julia Ward HOWE, F. Marion Crawford was one of the most popular—and one of the most prolific—novelists of his day. Born in Tuscany, Italy, Crawford was educated in Rome; Cambridge, England; Heidelberg, Germany; and at Harvard University. He is said to have been conversant in sixteen languages. His first novel, Mr. Isaacs: A Tale of Modern India (1882), was based on the life story of a diamond merchant Crawford met while living in India. The popular book won him fame, and it was followed by forty-three others, equally successful, many also based on true stories and nearly all set in the various countries in which he lived. Crawford also wrote historical romances—such as his story of Philip II's Spain, In the Palace of the King (1900)—and popular histories of Italy. He adapted several of his novels for the stage and wrote one original play, Francesca da Rimini (1902), a vehicle for French actress Sarah Bernhardt (1844–1923). Most of his short stories dealt with the supernatural and bore titles such as "The Upper Berth" (1886) and "The Screaming Skull" (1908). In The Novel: What

It Is (1893), Crawford outlined his notions about the form as popular entertainment. In 1885 Crawford moved to Sorrento, Italy, where he spent the remainder of his life.

Sources

Moran, John Charles. An F. Marion Crawford Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981.

Pilkington, John. Francis Marion Crawford. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Crockett, David (1786–1836) author and folk figure

Colonel David Crockett—or, commonly, Davy Crockett—is one of the United States's most enduring folk heroes. Born in the Tennessee backcountry, the fifth of nine children, Crockett fought in the Creek War, enlisting with the Tennessee Volunteers and serving intermittently from 1813 to 1815. In 1826 Crockett entered national politics, winning the U.S. Congressional race in his Tennessee district as a populist Democrat. He was re-elected in 1828, lost in 1830, and won back his seat in 1832.

Among the several works that helped transform Colonel Crockett into Davy Crockett the folk legend are James Kirke PAULDING's 1831 play The Lion of the West (in which a Crockett-esque character, Nimrod Wildfire, appears in a coonskin cap, though Crockett never wore one) and Matthew St. Clair Clarke's 1833 unauthorized biography, Life and Adventures of Colonel David Crockett of West Tennessee. The latter prompted Crockett to publish his autobiography, A Narrative of the Life of David Crockett (1834), in which he campaigned for an 1836 presidential nomination and condemned his former political ally and fellow Creek War veteran, then-president Andrew Jackson.

After Crockett failed to gain a presidential nomination and lost his 1834 Congressional race, he left his wife and four children behind in Tennessee to join the Texas revolt, arriving in San Antonio de Bexar on February 3, 1836. There, on March 6, Crockett famously died defending the Alamo.

Despite his death, Crockett remained a cultural icon. The Davy Crockett character produced several biographies in the 1830s and spawned Davy Crockett's Almanack, a popular circular that ran from 1835 to 1856. Frank Murdock's play, Davy Crockett; or Be Sure You're Right, Then Go Ahead, played in American theaters from 1872 to 1894. In the twentieth century, Crockett has been a character in over a dozen Hollywood movies.

Source

Crockett, David, and Thomas Chilton. A Narrative of the Life of David Crockett. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1987.

—Joshua Matthews

Cummins, Maria S. (1827–1866) novelist

Maria Susanna Cummins was born in Salem, Massachusetts, into a prominent and relatively affluent family. Her father took an active interest in her education as a child, and as an adolescent she attended Mrs. Charles Sedgwick's Young Ladies' School. There Cummins was influenced by the career of the proprietress's sister-in-law, Catharine Maria SEDGWICK, whose literary success served as a model for many other aspiring women novelists. Cummins's first novel, THE LAMP-LIGHTER (1854), was published when she was twenty-seven years old; the book became immensely popular. Her later novels are Mabel Vaughan (1857), El Fureidis (1860), and Haunted Hearts (1864). Cummins died an early death after struggling with illness for two years.

—Sabrina Ehmke Sergeant

Curtis, George William (1824–1892) journalist, essayist

Born in Rhode Island, George William Curtis spent two years of his youth at BROOK FARM, where he came under the influence of the transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). He began his writing career as a Middle Eastern correspondent for the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE, an experience that resulted in the travel sketches published as Nile Notes of a Howadji (1851) and The Howadji in Syria (1852). Lotus-Eating (1852) is a collection of letters Curtis sent back to the paper during trips to various spas. Two collections of New York sketches, The Potiphar Papers (1853) and Prue and I (1856), were followed by his novel Trump's (1861), which was set in New York City and Washington, D.C. From 1863 until his death, Curtis edited HARPER'S WEEKLY, for which he also wrote a regular column called the "Editor's Easy Chair."

In middle age Curtis also became well known as a reformer and orator. His speech "The Duty of the American Scholar to Politics and the Times" (1856) marked a turning point in his life. Thereafter, he lectured widely on the lyceum circuit (see LYCEUM MOVEMENT) on such topics as ABOLITIONISM, women's rights, and industrial reform. He also served as president of the National Civil Service Reform League from the time of its founding in 1881 until his death more than a decade later.

Sources

Cary, Edward. George William Curtis. N.p.: 1894; New York: Greenwood Press, 1969.

Milne, Gordon. George William Curtis and the Genteel Tradition. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1956.

Cabell, James Branch (1879–1958) novelist, essayist, poet, historian

James Branch Cabell belonged to one of Virginia's founding families and was educated at the College of William and Mary. His romance and fantasy novels were extremely popular, particularly Jurgen (1919), which was regarded as erotic. Cabell tended to set his stories in the medieval past. His heroes' sexual involvements led some critics to accuse the author of immorality, but the controversy increased Cabell's sales. He had an elaborate interest in genealogy, and his novels trace the intricate story of the character Dom Manuel and his descendants, a story that can be read in chronological order, which is not the order in which the novels were written and published. The sequence of events follows this order: Beyond Life (1919), Domei (1920, first published as The Soul of Melicent in 1913), Chivalry (1909), Jurgen, The Line of Love (1905), Gallantry (1907), The Certain Hour (1916), The Cords of Vanity (1909), The Rivet in Grandfather's Neck (1915), The Eagle's Shadow (1904), The Cream of the Jest (1917), Figures of Earth (1921), The High Place (1923), The Silver Stallion (1926), and Something about Eve (1927). Much admired in his day, Cabell was less popular with later generations of readers and critics put off by Cabell's complex use of artifice.

Sources

Inge, M. Thomas and Edgar E. MacDonald, eds. James Branch Cabell: Centennial Essays. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.

MacDonald, Edgar. James Branch Cabell and Richmond-in-Virginia. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1983.

Cahan, Abraham (1860–1951) journalist, novelist

In 1897 Abraham Cahan founded the Jewish Daily Forward, and under his editorship, the Yiddish-language newspaper climbed in circulation to nearly a quarter of a million readers (See JEWISH-AMERICAN LITERATURE). His most important work of fiction is The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), a novel that dealt with the immigrant dream of success in America. Cahan was born in Russia and came to the United States in 1882. A fervent socialist, he saw early that the Soviet government was a tyranny. His other books include The Imported Bridegroom and Other Stories of the New York Ghetto (1898) and Yekl: A Tale of the New York Ghetto (1896).

Source

Marovitz, Sanford E. Abraham Cahan. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Cahn, Sammy (1913–1993) lyricist

Born to Polish immigrant parents, Samuel Cohen grew up on New York's Lower East Side. The only son in the family, he was given violin lessons and soon was playing in vaudeville orchestras. He began writing songs with composer Saul Kaplan. As "Sammy Cahn" and "Saul Chaplin," they wrote several hits, including a 1933 English-language version of a Yiddish song, "Bei Mir Bist Du Shoen" (To me you're beautiful). The song's success in a recording by the Andrews Sisters got Cahn an assignment in Hollywood where he was teamed with composer Jule Styne, and more hits flowed, such as "I'll Walk Alone" (1944), "I Should Care" (1945), "Five Minutes More" (1946), and "Time After Time" (1947).

Just as Cahn and Styne were at the peak of success, their collaboration dissolved when Styne wanted to write for the Broadway stage. At Frank Sinatra's suggestion, Cahn teamed with Jimmy Van Heusen and his succession of hits resumed: "All the Way" (1957), "High Hopes" (1959), "Call Me Irresponsible" (1963), and "My Kind of Town" (1964). Although he never had a Broadway success, Cahn flourished in Hollywood. His songs were nominated for the Academy Award twenty-six times and won four Oscars. Reflecting on his early roots in show business, Cahn said, "I think a sense of vaudeville is very strong in anything I do, anything I write."

Source

Cahn, Sammy. I Should Care: The Sammy Cahn Story. New York: Arbor House, 1974.

—Philip Furia

Cain, James M. (1892–1977) journalist, novelist, short-story writer

Born in Annapolis and educated at Washington College in Maryland, James Mallahan Cain began his writing career at the Baltimore Sun and later worked for the New York World. After writing freelance magazine pieces, he published his first novel, The Postman Always Rings Twice (1934). His terse, hard-boiled style was compared to Ernest HEMINGWAY's, but Cain is closer to the pulp-fiction writers in his ability to unfold a story swiftly and often violently. Cain produced a string of successful novels, many of them made into movies. His novels include Serenade (1937), Mildred Pierce (1941), and Double Indemnity (1943). His stories are collected in The Baby in the Icebox (1981).

Sources

Hoopes, Ray. Cain. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1982.

Madden, David. James M. Cain. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Caldwell, Erskine (1903–1987) novelist, short-story writer

Erskine Caldwell was the son of a preacher and a school-teacher; he was brought up in the rural South, where his parents' vocations exposed him to the difficult social and economic conditions that defined life in the region. Educated at Erskine College, the University of Virginia, and the University of Pennsylvania, Caldwell held a variety of menial and sometimes adventurous jobs.

Caldwell began his writing career as a reporter for the Atlanta Journal, and throughout his life he served intermittently as an overseas correspondent reporting on world events. He also supplemented his considerable income as a novelist by working as a screenwriter in Hollywood. He was married four times and fathered four children. His second wife was the photographer Margaret Bourke-White, with whom he collaborated on You Have Seen Their Faces (1937), a documentary work about Southern sharecroppers, as well as on books about Europe before and during WORLD WAR II, North of the Danube (1939) and Russia at War (1942).

A prolific author of novels, short stories, travelogues, and memoirs, Caldwell first came to national attention with his third and fourth novels, TOBACCO ROAD (1932) and GOD'S LITTLE ACRE (1933). In these works he synthesized aspects of modernist narrative (see MODERNISM) with features of the frontier tradition of the tall tale. His backwoods Southerners were often physically freakish and almost always psychologically grotesque. Over the next half-century, Caldwell regularly produced slim novels and collections of short stories that became best-sellers, especially in paperback. Among his other novels, the most notable include Journeyman (1935), Trouble in July (1940), Tragic Ground (1944), This Very Earth (1948), Gretta (1955), Miss Mamma Aimee (1967), and The Weather Shelter (1969). The Complete Stories of Erskine Caldwell was published in 1953.

Critics have never come to terms with the mixture of grotesque comedy and social protest in Caldwell's fiction. Although his work exhibits considerable range in form, style, and tone, it is not characterized by the experimental technical virtuosity found in William FAULKNER's work. Caldwell was by midcentury commonly described as a "lesser" novelist in the Faulknerian vein. The emphasis on the salacious aspects of Caldwell's books in their cover art and blurbs, as well as in the reviews that they received, undoubtedly contributed to their commercial success; but it also contributed to the critical denigration of his achievement. It has become a critical maxim that Caldwell became a self-imitator, reducing his early successes to a formula that he was content to repeat in his subsequent work. Despite efforts to resurrect his reputation, in particular by emphasizing his considerable achievements in the short-story genre, Caldwell now lacks what he had never lacked for during the course of his long career—readership.

Sources

Arnold, Edwin T. Conversations with Erskine Caldwell. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1988.

Klevar, Harvey L. Erskine Caldwell: A Biography. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.

MacDonald, Scott. "An Evaluative Check-List of Erskine Caldwell's Short Fiction." Studies in Short Fiction, 15 (1978): 81–97.

MacDonald, ed. Critical Essays on Erskine Caldwell. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

—Martin Kich

The Call of the Wild by Jack London (New York: Macmillan, 1903) novel

Jack LONDON's most popular novel, The Call of the Wild, made the author famous around the world. Its protagonist is Buck, a half St. Bernard, half Scotch shepherd dog that eventually joins a wolf pack. Raised on a California estate, Buck is stolen and shipped to the Klondike, where he becomes a sled dog. Buck's allegiance to his new owner, John Thornton, is absolute, but after Thornton is killed, grief prompts Buck to heed the call of the wild. Although The Call of the Wild is at times sentimental, it was shaped by London's burgeoning ideas about the necessity of environmental adaptation and the influence of heredity, ideas he would later explore in depth.

Source

Tavernier-Coubin, Jacqueline. The Call of the Wild: A Naturalistic Romance. New York: Twayne, 1994.

The Cantos by Ezra Pound (1917–1972) poems

Ezra POUND claimed that the idea of writing the long poem that became The Cantos came to him when he was a student at Hamilton College (1903–1905) as a result of his study of Anglo-Saxon prosody. He first published drafts of the early portions of the work under the title “Three Cantos” in POETRY during the summer of 1917. The first book publication of a portion was The Fourth Canto (1919). Pound continued to publish his long project piecemeal through the rest of his life. The most complete and best available version of the work is The Cantos of Ezra Pound, published by New Directions in 1970. This volume of some eight hundred pages includes 117 cantos, some of which are drafts or fragments.

“Canto,” from the Latin verb cantare, to sing, originally meant “song” but afterward came to signify an individual section of a longer poem. Possibly the most famous work divided into cantos was one of Ezra Pound's touchstones, Dante Alighieri's La Divina Commedia (written circa 1291–1321). Pound's cantos share with Dante's work an emphasis on music, and both poets attempt to address all human culture in their poems. European history—classical, Renaissance, and modern—makes its way into this astonishing gallimaufry, as does Chinese, Japanese, Russian, English, and American history (see Cantos LII–LXXI). Canto LXV, a piece of musical score, is based on classical Greek and the work of the Danish composer Dietrich Buxtehude. The language, like that of James Joyce's Finnegans Wake, is multinational: lines in Greek, Latin, Anglo-Saxon, Italian, French, Chinese, Japanese, and even hieroglyphics appear throughout. Myth abounds. Free association enables Pound to warp and compress history and thereby offer, in the midst of his sprawling book, instances of surprising and eccentric conflation. The effect is revelatory and sometimes wearying.

Lines shortly after the start of Canto LXXIV, for instance, speak to a “you,” possibly any wanderer, possibly the reader, who departs from a world of “olive tree[s] blown white in the wind,” an image aurally and visually of great appeal, which has metaphoric force and whose whiteness is identified with Chinese rivers in which the wind has been washed, to pass beyond the pillars of Herakles, the boundary of the known world in ancient Greece; the “you,” the reader then learns, is traveling at the same time that Lucifer, or the devil, has fallen, presumably from God's grace, to land in “N. Carolina.” All this is packed into nine lines.

Although some sections of the Cantos are immediately apprehensible—for example, the opening narrative that recounts Odysseus's journey to the underworld to visit Tiresias—as a whole, The Cantos have proved baffling to most readers. Unlike Dante and Joyce, who in La Divina Commedia and Finnegans Wake found forms to order their work, Pound was unable, as he admitted, to make the Cantos “cohere.” His poetic ear was one of the most sensitive in twentieth-century literature; lines and brief passages in The Cantos show the purity and sweep of a great poet, but the writer has lost control. Meanings that rise to the surface sink and do not coalesce. The result is a hodgepodge, a work of genius, an amazing, intermittently beautiful, gathering of language, incident, thought, and imagination that exasperates and dazzles, delights and frustrates.

Sources

Eastman, Barbara. Ezra Pound's Cantos: The Story of the Text. Orono: National Poetry Foundation, University of Maine, 1979.

Kenner, Hugh. The Pound Era. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.

Terrell, Carroll F. A Companion to the Cantos of Ezra Pound, 2 volumes. Berkeley, Los Angeles & London: University of California Press, 1980, 1984.

—Roger Lathbury

Carolina Folk Plays

In 1919 the Carolina Playmakers, a regional theater group associated with the University of North Carolina, under Professor Frederick Henry Koch began having student playwrights such as Paul GREEN and Thomas WOLFE draw on regional materials and traditions. These “folk plays” marked a deliberate turning away from the conventions of the commercial theater. Koch wanted a closer contact with local materials and communities. Green's The Lost Colony (produced 1937), a dramatization of what happened to Virginia's first settlers, is a good example of the folk play's use of pageantry and tableau rather than the clear story lines and character conflicts associated with the commercial theater. Folk songs and historical chronicles are also featured in folk plays, which tend to include large casts of characters. Koch edited a quarterly selection of the plays, The Carolina Play-Book, beginning in March 1928. The plays were collected in a single volume in Carolina Folk-Plays (1941).

Willa Cather, 1912

Cather, Willa (1873–1947) novelist, short-story writer

*It is the inexplicable presence of the thing not named, of the overtone divined by the ear but not heard by it .
... that gives high quality to the novel or the drama, as well as to poetry itself.*

—“The Novel Demeuble” (1922)

Through a series of novels and short stories notable for their vivid characters and deceptively simple prose style, Willa Cather placed the landscape and immigrant peoples of the Great Plains on the American literary map. At the same time, she avoided becoming a mere regionalist (see REGIONALISM). Her mature fiction began with the discovery of rural Nebraska as a subject. By the end of her career, her imagination had carried her into locales as remote from her personal experience as France during WORLD WAR I, the New Mexico Territory of the mid nineteenth century, and seventeenth-century Quebec.

Willella (Willa) Cather was born in Back Creek Valley, Virginia, on December 7, 1873, the first of seven children. In 1883, when she was nine years old, Willa Cather moved with her family from Virginia to the Nebraska prairie, a relocation that had a profound impact on her life—and, ultimately, on her art. At age sixteen, Cather graduated from high school in the small town of Red Cloud, Nebraska, and enrolled at the University of Nebraska in Lincoln. Four years later, English degree in hand, she went to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where she worked as a journalist and as a high-school teacher. In 1906, she joined the staff at McClure's, a New York-based magazine known for its quality fiction and muckraking journalism. Cather rose through the ranks and became the managing editor of the publication. In 1912, after a trip to the American Southwest, she decided to become a professional writer of fiction.

Once she committed herself to writing full-time, Cather focused nearly all of her attention and energy on her art, tolerating few distractions. She spent most of her life living quietly in New York City with her companion Edith Lewis, and she remained aloof from literary circles and movements. Periodic travels in the American Southwest, French Canada, and Europe helped provide inspiration for her fiction, which she composed slowly and with almost obsessive attention to detail.

Cather produced creative work throughout her life. In 1903, she published her first book, the poetry collection April Twilights, and throughout her career as a journalist she published short stories, many of them anonymously. In 1905 she collected several of her best early short stories, including “Paul’s Case” and “The Sculptor’s Funeral,” in The Troll Garden. Cather thought little of her first novel, Alexander’s Bridge (1912), which, like much of her early work, was heavily influenced by Henry James. Set in Nebraska, O PIONEERS! (1913) introduced her mature approach to fiction, a nuanced rendering of quiet moments and seemingly ordinary situations that other novelists would likely leave out—what she called “the other side of the carpet.”

For her next several novels, Cather continued to mine her childhood memories of Nebraska for material. Though set in Colorado, the early sections of The Song of the Lark (1915), the story of a small-town singer’s rise to international fame, offer a disguised account of Cather’s Red Cloud. Regarded by many as her masterpiece, My ÁNTONIA (1918) celebrates the achievements of European immigrants in Nebraska through the heroic figure of Ántonia Shimerda, a Czech-American who repeatedly triumphs over adversity. A darker view of the Great Plains dominates One of Ours (1922), which depicts a young American’s flight from cultural suffocation on the prairie to military martyrdom on the Western Front, and A Lost Lady (1923), which mourns the demise of frontier values in the face of modern materialism.

Boldly experimental and set far from the familiar territory of Webster County, Nebraska, THE PROFESSOR’S HOUSE (1925) reflects the influence of literary MODERNISM, as does DEATH COMES FOR THE ARCHBISHOP (1927), a fragmented, episodic

O PIONEERS!

A stirring romance of the Western prairies, embodying a new idea and a new country. There are two heroines, — the splendid Swedish girl, Alexandra, who dares and achieves, and the beautiful Bohemian whose love story is the very story of Youth. It is only by a happy chance that a creature so warm and palpitating with life is ever enticed into the pages of a novel.

By Willa Sibert Cather

Dust jacket for Cather's second novel, in which Alexandra Bergson fulfills her father's dream of building a prosperous life on the Nebraska prairie work that offers one of the finest depictions of the Southwest in American literature. For the rest of her career, Cather moved back and forth between her Nebraska memories and a growing interest in more-exotic historical locales. Virtually devoid of plot, Shadows on the Rock (1931) re-creates seventeenth-century Quebec. Obscure Destinies (1932), a collection of three short stories (including "Old Mrs. Harris"), and Lucy Gayheart (1935) both depict the Red Cloud of Cather's youth. In 1940, she published her final novel Sapphira and the Slave Girl, a richly detailed work set in pre-Civil War Virginia, and at the time of her death on April 24, 1947, she was working on a new novel set in medieval Avignon.

Cather's success in rendering the beauty and human drama of the Great Plains, a region widely regarded as unsuitable for serious fiction, was quickly recognized by prominent critics, including H. L. MENCKEN and Sinclair LEWIS. F. Scott FITZGERALD admired her Nebraska fiction, as well—especially A Lost Lady. However, her identification with a specific locale also led to pigeonholing. Harsh criticism of the second half of One of Ours, set in wartime France, signaled the unwillingness of many reviewers to accept Cather as something more than a regionalist, and throughout her career she struggled to move beyond her restrictive reputation as a Nebraska writer. By 1931 when Shadows on the Rock appeared, she was relatively well-off and enjoyed a large readership. Shadows on the Rock was the first of her novels to reach the top ten best-sellers list. Yet, her perceived retreat into the historical past—into seventeenth-century Quebec—at the height of the GREAT DEPRESSION led to charges of escapism and irrelevance.

MY ÁNTONIA

BY

WILLA SIBERT CATHER

Optima dies . . . prima fugit
VIRGIL

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY
W. T. BENDA

BOSTON AND NEW YORK
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY
The Riverside Press Cambridge
1918

Title page for Cather's fourth novel, in which the experience of narrator Jim Burden, who finds friendship and happiness on the Nebraska prairie after a childhood in Virginia, parallels the pattern of the author's life

Despite such charges, Cather's fiction continued to attract new admirers after her death, and My Ántonia, in particular, became recognized as a classic American novel. However, a full appreciation of Cather's work did not occur until the 1980s, when an explosion of new critical perspectives enabled scholars to see that her novels and short stories operate on more levels than previously thought. Studies of Cather published since 1990 have further added to her reputation by arguing that her work, once dismissed as indifferent to real-life concerns, grapples with major themes in American culture and history. She is revered today as one of the most important American novelists of the twentieth century.

—Steven Trout

Principal Books by Cather

- April Twilights*. Boston: Badger, 1903.
The Troll Garden. New York: McClure, Phillips, 1905.
Alexander's Bridge. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1912.
O Pioneers! Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1913.
The Song of the Lark. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1915. Revised as volume 2 of The Novels and Stories of Willa Cather. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1937.
My Ántonia. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1918.
Youth and the Bright Medusa. New York: Knopf, 1920.
One of Ours. New York: Knopf, 1922.
April Twilights and Other Poems. New York: Knopf, 1923. Enlarged edition, New York: Knopf, 1933. Abridged in volume 3 of The Novels and Stories of Willa Cather. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1937.
A Lost Lady. New York: Knopf, 1923.
The Professor's House. New York: Knopf, 1925.
My Mortal Enemy. New York: Knopf, 1926.
Death Comes for the Archbishop. New York: Knopf, 1927.
Shadows on the Rock. New York: Knopf, 1931.
Obscure Destinies. New York: Knopf, 1932.
Lucy Gayheart. New York: Knopf, 1935.
Not Under Forty. New York: Knopf, 1936.
Sapphira and the Slave Girl. New York: Knopf, 1940.
The Old Beauty and Others. New York: Knopf, 1948.
Willa Cather on Writing. New York: Knopf, 1949.
Writings from Willa Cather's Campus Years, edited by James R. Shively. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1950.
Willa Cather in Europe, edited by George N. Kates. New York: Knopf, 1956.
Early Stories, edited by Mildred R. Bennett. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1957.
Willa Cather's Collected Short Fiction, 1892–1912. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1965.
The Kingdom of Art: Willa Cather's First Principles and Critical Statements, 1893–1896, edited by Bernice Slote. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1966.
The World and the Parish: Willa Cather's Articles and Reviews, 1893–1902, 2 volumes, edited by William M. Curtin. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1970.

The Professor's House

Willa Cather

Dust jacket for Cather's seventh novel, which contrasts the stuffiness of a professor's settled life with his student Tom Outland's explorations of Pueblo culture in the American Southwest

Uncle Valentine and Other Stories, edited by Slote. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1973.

Willa Cather in Person: Interviews, Speeches, and Letters, selected and edited by L. Brent Bohlke. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1986.

Studying Willa Cather

For information on a particular work by Willa Cather, students should consult the appropriate volume in the Willa Cather Scholarly Edition series published by the University of Nebraska Press. Each edition provides a definitive version of a Cather text, along with extensive annotations, relevant illustrations, and an historical essay that situates the work within Cather's life and her cultural milieu. Students interested in the publishing history and critical reception of a specific novel or short story will benefit from Joan Crane's Willa Cather: A Bibliography (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982) and Margaret O'Connor's Willa Cather: The Contemporary Reviews (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001).

Cather was a private person, and anyone who wishes to study her life in detail will soon feel like a trespasser. She burned most of her personal papers, and her last will and testament forbids direct quotations from her letters. Despite Cather's best efforts, scholars have made available considerable information about her day-to-day activities. Janis Stout's A Calendar of the Letters of Willa Cather (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002) provides a succinct summary for each of the hundreds of epistles that escaped the flames, and James Woodress's Willa Cather: A Literary Life (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1987), the best of the now many Cather biographies, offers a detailed account of her journey from obscurity to international acclaim. For a glimpse into Cather's personality, Sharon Hoover's Willa Cather Remembered (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002) offers a rich assortment of reminiscences by Cather's friends and literary acquaintances. Though dated in some respects, Mildred Bennett's The World of Willa Cather (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1951; revised, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1970) provides a lively account of Cather's formative experiences in Webster County, Nebraska.

Some of the most illuminating essays on Cather's work appear in the series Cather Studies, the first three volumes of which include thematically varied essays by major Cather scholars such as Susan J. Rosowski, John Murphy, and Ann Romines. The three most recent volumes focus on specific topics—Cather's Canadian and European connections, her environmental imagination, and her treatment of war. Older recommended critical monographs are David Stouck's Willa Cather's Imagination (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1975), Rosowski's The Voyage Perilous: Willa Cather's Romanticism (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1986), Merrill Maguire Skagg's After the World Broke in Two: The Later Novels of Willa Cather (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1990), and Mary Ryder's Willa Cather and Classical Myth: The Search for a New Parnassus (Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press, 1990).

Since the mid 1990s, most book-length studies of Cather have either placed her work within a variety of historical/ideological contexts or explored its expression of homoeroticism. Examples of the former include Joseph Urgo's Willa Cather and the Myth of American Migration (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995), Guy Reynolds's Cather in Context: Progress, Race, Empire (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996), Stout's Willa Cather: The Writer and Her World (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2000), and Steven Trout's Memorial Fictions: Willa Cather and the First World War (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002). Of the books that offer a Gay-and-Lesbian-studies perspective on Cather, the most useful is John Ander's Willa Cather and the Male Homosexual Literary Tradition (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999).

Cather is well served by the University of Nebraska-Lincoln's excellent electronic Willa Cather Archive (<<http://cather.unl.edu/>>). Here students will find a host of Cather photographs, virtual displays of first editions, on-line versions of Willa Cather Scholarly Editions and Cather Studies volumes, and many other useful resources.

—Steven Trout

"Champion" by Ring Lardner (1916) short story

First published in Metropolitan and collected in How to Write Short Stories (1924), "Champion" features Ring LARDNER's most disagreeable character, the prizefighter Midge Kelly. "Champion," though characteristically rich in irony, is also distinct among Lardner's stories for its absence of humor. A ruthless bully since childhood, Kelly rises to stardom while neglecting, betraying, or abusing everyone who cares for him. "Midge Kelly scored his first knockout when he was seventeen," Lardner begins his unflinching, fast-paced narrative. "The knockee was his brother Connie, three years his junior and a cripple." He later delivers blows to his work-weary mother, his pregnant wife, and his frail brother-in-law. Kelly's cruelty and self-centeredness escalate with his wealth and celebrity. He dines in lavish restaurants and sports garish clothing while ignoring his wife's requests to send money to support their ailing child. In his greed, he abandons the manager who transformed him from a barfly into a champion boxer. Yet despite his loathsome behavior the New York News depicts him as a wholesome role model. As with Lardner's "Haircut" and the stories collected in YOU KNOW ME AL (1916), "Champion" conveys the idea that Americans often overlook major character flaws in filling their need for heroes.

—John Cusatis

Chandler, Raymond (1888–1959) novelist, screenwriter

Down these mean streets a man must go who is not himself mean, who is neither tarnished nor afraid.

"The Simple Art of Murder" (1944)

Raymond Thornton Chandler was born in Chicago, Illinois. His parents divorced when he was seven years old, and he and his mother moved to London. Chandler attended Dulwich College, a respected public school south of London. He initially sought to make a living as a man of letters, contributing dozens of poems, sketches, and reviews to London newspapers and literary magazines. In 1912 he abandoned his writing career and moved to the United States. Chandler settled in Southern California, his home for the rest of his life. He served in the Canadian Army during WORLD WAR I and spent three months at the front in France before being transferred to aviation school in England. He returned to Los Angeles following his discharge and in 1924 married Cissy Pascal, who was seventeen years his senior. During the 1920s Chandler worked in the booming Southern California oil industry and eventually rose to the position of vice president for the Dabney Oil Syndicate. In 1932, following several years of heavy drinking and affairs with women in his office, he was fired.

Raymond Chandler, circa 1945

Unemployed at the depth of the GREAT DEPRESSION, Chandler turned to writing again, this time choosing pulp detective fiction as his market. He published his first short story, "Blackmailers Don't Shoot," in the December 1933 issue of BLACK MASK, the most respected of the detective PULP MAGAZINES, but over the next six years he struggled to make a living. In 1939, Chandler published his first detective novel, THE BIG SLEEP. He produced three more novels between 1940 and 1943, but he received little critical notice.

In 1943 Chandler signed a contract with Paramount Pictures and collaborated with Billy Wilder on the screenplay for Double Indemnity, an adaptation of the JAMES M. CAIN novel. Chandler spent the next five years working in Hollywood, earning increasingly higher rates. He received credit for four movies between 1943 and 1946, and his original screenplay for The Blue Dahlia (1946) was nominated for an Academy Award. Despite these successes, Chandler did not enjoy working in the movie industry. In 1949, after a six-year hiatus, he published The Little Sister and determined to work as a novelist for the rest of his career. His sixth and most ambitious novel, The Long Goodbye (1954), was first published in England in 1953. The following year his wife died, and Chandler entered a severe depression and resumed heavy drinking. Over the next four years he battled loneliness, alcoholism, and failing health. By this point he had gained a reputation in England as a serious literary author, and he divided his time between Southern California and London, where he was treated as a literary celebrity. Chandler's last novel, Playback, was published in 1958. He died in San Diego the following year.

Dust jacket for Chandler's first novel, which introduces private detective Philip Marlowe

Of Chandler's seven detective novels, The Big Sleep and The Long Goodbye are generally recognized as his best. The Big Sleep introduces the detective character Philip Marlowe, who is the narrator for all seven novels. His cynical, world-weary voice establishes the tone for the series. As the series progresses, Marlowe grows increasingly cynical about his role as a detective. There is little hope of his being able to restore justice through his investigations: the best he can do is protect one or two decent people from further trouble. Chandler's meditation on values and personal conduct culminated in The Long Goodbye, his most bitter assessment of the power of wealth and its ability to corrupt individuals.

Throughout his career, Chandler aspired to a reputation not only as a writer of popular detective fiction but also as a literary artist. He started to achieve this reputation only in the last years of his life, and it came first in Britain, not America. American critics were slower to accept that a writer working in a popular genre should be taken seriously. At Chandler's death in 1959, all but a handful of American reviewers still dismissed his novels as nothing more than light entertainment. In the mid 1960s Chandler's work first began receiving attention from academic critics, most notably from Philip Durham, whose Down These Mean Streets a Man Must Go: Raymond Chandler's Knight (1963) was the first book-length critical study of the Philip Marlowe novels. Chandler's academic reputation continued to grow during the 1970s and 1980s, with scholarly biographies and collections of his writing and letters being published, and his novels began to be taught in American literature courses.

Chandler is now recognized as one of the founders of the HARD-BOILED detective genre, a uniquely American style characteristic of the culture of the 1930s and 1940s. He is also noted as a key contributor through his screenwriting to the film noir subgenre of movies, which flourished in Hollywood in the 1940s. As such, he has had a lasting influence on American culture and the popular imagination. But Chandler's influence extends beyond the detective genre. Critics have linked his writing to other American modernists such as Ernest HEMINGWAY and F. Scott FITZGERALD, noting in particular Marlowe's search for values in a fallen world and Chandler's emphasis on realism in setting and language.

—Robert F. Moss

Principal Books by Chandler

The Big Sleep. New York: Knopf, 1939.
Farewell, My Lovely. New York: Knopf, 1940.
The High Window. New York: Knopf, 1942.
The Lady in the Lake. New York: Knopf, 1943.
Five Murderers. New York: Avon, 1944.
Five Sinister Characters. New York: Avon, 1945.

Dust jacket for Chandler's second novel, which opens with Marlowe encountering Moose Malloy, a huge, ostentatiously dressed white man, in a black neighborhood: "He looked about as inconspicuous as a tarantula on a slice of angel food."

The Finger Man and Other Stories. New York: Avon, 1947.
The Little Sister. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1949.
The Simple Art of Murder. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1950.
The Long Goodbye. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1954.
Playback. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958.
Raymond Chandler Speaking, edited by Dorothy Gardiner and Kathrine Sorley Walker. New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1962.
Killer in the Rain. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1964.
Chandler Before Marlowe, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1973.
The Blue Dahlia: A Screenplay, edited by Bruccoli. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1976.
The Notebooks of Raymond Chandler & English Summer, edited by Frank MacShane. New York: Ecco, 1976.
Raymond Chandler's Unknown Thriller: The Screenplay of Playback. New York: Mysterious Press, 1985.
Poodle Springs, by Chandler and Robert B. Parker. New York: Putnam, 1989.

Dust jacket for Chandler's sixth Marlowe novel, in which he examines the corrupting effect of money on society, "the dirty side of the sharp dollar," and the ideal of friendship

Studying Raymond Chandler

The student who wants to gain a full appreciation of the literary development of Raymond Chandler should read not only his novels but also his short stories, most of which were written early in his career and published in pulp magazines such as BLACK MASK. Chandler adapted material developed in his short stories for his first novel, THE BIG SLEEP (1939), as well as his second novel, Farewell, My Lovely (1940), and his fourth novel, The Lady in the Lake (1943). The two-volume collection Chandler: Stories & Early Novels and Chandler: Later Novels & Other Writings (New York: Library of America, 1995) brings together key stories and all seven of his novels, as well as selected letters and essays, including Chandler's seminal essay "The Simple Art of Murder."

Raymond Chandler: A Documentary Volume, edited by Robert F. Moss (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 253. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/The Gale Group, 2002), which includes reviews of his works and facsimiles of manuscript pages and personal documents, offers an essential introduction to his life and career; it has been republished in paperback as Raymond Chandler: A Literary Reference (New York: Carroll & Graff, 2003). Chandler's literary correspondence is collected in Selected Letters of Raymond Chandler, edited by Frank MacShane (New York: Columbia University Press, 1981), and The Raymond Chandler Papers: Selected Letters and Nonfiction 1909–1959, edited by MacShane and Tom Hiney (New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000). The Notebooks of Raymond Chandler (New York: Harper Perennial, 2007), spanning nearly two decades, is especially important for those interested in Chandler's thoughts on being a writer. For a comprehensive bibliography of Chandler's works, see Matthew J. Brucoli's Raymond Chandler: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1979).

MacShane's The Life of Raymond Chandler (New York: Dutton, 1976) approaches Chandler "as a novelist and not simply as a detective-story writer." Hiney's Raymond Chandler: A Biography (New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1997) concentrates more on Chandler as hard-boiled writer and his movie work. Further examination of Chandler's work for the screen is provided by Al Clark's Raymond Chandler in Hollywood (Los Angeles: Silman-James Press, 1996), which gives scene-by-scene discussions of each of the screenplays that he wrote from 1944 to 1948, and William Lühr's Raymond Chandler and Film (New York: Ungar, 1982).

The first book-length critical study of the Philip Marlowe novels is Philip Durham's Down These Mean Streets a Man Must Go: Raymond Chandler's Knight (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1963). Although the literary value of Chandler's work was not fully appreciated in some early studies that tended to focus on his popular appeal as an author of detective thrillers, in recent years his work has received increasingly complex and divergent critical analyses. He deserves consideration in regard to his place among HARD-BOILED genre writers, as well as in a broader literary context. To understand Chandler in relation to other detective writers, see Matthew J. Brucoli and Richard Layman's Hardboiled Mystery Writers: Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, and Ross Macdonald (New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002) and Robert E. Skinner's The Hard-Boiled Explicator: A guide to the Study of Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, and Ross Macdonald (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1985). The Critical Response to Raymond Chandler, edited by J. K. Van Dover (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995), presents fifteen essays on gender, genre, stylistics, and other topics related to Chandler and his work. Major Chandler manuscript collections are at the UCLA Library and at the Bodleian Library of Oxford University.

—Darien Cavanaugh

Chase, Ilka (1905–1978) memoirist, novelist

Ilka Chase grew up in New York high society. An editor of Vogue and a popular novelist, she is best known for her memoir Past Imperfect (1942), a vivid portrayal of New York theater and society.

Cheever, John (1912–1982) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Quincy, Massachusetts, John Cheever published his first short story, “Expelled,” an account of his own expulsion from Thayer Academy, in THE NEW REPUBLIC in 1929. By the mid 1930s Cheever was publishing stories of American city and suburban life in THE NEW YORKER. His work centers on exploring how his characters react to their comfortable, privileged world. Existence can seem absurd, yet Cheever reports its ridiculousness with care, humor, satire, and irony that reflect serious moral concerns. Occasionally Cheever strives for surrealistic effects, as in the title story of The Enormous Radio and Other Stories (1953). The whimsical cast of his fiction is reflected in the title Some People, Places, and Things That Will Not Appear in My Next Novel (1961). The Stories of John Cheever (1978) includes nearly all of his collected stories.

Cheever made his reputation as a novelist with The Wapshot Chronicle (1957) and The Wapshot Scandal (1964). These novels document the decline of a fictional New England town and the adventures of two boys who forsake their New England heritage for avid involvement in modern life, represented by New York City. Bullet Park (1969) recovered some of Cheever’s comic gifts, especially in his depiction of the novel’s hero, Eliot Nailles, a rather naive and yet accomplished man attuned to the natural world and to working with his hands. The setting is the suburbs, which Cheever treats both affectionately and critically. Falconer (1977), a model of narrative compression, enhanced Cheever’s reputation not only because of its beautiful prose but also because of its riveting depiction of prison life. This novel balances a view of society with the drama of his main character’s disintegrating personality. Oh What a Paradise It Seems (1982) is a slighter novel, but it retains Cheever’s trademark satirical views of modern life and compassion for his characters. The Letters of John Cheever was published in 1988 and The Journals of John Cheever in 1991.

Sources

- Donaldson, Scott. John Cheever: A Biography. New York: Random House, 1988.
- Donaldson, ed. Conversations with John Cheever. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987.
- Meaner, Patrick. John Cheever Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Chesnutt, Charles W. (1858–1932) short-story writer, novelist, essayist, biographer

Every time I read a good novel, I want to write one. It is the dream of my life—to be an author.

—Chesnutt’s journal, March 26, 1881

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, to free African American parents, Charles Waddell Chesnutt spent most of his youth in Fayetteville, North Carolina, where he attended school and worked in his family’s grocery store. He began his professional life in 1872 as a teacher in nearby Charlotte, North Carolina, and by 1880 he was the principal of the Fayetteville State Normal School for Negroes and a married man. Chesnutt was already writing by this settled time in his life and career, and he continued his own education, studying literature, music, and languages, as well as stenography. In 1883 he used his knowledge of stenography to start his own court-reporting firm after moving his family to Cleveland, where he remained for the rest of his life, working as a writer and court reporter.

Chesnutt published short stories, including “The Gophered Grapevine,” the first story by an African American to appear in The Atlantic Monthly (1887), before his first collection of fiction, THE CONJURE WOMAN, was published in 1899 by Houghton, Mifflin. These previously published stories were all set in a fictionalized Fayetteville. His second collection, THE WIFE OF HIS YOUTH AND OTHER STORIES OF THE COLOR LINE, came out that same year, as did his biography of Frederick Douglass. These first two collections of fiction earned Chesnutt critical praise. He spent the early years of the twentieth century publishing novels: The House Behind the Cedars (1900), The Marrow of Tradition (1901), and The Colonel’s Dream (1905). Throughout the final decades of his life, Chesnutt published stories and essays and continued to make speeches about race in America. In 1928 he was awarded the Spingarn Medal by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) for his pioneering literary work in American race relations.

Chesnutt is recognized as an innovator in the traditions of AFRICAN AMERICAN LITERATURE, including the use of dialect and the early use of magical realism. He is recognized for having countered the postwar romanticizing of the South in literature. His works were popular and recognized by critics in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, making him the nation’s first widely read African American author.

Sources

- Chesnutt, Charles W. Charles W. Chesnutt Stories, Novels and Essays. New York: Library of America, 2002.
- Heermance, J. Noel. Charles W. Chesnutt: America’s First Great Black Novelist. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1974.
- Monica F. Jacobe

"Chicago" by Carl Sandburg (1916) poem

"Chicago" is the title work of Chicago Poems (1916), Carl Sandburg's first major collection. A celebration of industrial and agricultural America as well as common American people, the collection exemplifies Sandburg's intention to write "simple poems for simple people." In the poem he names the blue-collar work—"Hog Butcher," "Tool Maker," "Stacker of Wheat," "Freight Handler"—that occupies the "City of the Big Shoulders," a city he claims as his own. Through images and language choice, he vividly acknowledges the brutalities of city life while manifesting an optimistic spirit. Regardless of its pitfalls, Chicago stands out among other cities, "with lifted head singing so proud / to be alive and coarse and strong and cunning." Despite "the terrible burden of destiny," the people of Sandburg's "Chicago" are "Building, breaking, rebuilding." The city is an ignorant young fighter "who has never lost a battle": "Laughing the stormy, husky brawling laughter of Youth, half-naked, sweating, proud to be Hog Butcher, Tool Maker, Stacker of Wheat, Player with Railroads and Freight Handler to the Nation."

Source

Sandburg, Carl. "Chicago." Chicago Poems. New York: Holt, 1916.

—Skye L. Suttie

Chicago Defender (1905– ) periodical

Established by Robert S. Abbott, this local newspaper commented on the state of affairs in African American life. It reported instances of injustice and worse (lynchings in the South, for example) and on improvements in the social and political lives of African Americans. It gradually became an influential voice in both local and national affairs—particularly in the Middle West and the South. In 1917, the Defender began a campaign urging the migration of blacks to the North. It also featured the columns of Langston HUGHES, in which he created his memorable character, Jesse B. Semple ("Simple").

The Chicago Renaissance

The Chicago Renaissance overlapped with the Chicago World's Fair of 1893. Its popularity was abetted by the influence of the journalistic figures of the era: Eugene Field, George Ade, and Finley Peter DUNNE. The prominent novelists were realists Henry B. Fuller and Sherwood ANDERSON. Theodore DREISER left Chicago for New York in 1895, before he wrote SISTER CARRIE (1900). The leading poets of the movement—which was more an accident of geography than a literary school—were Carl Sandburg and Edgar Lee MASTERS. Vachel LINDSAY in Springfield was an adjunct member of the group. THE JUNGLE (1906) was the most influential Chicago novel, but Upton SINCLAIR was not a local boy.

—Morris Colden

The Children's Hour by Lillian Hellman (produced 1934) play

The Children's Hour, which opened on November 20, 1934, for 691 performances, was Lillian HELLMAN's first successfully produced play. The tightly plotted drama examines the tragic repercussions of an evil child's lie, falsely accusing two female schoolteachers of a sexual relationship. In a newspaper interview Hellman argued that "this is really not a play about lesbianism, but about a lie. The bigger the lie the better, as always." Hellman based the story on a real case of two Scottish schoolteachers.

The main setting is a girls' preparatory school outside of Lancet, Massachusetts, operated by unmarried teachers Karen Wright and Martha Dobie. The play opens with a student in elocution class reciting Portia's "Quality of Mercy" speech from William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. The lines urging mercy establishes the story's tension between mercy and vengeance.

In the climax of the drama Martha realizes that the child had sensed her unconscious sexual love for Karen. The shame of her sexuality reflects the contemporary prejudice against homosexuality and leads to further tragedy.

Despite receiving strong reviews, the lesbian content of the play caused great concern and generated much controversy. Critical outrage over the play's failure to win the PULITZER PRIZE resulted in the formation of the Drama Critics Circle. A 1936 movie based on the play, renamed These Three, transformed the lesbian motif into a conventional heterosexual love triangle. Hellman directed a 1952 Broadway revival of the play as a commentary on the McCarthy-era persecution of perceived communists.

Sources

Conversations with Lillian Hellman, ed. Jackson R. Bryer. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1986.

Hellman, Lillian. The Children's Hour. New York: Knopf, 1935.

Mellon, Joan. Hellman and Hammett. New York: HarperCollins, 1996.

—Park Buckner

Children's Literature

American children's literature came into its own in the first part of the twentieth century. Technological improvements in printing made it possible to mass-produce books with quality color pictures inexpensively. The demand grew steadily throughout the period and book production increased greatly.

As in the nineteenth century, editions of fairy tales and classic stories were popular. Versions of classic tales for children featured the illustrations of talented artists. In 1883 Howard Pyle published the highly acclaimed The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood. Other retellings of historical tales followed, culminating in his version of the Arthurian legend for young readers in four volumes, beginning with The Story of King Arthur and His Knights in 1903. Pyle was also an influential teacher and his illustration students, among them Maxfield Parrish, N. C. Wyeth, and Jessie Willcox Smith, produced innovative illustrations for editions of classics.

During this period, original fantasy fiction emerged as a favorite among American readers. L. Frank BAUM's The Wonderful Wizard of Oz (1900) found an appreciative audience, and he wrote thirteen sequels. Despite the popularity of the Oz series, many critics objected that the books were poorly written and subsequent histories of children's literature have often ignored Baum. However, his popularity has endured. Books in the tradition of Mark Twain, portraying the life of a young male protagonist, appealed to young boys. Booth TARKINGTON's Penrod (1914) with its mischievous young hero attracted such an audience. Boys also enjoyed animal stories such as Jack LONDON's THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903) and Will James's Smoky (1926).

Young female readers preferred idealized characters as in Kate Douglas Wiggin's Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm (1903). Family stories such as Eleanor Estes's The Moffats (1941) and Laura Ingalls WILDER's Little House in the Big Woods (1932) were very successful; both were followed by other books about the family and its members. They provided a realistic view of American home life while maintaining an idealistic, positive outlook.

Series books enjoyed tremendous popularity. Edward STRATEMEYER created the Bobbsey Twins series in 1904. Laura Lee Hope, the author credited on the title page, did not in fact exist; the books were written by ghostwriters who eventually produced seventy-two books. Stratemeyer used the same formula for his other series, featuring Tom Swift (beginning in 1910), the Hardy Boys (beginning in 1927), and Nancy Drew (beginning in 1930). These books are not usually acknowledged by critics or historians of American children's literature.

Poetry did not share the high standing of American children's fiction. Eugene Field, known as the "Poet of Childhood," wrote nostalgic poetry about childhood that has endured. His Poems of Childhood (1904), published nine years after his death, was illustrated by Maxfield Parrish and featured the familiar poems "Little Boy Blue" and "Wynken, Blynken and Nod." Both Laura Richards and Eleanor Farjeon wrote books of poetry for children in addition to their novels and stories for young people. Mainstream poets Vachel LINDSAY and Carl SANDBURG also wrote volumes especially for children.

Books for children became an increasingly important component of American book culture. Public libraries had begun to recognize children as a specific audience by the end of the nineteenth century, setting aside special rooms for children and their books. In 1900 the American Library Association set up a children's-literature section as part of the organization. Publishers realized the implications of the growing market, and in 1920 Macmillan established the first separate department for children's books. Other publishers quickly followed suit. Children's literature was now big business.

In 1922 the children's section of the American Library Association was asked to initiate a prize to be awarded to the most distinguished contribution to children's literature published in the previous year. The award was named for John Newbery, who is credited with publishing the first books especially for children. Winners had to be American citizens or residents. Hendrick van Loon's The Story of Mankind (1921) was the first recipient.

Almost all of the children's books from this period addressed white children, ignoring the African American population entirely. In response, W. E. B. DU BOIS initiated The Brownies' Book, a monthly periodical, in 1920. It was published for twenty-four months and offered "children of the sun" writings portraying them in a positive light. The young Langston HUGHES was a frequent contributor. Otherwise, scant attention was paid to minority authors and audiences.

One important development during the 1920s and 1930s was the picture book for younger children. It was a natural result of the growing role for the illustrator, who no longer played an anonymous subordinate role, but was a partner in the production of the book. Illustrations became as significant as the text. Such books began to gain attention when the 1929 Newbery Awards cited Millions of Cats by Wanda Gág (1928) as an honor book. Illustrators such as Lois Lenski in The Little Engine That Could (1930) and Robert Lawson in The Story of Ferdinand (1936) demonstrated how pictures enhanced the story. In 1938 the American Library Association instituted a separate award for the illustrator of the most distinguished picture book for children. Named in honor of Randolph Caldecott, an influential illustrator of the early nineteenth century, the first award went to Dorothy Lathrop for Animals of the Bible, A Picture Book (1937).

More and more illustrators became writers as well and produced outstanding children's books: among them were Ludwig Bemelmans's Madeleine (1939), Robert McCloskey's Make Way for Ducklings (1941), and Virginia Lee Burton's The Little House (1942). In 1937 Theodor Seuss Geisel, better known as Dr. Seuss, published To Think I Saw It on Mulberry Street, the first of his picture storybooks combining humorous drawings with an original story told in verse.

Sources

- Clark, Beverly Lyon. Kiddie Lit: the Cultural Construction of Children's Literature in America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.
- Hunt, Peter. Children's Literature: An Illustrated History. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Meigs, Cornelia, ed. A Critical History of Children's Literature. New York: MacMillan, 1953.
- MacLeod, Anne Scott. American Childhood. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1994.

—Greta Little

Churchill, Winston (1871–1947) novelist

Winston Churchill graduated from the Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1894, but he never served in the navy. He launched his literary career with the novel The Celebrity (1898), said to have been intended as a satire of the colorful writer Richard Harding Davis. Churchill turned to American history as subject matter. Richard Carvel (1899), a romance set during the Revolutionary War, proved to be a best-seller, as did The Crisis (1901), a novel about politics and society during the Civil War, and The Crossing (1904), a romance concerning the settlement of Kentucky.

Churchill turned next to more-contemporary subject matter in Coniston (1906), portraying a mid-nineteenth-century New Hampshire politician's ethical conflicts. Mr. Crewe's Career (1908) is the story of a railroad's attempt to control state government. Churchill's literary focus mirrored his biographical one: his service in the New Hampshire legislature led, in 1913, to an unsuccessful bid for the governorship as the candidate of Theodore ROOSEVELT's Progressive Party.

As his fame grew in the first decades of the twentieth century, Churchill was often confused with the British Sir Winston Churchill, who suggested that one of the two should modify his name. The Englishman, who was younger, thereafter signed his name Winston S. Churchill.

Sources

Schneider, Robert W. Novelist to a Generation: The Life and Thought of Winston Churchill. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1976.

Titus, Warren I. Winston Churchill. New York: Twayne, 1963.

The Clansman by Thomas Dixon (New York: Doubleday, Page, 1905) novel

The Clansman: An Historical Romance of the Klu Klux Klan is the second of Thomas DIXON's trilogy of novels—the others are The Leopard's Spots (1902) and The Traitor (1907)—set in the South during Reconstruction. The melodramatic trilogy presents a virulently racist view of blacks and is an apology for the vigilante Ku Klux Klan. The book was popular in its day, and Dixon did well with his dramatization of it, which toured in 1905–1906. In 1915 director D. W. Griffith adapted The Clansman as the hugely successful silent movie The Birth of a Nation.

Source

Cook, Raymond Allen. Thomas Dixon. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Clark, Walter Van Tilburg (1909–1971) novelist

Walter Van Tilburg Clark was educated at the University of Nevada and the University of Vermont. He wrote poetry and short stories, but he is best known as the author of THE OX-BOW IN-

CIDENT (1940), a WESTERN that realistically probes the dangers of vigilante justice and mob violence. Another notable work is the symbolic novel The Track of the Cat (1949), in which a rancher who has little regard for the sacredness of the natural world hunts a panther that has been killing his cattle.

Source

Laird, Charlton, ed. Walter Van Tilburg Clark: Critiques. Reno: University of Nevada Press, 1983.

"The Congo" by Vachel Lindsay (1914) poem

"The Congo," first published in The Congo and Other Poems (1914), is Vachel LINDSAY's most famous and most controversial poem. It was written to be chanted aloud and included marginal notations suggesting the vocal qualities of various lines and sections of the poem. Lindsay became famous for his spirited recitations of the poem, which was subtitled "A Study of the Negro Race." Lindsay intended it as an ode to African Americans. Critics initially praised the poem as an innovative oral form; however, later critics, recognizing its patronizing tone and use of racial stereotypes, have dismissed it for its racism.

—Brian McAllister

The Conjure Woman by Charles W. Chesnutt (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1899) short-story collection

The Conjure Woman is Charles W. CHESNUTT's first book. These seven stories were drawn from the magazine publications that brought Chesnutt his literary reputation during the final fifteen years of the nineteenth century. The first story in this collection, "The Goophered Grapevine" published in the Atlantic Monthly in 1887, was the most notable, as it made Chesnutt the first African American to publish fiction in that magazine. All set in Patesville, a fictionalized Fayetteville, North Carolina, these stories feature Uncle Julius McAdoo telling tales of magic and African conjuring to a white family, transplants from the North. The tension between the family's idealized view of the South and Uncle Julius's realistic view of life as a former slave helped create Chesnutt's reputation for examining racial tensions in his fiction.

Source

McWilliams, Dean. Charles W. Chesnutt and the Fictions of Race. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2002.

—Monica F. Jacobe

Connelly, Marc (1890–1980) playwright

Marcus Cook Connelly was a journalist before turning to playwriting. One of his earliest plays was Dulcy (1921), a comedy he co-authored with George S. KAUFMAN. Much of his work consisted of adaptations of novels for the stage and screen. His greatest success was his dramatic adaptation of Roark Bradford's stories about African American tales based on the Bible; The Green Pastures (1929) won a PULITZER PRIZE. Connelly published Voices Offstage: A Book of Memoirs in 1968.

Source

Nolan, Paul T. Marc Connelly. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Conroy, Jack (1899–1990) novelist

John Wesley Conroy grew up in Missouri and in the late 1930s became deeply involved in the PROLETARIAN LITERATURE movement. He wrote a classic of this genre, The Disinherited (1933), an account of the common laborer or “working stiff,” full of detailed descriptions of working-class life and the arduous efforts of people to find and keep their jobs. His other work includes another novel, A World to Win (1935), and a study of African American migration to the North written in collaboration with Arna BONTemps, They Seek a City (1945), which was expanded as Anyplace but Here (1966). Conroy also edited a collection of proletarian writings from the late 1930s, Writers in Revolt (1973). The Jack Conroy Reader appeared in 1980.

Source

Wixson, Douglas C. Worker-Writer in America: Jack Conroy and the Tradition of Midwestern Literary Radicalism, 1898–1990. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.

Conquistador by Archibald MacLeish (Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1932) poem

Archibald MACLEISH's PULITZER PRIZE-winning poem was inspired by the journals of Bernal Díaz, a soldier who accompanied Hernán Cortés through Mexico in his conquest of the Aztecs. As Bernard A. Drabeck and Helen E. Ellis point out, MacLeish's retelling uses Hernán Cortés's journey as a metaphor to “subsume and clarify the whole experience of the Americas to the Europeans, including the disastrous ending. . . . What white men have done to the land was made pretty explicit.” In this sweeping, violent, ruminative, and eloquent poem, MacLeish uses allusive imagery to do justice to the complexity of his subject, while his reliance on dialogue gives the poem the power of an oral narrative. Always concerned with the violence men committed toward each other, MacLeish places the questioning of the doctrine of Manifest Destiny at the core of the poem.

Sources

Drabeck, Bernard A., and Helen E. Ellis. Archibald MacLeish: Reflections. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986.
MacLeish, Archibald. Collected Poems: 1917–1982. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1985.

—Paul Kareem Tayyar

The Cowperwood Trilogy by Theodore Dreiser:

The Financier (New York: Harpers, 1912; revised edition, New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927), The Titan (New York: John Lane, 1914), and The Stoic (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1947) novels

Theodore DREISER's American-business trilogy follows closely the career of Charles Tyson Yerkes (1837–1905), a banker and investor in municipal projects that he also controlled. Shrewd, magnetic, ruthless, and energetic, Frank Cowperwood, Dreiser's hero, rises from a clerk to the owner of a brokerage firm. From watching a squid and a lobster in a tank, Cowperwood as a boy concludes that the powerful survive and the weak are destroyed. His climb to wealth, recounted in The Financier, emanates directly from this understanding, as do Cowperwood's human relationships. The Financier details the world of power: businessmen who control markets, politicians who allow the activity for their own purposes, and functionaries who can be browbeaten into compliance.

Dreiser demonstrates that powerful men like Cowperwood, with the drive to succeed financially, have equally strong sexual drives. They require—deserve—women. As a young man, Cowperwood patronizes brothels. While he is married, Cowperwood has an affair with Aileen Butler, the eighteen-year-old daughter of a business partner. Cowperwood's alliances with women are not, according to the novel, matters of choice or free will. The book calls such attractions “chemisms,” and no moral judgment can be applied to them since they are controlled by impersonal forces.

Cowperwood's greatness comes from seeing that even when circumstances, such as the Chicago fire of 1871, work against him, the same impersonal principles of life hold. Consequently, after overextending himself and being imprisoned for larceny, Cowperwood remains unbowed; he deals with his situation shrewdly and with presence of mind takes advantage of a monetary panic in 1873 to recover his fortune.

In The Titan, a newly remarried Cowperwood tries to penetrate Chicago society. Like Yerkes, Cowperwood becomes a philanthropist. He gives an observatory to a university. However, society will not accept him because he lacks the sugarcoating of morality. Cowperwood is unable to escape his past; he cannot buy his way out of the judgment of Midwestern morality, which views his past life in Philadelphia as unforgivable.

Increasingly dissatisfied with his second wife, he has affairs. Aileen Cowperwood, in despair, takes lovers herself. There are melodramatic domestic scenes in which Aileen attacks one of Cowperwood's mistresses and halfheartedly tries to commit suicide. Cowperwood then relocates to New York, where he finds a much younger woman, the daughter of a madam. His competitors in the Midwest have succeeded in driving him out of business, an ouster that Cowperwood typically takes in stride. He takes his young mistress, Berenice Fleming, to Europe. From there, the story is picked up by The Stoic, posthumously published, in which Berenice's spiritual nature tries to guide Cowperwood toward mysticism, Hinduism, and the religions of the East—an alternative to the deterministic views of Dreiser's earlier fiction, but one not as thoroughly thought through and dramatized as Dreiser's NATURALISM.

Sources

Pizer, Donald, ed. Critical Essays on Theodore Dreiser. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Zimmerman, David A. Panic!: Markets, Crises, and Crowds in American Fiction. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

—Roger Lathbury

Cozzens, James Gould (1903–1978) novelist

To fill emotional partisans . . . with fury there's nothing like a careful exercise of detachment, or an attempt to write nothing but the truth.

—Cozzens letter, March 19, 1960

James Gould Cozzens is the most neglected and underrated major American novelist. He wrote major books in the 1930s, 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s, providing a body of fiction unsurpassed in its fidelity to truth and experience: "To me, life is what life is."

Cozzens wrote the best American novel about a clergyman (Men and Brethren, 1936), the best American novel about the law (The Just and the Unjust, 1942), and the best American novel about WORLD WAR II (Guard of Honor, 1948). He committed his literary lifetime to refining his techniques for truthfully representing life to grown-up readers. Nonetheless, the literary establishment of little-magazines critics and English-department intellectuals customarily denounce his work as insensitive or cold or anti-intellectual or reactionary or lacking in liberal guilt. His protagonists—upper-middle-class white Protestant men who are not doomed to end miserably—have fallen from literary fashion. Except for brief periods following publication of Guard of Honor and By Love Possessed, Cozzens and his novels were ignored by the reputation-makers. He belongs with the greatest American social realists.

Cozzens was educated at the Kent School in Connecticut and left Harvard in his sophomore year when his first novel, Confusion (1924), was published. It was followed by his only historical novel, Michael Scarlett (1925), set in Elizabethan England. A year teaching in Cuba provided material for Cockpit (1928) and Son of Perdition (1929).

In 1927 he married his literary agent, Bernice Baumgarten, who thereafter managed his career. Cozzens's first success came with the short novel S.S. San Pedro (1930), an account of a sinking ship that utilizes the distinguishing qualities of his mature work: a condensed time frame; thorough knowledge of a profession; and examination of the themes of duty, professionalism, responsibility, and social order. Three major "professional novels" followed: The Last Adam (1933), about a small-town Connecticut doctor who does not have a heart of gold; Men and Brethren (1936), about an Episcopal priest in a poor Manhattan parish who does not love his fellow-man; and The Just and the Unjust (1942), about a lawyer and a murder trial in Pennsylvania.

James Gould Cozzens, 1948

Wartime service at the Pentagon on the staff of General H. H. Arnold, chief of the Air Force, provided Major Cozzens with the material for Guard of Honor (1948). His best novel, it narrates three days at a Florida airbase; the combat scenes are flashbacks. In contrast to other World War II novels, Guard of Honor treats the professionals of the officer class with respect. Colonel Norman Ross is a representative Cozzens hero, a man of reason and intelligence operating within his awareness of human limitations. The novel won the PULITZER PRIZE, which Cozzens found embarrassing because he cared nothing about awards and the people who gave them. Except for the wartime years, he lived reclusively on his Lambertville, N.J., farm and avoided the "literary life" and literary people.

Cozzens escaped celebrity and literary politics until publication of By Love Possessed (1957) brought the fifty-four-

Dust jacket for Cozzens's 1930 novel, based on the 1928 sinking of the Vestris, blamed on the failure of the captain to act when the ship began to take on water during a gale year-old author welcome money and unwelcome notoriety. By Love Possessed covers forty-nine hours in the life of Arthur Winner Jr., a successful Pennsylvania lawyer, to examine the effects of varieties of love—parental, marital, sexual, familial, philanthropic, and altruistic—and their consequences. The strongest character is Winner's law partner, Julius Penrose, a highly intelligent misanthropist who refers to "a rabble of professional friends of man, social-worker liberals, and practitioners of universal brotherhood—the whole national horde of nuts and queers." Cozzens became briefly famous and was the subject of a hostile Time cover article. The initial rave reviews of the novel were followed by attacks on Cozzens as a reactionary, a snob, a bigot, and a deliberately difficult writer. The style of Cozzens's previous novels had been unadorned; but By Love Possessed utilizes complex sentences, parenthetical constructions, rhetorical devices, inverted word order, uncommon terms, and unidentified literary phrases. This density of expression was often intentionally ironic; but unequipped readers found it off-putting. Cozzens's technical achievements—the use of flashbacks, the simultaneity of action—were overlooked by the critics who attacked his style and politics. The cowardly reviewers who had initially hailed the novel and Cozzens's genius did not defend themselves or him against the furious attacks. Cozzens was an apolitical conservative, an unacceptable position among the academicians and critics who perceived him as their enemy. He did not respond, and his reputation faded. Cozzens's superb final novel, Morning Noon and Night (1968), about a successful business consultant, was ignored by readers and critics.

James Gould Cozzens's dedication to the craft of fiction was uncontaminated by critical fashions. He insisted that his standing among the literary reputation-makers did not matter to him, alive or dead. It matters to the readers who are deprived of his novels.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Dust jacket for Cozzens's eleventh novel, which examines the organization of a Florida air base plagued by racial tensions in September 1943

BY LOVE POSSESSED

JAMES GOULD COZZENS

Dust jacket for the controversial 1957 novel that was both acclaimed as a masterpiece and viciously attacked. The clock on the jacket is described in the novel's first paragraph and referred to again in its last paragraph.

Principal Books by Cozzens

Confusion. Boston: Brimmer, 1924.
Michael Scarlett. New York: Boni, 1925.
Cock Pit. New York: Morrow, 1928.
The Son of Perdition. New York: Morrow, 1929.
S.S. San Pedro. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1931.
The Last Adam. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1933.
Castaway. New York: Random House, 1934.
Men and Brethren. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1936.
Ask Me Tomorrow. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1940.
The Just and the Unjust. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1942.
Guard of Honor. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1948.
By Love Possessed. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1957.
Children and Others. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1964.

Morning Noon and Night. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1968.

A Flower in Her Hair. Bloomfield Hills, Mich. & Columbia, S.C.: Brucoli Clark, 1974.

A Rope for Dr. Webster. Bloomfield Hills, Mich. & Columbia, S.C.: Brucoli Clark, 1976.

Just Representations: A James Gould Cozzens Reader, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press / New York & London: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978.

A Time of War: Air Force Diaries and Pentagon Memos, 1943–45, edited by Brucoli. Columbia, S.C. & Bloomfield Hills, Mich.: Brucoli Clark, 1984.

James Gould Cozzens Selected Notebooks: 1960–1967, edited by Brucoli. Columbia, S.C. & Bloomfield Hills, Mich.: Brucoli Clark, 1984.

Studying James Gould Cozzens

James Gould Cozzens is a major American novelist whose work has been overlooked, misunderstood, or damned by literary historians and academic critics. His career breaks into two parts: before and after By Love Possessed (1957). The reception of his fourteenth novel made him a temporary Time-cover celebrity; it was followed by attacks on his conservative social standards and his “coldness.” His novels were rejected for reasons that had nothing to do with literary values. James Gould Cozzens: A Documentary Volume, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 294. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2004), is the best place to start studying his work, career, and reputation. The illustrated catalogue James Gould Cozzens: An Exhibition from the Brucoli Collection (Columbia, S.C.: Thomas Cooper Library, 2000) provides an overview and includes his previously unpublished correspondence. Just Representations: A James Gould Cozzens Reader, edited by Brucoli (1978), provides writings by and about him. George Garrett’s essay, “Whatever Wishful Thinking May Wish: The Example of James Gould Cozzens,” written for that volume, provides a sound approach to reading and studying Cozzens.

Introductions to Cozzens’s themes and methods are provided by THE LAST ADAM (his sixth novel, 1933), MEN AND BRETHREN (his eighth novel, 1936), and THE JUST AND THE UNJUST (his tenth novel, 1942). The masterpiece, Guard of Honor, based on Cozzens’s inside knowledge of the Air Force during World War II, is supported by A Time of War: Air Force Diaries and Pentagon Memos, 1943–1945, edited by Brucoli (1984). Cozzens’s most controversial work, By Love Possessed (1957), is his most stylistically complex novel and is required reading for serious students of Cozzens’s career. Readers who want to test Cozzens before reading a novel can start with his only volume of short stories, Children and Others (1964), which are excellent and clear.

Cozzens declined to become a literary celebrity. He didn’t grant interviews; he didn’t write about himself or his work; he made no public appearances; he avoided other writers. There is one biography, James Gould Cozzens: A Life Apart (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983), by Brucoli, who also edited Cozzens's Selected Notebooks: 1960–1967 (1984). Cozzens's work has generated relatively little criticism; the best critical volume is Frederick George Bracher's The Novels of James Gould Cozzens (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959). James Gould Cozzens: A New Acquist of True Experience, edited by Brucoli (Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1979), is a collection of essays about his work. The primary bibliography is Brucoli's James Gould Cozzens: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1981). Pierre Michel's outdated James Gould Cozzens: An Annotated Checklist (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1971) should be supplemented by the annual MLA bibliographies available in print or on-line in major libraries; but there is little there. Cozzens's manuscripts and correspondence are at the Princeton University Library.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

The Crack-Up by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: New Directions, 1945) collection

F. Scott FITZGERALD's friend, the influential critic Edmund WILSON, edited this posthumously published collection of writings by and about Fitzgerald, which helped to trigger the Fitzgerald revival. The volume took its title from the 1936 essays published in Esquire—"The Crack-Up," "Pasting It Together," and "Handle with Care"—in which Fitzgerald analyzed his depression and failing creative powers after the disappointing reception of TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934). He portrayed himself as a ruined man, and some of his literary friends regarded these confessional pieces as embarrassing. The collection includes letters to and from Fitzgerald, excerpts from his Notebooks, and critical assessments and tributes. This volume has remained in print; it continues to influence Fitzgerald's literary reputation and the perception of his character.

Source

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Notebooks of F. Scott Fitzgerald, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli. New York & London: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/ Brucoli Clark, 1978.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

Craig's Wife by George E. Kelly (produced 1925) play

A three-act PULITZER PRIZE-winning comedy-drama by George E. KELLY, Craig's Wife opened on Broadway October 12, 1925, for 360 performances. The play is a study of Harriet Craig, a possessive, social-climbing woman so obsessed by her home and possessions that she will not allow her husband, Walter, to smoke in his own house. Residing with them is Miss Austen, Walter's unmarried aunt, who warns Harriet that her oppressive ways will be her undoing, insisting that "other people will not go on being made miserable indefinitely." Critics applauded the psychological depth of Kelly's exploration of Harriet's character and the depiction of a distorted brand of middle-class provinciality. Craig's Wife became a summer stock staple for many years.

Source

Kelly, George. Craig's Wife. Boston: Little, Brown, 1926.

—James Fisher

Crane, Hart (1899–1932) poet

It is as though a poem gave the reader as he left it a singe, new word, never before spoken and impossible to actually enunciate, but self-evident as an active principle in the reader's consciousness henceforward.

—"General Aims and Theories" (1926)

Ohio-born Harold Hart Crane was the only child of the inventor of the "Lifesavers" candy. After his parents' stormy divorce in 1916, Crane moved to New York, in part to escape what he described as the "bloody battleground" of his childhood and in part to hone his skill as a poet. Energized by the city, Crane labored over his craft, hoping to emerge as a formidable voice among his contemporaries.

The decade of the 1920s were Crane's most prolific years, during which he wrote such landmark poems as "For the Marriage of Faustus and Helen" and "Voyages," which he included in his first collection, White Buildings (1926), and his epic, THE BRIDGE (1930). At the same time, however, his personal life began to deteriorate as he struggled with his homosexuality, several failed relationships, his parents' ongoing battles, and alcoholism. On April 27, 1932, Crane committed suicide by leaping from the stern of the Orizaba, ten miles east of the Florida coast, three months short of his thirty-third birthday.

Crane's poetry is not easily accessible. The density of his language and structure makes him one of the most difficult poets to read from any period or tradition. As with the poetry of his contemporary, T. S. ELIOT, his works are heavily allusive, often referencing passages from other texts that leave the uninitiated reader dependent upon footnotes.

The Bridge, published in 1930, is the poet's most ambitious project in both its breadth and theme. With the Brooklyn Bridge as its primary setting and organizing symbol, the poem highlights events both personal and historical that define the vast American experience in terms of its heritage and culture, in much the same way that Crane's influential precursor, Walt Whitman, attempted to craft an epic poem of American culture in Leaves of Grass.

Like his American contemporaries writing in the post-World War I culture (T. S. Eliot, Wallace STEVENS, Ezra POUND, and William Carlos WILLIAMS), Crane was writing during the Modernist period (see MODERNISM), a time of great experimentation with language and style, as well as grand attempts to capture either the decay and despair of the times or its potential and promise, such as Crane desired to express in The Bridge.

Few poets in the American tradition have attained the artistic stature along with the critical controversy of Hart Crane, whose work has been widely read and anthologized since his death. His legacy remains difficult to resolve, however, in part because his suicide at the height of his career left literary critics to argue over whether he reached his full potential. The critic Harold Bloom is not wholly alone in placing Crane with Walt Whitman, Emily Dickinson, and Wallace Stevens as the four pillars of American poetic tradition.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Hart Crane: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.

Crane, Hart. The Complete Poems and Selected Letters and Prose of Hart Crane, edited by Brom Weber. New York: Anchor, 1966.

Mariani, Paul. The Broken Tower: The Life of Hart Crane. New York: Norton, 1999.

—John P. Wargacki

Crane, Stephen (1871–1900) novelist, poet, journalist, short-story writer

I cannot help vanishing and disappearing and dissolving. It is my foremost trait.

—Crane to Ripley Hitchcock, March 1896

Born in Newark, New Jersey, Stephen Crane was the fourteenth child of the Reverend Dr. Jonathan Townley Crane, a well-known Methodist minister, and Mary Helen Peck Crane, a leader in church activities and the New Jersey Women's Christian Temperance movement. After attending fall semester at Lafayette College in 1890, he transferred to Syracuse University in spring 1891 but left after one semester. Instead of staying in school, he decided to pursue a career as a writer and journalist. Moving to New York City in 1892, he began writing stories and newspaper sketches about urban slum life. From January to May 1895 he traveled through the West and Mexico and wrote feature articles. With the publication of his Civil War novel THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE in fall 1895, Crane became an international celebrity.

Because of the popularity of his novel, Crane was hired as a war correspondent to report the Greek-Turkish War in 1897. Earlier in the year, he had attempted to travel to Cuba to cover the growing insurrection against Spanish rule, but his steamship, the Commodore, had sunk in the Atlantic Ocean. With the outbreak of the SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR in Stephen Crane, 1897. This photograph was taken in Athens, where Crane was reporting on fighting between the Greeks and the Turks.

1898, he got to Cuba and covered the major battles, including Teddy Roosevelt's famous charge up San Juan Hill. He died at age twenty-eight in Badenweiler, Germany, where he had gone for treatment of his tuberculosis.

Though Crane is best known for The Red Badge of Courage, he was a prolific writer who in a career of about a decade wrote two other novels, half of another, three novellas, two collections of poetry, and more than 250 short stories, sketches, and newspaper reports. He experimented with various narrative techniques and developed a distinctive style marked by irony, impressionistic responses to reality, and characters with limited perspectives through which to interpret reality. Whether he was writing about the impact of immigration and urbanization on New York City; the disappearance of the frontier in the West; conflict during recent or imaginary wars; or the absurdity of life—whether in a city, on the battlefield, or in the wilderness on land or at sea—Crane's writing reflects major forces that transformed American culture in the last part of the nineteenth century.

Of Crane's novellas, Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1893, revised 1896) is the best early example of literary NATURALISM in American fiction; George's Mother (1896), a companion piece also dealing with slum life in New York City, is more realistic than naturalistic and less melodramatic in its treatment of plot and characterization. THE MONSTER is a masterful study of prejudice and social isolation in small-town America. Two of Crane's novels, The Third Violet (1897) and Active Service (1899), are romantic comedies of manners; The O'Ruddy (1903), an unfinished novel completed by one of Crane's friends, is an historical romance.

Crane's collections of short stories include The Little Regiment and Other Episodes of the American Civil War (1896); Wounds in the Rain (1900), which includes most of his Cuban war stories; and Whilomville Stories (1900), about children in an imaginary town called Whilomville (partly modeled on Crane's boyhood in Port Jervis, New York). The Open Boat and Other Tales of Adventure (1898) includes Crane's greatest short story and one of the masterpieces in American literature, "THE OPEN BOAT," based on his harrowing experience with three other men in a ten-foot dinghy following the sinking of the Commodore. Two other highly regarded short stories are "The Blue Hotel" and "The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky." Besides parodying a romanticized view of the Old West, "The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky" dramatizes the advancement of Eastern culture into the Western frontier. In "The Blue Hotel," an easterner's distorted view of the West results in violence and death.

In two collections of poetry, THE BLACK RIDERS AND OTHER LINES (1895) and WAR IS KIND (1899), Crane rejected the sentimental poetry popular at the time and wrote about spiritual crisis and disillusion with society. He also strove to create a new kind of journalism that focused less on the "objective facts" of a news report—the who, what, and where—and more on his impressions of an event.

Although Crane was recognized in his lifetime as an important new voice in American literature, his contemporary reputation was defined by what he called the "accursed 'Red Badge,'" which became the touchstone for all of his other work. While such works as Maggie, "The Open Boat," and The Monster received favorable notice, his poetry, following the publication of The Black Riders and Other Lines, was ridiculed and parodied. Crane, however, was ahead of his time, and his varied career anticipated such literary and journalistic trends as MODERNISM, IMAGISM, and the New Journalism.

—Paul Sorrentino

Principal Books by Crane

Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (A Story of New York), as Johnston Smith. New York: Privately printed, 1893. Revised edition, as Stephen Crane. New York: Appleton, 1896.

Manuscript for Stephen Crane's poem published as "In the Desert" in The Black Riders and Other Lines (1895)

The Black Riders and Other Lines. Boston: Copeland & Day, 1895.
The Red Badge of Courage: An Episode of the American Civil War. New York: Appleton, 1895.

George's Mother. New York & London: Edward Arnold, 1896.

The Little Regiment and Other Episodes of the American Civil War. New York: Appleton, 1896.

The Third Violet. New York: Appleton, 1897.

The Open Boat and Other Tales of Adventure. New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1898.

War Is Kind. New York: Stokes, 1899.

Active Service. New York: Stokes, 1899.

The Monster and Other Stories. New York & London: Harper, 1899. Enlarged edition, London & New York: Harper, 1901.

Whilomville Stories. New York & London: Harper, 1900.

Wounds in the Rain: A Collection of Stories Relating to the Spanish-American War of 1898. New York: Stokes, 1900.

Great Battles of the World. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1901.

Last Words. London: Digby, Long, 1902.

The O'Ruddy: A Romance, by Crane and Robert Barr. New York: Stokes, 1903.

The Sullivan County Sketches of Stephen Crane, edited by Melvin Schoberlin. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1949.

Stephen Crane: Uncollected Writings, edited by O. W. Fryckstedt. Uppsala, Sweden: Studia Anglistica Upsaliensia, 1963.

chap
The Red Badge of Courage
An Episode of the American Civil War.
By Stephen Crane.

The cold passed reluctantly from the earth and the retiring fogs <sup>revealed</sup> an army stretched out on the hills, resting. As the landscape changed from brown to green the army awakened and began to tremble with eagerness at the noise of rumors. It cast its eyes upon the roads which were growing from long ~~and~~ troughs of liquid mud to proper thoroughfares. A river, amber-tinted in the shadow of its banks, furled at the army's feet and at night when the stream had become of a sorrowful blackness one could see, across, the red eye-like gleam of hostile camp-fires set in the low brows of distant hills.

<sup>a certain soldier</sup>
Once, ~~Jim Conklin~~, developed virtues and went resolutely to wash a shirt. He came flying back from a brook waving his garment, banner-like. He was swelled with a tale he had heard from a reliable friend who had heard it from a ~~reliable~~ truthful cavalymen who had heard it from his trust-worthy brother, one of the orderlies at division head-quarters. ~~He~~ <sup>He</sup> adopted the important air of a herald in red and gold.

"We're going to move tomorrow - sure," he said.

The War Dispatches of Stephen Crane, edited by R. W. Stallman and E. R. Hagemann. New York: New York University Press, 1966.

The New York City Sketches of Stephen Crane, edited by Stallman and Hagemann. New York: New York University Press, 1964.

Sullivan County Tales and Sketches, edited by Stallman. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1968.

The Notebook of Stephen Crane, edited by Donald and Ellen Greiner. Charlottesville, Va.: A John Cook Wylie Memorial Publication, 1969.

Stephen Crane in the West and Mexico, edited by Joseph Katz. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1970.

The Red Badge of Courage: A Facsimile Edition of the Manuscript, 2 volumes, edited by Fredson Bowers. Washington, D.C.: Brucoli Clark/NCR Microcard Edition, 1973.

The Works of Stephen Crane, edited by Fredson Bowers. 10 volumes. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1969–1976.

Stephen Crane: Prose and Poetry, edited by J. C. Levenson. New York: Library of America, 1984.

Studying Stephen Crane

Despite having a professional career that lasted only about ten years because of his early death, Stephen Crane was a prolific writer of fiction, poetry, and journalism. A student new to Crane studies will find two books especially helpful: Paul Sorrentino's Student Companion to Stephen Crane (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005) is an introduction to his life and work; Stanley Wertheim's A Stephen Crane Encyclopedia (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997) provides significant information for almost all of Crane's work. The best single volume of Crane's work is J. C. Levenson's Stephen Crane: Prose and Poetry (New York: Library of America, 1984). What is not there can be found in the ten volumes of The Works of Stephen Crane, edited by Fredson Bowers (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1969–1976), available in college libraries.

Donald Pizer's Critical Essays on Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage (Boston: Hall, 1990) collects some of the most important critical interpretations of Crane's greatest and most famous work. Of special note is James Colvert's essay, which addresses a critical debate among scholars: which version of Crane's novel should be read—the manuscript version or the version published in 1895? Colvert argues convincingly for the latter.

Crane was a master of the novella and short story whose most important works include MAGGIE: A GIRL OF THE STREETS (1893; revised 1896), THE MONSTER (1899), "The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky," "The Blue Hotel," and "THE OPEN BOAT." Two useful books for the study of such works are Chester L. Wolford's Stephen Crane: A Study of the Short Fiction (New York: Twayne, 1989) and Michael W. Schaefer's A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Stephen Crane (New York: Hall, 1996).

Cover for Crane's first collection of poems

The best study of Crane's journalism is Michael Robertson's Stephen Crane, Journalism, and the Making of Modern American Literature (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997). Milne Holton's Cylinder of Vision: The Fiction and Journalistic Writing of Stephen Crane (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1972) is a helpful analysis. Maurice Bassan's Stephen Crane: A Collection of Critical Essays (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1967) is also recommended. Though Crane is primarily known as a writer of prose, he was also a serious poet. The most detailed study of the poetry is Daniel Hoffman's The Poetry of Stephen Crane (New York: Columbia University Press, 1957).

Biographical study of Crane has been hampered by the fact that the first major biography, Thomas Beer's Stephen Crane (1923), is a literary forgery, which was not revealed until 1990. Every biography of Crane has unknowingly relied upon fictional anecdotes, forged documents, and falsified documents. To separate fact from fiction, students interested in Crane's life should first see his letters, collected in Wertheim and Sorrentino's The Correspondence of Ste- phen Crane (New York: Columbia University Press, 1988). They should also consult the same authors' The Crane Log: A Documentary Life of Stephen Crane 1871–1900 (New York: Hall, 1994). Linda H. Davis's Badge of Courage: The Life of Stephen Crane (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1998) is the first biography almost completely free of Beer's fabrications, but it contains factual errors and simplifies analyses of Crane's personality.

R. W. Stallman's Stephen Crane: A Critical Bibliography (Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1972) cites contemporary reviews of Crane's work and criticism of it up to 1970. For more-recent criticism, see Patrick Dooley's Stephen Crane: An Annotated Bibliography of Secondary Scholarship (New York: Hall, 1992). Students should also consult the online bibliographies of the Stephen Crane Society (<<http://www.wsu.edu/~campbelld/crane/bibpage.html>>) and the Modern Language Association (available in many major libraries).

—Paul Sorrentino

The Crisis (1910– ) periodical

This monthly magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), founded by W. E. B. DU BOIS in 1910, was the first to publish many of the writers of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. The magazine included articles about lynchings, meetings of African American and Pan-African congresses, poetry, reviews, translations, and short stories. Langston HUGHES published "THE NEGRO SPEAKS OF RIVERS," one of his most important poems, in The Crisis. The magazine continues to be a monthly publication of the NAACP, and publishes articles of general interest concerning African American culture and politics.

Criticism

See LITERARY CRITICISM.

Crouse, Russel

See LINDSAY AND CROUSE.

Cullen, Countee (1903–1946) poet, anthologist, novelist, translator, writer of children's literature, playwright

Countee Cullen remains something of an elusive figure in spite of his key role in the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Even his birthplace has not been authenticated. He was an adopted child who perhaps felt free to create his own origins. Cullen's intelligence first manifested itself at DeWitt Clinton High School in New York City. He became editor of the school newspaper and wrote poetry for its literary magazine. His sense of destiny is clearly marked out in an early poem, "I Have a Rendezvous with Life," which won an award in a citywide competition. During the Harlem Renaissance he published three admired books of poems: Color (1925), Copper Sun (1927), and The Ballad of the Brown Girl (1927). Although Cullen often took African American life as his subject, he wrote in a traditional style associated with English romantic poets such as John Keats. Certain critics faulted him for not relying more on black rhythms and speech patterns. Compared to writers such as Langston HUGHES, Cullen seemed formal and aloof, although his best work certainly is informed by intense passions. A learned and traditional poet, Cullen's appeal crossed racial lines. His mainstream acceptance was heralded with the publication of "Shroud of Color" in H. L. MENCKEN'S AMERICAN MERCURY. With his Phi Beta Kappa key from New York University and a master's degree from Harvard, Cullen cut a sophisticated figure in literary circles. By the end of the 1920s, however, Cullen's poetic drive seemed to diminish and The Black Christ and Other Poems (1929) received mixed reviews. He wrote less and took up teaching. His most famous student was James Baldwin. Cullen's novel, One Way to Heaven (1932), retains value as retrospective on the Harlem Renaissance, and his books for children, The Lost Zoo (A Rhyme for the Young, But Not Too Young) (1940) and My Lives and How I Lost Them (1942), remain charming. Cullen's own selection of his best poetry is On These I Stand (1947).

Source

Shucard, Alan R. Countee Cullen. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Cummings, E. E. (1894–1962) poet, critic, novelist

Edward Estlin Cummings was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard. He attracted early recognition with THE ENORMOUS ROOM (1922), a novel based on his WORLD WAR I experiences. He also wrote Him (1927), an EXPRESSIONIST drama, and Eimi (1933), his record of a trip to Russia.

But it is as a poet that Cummings made his reputation. Idiosyncratic and eccentric, his verse experiments with typography, slang, dialect, jazz rhythms, and jagged lines that mimic the sound or movement of his subjects. The very shape of his poems emphasize the forms of human expression. A poem about spring, for example, will be written in jumpy, bursting accents that the season itself represents. But Cummings could also be critical of society and of American culture. His frequently anthologized poems include "in Just-/ spring," "Buffalo Bill's/ defunct," and "next to of course god america i." Cummings's Complete Poems: 1913–1962 was published in 1972. His memoir i: six nonlectures, appeared in 1953.

Sources

Friedman, Norman, ed. (Re)valuing Cummings: Further Essays on the Poet, 1962–1993. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1996.

Kennedy, Richard S. E. E. Cummings Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1994.

Calisher, Hortense (1911– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Hortense Calisher grew up in Yorkville, a German Jewish neighborhood in New York City. Educated at Hunter High School and Barnard College, she wrote about the lives of middle-class Manhattanites. Her career started slowly: she began writing at thirty-six and published her first volume of short stories, In the Absence of Angels, in 1951. Her Collected Stories was published in 1975. Her later novels include The Bobby-Soxer (1986) and Age (1987). Calisher has written more than twenty books, including, perhaps most notably, her memoir, Herself (1972).

Source

Snodgrass, Kathleen. The Fiction of Hortense Calisher. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1993.

Campbell, Joseph (1904–1987) scholar, critic, editor

It has always been the prime function of mythology and rite to supply the symbols that carry the human spirit forward, in counteraction to those other constant human fantasies that tend to tie it back.

—The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949)

A scholar of comparative myths, Campbell spent one year at Dartmouth College and then attended Columbia University, where he received an A.B. in 1925 and an M.A. in 1927. When the English department at Columbia informed Campbell that mythology was not an appropriate area of study, he dropped out of the doctoral program. He joined the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College where he spent his time exploring the recurrence of archetypes in world literature.

Campbell's most important book is The Hero with a Thousand Faces (1949). Its wide-ranging exploration of myths—in Indian, Greek, Christian, Eskimo, Tibetan, Chinese, Japanese, and Australian cultures—led to its widespread success. A combination of anthropology and literary criticism, the book has appealed to scholars in many different disciplines.

Campbell also published a four-volume study, Masks of God (1959–1968). Myths to Live By (1972) and The Mythic Image (1974) did much to popularize Campbell's work. He also edited The Portable Jung (1971).

Sources

Ellwood, Robert S. The Politics of Myth: A Study of C. G. Jung, Mircea Eliade, and Joseph Campbell. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1999.

Segal, Robert A. Joseph Campbell: An Introduction. New York: Garland, 1987.

Canin, Ethan (1960– ) novelist, short-story writer, physician

Born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, Ethan Canin grew up in the Midwest and in San Francisco, where his father was concertmaster for the San Francisco Symphony. Canin enrolled at Stanford University intending to major in engineering, but he changed to English after reading The Stories of John Cheever (1978). In 1982 he joined the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP at the University of Iowa, where he earned his M.F.A. in 1984. Considering himself a failure at writing, he applied to medical school and enrolled at Harvard University. During his first year there, in an act he described as rebellion, Canin wrote the stories collected in Emperor of the Air (1988), which won the Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship. In 1991 he moved to San Francisco to begin an internal-medicine residency at the University of California, where he continued to write while still practicing medicine. Following the publication of his third book, The Palace Thief (1994), a collection of novellas, Canin devoted himself to writing full-time. He joined the faculty at the Iowa Writers' Workshop in 1998. His novels include Blue River (1991), which explores the history of two brothers, and For Kings and Planets (1998), which looks at two mismatched friends who eventually become brothers-in-law. Carry Me Across the Water (2001), his best-received novel, explores the long life of widower August Kleinman through vignettes of violent moments in his past.

—Anna Teekell

Capote, Truman (1924–1984) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

I invented myself, and then I invented a world to fit me.
—Interview with Gloria Steinem (1966?)

Truman Capote's early novels—Other Voices, Other Rooms (1948) and The Grass Harp (1951)—were influenced by the years he spent as a child among various relatives in the South. His parents divorced when he was four, and Capote was taken to live first in Monroeville, Alabama, and then, at age ten, in New Orleans.

From the beginning of his career, Capote was celebrated as a wunderkind who wrote with an elegance that many writers achieve only after writing several books. He was attracted to celebrities and other fashionable subjects, interests that are reflected in Breakfast at Tiffany's (1958), his charming story of Holly Golightly, a woman who tries to perfect her life, and Music for Chameleons (1980), a collection of stories and memoirs that feature his experiences with stars such as Marilyn Monroe.

Although classified as a writer with a sensitive grasp of what it was like to grow up in the South, Capote expanded his scope and his audience when he published IN COLD BLOOD in 1965. He called his account of the gruesome murder of a Kansas family a NONFICTION NOVEL. Although the best-selling book was based on fact, Capote wrote a narrative of such power that it has been compared with masterpieces of naturalism such as Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy (1925). As Capote developed the scene of the crime, he shifted points of view—entering, for example, the mind of one of the killers, Perry Smith. And instead of simply quoting from interviews with Smith and the other killer, Hickok, Capote reassembled their stories in his own poetic prose.

Capote continued to write profiles of personalities and short stories after In Cold Blood; however, he never produced another major work. Fragments of a novel, Answered Prayers, were published posthumously in 1986. This work was intended to be his exposé of high society, and the characters were largely based on his close friends, many of whom felt betrayed by Capote's revelations.

Sources

Clarke, Gerald. Capote: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1988.

Grobel, Lawrence, ed. Conversations with Capote. New York: New American Library, 1985.

Plimpton, George. Truman Capote: In Which Various Friends, Enemies, Acquaintances, and Detractors Recall His Turbulent Career. New York: Doubleday, 1997.

Caputo, Philip (1941– ) novelist, journalist

Philip Caputo is a novelist and journalist who came to national attention with a best-selling memoir of his Vietnam experiences, A Rumor of War (1977), now a modern classic. Born in Chicago in 1941, he attended Loyola University before joining the U.S. Marine Corps. In 1965 he was dispatched to South Vietnam and returned to the United States in 1966 to begin work as a journalist. Caputo shared a Pulitzer Prize in 1973 for his coverage of election fraud in Chicago. He returned to Vietnam to cover the war for the Chicago Tribune and reported on the fall of Saigon in 1975. His years as a foreign correspondent and war veteran continue to inspire his fiction, which often features journalists and other international adventurers negotiating their way through countries torn by war and social upheaval. His more than half a dozen novels include Horn of Africa (1980), Delcorso's Gallery (1983), Indian Country (1987), The Voyage (1999), and Acts of Faith (2005). He recounts his experiences as an international journalist, mixing fact and fiction, in Means of Escape: An Imagined Memoir (1991). In 2005 Caputo also published a history of the VIETNAM WAR, 10,000 Days of Thunder.

—Marshall Boswell

Carlson, Ron (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Logan, Utah, Ron Carlson laces his tales of middle-class discontent with a breezy, bittersweet comedy. Educated at the University of Houston and at the University of Utah, where he received an M.A. in 1972, Carlson worked as a boarding-school teacher in Connecticut while he drafted his first book, the coming-of-age novel Betrayed by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1977). In 1981, following the publication of his second novel, Truants (1981), he returned to Utah with his family. He found success with his third book and first short-story collection, The News of the World (1987), a sunny collection of first-person narratives. He has since published additional story collections—Plan B for the Middle Class (1992), Hotel Eden (1997), and At the Jim Bridger (2002)—as well as a novel for young adults, The Speed of Light (2003). He teaches creative writing at the University of California, Irvine.

Source

Rosen, Michael J. "An Interview with Ron Carlson," High Plains Literary Review, 2 (Winter 1987): 257–267.

—Marshall Boswell

Carruth, Hayden (1921– ) poet

Born in Connecticut, Hayden Carruth writes hard-edged poetry that has been compared to the understated but sharply phrased work of Robert Frost and T. S. Eliot. The Selected Poetry of Hayden Carruth was published in 1986. Carruth is also the editor of the influential anthology The Voice That Is Great Within Us: American Poetry of the Twentieth Century (1970), which is often used in the classroom because of its comprehensiveness. In 1996 he won both a Pulitzer Prize and a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Scrambled Eggs and Whiskey: Poems, 1991–1996. A collection of autobiographical essays, Reluctantly, was published in 1998. Toward the Distant Islands, New and Selected Poems (2006) was edited by Sam Hamill, Carruth's publisher at Copper Canyon Press.

Source

New York State Writers Institute. "Talking to Hayden: New York State Writers Institute," Writers Online, 1 (Spring 1997): <<http://www.albany.edu/writers-inst/olv1n3.html#carruth>> (viewed May 18, 2007).

Carver, Raymond (1938–1988) poet, short-story writer, screenwriter

It is possible to write a line of seemingly innocuous dialogue and have it send a chill along the reader's spine—the source of artistic delight, as Nabokov would have it. That's the kind of writing that interests me.

—"On Writing" (1981)

In prose both spare and skeletal, Raymond Carver wrote stories that disclosed the inarticulate despair of American working-class life. At the time of his death in 1988, he was perhaps one of the most imitated writers in America, as countless latecomers tried to mimic his deceptively simple, minimalist style, thus inadvertently producing a controversial mini-movement alternately called "catatonic realism" or "truckstop minimalism."

Carver was born in Clatskanie, Oregon, in 1938 and grew up in Washington. By the time he was twenty years old, he was already a husband and father, with a drinking problem. Throughout the late 1950s and early 1960s he worked as a deliveryman and a janitor while struggling to complete his B.A. With the help of novelist John GARDNER, he gained acceptance to the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP in 1963. After finishing his M.F.A., he worked as an editor for Science Research Associates, during which time he published his first two poetry collections. In 1971 Gordon Lish, the fiction editor for Esquire, accepted Carver's story "Neighbors" for publication, a coup Carver was able to parlay into a series of university teaching jobs. When his first short-story collection, Will You Please Be Quiet, Please? (1976), was nominated for a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1977, Carver, who had battled with alcoholism throughout the previous two decades, quit drinking for good. That same year he met the poet Tess Gallagher, whom he later married. In 1980 he joined the faculty of Syracuse University. His third collection, Cathedral (1983), was nominated for both the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD and the Pulitzer Prize. He died from lung cancer in 1988.

Raymond Carver

Dust jacket for Carver's first major collection of short stories, published in 1976

Carver never wrote a novel. His reputation is based on his three major short-story collections—Will You Please Be Quiet, Please?, What We Talk About When We Talk About Love (1981), and Cathedral (1983)—as well as on his volume of selected stories, Where I'm Calling From (1988). Carver drew heavily upon his own experiences as a heavy-drinking member of the American working class, and, minimizing attention to plot, traditional narrative drive, and even character development, he placed a strong focus on the careful accumulation of sparse but significant concrete details.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Carver

Near Klamath. Sacramento: English Club of Sacramento State College, 1968.

Winter Insomnia. Santa Cruz, Calif.: Kayak, 1970.

- Put Yourself in My Shoes*. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra, 1974.
At Night the Salmon Move. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra, 1976.
Will You Please Be Quiet, Please? New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.
Furious Seasons and Other Stories. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra, 1977.
What We Talk About When We Talk About Love. New York: Knopf, 1981.
The Pheasant. Worcester, Mass.: Metacom, 1982.
Fires: Essays, Poems, Stories. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra, 1983.
Cathedral. New York: Knopf, 1983.
If It Please You. Northridge, Calif.: Lord John, 1984.
This Water. Concord, N.H.: Ewert, 1985.
The Stories of Raymond Carver. London: Picador, 1985.
Where Water Comes Together with Other Water. New York: Random House, 1985.
My Father's Life. Derry, N.H.: Babcock & Koontz, 1986.
Ultramarine. New York: Random House, 1986.
Early for the Dance. Concord, N.H.: Ewert, 1986.
Those Days: Early Writings, edited by William L. Stull. Elmwood, Conn.: Raven, 1987.
In a Marine Light: Selected Poems. London: Collins Harvill, 1987.
Intimacy. Concord, N.H.: Ewert, 1987.
Where I'm Calling From: New and Selected Stories. New York: Atlantic Monthly, 1988.
Elephant, and Other Stories. London: Collins Harvill, 1989.
A New Path to the Waterfall. New York: Atlantic Monthly, 1989.
Carnations: A One-Act Play. St. Paul, Minn.: Engdahl Typography, 1992.
Nobody Said Anything and Other Stories. New York: Books in Motion, 1992.
No Heroics, Please: Uncollected Writings, edited by William L. Stull. New York: Vintage, 1992.
Short Cuts: Selected Stories. New York: Vintage, 1993.

Studying Raymond Carver

During his lifetime, Raymond Carver published six short-story collections and five volumes of poetry. In the years since his death in 1988, another volume of new poetry and several volumes of collected, revised, and/or previously unpublished stories and poems have surfaced. For the student first approaching Carver's works, Short Cuts: Selected Stories (New York: Vintage, 1993) offers a sampling. Where I'm Calling From: The Selected Stories (London: Harvill, 1993) is a much fuller collection. All of Us: The Collected Poems (New York: Knopf, 1998) provides most of his poetry. These may be supplemented with Call Me If You Need Me: The Uncollected Fiction and Prose, edited by William L. Stull (London: Harvill, 2000). There is no good secondary bibliography. Students should consult the MLA Bibliography, which lists 224 works on Carver as of spring 2007. For Carver's personal perspective on his own work and fiction and poetry in general, Conversations with Raymond Carver, edited by Marshall Bruce Gentry and William Stull (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990) is essential. Carver Country: The World of Raymond Carver (New York: Scribners, 1990) offers previously unpublished letters and photographic montages of the author's family life and physical environment that add some biographical weight to the poems and stories. Maryann Burk Carver, the author's first wife, published a memoir, What It Used to Be Like: A Portrait of My Marriage to Raymond Carver (New York: St. Martin's Press, 2006), which provides an alternate perspective on Carver's early years and the theme of marriage and divorce so prevalent throughout his stories and poems.

Dust jacket for the third of Carver's four major short-story collections. Cathedral (1983) was nominated for both the National Book Critics Circle Award and the Pulitzer Prize.

Most of the early criticism focuses on Carver the minimalist, with Arthur Saltzman's fine, though perhaps now dated, Understanding Raymond Carver (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988) reaffirming the general consensus reached by early critics in the scholarly journals. Other notable comprehensive studies include Adam Meyer's Raymond Carver (New York: Twayne, 1995) and Ewing Campbell's Raymond Carver: A Study of the Short Fiction (New York: Twayne, 1992). Randolph Runyon's Reading Raymond Carver (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1992) explores what Runyon describes as the "intratextuality," or webs of connectedness, apparent within and across the stories of Carver's early collections.

Several thesis-driven studies have managed to rescue Carver's work from minimalist obscurity. In The Stories of Raymond Carver: A Critical Study (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1995), Kirk Nessel identifies Carver's new realism as both a continuation of the realistic trend established by predecessors such as Saul BELLOW, John UPDIKE, and John Gardner, and as a reaction against the self-reflexive pyrotechnics of the Postmodernists like John BARTH, Thomas PYNCHON, and Robert COOVER. Arthur F. Bethea's Technique and Sensibility in the Fiction and Poetry of Raymond Carver (New York: Routledge, 2002) reassesses the prevalence of indeterminacy that earlier critics find paramount to Carver's work. Bethea argues that Carver asserts meaning through idiosyncratic poetic and fictional techniques. Bethea offers the most extensive analysis of Carver's poetry available to date. Raymond Carver: Comprehensive Research and Study Guide, edited by Harold Bloom (Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2002) is a useful resource. Sandra Kleppe's and Robert Miltner's New Paths to Raymond Carver: Critical Essays on His Life, Fiction, and Poetry (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2007) promises to fill critical gaps with more-recent scholarship and new perspectives on all of Carver's work.

—Student Guide by Paul Plisiewicz

Casey, John (1939– ) novelist, translator

John Casey was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1939 and was educated at Harvard University (B.A., 1962), Harvard Law School (LL.B., 1965) and the University of Iowa (M.F.A., 1968). He won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for his best-selling seafaring adventure Spartina (1989). His other books include the novels An American Romance (1977) and The Half-Life of Happiness (1998), as well as Testimony and Demeanor (1979), a short-story collection. He teaches in the fiction-writing program at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

—Marshall Boswell

Cassill, R. V. (1919–2002) novelist

Born and raised in Iowa, R. V. Cassill was educated at the University of Iowa, graduating with an M.A. in 1949 and returning in 1960 to teach creative writing there. In the late 1960s he took a position at Brown University, where in 1972 he was made full professor; he retired in 1983.

In his short fiction Cassill apparently aimed to draw from the inventions of writers such as James Joyce and Ernest Hemingway. While not formally experimental, Cassill's short stories nevertheless strengthened the genre by introducing characters and themes that previously had been ignored, particularly through his stories about the middle class. Cassill published provocative novels on a wide range of subjects, including Eagle on the Coin (1950), the story of a young liberal academic who helps an African American's running for election to the local school board; Clem Anderson (1961), about a self-destructive American poet modeled on Dylan Thomas; The President (1964), about the career of an ambitious college president; La Vie Passionnée of Rodney Buckthorne (1968), a satire about a Midwestern academic who liberates himself in Greenwich Village; Dr. Cobb's Game (1970), a spirited retelling of the 1963 John Profumo political and sexual scandal in Great Britain; Flame (1980), the life of a female movie star; and After Goliath (1985), a fictional biography of King David. His short fiction is collected in works such as Three Stories (1982) and Late Stories (1995).

—Marshall Boswell

Catch-22 by Joseph Heller (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1961) novel

Joseph HELLER's first and most famous novel is a black comedy set in Italy during WORLD WAR II. The title phrase, which Heller coined for the novel, has since entered the language, and refers to any situation in which one becomes a victim no matter what one does.

Yossarian, the novel's antihero, is an American bombardier trying with all his might to stay alive. No matter how many missions he flies, the required number keeps enlarging, while all around him both his superiors and his fellow comrades-in-arms find themselves caught up in the absurd complexities of the massive military bureaucracy that controls their fate. The Catch-22 of the title refers to a specific legal provision employed by the military. It "specified that a concern for one's safety in the face of dangers that were real and immediate was the process of a rational mind." Therefore, if one flies a mission that threatens one's life, one can be deemed crazy and therefore unfit to fly. But if one refuses to fly out of concern for one's safety, then one would be deemed sane and therefore required to fly.

The novel features a large cast of memorable—and memorably named—characters, chief among them being the hapless Major Major who, of course, gets promoted to Major; Yossarian's tireless, self-reliant roommate Orr; and Milo Minderbinder, a resourceful war profiteer who uses his tour of duty as an opportunity to transform himself into a one-man multinational corporation.

With its broad and bitter satire of the government, the military, and the heroism associated with World War II, this novel, which has sold well over eight million copies since its initial publication, influenced the counterculture ethos of the 1960s, and was a touchstone for the antiwar movement that emerged in response to the conflict in Vietnam.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Joseph Heller's Catch-22. New York: Chelsea House, 2001.

Kiley, Frederick, and Walter McDonald, eds. A Catch-22 Casebook. New York: Crowell, 1973.

Nagel, James, ed. Critical Essays on Catch-22. Encino, Calif.: Dickenson, 1974.

—Marshall Boswell

The Catcher in the Rye by J. D. Salinger (Boston: Little, Brown, 1951) novel

Perhaps the most widely read and most beloved novel of adolescent experience in American literature, J. D. SALINGER's first and only full-length novel dramatizes a tumultuous weekend in the life of a prep schooler named Holden Caulfield, who has since become representative of disaffected teenagers everywhere.

The novel's main action begins during a weekend before Christmas break. A student at a northeastern prep school called Pencey Prep, Holden considers the bulk of his Pencey classmates to be "phonies." In the wake of a fistfight with a detested classmate, Holden packs his bags and lights out for New York City, where he spends two episodic drunken days in the company of visiting tourists and a prostitute.

Although he has become estranged from his aloof, affluent parents, who live in New York City, Holden remains committed to his beloved kid sister, Phoebe. Fittingly, near the end of the novel, he sneaks into his parents' apartment to visit with Phoebe, an experience that leaves him feeling angry and bewildered at the incongruity between Phoebe's cherished innocence and the ugly world of "phonies" that she will soon inherit. His feelings of rage and helplessness are exasperated when he visits Phoebe's school and finds swearwords scrawled upon the walls. The novel ends with a guardedly hopeful scene in which Holden accompanies Phoebe to a playground. While watching Phoebe ride the carousel, Holden remarks, "The thing with kids is, if they want to grab for the gold ring, you have to let them do it, and not say anything. If they fall off, they fall off, but it's bad if you say anything."

Cast as an extended dramatic monologue implicitly directed at a therapist, Holden's story is as much about the telling as it is about what's told. Prior to publishing The Catcher in the Rye, Salinger was already a well-known writer of short fiction. His style combined the urbane elegance of John Cheever with the dialogue-driven terseness of John O'Hara, two frequent contributors to The New Yorker, where Salinger's stories also appeared. By the time he came to write The Catcher in the Rye, Salinger had perfected his gift for verbal mimicry, such that Holden's carefully stylized voice has an authentic quality. In this regard, The Catcher in the Rye consciously looks back to Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), another quest narrative told in a distinctive child's voice.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Holden Caulfield. New York: Chelsea House, 2005.

Salzman, Jack, ed. New Essays on The Catcher in the Rye. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Unrue, John. The Catcher in the Rye. Detroit: Manly, Inc./The Gale Group, 2001.

—Marshall Boswell

Cat's Cradle by Kurt Vonnegut (New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1963) novel
Kurt VONNEGUT's fourth novel, Cat's Cradle, is a surreal, slapstick work of METAFICTION that casts a grimly humorous eye on mankind's propensity for self-destruction. One of the signature works of the black humorist school of the 1950s and 1960s, the novel earned Vonnegut his first widespread following and set the stage for his most critically acclaimed work, SLAUGHTERHOUSE-FIVE (1969).

From the novel's opening lines—"Call me Jonah. My parents did, or nearly did. They called me John"—Vonnegut establishes, through this allusion to Herman Melville's Moby-Dick (1850), that the novel is keenly aware of its own artifice. As it happens (to use one of Jonah's favorite phrases), Jonah is a member of a religion known as Bokononism, whose holy book begins, "All of the true things I am about to tell you are shameless lies." In this unrealistic novel Vonnegut examines the real dangers of both religious fanaticism and nuclear armament, imparting a serious message with the caveat that grim humor might be the only way to confront "human stupidity."

Sources

Allen, William Rodney. Understanding Kurt Vonnegut. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Kurt Vonnegut's Cat's Cradle. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

The Centaur by John Updike (New York: Knopf, 1963) novel

Winner of the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, The Centaur combines the myth of Chiron with a loving and detailed recollection by a grown man of three days with his father in the winter of 1947.

Prior to publishing The Centaur, John UPDIKE had already established himself as a master prose stylist, particularly via the impressive run of stories about his Pennsylvania childhood that appeared in The New Yorker between 1958 and 1960. The Centaur draws on this same material, all set in the fictional town of Olinger, Pennsylvania, Updike's fictionalized version of his actual birthplace of Shillington. What distinguishes The Centaur from those stories is Updike's use of myth. Whereas in Modernist works such as James Joyce's

Ulysses (1922) or William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury (1929) the mythic parallels are merely invoked, in The Centaur scenes move back and forth from modern times to surreal sequences cast in Olympus.

The narrator is a thirty-year-old "second rate Abstract Expressionist" named Peter Caldwell who recalls his past in the hope of recovering his artistic ambition. Specifically, he remembers a snowy week when he was sixteen, during which he and his father, George Caldwell, a hapless high-school science teacher, found themselves stranded in Olinger, leaving the rest of their family—Peter's mother and her parents—to fend for themselves at the family farm. In Updike's refashioning of his mythic sources, Peter represents Prometheus, who stole fire from the gods, while George represents Chiron, the wise Centaur who, after serving faithfully as teacher to Achilles and others, is accidentally wounded by Heracles and, though immortal himself, elects to give his immortality to Prometheus.

Sources

Detweiler, Robert. John Updike. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Hunt, George. John Updike and the Three Great Secret Things: Sex, Religion, and Art. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William Eerdmans, 1980.

—Marshall Boswell

The Center for Editions of American Authors

The Center for Editions of American Authors (CEAA) of the Modern Language Association was constituted in 1963 and reconstituted in 1976 as the Committee on Scholarly Editions (CSE). During its decade of funding from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the CEAA editions established the standards for editing the texts of American literature and recovering the author's intentions. The editorial principles were established by Fredson Bowers for the Centenary Edition of the Works of Nathaniel Hawthorne. The Center for Editions of American Authors was headquartered at New York University under its first director William Gibson from 1962 to 1969 and at the University of South Carolina from 1969 to 1976 under Matthew J. Bruccoli. Textual and editorial standards were enforced by awarding or withholding the Center for Editions of American Authors "Approved Text" seal after 1967. 144 sealed volumes were published in 16 university press editions.

Chabon, Michael (1963– ) novelist, short-story writer

People frequently ask me what my favorite book is, and, in effect, there's always a capital-F Favorite capital-B Book that I would like to write myself someday. I try to go for that ideal of writing the best, most entertaining, most beautifully written book that I possibly can.

—Interview (2000)

Michael Chabon, the first of two sons, was born in Washington, D.C., to a pediatrician father and lawyer mother. His parents divorced when he was twelve, and his father soon moved to Pittsburgh, where Chabon spent his summer and holiday vacations in his youth. He received his B.A. in English from the University of Pittsburgh in 1984 and his M.F.A. from the University of California at Irvine in 1987. Chabon's adviser, Donald Heiney, was so impressed with Chabon's master's thesis, "The Mysteries of Pittsburgh," that he sent it to a literary agent in New York City. A private auction of the manuscript soon followed, and The Mysteries of Pittsburgh (1988) became a commercial best-seller that launched Chabon's career.

The Mysteries of Pittsburgh has been praised for its fully developed characters and relevant, contemporary themes of family conflict, sexual identity, and the function of memory in daily life. Critics have compared this coming-of-age novel to F. Scott Fitzgerald's This Side of Paradise (1920) and J. D. SALINGER'S CATCHER IN THE RYE (1951). Following the success of The Mysteries of Pittsburgh, Chabon published short stories in The New Yorker, Gentleman's Quarterly, and Mademoiselle, among others. Some of these stories were collected in A Model World and Other Stories (1991). Chabon wrote his second novel, Wonder Boys (1995), in less than a year. The novel is partially based on his experience with a false start, "Fountain City," and chronicles the exploits of Grady Tripp, a college creative-writing professor who is unable to complete the manuscript for his novel. Another collection of Chabon's short stories, Werewolves in Their Youth (1999), was published shortly before his third novel, THE AMAZING ADVENTURES OF KAVALIER AND CLAY (2000), debuted to critical praise. Recipient of the 2001 Pulitzer Prize, the novel is a bildungsroman of its two comic-book-writer protagonists, Joseph Kavalier and Samuel Clay, which explores themes of artistic production, methods of physical and spiritual escape, and the power of the imagination. Chabon has also published Summerland (2002), a children's fantasy novel; The Final Solution (2004), a novella; and The Yiddish Policemen's Union (2007), a novel.

Source

Fowler, Douglas. "The Short Fiction of Michael Chabon: Nostalgia in the Very Young," Studies in Short Fiction, 32 (Winter 1995): 75–82.

—Amber Shaw

Chang, Diana (1934– ) poet, novelist

Diana Chang was born in New York City and grew up in China. She returned to the United States after WORLD WAR II to attend high school. She majored in English at Barnard College, publishing her early poetry in the literary journals Poetry and Voices. Chang completed her first novel, Frontiers of Love, in 1956, and it immediately established her reputation as a promising writer. She has published five more novels: A Woman of Thirty (1959), A Passion for Life (1961), The

Only Game in Town (1963), Eye to Eye (1974), and A Perfect Love (1978). Since turning her focus to poetry, Chang has published the following collections: The Horizon Is Definitely Speaking (1982), What Matisse Is After (1984), Earth Water Light (1991), The Mind's Amazement: Poems Inspired by Paintings, Poetry, Music, Dance (1998), and Inklings (1999).

Chang explores Chinese American life from the perspective of a writer who is thoroughly grounded in the Western tradition. She has been called an existential writer because she focuses so much on questions of identity formation and consciousness of self (see EXISTENTIALISM). She is one of the first Asian American women authors to attain a major reputation.

Source

Hamalian, Leo. "A Melius Interview with Diana Chang," Melius, 20 (Winter 1995): 29.

The Changing Light at Sandover by James Merrill (New York: Atheneum, 1982) poem

The Changing Light at Sandover is the final name the poet James MERRILL assigned to his three-volume epic poem detailing the conversations he and his lover David Jackson conducted with a host of spirits in their Stonington, Connecticut, home via a Ouija board and a teacup. The first volume, "The Book of Ephraim," first appeared as the final section of Merrill's 1976 collection, Divine Comedies. The second and third volumes appeared as the books Mirabell: Books of Number (1978) and Scripts for the Pageant (1980). The entire series, including the final coda, The Higher Keys, was published as a single 560-page volume in 1982.

Sources

Materer, Timothy. James Merrill's Apocalypse. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2000.

Polito, Robert, ed. A Reader's Guide to James Merrill's The Changing Light at Sandover. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1994.

—Marshall Boswell

Chappell, Fred (1936– ) novelist, poet

Born and raised in North Carolina and educated at Duke University, where he received his M.A. in 1964, Fred Chappell taught at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro for more than twenty-five years. Much of his work can be termed regionalist. Set in North Carolina, his novels—It Is Time, Lord (1963), Dagon (1968), The Gaudy Place (1973), I Am One of You Forever (1985), Brighten the Corner Where You Are (1989), Farewell, I'm Bound to Leave You (1996), and Look Back All the Green Valley (1999)—include characters who explore the nature of family and community life, religion, sexuality, and education.

An accomplished poet, Chappell has published several collections: The World Between the Eyes (1971), River (1975), Bloodfire (1978), Wind Mountain (1979), and Earthsleep (1980). His later poetry includes Source (1985), First and Last Words (1989), Family Gathering (2000), and Backsack (2004).

Sources

Bizzaro, Patrick, ed. Dream Garden: The Poetic Vision of Fred Chappell. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997.

Lang, John. Understanding Fred Chappell. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

Chayefsky, Paddy (1923–1981) playwright, screenwriter, novelist

Born in New York City and a graduate of City College, Paddy Chayefsky turned to television writing after serving in WORLD WAR II. His most famous work is Marty, a sensitive story about a Bronx butcher and his tentative courtship with a schoolteacher, first shown on television in 1953 and made into a successful motion picture in 1955. Chayefsky's work is a blend of realism and sentimentality. He finds the good in common people. His great period of popularity was the 1950s, when he wrote The Bachelor Party, presented on television in 1953 and as a motion picture in 1957, and The Catered Affair, a 1955 television production and a 1956 motion picture. Much later in his career he achieved success in two remarkable motion pictures, Network, the story of a television anchorman; and Altered States, a science-fiction movie based on his 1978 novel of the same title. Chayefsky also had moderate success as a playwright with The Tenth Man (produced 1959), which focuses on Judaism, and with The Passion of Josef D (produced 1964), a treatment of Stalin, Trotsky, Lenin, and the Russian Revolution. His collected works appear in The Television Plays (1995). Chayefsky is studied for his grasp of 1950s American culture.

Source

Considine, Shaun. Mad as Hell: The Life and Work of Paddy Chayefsky. New York: Random House, 1994.

Chicago Critics

A group of academics centered at the University of Chicago in the 1940s and 1950s, the so-called Chicago Critics included R. S. Crane, Richard McKeon, Elder Olson, and W. R. Keast—all of whom practiced a critical method that was derived from Aristotle's Poetics.

The Chicago Critics did not subscribe to a single method of interpretation. Instead, they emulated Aristotle in their attempt to describe and analyze the constituent parts of a work of art (character, setting, and action). The key question for them was how these parts came together to make a whole work of art that moved an audience or readers.

Unlike the New Critics, the Chicago Critics did not focus exclusively on the elements of the work itself. They acknowledged that a work can be examined in a larger context of culture and history and that questions about it might lead to the examination of an author's life or body of writing. This examination in turn might elicit new and different questions than might arise from a consideration of the formal elements alone.

Source

Mukherjee, Tutun. The Chicago Critics: An Evaluation. Delhi: Academic Foundation, 1991.

Chu, Louis (1915–1970) novelist

Louis Chu came to Newark, New Jersey, from his native Canton, China. He received his M.A. from New York University in 1939 and served in the army during WORLD WAR II. He provides a vivid portrait of New York City's Chinatown in his only book, Eat a Bowl of Tea (1961). The novel is notable for its grasp of everyday Chinese American speech and social conflict.

Ciardi, John (1916–1986) poet, editor

John Ciardi was born in Boston and educated at Bates College in Maine and at Tufts University in Massachusetts where he graduated with honors in 1938. The following year, Ciardi received his M.A. from the University of Michigan. He taught English at Harvard and then at Rutgers and was poetry editor of the Saturday Review from 1956 to 1977.

Ciardi was a careful observer of American speech, and he was a stickler about the proper use of words, which he discussed with charming pedantry in his interludes on National Public Radio. He was a respected poet, celebrated for his wit in volumes such as Homeward to America (1940), Other Skies (1947), Live Another Day (1949), From Time to Time (1951), As If, Poems New and Selected (1955), and I Marry You (1958). His later work, In Fact (1962) and Lives of X (1971), dealt with his early years. Fast and Slow (1975) is a collection of essays. Ciardi was celebrated with honorary doctorates from seven institutions, including Tufts.

Source

Cifelli, Edward M. John Ciardi: A Biography. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1997.

Cisneros, Sandra (1954– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet

Born in Chicago, Sandra Cisneros is the child of a Mexican American mother and Mexican father. She grew up in Humboldt Park, Illinois, and graduated from Loyola University in 1976. She went to the University of Iowa to study writing, and received her M.F.A. in 1978. She has taught at the University of Michigan and other colleges and has published three collections of poetry: Bad Boys (1980), My Wicked, Wicked Ways (1987), and Loose Woman (1994). The novels The House on Mango Street (1984) and Caramelo; or, Puro Cuento (2002), and the collection Woman Hollering Creek, and Other Stories (1991) deal with the Chicana experience in the United States. Cisneros explores the nexus between ideas of individuality and community. Her prose tends to be poetic, but it is also clear and concise. She has identified herself as a feminist and has spoken strongly on the need for collective action by Chicana women.

Sources

Official Sandra Cisneros website: <<http://www.sandracisneros.com>> (viewed May 21, 2007).

Rodriguez Aranda, Pilar E. "On the Solitary Nature of Being Mexican, Female, Wicked and Thirty-Three: An Interview with Writer Sandra Cisneros," Americas Review, 18 (Spring 1990): 64–80.

—Marshall Boswell

Clampitt, Amy (1920–1994) poet

Born in New Providence, Iowa, Amy Clampitt was educated at Grinnell College, where she earned a B.A. in 1941. She then moved to New York City and worked in publishing as a researcher, editor, and librarian. She began publishing her poetry in 1978 in The New Yorker. Her first collection of poems, Kingfisher (1983), reflects her sensitivity to the natural world. She also published What the Light Was Like (1985), which ranges in subject matter from her native Iowa to Mexico, and Archaic Figures (1987), in which she evokes female figures such as Margaret Fuller, Dorothy Wordsworth, and George Eliot. Clampitt's Collected Poems appeared posthumously in 1997.

Clark, Eleanor (1913–1996) novelist

Eleanor Clark was born in Los Angeles and grew up in Connecticut. In 1934 she earned a B.A. from Vassar College, where along with Elizabeth BISHOP and Mary McCARTHY she founded a school literary magazine, Con Spirito. Beginning in 1937 her short stories, essays, and reviews appeared in journals such as The Kenyon Review, The Nation, and Partisan Review. Clark's first novel, The Bitter Box (1946), was well received and led to grants from the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the Guggenheim Foundation that allowed her to write her nonfictional account Rome and a Villa (1952). In 1952 she married Robert Penn Warren. The Oysters of Locmariaquer (1964), a personal account of the oyster harvesting on the Brittany coast, won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. Her second novel, Baldur's Gate (1970), focuses on a woman and a community who accept what Clark calls "the curse of humanity" and summon the courage to live creatively. Eyes, Etc. (1977) is her memoir about going blind. Her Camping Out (1986) is the story of two writers, one a lesbian and the other enmeshed in a problematic marriage, who confront the issue of sexual violence in America. Clark's stories are collected in Dr. Heart (1974).

Cleaver, Eldridge (1935–1998) autobiographer

Eldridge Cleaver's family moved from Arkansas, where he was born, to Los Angeles, in order to find better work and to escape Southern racism. Cleaver became a teenage delinquent and in the 1950s and 1960s served terms at Soledad Prison for rape and drug charges. Influenced by Malcolm X, Cleaver became interested in politics and history and began work on his autobiography, Soul on Ice (1968). The work is a candid account of the alienation he felt living in a society where political and social systems discriminated against African Americans, particularly, he felt, against black nationalists. A critical and popular success, the book made Cleaver a national celebrity as well as a prominent radical—he became the minister of information for the Black Panther Party in 1966. During this time he also served as an assistant editor at Ramparts, a magazine that provided a forum for his work.

In 1968 Cleaver fled the United States to evade arrest for violations of his parole. For the next seven years he was an exile in Cuba, Algeria, and other countries. By the time he returned to the United States in 1975, Cleaver had turned away from black militancy. He had witnessed the corruption of Communist and Third World states and had come to appreciate American institutions. In Soul on Fire (1978), he explained his turn toward conservatism and his experience as a born-again Christian. His last essays were published eight years after his death in Target Zero: A Life in Writing (2006), edited by his wife.

Sources

Rajiv, Sudhi. Forms of Black Consciousness. New Delhi: Jainsons Publications, 1991.

Rout, Kathleen. Eldridge Cleaver. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Cohen, Robert (1957– ) novelist, short-story writer

Robert Cohen was born in Syracuse, New York, in 1957. He received his B.A. from the University of California, Berkeley, in 1979 and his M.F.A. from Columbia University in 1983. His novels, The Organ Builder (1988) and The Here and Now (1996), both of which take up modern Jewish issues in a manner reminiscent of the early work of Philip ROTH and Saul BELLOW, and Inspired Sleep (2001), a contemporary cautionary tale about the pharmaceutical industry, were all well received. He has also published a short-story collection, Varieties of Romantic Experience (2002).

—Marshall Boswell

Cold Sassy Tree by Olive Ann Burns (New York:

Ticknor & Fields, 1984) novel

Her only completed book, Cold Sassy Tree is Olive Ann Burns's Southern coming-of-age novel. A best-seller upon its initial publication, the novel tells the story of general-store owner Grandpa E. Rucker Blakelee's unconventional marriage—three weeks after the death of his first wife—to Miss Love Simpson, a Northern milliner thirty years his junior. The novel's narrator is Grandpa Blakelee's bewildered fourteen-year-old grandson, Will Tweedy, who, while serving as their chaperone, receives valuable lessons from both his grandfather and the old man's new bride. Set in 1906 in the fictional town of Cold Sassy, Georgia—based on Burns's hometown of Commerce, Georgia—the book features a comic cast of scandalized townspeople, many of whom were inspired by actual figures from Burns's childhood.

Burns, who had spent a decade writing for the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, began writing the novel in the mid 1970s after she learned that she had cancer. She continued working on the novel during her chemotherapy and recovery, and was working on a sequel when she died in 1990. That unfinished sequel, Leaving Cold Sassy Tree, appeared in 1994, and picks up Will's story ten years later, just as he is about to marry a spirited schoolteacher.

—Marshall Boswell

Cold War

The term cold war refers to the rivalry and state of tension between the United States and the Soviet Union that arose at the end of WORLD WAR II. The cold war began with conflicts over postwar plans for Central and Eastern Europe, most of which the Soviet Union occupied as a result of defeating Germany. The United States argued that these Soviet-occupied countries should be able to determine their own fate. But Stalin installed friendly governments composed of Communists, and the United States used economic aid (the Marshall Plan) to rebuild countries allied to it in Western Europe.

Certain key events define the nature of the cold war. In 1948–1949, the Soviets blockaded Berlin (divided after World War II into an eastern Soviet zone and Allied western zones), in an attempt to subdue the West Berliners and unify the city under Soviet control. The Allied response was to mount an unprecedented massive airlift of supplies to the West Berliners. Instead of confronting the Soviets militarily, the West used what came to be known as the “containment policy,” a series of nonmilitary maneuvers designed to stop the spread of communism in Europe and in other parts of the world. The policy seemed to work; the Soviets eventually dropped their blockade and Germany remained divided.

Norman MAILER's Barbary Shore (1951) is a fictional evocation of the early cold war. Mailer conveys the allegorical feeling of cold-war tensions, the conviction that the period was about a fight between forces of good and evil, in which even one's neighbor might be a spy, a Communist, or fellow traveler (a liberal inclined to support Communist policies).

The debate about the cold war in the United States has always been whether the Soviet Union was, in fact, an aggressive power intent on dominating the world or rather a defensive state attempting to create a buffer between itself and an aggressive Germany backed by the Western powers. American historians called revisionists interpreted Soviet foreign policy as reactive—that is, the Soviets were always countering an aggressive American capitalism as it spread across the world.

The contest between the United States and the Soviet Union is vividly dramatized in such novels as Mailer's epic Harlot's Ghost (1991), large parts of which are set in West Berlin and concern the machinations of both the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the KGB (the CIA's Soviet counterpart). West Berlin, with its huge population of secret agents and informants, might be considered the capital of the cold-war world. Symbolically, it was also the center of the cold war because of the Berlin Wall, a graphic demonstration of the divide between East and West, the so-called Communist and free worlds. William Gass treats this aspect of the cold war in his novel The Tunnel (1995).

The cold war had its impact on American domestic life. Controversies arose over the extent to which Communists had infiltrated the American government, especially the State Department. It was alleged that the Soviet Union had been able to produce its atomic weapons so quickly after World War II because it had the help of American agents, including Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, a married couple executed in 1953 for alleged espionage. Many Americans believed that the Rosenbergs were the victims of paranoia about communism and scapegoats for Republican conservatives. The two best fictional accounts of the Rosenbergs' fate and their significance in American culture are E. L. DOCTOROW's The Book of Daniel (1971) and Robert COOVER's THE PUBLIC BURNING (1977). The latter deals not only with the Rosenbergs but also with the career of Richard Nixon (who narrates part of the novel). Both novels extend enormous sympathy to the Rosenbergs, although the preponderance of evidence (some of it available only after these novels were published) shows that the Rosenbergs were guilty as charged.

Other key events of the cold war include the KOREAN WAR; the Hungarian uprising against the Communist government in 1956; the building of the Berlin Wall and the Cuban missile crisis in 1961; the U.S.-supported coups in Iran (1953) and Guatemala (1954) to forestall the possibility of Communist governments; the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1969 when its Communist government became too liberal; the U.S. war in Vietnam (see VIETNAM WAR; U.S. policy declared it was a war to stop Communist aggression); and the dramatic military arms buildup of the Reagan administration, a buildup that increased tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union but also led to Mikhail Gorbachev's realization that his country could not overcome the United States militarily or economically. The cold war is said to have ended in 1990, by which time Gorbachev no longer wished to exercise control over Eastern Europe and the Berlin Wall had been torn down.

Norman Mailer's Harlot's Ghost covers some of the events leading to the end of the cold war. Many of his essay collections and his memoir The Armies of the Night (1968), along with Gore VIDAL's United States: Essays (1993) and his novels, especially Washington, D.C. (1967), also reflect the way the cold war was viewed in the American literary community. President John F. Kennedy's 1963 assassination has been linked to cold-war politics, which have received their most profound fictional treatment in Don DELILLO's Libra (1988). Ursula LE GUIN's The Dispossessed (1974) is a kind of cold-war allegory in which competing powers are measured against an anarchist system of values.

Sources

Axelsson, Arne. Restrained Response: American Novels of the Cold War and Korea, 1945–1962. New York: Greenwood Press, 1990.

Brunner, Edward. Cold War Poetry. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

Schaub, Thomas Hill. American Fiction in the Cold War. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991.

Seed, David. American Science Fiction and the Cold War: Literature and Film. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1999.

Collins, Billy (1941– ) poet

By just spending a few minutes reading a poem each day, new worlds can be revealed.

—Commenting on Poetry 180:
A Poem a Day for American High Schools

Billy Collins was born in New York City in 1941. He received his B.A. degree from the College of the Holy Cross in 1963 and his Ph.D. from the University of California, Riverside, in 1971. He served as POET LAUREATE of the United States for 2001–2002. His collections of poetry include Picnic Lightning (1998), Sailing Alone around the Room (2001), Nine Horses (2002), and The Trouble with Poetry, and Other Poems (2005). Collins's poetry is noted for humor and sharp observations about human nature and popular culture.

Source

Merrin, Jeredith. "Art Over Easy," Southern Review, 38 (Winter 2002): 202–214.

—Tod Marshall

The Color Purple by Alice Walker (New York:

Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982) novel

Both a critical and a commercial triumph, Alice WALKER's The Color Purple is a controversial and unconventional novel of sexual abuse and female empowerment that won both the Pulitzer Prize and the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD for Fiction. The book is written in an epistolary style, featuring letters addressed to God from Celie, the novel's protagonist, a poor, sexually abused African American woman who is raped repeatedly and twice impregnated by her stepfather.

Walker's novel instantly caught the attention of the literary establishment, and just as quickly courted controversy. A group of male African American writers and critics formally protested the book, suggesting that it provided a negative portrait of black male sexuality. At the same time, feminist readers and critics applauded the book's hopeful ending as well as its narrative strategy of giving voice—in the form of Celie's letters, for instance—to otherwise voiceless and overlooked victims of sexual abuse and patriarchal power. The book was made into a motion picture in 1985 that earned eleven Academy Award nominations.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Alice Walker's The Color Purple. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2000.

Winchell, Donna Haisty. Alice Walker. New York: Twayne, 1992.
—Marshall Boswell

Commentary (1945– ) periodical

A monthly journal, Commentary was founded by the American Jewish Committee in 1945. Under the distinguished editorship of Elliot Cohen (1945–1959) and Norman Podhoretz (1960–1995), such writers as Hannah ARENDT, Saul BELLOW, Paul GOODMAN, and Lionel Trilling published some of their best work. Under Podhoretz, the magazine became more conservative in its treatment of both domestic and international issues.

Commonweal (1924– ) periodical

Founded in 1924 by Roman Catholic laymen, this biweekly journal has followed an independent line in reporting on current events and culture. The journal contains book reviews and editorials. Its circulation is smaller than the more political and polemical journals such as The New Republic and The Nation.

A Confederacy of Dunces by John Kennedy Toole (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980) novel

After John Kennedy TOOLE failed to find a publisher for his novel about an errant knight on a quest to save the modern age from itself, he committed suicide. Seven years later his mother deposited the manuscript on the desk of novelist Walker PERCY, who was teaching at Loyola University. Percy prevailed upon the Louisiana State University Press—usually given to scholarly tomes—to publish the book. The novel appeared in 1980 and was awarded the 1981 Pulitzer Prize.

The novel's protagonist is thirty-year-old Ignatius J. Reilly who lives with his mother and spends most of his time in bed reading medieval history, railing at the television, and writing an indictment of the contemporary world on Big Chief writing tablets. He feels that the modern age has committed sins against "theology and geometry," and he harbors a long and incongruous list of targets for his ire, including Doris Day and the Greyhound bus company. Percy famously described Toole's antihero as a "fat Don Quixote" and "a perverse Thomas Aquinas rolled into one." Populated by wild, comic characters, this modern picaresque novel pays homage to Toole's hometown of New Orleans, Louisiana.

Source

Clark, William Bedford. "All Toole's Children: A Reading of A Confederacy of Dunces," Essays in Literature, 14 (Fall 1987): 269–280.

—Marshall Boswell

Confessional Poetry

Generally thought to have been given its impetus by Robert LOWELL's LIFE STUDIES (1959), confessional poetry was popularized in America in the 1950s and 1960s. The origins of American confessional poetry have been traced back to the English romantic poets, especially to William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who wrote autobiographical verse about their intimate explorations of the mind. Although some confessional poetry seems undisciplined and lacking in structure, the best of the confessional poets crafted poems of striking discipline and beauty, reflecting Wordsworth's definition of poetry as "emotion recollected in tranquillity." The confessional poets of the 1950s revealed even more about their personal lives, including details about their friendships, loves, and marriages. Some of the BEAT poets, particularly Allen GINSBERG, also adopted the role of the bard who makes a poetic example of his own life.

By the 1970s Anne SEXTON had established herself as a confessional poet, publishing verse that dealt with her personal life, including her mental illness and her experiences with psychotherapy. In a poem titled "Daddy" (1966), Sylvia PLATH recorded a savage reaction to her father's early death. W. D. SNODGRASS—like Plath, one of Lowell's students—wrote in Heart's Needle (1959) an account of his relationship with his daughter after his divorce.

Confessional poetry should be seen in the context of its age. Many poets in America in the late 1950s and early 1960s were searching for freer, more open literary styles, reacting against what was viewed as the stifling conventionality and conformism of the 1950s.

Source

Phillips, Robert. The Confessional Poets. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1973.

Connell, Evan S. (1924– ) novelist, historian, short-story writer, poet

Born in Kansas, Evan S. Connell received his A.B. from the University of Kansas in 1947. He attended graduate school at Stanford University, Columbia University, and at what is now San Francisco State University. Connell has lived much of his life in California. He is best known for his novels Mrs. Bridge (1959) and Mr. Bridge (1969), works that evoke with considerable humor the ironies and the banality of suburban life and marriage. His Son of the Morning Star (1984) provides a nonfiction account of General Custer's Last Stand, including an account of Custer from a Native American perspective. His most demanding work to date is The Alchemist's Journal (1991), which consists of seven fictional journals by an equal number of sixteenth-century alchemists. Connell published a novel about the Crusades, Deus Lo Volt! (2000), which is narrated by a thirteenth-century French knight in a style intended to replicate seamlessly the language, diction, and literary conventions of the period. Connell's short fiction has been collected in The Anatomy Lesson (1957), At the Crossroads (1965), and St. Augustine's Pigeon (1980). He has also published two long, philosophical poems, Notes from a Bottle Found on the Beach at Carmel (1963) and Points for a Compass Rose (1973), as well as several works of historical investigation, the most recent of which is a biography of Spanish painter Francisco Goya (2004).

Source

Shapiro, Gerald. "Evan S. Connell: A Profile": <<http://www.pshares.org/issues/article.cfm?prmarticleID=2335>> (viewed January 17, 2007).

Conover, Ted (1958– ) nonfiction writer

Ted Conover's books chronicle the tenuous living conditions of people on the fringes of mainstream culture. He was born in Okinawa, Japan, in 1958. While a student at Amherst College, where he earned a B.A. in 1981, he took a year off to hitchhike and jump trains around the United States. His experiences led to his first book, Rolling Nowhere (1984), which some critics saw as reminiscent of John Steinbeck's Travels with Charley (1961). His other works include Coyotes: A Journey through the Secret World of America's Illegal Aliens (1987), Whiteout: Lost in Aspen (1991), and Newjack: Guarding Sing Sing (2000), which won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD for nonfiction.

—Marshall Boswell

Conroy, Pat (1945– ) novelist

Elegant concision with language would never be one of my anxieties. The cool hard sentences of Hemingway were spare and shapely, but his sentences were trays of ice to me. I never could enroll in the it-is-true-and-good-and-spare-and-fine—and the road is dusty—school of American writing. The language genie found itself trapped in the bottle of my deepest self. Its longings and its roarings sounded in my bloodstream.

—Introduction to Thomas Wolfe's
Of Time and the River (1999)

The oldest of seven children, Donald Patrick Conroy was named after his father, a career U.S. Marine Corps officer from Chicago. His mother, Frances Peek Conroy, was a Southerner and an avid reader, the antithesis, Conroy claims, of his abusive father. The family moved twenty-three times, to different military bases around the South, before Conroy was fifteen. When a high-school teacher introduced him to Thomas Wolfe's Look Homeward, Angel (1929), Conroy decided that he wanted to write.

At his father's insistence, Conroy attended The Citadel in Charleston, South Carolina, where, while still a student, he wrote his first book, The Boo (1970), a tribute to the beloved Assistant Commandant of Cadets. After his graduation in 1967 Conroy taught English at a school in Beaufort, South Carolina, and then spent a year teaching impoverished children in a one-room schoolhouse on Daufuskie Island, off the South Carolina coast. The year at Daufuskie Island prompted Conroy to write the 1972 memoir The Water Is Wide, after which he turned to writing full-time. Conroy has since lived in Atlanta, Rome, and on Fripp Island, South Carolina.

Conroy has published four novels, three memoirs, and a collection of recipes and reminiscences, The Pat Conroy Cookbook: Recipes of My Life (2004). His work relies heavily on personal and family experience and often features tropes of victimization, initiation, and coming-of-age. Conroy's second novel, The Great Santini (1976), is a semi-autobiographical novel rooted in his turbulent relationship with his father. The Lords of Discipline (1980) is set on the campus of a military institution much like The Citadel, while Conroy's 1986 The Prince of Tides is another family drama, dealing with estrangement, violence, and death. Conroy's screenplay adaptation of The Prince of Tides earned him an Academy Award nomination. Conroy's sixth book, Beach Music (1995), tells the story of an American who moves to Rome in the aftermath of his wife's suicide. In 2002 Conroy returned to nonfiction with My Losing Season, a recollection of his childhood and particularly his senior basketball season at The Citadel.

All of his novels have enjoyed commercial success, and three of Conroy's books have been adapted into motion pictures.

Source

Burns, Landon C. Pat Conroy: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

—Anna Teekell

Cooley, Peter (1940– ) poet

Peter Cooley is an award-winning poet whose deeply personal work mixes concrete realism with hallucinatory surrealism. He was born in Detroit, Michigan, and was educated at Shimer College (A.B., 1962), the University of Chicago (M.A., 1964), and the University of Iowa (Ph.D., 1970), where he was a student in the writing program. His major poetry collections include The Company of Strangers (1975), Night-seasons (1983), The Van Gogh Notebook (1987), The Astonished Hours (1992), and Sacred Conversations (1998). In 2003 he published A Place Made of Starlight. He teaches English at Tulane University in New Orleans, Louisiana.

—Marshall Boswell

Coover, Robert (1932– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

I wander the island, inventing it.

—"The Magic Poker" (1969)

Born in Charles City, Iowa, Postmodern novelist Robert Coover is the author of more than a dozen novels, including THE PUBLIC BURNING (1977), a surreal and comic treatment of the trial and execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg as seen through the eyes of a paranoid, ambitious young Richard Nixon. That novel solidified a reputation established by his first two novels, The Origin of the Brunists (1966), the story of a religious cult built around a survivor of a mining incident who claims to have been saved by the Virgin Mary; and The Universal Baseball Association, Inc., J. Henry Waugh, Prop. (1968), about a man who becomes lost in his intricately imagined baseball league. Along with his contemporaries John BARTH, Thomas PYNCHON, and John HAWKES, Coover helped establish the contours of the American Postmodern novel (see POSTMODERNISM).

Coover's work often blurs the boundary between fact and fiction, between reality and representation. He is particularly known for his many stories and novels that explore the connections between fiction and motion pictures. His story collection, A Night at the Movies (1987), includes the much-anthologized story "You Must Remember This," which imagines the lives of characters from the classic motion picture Casablanca, while his novel, The Adventures of Lucky Pierre (The Director's Cut) (2002), follows the misadventures of a porn star in a mythical place called Cinecity. Other popular works include the story collection Prick- songs and Descants (1969), Pinocchio in Venice (1991), and Stepmother (2004).

Sources

Evenson, Brian. Understanding Robert Coover. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

McCaffery, Larry. The Metafictional Muse: The Works of Robert Coover, Donald Barthelme, and William H. Gass. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982.

—Marshall Boswell

The Corrections by Jonathan Franzen (New York:

Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2001) novel

The Corrections, Jonathan FRANZEN's third and most successful novel, charts the collapse of the ultramodern Lambert family of St. Jude's, Missouri (based on Franzen's hometown of St. Louis). The father, Alfred, suffers from Parkinson's disease and seems to be losing his mind, while his wife, Enid, clings to the conviction that her wayward, grown children will come home for Christmas. But the children all have troubles of their own. Gary, the oldest, is suffering from depression amid the chaos and emptiness of his affluent, consumer-obsessed family. Chip, the middle child, has been fired from his academic job after getting embroiled in a disastrous affair with a female student. And Denise, the youngest, has become completely consumed with managing a new restaurant and engaging in a complicated affair with another woman.

Franzen's Postmodern novel seeks to capture the discontent of middle-class life at the end of the twentieth century. All three of the Lambert children seek fulfillment, and yet each child's up-to-date solution to the basic ennui of human existence—Chip's adherence to contemporary CRITICAL THEORY, Gary's single-minded pursuit of wealth, and Denise's sexual adventurism—has left the children no happier than their Depression-era parents.

Franzen became briefly the object of a minor literary scandal when he expressed discomfort about the novel's being chosen as a selection of the Oprah Winfrey Book Club. Nevertheless, the novel became a number-one best-seller and won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Fiction.

Source

Green, Jeremy. Late Postmodernism: American Fiction at the Millennium. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.

—Marshall Boswell

Corso, Gregory (1930–2001) poet

Born in New York City, Gregory Corso had a troubled childhood among foster parents and institutions. He spent three years in jail before he was twenty. With Allen GINS-

BERG's encouragement Corso became a poet. He published many collections of humorous and sometimes bitter poetry, including Gasoline (1958) and Elegiac Feelings American (1970).

Corso was considered one of the original BEAT poets, but he disliked the distinction. Some of his other poetry collections include Bomb (1958), The Happy Birthday of Death (1960), and Minefield (1989). He also wrote a play, In This Hung-Up Age: A One-Act Farce Written 1954 (produced 1955); a novel, The American Express (1961); and an autobiography, What I Feel Right Now (1982).

Source

Skau, Michael. "A Clown in a Grave": Complexities and Tensions in the Works of Gregory Corso. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1999.

The Counterlife by Philip Roth (New York: Farrar,

Straus & Giroux, 1987) novel

The Counterlife is an experimental Postmodern METAFICTION about the relationship between storytelling and identity (see POSTMODERNISM). In this mid-career novel, Philip ROTH reprises his fictional double, the Jewish novelist Nathan Zuckerman, to create a kaleidoscopic work in which characters die and reappear as their polar opposites. Each life is contrasted with its counterlife in a dizzying back-and-forth that foregrounds the instability of the self. The Counterlife uses the process of storytelling to disclose the reciprocal relationship between experience and its transformation into fiction, thus blurring the boundary between, as Nathan puts it, "the kind of stories that people turn life into" and "the kind of lives that people turn stories into."

Source

Shostak, Debra. Philip Roth: Countertexts, Counterlives. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Creeley, Robert (1926–2005) poet

As I sd to my friend, because I am always talking — John, I sd, which was not his name . . .

—"I Know a Man" (1962)

Born in Arlington, Massachusetts, Robert Creeley was an ambulance driver during WORLD WAR II. A Harvard dropout, he went to Europe to pursue a career as a poet, but found his métier when he returned to the United States and established the Black Mountain Review with Charles OLSON, Robert DUNCAN, and Ed DORN. Creeley also became closely associated with the BEATS, visiting Allen GINSBERG, Jack KEROUAC, and Gary SNYDER in San Francisco. Creeley's work is in the tradition of Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot, although he favors simple verse forms and short lines. His Collected Poems, 1945–1975 appeared in 1982 and a revised edition in 1984. Creeley is also the author of a novel, The Island (1963), and stories, The Gold Diggers (1954). He published his Collected Essays in 1989. His last poetry collections, Echoes (1994), Life & Death (1998), Just In Time: Poems, 1984–1994 (2001), and If I Were Writing This (2003) were highly regarded. Creeley won the BOLLINGEN PRIZE in Poetry in 1999, a Before Columbus Lifetime Achievement Award in 2000, and a Lannan Lifetime Achievement Award in 2001. On Earth: Last Poems and an Essay (2006) was published after his death.

Sources

Faas, Ekbert. Robert Creeley: A Biography. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 2001.

Foster, Edward Halsey. Understanding the Black Mountain Poets. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994.

—Marshall Boswell

Critical Inquiry (1974– )

Published at the University of Chicago, Critical Inquiry is one of the foremost literary journals concentrating on CRITICAL THEORY. The journal was established in 1974 in response to the ascendancy of critical theory in the humanities. In the Winter 2004 issue more than two dozen major critics and cultural theorists—including Elizabeth Abel, Wayne Booth, Danielle Allen, and Stanley FISH—weighed in on the recent decline in importance of critical theory and on its future role, if any, in the humanities.

—Marshall Boswell

Critical Theory

The term critical theory was coined in 1930 by German social critic Max Horkheimer to describe the peculiar blend of theoretical and empirical social criticism being practiced by his colleagues at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Frankfurt. This group of intellectuals—including Theodor Adorno and Herbert Marcuse—have since been known collectively as the members of the Frankfurt School. The term now refers more generally to the heterogeneous body of criticism that combines the social critique associated with the Frankfurt School with the new techniques of literary analysis developed in the 1960s in reaction to the preeminence of the New Criticism.

The “critical theory of society” developed by the members of the Frankfurt School sought to blend the skepticism of Immanuel Kant, whose term “critique” referred to a brand of philosophical inquiry that acknowledged the limits of what can finally be known, with a Marxist “critique” of material social and economic conditions. Members of the Frankfurt School wanted their work to spur positive social change rather than serve as pure social analysis.

Conversely, “literary theory” as we understand it today is generally traced to theories about linguistics that were developed by French Structuralist Ferdinand de Saussure in the 1920s. His work emphasized the arbitrariness of signification and the social dynamics of meaning. In 1966 French theorist Jacques Derrida delivered his “Structure, Sign and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences,” a groundbreaking critique of Structuralism in general and of the work of Structuralist anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss in particular. This essay helped inaugurate a new era, POSTSTRUCTURALISM.

The term Poststructuralism includes the practice of DECONSTRUCTION as well as other forms of social criticism that proceed from the premise that any Structural analysis of cultural artifacts is itself always already informed by cultural biases. Hence, a Poststructural analysis tries to address both the object itself as well as the cultural and social forces that shape both the object and the analysis. Deconstructionists, in particular, examine literary texts through a Poststructuralist lens, regarding the ostensible meaning of a text as inherently unstable and subject to the shifting social, historical, ethnic, and intertextual influences that help produce the work itself. To “deconstruct” a text is to disclose the shifting and elusive influences that contribute to the work's network of meaning.

By the mid seventies, various practices indebted to the work of the Frankfurt School, including the cultural anthropology of French intellectual Michel Foucault and the social and linguistic theories of German thinker Jürgen Habermas, had begun to merge with the new Poststructuralist trends in literary theory to produce the broader field of critical theory: Structuralism, Poststructuralism, deconstruction, feminism, psychoanalysis, Marxism, reader-response theory, new historicism, cultural criticism, lesbian/gay/queer theory, African American criticism, and postcolonial criticism.

Sources

Held, David. Introduction to Critical Theory: Horkheimer to Habermas. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

Tyson, Lois. Critical Theory Today: A User-Friendly Guide, second edition. New York: Routledge, 2006.

—Marshall Boswell

Criticism

See LITERARY CRITICISM.

The Crucible (produced 1953) play

Arthur MILLER's most politically significant work was first performed during Senator Joseph McCarthy's widely publicized "red hunt," and recounts the hysteria that surrounded the 1692 Salem Witchcraft Trials.

The play opens with the principal characters gathered around Betty Parris, who has mysteriously taken ill. An investigation into the nature of her illness leads to the discovery that Betty; her cousin, Abigail; and several other girls were found dancing in the woods, supposedly practicing witchcraft. After Abigail confesses to the charge, she instigates a series of accusations against other women in town. Once several honorable women are implicated, it becomes clear that the accusation of witchcraft is being used as a weapon of intimidation and manipulation.

In the opening act of the play, Miller clearly establishes the analogy between the witch-hunt that occurred during the Salem Witchcraft Trials and McCarthy's "red hunt" for Communists. In this scheme, the "witches" of Salem invoke McCarthy's omnipresent Communists. Indeed, the play has become so wedded to the McCarthy hearings that political commentators still routinely refer to politically motivated investigations as "witch-hunts," a reference as much to Miller's play as to the actual Salem trials. However, while McCarthyism is an obvious backdrop to the play, Miller cautioned audiences on the fragility of an analogy that is dependent upon something—namely, witchcraft—which we now know does not exist, at least not in the way that the Salemites believed. Rather, the play works best as a testament to the personal and social consequences of the hysteria that springs from actions ruled by fear and intolerance.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Arthur Miller's The Crucible. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Johnson, Claudia D., ed. Understanding The Crucible: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Miller, Arthur. The Crucible. New York: Viking, 1953.

—Marshall Boswell

Cunningham, Michael (1952– ) novelist

Born in Cincinnati, Ohio, and raised in Pasadena, California, Michael Cunningham received a B.A. degree from Stanford University in 1975 and an M.F.A. from the University of Iowa in 1980. Cunningham has been narrowly identified as an author addressing the gay experience in the age of AIDS in America, but rather than focus strictly on the sexuality of his characters, he places them in a broad social framework. Cunningham's novels, including Golden States (1984), A Home at the End of the World (1990), Flesh and Blood (1995), THE HOURS (1998), and Specimen Days (2005), seem characterized by multiple narrative voices that work together to examine American family structures. Cunningham won both the 1999 Pulitzer Prize and the 1999 PEN/FAULKNER AWARD for The Hours, a triple-narrative written in homage to Virginia Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway (1925).

Sources

Hughes, Mary Joe. "Michael Cunningham's The Hours and Post-modern Artistic Re-Presentation," Critique, 45 (Summer 2004): 349–361.

Schiff, James. "An Interview with Michael Cunningham," Missouri Review, 26, no. 2 (2003): 111–127.

—Amber Shaw

Cyberpunk

See SCIENCE FICTION AND FANTASY.

Danckaerts, Jasper (1639–circa 1703) travel writer

Jasper Danckaerts was born in Flushing, Zeeland (The Netherlands), the son of Pieter Danckaerts and Janneke Schilders. He trained as a cooper, or barrel maker, and found employment with the Dutch West India Company in Middelburg. Danckaerts and his wife joined the Labadist Church in 1676. Like their Puritan contemporaries, the Labadists were persecuted by the religious establishment, and in the 1670s a group of them decided to seek refuge in America. They selected Jasper Danckaerts as their secret agent, instructing him to find and negotiate the purchase of land in the British colonies.

Danckaerts, by then a widower, set out for America in 1679. Traveling the colonies under an assumed name, he visited New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Massachusetts. After investigating land prices in NEW ENGLAND, the middle colonies, and the Chesapeake region, he decided on an area at the head of the Chesapeake Bay. His success in securing land for the Labadist settlement led to a second mission, this time making all the arrangements for a group immigrating to Dutch Guiana.

When the Guiana assignment was completed, Danckaerts returned to America and spent several years in the Maryland community. Apparently discontented with American life, he journeyed back to Middelburg and remained there until his death.

During his secret mission in 1679–1680, Danckaerts kept a journal in which he recorded his impressions of the various colonial ethnic communities as well as observations on the local climate, soil, flora, and fauna. The journal also served as an account book, detailing land prices and the cost of goods and supplies. Threaded throughout Danckaerts's descriptions, commentaries, and record keeping were repeated references to the differences between the behavior of "the elect" and the "godless" majority he encountered on his journey.

Much of Danckaerts's hostility was reserved for QUAKERS, whose faults included boring religious services, egotism, and deceitful practices against the American Indians. His criticism was not directed solely at the Quakers, however. He found New England's Congregationalists to be lacking in piety and characterized Bostonians as a people with "no respect, no reverence." As far as he could ascertain, Puritan New England's vaunted religiosity consisted of little more than "observing Sunday."

Southerners fared no better under Danckaerts's scrutiny. The white planters of Maryland and Virginia were, he concluded, both greedy and godless. They had created a society corrupted by "vile tobacco" and by the harsh treatment of the slaves and indentured servants who labored in the tobacco fields. (Ironically, when the Labadists settled in Maryland they too grew and marketed tobacco, and at least one community leader earned a reputation as a particularly cruel slave master.)

Danckaerts's Journal of a Voyage to New York, which was not published in the United States until 1867, provides an account of a New York man tormented by the devil. It also records political disputes between colonial governors and assemblies and offers detailed recollections of meetings with religious leaders and educators such as the Reverend John ELIOT, founder of a school for American Indians in New England. Danckaerts apparently thought of his journal as a resource for Labadist immigrants, a cautionary guide for what to expect in America. He provided a compendium of warnings, sweeping in their ethnic stereotypes: Expect to be overcharged by the Swedes; do not trust the English, who are notorious cheaters and liars; avoid British women, who are slovenly housekeepers. Only the Dutch of New York seemed to meet Danckaerts's approval. They were, he concluded, "the right kind of people." Jasper Danckaerts died sometime between 1702 and 1704.

Works

Danckaerts, Jasper. Journal of a Voyage to New York, translated and edited by Henry C. Murphy. Brooklyn: Long Island Historical Society, 1867; New York: Readex Microprint, 1966.

Danckaerts. Diary of Our Second Trip from Holland to New Netherland, 1683, translated and edited by Kenneth Scott. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Gregg Press, 1969.

Danckaerts. New World Encounters: Jasper Danckaert's View of Indian Life in 17th-Century Brooklyn. Brooklyn: The Brooklyn Historical Society, 1986.

Source

Goodfriend, Joyce D. Before the Melting Pot: Society and Culture in Colonial New York City, 1664–1730. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992.

Danforth, Samuel (1626–1674) poet, minister, astronomer

Samuel Danforth was born in September 1626 in Framlingham, Suffolk, England, the second son of Nicholas and Elizabeth Danforth. His mother died when Samuel was three, and when he was eight, his father took him to live in New England. As a student at HARVARD COLLEGE, Danforth was seen as overly pious, expressing shock at what he called the "pagan poetry" of the classics. After his graduation in 1643, however, his shock turned to admiration, and he filled An Almanack for the Year of Our Lord 1646 (1645) with poems modeled on Virgil. The work was replete with pagan gods who celebrated the changing seasons and the natural beauty of New England.

Despite his newfound respect for classical poetry, Danforth remained deeply religious. In 1641 he accepted an offer to share the pulpit in Roxbury, Massachusetts, the church with which John ELIOT, the missionary to American Indians, was affiliated. Danforth was ordained in September of 1650 and remained a pastor at Roxbury for the rest of his life. The year after his ordination he married Mary Wilson, the daughter of the Reverend John Wilson. The couple had twelve children, most of whom did not survive. Two sons, John and Samuel II, became ministers and poets like their father.

In his writing Danforth consistently attempted to reconcile science and religion. In An Astronomical Description of the Late Comet, or Blazing Star (1665), he argued that comets have natural causes and obey the laws of mathematics and thus should be studied scientifically. He also believed that comets were signs sent to human beings by God and thus were the proper study of theologians.

Danforth's election sermon, A Brief Recognition of New-Englands Errand into the Wilderness (1671), was a New England JEREMIAD based on Matthew 11:7–9. Danforth's theme was the decline of religious commitment in Massachusetts. He pointed to the deterioration and abandonment of mission, and to signs of God's wrath: the death of great ministers and natural disasters. Danforth died November 19, 1674.

Works

Danforth, Samuel. An Almanack for the Year of Our Lord 1646. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Stephen Daye, 1645; Early American Imprints, 18.

Danforth. An Astronomical Description of the Late Comet, or Blazing Star, As It Appeared in New-England in the 9th, 10th, 11th, and the Beginning of the 12th Moneth, 1664. Cambridge: Printed by Samuel Green, 1665; Early American Imprints, 99.

Danforth. A Brief Recognition of New-Englands Errand into the Wilderness: Made in the Audience of the General Assembly of the Massachusetts Colony at Boston in N. E. on the 11th of the Third Moneth, 1670, Being the Day of Election There. Cambridge: Printed by Samuel Green & M. Johnson, 1671; Early American Imprints, 160.

Source

Danforth family. Report of the . . . Meeting of the Danforth Family. Boston: G. E. Littlefield, 1893.

Day, Stephen (circa 1594–1668) printer

Acknowledged as the first printer in the American colonies, Stephen Day (also Stephen Daye or Steven Day) was born in England, where he was trained as a locksmith. Little else is known about Day's life prior to 1638, the year that he arrived in NEW ENGLAND as an indentured servant to Reverend Jose Glover. Day, married in 1618 to his wife Rebecca, brought his family and a printing press imported by Glover on the transatlantic journey. His indenture specified that he was responsible for assembling the press.

Although Glover died prior to Day's arrival in New England, Day fulfilled his contract by assisting Glover's wife, Elizabeth, in establishing a printing business in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The original location for the press was most likely the home that Elizabeth Glover purchased for the Days on Holyoke Street. The press was relocated in 1641 when Elizabeth married Henry Dunster, president of HARVARD COLLEGE. It appears that Day had successfully operated the press for two years prior to the relocation without the benefit of any formal training. Day, barely literate, was assisted by his son Matthew, who probably set the type; Day himself apparently managed the business and operated the press. The records indicate that Matthew, who followed his father as a locksmith, may have been trained in England as a printer. Stephen Day's accomplishments as the first commercial printer in New England were recognized in 1641 with a grant of three hundred acres of land (a reward that remained unpaid until 1657).

Day's printing career began in 1639 with the publication of a broadside, the Freeman's Oath. This was followed by William Pierce's An Almanack for New England for the Year 1639 (1639) and THE BAY PSALM BOOK. Originally published as The Whole Booke of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre, the book served as a widely used alternative to Anglican psalm books into the mid eighteenth century. Day and his son Matthew were also credited with numerous other publications, including the Capital Laws (1642), John WINTHROP's Declaration of . . . the Narrowgansets (1645) and The Book of the General Lawes and Libertys (1648). Many of these may have been the work of Matthew Day, since by 1643 his father was actively involved in a company organized by John Winthrop Jr. to establish a new settlement and an iron-mining business in present-day Lancaster, Massachusetts. When this enterprise proved unsuccessful, Day found himself heavily in debt. Unable to claim the three hundred acres he was due, he mortgaged what little property he had. Day returned to his trade as a locksmith around 1655 and apparently never resumed his career as a printer. In 1649 the press became the responsibility of Samuel Green. Nine years later Day's wife died. He was remarried in 1664 to Mary Fitch. Stephen Day died December 22, 1668, in Cambridge.

Work

The Bay Psalm Book. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Stephen Day, 1640; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956; Early American Imprints, 4, 20, 33.

Sources

Amory, Hugh. Steven Day's First Type, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1639–1989. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed at the Meriden-Stinehour Press for the Houghton Library, 1989.

Amory. Bibliography and the Book Trades: Studies in the Print Culture of Early New England, edited by David D. Hall. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Amory, Hugh, and David D. Hall, eds. A History of the Book in America. New York & Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Derry, William C. Stephen Daye: America's First Printer. Cincinnati: Stratford, 1963.

Declaration of Independence (1776)

On June 7, 1776, Virginian Richard Henry Lee rose on the floor of the Continental Congress to propose a resolution "that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Although armed combat between Great Britain and the colonies had been underway since April 1775, the debate over such a declaration of independence was still lively. Rather than put Lee's simple declarative statement to an immediate vote, the congress assigned five members to draft a full justification for revolution against England and the king.

The committee's five members were John ADAMS of Massachusetts, Benjamin FRANKLIN of Pennsylvania, Roger Sherman (1721–1793) of Connecticut, Robert R. Livingston (1746–1813) of New York, and Thomas JEFFERSON of Virginia. Pressured by Adams, Jefferson agreed to prepare the first draft. When it was done, Adams, Franklin, and Jefferson made revisions. The completed draft went to the congress, and immediately after Lee's resolution was adopted on July 2, 1776, the congressmen took up debate over Jefferson's document. Several changes were made, and key sections (including a condemnation of slavery as a "cruel war against human nature itself") were deleted. The revised document was then sent to the printer, and delegates put their signatures on it over the next several months.

Jefferson was clear about the purpose of the declaration he had been called upon to draft: It must justify American independence "in terms so plain and full as to command their assent." The preamble to the Declaration contains the following statement in favor of the rights of the people and regarding their duty to resist an abusive or tyrannical government:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. —That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, —That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government. . . .

In his discussion of the natural rights of citizens, Jefferson drew upon the work of familiar European philosophers. In his insistence on government by consent and on unalienable rights, he emulated the political theory of English philosopher John Locke (1632–1704), whose influence on American political assumptions and institutions was extensive. Jefferson's political ideas thus were not original, but his eloquent presentation brought them to life.

Work

The Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence. Washington, D.C.: U.S. G.P.O., 2000; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Eicholz, Hans Louis. Harmonizing Sentiments: The Declaration of Independence and the Jeffersonian Idea of Self Government. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.

Gibson, Alan Ray. Interpreting the Founding: Guide to the Enduring Debates over the Origins and Foundations of the American Republic. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2006.

Maier, Pauline. American Scripture: Making the Declaration of Independence. New York: Knopf, 1997.

McCullough, David. 1776. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2005.

Deism

Deism refers to a set of beliefs emerging from the ENLIGHTENMENT that emphasizes rational understanding of the universe rather than miraculous explanations. Deism has often been associated with an image of God as a grand mechanic or clockmaker who, having created the universe, stepped back to allow humans to govern themselves through rational and moral laws. In early America Benjamin FRANKLIN, Thomas JEFFERSON, and Thomas PAINE are often associated with the principles of deism. In Franklin's AUTOBIOGRAPHY he describes how he came across some books claiming to refute deism, but he found instead that "the arguments of the Deists, which were quoted to be refuted, appeared to me much stronger than the refutations; in short I soon became a thorough Deist." Franklin was impressed by the deistic perception of Divinity and later adapted some of these principles to his "Plan for Moral Perfection" included in his Autobiography: "I grew convinc'd that Truth, Sincerity and Integrity in Dealings between Man and Man, were of the utmost Importance to the Felicity of Life; and I form'd written Resolutions, (which still remain in my Journal Book) to practice them ever while I lived."

According to Franklin, deism was characterized by rationalism allied with a scientific Enlightenment perspective. For Thomas Paine, "the pure and simple profession of Deism" signaled a departure from forms of religion that, in Paine's view, promoted and supported oppressive governments, as expressed in his AGE OF REASON: "The true Deist has but one Deity, and his religion consists in contemplating the power, wisdom, and benignity of the Deity in his works, and in endeavoring to imitate him in everything moral, scientific, and mechanical." In Paine's Of the Religion of Deism Compared with the Christian Religion, and the Superiority of the Former over the Latter (1804), he notes: "The Deist needs none of the tricks and shows called miracles to confirm his faith, for what can be a greater miracle than the creation itself and his own existence?"

Philip FRENEAU considered a deistic god to be inspiring. His "On the Universality and Other Attributes of the God of Nature" (1815) offers the following description of creation:

*A moment from the works he made
His system fix'd on general laws
Bespeaks a wise creating cause
Impartially he rules mankind
And all that on this globe we find.*

As these lines suggest, nature as a source of spiritual guidance offers an alternative to traditional religion.

Sources

Byrne, Peter. Natural Religion and the Nature of Religion: The Legacy of Deism. New York: Routledge, 1989.

Holmes, David L. The Faiths of the Founding Fathers. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Walters, Kerry S. The American Deists: Voices of Reason and Dissent in the Early Republic. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1992.

Delaware Tribe

The Delaware tribe, or Lenni Lenape, as they called themselves (meaning "real people"), lived in "Lenapehaking," or "Lenape land." An agricultural tribe, the Lenape thrived in the rich Delaware Valley, from which they derived their English name. Cited in Giovanni da Verrazano's (1485–1528) 1524 journal and later in Henry Hudson's (d. 1611) narrative of his 1609 voyage, the Delaware were estimated to have a population of twelve thousand. Known for their diplomacy and skills in negotiation, the Delaware, upon entering into a 1682 treaty with the British colonists, who were represented by William PENN, enjoyed a mutual coexistence with the British. This fifty-year peace was broken, however, as subsequent Penn family members renegotiated and eventually displaced the Delaware, who upon defeat by the Iroquois in 1720 relocated to the Ohio River valley.

Allied with the French in the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, the Delaware figure prominently in James Fenimore Cooper's (1789–1851) The Last of the Mohicans (1826). Portrayals of Delaware Indians may also be found in Philip Morin FRENEAU's "Prophecy of King Tammany" (1782) and Charles Brockden BROWN's Edgar Huntly (1827).

Sources

Trigger, Bruce G., ed. Handbook of North American Indians, Volume 15: Northeast. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution, 1978.

Verhoeven, W. M., ed. James Fenimore Cooper: New Historical and Literary Contexts. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1993.

Waldman, Carl. Atlas of the North American Indian. New York: Facts On File, 1985.

Dennie, Joseph (1768–1812) essayist, editor

Joseph Dennie, known as "the American Addison" (a reference to the English essayist Joseph Addison [1672–1719]), earned his reputation with two series of satiric essays, "The Lay Preacher" and "Farrago." Dennie also established the Port Folio, the first successful literary magazine with a national circulation in America.

Dennie was born on August 30, 1768, the only child of Joseph Dennie, a wealthy Boston merchant. His mother, Mary Green Dennie, came from one of the foremost printing families of New England. At the outbreak of the AMERICAN REV-OLUTION, Dennie's father, a LOYALIST, removed the family to rural Massachusetts. The young Dennie was frail in health and spent most of his time with his mother, who instilled in him a lifelong love of literature. Dennie later enrolled at HARVARD, where his health continued to be a problem. He suffered, he said, from "quick vibrations," a nervous disorder that made concentration difficult. Dennie graduated in 1790 and moved to Charlestown, New Hampshire, where he studied law. After being admitted to the bar in 1794, he began a brief legal career.

In 1792 he published the first of his "Farrago" essays, satiric accounts of his neighbors and their foibles. These portraits of life in a small town were immediately popular. Soon afterward Dennie received an offer to serve as lay preacher in a local Episcopal church. He used this as an opportunity to write The Lay Preacher, or Short Sermons for the Idle Readers (1796), a series of humorous essays that satirized daily life on the basis of biblical stories. Dennie continued to add to both series over the years, producing twenty-nine "Farrago" essays between 1792 and 1802.

Dennie's career as a newspaper and magazine publisher began in 1795, when he returned briefly to Boston to establish the Tablet: A Miscellaneous Paper Devoted to Belles Lettres. Although the Tablet failed after thirteen issues, it firmly established Dennie's journalistic talents. Returning to New Hampshire, he became the editor of The New Hampshire Journal; or, The Farmer's Weekly Museum, a paper that already enjoyed a noteworthy reputation. Under Dennie's guidance the paper's literary offerings increased in number and improved in quality. Its motto was: "Ho, every one, that thirsteth for novelty—come!" The Farmer's Weekly Museum also became more overtly partisan; always a social and political conservative, Dennie turned The Farmer's Weekly Museum into a FEDERALIST publication.

In the late 1790s Dennie ran for Congress. He was soundly defeated, receiving only six votes out of several hundred. Except for a brief appointment as private secretary to U.S. Secretary of State Timothy Pickering (1745–1829), Dennie never ventured into formal politics again. Dennie continued, however, to wage political warfare against the democratic agendas of men such as Thomas JEFFERSON and the radical tradition of men such as Thomas PAINE. By the end of the eighteenth century he had moved to Philadelphia and joined the staff of John FENNO's Federalist Gazette of the United States, the nation's chief rival to the Republican organ, the AURORA. In the pages of the Gazette, Dennie voiced his contempt for the republican form of government, his regret that the American Revolution had ever occurred, and his certain conviction that Thomas Jefferson, candidate for the presidency, was the most dangerous man in America. He wrote editorials attacking his political enemies, calling Aurora editor William Duane (1760–1835) "a gin-drinking pauper" and making public the persistent rumors that Jefferson had carried on a long-standing affair with one of his slaves. Dennie's private correspondence echoed his editorial stance; writing to a friend, he insisted that his countrymen were a "brute mass . . . despicably mean, weak and miserable."

In 1800 Thomas Jefferson was elected third president of the United States, the Gazette fell into new hands, and Joseph Dennie began work on his most ambitious and significant project: On January 3, 1801, Dennie and his partner launched the Port Folio, the largest American magazine attempted at the time. It was an immediate magnet for some of the finest writers and political thinkers of the nation, including Charles Brockden BROWN and John Quincy Adams (1767–1848). Dennie controlled the magazine from 1802 to 1808, writing under the pseudonym "Oliver Oldschool" in order to convey his feeling that America's glory lay in the past. His editorial decisions showed a distinct bias for English poets and essayists and for American work imitative of English form and style. The Port Folio did little to encourage writers to develop a distinctive American literature.

In 1808 Dennie's failure to successfully manage his financial affairs forced him to give up control of the magazine, although he remained as an editor. By 1811 his health, always poor, began a rapid decline. He died on January 7, 1812, at the age of forty-three.

Works

Dennie, Joseph. The Farrago. 1792–1802. Edited by Bruce Granger. Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1985.

Dennie. The Letters of Joseph Dennie, 1768–1812, edited by Laura Green Pedder. Orono, Maine: University Press, 1936.

Dennie. The Lay Preacher, or Short Sermons for the Idle Readers, edited by Milton Ellis. Walpole, N.H.: Printed by David Carlisle Jr., 1796; New York: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1943; Early American Imprints, 30335.

The Spirit of the Farmers' Museum, and Lay Preacher's Gazette. Walpole, N.H.: Printed for Thomas & Thomas, by D. & T. Carlisle, 1801; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1976.

Source

Dowling, William C. Literary Federalism in the Age of Jefferson: Joseph Dennie and The Port Folio, 1801–1812. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

A Description of New England by John Smith

(London: Humphrey Lownes, 1616) promotional tract
A Description of New England is a PROMOTIONAL TRACT intended to attract and recruit colonists to the New World. With detailed descriptions of a beautiful land, fertile soil, and abundant fish, Smith promotes Virginia as a place for rewards and recreation, thus appealing to potential settlers. Through a series of contrasts between England and the area Smith called NEW ENGLAND, he builds his case for immigration on financial benefits: "For, I am not so simple, to thinke, that ever any other motive then wealth, will ever erect there a Commonweale; or draw companie from their ease and humours at home. . . ." With some exaggeration, he claims: "He is a very bad fisher [that] cannot kill in one day with his hooke and line, one, two, or three hundred Cods. . . . If a man worke but three dayes in seaven, he may get more than hee can spend, unlesse he will be excessive." Smith also includes a long list of workers needed to develop the colony, yet he carefully explains that he does not wish to separate families but to initially entice single young men in search of a better life. John Smith's A Description of New England helped to initiate a significant increase in migration to the New World in the years following its publication.

Dickinson, John (1732–1808) pamphleteer, essayist, politician

*Then join hand in hand, brave Americans all,
By uniting we stand, by dividing we fall. . . .*
—"The Liberty Song" (1768)

A conservative member of the Continental Congress, John Dickinson preferred maintaining alliance with England, to a point. When it became clear that reconciliation was impossible, Dickinson supported the revolutionary cause, always offering a moderate, legal-minded perspective to the debates. Though he is known as a main opponent of John ADAMS regarding the form of government and at one point opposed the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, like the gentleman farmer in his Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies, Dickinson endorsed solidarity and loyalty founded upon agrarian ideals.

John Dickinson was born in Talbot County, Maryland, on November 8, 1732, to Samuel Dickinson, a wealthy farmer and later a judge, and Mary Cadwallader Dickinson. He grew up on the family's Crosiadore estate, near the village of Trappe. Shortly after his birth, in 1740, the family moved to Kent County, Delaware, and lived at Poplar Hall, where Dickinson was privately educated by tutors and where his father eventually became chief justice of the county. Dickinson studied law in the office of John Moland in Philadelphia and in 1753 traveled to London to study at the Middle Temple. When he returned to Philadelphia four years later Dickinson opened a law practice, and two years later entered the political arena when he was elected to the Delaware Assembly in 1759 and became its speaker. In 1762 he was elected to represent Philadelphia in the Pennsylvania Assembly. On July 19, 1770, John Dickinson married Mary Norris (1740–1803), daughter of the wealthy Philadelphia QUAKER merchant Isaac Norris (1701–1766), who was also Speaker of the Pennsylvania General Assembly and a superintendent of the State House. John and Mary Dickinson had two children.

As evident from his nickname, "Penman of the Revolution," John Dickinson wrote extensively throughout the tumultuous years leading up to the war and the constituting of the New Republic. When the STAMP ACT was issued, Dickinson's opposition to the shift in imperial policy prompted his "Declaration of Rights and Grievances" (1765). This protest was the beginning of Dickinson's distinction as a writer in colonial America. That same year Dickinson issued The Late Regulations Respecting the British Colonies on the Continent of America (1765). In this PAMPHLET Dickinson referred to the American tactic of boycotting British-made goods and informed British merchants that they too would suffer from the Sugar Act and Stamp Act. He then warned against further government actions that might drive the colonists to rebellion:

Late measures have indeed excited an universal and unexampled grief and indignation throughout the colonies. . . . What man who wishes the welfare of America, can view without pity, without passion, her restricted and almost stagnated trade, with its numerous train of evils—taxes torn from her without consent . . . ?

In 1766 Dickinson published a second pamphlet, An Address to the Committee of Correspondence in Barbados, in which he denied that resistance to the Stamp Act was rebellion. Drawing an analogy, he wrote: "If my father, deceived and urged on by bad or weak men, should offer me a draught of poison, and tell me it would be of service to me, should I be undutiful, if, knowing what it is I refuse to drink it?, or if inflamed by passion, he should aim a dagger at my heart, should I be undutiful, if I refuse to bare my breast for the blow?" Dickinson asserted reason where emotions and conflicted loyalties ran high.

Dickinson's most influential work, Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies, began appearing serially in December 1767. In these twelve fictitious letters, which were read by the largest colonial audience to date, Dickinson adopted the persona of a gentleman farmer who embodied industry, frugality, and integrity. Reminiscent of Dickinson's legal education, the Pennsylvania Farmer cited John Locke, David Hume, Montesquieu, Tacitus, Machiavelli, and others in order to, as Robert A. Ferguson points out, "assume that the social compact protects the inalienable right of property." Although the farmer would have preferred to remain tranquil and live the life of the peaceful cultivator, when political circumstances disturbed his peace, he spoke out.

As the prospect of war intensified in 1774, Dickinson issued An Essay on the Constitutional Power of Great-Britain over the Colonies in America. In this legalistic essay he argued the need to clearly delineate Parliament's powers and the powers of the colonial legislatures. While Dickinson granted Parliament the right to regulate commerce and foreign affairs, he insisted that the colonial assemblies had the “exclusive right” to enact internal taxation laws. As a Pennsylvania representative to the First and Second Continental Congresses, Dickinson served as the chief draftsman of the most radical document preceding the Declaration of Independence: A Declaration by the Representatives of the United Colonies of North-America, Now Met in General Congress at Philadelphia, Setting Forth the Causes and Necessity of Their Taking Up Arms.

Yet, like several prominent colonial leaders, Dickinson proved hesitant to support the final break with the Mother Country. Refusing to sign the Declaration of Independence, he cited the poor state of preparedness on the part of the colonies, their lack of foreign allies, and their disunity. Dickinson, however, agreed in July 1776 to write the first draft of the proposed new frame of government, the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, which names the confederacy “The United States of America,” and despite his Quaker allegiances he enlisted as a private in the Continental army. (He had served in the First Philadelphia Battalion as a colonel.)

In 1781 Dickinson was elected president of the Supreme Executive Council of Delaware; the following year he accepted the same position in Pennsylvania. During this time Benjamin Rush, the famous Philadelphia physician, had been making plans to expand a grammar school in Carlisle in western Pennsylvania and charter a college, and had asked Dickinson to lend his name to the endeavor. On September 9, 1783 Dickinson College was officially founded. In 1787, as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention, Dickinson helped draft a new federal constitution, citing many arguments from Thomas PAINE’s The Rights of Man. He was one of the five signers from Delaware.

Failing health forced Dickinson to resign from the Delaware Assembly in 1793, but he continued to speak out on political issues, especially on foreign affairs. A strong supporter of France in that nation’s growing conflict with England, Dickinson criticized the 1794 Jay Treaty. He called on Americans to remain loyal to the French people “who first acknowledged our independence, and set the blessed example to others.” Dickinson’s political writings were published in two volumes in 1801, several years before his death on February 14, 1808.

Work

Dickinson, John. The Writings of John Dickinson. Philadelphia: The Historical Society of Pennsylvania, 1895.

Sources

- Flower, Milton Embick. John Dickinson: Conservative Revolutionary. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1983.
- Jacobson, David Louis. John Dickinson and the Revolution in Pennsylvania, 1764–1776. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1965.

Dock, Christopher (circa 1698–1771) educator

Christopher Dock was probably born in Germany, possibly to a Mennonite family. He came to America in 1718 after several years of school teaching in Europe. Dock settled in Pennsylvania, teaching in Skippack. He has been referred to as the “Colonial Schoolmaster” and the “Father of American Pedagogy.”

Contrary to custom, Dock provided incentives and rewards to his students instead of corporal punishment. His outlook toward children’s education was rooted in his commitment to the mystical teachings of German theologians Philipp Jakob Spener (1635–1705) and August Hermann Francke (1663–1727) and in the educational philosophy of the Moravian educator John Amos Comenius (1592–1607). Dock believed that all children, poor as well as rich, had a right to be educated. He argued that the church, not the state, should subsidize education since, in his view, the main purpose of education was to shape character instead of to instill knowledge. In 1728 Dock quit teaching and became a farmer. He returned to teaching ten years later, and for the remainder of his life, he divided his time between classrooms in Salford and nearby Skippack.

In 1749 a noted publisher asked Dock to write a book detailing his philosophy of education and describing his pedagogy, including his approach to discipline. The result, completed in 1750, was Eine einfältige und gründlich abgefasste Schul-Ordnung, which Dock insisted could not be published in his lifetime. It appeared in print in 1770, shortly before his death. Schul-Ordnung includes a discussion of how parents can become involved in the educational activities of their children.

Work

Dock, Christopher. Eine einfältige und gründlich abgefasste Schul-Ordnung. Germantown, Pa.: Christoph Saur; Early American Imprints, 11636.

Source

Studer, Gerald C. Christopher Dock, Colonial Schoolmaster: The Biography and Writings of Christopher Dock. Scottsdale, Pa.: Herald Press, 1967.

Douglass, William (1691–1752) pamphleteer, historian, doctor

During the 1721–1722 smallpox epidemic in Boston where in the month of October alone over four hundred people died, heated debates arose over the best methods of prevention and cure. The Puritan minister Cotton MATHER, supportive of inoculation through deliberate infection, convinced Boston physician Zabdiel Boylston (1680–1766), an unlettered doctor, to test the controversial process on his son, his slave, and his slave’s son. The inoculation worked and subsequently saved thousands of lives.

William Douglass, a doctor trained in Edinburgh, vehemently opposed this practice, citing it as dangerous and hazardous. Benjamin FRANKLIN's newly issued NEW-ENGLAND COURANT published a series of articles directly attacking the "Inoculation Ministers." According to J. A. Leo Lemay, Franklin published two of Douglass's PAMPHLETS "at his own risk": on January 11, 1722, the Inoculation of the Small-Pox as Practised in Boston, and on March 6, 1722, Abuses and Scandals of Some Late Pamphlets in Favour of Inoculation of the Small-Pox. Mather's camp issued a response via the BOSTON NEWS-LETTER, attacking the antiscience stance of the anti-inoculationists. The disagreement, known as the "War of the Pamphlets," involved Mather arguing for "lawful practice, blessed by God," while Douglass continued to assert the danger of this untested procedure. Though Douglass eventually supported the practice, the debates brought issues of science and social class to the surface.

William Douglass was born in Gifford, Haddington County, Scotland, in 1691. After studying medicine at the University of Edinburgh and in Leyden, Douglass immigrated to America in 1716 and settled in Boston in 1718, three years before the smallpox epidemic. In addition to his medical work and scientific publications, Douglass wrote on history and economics in his A Summary, Historical and Political, of the First Planting, Progressive Improvements, and Present State of the British Settlements in North-America (1747–1752). A Summary begins with a short survey of ancient and modern colonization and discusses North American settlements, including Canada, but the major focus is on NEW ENGLAND. On the whole, Douglass emerges as a strong defender of Crown prerogatives in the management and governance of the empire. Medicine and currency play a central role in his history. He died before he completed the work.

Douglass also produced several pamphlets dealing with medical issues, among them The Practical History of a New Epidemical Eruptive Military Fever. This clinical description of scarlet fever, published in 1736, appeared in print twelve years before the more famous English essay on the disease by John Fothergill. Interestingly, much of Douglass's writing did not focus on medical matters but on fiscal ones. Another Massachusetts writer who is strongly identified with the currency struggles in the colony, Thomas HUTCHINSON, hailed Douglass for his anti-paper-money stance. Hutchinson may have misread Douglass on this issue, however, for the doctor was less opposed to paper currency per se than to the irresponsible way legislatures created and used it. William Douglass died on October 21, 1752 in Boston.

Works

Douglass, William. The Abuses and Scandals of Some Late Pamphlets in Favour of Inoculation of the Small Pox. . . . Boston: Printed by J. Franklin, 1722; Early American Imprints, 2331.

Douglass. A Discourse Concerning the Currencies of the British Plantations in America, edited by Charles J. Bullock. New York: Macmillan Company, 1897.

Douglass. A Summary, Historical and Political, of the First Planting, Progressive Improvements, and Present State of the British Settlements in North-America. . . . Boston, 1747–1752; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Burton, John D. "The Awful Judgements of God upon the Land': Smallpox in Colonial Cambridge, Massachusetts," New England Quarterly, 74 (2001): 495–506.

Vans, Hugh. An Inquiry into the Nature and Uses of Money. . . . Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland and T. Green, 1740; New York: Readex Microprint, 1985.

Wetering, Maxine Van De. "A Reconsideration of the Inoculation Controversy," New England Quarterly, 58 (1985): 46–67.

Lemay, J. A. Leo. Benjamin Franklin: A Documentary History to 1748. <<http://www.english.udel.edu/lemay/franklin/>> (viewed September 12, 2006).

Drama

Drama in early America developed gradually, finding its strongest support initially in the Southern colonies of Virginia and Maryland rather than in the NEW ENGLAND colonies, which expressed a more pronounced Puritan resistance to the theater. The first known play written in English and performed in America was William Darby's Ye Bare and Ye Cubb (The Bear and the Cub; 1665). No copies of this play, which was performed in a local tavern, have survived. In the early 1700s, New York and Virginia were the first colonies to build theaters; Boston's first theater house opened in 1794.

Although seventeenth-century Anglo-American drama largely comprised English plays, eighteenth-century plays more directly addressed themes of early America. The first play printed in America was an unproduced political SATIRE, Androboros (Man-Eater), written in 1714 by Robert Hunter (1666–1734), royal governor of New York and New Jersey (1709–1719), in which he ridiculed his political enemies—Colonel Francis Nicholson (1655–1728), New York's lieutenant governor, and William Vesey (1696–1742), Rector of Trinity Church, New York. In 1764 an anonymous play, The Paxton Boys, addressed frontier Native American relations in Pennsylvania. Thomas GODFREY's The Prince of Parthia (1759) was the first play produced by an American-born playwright; it was presented in 1767, four years after Godfrey's death.

The AMERICAN REVOLUTION inspired plays from both PATRIOTS and LOYALISTS, notably General John Burgoyne's (1722–1792) The Blockade of Boston (1775) and an anonymous response, THE BLOCKHEADS; OR, THE AFFRIGHTED OFFICERS. George WASHINGTON, an avid supporter of the

AS the great buſineſs of the polite world is the eager purſuit of amuſement, and as the Public diverſions of the ſeaſon have been interrupted by the hoſtile parade in the capital; the exhibition of a new farce may not be unentertaining.

THE GROUP,

As lately acted, and to be re-acted to the wonder of all ſuperior intelligences, nigh head-quarters at Amboyne.

The author has thought proper to borrow the following ſpirit-ed lines from a late celebrated poet, and offer to the public by way of PROLOGUE, which cannot fail of pleaſing at this criſis.

What! aim'd for virtue, and not point the pen,
Brand the bld front of ſhameleſs guilty men,
Daſh the proud Gameſter from his gilded car,
Bare the mean heart which lurketh beneath a ſtar,
.....
Shall I not ſtrip the gilding off a knave,
Unplac'd, unpenſion'd, no man's heir or ſlave?
I will or periſh in the gen'rous cauſe;
Hear this and tremble, ye who ſcape the laws;
Yet, while I live, no rich or noble knave,
Shall walk the world in credit to his grave;
To virtue only, and her friends, a friend,
The world beſide may murmur, or commend.

B O S T O N : Printed and Sold by EDES and GILL, in Queen-Street. 1775.

Title page for the satirical play by Mercy Otis Warren, published both in newspapers and in pamphlet form, about Loyalists to the British Crown theater, was featured in several plays: Hugh Henry BRACKENRIDGE's The Battle of Bunkers-Hill (1776), John Leacock's (1729–1802) The Fall of British Tyranny (1776), William DUNLAP's André (1798), Peter Markoe's (1752?–1792) The Patriot Chief (1784), and Royall TYLER's THE CONTRAST. Political satire is also the subject of Mercy Otis WARREN's triad of Revolutionary-themed plays—The Adulateur (1773), The Defeat (1773), and The Group (1775); these plays highlight the misdirected actions of Thomas Hopkinson, a Massachusetts royal governor, and other Loyalists.

The first play written by an American to be professionally produced was Tyler's The Contrast, a comedy of manners in which the honest, simple ways of the American are set against the corrupt indulgence of the Anglo-European. The Contrast opened on April 16, 1787, at the John Street Theatre and was immediately reproduced on April 18, May 2, and

May 12, an unprecedented number of performances in one month. When the play was published in Philadelphia in 1790, subscribers included George Washington. Inspired by Richard Sheridan's (1751–1816) School for Scandal (1777), Tyler emphasized virtue and simplicity over pretense. In Jeffrey H. Richards's discussion of the main elements of a play—scenery, music, dialogue, plot, and character—he notes that The Contrast was staged with “only a few props—chairs, a table—and flats, painted scenery that could be slid into place from the sides or wings, or with a background painting.”

Other notable early American plays include Thomas Forrest's (1747–1825) The Disappointment, or, The Force of Credulity (1767); Susanna Haswell ROWSON's Slaves in Algiers; or, A Struggle for Freedom (1794), The Female Patriot (1795), The Volunteers (1795), and Americans in England (1797); James Nelson BARKER's (1784–1858) The Indian Princess (1808); and Robert Montgomery BIRD's (1806–1854) The Gladiator (1831).

Works

Clark, Barrett Harper, ed, America's Lost Plays, 20 volumes.

Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1940; 1963–1965.

Coyle, William, and Harvey G. Damaser, Six Early American Plays, 1798–1890. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1968.

Portrait by George Spalding of William Dunlap, circa 1826, who was known as the Father of American Drama

Title page for the posthumous publication of Thomas Godfrey's play about the evils of despotism, first produced in 1767, four years after Godfrey's death

- Kritzer, Amelia Howe. Plays by Early American Women, 1775–1850. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995.
- Moody, Richard. Dramas from the American Theatre, 1762–1909. Cleveland: World, 1966.

Sources

- Brown, Jared. The Theatre in America during the Revolution. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Richards, Jeffrey H. Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Richards. Theatre Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage, 1607–1789. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1991.
- Richards, ed. Early American Drama. New York: Penguin, 1997.
- Vaughan, Jack A. Early American Dramatists from the Beginnings to 1900. New York: Ungar, 1981.

Wilmer, Steve E. Theatre, Society and the Nation: Staging American Identities. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Recommended Writings

- The Paxton Boys* (1764)
- The Blockheads; or, The Affrighted Officers* (1776)
- Barker, James Nelson. The Indian Princess (1808)
- Bird, Robert Montgomery. The Gladiator (1831)
- Brackenridge, Hugh Henry. The Battle of Bunkers-Hill (1776)
- Burgoyne, General John. The Blockade of Boston (1775)
- Dunlap, William. André (1798)
- Forrest, Thomas. The Disappointment; or, The Force of Credulity (1767)

Title page from Susanna Rowson's 1794 play insisting that women are the equals of men

Portrait of Hugh Henry Brackenridge, copied from the original by Gilbert Stuart

Godfrey, Thomas. The Prince of Parthia (1759)
 Hunter, Robert. Androboros (Man-Eater) (1714)
 Leacock, John. The Fall of British Tyranny (1776)
 Markoe, Peter. The Patriot Chief (1784)
 Rowson, Susanna Haswell. Slaves in Algiers; or, A Struggle for Freedom (1794), The Female Patriot (1795), The Volunteers (1795), and Americans in England (1797)
 Tyler, Royall. The Contrast (1787)
 Warren, Mercy Otis. The Adulateur (1773), The Defeat (1773), and The Group (1775)

Studying Early American Drama

To begin a study of early American drama, students should consult these five early sources that address historical and technical issues connected to the theatre: Hugh F. Rankin's The Theater in Colonial America (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1965); Brooks McNamara's The American Playhouse in the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1969); Paul Leicester Ford's Some Notes Towards an Essay on the Beginnings of American Dramatic Literature, 1606–1789 (New York: Burt Franklin, 1971); Daniel F. Havens's The Columbian Muse of Comedy; The Development of a Native Tradition in Early American Social Comedy, 1787–1845 (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1973); and Jack A. Vaughan's Early American Dramatists from the Beginnings to 1900 (New York: Ungar, 1981). More-recent sources include Zoe Detsi-Diamanti's Early American Women Dramatists, 1775–1860 (New York: Garland, 1998); Jeffrey H. Richards's "Early American Drama and Theater," in Teaching the Literatures of Early America, edited by Carla Mulford (New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1999, 213–228).

For studies that focus on cultural and political aspects of the theatre, students should consult Jared Brown's The Theatre in America during the Revolution (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995); Heather S. Nathans's Early American Theatre from the Revolution to

Frontispiece from Royall Tyler's The Contrast: A Comedy in Five Acts (1790), the first professionally produced comedy in the United States

Thomas Jefferson: Into the Hands of the People (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003); Richards's Theatre Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage, 1607–1789 (Durham: Duke University Press, 1991); Steve E. Wilmer's Theatre, Society and the Nation: Staging American Identities (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002); John Ogasapian's Music of the Colonial and Revolutionary Era (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004); and Richards's Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005).

For early print bibliographies, see the Federal Theatre Project's Early American Plays, A Program Devoted to the Early American Theatre (New York City: Federal Theatre Project, 1936); Jon Ben Russak's Early American Plays (New York City: Federal Theatre Project, 1939); G. William Bergquist and Henry Willis Wells's Three Centuries of English and American Plays, A Checklist. England: 1500–1800, United States: 1714–1830 (New York: Hafner, 1963); and Oscar Wegelin and John Malone's Early American Plays, 1714–1830; Being a Compilation of the Titles of Plays by American Authors Published and Performed in America Previous to 1830 (New York: Haskell House Publishers, 1968).

Drinker, Elizabeth Sandwith (1735–1807) diarist

As one of the most prolific women writers in early America, Elizabeth Sandwith Drinker left a body of work that totals several thousand pages. Her diary, considered her most significant literary endeavor, is the most complete firsthand account of the life of an elite woman in colonial North America. Elizabeth Sandwith was the daughter of Philadelphia QUAKERS Sarah Jervis and William Sandwith. She was educated by Anthony BENEZET, a noted Quaker and abolitionist. When her parents died in 1756, Elizabeth and her older sister, Mary, were taken in by Quaker families. The sisters, both in their early twenties, developed their own feather-trading business with a Dublin merchant. At the age of twenty-five Elizabeth married Henry Drinker, a wealthy Quaker merchant and widower. Elizabeth's sister, Mary, lived with the Drinkers, helping them manage two homes and care for their nine children, five of whom lived to adulthood.

Drinker began diary keeping in 1758, chronicling problems with servants, her constant concerns about her children's health, and her loneliness when her husband's business took him away for long periods. During the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, Henry Drinker, a pacifist, refused to swear allegiance to the new revolutionary government and was therefore arrested and exiled to Virginia along with sixteen other Quakers. His arrest did little to improve Elizabeth Drinker's already unfavorable opinion of the Continental army. Along with other prominent Quaker women, she presented a petition for the release of the Quaker men to General George WASHINGTON, who allowed them to proceed to Lancaster, Pennsylvania, where they delivered the petition to Timothy Matlack (?–1829), the secretary of the Pennsylvania Supreme Executive Council. After many delays the Drinkers were reunited.

Drinker's diary makes it clear that she disliked the Continental forces, but she was equally disdainful of the British army. Describing a lavish celebration for General William Howe, she writes: "This day may be remembered by many from the scenes of folly and vanity. . . . How insensible do these people appear, while our land is so greatly desolated, and Death and sore destruction has overtaken and impends over so many."

A pacifist and an abolitionist, Drinker nevertheless appears judgmental and domineering toward her servants. Drinker recounts the story of an unmarried servant who became pregnant while working for the Drinker family. Elizabeth and Henry removed the child from the mother, named the child themselves, and refused to let the father see the baby.

Elizabeth Drinker not only recorded the details of her personal life but also provided details about the larger world around her during a time of social and political change. She died November 24, 1807.

Work

Drinker, Elizabeth Sandwith. The Diary of Elizabeth Drinker, 3 volumes, edited by Elaine Forman Crane. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991.

Sources

- Berkin, Carol. First Generations: Women in Colonial America. New York: Hill & Wang, 1996.
- Branson, Susan. These Fiery Frenchified Dames: Women and Political Culture In Early National Philadelphia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Drinker, Elizabeth Sandwith. The Diary of Elizabeth Drinker: The Life Cycle of an Eighteenth-Century Woman, edited by Elaine Forman Crane. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1994.

Dunlap, John (1747–1812) printer, journalist

John Dunlap was born in Ireland in 1747. At the age of ten he joined his uncle William DUNLAP, a printer, BOOKSELLER, and postmaster, in Philadelphia as a printer's apprentice. John married Elizabeth Hayes Ellison, a widow from England, in 1773.

When William Dunlap traveled to England to study for the ministry in 1766, John Dunlap assumed responsibility for the printing shop. In 1768 he became the sole proprietor of the business by assuming a ten-year loan from his uncle. He was able to build his business over the next three years by printing a variety of publications. Following in the path of a few other enterprising printers, Dunlap established his own weekly newspaper, The Pennsylvania Packet, and The General Advertiser, in 1771.

Dunlap competed in a relatively crowded market for advertising and for government printing assignments. THE PENNSYLVANIA GAZETTE, which had been established by Benjamin FRANKLIN, and The Pennsylvania Journal, operated by the Bradford family, dominated the market. Dunlap was successful in an indirect way: in 1774 he exchanged books, stationery, and printing services for a major purchase of land in Northumberland County.

The AMERICAN REVOLUTION brought increased opportunities for newspapers. It also inspired new enterprises, including Benjamin TOWNE's Pennsylvania Evening Post and James Humphreys's Pennsylvania Ledger. Dunlap seized his opportunity by actively supporting the PATRIOT cause. Accordingly, he received a number of printing assignments from the state and from the Continental Congress; for example, he printed the first edition of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. Congress distributed this printed version to the other colonies and to foreign governments as the official notice of independence.

Dunlap left Philadelphia for Lancaster, Pennsylvania, during the British occupation, establishing himself as the principal printer for the state legislature. His services included printing both public notices and the new state currency. He also was an active participant in the state government and a member of the militia, serving at the battles of Princeton and Trenton. In 1778 he was the first Patriot printer to reestablish his shop in Philadelphia following the evacuation of the British. Two years later he established a partnership with David Claypoole, a former apprentice. Under the joint management of Dunlap and Claypoole, the Packet made a transition to triweekly and then in 1784 to daily publication.

The partnership allowed Dunlap to expand his interests. With a steady income and new contacts within the government and among the state's Patriot elite, he became an entrepreneur, speculating in currency and land. Dunlap used depreciation and purchase of LOYALIST property to his advantage; in 1788 he purchased one hundred and thirty-one thousand acres of land in Kentucky. During this time he also expanded his printing interests, establishing Dunlap's Maryland Gazette, or, The Baltimore General Advertiser (1775–1778). With James Hayes Jr., Dunlap expanded in 1781 by establishing a printing business and a newspaper, The Virginia Gazette, or, The American Advertiser, in Richmond, Virginia. Once again Dunlap was able to capitalize on public printing assignments. Over the next two decades he became an important figure in Philadelphia and in Pennsylvania politics and society. He died November 27, 1812.

Works

Dunlap's Pennsylvania Packet. Philadelphia: Printed by John Dunlap. 1773–1777; Early American Imprints, 13261.

Dunlap's Maryland Gazette, or, The Baltimore General Advertiser. Baltimore: Printed by John Dunlap. 1775–1778; Early American Imprints, 14016.

The Virginia Gazette, or, The American Advertiser. Richmond, Va.: Printed by John Dunlap & James Hayes, 1781– ; Early American Imprints, 17418.

The Pennsylvania Packet, and Daily Advertiser. Philadelphia: Printed by John Dunlap, 1784–1790.

Sources

Goff, Frederick Richmond. The John Dunlap Broadside: The First Printing of the Declaration of Independence. Washington: Library of Congress, 1976.

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers . . ., 2 volumes. Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1810; second edition, Albany, New York: Printed by J. Munsell, 1874; reprinted and edited by Marcus A. McCorison, New York: Weathervane, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 21483.

Dunlap, William (1766–1839) playwright, historian

*Our Poet builds upon a fact to-night;
Yet claims, in building, every Poet's right;
To choose, embellish, lop, or add, or blend,
Fiction with truth, as best may suit his end. . . .*

—André (1798)

A major figure in the development of American art and theater, William Dunlap had an interesting and varied career as a painter, playwright, merchant, theatrical manager, and historian. Dunlap was born in Perth Amboy, New Jersey, the only child of Samuel Dunlap, a LOYALIST merchant, and Margaret Sargent. When he was eleven his father relocated the family to New York, which was then under British military occupation. Dunlap received his education in New Jersey and New York; his teachers included his mother, various tutors, and a local artist. Having demonstrated some skill at painting, he was sent to London in 1784 to study art under Benjamin West (1738–1820), an American expatriate, the leading Anglo-American historical painter of the eighteenth century, and mentor of a number of prominent American artists. Although Dunlap met West, he failed to enroll in a course of study and spent most of his three years in London socializing with friends and attending the theater.

Dunlap returned to New York, where he established a studio. He had limited success as a professional artist. Instead, he devoted significant amounts of his time to the local theater. He had developed an early taste for plays produced in New York, both by professional companies and by the British officer corps. Dunlap was inspired by the emerging American theater, particularly by the success of Royall TYLER's THE CONTRAST, the first American comedy to be produced pro-professionally. During this period Dunlap wrote a number of his own plays, including The Modest Soldier; or, Love in New York (1787), which was never produced, and The Father; or, American Shandy-ism (1789), which received critical acclaim as a professional production. Encouraged by his early success as a playwright, Dunlap continued to write, even though his plays did not provide enough income for himself and his new bride, Elizabeth Woolsey, whom he married in 1789 and with whom he had two children.

Dunlap supplemented the family income by taking a partnership in his father's china business, but he remained interested in the theater. He wrote the first American Gothic plays, Fontainville Abbey (1795) and Ribbemont; or the Feudal Baron (1796). Drawing on a style of literature popular in eighteenth-century England, Dunlap presaged nineteenth-century American authors such as Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849) and Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804–1864), whose writings contemplated the dark side of the human imagination.

In 1796 Dunlap tried his hand at theater production, buying an interest in the Old American Company. The company did not prosper, suffering from poor management and declining public interest. Dunlap's plays André (1798) and The Glory of Columbia—Her Yeomanry! (1803) met with little success, and bankruptcy brought an end to the second phase of his theatrical career in 1805.

After a year of earning a limited income as an itinerant painter of miniature portraits, in 1806 Dunlap accepted a position as assistant manager at the Park Theater, where he remained for five years, before returning to his artwork. In 1813 he tried his hand at two additional genres, writing a biography of the late English actor George Frederick Cooke and publishing a short-lived magazine, the Monthly Recorder. Bankrupt again, he found employment as assistant paymaster-general for the state militia. At the same time he published his second attempt at biography, The Life of Charles Brockden Brown (1815).

With the war over, Dunlap returned to painting miniatures and became a founder of the National Academy of Design. He continued to write plays until 1828. In 1832 he published the History of the American Theatre, largely focusing on the theater in New York in the late 1700s and early 1800s. This was followed by the History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States (1834), a broad catalogue of artists and craftsmen, including autobiographical statements that had been solicited by Dunlap, and their reminiscences of other artists.

Never shy about trying new genres, Dunlap wrote a novel, Thirty Years Ago; or, the Memoirs of a Water Drinker (1836), that reflected his own experience as a lifelong advocate of temperance. Returning to history, he published A History of New York for Schools in 1837 and expanded on the subject in the two-volume History of the New Netherlands, Province of New York, and State of New York, to the Adoption of the Federal Constitution (1839, 1840). The second volume of his last work was published posthumously. Dunlap died in 1839 following a stroke.

Works

Dunlap, William. Five Plays of William Dunlap. 1800–1830; Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1991.

Dunlap. History of the American Theatre, and Anecdotes of the Principal Actors. New York: Printed by J. & J. Harper, 1832; edited by John Hodgkinson. New York: Burt Franklin, 1963.

Dunlap. History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States. New York: Printed by George P. Scott, 1834; revised and enlarged edition, 3 volumes, edited by Alexander Wyckoff. New York: B. Blom, 1965.

Dunlap. A History of New York, for Schools, 2 volumes. New York: Collins, Keese, 1837; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms.

Dunlap. Diary of William Dunlap (1766–1839): The Memoirs of a Dramatist, Theatrical Manager, Painter, Critic, Novelist, and Historian, 3 volumes. New York: Printed for the New York Historical Society, 1930.

Sources

Canary, Robert H. William Dunlap. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Lyons, Maura. William Dunlap and the Construction of an American Art History. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2005.

Dwight, Timothy (1752–1817) poet

*While life prolongs its precious light,
Mercy is found, and peace is given;
But soon, ah soon, approaching night
Shall blot out every hope of heaven.*

—“While Life Prolongs Its Precious Light” (1800)

Timothy Dwight, one of America's first PATRIOT poets, was born to Mary Edwards Dwight and Major Timothy Dwight in Northampton, Massachusetts, on May 14, 1752. He was the oldest of thirteen children. His mother was the daughter of the clergyman Jonathan EDWARDS. As a child, Dwight was strongly influenced by his mother, especially in his education. He showed great academic promise from the beginning, learning the alphabet at two and reading the King James Bible with ease by the age of four. He had mastered basic Latin before his seventh birthday. Like his grandfather Edwards, Dwight entered Yale at thirteen and was a dedicated student. He dedicated over fourteen hours a day to his studies, which included pre-dawn readings of Homer, an activity that led to vision problems later in life. Dwight graduated at the top of his class and then tutored at Yale while he earned his master's degree. During this time he helped organize a literary circle at Yale known as THE CONNECTICUT WITS. As his thesis, Dwight produced

A Dissertation on the History, Eloquence, and Poetry of the Bible, further damaging his eyes, so that he had to hire others to read for him for the rest of his life.

In 1776, Dwight's father removed himself to British-controlled western Florida because he believed that the oath he had taken as a probate judge precluded his support for, or participation in, the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, and he did not want to actively aid the British during the war. He died there on June 10, 1777, but his wife and children did not learn of his death for over a year. A few months before his father's death, Dwight married Mary Woolsey. He resigned from Yale in September of that year and joined a Connecticut brigade of the Continental army as chaplain. During the war Dwight turned his literary skills to songwriting, composing, among others, the popular patriotic tune, "Columbia, Columbia, to Glory Arise." In "America: Or, a Poem on the Settlement of the British Colonies; Addressed to Friends of Freedom, and Their Country, By a Gentleman Educated at Yale-College" (1780), Dwight writes, "O Land supremely blest! to thee tis given / To taste the choicest joys of bounteous heaven; / Thy rising Glory shall expand its rays."

When Dwight received the news of his father's death he resigned from the army so that he could return to Northampton and assist his mother and siblings.

In the last years of the war, Dwight's contemporaries urged him to enter politics. He served two terms in the Massachusetts state legislature but turned down a nomination to the Continental Congress. Instead, he devoted his time to preaching, education, and poetry. His rise to national prominence came when he accepted the leadership of Greenfield Hill Congregationalist Church in July 1783. Soon afterward he established the Greenfield Academy, a school that earned an international reputation. The academy attracted students from every region of the United States and from the West Indies. At Greenfield Dwight implemented the most advanced curriculum possible, eliminating corporal punishment and admitting female students, who studied the same subjects as their male counterparts, including Latin and higher mathematics.

Dwight did not let his fame for educational innovation overshadow his interest in poetry. He wrote the first epic poem in the United States, The Conquest of Canaan, in 1785. Almost a decade later, he published Greenfield Hill (1794). This pastoral poem, a paean to the rural American life, described the scenery, people, and conditions of his part of Connecticut. Dwight hoped was that this poem would prove to Europeans that the new republic had worthwhile artistic, poetic talent.

Dwight also wrote satiric poems, declaiming against Voltaire (1694–1778) and David Hume (1711–1776). He expressed his certainty that, despite improvements in material circumstances, technological advances, and new scientific theories, human nature would remain prey to evil. Dwight's pessimism regarding the human condition contributed to his opposition to democracy.

In 1795 Ezra STILES, president of Yale, died, leaving a legacy of decaying facilities, budget shortages, haphazard instruction, and student unrest. The university invited Dwight to return to his alma mater and improve its financial, intellectual, and social conditions. (Ironically, Dwight had been the clear choice of Yale tutors and students when the trustees offered Stiles the position.) Dwight accepted, and immediately set about refurbishing the university. He appointed Benjamin Silliman (1779–1864) as professor of chemistry, instantly establishing Yale as the center of experimental sciences in the country. He raised funds from donors, alumni, and the state legislature. Lauded for his reforms, Dwight continued to serve as president of Yale until his death.

From 1796 to 1815 Dwight regularly traveled through New York and NEW ENGLAND, keeping notebooks of his observations and experiences. His collection of travel letters was published after his death in Travels in New England and New York (1821–1822; 4 volumes). Dwight died January 11, 1817.

Work

Dwight, Timothy. Dissertation on the History, Eloquence, and Poetry of the Bible. New Haven: Printed by Thomas and Samuel Green; republished in The Major Poems of Timothy Dwight, 1752–1817. Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1969; Early American Imprints, 12380.

Sources

Fitzmier, John R. New England's Moral Legislator: Timothy Dwight, 1752–1817. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

Silverman, Kenneth. Timothy Dwight. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Wenzke, Anabelle S. Timothy Dwight. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.

Kafer, Peter K. "The Making of Timothy Dwight: A Connecticut Morality Tale," The William and Mary Quarterly, 47 (1990): 189–209.

Wells, Colin. The Devil and Doctor Dwight: Satire and Theology in the Early American Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Daisy Miller: A Study by Henry James (New York: Harper, 1878) novel

In what is perhaps James's most accessible and certainly one of his most widely read works, the author addresses one of his perennial themes: the interplay of the Old World and the New. Frederick Winterbourne, an American expatriate visiting Vevey, Switzerland, becomes fascinated with Daisy Miller from Schenectady, New York. The bold and naive Daisy and her family blunder about in the sophisticated European environment. When Winterbourne later meets Daisy and her family in Rome, he finds that she is regarded with suspicion and disgust by resident Americans who think she is flouting the proper code of conduct for a young lady, especially when she allows herself to be escorted by Giovanelli, an Italian opportunist. One night Winterbourne finds Daisy with Giovanelli in the Colosseum and tells him he should not expose Daisy to the malarial atmosphere. The Italian laconically replies, "But when was the Signorina ever prudent?" Daisy dies with shocking suddenness a few days later.

Much of the power of James's story derives from the shock of Daisy's death. Although she has been reckless and ignorant, Winterbourne admires her independence and her lack of concern for what others think of her. Her premature death therefore seems a tragic end to a spirited young woman with brighter prospects than her conventional contemporaries had recognized.

Daisy Miller preceded James's more complex representations of women, which include Isabel Archer in THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY (1884) and Maisie Farange in What Maisie Knew (1897).

Sources

Bender, Todd K. A Concordance to Daisy Miller. New York: Garland, 1987.

Hoffman, Charles G. The Short Novels of Henry James. New York: Bookman, 1957.

Pollak, Vivian R., ed. New Essays on Daisy Miller and The Turn of the Screw. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Reed, Kimberly C., and Peter G. Beidler, eds. Approaches to Teaching Henry James's Daisy Miller and The Turn of the Screw. New York: Modern Language Association, 2005.

Dana, Richard Henry, Jr. (1815–1882) novelist

No man can be a sailor, or know what sailors are, unless he has lived in the forecabin with them—turned in and out with them, eaten of their dish and drank of their cup.

—Two Years Before the Mast (1840)

Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Richard Henry Dana Jr. spent two years at sea before completing his Harvard degree in 1837. He attended law school from 1837 to 1840 and was admitted to the bar in 1840. An outspoken political activist, he defended fugitive slaves in the early 1850s when a federal law required their return to their Southern masters. Dana served as U.S. district attorney for Massachusetts from 1861 to 1866. His autobiographical novel, TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST (1840), proved influential: Herman MELVILLE's WHITE-JACKET and MOBY-DICK both profited from Dana's vivid narrative and authentic account of life at sea.

Sources

Gale, Robert L. Richard Henry Dana, Jr. New York: Twayne, 1969.
Shapiro, Samuel. Richard Henry Dana, Jr. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1961.

Dana, Richard Henry, Sr. (1787–1879) editor, poet

Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Richard Dana was trained as a lawyer but devoted his time to writing. He was one of the founders of THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW and later began another journal in New York, The Idle Man, which lasted less than a year. Dana's first book of poetry, The Buccaneer and Other Poems, appeared in 1827. "The Buccaneer," his best-known poem, reflects the influence of the English Romantic poets William Wordsworth and Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Dana's Poems and Prose Writings was published in 1833.

Source

Hunter, Doreen M. Richard Henry Dana, Sr. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Davis, Rebecca Harding (1831–1910) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Alabama and educated at a Pennsylvania seminary, Rebecca Harding Davis grew up in the town of Wheeling in what is now West Virginia. Her novella Life in the Iron Mills, which appeared in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in 1861, established her as an early proponent of REALISM. In Margret Howth (1862) Davis told readers that her purpose was to "dig into this commonplace, this vulgar American life, and see what is in it."

Davis published ten novels and more than one hundred short stories, together with essays and children's literature. Later works include Waiting for the Verdict (1868), a novel about the treatment of African Americans after Emancipation; Earthen Pitchers (1873–1874), an experimental short story in which self-sufficient women find their identities in helping others; and John Andross (1874), one of the first novels dealing with American political corruption.

In 1863 Davis married a Philadelphia journalist, with whom she had three children; her son Richard Harding DAVIS also became a journalist. By the time she published her memoir, Bits of Gossip, in 1904, Davis had lapsed into obscurity. Davis's work was rediscovered in the 1970s by the writer Tillie Olsen.

Sources

Rebecca Harding Davis: Writing Cultural Autobiography, edited by Janice Milner Lasseter and Sharon M. Harris. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 2001.
Pfaelzer, Jean. Parlor Radical: Rebecca Harding Davis and the Origins of American Social Realism. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1996.

Rose, Jane Atteridge. Rebecca Harding Davis. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Davis, Richard Harding (1864–1916) journalist, fiction writer, playwright

The son of novelist Rebecca Harding DAVIS, Richard Harding Davis worked as a reporter for the New York Sun and other newspapers. He served as a war correspondent during the Spanish War in Cuba (1895–1896), the Greco-Turkish War (1897), the Spanish-American War (1898), the Boer War (1899–1902), the Russo-Japanese War (1904–1905), and World War I (1914–1918). His dispatches from various fronts were vivid and accurate, in part because of his enthusiasm for the conflicts he covered. In the Battle of San Juan Hill during the Spanish-American War, Davis joined the ranks of Theodore Roosevelt's cavalry unit, although such conduct was forbidden to journalists by the rules of war. In his rush to get to the front lines in World War I, Davis was almost shot as a spy by the Germans. He exhibited similar involvement in minor events he covered—for example, serving as a yachtsman while covering yacht-club races. He turned his own wedding engagement into a news event by sending his fiancée's ring on a treacherous eight-thousand mile route via a messenger, tracking the ring's progress with daily press bulletins.

After becoming managing editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY in 1890, Davis published a collection of his news reports. He also published several collections of short fiction. Many of his stories were set in the exotic locales he covered as a reporter, but he also wrote stories about New York socialite Courtlandt Van Bibber, whose character helped shape the popular conception of the ideal fin de siècle American male. Another of Davis's fictional alter egos is the eponymous cub reporter of Gallegher and Other Stories (1891). Davis also wrote several novels and some twenty-five plays, many of them based on his own stories.

Sources

Langford, Gerald. The Richard Harding Davis Years: A Biography of Mother and Son. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1961.
Osborn, Scott Compton. Richard Harding Davis. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
Roggenkamp, Karen. Narrating the News: New Journalism and Literary Genre in Late-Nineteenth-Century American Newspapers and Fiction. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2005.
Seelye, John D. War Games: Richard Harding Davis and the New Imperialism. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2003.

De Forest, John William (1826–1906) novelist

John William De Forest was the son of a small-town Connecticut manufacturer who gave him a strong work ethic.

Burdened by chronic illness in early manhood, De Forest was unable to attend college. Instead, he traveled for some four years in the Near East and in Europe, an experience that provided him with material he used in two of his earliest works, the travel books Oriental Acquaintance (1856) and European Acquaintance (1858). After serving three years with the Union army during the Civil War, De Forest worked with the Veteran Reserve Corps in Washington, D.C., and with the Freedmen's Bureau in South Carolina before returning to Connecticut in 1869.

While still engaged in Reconstruction work, De Forest published the novel on which his reputation rests: MISS RAVENEL'S CONVERSION FROM SECESSION TO LOYALTY (1867), considered by some to be the first realistic novel about the war and a precursor to Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage (1895). For the next decade De Forest wrote professionally, turning out a series of realist novels that reflected his disillusionment with the GILDED AGE, such as Kate Beaumont (1872), a study of South Carolina manners and morals; and Honest John Vane (1875) and Playing the Mischief (1875), political novels set during the administration of Ulysses S. Grant.

After the death of his wife in 1878 De Forest began writing private reminiscences, two of which—a war memoir titled A Volunteer's Adventures (1946) and its sequel, A Union Officer in the Reconstruction (1948)—were published posthumously. Later, William Dean HOWELLS followed De Forest's realist path and extolled his predecessor as a major novelist whose work was ahead of its time.

Sources

Gargano, James W., ed. Critical Essays on John William De Forest. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Hijiya, James A. John De Forest and the Rise of American Gentility. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1988.

Light, James F. John William De Forest. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Delany, Martin (1812–1885) editor, political writer, novelist

Born in what is now Charleston, West Virginia, Martin Delany was raised in western Pennsylvania. Between 1843 and 1847, he edited The Mystery, the first abolitionist paper published west of the Alleghenies. He later served as co-editor, with Frederick DOUGLASS, of THE NORTH STAR (1847–1849). During the 1850s Delany encouraged African American emigration to such locales as Central America and Eastern Africa. His only novel, Blake, or The Huts of America (1859) was written largely in opposition to the passive and servile image of African Americans in Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN. It tells the story of a West Indian slave who foments revolution in both Cuba and the American South. During the CIVIL WAR, Delany served as a recruiter for the Union army, eventually becoming the first black field officer in the United States. Following the war he worked for the Freedmen's Bureau and, in the late 1870s, briefly entertained plans to emigrate to Liberia. Delany died in Wilberforce, Ohio.

—Edward Whitley

Dewey, John (1859–1952) philosopher, educator

The inclination to learn from life itself and to make the conditions of life such that all will learn in the process of living is the finest product of schooling.

—Democracy and Education (1916)

Born in Vermont, John Dewey earned his B.A. degree at the University of Vermont and received his Ph.D. in philosophy from Johns Hopkins, where he worked under the pragmatist logician Charles Saunders Peirce, in 1884. He taught at several universities, including the University of Michigan, the University of Minnesota, the University of Chicago, and Columbia University. He is best known for his theories of progressive education as propounded in his Psychology (1887), The School and Society (1899), The Child and the Curriculum (1902), Moral Principles in Education (1909), and Interest and Effort in Education (1913). These early works reflect Dewey's pragmatism, an approach to philosophy and education pioneered by Peirce and William JAMES. Dewey believed that modern education had to take into account a changing industrial society, the findings of science, and the tenets of democracies. But education also had to infuse students with the practical applications of abstract knowledge; thus, for Dewey, education was not merely a way of acquiring wisdom but also a way of transforming the world.

Dewey developed his own concept of “instrumentalism,” arguing that truth and knowledge grow out of a changing reality. Education therefore had to be dynamic, its curriculum subject to continuous revision. Through constant observation, as in the natural sciences, a democratic society would prosper. Dewey expanded on this approach in Studies in Logical Theory (1903); How We Think (1910); The Influence of Darwin on Philosophy (1910); Democracy and Education (1916); Reconstruction in Philosophy (1920); Experience and Nature (1925); Individualism, Old and New (1930); Art as Experience (1934); Liberalism and Social Action (1935); and Freedom and Culture (1939).

Although Dewey was not a political activist, his work was regarded as one of the pillars of liberal civilization and Dewey himself as a man of outstanding integrity. When Joseph Stalin (1879–1953) carried on his famous purge trials in 1935, Dewey headed a commission to determine whether the defendants were getting a fair hearing. His findings that the trials were, in fact, bogus turned many liberal thinkers away from the notion that the Soviet Union could serve as a model of the socially responsible welfare state. Dewey's philosophy and political stance are clarified in works such as Democracy and Education (1916) and Problems of Men (1946), a collection of essays.

Sources

- Archambault, Reginald D., ed. Dewey on Education: Appraisals. New York: Random House, 1966.
- Caspary, William R. Dewey on Democracy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2000.
- Dalton, Thomas C. Becoming John Dewey: Dilemmas of a Philosopher and Naturalist. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2002.
- Eames, Elizabeth R., and Richard W. Field, eds. Experience and Value: Essays on John Dewey and Pragmatic Naturalism. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press, 2003.
- Martin, Jay. The Education of John Dewey: A Biography. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.

The Dial (1840–1844; 1860) periodical

Originally an organ of the transcendentalist movement (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), The Dial was founded in 1840 by Theodore PARKER, Bronson ALCOTT, Orestes AUGUSTUS BROWNSON, Margaret FULLER, James Freeman CLARKE, and Ralph Waldo EMERSON; it was published in Boston. Fuller served as editor until 1844, when Emerson briefly took over the post. This version of the magazine, although attacked in the press for its obscurity, still managed to influence the public greatly through the publication of works by such influential thinkers as Henry David THOREAU. Perpetually in the red, the magazine ceased publication in April 1844.

When The Dial was revived in 1860 by Unitarian clergyman Moncure Conway (1832–1907) in Cincinnati, it served once again as a transcendentalist mouthpiece. Conway, a Congregationalist minister who championed causes such as ABOLITIONISM, published writing by Emerson, Alcott, and William Dean HOWELLS, among others. Distinguished literary journals called The Dial were also published in the twentieth century.

Sources

- Myerson, Joel. The New England Transcendentalists and the Dial: A History of the Magazine and Its Contributors. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980.
- Wasserstrom, William. The Time of the Dial. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1963.

Dialect or Vernacular Writing

As used in connection with developments in nineteenth-century American literature such as REALISM, dialect writing refers to the simulation of the language of everyday life in rural America. The key characteristics of this simulation include phonetic spelling and deliberately ungrammatical constructions. For instance, Mary N. MURFREE used dialect in the title of her short story, "A-Playin' of Old Sledge at the Settlement" (1883), where elisions and misspellings indicate how Murfree's Tennessee mountaineer characters actually speak. Some dialect writing also uses what is known as "eye dialect," or misspellings that do not affect a word's pronunciation. A famous example is Huckleberry Finn's spelling of "siviliation," which Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) used to indicate Huck's low level of education. It should be noted that these two types of dialect function differently: the first is a feature of a character's speech and the second a feature of a narrator's voice.

In the first case, poor English is displayed as dialogue within a story that is otherwise dialect free. Dialect in this case is isolated as though it were a verbatim transcription of "local" speech. This kind of dialect is common to LOCAL-COLOR stories, or stories whose primary aim is to highlight the peculiarities of rural folkways. In the second case, when the narrative voice itself is written in dialect, there is no stark contrast between the language of the narration and the language spoken by a character. It can be said, therefore, that this second kind of dialect writing does not present abnormal speech as such but instead explores the limits and possibilities of an individual speech pattern.

Dialect writing reached its pinnacle in the late nineteenth century, when American literary periodicals, such as THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY (1857– ) and HARPER'S MONTHLY (1850– ), began to publish a steady stream of local-color stories. The most popular setting for early dialect writing was the American South. An exposé titled "The South As It Is," published in THE NATION just months after the CIVIL WAR, began a national phenomenon of stories featuring Southern settings and dialects. Dialect writing reinforced sectional division in America; according to the prevailing logic, the rural South had dialect while the urban North, with the exception of slums and immigrant neighborhoods, had none. Likewise, African American characters of the period spoke in thick dialect and thus seemed ignorant and unassuming. For instance, Joel Chandler HARRIS's Uncle Remus, the title character/storyteller of Harris's UNCLE REMUS, HIS SONGS AND HIS SAYINGS—and other fictionalizations by Harris of African American fables—embody the minstrel motif of the docile Negro (see MINSTREL SHOW).

Charles W. Chesnutt, a near contemporary of Harris, used dialect to subvert this same motif. The former slave character/storyteller in Chesnutt's Uncle Julius stories is a "trickster"; he speaks in a remarkably dense dialect, and his name echoes that of Harris's character, but Julius is smarter than he lets on. Through Julius, Chesnutt exposes the racist social hierarchy embedded in dialect speech, wherein dialect speakers appear less worldly and more inescapably bound to backwards folkways than do nondialect speakers. In short, dialect writers often shared the realist's interest in critiquing social structures. Reproducing the linguistic signs of low social status, the dialect writer exposed the link between speech patterns and status.

Further distinctions can be made between dialect writing and realism. First, dialect writing centered on rural, impoverished places. Second, it demarcated the external signs of social hierarchy, whereas so-called high realists, such as Henry JAMES, explored the internal, psychological impact of such hierarchies. Finally, no matter how subtle or subversive it may be, dialect writing is always vulnerable to claims that it is more anthropological than literary. Its realism, unlike that of James, seems verifiable—one can go to the South and listen to people talk, but no one can enter the psyche of a Jamesian protagonist. Another characteristic of dialect writing that distinguishes it from other forms of realism is its grounding in “vernacular culture” or the everyday situations and customs of life in low places.

Being very far from the Victorian ideal of what Matthew Arnold called “the best that has been known and said in the world,” dialect writing might seem little more than a sidebar to American literature; that is, it might seem to have had no direct influence on high art. However, as one example in this era, it is at least partially due to a masterful use of the vernacular that Twain's ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884) is often considered the pinnacle achievement of American fiction. Dialect and vernacular writing have always proved to have an impact on high art.

Sources

Ammons, Elizabeth, and Valerie Rohy, eds. “Introduction,” in their American Local Color Writing, 1880–1920. New York: Penguin, 1998, pp. vii–xxx.

Brodhead, Richard. “Regionalism and the Upper Class,” in Rethinking Class: Literary Studies and Social Formations, edited by Wai Chee Dimock and Michael T. Gilmore. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994, pp. 150–174.

Jones, Gavin Roger. Strange Talk: The Politics of Dialect Literature in Gilded Age America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.

—Jason Arthur

Dickinson, Emily (1830–1886) poet

Tell all the truth but tell it slant — Success in Circuit lies

—Untitled (circa 1872)

Born in Amherst, Massachusetts, a daughter of the distinguished lawyer Edward Dickinson, Emily Dickinson went to the Amherst Academy and attended Mount Holyoke Female Seminary for a year. The rest of her life was spent at home among a few close friends; her only other regular contacts were correspondents. Although she never married, Dickinson formed close friendships with several men. These included Benjamin F. Newton, a law student with whom she shared her interests in reading and poetry; the Reverend Charles Wadsworth of Philadelphia, who met her in 1854 and became a confidant; and Thomas Wentworth HIGGINSON, who took an interest in her poetry and co-edited the first volume of her poems after her death. Dickinson's relationships with women were equally important: writer Helen Hunt Jackson was a childhood friend, correspondent, and supporter; her sister, Lavinia, was her longtime companion and advocate of her work after her death; her sister-in-law, Susan, shared a deep and influential friendship with Dickinson until the end of her life; and Mabel Loomis TODD, her brother's friend and co-editor with Higginson, never met Dickinson in person but proved instrumental in making Dickinson's name a household word.

Emily Dickinson, circa 1847

Dickinson led a quiet life away from the world, yet her poetry and letters testify to an active mind very much engaged with her surroundings and with the world outside Amherst. She shared her poetry with few people. Some, like Higginson, mistakenly thought her limited by her circumstances and did not realize the extent of her creativity and knowledge.

Dickinson wrote over 1,700 poems. Written on various topics, the poems include accounts of a moment's revelation, observations of nature, descriptions of sexual stirrings, and

Manuscript for "We talked with each other about each other," which was first published fifty-nine years after Dickinson's death meditations on the nature of life and death. A descendant of New England Puritans, Dickinson looked for signs of a spiritual significance in the creatures and objects of this world. She had a New England wit and gift for understatement that foreshadowed the work of the twentieth-century poets Edwin Arlington Robinson and Robert Frost.

Dickinson excelled in the development of metaphors and pithy, metaphysical statements, as when she described a hummingbird as "A Route of Evanescence." Her eccentric punctuation, especially her use of the dash, still intrigues scholars of her work. She tended to work in short forms with simple meters, especially favoring "hymn" or "common" meter.

Only a handful of Dickinson's poems were published during her lifetime. After her death, friends sorted through the jumbled manuscripts, some in bundles, others on scraps of paper. The editions of her work edited by Todd and Higginson began to appear in the 1890s. Because the editors suppressed or severely edited some poems and took liberties with the arrangement and punctuation of others, these early editions are now considered unreliable. The first scholarly edition of Dickinson's poems appeared in 1955 in three volumes edited by Thomas H. Johnson; he also published Dickinson's letters in three volumes in 1958. The Manuscript Notebooks of Emily Dickinson appeared in 1981.

The simplicity of Dickinson's poems is often deceptive; many of them have been the subjects of widely varying interpretations. In part, Dickinson's elusiveness has to do with her metaphysical bent—her suggestion that life itself is elusive and its import ambiguous, so that interpretations are by definition provisional.

Principal Books by Dickinson

Poems by Emily Dickinson, edited by Mabel Loomis Todd and T. W. Higginson. Boston: Roberts, 1890.

Poems by Emily Dickinson, Second Series, edited by Higginson and Todd. Boston: Roberts, 1891.

Letters of Emily Dickinson, two volumes, edited by Todd. Boston: Roberts, 1894; enlarged edition, New York: Harper, 1931.

Poems by Emily Dickinson, Third Series, edited by Todd. Boston: Roberts, 1896.

The Single Hound: Poems of a Lifetime, edited by Martha Dickinson Bianchi. Boston: Little, Brown, 1914.

Further Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Bianchi and Alfred Leete Hampson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1929.

Unpublished Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Bianchi and Hampson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1935.

Bolts of Melody: New Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Todd and Millicent Todd Bingham. New York & London: Harper, 1945.

Emily Dickinson's Letters to Dr. and Mrs. Josiah Gilbert Holland, edited by Theodora Van Wagenen Ward. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1951.

The Poems of Emily Dickinson: Including Variant Readings Compared with All Known Manuscripts, 3 volumes, edited by Thomas H. Johnson. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1955.

The Letters of Emily Dickinson, 3 volumes, edited by Johnson and Ward. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1958.

The Complete Poems of Emily Dickinson, edited by Johnson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1962.

The Manuscript Books of Emily Dickinson, 2 volumes, edited by R. W. Franklin. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1981.

Emily Dickinson's Open Folios, edited by Marta L. Werner. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995.

Open Me Carefully: Emily Dickinson's Intimate Letters to Sue, edited by Martha Nell Smith and Ellen Louise Hart. Ashfield, Mass.: Paris Press, 1998.

The Poems of Emily Dickinson, Variorum Edition, 3 volumes, edited by Franklin. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1998.

Studying Emily Dickinson

Although she was virtually unknown until the posthumous publication of Poems in 1892, Emily Dickinson has emerged alongside Walt WHITMAN as one of the two giants of nineteenth-century American poetry. Dickinson composed over 1,700 poems, but the ten published in her lifetime were all either written while she was still a youth or printed without her consent. Consequently, readers must rely on collections of her verse compiled by editors after her death. Dickinson's idiosyncratic punctuation, difficult handwriting, and eccentric methods of composition make the editor's task particularly difficult. Dickinson frequently offered alternative words in her poems, and peppered her pages with dashes of wildly varying lengths and angles that defy translation into print. Further, she bound many of her poems into "fascicles," or handmade books, and included still more—sometimes in significantly different forms—in letters to correspondents (see the letter collections listed above in "Principal Books"), creating complicated contexts from which editors have had to divorce the poems. All of these factors have made the editing of Dickinson's poems not just difficult but also a contentious enterprise, with each edition of her poems drawing criticism from scholars who disagree with how the poems have been transcribed and presented. Nevertheless, two editions of her poems are especially important: The Poems of Emily Dickinson (1955), edited by Thomas Johnson; and The Poems of Emily Dickinson (1998), edited by R. W. Franklin. The two editions differ in the chronology they suggest for the poems, as well as in the ways they represent such features as line breaks and capitalization. Both works are considered standard (though Franklin's edition is quickly superseding Johnson's), and students should begin by consulting one of these two works or the shorter "reading edition" derived from Franklin's text (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1999).

Since Dickinson's death, readers have been interested in her life and unusual manner of living, which have too frequently been reduced to an oversimplified caricature of complex realities. Jay Leda's The Years and Hours of Emily Dickinson (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1960) and Richard Sewall's The Life of Emily Dickinson (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1974) are long-standing classics of Dickinson biography; Alfred Habegger's My Wars Are Laid Away in Books (New York: Random House, 2001) is another important resource. Johnson and Theodora Van Wagenen Ward's The Letters of Emily Dickinson (1958) is a staple of Dickinson scholarship that helps situate her poems in a biographical context created through the poet's own words.

Several feminist critics have sought to read Dickinson in the context of nineteenth-century female creativity. Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar's The Madwoman in the Attic (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979) is a highly influential study of nineteenth-century women writers, including Dickinson, and it should be the starting place for students interested in a feminist reading of the poet.

In recent years scholars have paid increasing attention to Dickinson's manuscripts, pointing out that encountering the poems in their original forms (rather than as they have been translated into print) can lead readers to different understandings. To study the manuscripts, students should consult Franklin's two-volume facsimile publication, The Manuscript Books of Emily Dickinson (1981), and the Dickinson Electronic Archives (<www.emilydickinson.org> viewed July 25, 2007). As recommended secondary resources, G. Thomas Tanselle's "Emily Dickinson as an Editorial Problem" (Raritan, 19 [Spring 2000] 64–80) provides an excellent introduction to the topic, as does Cristanne Miller's "Whose Dickinson?" (American Literary History, 12, nos. 1 & 2 [2000]: 230–253). Domhnall Mitchell's Measures of Possibility (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2005) is a helpful study of Dickinson's composition process.

Given the enormous diversity and abundance of Dickinson scholarship, students are advised to begin a survey with one of the several essay collections that have been published in recent years. The Cambridge Companion to Emily Dickinson, edited by Wendy Martin (New York & London: Cambridge University Press, 2002) and A Historical Guide to Emily Dickinson, edited by Vivian Pollak (New York: Oxford University Press, 2004) both offer accessible articles on a variety of topics that should prove useful to students. The Emily Dickinson Journal, edited by Cristanne Miller, should be consulted for current scholarship on Dickinson. Jeanetta Boswell's Emily Dickinson: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1989) identifies resources through 1987; American Literary Scholarship, edited by David J. Nordloh, and others, offers yearly summaries of scholarship on Dickinson.

—Amanda Gailley

Dime Novel

Dime novels were cheaply printed, pamphlet-sized paper-covered books, typically 96 pages, published in the mid to late nineteenth century for unsophisticated readers. E. Z. C. JUDSON (Ned Buntline) paved the way for these cheap thrillers with Ned Buntline's Own (1844–1858), a weekly magazine that included his WESTERNS. Although Buntline is sometimes referred to as the father of the dime novel, the genre was popularized by Erastus BEADLE and his brother, Irwin. In 1859 Irwin Beadle published the first Beadle's Dime Song Book in New York City. In 1860—first with partner Robert Adams, then with his brother Erastus—Beadle began publishing a string of yellow-backed novels dealing with frontier life, the American Revolution, and Indian conflicts. The first of their dime novels was Ann S. STEPHENS'S MALAESKA. It sold sixty thousand copies.

These so-called dime novels—which were distantly related to the sensational English "penny dreadfuls" and often, in fact, cost only five cents—received a tremendous boost during the CIVIL WAR, when they were eagerly read by both Union and Confederate soldiers. By mid 1865 the firm of Beadle & Co. (later Beadle & Adams) published a book every other week and had sold more than four million books; some titles sold as many as eighty thousand copies. In response to the popularity of the dime novel, the company published several series simultaneously. Most of these were formulaic original stories, but as competition for readers increased, publishers turned to cheap reprints of foreign novels, which at the time were not covered by U.S. COPYRIGHT laws.

While the Beadles were the earliest prolific publishers of dime novels, many other companies followed suit. Munro's Publishing House published the popular detective series Old Cap. Collier Library (1883–1899); Street & Smith published the detective series the Nick Carter Weekly (1897–1912); Frank Tousey published Pluck and Luck: Complete Stories of Adventure (1898–1929), Wild West Weekly: A Magazine Containing Stories, Sketches, Etc., of Western Life (1902–1927) and Young Glory: Patriotic War Stories (1898); and Arthur Westbrook published Old Sleuth Weekly: A Series of the Most Thrilling Detective Stories Ever Published (1908–1912).

Sources

- Bragin, Charles. Bibliography, Dime Novels, 1860–1964. New York: Printed by the Author, 1964.
- Cox, J. Randolph. The Dime Novel Companion: A Source Book. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.
- Denning, Michael. Mechanic Accents: Dime Novels and Working-Class Culture in America. New York: Verso, 1998.
- Johannsen, Albert. The House of Beadle and Adams and its Dime and Nickel Novels: The Story of a Vanished Literature. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1950.
- Jones, Daryl. The Dime Novel Western. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University, Popular Press, 1978.

Dodge, Mary Abigail (1833–1896) essayist

Born in rural Hamilton, Massachusetts, Mary Abigail Dodge initially supported herself as a teacher before moving to Washington, D.C., to work as a governess for the editor of an antislavery newspaper. Her employer began publishing Dodge's abolitionist essays under the pseudonym "Gail Hamilton," and her early success encouraged Dodge to write full-time. A prolific author, today Dodge is best known as a feminist thinker. In this vein, her most important works are her essay, "Men and Women" (1862), and her books, A New Atmosphere (1865) and Woman's Wrongs (1868), in which she advocates suffrage and equal educational opportunities for women (see SUFFRAGISM). Dodge never married, believing that women should be self-sufficient. This made her acutely aware of the income inequality between male and female writers, a concern that informs A Battle of the Books (1870), the fictionalized account of her struggle to obtain fair pay from her publisher, James Fields.

Source

- Coultrap-McQuinn, Susan. Doing Literary Business: American Women Writers in the Nineteenth Century. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990, pp. 105–136.

—Robin Rudy Smith

Dodge, Mary Mapes (1831?–1905) children's writer

Born in New York City, Mary Mapes Dodge made her name as an author of children's books, the most famous of which is Hans Brinker; or, The Silver Skates (1866). She also edited ST. NICHOLAS, a magazine for children, from 1873 until her death. As editor, Dodge became the most influential individual of the day in the field of children's literature, and she was able to attract such popular contributors to the magazine as Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936), Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Jack London, L. Frank Baum, and Theodore Roosevelt.

Sources

- Gannon, Susan R., and Ruth Anne Thompson. Mary Mapes Dodge. New York: Twayne, 1992.
- Gannon, Suzanne Rahn, and Thompson. St. Nicholas and Mary Mapes Dodge: The Legacy of a Children's Magazine Editor, 1873–1905. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004.

Doesticks, Q. K. Philander

See THOMSON, MORTIMER NEAL

Donnelly, Ignatius (1831–1901) politician, editor, novelist, historian

Born in Philadelphia, Ignatius Donnelly trained to be a lawyer and in 1856 moved to Minnesota to found a utopian community called Nininger City. When Nininger failed, Donnelly became active in politics, serving as lieutenant governor, congressman, and state senator. A leader in the agrarian reform movement to improve conditions for farmers, he was also one of the founders of the Populist Party. He used his weekly magazine, the Anti-Monopolist (1874–1879), to disseminate his views, which also informed his novels. In addition to publishing novels such as Caesar's Column (1890), which depicts a future that is technologically advanced for the rich but oppressive for the poor, he wrote nonfiction, including Atlantis: The Antediluvian World (1882), a book that argued for the lost continent as the cradle of civilization, and Ragnarok (1883), an attempt to explain earth's geology in terms of a collision with a giant comet.

Later in life Donnelly took up the theory that the English philosopher Francis Bacon had written the plays of William Shakespeare and Christopher Marlowe, as well as Robert Burton's treatise Anatomy of Melancholy (1621), and the essays of Michel de Montaigne. Donnelly's The Great Cryptogram (1888) and The Cypher in the Plays and on the Tombstone (1899) were attempts to prove Bacon's authorship of Shakespeare's plays.

Source

Anderson, David D. Ignatius Donnelly. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Douglass, Frederick (circa 1818–1895) abolitionist, journalist, autobiographer

By far the larger part of the slaves know as little of their ages as horses know of theirs. . . . A want of information concerning my own was a source of unhappiness to me even during childhood. The white children could tell their ages. I could not tell why I ought to be deprived of the same privilege.

—Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (1845)

Born into slavery in Maryland in 1818, (or 1817, according to some sources), Douglass escaped to freedom in the North, where he first settled in Massachusetts. There his eloquence soon became apparent, and he was hired by the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society to travel throughout the northern states lecturing on ABOLITIONISM. Douglass was a powerful orator, and in 1845 he embarked on a twenty-one-month lecture tour of England, Ireland, and Scotland, to advertise the first of his three autobiographical narratives, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave, Written by Himself (1845). This work proved to be the most popular of the extant slave narratives, selling eleven thousand copies in the United States during its first three years in print, plus substantial sales abroad.

On the strength of his newfound success, Douglass returned to the United States in 1847 to start his own newspaper, THE NORTH STAR. He served as editor and wrote most of the paper's contents. On the strength of his writing, he managed to keep it and its successive newspapers, Frederick Douglass's Paper and Frederick Douglass Monthly, going until 1863.

Douglass's rupture with his one-time mentor William Lloyd GARRISON over methods of promoting abolitionism led to the publication of the second of Douglass's autobiographies, My Bondage and My Freedom (1855), which clarified his political approach to abolitionism. Declining John Brown's (1800–1859) invitation to participate in the raid on Harper's Ferry, Douglass instead organized two regiments of his fellow African American Massachusetts residents to fight in the Civil War. After the war ended, he petitioned President Andrew Johnson (1808–1875) for a national voting rights act giving African Americans the franchise in all of the states in the union. Douglass's loyalty to the Republican Party eventually won him a series of political appointments: federal marshal and recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia, president of the Freedmen's Bureau Bank, consul to Haiti, and chargé d'affaires to the Dominican Republic.

Frederick Douglass, circa 1883

The income from such positions and from shrewd real estate investments permitted Douglass and his family to live comfortably in Uniontown, just outside Washington, D.C. Until the end of his life, Douglass remained active in public service, lecturing, writing, and working on behalf of women's suffrage. The third of his autobiographies, Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, first appeared in 1881 and was expanded in 1892.

Principal Books by Douglass

Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, Written by Himself. Boston: Anti-Slavery Office, 1845; Dublin: Webb & Chapman, 1845; Wortonley, U.K.: Printed by J. Barker, 1846.

The Heroic Slave, in Autographs for Freedom, edited by Julia Griffiths. Boston: J. P. Jewett, 1853.

My Bondage and My Freedom. New York & Auburn, N.Y.: Miller, Orton & Mulligan, 1855.

Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, Written by Himself. His Early Life as a Slave, His Escape from Bondage, and His Complete History to the Present Time, Including His Connection

Frontispiece and title page for the first edition of Douglass's autobiography published when he was twenty-seven years old with the Anti-slavery Movement. Hartford, Conn.: Park, 1881; London: Christian Age Office, 1882; revised and enlarged edition, Boston: DeWolfe, Fisk, 1892.

The Frederick Douglass Papers, edited by John W. Blassingame, and others: Series I: Speeches, Debates, and Interviews, 5 volumes. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979–1992; Series II: Autobiographical Writings, 3 volumes projected. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1999– ; Series III: Correspondence, 3 volumes projected. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, forthcoming.

Studying Frederick Douglass

During his lifetime, Frederick Douglass was most famous as an orator, much in demand for his powerful speeches. Before the CIVIL WAR those speeches usually focused on abolition; afterward they often dealt with social justice issues, such as voting rights for blacks and women. These speeches were frequently published, sometimes as pamphlets but usually as transcribed newspaper accounts. Douglass also had a considerable reputation as an editorial writer. He edited THE NORTH STAR (later Frederick Douglass's Paper) from 1847 to 1860, Frederick Douglass Monthly from 1859 to 1863, and The New National Era from 1870 to 1874. And though he was not known as a fiction writer, he did produce one significant piece of fiction, the novella The Heroic Slave. Published in the gift book Autographs for Freedom and serialized in Frederick Douglass's Paper in the early months of 1853, The Heroic Slave appeared shortly before William Wells Brown's Clotel, making it, apparently, the first published work of long fiction written by an African American.

None of these considerable accomplishments, however, lies at the center of Douglass's status as a major figure of American literature. To many students of literature, Frederick Douglass is known as a writer of autobiography, and not because of his unusual productivity in the genre, having produced three distinct versions of his life story over a span of forty-seven years.

LIFE AND TIMES -OF- FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

His Early Life as a Slave, His Escape from Bondage, and His Complete History to the Present Time.

Including his connection with the Anti-slavery Movement; his Labors in Great Britain as well as in his own country; his Experience in the Conduct of an Influential Newspaper; his Connection with the Underground Railroad; his Relations with John Brown and the Harper's Ferry Raid; his Recruiting the 54th and 55th Mass. Colored Regiments; his Interviews with Presidents Lincoln and Johnson; his Appointment by Gen. Grant to Accompany the Santo Domingo Commission; also, to a Seat in the Council of the District of Columbia; his Appointment as United States Marshal by President R. B. Hayes; also, his Appointment by President J. A. Garfield to be Recorder of Deeds in Washington; with many other interesting and important events of his most eventful life;

With an Introduction by Mr. GEORGE L. RUFFIN, of Boston.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS holds a unique place in American history. His life is an epitome of slavery. He in his own person has suffered its cruelties and shame and seen its terrors; but, unlike the rest of his race, was able to lift himself out of it all; and he now tells of all these with a pathos and eloquence which can not be surpassed. Probably no other man has lived whose life has been so full of all those incidents which form the most interesting chapter of our national history, who is at the same time able to tell them so eloquently.

It is safe to say that no other topic has ever proved so intensely absorbing to all classes as slavery. Uncle Tom's Cabin had an enormous sale, and was widely read in every land, because it portrayed in vivid language the cruelties and horrors which appalled the world. Frederick Douglass's Autobiography outrivals Uncle Tom's Cabin inasmuch as it details the same intensely interesting incidents in a still more graphic manner, and to all this is added the charm of knowing that every word is true. Verily, "truth is stranger than fiction."

The galaxy of great men whose noble efforts carried forward the work of abolition have nearly all passed away. With Garrison, John Brown, Phillips, Sumner and others, Frederick Douglass was closely associated as a co-laborer in the great work. This book serves to impress on a younger generation the lessons of these lives, and to open to it a chapter of American history that no other work has given. The spirit of slavery which has degraded the African must be thoroughly understood, if we would understand the problem of elevating that race to the dignity and correct use of freedom.

The historical value of this work can not be overestimated. While the period of slavery agitation was the most important of any in American history, the spirit and real interest of the times can not be found in any history. It can only be found in such a work as this. The charm of historical truth and the absorbing interest of romance are combined in one.

In a review of the life and struggles of Frederick Douglass, the New York Times says: "From the very lowest depths he has struggled upward to his high position. It is doubtful if any man in any country, commencing so low, has climbed so high as has Frederick Douglass."

CONDITIONS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

This book will be printed from new electrotype plates, on fine white paper, with a steel portrait of the author, and sixteen full page illustrations engraved expressly for this work. It will contain 528 pages, and be furnished to subscribers at the following prices:

|  |           |               |
|--|-----------|---------------|
| Extra English Cloth, Sprinkled Edges, | . . . . . | $2.50 |
| " " " Gilt Edges,                     | . . . . . | 3.00   |

The work can be obtained through our distributing agents.

Prospectus for the revised version of Douglass's autobiography sold by subscription, 1881

Only one of his autobiographies is commonly read: NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS, AN AMERICAN SLAVE (1845). In part, the centrality of the Narrative to Frederick Douglass's current reputation is a testament to that early work's power and significance; it remains the exemplary specimen of the SLAVE NARRATIVE. For this reason, the Narrative is the logical starting point for a study of Douglass's work. However, attention paid to the Narrative should not come at the expense of Douglass's later autobiographies, My Bondage and My Freedom (1855), and both versions of Life and Times of Frederick Douglass (1881; 1892).

Probably because the rise of literary interest in Douglass is a relatively recent phenomenon (connected to the Civil Rights movement of the mid twentieth century), resources for studying Douglass's work are not as abundant as they are for many of his contemporaries; among the good resources that do exist, only those for the Narrative can fairly be said to be mature.

A definitive edition of that work was issued in a 1999 volume of the Frederick Douglass Papers from Yale University Press. In 2001 Yale also published a Narrative that draws upon the same impeccable scholarship of the 1999 edition; as an inexpensive paperback it is more widely available and therefore also recommended. The definitive edition of My Bondage and My Freedom was published in 2004. The Yale edition of Life and Times of Frederick Douglass has not appeared, as of 2007. Each of the autobiographies is available in competent editions from other publishers, however. Of particular note is Autobiographies, which contains Narrative, My Bondage and My Freedom, and the 1893 Life and Times, annotated by Henry Louis Gates Jr. (New York: Library of America, 1994). The Norton Critical Edition of the Narrative, edited by William L. Andrews and William S. McFeely (New York, 1997) offers a combination of annotated text, contextual materials, and selected criticism characteristic of the Norton series.

The current ambition of the Frederick Douglass Papers project is to create a twelve-volume edition of his works in three series. Series one, Speeches, Debates, and Interviews, comprises five volumes and is complete. The three autobiographies constitute the second series. As of this writing, none of the four volumes of the third series, Correspondence, has appeared.

Of Douglass's approximately five hundred speeches from 1841 to 1846, Speeches, Debates, and Interviews prints sixty. As Douglass's editorial work is not included in the Yale series, students are encouraged to use alternate sources of primary materials, including the five-volume The Life and Writings of Frederick Douglass, edited by Philip S. Foner (New York: International Publishers, 1950–1975), which contains speeches, letters, and editorials. The North Star and Frederick Douglass' Paper through 1855 have been digitized and are available through Thomson Gale's 19th Century U.S. Newspapers database, a subscription service. The Oxford Frederick Douglass Reader, edited by William L. Andrews (New York: Oxford University Press) is an inexpensive, small but well-chosen sample of Douglass's work that includes spare introductions for each selection: two letters, two speeches, and two editorial pieces, as well as the Narrative and The Heroic Slave in full and substantial excerpts from My Bondage and My Freedom and both versions of Life and Times. The Documenting the American South website (<<http://docsouth.unc.edu/>> viewed July 25, 2007) offers, free of charge, texts of Douglass's autobiographies, several letters and speeches, and The Heroic Slave. It also offers complete texts of three early biographies, by James Gregory, Charles Chesnutt, and Booker T. Washington.

Of the several good modern Douglass biographies that are available, William S. McFeely's Frederick Douglass (New York: Norton, 1991) is especially recommended. It should be supplemented with Benjamin Quarles's Frederick Douglass (Washington: Associated Publishers, 1948); Philip S. Foner's

Frederick Douglass: A Biography (New York: Citadel Press, 1964); and Dickson J. Preston's Young Frederick Douglass (1980).

A convenient overview of critical appraisals of Douglass's work over time is Critical Essays on Frederick Douglass, edited by William L. Andrews (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991). Eric J. Sundquist's Frederick Douglass: New Literary and Historical Essays (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990) is an excellent collection of recent perspectives. Frederick Douglass: A Critical Reader, edited by Bill E. Lawson and Frank M. Kirkland (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1999) presents thirteen essays on the topic of Douglass's philosophy. Wilson Jeremiah Moses's Creative Conflict in African American Thought: Frederick Douglass, Alexander Crummell, Booker T. Washington, W. E. B. Du Bois and Marcus Garvey (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004) puts Douglass's ideas in the context of the ideas of other important African American thinkers. David W. Blight's Frederick Douglass' Civil War (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989) examines the career-long development of Douglass's thinking with regard to the war. For studies of Douglass's oratory, students should consult David B. Chesebrough's Frederick Douglass: Oratory from Slavery (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998); Ronald K. Burke's Frederick Douglass: Crusading Orator for Human Rights (New York: Garland, 1996); and Gerald Fulkerson's "Frederick Douglass," in African-American Orators: A Bio-Critical Sourcebook, edited by Richard W. Leeman (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996, pp. 82–97). Wolfgang Mieder's "No Struggle, No Progress": Frederick Douglass and His Proverbial Rhetoric for Civil Rights (New York: Peter Lang, 2001) is a fine appraisal of Douglass's use of proverbs from the Bible and folklore.

No comprehensive bibliography of Douglass scholarship exists, though several of the books mentioned above contain good selected bibliographies. Students are especially directed to those in the Frederick Douglass Papers, McFeely's Frederick Douglass, and The Oxford Frederick Douglass Reader. Students should also consult the annual bibliographies of Douglass scholarship in American Literary Scholarship (Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1963– ).

—Student Guide by Brett Barney

Drama

American drama in the nineteenth century remained firmly rooted in the colonial tradition; that is, although the United States produced its own playwrights, productions were, in overwhelming numbers, based on the classics, especially William Shakespeare, whose work continued to be popular with all classes of Americans. This popularity can be seen, for example, in Mark Twain's (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) use of a Shakespearean medley in the theatrical productions of the reprobate Duke and Dauphin in ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884).

Particularly significant among plays written and produced by Americans are MINSTREL SHOWS, burlesques, and melodramas, particularly those that deal with such American subjects as American Indians, the frontier, farm and rural life, New England and Yankee sensibilities, and temperance. In the nineteenth century, American drama was noteworthy for promoting a sense of national history and for confronting cultural issues and current events. American heroes emerged in plays about the frontier and western expansion. The rustic, the woodsman, the farmer, the soldier, and the frontiersman—these character types appeared frequently, in plays such as Mordecai M. Noah's She Would Be a Soldier; or, The Plains of Chippewa (produced 1819) and Samuel Woodworth's The Forest Rose; or, American Farmers (produced 1825).

The settler's encounter with the American Indian became a staple of the stage beginning with John Augustus Stone's Metamora; or, The Last of the Wampanoags (produced 1829). Such plays reflected and helped to rationalize the recognition that the drive westward was changing the face of the continent and obliterating the lives of its indigenous peoples. In this context, surviving Indians became the last of a noble race, as they are in James Fenimore COOPER's novels. Famous episodes such as John Smith's encounter with Pocahontas were also dramatized, as in George Washington Parke Custis's Pocahontas; or, The Settlers of Virginia (produced 1830).

Along with the settling of America came moral crusades to uplift and reform rowdy frontier manners and urban dissipations, and drama became part of the campaigns to ban alcohol and to enforce Christian values. William Henry Smith's The Drunkard; or, The Fallen Saved (produced 1843), for example, combined standard melodramatic plot elements—a villain, a secret will, a forgery, and last-minute rescues—with a meticulous and realistic account of the protagonist's alcoholism.

Quite a different tradition—the comedy of manners—came to America with Anna Mowatt Ritchie's Fashion (produced 1845). On the one hand, the play satirized the pretensions of newly rich Americans who clumsily imitated European fashions; on the other hand, it exulted in the American strain of forthrightness and independence.

Very few African Americans had the opportunity or the resources to pursue careers in playwriting. A notable exception, William Wells Brown, produced The Escape; or, A Leap to Freedom (produced 1857), which has been compared in style and subject matter to Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (produced 1852). Both the play that was adapted from Stowe's novel and Brown's Escape initiated the tradition of American protest drama.

Minstrel shows that sentimentalized plantation life and portrayed African Americans as grinning, simpleminded entertainers became especially popular after the CIVIL WAR. By the end of the century the tradition had been adopted by African Americans and had produced playwrights such as Bob Cole (A Trip to Coontown [produced 1898]); Marian Cook and Paul Laurence Dunbar (Clorindy, the Original of the Cake Walk [produced 1898]); and Jesse A. Shipp (Senegamia Carnival [produced 1898]). A notable exception to the tradition of minstrelsy appeared in William Easton's historical verse drama Dessalines, a Dramatic Tale; a Single Chapter from Haiti's History (produced 1893), which was intended to promote racial pride during a time when the theater was dominated by negative stereotypes of African Americans.

In the period between the Civil War and the end of the century, plays about American heroes and the settling of the nation continued to be produced. Especially notable are the various adaptations of Washington IRVING's short story "RIP VAN WINKLE" and Davy Crockett; or, Be Sure You're Right, Then Go Ahead (produced 1872). As in novels of the time, however, there was a call for stage productions that were more realistic and less melodramatic. James A. Herne was a pioneer in fashioning dialogue and plots that reflected everyday life and the problems that tore families apart. His Margaret Fleming (produced 1890) dramatized the plight of a woman who chose to rear her husband's illegitimate child. Although such themes were beginning to be explored in American novels, to present them on stage was unheard of, and Herne, who had already challenged theatrical norms with The Minute Men (produced 1886) and Drifting Apart (produced 1888), had trouble convincing theater managers to book his play. Herne had more success with Shore Acres (1892), the story of a hard-hearted father and his efforts to thwart his daughter's elopement. Although he made concessions to the popular desire for melodrama and sentimentality, Herne's dialogue and characters moved American drama closer to a frank exploration of domestic life.

By the end of the nineteenth century, American playwrights had begun to move theater in the direction of greater complexity, a preparation for the emergence of American drama as a worthy contributor to world literature.

Sources

- Bank, Rosemarie K. Theatre Culture in America, 1825–1860. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Engle, Ron, and Tice L. Miller, eds. The American Stage: Social and Economic Issues from the Colonial Period to the Present. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Gassner, John, ed. Best Plays of the Early American Theatre: From the Beginning to 1916. New York: Crown, 1967.
- McConachie, Bruce A. Melodramatic Formations: American Theatre and Society, 1820–1870. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1992.

Dred: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp by Harriet Beecher Stowe (Boston: Phillips, Sampson and Company, 1856) novel

Harriet Beecher Stowe's title character, modeled on Nat Turner, is a prophet preaching repentance and threatening violent slave rebellion. But Dred is absent from the first third of the novel, which is dominated by Nina Gordon. She means well but is unfitted to manage herself or Canema, the plantation that has become her responsibility. Partly under the tutelage of her suitor Edward Clayton, she develops from a naive girl into a woman sensible about men, history, and the social injustice of slavery. After a cholera epidemic cuts her life short, Nina's villainous brother Tom Gordon comes into possession of Canema and into conflict with Clayton and with her servant (and half brother) Harry Gordon.

Split between two protagonists—the book was also issued with the title Nina Gordon—and infused with Dred's language of Old Testament retribution, the work was neglected by critics until the 1990s. One of its most powerful scenes is Dred's interruption of a revival to scorn corrupt ministers. Recent critics have emphasized Stowe's threat of a violent slave rebellion in Dred and have noted her effort to depict the slaves' points of view. Millie, a former slave who rescues orphaned children, typifies Stowe's effort to reverse the privilege inherent in the typical white-first-then-black dichotomy: "White chil'en, when they 'haves themselves, is jest as good as black, and I loves 'em jest as well."

—Wesley Raabe

Drum-Taps by Walt Whitman (New York: Peter Eckler, 1865) poetry collection

Drum-Taps is a book of poems that largely emerged out of Walt WHITMAN's experiences in the CIVIL WAR—specifically, out of his service as a nurse in Washington, D.C., hospitals, caring for thousands of wounded soldiers from both sides of the conflict. Less optimistic and life-affirming than his earlier editions of LEAVES OF GRASS, many of the poems in Drum-Taps deal with the horrors of death, especially with the violent, premature death caused by war. Poems such as "Come Up from the Fields Father," "Vigil Strange I Kept on the Field One Night," and "A Sight in Camp in the Daybreak Gray and Dim" depict the effects that the wartime deaths of young men have on those who are left behind. As Whitman was making preparations to publish the book, the Civil War ended, and several days later President Abraham Lincoln was assassinated. Whitman quickly wrote several new poems about Lincoln's death—including his famous elegies "WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOOR-YARD BLOOM'D" and "O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!"—and he printed these in A Sequel to Drum-Taps, which he bound together with the original Drum-Taps (already printed). In following years, as Whitman began to see the Civil War as an integral part of both American experience and identity, he incorporated the poems of Drum-Taps (and the Sequel) into later editions of Leaves of Grass.

—Y. P. Renfro

Du Chaillu, Paul Belloni (circa 1831–1903) explorer, children's writer, travel writer

The details of Paul Belloni Du Chaillu's early years are unknown, but he is believed to have been born in Paris and to have spent his youth along the west coast of Africa, where his father worked as a trader. Du Chaillu came to the United States, probably in 1852, with the intention of securing financing for his African explorations. He became a citizen of the United States and in 1856 gained the support of the Philadelphia Academy of Sciences for an expedition to Gabon. He returned four years later with the first gorilla ever to be seen in America, along with stories about great apes that were thought so fantastic that he was deemed a fraud. Nonetheless, Du Chaillu published his findings in 1861 as Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa and returned to Africa in 1863 to gain further proof of his account.

Just as his earlier report had challenged contemporary notions about the geography of Africa, his Journey to Ashangoland (1867), Stories of the Gorilla Country (1867), Wild Life under the Equator (1869), Lost in the Jungle (1869), My Apingi Kingdom (1870), and The Country of the Dwarfs (1872) were thought to be fabrications—particularly the last work, which confirmed the existence of Pygmies. Later explorers, however, validated many of Du Chaillu's findings. Later he traveled to Scandinavia, where he gleaned material for two other books, Land of the Midnight Sun (1881) and The Viking Age (1889). He died in Russia while gathering material for a book about that country.

Sources

Meyer, Lysle E. The Farther Frontier: Six Case Studies of Americans and Africa, 1848–1936. Selinsgrove, Pa.: Susquehanna University Press, 1992.

Vaucaire, Michel. Paul Du Chaillu, Gorilla Hunter: Being the Extraordinary Life and Adventures of Paul Du Chaillu. New York: Harper, 1930.

Dunbar, Paul Laurence (1872–1906) poet, novelist

Born in Dayton, Ohio, to former slaves, Paul Laurence Dunbar was taught to read by his mother, who inculcated in him a powerful sense of the oral tradition of pre-CIVIL WAR African-American culture. At Dayton Central High School, Dunbar was the only black student. He excelled and had begun writing poetry by the time he graduated. Working as an elevator operator at a Dayton hotel, he used his slack hours to write, and in 1892 he self-published his book of lyrics,

Oak and Ivy. That year he attended the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, where he captured the attention of Frederick DOUGLASS. When his second collection of poetry, Majors and Minors (1896), was enthusiastically reviewed by William Dean HOWELLS, Dunbar was finally established as a literary star.

Dunbar's next volume, Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896), reprinted some of his earlier work and was brought out by a major publisher. Dunbar began reading poetry on the lecture circuit. He took a job at the Library of Congress where he worked as a reading-room assistant, giving him ready access to materials required for literary study. At the time the only practitioners of African-American dialect poetry and prose were white men such as Joel Chandler HARRIS and Thomas Nelson. PAGE. In volumes such as Lyrics of Love and Laughter (1903), Dunbar was able to bring a degree of authenticity to the form that was inaccessible to his predecessors. The contemporary vogue for LOCAL COLOR helped make Dunbar's dialect verse popular with black and white readers alike.

Still, there were problems with Dunbar's work. In his dialect poems he wrote at one remove from the source of his inspiration which, as an Ohioan born after emancipation, he never knew firsthand. Dunbar himself felt that his writing in the genre was flawed, and he regretted the neglect of his early work. After his premature death from tuberculosis and alcohol abuse, many black critics found his dialect poems derivative and even racist. Dunbar's reputation was restored, however, with the revival of interest in African-American culture in the second half of the 20th century. The Paul Laurence Dunbar Reader (1975), a new edition of his work, appeared after the celebration in 1972 of the centenary of his birth.

Sources

Dunbar, Paul Laurence. The Paul Laurence Dunbar Reader: A Selection of the Best of Paul Laurence Dunbar's Poetry and Prose, Including Writings Never Before Available in Book Form. Edited by Jay Martin and Gossie H. Hudson. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.

Gayle, Addison. Oak and Ivy: A Biography of Paul Laurence Dunbar. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

Martin, Jay, ed. A Singer in the Dawn: Reinterpretations of Paul Laurence Dunbar. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1975.

Duyckinck, Evert A. (1816–1878) editor, literary historian

Together with his brother George L. DUYCKINCK, Evert Augustus Duyckinck was at the center of New York literary life in the middle of the nineteenth century. From 1847 to 1853 they edited the influential literary weekly New York Literary World, and in 1855 they published their collaborative effort, the Cyclopædia of American Literature. This 1,470-page, two-volume work comprised the most comprehensive literary scholarship of its time. It included lengthy discussions of many of the writers the Duyckincks had befriended and published, including Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, William Cullen BRYANT, Washington IRVING, William Gilmore SIMMS, and Herman MELVILLE. During Evert Duyckinck's lifetime, three further editions of the Cyclopædia of American Literature were published—in 1856, 1866, and 1875—each with a generous helping of additional information.

Together with Cornelius Mathews, Evert Duyckinck also founded the literary journal Arcturus, which Duyckinck edited from 1840 to 1842. When he died Duyckinck left his library, which had been an invaluable resource for his friend MELVILLE, to the New York Public Library.

Source

Greenspan, Ezra. "Evert Duyckinck and the History of Wiley and Putnam's Library of American Books," American Literature, 64 (December 1992): 677–693.

Duyckinck, George L. (1823–1863) editor, biographer

George Long Duyckinck was born in New York City and is best known as the co-editor, with his brother Evert DUYCKINCK, of the Cyclopædia of American Literature (1855). Like Evert, George Duyckinck studied law but made his career in editing. In 1848, the two bought and co-edited the Literary World, through which they championed American literary independence. After the periodical folded in 1853, the brothers did personal research and consulted with such literary figures as Washington IRVING and William Gilmore SIMMS to produce the Cyclopædia. Between 1859 and his death four years later, George Duyckinck prepared an annotated edition of Shakespeare's works and published four biographies of prominent fellow Episcopal church members.

—Brett Barney

Dahlberg, Edward (1900–1977) novelist, autobiographer, poet, critic

The Boston-born Edward Dahlberg grew up in a Jewish orphan asylum in Cleveland, an experience he described in his autobiography, Because I Was Flesh (1964). He also wrote about this period of his life in a novel, Bottom Dogs (1929), a good example of proletarian fiction (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE) in which he writes about his experiences as a hobo and slum dweller. In another novel Those Who Perish (1934), he explores American Jews' attitudes toward Nazism. Influenced by his friend D. H. Lawrence, he was a vigorous critic of literature, publishing Do These Bones Live in 1941. Flea of Sodom (1950) is an example of his parables, which flay modern civilization. His first poetry collection was Cipango's Hinder Door (1966), which was followed by a collection of his essays and poems, The Leafless American (1967).

Source

DeFanti, Charles. The Wages of Expectation: A Biography of Edward Dahlberg. New York: New York University Press, 1978.

Davidson, Donald (1893–1968) poet, essayist

Educated at Vanderbilt University, where he became a professor, Donald Davidson was a exponent of REGIONALISM and the most conservative member of the group known as the AGRARIANS. The Attack on Leviathan (1938) is a collection of essays expressing his hostility to a centralized and industrialized state. Lee in the Mountains (1938) is a series of short narrative poems about the figures of the Southern past. Still Rebels, Still Yankees (1957) is his best-known essay collection. Poems, 1922–1961 appeared in 1966.

Source

Winchell, Mark Royden. Where No Flag Flies: Donald Davidson and the Southern Resistance. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2000.

The Day of the Locust by Nathanael West (New York: Random House, 1939) novel

Nathanael West's fourth and final novel, The Day of the Locust—too pessimistic and grotesque for its time—is now widely regarded as one of the few great novels about Hollywood. For West, Hollywood epitomized the artificiality and destructiveness of the American Dream, which he personifies in the physically alluring—yet spiritually vacuous—Faye Greener, with whom the two central characters, Tod Hackett and Homer Simpson, are obsessed. The novel is primarily told from the third-person point of view of Tod, a set designer who aspires to be an artist and who is at least partially based on West. While writing the novel, West was a screenwriter hoping to make a living as a novelist. He explained to his publisher that Hollywood was similar to Fascist Germany, claiming “in Munich they murder your flesh, but here it is the soul which is put under the executioner's axe.” West's working title for the novel was “The Cheated,” as Tod places Hollywood's inhabitants into two classes, the purveyors of the myth that the West Coast promises salvation from boredom, and those seduced—and ultimately cheated—by that promise. The listless Homer, driven to madness by Faye, represents the latter group. The title of the published novel recalls the devastation prophesied in both Exodus and Revelation. Tod's vision of a holocaust initiated by Hollywood's cheated materializes in the final scene of the novel when Homer murders a child actor who teases him, and an excitement-starved mob murders Homer.

Source

Light, James F. Nathanael West: An Interpretive Study. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1961.

—John Cusatis

Dead End by Sidney Kingsley (produced 1935) play

Sidney KINGSLEY's Dead End, a gritty, naturalistic drama exposing the hardships of contemporary urban life, is set on a New York street dead-ending into the East River on which a new luxurious apartment house faces a rundown tenement. Tommy, a young tough from the tenement, is torn between his caring sister, Drina, who strives to keep him out of trouble, and a gang of wayward boys he leads. The likely future of the gang members is indicated in the fate of Baby Face Martin, a gangster wanted for murder who is killed by police after he returns to the street where he grew up. Dead End shocked some critics with its frank depiction of the human and economic realities of the poor at the height of the GREAT DEPRESSION and became Kingsley's most enduring drama. He directed its original production, which opened on October 28, 1935, on Broadway for a 684-performance run.

—James Fisher

Death Comes for the Archbishop by Willa Cather (New York: Knopf, 1927) novel

Willa CATHER's Death Comes for the Archbishop is one of the most admired depictions of the Southwest in American literature. Comprised of loosely related vignettes, the book focuses on two French priests, Archbishop Latour and Father Vaillant (both drawn from historical models), as they oversee Catholic holdings in the vast New Mexico Territory of the mid nineteenth century. In part, the novel offers a case study in reform as the two clerics restore proper church practices that have fallen into disuse and as they challenge the authority of local priests who have used their positions for profit. At the same time, the narrative traces both men's growing respect for the various cultures that they encounter. Although Cather's negative portrayal of Mexican priests and clear preference for French clergy has drawn criticism, the novel's themes of migration and pluralism anticipate many of the interests of modern multiculturalists. Death Comes for the Archbishop is also a moving portrait of friendship, as two very different men spend their lives working together for a common cause.

Source

Cather, Willa. Death Comes for the Archbishop, edited by John J. Murphy and others, Willa Cather Scholarly Edition. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

—Steven Trout

"The Death of the Hired Man" by Robert Frost (1914) poem

In this pastoral epic narrative that Robert FROST included in his second collection of poetry, North of Boston (1914), Mary and Warren, a New England farm couple, debate what to do when Silas, their former hired hand, comes back looking for work and perhaps a final resting place. Mary meets Warren in the doorway of their home, asking him to treat Silas kindly, and draws "him down / To sit beside her on the wooden steps" of their porch. Warren bears a grudge against Silas, who has left him in haying season when someone else offered better wages. Mary, who has seen Silas, describes him as "worn out" and "miserable."

The majority of lines of the poem, which has been produced as a one-act play, belong to Mary and Warren's back-and-forth dialogue. The slow-moving but dramatic intensity of their debate illustrates contrasting male and female values, attitudes, and understandings. At a pause in their conversation, she spreads out her apron to catch the light of the falling moon and communicates "some tenderness / That wrought on him beside her in the night." She tells Warren that Silas has "come home to die," and their definitions of home typify their personalities: To Warren, home is where "they have to take you in," but to Mary, home is "Something you somehow haven't to deserve." His principles are justice and responsibility; hers are love, sympathy, and mercy.

Mary urges Warren to see Silas for himself. As he leaves her, she sits watching to "see if that small sailing cloud / Will hit or miss the moon." Warren returns, and takes his wife's hand in his: "'Dead,' was all he answered."

Source

Frost, Robert. North of Boston. London: David Nutt, 1914; New York: Holt, 1915.

—Gary L. Kerley

Depression

See Great Depression.

Derleth, August (1909–1971) science-fiction and mystery writer, poet, editor

Called a "one-man fiction factory," August Derleth wrote and edited more than 150 books over a fifty-year career. Born in Sauk City, Wisconsin, which he later called "not only the center of my world but also the microcosm of my macrocosm," Derleth attended Sauk City High School and at age fifteen published his first story, "Bat's Belfry," in Weird Tales. He went on to earn a B.A. at the University of Wisconsin, where he created the detective Solar Pons, in the style and spirit of Sherlock Holmes (some seventy stories in this series were published from 1945 to 1973). In 1931, Derleth moved to Minneapolis to work as an editor for Fawcett Publications and as associate editor for Mys- tic Magazine, but he soon returned to Sauk City to pursue his literary career. In 1939 he built “Place of Hawks,” an estate on the edge of Sauk City. That same year, with Donald Wandrei, he founded Arkham House Publishers, which he ran, often single-handedly, until his death.

Derleth’s work appeared in more than 500 magazines and newspapers in a variety of forms: mystery and detective fiction, “weird” tales, history, biography, juvenile books, supernatural and horror, journals, plays, criticism, poetry, and novels about his region (see REGIONALISM). His first book publication was Murder Stalks the Wakely Family (1934), which began a mystery series featuring Judge Peck. When SCRIBNERS published Still Is the Summer Night (1937), the first book in what he called his Sac Prairie Saga, Derleth was praised by Sinclair LEWIS as “an important national, maybe international, figure.” In 1938, on the recommendation of Lewis and Edgar Lee MASTERS, he received a Guggenheim Fellowship to continue his saga, which eventually in twenty-eight volumes attempted to tell, through short stories, poetry, and novels, the story of his home and Wisconsin from the early 1800s to the present. His Wisconsin writings, along with his nature books Walden West (1961) and Return to Walden West (1970), show the influence of Henry David Thoreau and Ralph Waldo Emerson, both of whom were subjects of Derleth biographies.

Although he considered himself an entertainer, Derleth is remembered as one who championed regionalism and popularized the fields of science fiction, fantasy, and the “weird” tale. He is considered by many to be more important as a publisher than as a writer. After founding Arkham House largely to preserve and popularize the macabre tales of H. P. LOVECRAFT, he went on to publish the first works of such writers as Ray Bradbury, Robert Bloch, and A. E. van Vogt. Yet, it is on his reputation as a regional writer that Derleth’s legacy will ultimately rest.

Sources

- Derleth, August. Thirty Years of Arkham House 1939–1969: A History and Bibliography. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1970.
- Scroth, Evelyn M. The Derleth Saga. Appleton, Wis.: Quintain Press, 1979.
- Wandrei, Donald. 100 Books by August Derleth. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 1962.
- Wilson, Alison M. August Derleth: A Bibliography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983.

—Gary L. Kerley

Desire Under the Elms by Eugene O’Neill (produced 1924) play

Desire Under the Elms, Eugene O’NEILL’s three-part drama inspired by ancient Greek tragedy, opened on November 11, 1924 at the Greenwich Village Theatre.

New York authorities attempted to close the play when moral crusaders objected to its steamy subject matter, which included frank depictions of sexuality, incest, and violence, but Desire Under the Elms was generally acclaimed by critics and audiences and ran for 208 performances.

Reinventing the Hippolytus/Phaedra story of classical literature, O’Neill set his play in 1850 on a stark New England farm, over which the hovering elms seem to brood: “They appear to protect and at the same time subdue. There is a sinister maternity in their aspect, a crushing, jealous absorption.” The decision of old hard-hearted Ephraim Cabot, the recently widowed owner of the farm, to marry young Abbie Putnam, a woman who sees the farm as providing security, essentially dispossesses Ephraim’s son Eben and establishes the central conflict of the drama, for all three covet the farm. For Eben, the sensuous Abbie is the embodiment of his desire to possess those things his father loves most, and for Abbie the male heir that results from the consummation of her relationship with the younger Cabot seals her claim to the farm. The discovery of the paternity of the child, however, leads to a horrific, tragic climax.

O’Neill makes use of New England dialects for the characters, as well as imbuing the play with a biblical quality (Ephraim, particularly, seems a character out of the Old Testament), an approach which helps elevate the play’s language and idiom above the realistic style of much early-twentieth-century drama. Clearly, O’Neill was seeking a poetic language and a way for the characters to more directly express themselves beyond the constraints of realism. Desire Under the Elms, which contains a few central symbols, is also a highly naturalistic drama, a quality emerging, in part, from the sexually explicit actions of its characters and the detailed depiction of the harsh realities of nineteenth-century farm life. O’Neill’s unsparing study of family strife, greed, and untamed sexuality has steadily gained recognition as one of O’Neill’s finest accomplishments of the 1920s.

Sources

- Herr, Linda L. “Stillborn Future: Dead and Dying Infants and Children as a Secondary Image in the Plays of Eugene O’Neill: An Analysis of the Image in Desire Under the Elms,” in Art, Glitter, and Glitz. Mainstream Playwrights and Popular Theatre in 1920s America. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004, pp. 11–17.
- O’Neill, Eugene. Desire Under the Elms. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.

—James Fisher

DeSylva, Buddy (1895–1950) lyricist

George Gard DeSylva was born in New York City but raised in California. His father, Aloysius Joseph DeSylva, had been a vaudeville performer. When “Buddy” was a student at the University of Southern California, he formed a singing group, “The Hawaiians,” and wrote songs, one of which, “N’ Everything,” caught the ear of Al Jolson in 1918. When Buddy DeSylva received a royalty check for $16,000, he dropped out of USC and went to work for the Jerome Remick music-publishing company on New York’s Tin Pan Alley.

In 1920 DeSylva collaborated with Jerome Kern on Sally, one of the most successful musicals of the decade, which featured the song “Look for the Silver Lining.” DeSylva followed with other hits in 1921, such as “April Showers” with composer Louis Silvers, and “Avalon” with Jolson and composer Vincent Rose. In 1922, he collaborated with George and Ira Gershwin on “I’ll Build a Stairway to Paradise” and, two years later, with George Gershwin and Ballard MacDonald, on “Somebody Loves Me.”

In 1925, DeSylva teamed with another lyricist, Lew Brown, and composer Ray Henderson to form one of the most successful three-way collaborations in American popular music history. For the next six years, DeSylva, Brown, and Henderson wrote songs for Broadway shows that embodied the giddiness, naughtiness, and ebullient optimism of the Jazz Age—“It All Depends on You” (1925), “The Best Things in Life Are Free” (1927), and “Button Up Your Overcoat” (1929). DeSylva, Brown, and Henderson were among the first songwriters to move to the West Coast where they wrote songs for such early movie musicals as The Singing Fool (1928) and Sunny Side Up (1929). Their collaboration provided the material for The Best Things in Life Are Free, a 1956 movie about the trio.

The partnership broke up when DeSylva became a producer at 20th Century-Fox. Lew Brown and Ray Henderson continued to collaborate on such hits as “Life Is Just a Bowl of Cherries” (1931), but they too drifted apart. DeSylva went on to become head of musical production at Paramount, and, on Broadway he produced several of Cole Porter’s musicals. He was also one of the founders of Capitol Records, the first major recording company based on the West Coast.

Source

Furia, Philip. The Poets of Tin Pan Alley: A History of America’s Great Lyricists. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990, pp. 87–94.

—Philip Furia

Detective Fiction

Twentieth-century American detective fiction is defined by two movements: the continuing popularity of the literary mystery story, which was originated by Edgar Allan Poe in the nineteenth century and developed by such writers as Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in his work featuring Sherlock Holmes; and hard-boiled detective fiction, which originated in America in the 1920s, in part as a reaction to the perceived artificiality of the literary mystery. The distinguishing traits of the two traditions involve class, style, and language, as the literary mystery usually concerns middle- and upper-class characters whereas hard-boiled fiction usually focuses on the criminal underworld and relies on slang and colloquial speech. But the differences between the traditions is also indicative of fundamentally contrasting views of reality. In the literary mystery, the world before the crime occurs is stable; the violent act is an aberration; and the solution to the puzzle of the mystery restores order and justice. In the world of hard-boiled detective fiction, crime is endemic; the quest for truth and justice is quixotic; and any resolution is at best temporary.

The tradition of the literary mystery in the United States was exemplified by such writers as S. S. Van Dine, the pseudonym for Willard Huntington Wright, who created a suave American version of Sherlock Holmes in the cosmopolitan detective Philo Vance, who began his long career in The Benson Murder Case (1926). Even more popular were the detective stories and novels written about and by Ellery Queen, the pseudonym for the cousins Frederic Dannay and Manfred Lee, who also edited mystery anthologies and Ellery Queen’s Mystery Magazine. The first Ellery Queen novel, The Roman Hat Mystery (1929), was followed by more than thirty others published over a span of forty-eight years. Another American writer popular between World Wars I and II, the so-called Golden Age of the literary detective story, was John Dickson Carr, known for his “locked-room” mysteries. According to one of Carr’s detectives, Dr. Gideon Fell, the word “improbable” is “the very last that should ever be used to curse detective fiction” because a “great part of our liking for detective fiction is based on a liking for improbability.”

In the 1920s the American fascination with crime and criminals engendered a new, more realistic approach to detective fiction, practiced at its best by Dashiell HAMMETT, Raymond CHANDLER, and later by Ross Macdonald. Hammett began his career by writing for BLACK MASK, one of many PULP MAGAZINES that flourished at the time. Most stories in these magazines were melodramas with little character development and clichéd views of society. Hammett, a former Pinkerton detective, developed a fresh, understated style and a dark, pessimistic view of human nature and society. In Hammett’s first novel, Red Harvest (1929), the detective is a loner battling long odds as he comes to grips with corruption in business and government. In Hammett’s greatest novel, THE MALTESE FALCON, detective Sam Spade thrives in a world where law enforcement is ineffective and stays true to his own sense of conduct, his personal code.

Chandler in his work realistically evoked the seamy side of urban life in Los Angeles. His detective, Philip Marlowe, confronts corruption and forces that threaten his sense of self. In novels such as THE BIG SLEEP (1939) and The Long Good-Bye (1954) Chandler examines personal honor, murder, and misogyny.

Sources

Docherty, Brian, ed. American Crime Fiction. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1988.

Landrum, Larry. American Mystery and Detective Novels: A Reference Guide. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Marling, William. The American Roman Noir: Hammett, Cain, and Chandler. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995.

—Tilly Newell

"The Devil and Daniel Webster" by Stephen

Vincent Benét (1936) short story

Stephen Vincent BENÉT's short story appeared in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST in 1936 and was widely praised and reprinted. In the mid 1800s, farmer Jabez Stone sells his soul to the devil in exchange for riches. When the devil comes to collect, Stone calls on the great American orator and lawyer Daniel Webster to defend him. The devil agrees to a trial if he gets to pick a ghostly judge and jury of the worst scoundrels in American history. Webster's brilliant oratory melts even these terrible men, and Jabez gets his soul back. This story has been made into a play, opera, and movie.

Source

Izzo, David Garrett, and Lincoln Konkle, eds. Stephen Vincent Benet: Essays on his Life and Work. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003.

—David G. Izzo

DeVoto, Bernard (1897–1955) educator, editor, novelist, historian

DeVoto was born in Utah, and this background in the West informs his most important work, Across the Wide Missouri (1947) a history of the Rocky Mountain fur trade that won the PULITZER PRIZE. After an early career as an English professor at Northwestern University and Harvard, DeVoto became editor of the SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE (1936–1938) and of Harper's (1935–1955). A specialist in the life and career of Samuel Clemens, he published Mark Twain's America (1932) and Mark Twain at Work (1942). His other important nonfiction books on America include The Year of Decision: 1846 (1942) and The Course of Empire (1952). His fiction, which included several novels written under the pseudonym John August, was not well received by critics.

Source

Stegner, Wallace. The Uneasy Chair: A Biography of Bernard DeVoto. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.

De Vries, Peter (1910–1993) humor writer

Born in Chicago and graduated in 1931 from Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Michigan, De Vries began his career as an editor, working at Poetry magazine from 1938 to 1944. James Thurber got him a job at the New Yorker in 1944, and De Vries became a regular contributor as well as a member of the editorial staff from 1944 to 1987. De Vries wrote twenty-four novels—beginning with But Who Wakes the Bugler? (1940)—all characterized by sophisticated humor and witty word play. His last novel, Peckham's Marbles (1986), is about a man recovering from a case of hepatitis, which caused him to look at the world with a jaundiced eye. The Tunnel of Love (1954), Comfort Me with Apples (1956), and Slouching towards Kalamazoo (1983) are regarded as his most successful books. Julian Barnes wrote: "Samuel Butler advised us to eat a bunch of grapes downwards, so that each grape gets bigger and sweeter. Perhaps you should read Mr. De Vries backwards, so that each book will seem funnier and truer."

Source

J. H. Bowden, Peter De Vries. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

The Dial (1880–1929) periodical

Originally a title used for two nineteenth-century Transcendentalist journals (1840–1844 and 1860), The Dial in its third incarnation was a conservative literary journal that was harshly critical of works such as Stephen CRANE's THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE (1895). Founded in Chicago in 1880, the magazine kept this stance until it moved to New York City in 1916. There, under the guidance of such contributing editors as Conrad Aiken, Randolph Bourne, and Van Wyck Brooks, The Dial was transformed into a journal of radical opinion. In 1919 Scofield Thayer took over the editor's chair and transformed the magazine once again, making it one of the foremost literary magazines in the country. In the October 1922 issue, the magazine published T. S. ELIOT's poem THE WASTE LAND. Thayer instituted an annual $2,000 Dial Award to afford the selected artist the opportunity to "serve God (or go to the Devil) according to his own lights." Eliot, E. E. CUMMINGS, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Ezra POUND were among the recipients. In 1925 the poet Marianne MOORE assumed the editorship until the magazine ceased publication in 1929.

Source

Joost, Nicholas. Scofield Thayer and The Dial: An Illustrated History. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1964.

"The Diamond as Big as the Ritz" by F. Scott

Fitzgerald (1922) short story

Although F. Scott FITZGERALD classified this novelette as a fantasy, it is a realistic treatment of the message that absolute wealth corrupts absolutely. John T. Unger is invited to spend the summer in the west by his prep-school friend Percy Washington, who states that his father is the richest man in the world. The Washingtons own and live on a diamond mountain in the West. The protection of their secret necessitates the murder or imprisonment of anyone outside the family who learns about the diamond. The scheduled murder of John, who has fallen in love with Kismet Washington, is prevented by the discovery of the diamond and an aerial attack. Braddock Washington, the head of the family, offers God a bribe to restore everything to how it was. When the deal is rejected Braddock blows up the mountain. Only John and the two Washington daughters escape.

The story was rejected by mass-circulating magazines whose editors regarded it as blasphemous. H. L. MENCKEN and George Jean NATHAN published it in THE SMART SET; Fitzgerald included the story in TALES OF THE JAZZ AGE (1922).

—Morris Colden

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

Di Donato, Pietro (1911–1992) novelist

Pietro Di Donato was the son of a bricklayer who chronicled his life and the plight of Italian American laborers in his most famous novel, Christ in Concrete (1939). The autobiographical novel was praised for its honest depiction of immigrant life in the United States. The celebrity status Di Donato achieved with this work impeded his writing; it was more than two decades before he produced his second, and last, novel, Three Circles of Light (1960).

Source

Green, Rose Basile. "Adjusting to a Pluralistic Society," "Counterrevulsion," in her The Italian-American Novel. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1970, pp. 44–45, 150–157, 165.

—Crystal McCage

Dietz, Howard (1896–1983) lyricist

Born to Russian-immigrant parents, Howard Dietz grew up in New York and attended Townsend Harris, a high school for gifted pupils. He then went to Columbia University, where he wrote lyrics and dramatic sketches for student shows and also contributed light verse to New York newspapers under the pen name of "Freckles." He went into advertising in 1924 as publicity director for the newly formed Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie studio, for which Dietz developed the "Leo the Lion" trademark.

Dietz continued writing newspaper verse as well as song lyrics for Broadway shows and revues, including Dear Sir (1924), where he collaborated with Jerome Kern. Arthur Schwartz, a young composer who admired Dietz's work, invited him to collaborate, and Dietz finally agreed to work on a 1929 revue called The Little Show. Unlike the lavish Ziegfeld Follies, The Little Show was an intimate, sophisticated revue that emphasized witty sketches and urbane songs, such as "I Guess I'll Have to Change My Plan." Dietz and Schwartz collaborated on several similar revues and musical comedies that produced such standards as "Dancing in the Dark" (1931), "Alone Together" (1932), "You and the Night and the Music" (1934), and "By Myself" (1937).

Dietz's lyrics were at their best when they countered Schwartz's brooding melodies with witty, flippant sentiments; when Dietz gave himself over to Schwartz's music, his lyrics strained for poetic heights. In 1953 MGM produced The Band Wagon, which featured many of the songs Dietz and Schwartz had written for Broadway revues and musicals. The songwriters created one new song for the movie, "That's Entertainment," which epitomizes Dietz's skills as a lyricist in such lines as his summary of the plot of Hamlet: "Where a ghost and a prince meet, / And everyone ends in mincemeat."

Source

Dietz, Howard Dietz. Dancing in the Dark. New York: Quadrangle, 1974.

—Philip Furia

Dix, Dorothy

See ELIZABETH MERIWETHER GILMER.

Dixon, Thomas (1864–1946) novelist, playwright

Thomas Dixon was a southerner who referred to himself as a "reactionary individualist." Before making a name for himself as a writer, Dixon made his living as a Baptist minister, lawyer, legislator, and lyceum lecturer. He wrote more than twenty novels, but his biggest success came with a trilogy set in the South during Reconstruction: The Leopard's Spots (1902), THE CLANSMAN (1905), and The Traitor (1907). Of these, the middle volume proved to be the most successful. Hollywood director D. W. Griffith adapted Dixon's play The Clansman, based on the first two novels of the trilogy, for the screen in 1915 as The Birth of a Nation; it became the first "million-dollar movie" and proved to be so influential that it led to a revival of the Ku Klux Klan. All of Dixon's novels were vehicles for his social theories, and all of them were highly conservative. After the success of Griffith's movie, Dixon wrote dramas and screenplays and adapted his own novels for the movies, five of which he produced at his Los Angeles studio.

Sources

Cook, Raymond Allen. Fire From the Flint: The Amazing Careers of Thomas Dixon. Winston-Salem, N.C.: J. F. Blair, 1968.

Cook. Thomas Dixon. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Dobie, J. Frank (1888–1964) short-story writer, historian

J. Frank Dobie is a key figure in the literature of the Southwest. A Texas native, he wrote about the life of a cattleman in A Vaquero of the Brush Country (1929), based on a true story. His other important books include Guide to Life and Literature of the Southwest (1943), The Voice of the Coyote (1949), Tales of Old-Time Texas (1955), and Cow People (1964). Dobie has been praised for his painstaking research, which has helped to correct earlier fictionalized accounts of the Southwest that relied too much on legend.

Source

Tinkle, Lon. An American Original: The Life of J. Frank Dobie. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978.

“The Doctor’s Son” by John O’Hara (1935) story

“The Doctor’s Son” provided the title for John O’HARA’s first collection of stories, The Doctor’s Son and Other Stories (1935). It is set in GIBBSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA, O’Hara’s fictional community based on his hometown of Pottsville, during the 1918 flu epidemic. The title character and narrator is fifteen-year-old Jimmy Malloy, who represents O’Hara in thirteen short stories and novelettes and two novels. “The Doctor’s Son” is an initiation story about death, love, and betrayal. The collection includes “It Must Have Been Spring” and “Over the River and Through the Wood.”

Sources

O’Hara, John. The Doctor’s Son and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.

O’Hara. Gibbsville, Pa.: The Classic Stories, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992; second edition, 2004.

—Morris Colden

Doolittle, Hilda (1886–1961) poet, novelist, playwright, translator

Hilda Doolittle, known to the literary world as H.D., was a leading contributor to the Imagist verse movement of the early twentieth century (see IMAGISM). Born in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, H.D. attended Bryn Mawr College for three terms before traveling to Europe and eventually settling in England. Her development as a writer was influenced by her studies of Greek literature as well as by Ezra POUND, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Marianne MOORE. H.D. translated Greek texts, wrote novels, essays, and memoirs—including Tribute to Freud (1956), about her relationship with the psychoanalyst—but she is known mainly for her poetry and her adherence to the principles of Imagism: direct treatment of the subject, use of only the necessary words to convey meaning, and avoidance of clichéd devices such as similes. Her first collection of poems was Sea Garden (1916). Her most admired work includes her trilogy—made up of The Walls Do Not Fall (1944), Tribute to the Angels (1945), and The Flowering of the Rod (1946)—and her long poem, Helen in Egypt (1961), which retells the story of the Trojan War from the perspective of Helen.

Sources

Boughn, Michael. H.D.: A Bibliography, 1905–1990. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993.

Hollenberg, Donna Krolik, ed. H.D. and Poets After. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2000.

—Skye L. Suttie

Dos Passos, John (1896–1970) novelist, historian, essayist

America our nation has been beaten by strangers who have turned our language inside out who have taken the clean words our fathers spoke and made them slimy and foul . . .

All right we are two nations

—The Big Money (1936)

John Dos Passos was born in Chicago, the son of a successful trust lawyer from New York and Lucy Sprigg Madison, a widow from Virginia. The elder Dos Passos supported Madison and his son for eleven years until the death of Mrs. Dos Passos, after which he married Lucy Madison. Meanwhile, the young Dos Passos and his mother lived what he called a hotel childhood, mostly in Brussels and London. After a year in a Washington, D.C. school, he was educated in London until he was eleven, when he and his mother moved back to the United States and Dos Passos entered Choate Academy, which prepared him for admission at the age of sixteen to Harvard. Because his father thought him too young for college, he traveled in Europe with a tutor for a year before entering Harvard, where he studied literature and began writing fiction. Uncertain whether he wished to pursue a career as an artist or as a writer, he went to Spain after graduation in 1916 to study architecture. In January 1917, while Dos Passos was in Spain, his father died. Dos Passos returned to the United States for the funeral. Three months later, the United States declared war on Germany, and Dos Passos, too nearsighted for military service, joined the Norton-Harjes volunteer ambulance corps, which was soon merged into the American Red Cross. Serving in France and Italy he became disgusted by what he called the war machine driven by corrupt governments serving the interests of big business. He expressed his anger in a collaborative novel with his Harvard classmate Robert Hillyer. After the war, when Dos Passos determined to devote his life to literature, he heavily revised a portion of his contribution to the collaboration into his first published novel, One Man's Initiation—1917 (1920), and he expanded another portion into his first major novel, THREE SOLDIERS (1921).

John Dos Passos, 1924

Dos Passos was an inveterate traveler, and throughout his writing career he generally alternated between publishing creative works—either novels or, in the 1920s, plays—and nonfiction, usually essays based on his travels early in his career and histories later. Arguably, his most influential literary friendship of the time was with John Howard Lawson, with whom he had served in the ambulance corps during the war. Lawson was a devoted communist, and he urged Dos Passos toward leftist activism. Three Soldiers, was an uncompromising, satirical antiwar novel that shifted perspective among three men in the army. The novel was praised in literary circles for what was called its honest realism and damned in the popular press as un-American; the controversy it stirred established Dos Passos's reputation as a serious writer. With MANHATTAN TRANSFER (1925), among the earliest American modernist novels (see MODERNISM), Dos Passos solidified his reputation as a major writer. Sinclair Lewis wrote that Manhattan Transfer could be “the foundation of a whole new school of novel-writing.” Mixing impressionism, expressionism, stream of consciousness, fragments of newspaper text, song lyrics, and advertisements, with masterful satirical portraits and classical allusions, Dos Passos crafted a complex novel that avoided being self-consciously experimental.

In 1926 Dos Passos began working with the New Playwrights Theatre, a radical group that included Lawson. He wrote three experimental plays, including The Garbage Man (1926), and helped with production of other proletarian dramas. During the same period, he served on the editorial board of the communist magazine New Masses, in which he advocated a brand of radicalism that avoided “phrases, opinions, badges, banners imported from Russia or anywhere else.” Though he never joined the Communist Party, Dos Passos was a dependable fellow traveler during the 1920s and most of the 1930s.

In 1930 Dos Passos completed The 42nd Parallel, the first volume of the U.S.A. trilogy, his masterwork. The other two volumes are 1919 (1932) and The Big Money (1936). U.S.A. is a panorama of American life in the first third of the twentieth century. To capture the spirit of the time Dos Passos employed four different modes of narration: conventional narrative focusing alternately on the lives of a cast of representative characters; what he called The Camera Eye—impressionistic autobiographical bits of stream of consciousness; Newsreels—montages of contemporary newspaper headlines and fragments of articles; and highly stylized satirical biographies of notable people. The novels were widely praised; Malcolm Cowley called 1919 “a landmark in American fiction.”

The Spanish Civil War, which began in 1936, was regarded by Popular Front Communists as a battle of international significance against fascism. Dos Passos, who had traveled extensively in Spain and had many friends there, was particularly troubled by the Nationalist attempt, bolstered by Germany and Italy, to overthrow the elected Republican government, supported by the Russians. In March 1937, he went with Ernest HEMINGWAY, his friend since about 1924, to film a communist-sponsored documentary about the war. When he arrived, Dos Passos learned that his friend and translator Jose Robles, a Republican, had been murdered by communists, who questioned his loyalty. Against Hemingway's advice, Dos Passos wrote a series of essays in 1938 critical of the communist involvement in Spain and followed them the next year with Adventures of a Young Man, in which a sincere American communist regarded as politically unreliable is sent by party leaders to the front lines in Spain during the war, where he will be killed. Dos Passos immediately lost his leftist credentials as a literary figure. When the U.S.A. trilogy was published in a single volume in 1938, the communist reviewers took the opportunity to reassess the work they had praised when it was initially published: Granville Hicks accused Dos Passos of “irresponsibility, banality, naiveté and sheer stupidity.” In terms of production, his literary career was not yet half over; in terms of reputation, he moved from the first rank of American writers to respected has-been. Hemingway led the attackers.

After 1938 Dos Passos continued to write at the rate of a book a year. He alternated between histories that exhibited a particular interest in the founding fathers, notably The Ground We Stand On (1941) and The Men who Made the Nation (1957), and social fiction. His District of Columbia trilogy—Adventures of a Young Man (1939); Number One (1943), about a politician modeled on Huey Long; and The Grand Design (1949), about Franklin D. Roosevelt's administration—attempted a social and political satire of the period between 1930 and the end of the New Deal. Midcentury (1961) was an attempt to apply the techniques of U.S.A. with a decidedly conservative political bias.

Dos Passos wrote thirty-eight books, but he is remembered primarily for Three Soldiers, Manhattan Transfer, and the U.S.A. trilogy. Those works rank him among the most significant novelists of the twentieth century. He received numerous awards, including the National Institute of Arts and Letters Gold Medal Award for fiction in 1957 and the Antonio Feltrinelli Prize from Italian Academia Nazionale dei Lincei in 1967, but his honors came for his novels of the 1920s and 1930s. He died in 1970, having nearly completed Century's Ebb (1975), his fifteenth novel, which he called his "chronicle of despair."

—Richard Layman

Principal Books by Dos Passos

One Man's Initiation—1917. London: Allen & Unwin, 1920; New York: Doran, 1920. Republished as First Encounter. New York: Philosophical Library, 1945. Republished as One Man's Initiation—1917, unexpurgated edition. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1969.

Three Soldiers. New York: Doran, 1921.

Rosinante to the Road Again. New York: Doran, 1922.

A Pushcart at the Curb. New York: Doran, 1922.

Streets of Night. New York: Doran, 1923.

Manhattan Transfer. New York & London: Harper, 1925.

The Garbage Man. New York & London: Harper, 1926.

Orient Express. New York & London: Harper, 1927.

Facing the Chair: Story of the Americanization of Two Foreign-born Workmen. Boston: Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee, 1927.

Airways, Inc.. New York: Macaulay, 1928.

The 42nd Parallel. New York & London: Harper, 1930.

1919. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1932.

Three Plays: The Garbage Man, Airways, Inc., Fortune Heights. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934.

In All Countries. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934.

The Big Money. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1936.

The Villages Are the Heart of Spain. Chicago: Esquire-Coronet, 1937.

Journeys Between Wars. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1938.

U.S.A. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1938.

Adventures of a Young Man. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.

Dust jacket for Dos Passos's 1925 novel, in which he interweaves the lives of a large cast of characters, all of whom are shaped by their experience of the city

The Ground We Stand On. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1941.

Number One. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1943.

State of the Nation. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1944.

Tour of Duty. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1946.

The Grand Design. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1949.

The Prospect Before Us. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1950.

Life's Picture History of World War II, full-page texts by Dos Passos. New York: Simon & Schuster/Time, Inc., 1950.

Chosen Country. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1951.

District of Columbia. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1952.

The Head and Heart of Thomas Jefferson. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1954.

Most Likely to Succeed. New York: Prentice-Hall, 1954.

The Theme Is Freedom. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1956.

The Men Who Made the Nation. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1957.

The Great Days. New York: Sagamore Press, 1958.

Dust jackets for Dos Passos's U.S.A. trilogy, a story that combines history, fiction, and the author's personal experience

- Prospects of a Golden Age*. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1959.
- Midcentury*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1961.
- Mr. Wilson's War*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1962.
- Brazil on the Move*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1963.
- Occasions and Protests*. Chicago: Regnery, 1964.
- Thomas Jefferson: The Making of a President*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1964.
- The Shackles of Power: Three Jeffersonian Decades*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1966.
- The Best Times: An Informal Memoir*. New York: New American Library, 1966.
- The Portugal Story: Three Centuries of Exploration and Discovery*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1969.
- Easter Island, Island of Enigmas*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.
- Century's Ebb: The Thirteenth Chronicle*. Boston: Gambit, 1975.

Studying John Dos Passos

John Dos Passos wrote forty-two books published between 1921 and his death in 1970. They fall into two distinct periods, characterized by his political interests. Before the mid 1930s, Dos Passos was a political activist who advocated many of the tenets of communism, though he never joined the party. After the Spanish Civil War in 1937, he turned abruptly from communism and aligned himself with politically conservative friends and causes. Although Dos Passos insisted that what he called the ground he stood on—the basic principles that guided his thought—was consistent throughout his career, his politics clearly affected his writing. Most critics agree that the works from the early part of Dos Passos's life are more innovative, more interesting, and the most enduring. THREE SOLDIERS (1921), a satire on WORLD WAR I army life and an indictment of the war machine, MANHATTAN TRANSFER (1925), a modernist novel about the stultifying force of urbanization; and the U.S.A. Trilogy (1938), a panoramic, stylistically innovative social fiction about life in the United States during the first third of the twentieth century, are considered his most significant novels.

Dos Passos published as much nonfiction as he did fiction. Particularly during the first part of his life, he recorded his extensive travel experiences in books that focused on the social and political life of the places he visited. After 1937 he turned to studies of American history, particularly the founding fathers, in an attempt to elucidate the basic principles of American democracy.

The study of Dos Passos's novels should begin with his important novels of the 1920s and 1930s, particularly U.S.A., which is his masterwork. Reading of these novels will be enhanced by a study of Dos Passos's letters, collected in Townsend Ludington's John Dos Passos: A Twentieth Century Odyssey (New York: Dutton, 1980) and in the nonfiction Dos Passos wrote, mainly in radical magazines of the time, that are collected in John Dos Passos: The Major Non- fictional Prose, edited by Donald Pizer (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1988). Pizer's Dos Passos's U.S.A.: A Critical Study (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1988) is a model for the study of Dos Passos's most important work.

Students interested in Dos Passos's political development should begin, after the primary works, with Melvin Landsberg's Dos Passos's Path to U.S.A.: A Political Biography 1912–1936 (Boulder, Colo.: Colorado Associated University Press, 1972) and Robert C. Rosen's John Dos Passos, Politics and the Writer (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1981). Daniel Aaron's Writers on the Left, Episodes in American Literary Communism (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1961) and Walter B. Rideout's The Radical Novel in the United States, 1900–1954 (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1956) are useful for context.

The best study of Dos Passos's apprentice fiction and his lesser early novels, is Michael Clark's Dos Passos's Early Fiction, 1912–1938 (Selinsgrove, Penn.: Susquehanna University Press, 1987). There is no recommended book-length study of his later works.

Biographical study of Dos Passos should begin with his The Best Times: An Informal Memoir (New York: New American Library, 1966). The recommended full-length biography of Dos Passos is Ludington's John Dos Passos: A Twentieth Century Odyssey, and it should be supplemented with Virginia Spencer Carr's Dos Passos: A Life (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1984).

David Sanders's John Dos Passos: A Comprehensive Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1987) is a primary bibliography that also lists archival holdings, reviews, and criticism. It should be supplemented with John Rohrkemper's John Dos Passos, A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980). Both are well out of date; the student should consult the Modern Language Association annual bibliographies available on-line in most major libraries.

—Richard Layman

Drama genre

Twentieth-century drama begins with the work of Eugene O'NEILL and the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS. Before the advent of this experimental troupe, densely plotted melodramas and sentimental comedies dominated the nineteenth-century American stage. The Provincetown Players aspired to create a dramatic literature that was the equal in theme and character of American and European achievements in the novel and in poetry. O'Neill's early plays, drawing on the work of Herman Melville and Joseph Conrad, exhibit a brooding sense of fate and family disorder that marked his mature later plays. His style ranged from expressionistic dramas (see EXPRESSIONISM) such as THE HAIRY APE (produced 1922) to studies of American myth in The Fountain (produced 1925), based on the legend of Juan Ponce de Leon and the fountain of youth. O'Neill uses a novelistic STREAM-OF-CONSCIOUSNESS technique in his nine-act STRANGE INTERLUDE (produced 1928) in which he contrasts characters' public actions with their inner thoughts and desires. In The Great God Brown (produced 1926) O'Neill uses masks in a contemporary setting reminiscent of the ancient Greek theater. O'Neill was influenced by both modern psychology and philosophy (Sigmund Freud, Friedrich Nietzsche, Carl Jung) and ancient sources (Aeschylus) as demonstrated in his version of the Orestia trilogy, MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA (produced 1931). Later in his career, posthumously produced plays such as A Touch of the Poet (produced 1958) and More Stately Mansions (produced 1964) reflected his interest in American history as a shaper of human character. In THE EMPEROR JONES (produced 1920) and All God's Chillun Got Wings (produced 1924) he took on controversial issues such as racism and miscegenation. In O'Neill's last phase, his two masterpieces, The Iceman Cometh (produced 1946) and Long Day's Journey into Night (produced 1956) exhibited a heightened realism that was just as intense as his earlier experimental plays.

Other playwrights followed O'Neill's example—experimenting boldly with theme and subject matter. Elmer RICE in THE ADDING MACHINE (produced 1923) created an expressionistic drama that criticized a civilization increasingly dominated by commercial considerations that turned people into numbers or adding machines. Playwright Paul GREEN, on the other hand, wrote searing realistic dramas about the plight of poor whites and blacks, providing a folk-based critique of the capitalistic system that later resulted in spectacle plays in which large casts dramatized the history of America. In OUR TOWN (produced 1938) and THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH (produced 1942), Thornton WILDER played with the concept of time and the use of stage space to create characters that were American originals often expressing small-town values and yet also world citizens responding to social, psychological, and economic changes occurring in the modern world.

Conventional plays written during this period of experimentation examined themes relevant to a rapidly evolving society. Susan GLASPELL, who belonged to the Provincetown Players with O'Neill, revealed the subtle yet destructive pressures on women's lives in her one-act "Trifles" (produced 1916) and her PULITZER PRIZE-winning drama Alison's House (produced 1930). Both George E. KELLY in CRAIG'S WIFE (produced 1925) and Philip Barry in HOLIDAY (produced 1928) and THE PHILADELPHIA STORY (produced 1939) enjoyed great success with family dramas and comedies of manners. George S. KAUFMAN—the great collaborator—contributed both as author and director to most of the period's comedic triumphs. Kaufman directed the Marx Brothers in their Broadway successes The Cocoanuts (produced 1925) and Animal Crackers (produced 1928). With Marc Connelly, Kaufman wrote the business satire Beggar on Horseback (produced 1924); with Edna Ferber Dinner at Eight (produced 1932) and Stage Door (produced 1936); and with Moss Hart the enduring farces YOU CAN'T TAKE IT WITH YOU (produced 1936) and THE MAN WHO CAME TO DINNER (produced 1939). After his great success with Laurence STALLINGS in the WORLD WAR I drama WHAT PRICE GLORY (produced 1924), Maxwell ANDERSON elevated the language of American drama in the verse plays: WINTERSET (produced 1935) and his historical drama Elizabeth the Queen (produced 1930) and Mary of Scotland (produced 1933).

With the economic collapse of the GREAT DEPRESSION, American playwrights began to examine economic disparities and social injustice in their plays. Sidney KINGSLEY realistically dramatized slum life in his hit Broadway play DEAD END (produced 1935). Clifford Odets championed labor unions in Waiting for Lefty (produced 1935) and examined economic pressures on lower-class immigrant families in Awake and Sing! (produced 1935) and Golden Boy (produced 1937). Clare Boothe LUCE satirized upper-class matrons in her all-female play THE WOMEN (produced 1936). Lillian HELLMAN excited audiences with her combination of melodrama and social criticism. Her first play THE CHILDREN'S HOUR (produced 1934) challenged audiences' attitudes about lesbianism, and in THE LITTLE FOXES (produced 1939) she criticized the cruelties of modern American capitalism through the metaphor of a traditional nineteenth-century melodrama. In Watch on the Rhine (produced 1941) she attacks the complacency of Americans to the dangers of European fascism.

This first great age of American drama culminates in 1944 with the premiere of Tennessee WILLIAMS's autobiographical play THE GLASS MENAGERIE. Blending elements of realism, expressionism, and verse drama Williams successfully dramatizes the complexity of individual characters within his haunted family. Like O'Neill, Williams examines the porous membrane separating the past from present.

Sources

- Bryer, Jackson, R., ed. The Playwright's Art: Conversations with Contemporary American Dramatists. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1995.
- Engle, Ron, and Tice L. Miller, ed. The American Stage: Social and Economic Issues from the Colonial Period to the Present. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Frankel, Aaron. Writing the Broadway Musical. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo, 2000.
- Gassner, John, ed. Best Plays of the Modern American Theatre. New York: Crown, 1947.

Dreiser, Theodore (1871–1945) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

We are to have no pictures which the Puritan and the narrow, animated by an obsolete dogma, cannot approve of. We are to have no theatres, no motion pictures. No books, no public exhibitions of any kind, no speech even which will in any way contravene his limited view of life.

—Life, Art and America (1917)

Born in Terre Haute, Indiana, into a large Catholic family, one of thirteen children, Theodore Dreiser never lost his sense of life as a struggle against forces—economic, social, emotional—that could at any moment overwhelm and defeat the individual. Refusing to conform to the prevailing morality of his time, Dreiser adhered to a grim, deterministic philosophy that defined his life and work.

Dreiser's father, a German immigrant, shifted from job to job while Theodore was educated in sundry Catholic and public schools; he attended Indiana University as a "special student" but did not graduate. His siblings drifted from the family, his sister Emma having a child out of wedlock and his brother Paul (1858–1906) leaving to become a songwriter as Paul Dresser. The first stanza of his best-known song, "On the Banks of the Wabash," now the state song of Indiana, was written by Theodore. "Theo" became an omnivorous reader, being blown "to bits" by Herbert Spencer's ideas that demonstrable, physical powers could be studied scientifically and that these, instead of moral or transcendent principles, forced individual and social change. His amorality extended to his personal comportment; throughout his life Dreiser formed and broke liaisons with young women.

As a young man Dreiser held a variety of positions—stock clerk, real-estate salesman, collection agent, dishwasher, railroad- and farmworker, among others—before beginning his newspaper career at age twenty-one as a reporter for the Chicago Daily Globe. He also worked for newspapers in St. Louis, Toledo, Pittsburgh, and New York. In 1895 Dreiser created the magazine Ev'ry Month, which he edited and mainly wrote for two years. He then wrote for popular magazines. After his friend Arthur Henry prompted him to try a novel, Dreiser wrote his first great book, SISTER CARRIE, based upon the life of his sister Emma. The book impressed an editor at Doubleday, Frank Norris, but shocked the wife of the firm's founder, who tried to suppress it as immoral. The contract prevailed and SISTER CARRIE appeared in 1900, but with no publicity or support, it languished in obscurity. As soon as it was published Dreiser began his second novel, Jennie Gerhardt.

Depressed, Dreiser changed jobs often, eventually becoming a successful editor for women's magazines. With the encouragement of H. L. MENCKEN, Dreiser revised Jennie Gerhardt, which Harper published in 1911. Dreiser soon started work on The Financier, the first of three novels on Frank Cowperwood, based on the life of a traction tycoon Charles Tyson Yerkes (see COWPERWOOD TRILOGY). Although The Financier (1912) received positive notices, Harper refused to publish the second novel in the trilogy, The Titan, and he moved to the publisher John Lane, who brought out the novel in 1914. He became dissatisfied with Lane when the publisher withdrew The "Genius" (1915), a semi-autobiographical chronicle of his love affairs, after it was declared obscene by the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice. Dreiser's reputation was consolidated in 1925 with the BONI AND LIVERIGHT publication of AN AMERICAN

Theodore Dreiser, circa 1907

TRAGEDY, a two-volume novel based on an actual murder in the Adirondacks.

After a visit to Russia, whose social ideals he greatly admired, Dreiser began two decades of magazine writing and work on philosophical essays. Books of fiction started earlier stalled, and it was only as his health began to fail that he strove to complete The Bulwark and The Stoic, the latter the third of the Cowperwood novels. His first wife, Sara, died in 1942; one year before he died Dreiser married Helen Richardson, with whom he had conducted a relationship since 1919.

Throughout his life, Dreiser had difficulty maintaining a connection with a publisher. His demands for remuneration and his refusal to alter his work placed unusual demands upon Harper, John Lane, Boni and Liveright, and Doubleday, four firms with whom he had contracts. None of his works until An American Tragedy were great successes in the marketplace, although from 1915 through 1925 his fiction sold steadily.

Question the proof
29
Sister Carrie.
 CHAPTER I. Start 150,000 words
The haquet attracting : it was and forced.
 When Caroline Meeber boarded the afternoon train for Chicago, her total outfit consisted of a small trunk, ~~which was chosen~~ ~~in the baggage car,~~ a cheap imitation alligator skin satchel, ~~holding~~ ~~some minor details of the toilet,~~ a small lunch in a paper box and a yellow leather snap purse, containing her ticket, a scrap of paper with her sister's address in Van Buren Street, and four dollars in money. It was in August, 1889. She was eighteen years of age, bright, ~~timid~~ ~~at~~ ~~full~~ ~~of~~ ~~illusions,~~ ignorance and youth. Whatever touch of regret at parting characterized her thoughts, it was certainly not for advantages now being given up. A flush of tears at her mother's farewell kiss, a touch in the throat when the cars clacked by the flour mill where her father worked by the day, a pathetic sigh as the familiar green environs of the village passed in review, and the threads which bound her so lightly to girlhood and home were irrevocably broken.
 To be sure, ~~she was not conscious of any of this. Any~~ ~~change, however great, might be remedied.~~ There was always the next station where one might descend and return. There was the great city bound more closely by these very trains which came up daily.
 Columbia City was not so very far away, even once she was in Chicago.
 What, pray, is a few hours - a hundred miles? ~~Another opportunity~~ ~~was there.~~ She looked at the little slip bearing ~~the address~~ address and wondered. She gazed at the green landscape, now passing in swift review, until her swifter thoughts replaced its impression with vague conjectures of what Chicago might be, like. ~~Since infancy~~
~~her ears had been full of the name.~~ ~~Since the family had thought of~~

Top page of the revised typescript for Dreiser's first novel

Dreiser's novel most generally taught in schools is his first, Sister Carrie. It is his most compressed and most consciously shaped narrative. British readers were readier to see its power than Americans. Its rise to prominence was gradual and steady; its reissue in America in 1907 sold more copies than the original edition, and by the time the MODERN LIBRARY issued it in 1932, its stature as a classic of twentieth-century literature was assured.

Jennie Gerhardt, The Financier, and The Titan enlarged the scope of Dreiser's vision. In the Cowperwood novels, especially, his exploration of business practices, local and national politics, and social mores is penetrating and comprehensive. His framing of Cowperwood's story with scientific theory augments its thematic depth. The Financier refers to "the survival of the fittest," an idea Dreiser took from Spencer; to "chemisms," or the force of natural attraction, as in Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Wahlverwandschaft; and to particle theory, as when he compares members of a jury to atoms.

An American Tragedy remains Dreiser's most impressive achievement. Every level of American society, from the poorest to the wealthiest, serves to shape the destiny of the hero, Clyde Griffiths. The circumstances that create him, that maneuver him into a position where he becomes responsible for the murder of his lover, and that equally cause his attraction to a wealthy socialite (and that make this attraction reciprocal), forcing him into feelings he himself does not want or seek, justify the appellation of tragedy. The conclusion, in which he is executed for actions for which he is not responsible, give the book added bitterness. Although written in intermittently lumbering prose, the arc of the story unifies the whole and gives to the ordinary American at its center nobility and significance.

Dreiser's stature grew throughout the first two decades of this century and reached a high point in the mid 1920s. By the time An American Tragedy was published, the public had become aware of the breadth of his achievement. After 1925 he was for a decade an American icon. When the Swedish academy decided to award a Nobel Prize in literature to an American in 1929, the names most put forth were Theodore Dreiser and Sinclair LEWIS. In his acceptance speech, Lewis paid Dreiser homage. After Dreiser's death in 1945 his books continued to sell, partly kept alive by universities. Today he is remembered as an intrepid trailblazer and as the author of Sister Carrie and An American Tragedy, with a devoted but more select following for the Cowperwood trilogy.

—Roger Lathbury

Principal Books by Dreiser

Sister Carrie. New York: Doubleday, Page, 1900. Pennsylvania Edition, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

Jennie Gerhardt. New York & London: Harper, 1911.

The Financier. New York & London: Harper, 1912. Revised edition, New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.

Theodore Dreiser, John Dos Passos, and Samuel Ornitz in 1931, just after their return from Harlan County, Kentucky, where, on behalf of a leftist committee chaired by Dreiser, they investigated conditions among striking coal miners

A Traveler at Forty. New York: Century, 1913.

The Titan. New York: John Lane, 1914.

The "Genius." New York: John Lane, 1915.

Plays of the Natural and the Supernatural. New York: John Lane, 1916.

A Hoosier Holiday. New York: John Lane, 1916.

Free and Other Stories. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1918.

Twelve Men. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1919.

The Hand of the Potter. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1919. Revised, 1927.

Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1920.

A Book About Myself. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922. Republished as Newspaper Days. New York: Liveright, 1931.

The Color of a Great City. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1923.

An American Tragedy. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.

Moods: Cadenced and Declaimed. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926. Revised, 1928. Revised and republished as Moods Philosophic and Emotional, Cadenced and Declaimed. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1935.

Chains. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.

Dreiser Looks at Russia. New York: Liveright, 1928.

A Gallery of Women. New York: Liveright, 1929.

Dawn. New York: Liveright, 1931.

Tragic America. New York: Liveright, 1931.

America Is Worth Saving. New York: Modern Age, 1941.

The Bulwark. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1946.

The Stoic. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1947.

Notes on Life, edited by Marguerite Tjader and John J. McAleer. University: University of Alabama Press, 1974.

Theodore Dreiser: A Selection of Uncollected Prose, edited by Donald Pizer. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1977.

Selected Magazine Articles of Theodore Dreiser, edited by Yoshinobu Hakutani. Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1985.

Studying Theodore Dreiser

The best beginning for the study of Theodore Dreiser is his first novel, SISTER CARRIE. It remains his most compressed presentation of the material inequities of American culture and the forces that overwhelm those caught in it; it exhibits Dreiser's great cumulative power as well as his stylistic garishness. The book published in 1900 is in most respects the one Dreiser wrote, but the original publishers (and subsequent reprints) altered Dreiser's ending; the novel as the author conceived it can be found in the University of Pennsylvania Press edition of 1981 and the current Penguin paperback. After Sister Carrie the student should read AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY (1925) for its encompassing vision of American social classes, and then proceed to The Financier (1912), the longest and most fully rounded of the COWPERWOOD TRILOGY. Jennie Gerhardt (1911) is a worthy successor to Sister Carrie. The "Genius" (1915) dramatizes Dreiser's lifelong preoccupation with sexual drives and, here, their connection to artistic productivity.

Dreiser was not an economical writer. The length of his books, however, should not discourage readers from becoming absorbed in his work. Although he can be effective in the short story, as in Free and Other Stories (1918), his broad understanding of the connections between personal motivations, economic life, and politics requires the space of the novel.

In addition to the fiction, which is of the first importance, Dreiser was a memoirist of ability: see A Hoosier Holiday (1916) about his native Indiana, and Twelve Men (1919), a series of colorful biographical sketches. Especially memorable is the portrait of his brother, Paul Dresser, the songwriter, who until recently was celebrated more than Dreiser himself in Indiana. His Dawn (1928) is an astonishingly frank memoir about his family and his early years.

Dreiser's philosophical ideas as expressed directly in Hey Rub-a-Dub-Dub (1920) lack the coherence and force of the novels. "Neurotic America and the Sex Impulse" is a tirade; An American Tragedy is art. Politically, for the last two and a half decades of his life Dreiser was a supporter of communism—see Dreiser Looks at Russia (1928)—which he viewed as the one way of life that held out hope to all levels of humanity by establishing an environment not dominated by economic power.

The standard biography is Richard Lingeman's two-volume Theodore Dreiser: At the Gates of the City, 1871–1907 and Theodore Dreiser: An American Journey, 1908–1945 (New York: Putnam, 1986, 1990). Lingeman abridged this work into one volume, Theodore Dreiser: An American Journey (New York: J. Wiley, 1993). The best volume of letters is still Robert H. Elias's three-volume Letters of Theodore Dreiser (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1959).

The fiction has been studied from thematic, historical, and aesthetic viewpoints. A good overall study is Donald Pizer's The Novels of Theodore Dreiser (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1976). Louis J. Zanine's Mechanism and Mysticism: The Influence of Science on the Thought and Work of Theodore Dreiser (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993) limns Dreiser's scientific determinism. Walter Benn Michaels in The Gold Standard and the Logic of Naturalism: Literature at the Turn of the Century (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987) puts Dreiser in historical and literary context. Dreiser's aesthetic accomplishments, often derided because of his clumsy prose style, are sympathetically addressed in Robert Penn WARREN's Theodore Dreiser, an Appreciation (New York: Random House, 1971), published in the centenary of Dreiser's birth.

—Roger Lathbury

Dubin, Al (1891–1945) lyricist

Al Dubin was born to Russian immigrant parents in Zurich, Switzerland and at the age of five moved with his family to Philadelphia. Unhappy in school, Dubin moved to New York to be closer to Tin Pan Alley. There he had several hits, such as "Among My Souvenirs" (1927) with composer Lawrence Wright, and "Tip Toe Through the Tulips" (1929) and "Dancing with Tears in My Eyes" (1930) with Joseph Burke.

One of the first songwriters to move to the West Coast after the advent of talking pictures, Dubin was put under contract by Warner Bros. and paired with composer Harry Warren. Over the next five years, Dubin and Warren wrote songs for a highly successful series of movie musicals—42nd Street (1933), Dames (1934), and the Gold Diggers series (1933–1938)—that reflected the gritty realities of the Depression in their backstage stories about struggles to mount Broadway shows. Songs such as "You're Getting to Be a Habit with Me" (1933), "I Only Have Eyes for You" (1934), and "Lullaby of Broadway" (1935) were choreographed by Busby Berkeley, whose innovative camera movement gave kaleidoscopic perspectives of such production numbers that no audience of a stage production could possibly envisage. Dubin and Warren's songs, like Busby Berkeley's camera, captured the restless, dynamic energy of New York—"Naughty, bawdy, gaudy, sporty Forty-second Street"—and redefined the movie musical at a moment when its initial popularity had begun to wane.

Working for Warner Bros. was as demanding as the backstage agonies portrayed in these movie musicals, and Dubin, a man of gargantuan appetites and little discipline, began to escape into alcohol and drugs. After collapsing on a New York street, he died at the age of fifty-three.

Source

McBride, Patricia Dubin. Lullaby of Broadway. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel, 1983.

—Philip Furia

Du Bois, W. E. B. (1868–1963) sociologist, historian, novelist, journalist

I sit with Shakespeare and he winces not.

—The Souls of Black Folk (1903)

William Edward Burghardt Du Bois was born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. His father was of Haitian birth, and a maternal ancestor served in the Revolutionary War on behalf of his Massachusetts master. By the age of fifteen, Du Bois was already contributing editorials to the New York Globe on racial and national issues. The three years he spent at Fisk University in Nashville exposed him to Southern race relations and cemented his lifelong interest in what he called “the problem of the color line.”

For the next two decades he pursued his own education (at Fisk, Harvard, and in Europe), and simultaneously developed his ideas—in explicit contrast to those of Booker T. WASHINGTON—of the need for an educated, “Talented Tenth” of black leaders. Between 1905 and 1920 Du Bois focused on political concerns, forming first the Niagara Movement and then the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) to advocate for political and legal equality. Between 1920 and 1940 he turned to literary and historical pursuits, working both alongside the pioneers of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE and on his own academic projects at Atlanta University. And from 1940 until his death he dedicated his efforts to Pan-African causes, eventually expatriating to Ghana, where he died.

Each phase of Du Bois’s life produced major literary efforts. In the first stage of his career, he wrote THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK (1903), a pioneering work of American sociology. As his focus turned to politics, he founded THE CRISIS (1910), a weekly magazine affiliated with the NAACP for which he served as editor for the next quarter century. As an early member of the Harlem Renaissance he contributed both the climactic essay for Alain LOCKE’s collection The New Negro (1925) and two historical novels, Darkwater (1920) and Dark Princess (1928); his academic historical work yielded the seminal Black Reconstruction (1935) and Black Folk, Then and Now (1939). In his Pan-African phase, he published Dusk of Dawn (1940), Color and Democracy (1945), and The World and Africa (1947). At his death he was working on a memoir, published posthumously as The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of Its First Century (1968).

Du Bois’s central importance to African American history, literature, philosophy, and politics has never been in doubt. His works across a wide variety of genres and disciplines remain seminal; no account of American sociology, history, or political writing can ignore Du Bois’s contributions. In recent years his underappreciated historical novels have received new attention as well.

—Ben Railton

Principal Books by Du Bois

The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade to the United States of America, 1638–1870. New York & London: Longmans, Green, 1896.

Philadelphia Negro: A Social Study. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1899.

The Souls of Black Folk. Chicago: McClurg, 1903.

John Brown. Philadelphia: Jacobs, 1909.

Quest of the Silver Fleece. Chicago: McClurg, 1911.

The Negro. New York: Holt, 1915.

Darkwater: Voices from within the Veil. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1920.

The Gift of Black Folk: Negroes in the Making of America. Boston: Stratford, 1924.

Dark Princess: A Romance. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1928.

Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935); republished as Black Reconstruction in America. Cleveland, Ohio: World, 1964.

Black Folk, Then and Now: An Essay in the History and Sociology of the Negro Race. New York: Holt, 1939.

Dusk of Dawn: An Essay toward an Autobiography of a Race Concept. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1940.

The World and Africa: An Inquiry into the Part Which Africa Has Played in World History. New York: Viking, 1947; enlarged edition, New York: International, 1965.

In Battle for Peace: The Story of My 83rd Birthday. New York: Masses & Mainstream, 1952.

The Ordeal of Mansart. New York: Mainstream, 1957.

Mansart Builds a School. New York: Mainstream, 1959.

Worlds of Color. New York: Mainstream, 1961.

The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of Its First Century, edited by Herbert Aptheker. New York: International Publishers, 1968.

Against Racism: Unpublished Essays, Papers, Addresses, 1887–1961 by W. E. B. Du Bois, edited by Herbert Aptheker. Amherst & London: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

Creative Writings by W. E. B. Du Bois: A Pageant, Poems, Short Stories, and Playlets, edited by Aptheker. White Plains, N.Y.: Kraus-Thomson Organization, 1985.

Newspaper Columns by W. E. B. Du Bois, edited by Aptheker. White Plains, N.Y.: Kraus-Thomson Organization, 1986.

W. E. B. Du Bois: The Crisis Writings, edited by Daniel Walden. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1972.

W. E. B. Du Bois Speaks: Speeches and Addresses, edited by Philip S. Foner. New York: Pathfinder Press, 1970).

The Complete Published Works of W. E. B. Du Bois, 32 volumes, edited by Aptheker. Millwood, N.Y.: Kraus Thomson, 1973–1986).

Studying W. E. B. Du Bois

W.E.B. Du Bois is a central figure in the social and cultural history of blacks both in America and throughout the world. As a founder of the NAACP, he pioneered the Civil Rights Movement; as the editor of The Crisis magazine, he affected the cultural awareness of his people; as an early leader of the Pan-African movement, he spread his ideas about racial and class identity internationally. Du Bois may be studied as a sociologist, as a statesman, as a historian, and as a literary figure. The emphasis here is on his work in literature.

The Complete Published Works of W. E. B. Du Bois, edited by Herbert Aptheker, is available in thirty-two volumes (Millwood, N.Y.: Thomson Kraus, 1973–1986), and will serve students' needs regarding primary work; within that collection the volume most interesting to literature students is Aptheker's Creative Writings by W. E. B. Du Bois: A Pageant, Poems, Short Stories, and Playlets (Millwood, N.Y.: Thomson Kraus, 1985). The fourteen essays collected in The Souls of Black Folks (1901), Du Bois's most famous work, provides a solid introduction to his thought about history, sociology and moral philosophy, in addition to his attitude toward literature and music. Students should also familiarize themselves with The Crisis magazine, which Du Bois edited from 1910 to 1934. His writings for the magazine are collected in W. E. B. Du Bois: The Crisis Writings, edited by Daniel Walden (Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1972), as well as in The Complete Published Works (The Library of America collection). Writings (1986), edited by Nathan I. Huggins, is a good one-volume anthology of Du Bois's most important works. It includes The Suppression of the African Slave-Trade, The Souls of Black Folk, Dusk of Dawn, essays, and articles from The Crisis.

Aptheker edited The Autobiography of W. E. B. Du Bois: A Soliloquy on Viewing My Life from the Last Decade of Its First Century (New York: International Publishers, 1968). The standard biographies are David Levering Lewis's W. E. B. Du Bois: Biography of a Race, 1868–1919 (New York: Holt, 1993), and Lewis's W. E. B. Du Bois: The Fight for Equality and the American Century 1919–1963 (New York: Holt, 2000). Aptheker also edited The Correspondence of W. E. B. Du Bois (3 volumes, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1973–1978), which may interest students who want to conduct their own biographical research.

As part of the Complete Published Works, Aptheker published Annotated Bibliography of the Published Writings of W. E. B. Du Bois (1973). Paul Partington self-published a primary bibliography and a supplement based on his examination of the Du Bois papers at the University of Massachusetts, but they are not always findable, and the Aptheker bibliography is adequate on its own. A good checklist of secondary sources is available at <<http://www.duboisweb.org/books.html>> (viewed August 30, 2007).

The place to begin reading about Du Bois and his work is Arnold Rampersad's The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976). Rampersad is reliable and accessible. Students seeking a quick introduction might start with Manning Marable's W. E. B. Du Bois: Black Radical Democrat (Boston: Twayne, 1986). Keith E. Byerman's Seizing the Work: History, Art, and Self in the Work of W. E. B. Du Bois (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1994); Adolph L. Reed Jr.'s W. E. B. Du Bois and American Political Thought: Fabianism and the Color Line (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997) and Shamoon Zamir's Dark Voices: W. E. B. Du Bois and American Thought, 1888–1903 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995) are also valuable. Byerman will be most interesting to the literature student.

Dunbar-Nelson, Alice Moore (1875–1935) poet, short-story writer, journalist

Of white, black, and Indian ancestry, Dunbar-Nelson was born Alice Ruth Moore in New Orleans. After graduating from a teachers' training program at Straight University (1890–1892), she began her teaching career in New Orleans. She later taught at public schools in Brooklyn and at Howard High School in Wilmington, Delaware (1902–1920). She continued her formal education at Cornell University, where she earned an M.A.

An early poem, which was published with her picture in the Monthly Review, interested Paul Laurence Dunbar, an established poet who in 1897 initiated a correspondence. He became her first husband (1898–1902). Her third and final husband was Robert J. Nelson, a journalist, politician, and civil rights activist, whom she married in 1916. Although Dunbar-Nelson had always been involved in social, political, and cultural organizations, in the last twenty years of her life she became extremely active in Delaware and regional politics, as well as in the emerging civil rights and women's suffrage movements.

Dunbar-Nelson's first book, Violets and Other Tales (1895), a collection of short stories and poems, demonstrates her skill in rendering the language, setting, and pathos of New Orleans life at the turn of the century. Her second collection, The Goodness of St. Rocque and Other Stories (1899), was published to accompany a special edition of Paul Laurence Dunbar's Poems of Cabin and Field. Her stories focus on the New Orleans Creole culture, while her husband's work centers on traditional southern plantation life. Reminiscent of the Creole studies of George Washington Cable and Kate Chopin, The Goodness of St. Rocque and Other Stories helped to establish Dunbar-Nelson as a southern local colorist.

In 1914 Dunbar-Nelson edited the anthology Masterpieces of Negro Eloquence. For the next fifteen years she published work chiefly in periodicals. Her one-act play Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory, which appeared in THE CRISIS in April 1918, examines the loyalty the African American owes to a nation that offers no loyalty to him. Dunbar-Nelson's life and career during this period are documented in detail in her diaries, edited by Gloria Hull and published as Give Us Each Day: The Diary of Alice Dunbar-Nelson (1984).

Sources

Brown-Guillory, Elizabeth. Their Place on the Stage: Black Women Playwrights in America. New York: Praeger Press, 1988.

Hull, Gloria T. Color, Sex and Poetry: Three Women Writers of the Harlem Renaissance. Indiana: Indiana University Press, 1987.

—Patricia A. Young

Dunne, Finley Peter (1867–1936) journalist

Finley Peter Dunne is best known for his creation of the character “Mr. Dooley,” an Irish saloon keeper whose witty commentary on contemporary events proved to be exceedingly popular. The character first appeared in the Chicago Evening Post in 1893. Over his career Dunne wrote more than seven hundred Mr. Dooley pieces, which were collected in eight volumes, beginning with Mr. Dooley in Peace and in War (1898). The last collection Dunne published in his lifetime was Mr. Dooley on Making a Will (1919). Several more collections, including Mr. Dooley and the Chicago Irish, edited by Charles Fanning (1976), have been published posthumously.

Source

Eckley, Grace. Finley Peter Dunne. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Dædalus (1955– ) periodical

Dædalus is the official journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Founded in 1780, the Academy includes among its members leading contributors to the arts, sciences, and humanities. Dædalus was first established in 1955 and became a quarterly in 1958. The journal is currently published by MIT Press.

—Marshall Boswell

Danielewski, Mark Z. (1966– ) novelist

Mark Z. Danielewski is the author of the novel House of Leaves (2000), a horror story of sorts, which uses multiple typefaces, unconventional formatting, and other typographical oddities to dramatize what happens when a news photographer moves into a house whose interior is bigger than its exterior. The book won the Young Lions Fiction Award for 2001. Before writing House of Leaves, Danielewski studied at Yale University and at the University of Southern California School of Cinema-Television, and he worked as a soundman on the documentary motion picture Derrida (2002), a biopic about French theorist Jacques Derrida. Danielewski's second novel, Only Revolutions (2006), tells the story of two teenage lovers, with the male's version printed on one side of the page and the female's version printed on the other. Only Revolutions was a 2006 finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for fiction.

—Marshall Boswell

Danticat, Edwidge (1969– ) novelist and short-story writer

Born in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, Edwidge Danticat immigrated to the United States at the age of twelve. While her parents urged her to pursue a career in medicine, Danticat instead pursued a career in writing; she received her B.A. degree from Barnard College in 1990 and an M.F.A. from Brown University in 1993. She writes primarily about her experiences as a Haitian in Haiti and in the United States. Her publications, often cited for their lyrical language, include the novels Breath, Eyes, Memory (1994) and The Farming of Bones (1998), and a short-story collection Krik? Krak! (1995), a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD finalist. In addition, Danticat has published short stories in more than twenty-five periodicals. Many of her stories and novels involve complicated mother-daughter relationships and the Haitian tradition of oral storytelling. The Dew Breaker (2004), her third novel, is about a torturer of Haitians under the regime of François "Papa Doc" Duvalier. Behind the Mountains (2002) is an immigrant's coming-of-age novel for children; Anacaona: Golden Flower, Haiti, 1490 (2005) is a novel for children about the European invasion of Haiti from the Haitian point of view.

Sources

Lyons, Bonnie. "An Interview with Edwidge Danticat," Contemporary Literature, 44 (Summer 2003): 183–198.

Samway, Patrick, S. J. "A Homeward Journey: Edwidge Danticat's Fictional Landscapes, Mindscapes, Genescapes, and Sign-scapes in Breath, Eyes, Memory,” Mississippi Quarterly, 57 (Winter 2003–2004): 75–83.

—Amber Shaw

Davenport, Guy (1927–2005) fiction writer, poet, translator, critic, illustrator

Born in Lexington, Kentucky, Guy Davenport received his B.A. at Duke University in 1948, his B.Litt at Merton College, Oxford, in 1950 as a Rhodes Scholar, and his Ph.D. at Harvard in 1961. He taught at Washington University and Haverford College before returning to Lexington to teach at the University of Kentucky from 1963 until his retirement in 1992. Respected for his erudition and the breadth of his interests, Davenport's first works were translations of ancient Greek texts and poetry. He is best known for his thirteen volumes of short stories, distinguished by their extreme Modernist techniques, their precise craftsmanship, and their learned expression of philosophical themes. His first collection was Taitlin! (1974), six stories reflecting the influence of Ezra Pound and James Joyce. His trilogy, Apples and Pears and Other Stories (1984), The Jules Verne Steam Balloon (1987), and a long story in The Drummer of the Eleventh North Devonshire Fusilliers (1990) is based on the theories of utopian sociologist Charles Fourier, a primary influence on his work.

Source

Meanor, Patrick. “Guy Davenport,” in Critical Survey of Short Fiction, rev. ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Salem Press, 1993, pp. 678–689.

Davis, Lydia (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer, translator

Highly regarded in academic circles for her translations of works by such challenging French writers as Maurice Blanchot and Marcel Proust, Lydia Davis is also recognized as a writer of sparse, lyrical fiction. Born in Northampton, Massachusetts, to two published writers, Robert Gorham Davis and Hope Gale Davis, Lydia Davis was educated at Barnard College (B.A. 1970). Although she had been publishing her fiction with small presses since the mid 1970s, her first major work with a national press was the short-story collection Break It Down (1986), which consists of short, oblique sketches, some less than a page long. The book was a finalist for the PEN/Hemingway Foundation Award for first fiction. Critics have sometimes applied the term “minimalist” to her work, even though her approach owes less to the working-class realism of Raymond CARVER or Bobbie Ann MASON than to the experimental work of such European writers such as Alain Robbe-Grillet and Samuel Beckett. Her other works include the novel The End of the Story (1995), a poetic recollection of a failed relationship, and the short-story collections Almost No Memory (1997) and Samuel Johnson Is Indignant (2002). In 2003 she was chosen as a MacArthur Fellow. Her seventh story collection, Varieties of Disturbance, was published in 2007.

Sources

Knight, Christopher J. “An Interview with Lydia Davis,” Contemporary Literature, 40 (Winter 1999): 525–551.

Perloff, Marjorie. “Fiction as Language Game: The Hermeneutic Parables of Lydia Davis and Maxine Chernoff,” in Breaking the Sequence: Women's Experimental Fiction, edited by Ellen G. Friedman and Miriam Fuchs. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1989, pp. 199–214.

—Marshall Boswell

Death of a Salesman by Arthur Miller (produced 1949) play

ARTHUR MILLER's most popular play is about Willy Loman, a traveling salesman who has decided to end his life. Willy is a failure who has invested his hope in his older son, Biff, a high-school football hero who has wasted his opportunities. Willy's wife, Linda, stands by him but realizes that Willy is tired. At the age of sixty-three Willy loses his job, and Biff comes home for a visit. Father and son are estranged: Biff once saw his father at a hotel in an adulterous situation, and this shattered his idealized image of his father. Willy's younger son, Happy, pretends to believe the family myth that Biff will be a success; he thinks of himself, as Willy likes to say, as “well liked.” Willy ultimately realizes that his life has been based on an illusion. He kills himself, hoping that his insurance policy will take care of his wife and give his sons a new start.

Critics have argued whether Willy, who does not articulate his understanding of his failure, merits the term “tragic.” In his essay, “Tragedy and the Common Man” (1949), Miller argued that modern drama need not have a great hero for its tragic figure. Miller's careful crafting of character and his expert blending of realistic social drama with scenes that reflect Willy's confused and grandiose consciousness attracted the praise of critics and the support of theater audiences. The original production of Death of a Salesman ran for 742 performances. It was made into a motion picture, adapted for television, and has been revived as a play many times.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1988.

Marino, Stephen A., ed. “The Salesman Has a Birthday”: Essays Celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2000.

Miller, Arthur. Death of a Salesman. New York: Viking, 1949.

Weales, Gerald, ed. Arthur Miller: Death of a Salesman, Text and Criticism. New York: Viking, 1967.

Deconstruction

The term deconstruction refers to a specific practice of reading in which the critic discloses buried, competing—even contradictory—meanings latent within a text. Deconstruction draws its inspiration primarily from the work of French theorist Jacques Derrida, who, in his essays from the late 1960s and early 1970s, sought to discount the notion that philosophical and literary works contain some single, inherent meaning, and that this meaning refers directly to something that exists in the world. Derrida showed how philosophical texts in particular unavoidably refer back to previous texts, such that “il n’y a rien hors du texte” (there is nothing except the text). Derrida argued that language should be viewed as a self-contained system of signs that achieve signification via an endless network of subjective renderings that sometimes are in opposition to one another. Deconstructionist readings tease out these implied oppositions, as well as trace elements of past texts, double meanings, cultural codes, and other linguistic difficulties. It is also customary in deconstructive practice to apply these same interpretive assumptions back onto the analysis itself.

Sources

Culler, Jonathan. On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1982.

Joseph, Jonathan, and John Michael Roberts. Realism, Discourse, and Deconstruction. London & New York: Routledge, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Delany, Samuel R. (1942– ) novelist, short-story writer, critic, memoirist

Along with J. G. Ballard and Roger Zelazny, Samuel Ray Delany is one of the leading figures of the 1960s “New Wave” of science-fiction writers who sought to incorporate literary conventions, mythic archetypes, and other high-cultural aesthetic devices into their otherworldly tales. A gay African American writer with an academic’s penchant for theoretical speculation, Delany has also attracted the attention of literary critics who have analyzed his work for its treatment of such issues as race, gender, and language. He was born in Harlem in 1943, attended City College of New York, and spent his twenties working as a musician and singer in Greenwich Village before trying his hand at writing. His first major work was the Fall of the Towers trilogy, which consists of the novels Captives to the Flame (1963), The Towers of Toron (1964), and City of a Thousand Suns (1965). Babel-17 (1966), winner of the Nebula Award, first introduced readers to Delany’s interest in language and semiotics, a preoccupation that continued in The Einstein Intersection (1967), yet another Nebula Award winner. His experimental novel Dhalgren (1975)—a mixture of poetry, surrealism, and high adventure—is regarded by many critics as his most substantial work to date. Delany’s work has grown increasingly sexual and controversial—his pornographic novel Hogg (1994), for instance, was written twenty years before it was published, and his novella Phalos (2004) imagines an anonymous gay pornographic novel written in 1969 and examines the impulse toward integrating pleasure into one’s day-to-day life. His essays and criticism have helped make him a respected figure among critics of contemporary experimental writing.

Sources

Tucker, Jeffrey Allan. A Sense of Wonder: Samuel R. Delany, Race, Identity, and Difference. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 2004.

Sallis, James, ed. Ash of Stars: On the Writing of Samuel R. Delany. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

—Marshall Boswell

DeLillo, Don (1936– ) novelist, playwright

Do you know why I believe in the novel? It's a democratic shout. Anybody can write a great novel, one great novel, almost any amateur off the street. . . . Some nameless drudge, some desperado with barely a nurtured dream can sit down and find his voice and luck out and do it. Something so angelic it makes your jaw hang open.

—Mao II (1991)

Don DeLillo has risen through the ranks during the last thirty years to achieve recognition as one of the leading writers of Postmodern American fiction (see POSTMODERNISM). He was born in the Bronx to Italian immigrant parents. His father was an auditor for the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. The first literary work that made an impact on Don DeLillo was James T. Farrell’s Studs Lonigan trilogy, which, he has said, showed him that his own life, “or something like it, could be the subject of a writer’s scrutiny. This was an amazing thing to discover.” DeLillo graduated from Fordham University in 1958, though he has insisted that his college studies made less of an impact upon him than did New York City itself and the movies of Frederic Fellini and Jean-Luc Godard. After a brief stint as an advertising copywriter, DeLillo quit his job for good in 1965 and began writing fiction while working as a writer-for-hire to make ends meet. His first novel, Americana, appeared in 1971 and was followed by End Zone (1972) and Great Jones Street (1973). These three novels comprise an informal trilogy in which DeLillo dissects contemporary experience via three separate mediative modes: Americana explores the country through a traveling television executive; End Zone uses college football to explicate America's obsession with violence and order; and Great Jones Street examines the excesses and mysteries of fame via its hero—a reclusive, drug-addled rock star named Bucky Wunderlick.

Don DeLillo

In Ratner's Star (1976), DeLillo turned his attention to scientific discourse. Billy Twillig—the hero of this formidable, though uneven, novel—is a fourteen-year-old math prodigy who joins a group of baffled scientists in an underground compound as they seek to communicate with beings from outer space. A satire of both science and science fiction, the book is also a serious inquiry into language and the uses and abuses of scientific inquiry.

The three novels that followed Ratner's Star inaugurate a fresh interest in violence and terrorism while also emphasizing DeLillo's metafictional tendencies (see METAFIC-TION). The Players (1977), a novel about disillusioned, wealthy New Yorkers who become entranced with revolutionary violence, begins with a prologue in which the main characters are made to watch a silent movie. The main character of The Names (1982) is an emotionally arid “risk analyst” living in Greece who gets caught up in a “language cult” whose members appear to have been guilty of a series of ritualistic murders.

In 1985 DeLillo published his eighth and most successful novel, White Noise, a satire of suburban ennui, which earned him the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. This novel remains his most accessible and entertaining work. A mordant parody of both campus and suburban novels, it is the story of Jack Gladney, a Hitler scholar, and his super-modern family as they negotiate their way through brand-name consumer culture and the ominous presence of something vaguely referred to as an Airborne Toxic Event. In White Noise DeLillo discloses the dread and anxiety that lie beneath the seamless surface of contemporary life.

DeLillo took on as the subject for his ninth novel, Libra (1988), Lee Harvey Oswald's assassination of John F. Kennedy. The book mixes fact and fiction to propose a counternarrative to the official “single-bullet” theory. It was followed by Mao II (1991), with a similarly bold premise: a famously reclusive novelist named Bill Gray decides to come out of hiding, at the risk of undermining the aura of mystery that has arisen since his disappearance. DeLillo spent six years writing his next novel—the longest period between books in his career—and the result was the COLD WAR epic Underworld (1997), his most ambitious work. The novel begins in the stands of the final pennant game between the Giants and the Dodgers in 1951, when J. Edgar Hoover, Jackie Gleason, and Frank Sinatra share a box amid news that the Soviet Union has successfully detonated its second atomic bomb. Since this publication DeLillo has published two novellas, The Body Artist (2001) and Cosmopolis (2003). Falling Man (2007) deals with the effects of the 9/11 terrorists attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by DeLillo

- Americana*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1971.
- End Zone*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972.
- Great Jones Street*. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1973.
- Ratner's Star*. New York: Knopf, 1976.
- Players*. New York: Knopf, 1977.
- Running Dog*. New York: Knopf, 1978.
- Amazonas*, as Cleo Birdwell. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1980.
- The Names*. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- White Noise*. New York: Viking, 1985.
- The Day Room*. New York: Knopf, 1987.

Dust jacket for DeLillo's 1988 novel, which won the Irish Times International Fiction Prize

Libra. New York: Viking, 1988.

Mao II. New York: Viking, 1991.

Underworld. New York: Scribners, 1997.

The Body Artist. New York: Scribners, 2001.

Cosmopolis. New York: Scribners, 2003.

Falling Man. New York: Scribners, 2007.

Studying Don DeLillo

The Viking Critical Edition of White Noise (New York: Penguin, 1998), edited by Mark Osteen, remains the best starting point for approaching the fiction of Don DeLillo. This edition offers a wealth of critical essays from some of the leading DeLillo scholars that place White Noise in the context of DeLillo's other works (earlier and later) as well as contemporary American culture. Leonard Orr's White Noise: A Reader's Guide (New York: Continuum, 2003) offers an especially accessible companion to the novel that draws together many of the same scholars in a straightforward analysis of the major characters, themes, and symbols of the novel (such as the technical term "white noise") as well as its critical reception. The introduction to A Reader's Guide contains useful biographical information, and it also concisely summarizes DeLillo's other novels. Approaches to Teaching DeLillo's White Noise, edited by John N. Duvall and Tom Engles (New York: MLA, 2006), is a comprehensive collection of interpretations and writings especially designed for teachers and students. Don DeLillo's White Noise, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003), is a useful collection of critical essays.

DeLillo's thematic use of waste, commercialism, art, and religion in White Noise led directly to the novel many regard as his masterpiece, Underworld. Underworlds, edited by Joseph Dewey, Steven G. Kellman, and Irving Malin (Newark: University of Delaware, 2002), collects essays on the novel. For further help on Underworld, students might also consult Duvall's Underworld: A Reader's Guide (New York: Continuum, 2002).

Language and communication are key aspects of DeLillo's work, and while most scholars nod to the presence and importance of this element, Tom LeClair's In the Loop:

The pain made it hard for him to sleep and this stretched and deepened time, gave it ~~ax~~ a consciousness, an ~~Old Testament mind, as of the~~ ~~the stubborn~~ cruelty of the Old God.

a quality of ~~mind~~
and pervasive presence, stubborn ~~XXXXXXXXXX~~
an ~~XXXXXX~~ all-seeingness, as of the Old God who on the ~~slayer~~

is present.
X ~~potential~~

flee the world

a ingenuity of movement.

as if some god in an old myth who weddles takes too broad an interest in

Dust jacket for DeLillo's 1997 novel, which was named one of the best works of American fiction of the past twenty-five years in a May 2006 poll conducted by The New York Times Book Review. The jacket was thought by some observers to foreshadow the destruction of the World Trade Center on 9/11/2001.

Don DeLillo and the Systems Novel (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987), David Cowart's The Physics of Language (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2002), and Joseph Dewey's Beyond Grief and Nothing (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2006) devote the most sustained attention to its significance across the DeLillo cannon. In Balance at the Edge of Belief (New York: Peter Lang, 2004), Jesse Kavadlo applies to DeLillo's work an interpretative scheme similar to Dewey's, informed by Postmodern theory. These two critical works might aid students best as critical introductions before consulting more complicated books by Osteen, LeClair, and Cowart.

—Student Guide by Brian Ray

Deliverance by James Dickey (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1970) novel

Deliverance is a story of stark violence set in the vanishing wilderness of the American South in the 1960s. James DICKEY, who had already established himself as a major poet, drew upon his experiences as an outdoorsman for his first novel. The story concerns four suburbanites from Atlanta who undertake a canoe trip down the fictional Cahulawassee River (based on the Chattooga River). Ed Gentry, the narrator, joins two friends and a charismatic, experienced outdoorsman named Lewis Medlock, who is determined to turn the trip into "A lesson. A moral. A life principle. A Way." A novel of initiation that dramatizes the obdurate claims of nature as well as the potential of even the most civilized to tap into the wilderness within, Deliverance was a best-selling novel. It was made into a motion picture in 1972.

Source

Baughman, Ronald. Understanding James Dickey. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1985.

—Marshall Boswell

Detective Fiction

By the end of WORLD WAR II, the hard-boiled revolution in mystery and detective fiction, led by Dashiell Hammett and associated with the writers of the pulp magazine Black Mask, had transformed mystery fiction. The more or less elegant word puzzles involving isolated incidents of violence committed among refined people that had characterized the book-length mystery before about 1920 were increasingly giving way to gritty, realistic portrayals of crime as it occurred. Hammett's last novel, The Thin Man, had been published in 1934; Raymond Chandler, who led the second generation of hard-boiled novelists, had published his first novel featuring Phillip Marlowe, The Big Sleep, in 1939. Ross MACDONALD with his series on detective Lew Archer, always conscious of the psychological implications of his cases, and John D. MacDonald with his Travis McGee series, exploring the sociological implications of his, followed closely in Chandler's wake. Hammett had, by example, provided a definition of hard-boiled detective fiction. He concentrated on describing the world his detectives saw and their approach to it. Chandler, Macdonald, and MacDonald were the most prominent of those who concentrated on the psychological and sociological complexities of their detectives; they approached their work with literary sophistication and a conscious attention to style. In the hands of these skilled writers the detective novel achieved with increasing regularity the goal Hammett declared for The Maltese Falcon, his third novel, in 1930: it became literature—sometimes.

The action story about crime still attracted a large and loyal readership not necessarily demanding of literary quality, and that readership was served by writers who produced novels at a breakneck pace, often adopting one or more pseudonyms. The introduction of the cheaply produced and cheaply priced paperback books after World War II provided an easy market for writers who had formerly published in pulp magazines. Erle Stanley Gardner, who began his career as a hard-boiled story writer and editor at Black Mask, introduced his series character Perry Mason in 1933 and published one or two Mason novels a year, in addition to other series, for the next forty years. At the end of his life he claimed that more than 200 million copies of his books had been sold. Rex Stout published 72 novels featuring detective Nero Wolfe over a forty-year period beginning in the mid 1930s. Mickey Spillane's first book, I, The Jury (1946), though widely maligned for its comic-book-style writing and gratuitous sex and violence, sold 140 million copies over the years and was called the most widely translated book in the world by the time of Spillane's death sixty years later. John Dickson Carr, whose first novel was published in 1930, published 70 novels before his death in 1977. The writing team of cousins Frederic Dannay and Manfred B. Lee, who called themselves Ellery Queen and whose first novel, The Roman Hat, was published in 1929, continued to write popular novels into the early 1970s, but their primary influence was to encourage the mystery short story, which had a reduced market due to the decline of pulp magazines beginning in the 1930s. Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine and the frequent book collections of stories edited by Ellery Queen served as dependable providers of good mystery stories.

Beginning in the 1930s the popularity of mystery fiction was augmented by the adaptation of popular series characters to radio dramas. In the 1940s Hammett's Sam Spade, a character based on Nick Charles called The Thin Man, and Chandler's Phillip Marlowe were the subjects of popular radio shows, as was Stout's Nero Wolfe and Ellery Queen, among many others. There were more than eighty detective serials on radio during the decade. During the 1950s and 1960s there were a like number of television series featuring detectives. These presentations emphasized the dramatic quality of detective fiction, and while most of these popular dramatizations were undistinguished, they encouraged practitioners of the form.

In 1945 mystery writers felt the need to organize. That year in New York City they formed the Mystery Writers of America (MWA), an organization devoted to promoting crime fiction and serving the needs of its writers. At annual conventions, begun in 1947, MWA gives Edgar Awards, named after Edgar Allan Poe, in several categories, including best novel, best short story, and best first novel, which are regarded as the highest honor in the field. By the mid 1970s regional divisions of MWA served the entire country.

By the early 1970s detective fiction was marked by diversity. Black expatriate novelist Chester HINES, whose "Harlem Domestic Series" about the adventures of black detectives working in Harlem were first published during the 1950s in French translations of his English manuscripts and then in American paperbacks, enjoyed a rediscovery after the popular movie Cotton Comes to Harlem (adapted from his 1964 novel) was released in 1970. Tony HILLERMAN in 1970 began publishing his series of crime novels set in the Southwest and featuring Native American detective Joe Leaphorn. Patricia HIGSMITH had paved the way for the introduction of homosexual suspense novels with her Ripley novels, the first of which was The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955). In 1964 Joseph Hansen began his long series of novels featuring gay detective David Brandstetter.

By the mid 1970s a new generation of crime writers mindful of their literary tradition was beginning to publish and to lead the way toward more expansive, less genre-bound, fiction. Joe Gores, whose A Time of Predators (1970) won the first of his three Edgar Awards from the Mystery Writers of America, paid homage to Hammett as his primary influence; Robert B. Parker, who introduced his literary detective Spencer in 1974 and won an Edgar for his fourth novel, Promised Land (1976), regards himself as a literary descendant of Chandler. Joseph Wambaugh, who won an Edgar for his third book, a nonfiction account of a police murder, The Onion Field (1974), is a leading practitioner of the police procedural, a form that traces its roots to the pulps of the late nineteenth century. The detective novel was an anachronistic term by that time, replaced by the crime novel, which had, in the hands of serious writers, shed the conventions that had shaped the form for nearly a century.

—Richard Layman

Dexter, Pete (1943– ) novelist, journalist

Pete Dexter amassed a decade of experience as a journalist and a columnist before turning to fiction—and he did so partly in response to being beaten by angry readers of his column for the Philadelphia Daily News. Not surprisingly, his award-winning fiction is marked by its journalistic detail and violence; but it is notable also for its readability and strong characterization. Dexter was born in Pontiac, Michigan, in 1943 and received his degree in journalism from the University of South Dakota in 1970, after which he went to work as a journalist for the Palm Beach Post (1970–1971), the Philadelphia Daily News (1972–1984), and the Sacramento Bee, where he began working in 1985. His first novel, God's Pocket, appeared in 1984, followed by Deadwood (1986) and Paris Trout (1988), his most successful and important novel to date, which won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. The title character is a vicious, white hardware-store owner and loan shark to the black community, who is accused of murder, for which he shows no remorse. The novel offers a critical portrait of small-town racism in post-WORLD WAR II Georgia. Dexter's other novels include Brotherly Love (1993), The Paperboy (1995)—another commercially successful, violence-prone tale set in the Florida everglades—and Train (2003), a novel about racial politics in Los Angeles during the 1950s. Paper Trails: True Stories of Confusion, Mindless Violence and Forbidden Desires, a Surprising Number of Which Are Not about Marriage (2007) is a collection of his newspaper columns. Dexter has also written screenplays, including one for Paris Trout.

Source

Predmore, Richard. "Ownership in Dexter's Paris Trout," The Southern Quarterly: A Journal of the Arts in the South, 33 (Winter–Spring 1995): 147–150.

—Marshall Boswell

Diaz, Junot (1968– ) short-story writer, novelist

Born in 1968 in the Dominican Republic, Junot Diaz received his B.A. from Rutgers University and his M.F.A. from Cornell University. He achieved widespread acclaim for his short-story collection, Drown (1996), ten tales narrated by poor, young men struggling to define themselves in the Dominican Republic, New York, and New Jersey. Diaz was the only writer chosen as one of Newsweek magazine's "New Faces of 1996." His first novel, The Brief Wondrous Life of Oscar Wao, about an insecure Dominican nerd at a New Jersey high school who falls in love with a classmate he believes to be out of his reach, was published in 2007. Diaz teaches creative writing at M.I.T.

—Marshall Boswell

Dick, Philip K. (1928–1982) novelist

Born in Chicago, Philip K. Dick attended the University of California at Berkeley in 1950. He sold his first science-fiction story in 1951 and by 1953 he had published more than sixty-five additional stories. Dick's work introduced characters who barely managed to survive in environments that undermined their psychological equilibrium. Unlike the typical heroes of science fiction, Dick's characters find existence itself is a dilemma. Dick's important works include The Man in the High Castle (1962), which won a Hugo award in 1963; Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? (1968); Galactic Pot-Healer (1969); and A Scanner Darkly (1977). Blade Runner, a motion picture based on Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? became a cult classic when it was released in 1982. Like much of his work, it explores the difficulty of discriminating between illusion and reality—exemplified in the movie by "skin jobs": artificially created creatures eventually indistinguishable from human beings.

Source

Umland, Samuel J., ed. Philip K. Dick: Contemporary Critical Interpretations. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995.

Dickey, James (1923–1997) poet, novelist

*Up Highway 106, continually
Drunk on the wind in my mouth,
Wringing the handlebar for speed,
Wild to be wreckage forever.*

—"Cherrylog Road" (1964)

James Dickey was born and raised in Atlanta and though his poems and novels deal with the universal experiences of men facing the elemental forces of nature, he remains closely identified with the South where he lived most of his life. Dickey left Clemson University in 1942 after one semester to enter the Army Air Corps. He served as a radar observer in a night-fighter squadron in the Pacific Theater, where his experiences later provided material for poems and two novels. After the war he studied at Vanderbilt where he received a B.A. (1949) and M.A. (1950). Dickey taught at Rice Institute from 1950 to 1954, with an interruption for a second tour of military service. From 1956 to 1960, he worked in advertising and began to establish himself as a poet. His first book of poems, Into the Stone (1960) led him to resign his job and devote himself to poetry, publishing three books of poems in the next four years, culminating with Buckdancer's Choice (1965) which won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1966. He taught at various institutions before coming to the University of South Carolina, where he remained from 1968 until his death. Among his many honors were service as Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress (1966–1968), and a commission to write a poem for the inauguration of Jimmy Carter ("The Strength of Fields").

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, Dickey established himself as a kind of Hemingway of poetry, comparable in visibility and self-promotion to Norman MAILER. His best poems cover a wide range of experience, from youthful exuberance ("Cherrylog Road") to war ("The Firebombing," "The Performance") to identification with creatures of the wild ("The Heaven of Animals," "The Sheep Child," "For the Last Wolverine") to majestic monologues in the mouths of troubled women ("Falling," "May Day Sermon"). Throughout his career, Dickey aimed to "keep it new" by experimenting with techniques like the "split-line" and "walls-of-words" that would exhibit vitality or orchestrate the rhythms by which his poems should be read. He enjoyed great success in volumes like Drowning with Others (1962) and Helmets (1964), and his poetic reputation is secure on the basis of Poems 1957–1967 (1967).

Dickey's permanent place in American culture is based on his novel Deliverance. The movie (and Dickey's appearance in it), propelled him to a level of celebrity from which his subsequent literary work never recovered. A second novel, as long and complex as Deliverance, was short and direct, Alnilam (1987), dealt with a blind father searching for his son and was neither a critical nor commercial success. His last novel, To the White Sea (1993), the story of a lone American soldier escaping Japan in the midst of the war, enjoyed modest success. Early in his career, Dickey was a frequent essayist (The Suspect in Poetry [1964]) and reviewer (Babel to Byzantium [1968]).

Sources

Baughman, Judith, ed. James Dickey: An Illustrated Chronicle. Dictionary of Literary Biography, Documentary Series, volume 19. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1999.

Baughman, Ronald. Understanding James Dickey. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1985.

Hart, Henry. James Dickey: The World as a Lie. New York: Picador, 2000.

Kirschten, Robert, ed. "Struggling for Wings": The Art of James Dickey. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

—Ward Briggs

Didion, Joan (1934– ) journalist, essayist, novelist, screenwriter

In many ways writing is the act of saying I, of imposing oneself upon other people, of saying listen to me, see it my way, change your mind.

—"Why I Write" (1975)

Joan Didion was born in Sacramento, California, and attended C. K. McClatchy Senior High School. In 1956 she graduated from the University of California at Berkeley with a B.A. in English. She won the Priz de Paris in a competition sponsored by Vogue magazine for college seniors and moved to New York where she worked at Vogue in several capacities, including senior features editor, and wrote movie reviews for Vogue, Mademoiselle, and other magazines.

Didion's traditional novel Run River (1963) was a regionalist interpretation of California and the American West. Didion married the writer John Gregory DUNNE in 1964; the couple lived in Los Angeles for over two decades before returning to New York in 1988. Working in concert on many projects, Didion and Dunne alternated on the writing of a monthly column called "Points West" that was published by Esquire in the 1970s. They also collaborated on several screenplays, most notably The Panic in Needle Park, a gritty 1971 movie focusing on drug addiction in New York's Sherman Park. Didion and Dunne adopted a daughter, Quintana Roo, named after a state in Mexico, in 1966; she is featured in both of her parents' journalism of the period, especially in the personal essays in Didion's Slouching Towards Bethlehem (1968).

Play It as It Lays (1970) became a minor classic, celebrated for its portrayal of anomie in the self-destructive lives of a Hollywood starlet and her associates. A deliberately fast read due to its prominent display of white space on the page, Play It as It Lays offered its readers a stylish morality tale narrated by an existentialist heroine. It was followed by A Book of Common Prayer (1977), a complex novel inspired by the radical political movements of the 1970s and connected to Didion's interest in the abduction of the heiress Patricia Hearst in 1974 by the Symbionese Liberation Army. Didion later wrote a sympathetic review of Hearst's laconic memoir. In an essay called "Girl of the Golden West," Didion writes of Hearst: "She was never an idealist, and this pleased no one. She was tainted by survival." In Didion's reading, Hearst becomes a pragmatic survivor in the frontier mold of pioneers who avoided the backward glance in their will to surmount hardships encountered in settling the American West.

Joan Didion

Didion was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis after experiencing episodes of temporary blindness, a trauma she discusses in the essay "The White Album," published in 1979. After Henry (1992) is dedicated to her longtime literary agent, Henry Robbins, who died of a heart attack at fifty-one. Didion has written about her own ancestors, some of whom traveled partway with the Donner-Reed party on their ill-fated overland crossing to California in the 1840s. Her 2003 book, Where I Was From, draws extensively on family diaries, as do the personal essays of Slouching Towards Bethlehem.

Didion's recent work is framed by a succession of personal losses. Where I Was From (2003) is dedicated to her parents and closes with her poignant memories of her mother's and father's deaths. John Gregory Dunne died in December 2003 and Didion's daughter died in August 2005 at the age of thirty-nine. Didion won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Nonfiction in 2005 for The Year of Magical Thinking, a memoir examining her grief at her husband's death and her daughter's critical illness. Reviews of The Year of Magical Thinking have centered on the attending social worker's description of Didion as a "pretty cool customer" in the immediate moments after her husband's death—a survival mechanism that also describes the reactions of her heroines Maria Wyeth of Play It As It Lays, Grace Strasser-Mendana of A Book of Common Prayer, Inez Victor of Democracy (1984), and Elena McMahon of The Last Thing He Wanted (1996)—suggesting a coherence and consistency to Joan Didion's work and preoccupations over the past forty years.

Didion is often classed with the New Journalists (see NEW JOURNALISM) of the 1960s, a nonaffiliated group of writers who emphasized the necessary subjectivity of their reporting. Her first collection of essays, Slouching Towards Bethlehem, included incisive portraits of the Haight-Ashbury hippies in San Francisco, an account of a murder trial in San Bernardino County that seemed to be drawn from the plots of James M. Cain noir novels, and several personal essays on Didion's relation to her family, her family's frontier history, and her ambivalent fascination with New York and Sacramento. Her work is influenced by several writers she admires, among them Henry James and George Orwell; her stylistic debts to Ernest Hemingway's spare sentence are well known, but her recent nonfiction owes much to James's opaque style in his later novels. Didion's reputation is primarily as the writer of two important and influential collections of essays, each the register of a particular decade of American culture: Slouching Towards Bethlehem reports on the 1960s, The White Album on the 1970s. She is also a novelist of some repute. Her novels range from realist to Postmodernist in their technique, and have become progressively more skeptical in their relation to narrative. "You see the shards of the novel I am no longer writing, the island, the family, the situation. I lost patience with it. I lost nerve," the narrator, Joan Didion, admits about the book she is struggling to write in Democracy: "I am resisting narrative here." The stance is consistent with her focus on image rather than on narrative in the collage-style title essay of The White Album. Her most recent work has focused on an exploration of the ideological underpinnings of narrative. Where I Was From (2003) is a revisionist study of the persistent mythologizing of California's history by such writers as Jack London, Frank Norris, and Didion herself, culminating in a skeptical reading of the romantic narrative of her elegiac first novel, Run River. The author of five novels and eight nonfiction books, Didion is a frequent contributor to The New York Review of Books and The New Yorker.

—Jennifer Brady

Dust jacket for Didion's second novel, 1970, which earned a National Book Award nomination

Principal Books by Didion

Run River. New York: Obolensky, 1963.

Slouching Towards Bethlehem. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1968.

Play It As It Lays. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1970.

A Book of Common Prayer. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1977.

Telling Stories. Berkeley, Calif.: Bancroft Library, 1978.

The White Album. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979.

Salvador. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1982.

Democracy. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.

Miami. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1987.

After Henry. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.

The Last Thing He Wanted. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Political Fictions. New York: Knopf, 2001.

Where I Was From. New York: Knopf, 2003.

"I can't seem to tell what you do get the real points for," Charlotte said. ~~"I mean I seem to miss getting them."~~

~~"So what."~~

"So what." So I guess I'll stick around here a while."

And when his plane was cleared to leave she had walked out to the gate with him and he had said again don't you want to see Marin and she had said I don't have to see Marin because I have Marin in my mind and Marin has me in her mind and they closed the gate and that was the last time Leonard Douglas ever saw Charlotte, alive.
~~The last time I ever saw Charlotte was the night two weeks later~~
~~when she pinned the gardenia on my dress and dabbed the Gres perfume~~
~~on my wrists like a child helping her mother dress for a party.~~

VICKY: — SPACE BREAK —

IP The last time I ever saw Charlotte alive was the night two weeks later when I left for New Orleans.

IP When she pinned her gardenia on my dress.

IP When she dabbed her Gres perfume on my wrists.

IP Like a child helping her mother dress for a party.

Fixed Ideas: America since 9.11. New York: New York Review of Books, 2003.

Vintage Didion. New York: Vintage Books, 2004.

The Year of Magical Thinking. New York: Knopf, 2005.

We Tell Ourselves Stories in Order to Live: Collected Nonfiction. New York: Knopf, 2006.

Studying Joan Didion

The Everyman's Library collection of her nonfiction, We Tell Ourselves Stories in Order to Live (2006), includes Joan Didion's important early works. Her award-winning The Year of Magical Thinking (2006), a meditation on the deaths of her husband and daughter, is not included in the Everyman collection and is a necessary element in her canon. Her novels are available in separate editions. No book-length biography of Didion exists; however, Joan Didion: Essays and Conversations, edited by Ellen G. Freidman (Princeton, N. J.: Ontario Review Press, 1984), collects three interviews and an essay by Didion as well as critical responses from academic scholars. Though it focuses mainly on Didion's fiction, this book provides insight into Didion's creative process and her personal life.

The Critical Response to Joan Didion, edited by Sharon Felton (Westport, Conn: Greenwood, 1994), provides reviews of her books and offers scholarly examinations of Didion's foundational works including her nonfiction, novels, and journalism. Katherine Usher Henderson's Joan Didion (New York: Ungar, 1981) and Mark Roydon Winchell's Joan Didion (Boston: Twayne, 1989) both connect biography to analysis in order to examine Didion's fiction and nonfiction through critical surveys of her life and career.

Two books that examine Didion's work within larger frameworks—the first, placing her in the tradition of New Journalism, and the second, examining her place among British and American women writers—include Marc Weingarten's The Gang that Wouldn't Write Straight: Wolfe, Thompson, Didion, and the New Journalism Revolution (New York: Crown, 2006) and Janis Stout's Strategies of Reticence: Silence and Meaning in the Works of Jane Austen, Willa Cather, Katherine Ann Porter, and Joan Didion (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1990). Sandra Braman's chapter in A Sourcebook of American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre, edited by Thomas Connery (New York: Greenwood, 1992), names Didion as a founder of the New Journalism movement.

—Student Guide by Britt Terry

Dillard, Annie (1945–) essayist, novelist, poet

A child wakes up over and over again, and notices that she's living . . . bingo, she feels herself alive. . . . And she notices she is set down here, mysteriously, in a going world.

—"To Fashion a Text" (1987)

Born Ann Doak in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Annie Dillard was educated at Hollins College, where she received a B.A. in 1967 and an M.A. in 1968. She won a Pulitzer Prize for Pilgrim at Tinker Creek (1974), a nonfiction work that evokes the wonder of nature and has been compared to Henry David Thoreau's Walden. Like Thoreau, Dillard is a keen observer of the seasons and natural cycles. Other titles that extend her view of nature and the act of writing about it are Teaching a Stone to Talk (1982), Living by Fiction (1982), and Writing Life (1989). In An American Childhood (1987) she describes her conventional childhood in middle-class urban America. Her novel The Living (1992), is characterized by a philosophical regionalism. She reveals a feeling for the way people interact with the land—in this case, loggers in the Pacific Northwest at the turn of the nineteenth century. She has also written two poetry collections, Tickets for a Prayer Wheel (1974) and Mornings Like This (1995). Her novel The Maytrees was published in 2007.

Source

Johnson, Sandra Humble. The Space Between: Literary Epiphany in the Work of Annie Dillard. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1992.

The Disenchanted by Budd Schulberg (New York: Random House, 1950) novel

Budd Schulberg's third novel introduces the novelist Manley Halliday, teamed with junior writer Shep Stearns to script "Love on Ice," a formulaic romantic comedy that is to be filmed on location at the Dartmouth winter carnival. The novel is freely based on Schulberg's collaboration with F. Scott Fitzgerald, in which the two authors shared misadventures at Dartmouth while working on the motion picture Winter Carnival (1939). The details are accurately drawn from Schulberg's firsthand knowledge of Hollywood where his father, B. P. Schulberg, was head of Paramount Studios from 1925 to 1932. With celebratory champagne as fuel, Halliday's comeback from his literary nadir and Stearns's shot at a bright writing future are derailed. Halliday dies, joining the ghosts of his past, while young Stearns learns of life's disenchantment. The novel was adapted into a Broadway play by the author and Harvey Breit in 1958 and ran for 189 performances. Schulberg's best-seller helped trigger a Fitzgerald revival.

—Michael Edelson

"Diving into the Wreck" by Adrienne Rich (1973) poem

Taken from her 1973 book of the same title, "Diving into the Wreck" is perhaps Adrienne Rich's most famous poem. Having abandoned the taut formal work of her first collections, Rich utilizes a short-lined free-verse structure in this poem that creates a quick and graceful movement. The poem articulates a mythic journey, undertaken to subvert outdated ideas of gender, language, and identity. Using a narrative framework of a scuba diver's descent into the sea, Rich creates a speaker who is exploring waters that are familiar and foreign, dangerous and alluring. The "sundry" items that the diver uses are symbolically resonant: the speaker must put on a "powerful mask"; she must don "awkward flippers" that "cripple" her; she takes a camera to capture a story that is not reliant on language, and a knife, because where she is going is dangerous.

Once immersed in the water, the speaker goes in search of the wreck: "to see the damage that was done / and the treasures that prevail." The shipwreck at the bottom of the ocean demands to be identified with both the masculine and the feminine: once the destructive and limiting ideas about gender—"the wreck"—are transcended, a new understanding of gender identity can be developed.

Sources

Rich, Adrienne. Diving into the Wreck: Poems, 1971–1972. New York: Norton, 1973.

Templeton, Alice. The Dream and the Dialogue: Adrienne Rich's Feminist Poetics. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1994.

—Tod Marshall

Dixon, Stephen (1936– ) short-story writer, novelist

Stephen Dixon is the author of more than twenty books, including a dozen short-story collections culled from approximately five hundred published stories. The son of a dentist and an interior decorator, he was born in Brooklyn in 1936 as Stephen Ditchik; his parents changed his name to Dixon when he was six years old. He earned his B.A. from City College of New York in 1958, and worked for several years as a journalist and an editor before earning his M.F.A. from Stanford University in 1965. Dixon's stories and novels are characterized by their intense interiority and density of detail, as well as by their use of repetition. His male narrators are epic worriers who return over and over again to sites of anxiety, embarrassment, or longing. Frog (1991) is a long, experimental novel woven from novellas, stories, and other fragments that tells the story of Howard Tetch, a petulant, angst-ridden college professor whose life unfolds confusingly via a non-chronological, and sometimes contradictory, series of short episodes. His other major novels are Interstate (1995), Gould: A Novel in Two Novels (1997), 30: Pieces of a Novel (1999), I. (2002), its sequel, End of I. (2006), and Phone Rings (2005). Dixon selected sixty of his best short stories for The Stories of Stephen Dixon (1994).

Source

Klinkowitz, Jerome. "Experimental Realism in Recent American Painting and Fiction," in Representation and Performance in Postmodern Fiction, edited by Maurice Couturier. Montpelier: Université Paul Valéry, 1983, pp. 149–162.

—Marshall Boswell

Doctorow, E. L. (1931– ) novelist

The car's owner was Harry Houdini, the famous escape artist. He was spending the day driving through Westchester. He was thinking of buying some property. . . . He seemed depressed.

—Ragtime (1975)

A native of the Bronx, New York, Edgar Lawrence Doctorow has centered much of his fiction on New York City. After graduating from Kenyon College, Doctorow worked as an editor in New York. In 1960 he published his first novel, Welcome to Hard Times, a parody of the myths that motivate the conventional western; however, Doctorow's novel presents a grim view of America, where justice does not prevail and where heroes do not triumph. Much of Doctorow's fiction presents a subtle appreciation of American beliefs even as it severely challenges the country's faith that its ideals have been put into practice. Because Doctorow writes with great economy and elegance, his work avoids the didactic quality of political novelists and other writers of proletarian literature of the 1930s, although Doctorow is clearly in sympathy with their convictions.

In The Book of Daniel (1971), Doctorow delves directly into American political history, fashioning a mock-memoir of the anti-Communist COLD WAR era, a narrative told by Daniel, the son of a couple executed for treason. This thinly disguised retelling of the deaths of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who were executed in 1953 for their roles in a spy ring that stole atomic secrets for the Soviet Union, also contrasts the leftists of the 1950s with the radicals of the 1960s.

Doctorow achieved great critical and popular acclaim for Ragtime (1975), a re-creation of turn-of-the-twentieth-century America, in which historical figures such as Henry Ford and J. P. Morgan appear alongside fictional creations such as Coalhouse Walker. As in Welcome to Hard Times, Doctorow portrays the American past with great fondness while also exposing grievous faults like racism. His blending of fact and fiction enchanted some readers even as it disturbed others who resented the novelist's manipulation of the historical record. Ragtime won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD in 1976.

World's Fair (1985), a re-creation of New York in 1939 and a memoir of Doctorow's family life, won the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD in 1986. Billy Bathgate (1989), a rollicking re-enactment of the Prohibition era modeled after Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, won the 1990 National Book Critics Circle Award and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. In later novels The Waterworks (1994) and City of God (2000), Doctorow continues to shuttle back and forth between nineteenth-and twentieth-century American history, demonstrating no diminishment in his power to both celebrate and criticize American culture.

Doctorow has also published Lives of the Poets: Six Stories and a Novella (1984); a play, Drinks Before Dinner (produced 1978); and collections of cultural commentary and literary criticism, including Jack London, Hemingway, and the Constitution: Selected Essays, 1977–1992 (1993) and Creationists: Selected Essays 1993–2006 (2006).

Sources

Doctorow, E. L. Conversations with E. L. Doctorow. Edited by Christopher D. Morris. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

Fowler, Douglas. Understanding E. L. Doctorow. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1992.

Donleavy, J. P. (1926– ) novelist

The son of Irish immigrants, James Patrick Donleavy was born in Brooklyn and graduated from prep school before enlisting in the U.S. Naval Reserves during World War II. He studied at Trinity College in Dublin from 1946 to 1949. Donleavy writes with a ribald sensibility that has been compared to that of James Joyce. Like Joyce, Donleavy finds a good deal of comedy in the subject of sex. He has continued to write exuberant prose in A Singular Man (1963), The Beastly Beatitudes of Balthazar B (1968), The Destinies of Darcy Dancer, Gentleman (1977), The Lady Who Liked Clean Rest Rooms: The Chronicle of One of the Strangest Stories Ever to Be Rumoured about around New York (1995), and Wrong Information Is Being Given Out at Princeton (1998). He has also written an autobiography, The History of the Ginger Man (1994). Donleavy became an Irish citizen in 1967 and has spent most of his adult life living in Ireland.

Source

Masinton, Charles G. J. P. Donleavy: The Style of His Sadness and Humor. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1975.

Dorn, Ed (1929–1999) poet

Ed Dorn was born and raised in Villa Grove, Illinois. After attending the University of Illinois and Eastern Illinois University he studied at Black Mountain College from 1951 to 1954, where he came under the influence of Charles OLSON and the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS. He wrote what Olson called “projective verse”: a form of free verse suited to the way the individual poet actually spoke. Dorn’s first published work was What I See in the Maximus Poems (1960), which discussed Olson’s magnum opus.

Dorn is best known for his verse epic Gunslinger (1968–1972), written in four parts. His other poetry collections include The Newly Fallen (1961), Yellow Lola (1981), Captain

Jack’s Chaps (1983), Abhorrences (1984), and High West Rendezvous (1996).

Source

Wesling, Donald, ed. Internal Resistances: The Poetry of Edward Dorn. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.

Douglas, Ellen (1921– ) novelist, short-story writer

Ellen Douglas is the pen name for Josephine Haxton, who was born in 1921 in Natchez, Mississippi. Haxton grew up in various small Southern towns in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas, a background that informs much of her work. Her first novel published as Ellen Douglas, A Family’s Affairs (1961), won the Houghton Mifflin Fellowship, and was quickly followed by a story collection, Black Cloud, White Cloud (1963). Douglas’s other novels—all of which are within the Southern tradition, typified by such writers as Eudora Welty, Peter TAYLOR, and Flannery O’CONNOR—include Apostles of Light (1973), a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD; A Rock Cried Out (1979); and Can’t Quit You, Baby (1988), a richly orchestrated examination of race, womanhood, and storytelling in Mississippi during the 1960s and 1970s. A novel, Where the Dreams Cross, was published in 2000, and a collection of nonfiction essays, Witnessing, in 2004.

Source

Reid, Panthea, ed. Conversations with Ellen Douglas. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

Dove, Rita (1952– ) poet, novelist, short-story writer, playwright

I’ve never been sure what exactly it’s supposed to mean, to be called an African-American poet or a woman poet. I’m a woman, I’m an African-American. My poems often reflect those two aspects of myself.

—Interview (1995)

Born in Akron, Ohio, Rita Dove graduated summa cum laude in 1973 from Miami University in Ohio and then held a Fulbright scholarship at the University of Tübingen in West Germany. In 1977 she published Ten Poems, and in 1980 The Only Dark Spot in the Sky and The Yellow House on the Corner. Dove’s highly structured and disciplined poetry has been compared to the work of Gwendolyn Brooks. Although Dove often deals with race and the history of slavery, she also addresses the fate of women and her own family history. In 1987 she won the Pulitzer Prize for Thomas and Beulah (1986), a poetry collection.

Dove published her first novel, Through the Ivory Tower, in 1992 and her first play, The Darker Face of the Earth, in 1994.

She also published a collection of stories, Fifth Sunday, in 1985. Her novel concentrates on the life of an African American woman who is an artist in residence in Akron, Ohio; apparently, it is based on her own experience.

In 1993 Dove published her Selected Poems and became the first African American woman to be named the U.S. POET LAUREATE. Mother Love: Poems appeared in 1995; On the Bus with Rosa Parks: Poems, in 1999; and The Poet's World, a collection of essays, in 1995. Dove's twelfth poetry collection, American Smooth, was published in 2004.

Sources

Steffen, Therese. Crossing Color: Transcultural Space and Place in Rita Dove's Poetry, Fiction, and Drama. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Vendler, Helen. The Given and the Made: Strategies of Poetic Redefinition. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1995.

Drama

In the years immediately following WORLD WAR II, American drama advanced in its development of complex moral dramas pioneered by Eugene O'Neill in the 1920s and 1930s. But the playwrights of the postwar period did not attempt for several years the wide structural experimentation of the earlier period as Realism remained the dominant style. O'Neill ended his career with arguably his two greatest tragic achievements: The Iceman Cometh (produced 1946) and Long Day's Journey into Night (completed in 1942 and produced posthumously in 1956). Other playwrights who commenced authorship before the war continued to produce superior works in this period. Thornton Wilder's prescient apocalyptic drama The Skin of Our Teeth (produced 1942) served as an incisive comment on the war. Clifford Odets presented a Hollywood tragedy in The Big Knife (produced 1949) and a mature study of alcoholism in The Country Girl (produced 1950). Lillian Hellman softened the didactic melodramatic structure of her previous plays and composed the Chekhovian drama The Autumn Garden (produced 1951) and the psychologically disturbing Toys in the Attic (produced 1960).

But the dominant American playwrights of the 1940s and 1950s were newcomers Tennessee Williams and Arthur MILLER. Williams emerged in 1944 as an accomplished dramatic poet in his autobiographical play The Glass Menagerie. In the post-war period of optimism, Williams and Miller examined the darker and self-destructive aspects of the American experience. With two tragedies produced in 1947—Miller's All My Sons and Williams's A STREETCAR NAMED DESIRE (both directed in the Stanislavskian style by Elia Kazan)—established Broadway as a legitimate rival to European capitals in its ability to create high dramatic art. In A Streetcar Named Desire Williams presented a brutish World War II veteran as the fascist "executioner" of art and compassion. Miller dramatized the failures of the American economic system as a father-son drama in DEATH OF A SALESMAN (produced 1949). Williams examined the same theme in his father-son drama Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955). Despite the many critical successes of Williams and Miller, the most popular serious dramatist of the 1950s was midwestern playwright William INGE. Like Williams, Inge successfully dramatized female psychology and sexuality, particularly in his plays Picnic (produced 1953) and Bus Stop (produced 1955).

The American musical reached its pinnacle in the period after World War II, spearheaded by the work of Richard Rogers and Oscar Hammerstein II. Hammerstein's lyrics and books for the musicals he wrote with composer Rogers achieved wide popular and critical success. Building on their wartime achievement of Oklahoma! (produced 1943), the team produced the musical plays Carousel (produced 1945) The King and I (produced 1951) and The Sound of Music (produced 1959). Uncharacteristically provocative for a musical, the team's production of South Pacific (produced 1949), adapted from James A. MICHENER's war stories, addressed the period's racial politics. Other successful musicals of this period include Frank Loesser's gangster cartoon Guys and Dolls (produced 1950) and Meredith Willson's American folk comedy The Music Man (produced 1957). West Side Story (produced 1957) and Gypsy (produced 1959), both with books by Arthur Laurents and lyrics by Hammerstein protégé Stephen Sondheim, signaled a shift in American musicals in their exploration of tragic themes away from the decade's emphasis on optimism.

Movies, and especially television, began to dominate American entertainment and lure audiences away from the legitimate theater. Yet, television and movie dramas—often bland—failed to examine mature themes, while American drama continued to criticize national culture and politics. In a reaction to the period's anti-Communist investigations of writers, Miller wrote THE CRUCIBLE (produced 1953). Whereas external political pressure prevented many actors, writers, and other artisans from working in the movie, television, and radio industries, Broadway never operated under a blacklist system, and remained one of the few places in American public life that openly criticized the government. Politically-charged dramas continued well into the Vietnam era in such plays as the counter-culture rock musical Hair (produced 1967) and David RABE's anti-war drama The Basic Training of Pavlov Hummel (produced 1971).

For most of American history Broadway theater reflected other national institutions in its domination by white males. In 1959 Lorraine HANSBERRY became the first African American playwright to achieve broad commercial and critical success on Broadway with her social realism drama of racial integration, A RAISIN IN THE SUN. Significant successors to Hansberry's legacy include LeRoi Jones (Dutchman [produced 1964]; see Amiri BARAKA), Ntozake SHANGE (for colored girls who have considered suicide/when the rainbow is enuf [produced 1975]), Suzan-Lori Parks (Topdog/Underdog [produced 2002]) and August WILSON, the first African American dramatist to enjoy a long career in the theater.

As the Broadway presence of Williams, Miller, and Inge receded in the early 1960s, Edward ALBEE emerged as their likely successor. Employing many techniques from the “theater of the absurd” school, Albee presented nightmarish depictions of American normalcy in his influential one acts THE ZOO STORY (produced 1959) and The American Dream (produced 1961), and in his predatory “parents” of WHO’S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOOLF? (produced 1962). His career continues into the twenty-first century with his award-winning examination of male desire The Goat, or Who is Sylvia? (produced 2002). In the 1960s Broadway economics favored safe investments like audience-friendly musicals and comedies, exemplified by the popular, well-crafted dramas of Neil SIMON such as Barefoot in the Park (produced 1963) and The Odd Couple (produced 1965). These conditions forced many serious dramas into smaller theaters, often located in lower Manhattan, known as “Off-Broadway.” The smaller budgets allowed young playwrights the flexibility of experimentation with both form and content, and often served as a workshop for plays that ultimately moved uptown to Broadway.

Significant playwrights to originate in the Off-Broadway movement include Lanford WILSON, John Guare, Sam SHEPARD, David MAMET and Wendy WASSERSTEIN. In the 1970s American drama reflected the period’s cynicism and depression. In The Hot I Baltimore (produced 1973) Wilson captured the decade’s cultural stagnation and nostalgia for past glory. Many playwrights began to dramatize the disintegration and reconstruction of the American family. Wilson depicted generational tensions in his autobiographical family trilogy 5th of July (produced 1978), Talley’s Folly (produced 1979), and Talley & Son (produced 1985). Both Guare in The House of Blue Leaves (produced 1971), and Shepard in Buried Child (produced 1978) and True West (produced 1980), also examine the breakdown of the American family, often casting it as monstrous surreality. Like Odets, Mamet injected raw verbal vigor and violence onto the American stage in such plays as AMERICAN BUFFALO (produced 1975) and Glengarry Glen Ross (produced 1984).

In the late 1970s and 1980s female playwrights became more prominent on Broadway—corresponding with the women’s movement. Their dramas offered intimate depictions of women’s lives separate from men. Wasserstein famously dramatized her generation’s experience with feminism in Uncommon Women and Others (produced 1975) and The Heidi Chronicles (produced 1988). Two other female playwrights earned distinction for their plays in the 1980s: Beth HENLEY for her Southern Gothic comedy Crimes of the Heart (produced 1979), which was produced on Broadway in 1981, and Marsha Norman for her study of suicide in ‘night, Mother (produced 1983).

The experimentation of the 1960s reached the American musical when director/choreographer Michael BENNETT re-invented the form with A Chorus Line (produced 1975), by using a dance audition as a metaphor for the period’s mood of emotional alienation and anonymity. Composer Stephen Sondheim similarly deconstructed the musical form in Sunday in the Park with George (produced 1984) and the post-modern fairy tale Into the Woods (produced 1987). The spectacle often associated with Broadway musical extravaganzas began to appear in the 1980s and 90s as part of so-called serious drama. In the tradition of German playwright Bertolt Brecht’s “epic theater” playwrights used drama as a vehicle for social commentary. David Henry HWANG’s Puccini deconstruction M. Butterfly (produced 1988) and Tony Kushner’s two-play epic AIDS polemic ANGELS IN AMERICA (1991, 1993) used spectacle to examine the intersection of politics and sexuality. Yet, despite experimentation and heavy dependence on special effects, realistic drama remains the enduring genre for American playwrights. Realism’s durability and resilience is illustrated by August Wilson’s epic ten-play cycle. With each play representing a decade of the twentieth century, Wilson examined African American history and interaction with American culture in plays that are primarily of social realism such as Fences (produced 1985) and The Piano Lesson (produced 1987). Wilson combines O’Neill’s epic scope, Miller’s social criticism, and Williams’s lyricism, making him the dominant American playwright of the late twentieth and early twenty-first century.

Source

Brockett, Oscar G. and Franklin J. Hildy. History of the Theatre, ninth edition. Boston: Allyn & Bacon, 2002.

—Park Bucker

The Dream Songs by John Berryman (New York:

Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1969) poetry collection

John BERRYMAN’s The Dream Songs is a 385-poem collection of two of his previously published works, the Pulitzer Prize-winning 77 Dream Songs (1964) and His Toy, His Dream, His Rest (1968). A sequence of emotional, topically diverse, and syntactically unusual poems, The Dream Songs introduces several personae but relies most heavily on Henry, a speaker who seems to represent the author. Including simple odes; poems of lust, disgust, boredom, and celebration; poems of deep anguish; and poems of simple comic relief, the collection seems driven by this mercurial and opaque figure who is both Berryman and the Berryman of a dream world.

The collection, comic as well as poignant, is made up of eighteen-line poems of irregular rhyme and meter. Ranging from the farcical to the confessional (see CONFESSIOAL POETRY), the poems mainly explore Henry’s musings and observations; there is no specific narrative arc to the series, but rather, an examination of Henry’s deep feelings of loss—feelings which are reminiscent of Berryman's own loss of his father to suicide. As the speaker reveals himself to be ill at ease in the world, the poem's syntactical convolutions and the meanderings of the poem's mock hero echo this feeling of discomfort.

Sources

Conarroe, Joel. John Berryman: An Introduction to the Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.

Mendelson, Edward. "How to Read Berryman's Dream Songs," in American Poetry since 1960: Some Critical Perspectives, edited by Robert B. Shaw. Cheshire, U.K.: Carcanet Press, 1973: 29–43.

—Tod Marshall

Drury, Allen (1918–1998) novelist

Allen Drury was born in Texas and graduated from Stanford University. He worked as a Washington correspondent for The New York Times, which gave him the background to write his Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, Advise and Consent (1959), which dramatized the political conniving involved in confirming a secretary of state. Drury's other fiction—including Capable of Honor (1966) and Come Nineveh, Come Tyre: The Presidency of Edward M. Jason (1973)—did not achieve the popular or critical success of his first novel.

Source

Kemme, Tom. Political Fiction, The Spirit of the Age, and Allen Drury. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1987.

Dubus, Andre (1936–1999) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Lake Charles, Louisiana, Andre Dubus established himself as one of America's finest short-story writers of the past forty years. He received his B.A. degree from McNeese State College in 1958 and his M.F.A. in 1966 from the University of Iowa. Dubus, a lifelong Roman Catholic, typically focuses his fiction on the painful relationships between men and women, his short stories centering on the ambiguous moral choices that his characters must confront and resolve to the best of their abilities. Separate Flights (A Novella and Seven Stories), Dubus's first collection of short fiction, appeared in 1975, winning the Lawrence L. Winship Award from the Boston Globe. His other notable books include Adultery and Other Choices (1977), Finding a Girl in America (1980), The Last Worthless Evening (1986), Broken Vessels (1991), Dancing after Hours (1996), and Meditations from a Moveable Chair (1998). In 1986 Dubus lost the use of both of his legs in a highway accident while helping a motorist on the side of a Boston highway. He was awarded the PEN/Malamud Award and the Rea Award for excellence in short fiction. His short fiction has also been adapted as two motion pictures: In the Bedroom (2001) and We Don't Live Here Anymore (2004).

Source

Kennedy, Thomas E. Andre Dubus: A Study of the Short Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

—Matthew Shippe

Duncan, Robert (1919–1988) poet

Often I am permitted to return to a meadow as if it were a given property of the mind that certain bounds hold against chaos,

that is a place of first permission, everlasting omen of what is.

—"Often I Am Permitted to Return to a Meadow" (1960)

Robert Duncan's mother died in childbirth, and his father gave him up for adoption. He studied at the University of California, Berkeley, from 1936 to 1938 and again from 1948 to 1950. Duncan was discharged from the army during World War II on psychological grounds. He matured as a poet and teacher at Black Mountain College (see BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS), where he worked closely with Charles OLSON and Robert CREELEY. Influenced by Ezra Pound, his poems have been praised for their musical quality. His work is marked by his interest in the occult; Duncan's adoptive parents raised him in the tradition of theosophy. Duncan also made his homosexuality an important component of his work. His first collection, Heavenly City, Earthly City (1947), was followed mid-career by Bending the Bow (1968). His Ground Work: Before the War appeared in 1984. He also published nonfiction, including As Testimony: the Poems and the Scene (1964), The Truth and Life of Myth (1968), and Fictive Certainties (1979). His Selected Poems 1942–1950 was published in 1959.

Sources

Duncan, Robert, and Denise Levertov. The Letters of Robert Duncan and Denise Levertov. Edited by Robert J. Bertholf and Albert Gelpi. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2004.

Johnson, Mark Andrew. Robert Duncan. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

Dunne, John Gregory (1932–2003) journalist, novelist

John Gregory Dunne grew up in a large Irish family (which included his brother Dominick) in Hartford, Connecticut.

He received his A.B. from Princeton in 1954 and worked for several years in New York on various magazines, including the National Review, where he met his wife, Joan DIDION, whom he married in 1964. They left New York to pursue their careers as novelists, journalists, and screenwriters in California. Dunne made a stunning debut as a novelist with True Confessions (1977), the story of a hard-boiled police detective and the detective's brother, an ambitious priest. The Red, White, and Blue (1987) is an epic novel of U.S. politics loosely based on the lives of the Kennedys. In Playland (1994), he produced a novel about Hollywood reminiscent of F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Last Tycoon (1941). Dunne's nonfiction is as good as, if not better than, his fiction. Delano (1967) is about Cesar Chavez and his United Farmworkers union. In The Studio (1969) and Monster (1997) he has written amusingly and insightfully about the movie industry. Quintana and Friends (1978) is a collection of his essays. Harp (1989) is a candid, engaging memoir about himself, his family, his marriage, and his obsession with being Irish. Together with Didion he wrote several movie scripts, including Panic in Needle Park (1971), Play It as It Lays (1972; based on Didion's 1970 novel by the same name), A Star Is Born (1976), and Up Close and Personal (1996).

Sources

Didion, Joan. The Year of Magical Thinking. New York: Knopf, 2005.

Winchell, Mark Royden. John Gregory Dunne. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1986.

Edes, Benjamin (1732–1803) editor

Born October 14, 1732 in Charlestown, Massachusetts, Benjamin Edes overcame a limited education to become one of the most prominent printers and publishers in Boston. In 1755 he took over editorship of THE BOSTON GAZETTE, or, Country Journal, with John GILL as his partner. The Gazette was the third newspaper to be established in Boston. The firm of Gill and Edes also published PAMPHLETS and American editions of British books.

The Gazette became the primary voice for the PATRIOT cause. The newspaper voiced strong opposition to British policy, particularly protesting the STAMP ACT, the Tea Act (1773), and the Boston Port Bill (1774). Gill and Edes printed many of the handbills and PAMPHLETS (broad sides) that flooded Boston's streets with the news and rhetoric of rebellion. Their offices provided a meeting place for the Patriot leadership and allegedly served as the planning center and gathering place for the Boston Tea Party (1773). A number of the Patriot leaders who gathered there also contributed to the anti-British editorials that frequently appeared in the Gazette. These men included Samuel ADAMS and John Hancock (1737–1793).

Edes was very active in all phases of the rebellion. As a member of the Sons of Liberty, he was directly involved in the planning and execution of protests. He may have been a member of the group that dumped the tea into the Boston harbor. As an author, he contributed many of the anti-British articles and editorials that appeared regularly in the Gazette. Identified directly with the protests and facing possible arrest during the British occupation of Boston, Edes fled the city in 1775 with some of the printing equipment, effectively dissolving his partnership with Gill. Relocating to Watertown, Massachusetts, where the Provincial Congress was meeting, Edes ran the Gazette as a newspaper in exile until the British evacuated Boston in 1776.

After his return to Boston, Edes ran the paper with the help of his two sons. In 1794 he resumed sole control until 1798, when he closed his business. Despite his efforts, when Edes died on December 11, 1803, he left a considerable debt.

Works

The Boston Gazette, or, Country Journal. Boston: B. Edes & J. Gill, 1756–1779; Boston: Benjamin Edes & Sons, 1779–1793; New Canaan, Conn.: Readex Microprint.

The Boston Gazette and Weekly Republican Journal. Boston: Benjamin Edes & Sons, 1794–1798; New Canaan, Conn.: Readex Microprint.

Sources

Silver, Rollo Gabriel. Benjamin Edes, Trumpeter of Sedition. New York, 1953.

Pasley, Jeffrey L. The Tyranny of Printers: Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001.

Edwards, Jonathan (1703–1758) minister

And let every one that is yet out of Christ, and hanging over the pit of hell, whether they be old men and women, or middle aged, or young people, or little children, now harken to the loud calls of God's word and providence.

—Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God (1741)

Jonathan Edwards

The only known portrait from life of Jonathan Edwards, painted circa 1750–1755 by Joseph Badger

Jonathan Edwards, one of the leading figures of the religious revival known as the GREAT AWAKENING, was born in East Windsor, Connecticut, on October 5, 1703, into a long line of ministers. His father was the Reverend Timothy Edwards, and his grandfather, the Reverend Solomon Stoddard, was one of the most powerful clergymen of his time in New England. Timothy and Esther Stoddard Edwards had eleven children; Jonathan was their only son.

Edwards enrolled at Connecticut's Collegiate School (two years later Yale College, now Yale University) in 1716 at the age of thirteen. In 1720 he graduated at the top of his class, an accomplishment that his grandson Timothy DWIGHT would later match. The young Edwards spent two years reading theology after his graduation and was awarded a master's degree in 1723. The following year he became a tutor at the college, but he resigned in 1725 because of an illness.

It was during his graduate study that Edwards underwent a religious conversion. Recounting the experience in his "Personal Narrative," Edwards recalled that "there came into my Soul, and was as it were diffused thro' it, a sense of the glory of the Divine Being, a new sense, quite different from any thing I ever experienced before." He also recorded the religious conversion of his wife, Sarah Pierrepont Edwards, whom he had married in 1727, using her experience as a model in his Some Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New-England (1742).

In 1729 Edwards's grandfather Stoddard died, and the young man took over the duties of pastor of the Northampton Congregational Church in Northampton, Massachusetts. Through much of 1734 and 1735, Edwards's congregation experienced "surprising conversions." Young people, considered unregenerate and unrepentant in their beliefs and behavior, began to flock to Edwards's church. The congregation swelled with visitors from all parts of the colony, and soon the word spread that a spiritual revival had begun. Though successful in terms of advancing the evangelical message, the revivals ended in personal tragedy for Edwards when one of Edwards's in-laws committed suicide in despair over his spiritual state. Edwards never doubted that the period of "surprising conversions" as well as the later Great Awakening were inspired by God, but he took care after the suicide to warn against religiously motivated emotional excesses.

From 1740 to 1741, Edwards extended an invitation to the English revivalist minister George WHITEFIELD and other "awakeners" to preach in New England. As a supporter of the Awakening and a member of the New Light movement, Edwards responded to criticisms of more conservative clergy. At the height of the Awakening, Edwards preached his most famous sermon, Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God (1741). This JEREMIAD, aimed at jarring listeners from their sinful ways, used the spider as its central metaphor, describing a God who held a sinner like a spider suspended above the pits of Hell. Without God's grace, Edwards warned, the sinner will simply drop of his own weight into the fires below. Although Edwards reputedly delivered the sermon in a monotone voice, the words had an aspect of the preaching style that came to be known as "fire and brimstone."

Tension developed between Edwards and his congregation as he tightened the requirements for church membership, refusing to admit new members and rejecting the compromise of the HALF-WAY COVENANT. Previously observed by the Northampton Congregational Church, and honored by his grandfather, the covenant allowed church members' children to join the church without testifying to a conversion experience. On June 22, 1750, the congregation voted to dismiss Edwards. In a May 24, 1749 letter to Reverend Thomas Foxcroft, Edwards wrote: "I seem as it were to be casting myself off from a precipice; and Northampton Jan 21. 1742.

Rev<sup>d</sup> & Dear Sir,

I received yours of Jan 11. for which I thank you. Religion in this and the neighboring towns has now of late been on the decaying hand; I desire your Prayers that God would quicken & revive us again, and particularly that he would greatly humble and pardon and quicken me, & fill me with his own fullness, and, if it may consist with his will, inspire me on first to revive his work. There has been the year past the most wonderful work amongst Christians here, by far, that ever was: God has seemed almost willing to take a new Generation, there are come on since the late great work seven years ago. — neither Earth or Hell can hinder his work that is going on in the Country. Christ gloriously triumphs at this Day. You have probably before now heard of the great & wonderful things that have lately been wrought at Northampton, the Chief Town in New-Hampshire Government: There are also lately appearing great things at Ipswich, & Newbury, & at New-

Letter, January 21, 1742, from Jonathan Edwards to his fellow minister Reverend Joseph Bellamy. The second sentence reads "Religion in this and the neighboring towns has now of late been on the decaying hand"; yet Edwards goes to say, about two-thirds of the way down the page, after the dash, "neither Earth or Hell can hinder his [God's] work that is going on in the country."

have no other way, but to go on, as it were blindfold, i.e. shutting my eyes to everything else but the evidences of the mind and will of God, and the path of duty; which I would observe with the utmost care."

After considering other pastorates, Edwards decided to become a missionary to the Housatonic Indians of western Massachusetts. His family thus settled in Stockbridge the following year.

Although the community of Stockbridge was often hostile, and war and illness disrupted his life, Edwards found these years to be the most productive of his writing life. He produced a wide variety of works, including treatises, histories, an autobiography, narrative reports, and sermons. A Careful and Strict Enquiry into the Modern Prevailing Notions of that Freedom of Will, which is Supposed to be Essential to Moral Agency, Virtue and Vice, Reward and Punishment, Praise and Blame (1754) established his reputation as one of America's earliest philosophers. In this work Edwards linked the Divine to nature and joined reason and rationalism to mysticism. He radically separated the Divine from the human, insisting that only God's grace could bridge the chasm. A Careful and Strict Enquiry became the foundation of the official orthodox position known as the New England Theology.

In 1757 Edwards was offered the presidency of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University). He accepted early the following year, and the family moved to New Jersey. He died March 22, 1758 after exposure to a primitive smallpox vaccine.

Works

Edwards, Jonathan. The Works of Jonathan Edwards. 25 volumes to date, edited by Perry Miller. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1957– .

Edwards. Basic Writings. New York: New American Library, 1966.

Edwards. Apocalyptic Writings, edited by Stephen J. Stein. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977.

Edwards. Sermons and Discourses, 1720–1723, edited by Wilson H. Kinnach. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992.

Edwards. Letters and Personal Writings, edited by George S. Clag-horn. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998.

Sources

Hatch, Nathan O., and Harry S. Stout. Jonathan Edwards and the American Experience. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Jenson, Robert W. America's Theologian: a Recommendation of Jonathan Edwards. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

McClymond, Michael James. Encounters with God: an Approach to the Theology of Jonathan Edwards. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Miller, Perry. Jonathan Edwards. 1949; reprint, Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1973.

Smith, John E., Harry S. Stout, and Kenneth P. Minkema, eds. A Jonathan Edwards Reader. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

Recommended Writings

On Sarah Pierrepont (c. 1723)

A Divine and Supernatural Light (1733)

A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (1736)

Discourses on Various Important Subjects (1738)

Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God . . . (1741)

The Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit (1741)

A Treatise Concerning Religious Affections (1746)

Images of Divine Things (c. 1750)

Freedom of the Will (1754)

Personal Narrative (1765)

Studying Jonathan Edwards

Jonathan Edwards was a fourth-generation Puritan minister and a central figure in NEW ENGLAND church matters and leadership, and subsequently Edwards studies are plentiful and far-reaching. A key figure in the religious revivals known as the GREAT AWAKENING, Edwards was also a controversial figure who was ultimately ousted and exiled from his own congregation. Biographies of Edwards thus range from the honorific to the psychological. To become acquainted with Edwards's life, students might begin with older studies such as Perry Miller's Jonathan Edwards (1949); a reprint is available with an introduction by John F. Wilson (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2005). Also see Alfred Owen Aldridge's Jonathan Edwards (New York: Washington Square Press, 1966) and M. X. Lesser's Jonathan Edwards (Boston: Twayne, 1988). More-recent biographies include Joseph Conforti's Jonathan Edwards, Religious Tradition, and American Culture (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995) and Philip Gura's Jonathan Edwards: America's Evangelical (New York: Hill & Wang, 2005). For collected critical essays on Jonathan Edwards and recent scholarship, students should consult The Cambridge Companion to Jonathan Edwards, edited by Stephen J. Stein (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006) and The Princeton Companion to Jonathan Edwards, edited by Sang Hyun Lee (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2005).

Studies that consider Edwards's influence as a minister and theological issues in general include Norman Fiering's Jonathan Edwards's Moral Thought and Its British Context (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981); Jonathan Edwards and the American Experience, edited by Nathan O. Hatch and Harry S. Stout (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988); Robert W. Jenson's America's Theologian: A Recommendation of Jonathan Edwards (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988); Michael James McClymond's Encounters with God: an Approach to the Theology of Jonathan Edwards (New York: Oxford University Press, 1998); and Gerald R. McDermott's Jonathan Edwards Confronts the Gods: Christian Theology, Enlightenment Religion, and Non-Christian Faiths (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000).

For an investigation of the Great Awakening, students should begin with Frank Lambert's Inventing the "Great Awakening" (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999); David S. Lovejoy's Religious Enthusiasm and the Great Awakening (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1969); Richard L. Bushman's The Great Awakening: Documents on the Revival of Religion, 1740–1745 (New York: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va. [by] Atheneum, 1970); and Joseph Tracy's The Great Awakening (New York: Arno, 1969). Students interested in Puritan theology in general should consult Perry Miller's Errand into the Wilderness (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1956); Owen Watkins's The Puritan Experience (New York: Schocken, 1972); Emory Elliott's Power and the Pulpit in Puritan New England (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1975); Sacvan Bercovitch's The Puritan Origins of the American Self (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975) and The American Jeremiad (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978); Charles Lloyd Cohen's God's Caress: Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience (New York: Oxford University Press, 1989); and Andrew Delbanco's The Puritan Ordeal (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989). For studies of New England church matters and Edwards's contemporary world, see David D. Hall's The Faithful Shepherd: A History of the New England Ministry in the Seventeenth Century (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1972); Patricia J. Tracy's Jonathan Edwards, Pastor: Religion and Society in Eighteenth-Century Northampton (New York: Hill & Wang, 1980).

For electronic sources, students should consult The Jonathan Edwards Center at Yale University, a comprehensive site whose mission is "To provide online and offline learning environments that encourage critical appraisal of the life and thought of America's premier theologian," which offers primary sources, biographical information, and valuable outside links (<<http://edwards.yale.edu/>> viewed April 26, 2007). The Jonathan Edwards Papers are housed at Yale University.

Elegy

In their original ancient Greek form, elegies were funeral songs intended to lament the dead. In English usage, the term elegy frequently refers to funeral poetry, which may or may not be written in the classical elegiac meter—a composition using alternating lines of dactylic hexameter and pentameter. A prominent example of the classical elegiac form is "Lycidas" (1637) by John Milton (1608–circa 1674). Another type of elegy is a reflective poem written in a sorrowful mood, such as "An Elegy Wrote in a Country Church Yard" (1751) by Thomas Gray (1716–1771).

Elegies were a common literary form among the Puritans. Often written by ministers and incorporated into their sermons, elegies were typically unpublished, although some were widely distributed as printed broadsides. Because use of the form was so widespread, the majority of examples reflect the work of amateur authors. A notable exception can be found in the work of Benjamin Thomas (1642–1714), whose credits include a published volume of poetry and a satirical epic.

The elegiac form was not restricted to Puritan NEW ENGLAND. Richard LEWIS composed two elegies lamenting the death of the governor of Maryland, Benedict Leonard Calvert, in 1732: "Verses. To the Memory of His Excellency Benedict Leonard Calvert; Late Governor of the Province of Maryland" and "To John Ross Esqr, Clerk of the Council."

Colonial women played a prominent role in funeral practices, preparing the body for burial and participating actively in the mourning process. Accordingly, elegies provided an important outlet for women who wished to express themselves through poetry. Amateur attempts at elegy were not limited to deceased friends and family. Elegies memorialized prominent individuals and, in particular, heroes who had fallen in war.

Mercy Otis WARREN was perhaps the most prominent American elegist. Warren wrote elegies to lament death within her own family. In "On Hearing of the Sudden Death of a Sister, Mrs M[ary] G[ray]" (1763), Warren responds to unexpected death: "Hah! Myra dead! the echoing vaults resound / While my torn bosom bleeds beneath the wound." In a later poem, "On the Early Death of Two Beautiful Young Ladies, Misses Eliza and Abigail Otis" (1766), Warren writes:

*Her cheerful tender frame dissolves
A quick transition's made
The sprightly form the smiling cheek
Veils in the mirky grave.*

In the elegies lamenting the deaths of her sons Charles, Winslow, and George, Warren reveals the anguish of a parent outliving her children.

Warren was also known for her public elegies. She addressed John WINTHROP's widow in her "On the Death of the Hon. John Winthrop, Esq.," but it was widely circulated, owing to Winthrop's importance as the president of Harvard. In the opening stanza, Warren blends the Puritan elegiac tradition with the epic form to signify the depth of public grief and the corresponding value of Winthrop's life:

*A SERAPH shot across the plain,
The lucid form display'd,
The starry round he here explor'd,
And cry'd—"great Winthrop's dead."*

Although the lament served as the most common form of elegy, early American authors used the reflective form as well. In "Before the Birth of One of Her Children" (1678), Anne BRADSTREET confronts the harsh reality that many colonial women faced: the fear of death in childbirth. William Cullen Bryant, often considered to be the first American romantic poet, adopted the elegy in "Thanatopsis" (circa 1817), in which he contemplates death as a natural and reconcilable experience because "All that breathe / Will share thy destiny."

American authors also employed the elegy, in form or in name, as political satire. In her "On the Death of General Wooster" (1777), Phillis WHEATLEY highlights the contradiction of a champion of American freedom who is at the same time an owner of slaves:

*But how, presumptuous shall we hope to find
Divine acceptance with the Almighty mind—
While yet o deed ungenerous they disgrace
And hold in bondage Afric: blameless race*

Supporters of John Peter ZENGER, a German-born printer tried for and acquitted of seditious libel, also published satirical elegies attacking Zenger's tormentors. Among these was David HUMPHREYS's "The Lamentable Story of Two Fatherless and Motherless Twins" (1735).

Work

Harris, Jill Werman, ed. Remembrances and Celebrations: A Book of Eulogies, Elegies, Letters, and Epitaphs. New York: Pantheon, 1999.

Sources

Hammond, Jeffrey A. The American Puritan Elegy: A Literary and Cultural Study. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Shaw, W. David. Elegy & Paradox: Testing the Conventions. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.

Zeiger, Melissa F. Beyond Consolation: Death, Sexuality, and the Changing Shapes of Elegy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Eliot, John (1604–1690) translator, missionary

John Eliot was born in August 1604 in Widford, England, to Bennett and Lettese Eliot. He was educated at local grammar schools and at Jesus College, Cambridge; he graduated in 1622 and applied for ordination as a minister in 1625. Joining the ranks of the nonconforming clergy who opposed orthodox Anglican theology, Eliot was one of the early settlers in the Puritans' MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY. Two years after his arrival, he married Hannah Mumford. The couple had six children.

Eliot's first position was as substitute pastor at the main church in Boston. He later received his own congregation in Roxbury. He earned a reputation for his kindness, both to his parishioners and to the poor, giving away substantial portions of his salary to aid others. Eliot took an active interest in colonial politics, protesting a peace treaty with the local Pequot that Governor Winthrop signed in 1634 without popular approval. Eliot also upheld the Puritan belief that the mission of the Puritans was to be a model Protestant community, a "City upon a Hill." He participated in the trial that led to Anne HUTCHINSON's exile, and joined with other clergy to develop the BAY PSALM BOOK (1640).

Sometime in the late 1630s, Eliot began to study the Algonquian language with the help of a Native American tutor. After nine years he felt competent to communicate with local Indians, and by 1646 he had begun to preach to them in their own language. Often called the "Apostle to the Indians," Eliot later claimed that he had received direct, mystical inspiration to perform this missionary work from the Native American figure on the colonial seal of Massachusetts Bay. By the end of the decade, Eliot's commitment to this missionary work had diminished his interest in his Roxbury pulpit.

The colony showed little interest in or support for Eliot's work with the ALGONQUIN. Chronically short of funds, he finally received some financial assistance from the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Through the Society, he published his Eliot Tracts (1643–1671), eleven PAMPHLETS promoting his work in America. Ultimately, Eliot hoped these reports of conversions, greatly exaggerated by the author, would elicit funds for an American Indian college at HARVARD. The Indian College was established in 1654 and endured until 1665.

Remarkably, Eliot produced a literature for the Algonquin, despite the fact that the Indians possessed no written tradition. In 1663 he published a translation of the Bible, Mamusse Wunneetupanatamwe Up-Biblum God (1663), which was still used by northeastern Native Americans as late as the nineteenth century. Eliot's fluency is evident in his attempt to present clear translations of Scripture that conformed to native usage but could not be misconstrued. For example, Eliot translated the first line of "The Lord's Prayer" to read, literally in Algonquian, "Our Father heaven in hallowed." In 1666 Eliot published The Indian Grammar Begun; this was followed by The Indian Primer (1669), and in 1672, The Logic Primer.

Like most English clergy, Eliot believed that Native Americans had to adopt English habits and customs before they could become "good" Christians. Toward this end, he developed PRAYING TOWNS, the first of which was Natick, Massachusetts, founded in 1650. Here Eliot and his associates worked to induce converted American Indians to learn English farming techniques and to forsake their traditional gendered division of labor. The town residents were to adopt European dress as well. The "praying town" experiments lasted until King Philip's War (1675–1676).

The Eliot Tracts are a rich source of ethnographic detail, revealing a complex and sophisticated native culture. The pamphlets also reveal the author's conviction that Indians needed to be "bridled, restrained and civilized." Unlike most of his English contemporaries, however, Eliot argued that Indians had intelligence, human emotions, and souls. In fact, like the Mormon leader Joseph Smith (1805–1844) two centuries later, Eliot was convinced that Indians were one of the lost tribes of Israel. John Eliot died May 20, 1690.

Works

Eliot, John. The Eliot Tracts: With Letters from John Eliot, London, 1643–1671; Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003.

Mamusse Wunneetupanatamwe Up-Biblum God (The Holy Bible Containing the Old Testament and the New). Translated into the Massachusetts Indian language by John Eliot. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Samuel Green & Marmaduke Johnson, 1663; Early American Imprints, 72, 73.

Eliot. The Indian Grammar Begun. Boston: Printed by W. L. Lewis, 1666; Early America Imprints, 106.

Sources

Cogley, Richard W. John Eliot's Mission to the Indians before King Philip's War. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. John Eliot, Apostle to the Indians. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1968.

Enlightenment

The eighteenth-century American Enlightenment was marked by an emphasis on rationality rather than tradition, on scientific inquiry instead of religious dogma, and on representative government rather than monarchy. Enlightenment thinkers and writers were committed to the belief that the natural rights of man should include the principles of justice, liberty, and equality. Some of the best-known authors of the American Enlightenment include Benjamin FRANKLIN, Thomas JEFFERSON, and Thomas PAINE.

The movement in America was an outgrowth of the European Enlightenment, an intellectual movement which took place largely in the eighteenth century and which stressed reason and science over superstition, dogma, and autocracy. Accordingly, the movement challenged the dominance of the two leading institutions in European society: established religion—the Catholic Church, in particular—and hereditary aristocracy, including monarchy and the concept of the divine right of kings.

The origins of the Enlightenment can be traced to the classical literature of ancient Greece and Rome and to the writings of the Renaissance in Italy and France (fourteenth and fifteenth centuries). Major influences from the classical and Renaissance eras included Aristotle (384 B.C.–322 B.C.), an ancient Greek philosopher; St. Thomas Aquinas (1224/1225–1274), a thirteenth-century scholastic theologian; and François Rabelais (circa 1494–1553), a French monk and humanist whose writings challenged the dogma of the Catholic Church.

French philosophers were also forerunners of the Enlightenment. Writing at the close of the Renaissance, Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592) had a significant influence on Enlightenment scholars, particularly in England, where his Essays (1580–1588; translated into English in 1603) with their emphasis on individual responsibility for self determination as opposed to blind commitment to a religious or political group, became very popular. The Discourse on Method (1637), by mathematician René Descartes (1596–1650), established a scientific foundation for reasoning. French influence continued into the later eighteenth century with the work of Voltaire (1694–1778) and Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778). Voltaire used satire and polemic, often in the form of drama and poetry, to challenge a broad range of religious, philosophical, and literary assumptions. Rousseau celebrated nature as the source of equality among men, insisting that inequality and tyranny were the product of private property and government. His The Social Contract (1762) had a significant influence on politics in England and in the American colonies.

Influenced by the work of French and Dutch scholars, the Enlightenment flourished in England and Scotland during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. John Locke (1632–1704) established empiricism or experimental science as an early foundation for the British Enlightenment, employing this approach in An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) and in Two Treatises of Government (1690). Scottish philosopher David Hume (1711–1776) emphasized the metaphysical approach to reasoning. In general, the Enlightenment in England emphasized religious dissent—most notably the Puritan and QUAKER challenge to the ANGLICAN CHURCH—and political liberty, which included limits on the power of monarchy, expanded authority for the House of Commons, and a broader understanding of individual rights of expression.

The ideas that emerged from the Enlightenment in England and France had a significant influence on the development of politics and literature in the American colonies. The concepts of natural law, inherent rights, and the right to self-determination (the social contract) that form the logical foundation for the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE are based on the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Locke, among others. In Common Sense (1776), Thomas Paine drew on the concepts of nature and the corruption of government to construct his argument in favor of independence from England. The diary of John ADAMS includes numerous mentions of Enlightenment scholars, both English and French, as sources of legal and political doctrine and as shorthand references for broad ideas and concepts. The founding fathers were also familiar with the Enlightenment scholars' challenge to organized religion as an adjunct of autocracy. This undoubtedly influenced the tendency of many of the founding fathers—Jefferson, Paine, Adams, and George WASHINGTON among them—to embrace DEISM, a belief that God created a rational universe and did not intervene in its operation following its creation. The Enlightenment's disdain for organized and established religion also influenced the evolution of religious tolerance and the separation of church and state, two of the most important elements of American constitutionalism.

Sources

Commager, Henry Steele. The Empire of Reason: How Europe Imagined and America Realized the Enlightenment. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor/Doubleday, 1977.

Engell, James. The Creative Imagination: Enlightenment to Romanticism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.

Ferguson, Robert A. The American Enlightenment, 1750–1820. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Himmelfarb, Gertrude. The Roads to Modernity: The British, French, and American Enlightenments. New York: Knopf, 2004.

Munck, Thomas. The Enlightenment: A Comparative Social History, 1721–1794. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Equiano, Olaudah (circa 1745–1797) autobiographer, sailor, abolitionist

... I offer here the history of neither a saint, a hero, nor a tyrant.

—The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African (1789)

Information about Olaudah Equiano's life comes almost entirely from his autobiographical account, THE INTERESTING NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF OLAUDAH EQUIANO (1789). According to his autobiography, Equiano and his sister were abducted as children by African slavers. He said he was taken from his home in the North Ika Ibo region of Essaka, Nigeria, to the Caribbean island of Barbados. There he was sold to British slave traders and taken to Virginia, where he arrived on June 13, 1754 and was purchased by Mr. Campbell, a planter. Equiano was then bought by Michael Henry Pascal, who named the young slave Gustavus Vassa. Equiano departed Virginia with Pascal for England, arriving in London on December 14, 1754. During this time Equiano learned to read English, along with some assistance from Dick Baker; by 1757 he "could now speak English tolerably well." Equiano was able to buy his freedom on July 11, 1766. His Narrative, which in part describes his time as a slave in Virginia, was published in London in 1789. Equiano died on March 31, 1797.

The book went through at least twenty-four editions, abridgments, and translations before the twentieth century and had a significant impact on the British antislavery movement. Today, excerpts from Equiano's autobiography, which is among the first slave narratives, remain a staple in American and African American anthologies. Recent scholarship, indicating that Equiano was born in South Carolina, suggests that there was a degree of fabrication in his narrative, particularly with regard to his early life.

Works

Equiano, Olaudah. The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself. 2 volumes. London: Printed and sold by the author, 1789; edited by Werner Sollors, Early American Imprints, 23353; New York: Norton, 2001.

The Interesting Narrative and Other Writings, edited by Vincent Carretta. New York: Penguin, 1995.

Sources

Carretta, Vincent. Equiano the African: Biography of a Self-Made Man. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005.

Carretta, and Philip Gould, eds. Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Black Atlantic. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001.

Recommended Writing

The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African (1789)

Studying Olaudah Equiano

Olaudah Equiano was a sailor and adventurer, and the first former slave to publish an autobiography. Also known as Gustavus Vassa, the name of a sixteenth-century Swedish king and freedom fighter given to him ironically by one of his slave owners, Equiano eventually bought his freedom with money earned from trading while sailing and serving on various ships. He was one of the foremost leaders involved in the British abolitionist efforts. In addition to his autobiography, he wrote antislavery tracts. After reading Equiano's autobiography, THE INTERESTING NARRATIVE OF OLAUDAH EQUIANO (1789), students should begin their studies with the definitive Equiano biography: Vincent Carretta's Equiano the African: Biography of a Self-Made Man (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005). Carretta provides extensive background and historical context that will offer students an understanding of both Equiano's life and the transatlantic slave trade in the eighteenth century. Another work to consider that focuses on Equiano's life is Angelo Costanzo's Surprising Narrative: Olaudah Equiano and the Beginnings of Black Autobiography (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1987).

For studies of slavery in colonial America and the transatlantic slave trade, see Madeleine Burnside and Rosemarie Robotham's Spirits of the Passage: The Transatlantic Slave Trade in the Seventeenth Century (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1997); James A. Rawley and Stephen D. Behrendt's The Transatlantic Slave Trade: A History (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2005); Betty Wood's Slavery in Colonial America, 1619–1776 (Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2005); and David Brion Davis's Inhuman Bondage: The Rise and Fall of Slavery in the New World (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006). For primary sources in this area see Kenneth Morgan's The British Transatlantic Slave Trade (London: Pickering & Chatto, 2003). Students interested in learning more about SLAVE NARRATIVES should consult this collection of primary and secondary sources: Charles T. Davis and Henry Louis Gates Jr.'s The Slave's Narrative (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985). In addition, other sources include William L. Andrews's To Tell a Free Story: The First Century of Afro-American Autobiography, 1760–1865 (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986). Critical essays on slavery to consider: Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Black Atlantic, edited by Vincent Carretta and Philip Gould (Lexington: The University Press of Kentucky, 2001).

Frontispiece and title page for the book sometimes called the first slave narrative

For an electronic source for the study of slavery, see The Gilder Lehrman Center for the Study of Slavery, Resistance, and Abolition (<<http://www.yale.edu/glc/>> viewed May 15, 2007). For an electronic source of Equiano's autobiography, see Documenting the American South, from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill: The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African. Written by Himself. Vol. I-II (<<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/equiano1/menu.html>> viewed May 15, 2007) and (<<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/equiano2/menu.html>> viewed April 26, 2007).

Exploration Literature

Exploration literature, written by explorers and travelers to the New World, provided information about the physical landscape and native peoples with the hope of attracting future colonization and continued financial backing. These journals, letters, and PAMPHLETS emphasized the explorer's exploits and discoveries and the land's potential for cultivation and profit. Christopher COLUMBUS's journal of his first voyage to America, 1492–1493, for example, includes this description from October 13, 1492: "This island is quite big and very flat and with very green trees and much water and a very large lake in the middle and without any mountains; and all of it so green that it is a pleasure to look at." Some exploration literature quantified discovery by providing measurements and data, as in Columbus's letter to the court of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, addressed to Lord Raphael Sanchez, Treasurer, March 15, 1493: "I have already said how I went 107 leagues in a straight line from west to east along the coast of the island Juana, and as a result of that voyage I can say that this island is larger than England and Scotland together."

In his DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND, John SMITH writes in the language of measurement and evaluation:

That part wee call New England is betwixt the degrees of 41. and 45; but that parte this discourse speaketh of, stretcheth but from Pennobscot to Cape Cod, some 75 leagues by a right line distant each from other; within which bounds I have seene at least 40. severall habitations upon the Sea Coast, and sounded about 25 excellent good Harbours. . . .

In his Relation of Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca (1542) CABEZA DE VACA compares the New World to Spain, a characteristic of exploration literature; explorers and travelers often attempted to describe the new land in terms familiar to the reader.

Most explorers seem to have considered themselves technologically and socially superior to the native peoples, yet even from this perspective, their records provide helpful details. Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588), for example, includes this description of a local ALGONKIN tribe:

In respect of us they are a people poore, and for want of skill and judgement in the knowledge and use of our things, doe esteeme our trifles before things of greater value: Notwithstanding, in their proper maner (considering the want of such meanes as we have), they seem very ingenious. For although they have no such tooles, nor any such crafts, Sciences and Artes as wee, yet in those things they doe, they shew excellence of wit.

Whether describing the author's curiosity about an area's natural resources or documenting the exploration and settlement of new land, exploration literature details the experiences of early travelers and explorers and initiates the discourse from which New World literature developed.

Sources

Bauer, Ralph. The Cultural Geography of Colonial American Literatures: Empire, Travel, Modernity. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Fuller, Mary C. Voyages in Print: English Travel to America, 1576–1624. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Sale, Kirkpatrick. The Conquest of Paradise: Christopher Columbus and the Columbian Legacy. New York: Knopf, 1990.

Eastman, Mary Henderson (1818–1887) novelist, folklorist

Born in Virginia, Mary Henderson Eastman moved to Minnesota in 1841. While in Minnesota, she interacted with the region's Sioux population, learning their language and listening to their folklore. Eastman drew upon these stories to write Dahcotah: Life and Legends of the Sioux around Fort Snelling, which she published in 1849. Incensed by the success of Harriet Beecher Stowe's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1852), Eastman published the proslavery novel Aunt Phillis' Cabin in 1852, arguing that slavery was God's will and that slaves were happier than their free counterparts. Three of Eastman's collections of Native American tales appeared between 1853 and 1854. Her final work, a poetry collection titled Easter Angels, was published in 1879.

Source

McNeil, W. K. Mary Henderson Eastman: Pioneer Collector of American Folklore. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, Folklore Publications Group, 1974.

—Holly M. Kent

Eggleston, Edward (1837–1902) novelist

Born in Indiana, Edward Eggleston was a strict Methodist for the first half of his life. He worked as a Bible salesman, a circuit-riding minister, a local pastor, and a writer and editor of Sunday-school materials and literature for the juvenile market. In 1874 he abandoned Methodism and founded his own creedless Church of Christian Endeavor in Brooklyn, New York. In 1879 he retired from his duties as pastor and devoted himself full-time to his writing.

By that time Eggleston was already a well-known writer, most famous for The Hoosier School-Master (1871), a realistic tale of life in the Indiana backwoods that drew heavily on the experiences of his younger brother, George Eggleston, a teacher in a country school there. Edward Eggleston's other novels to that date included The End of the World (1872), an Indiana love story featuring the Millerite version of the apocalypse (the Millerites believed the end of the world would come in 1843 or 1844); The Circuit Rider (1874), a novel about a Methodist preacher's adventures in the lawless Ohio country in the early nineteenth century; and Roxy (1878), a story of poor whites in Indiana. After his retirement Eggleston published other regionalist books including The Hoosier Schoolboy (1883), with its underlying message of the need for school reform; The Graysons (1888), an historical romance that featured President Abraham Lincoln as a lawyer; and The Faith Doctor (1891), a parody of well-to-do Christian Scientists. After Eggleston's death two volumes of his history of the United States appeared.

Source

Randel, William Peirce. Edward Eggleston. New York: Twayne, 1963.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803–1882) essayist, poet

*We do not know today whether we are busy or idle.
In times when we thought ourselves indolent, we have afterwards discovered, that much was accomplished, and much was begun in us.*

—"Experience" (1844)

Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1853

Ralph Waldo Emerson was born in Boston, the son of a Unitarian minister with Puritan ancestors. After his father's early death, Emerson was reared by his mother and by an aunt, Mary Moody Emerson, who guided Emerson's spiritual and educational development. Emerson began writing in his youth and kept journals at Harvard University that became the basis of his most famous essays and poems. After teaching at a school for young women for two years, he entered Harvard's divinity school. An undisciplined student, Emerson nevertheless completed his studies and became a popular preacher at Boston's Second Church. In 1829 he married Ellen Tucker.

Ellen Emerson died in 1831, and the following year Emerson resigned from his position in the church, no longer a believer in its doctrines and yearning for another kind of faith. He toured Europe in 1832 and 1833 and met the English Romantic writers Thomas Carlyle; William Wordsworth; and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who turned Emerson's attention to German Idealism and to Plato. Emerson broadened his education to include European masters of rational thought such as Michel de Montaigne; mystics such as Emanuel Swedenborg; and British thinkers and empiricists, notably George Berkeley, David Hume, and John Locke.

Emerson returned to Boston and began a lecture tour; his addresses, drawn from his journals, were titled "The Philosophy of History," "Human Culture," "Human Life," and "The Present Age." He eventually refined these talks into the classic essays "SELF-RELIANCE," "THE OVER-SOUL," "Compensation," "Spiritual Laws," "Love," and "Friendship." In his writing Emerson typically announced a thought and then gradually expanded its range of reference to other matters; he did not follow the classical form of the essay, with an introduction, body, and conclusion.

Emerson remarried in 1835 and made his home in Concord, Massachusetts, where he befriended other writers such as Henry David THOREAU, Bronson ALCOTT, Jones VERY, Margaret FULLER, Orestes BROWNSON, and others who became known as transcendentalists. Emerson's essay "NATURE" became a key text in TRANSCENDENTALISM. In it he expressed his conviction that the individual in contact with nature could comprehend the great and universal truths of the universe. He solidified his argument in "THE AMERICAN SCHOLAR," which called on Americans to have faith in their own creativity and not to rely so much on the age-old learning of Europe. Emerson's creed helped to further the development of a distinctly American literature. His position grew even more radical in his "ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE SENIOR CLASS IN DIVINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE" (1838), in which he rejected traditional religion and advocated an intuitive spiritual experience much like that espoused by the Romantics in England.

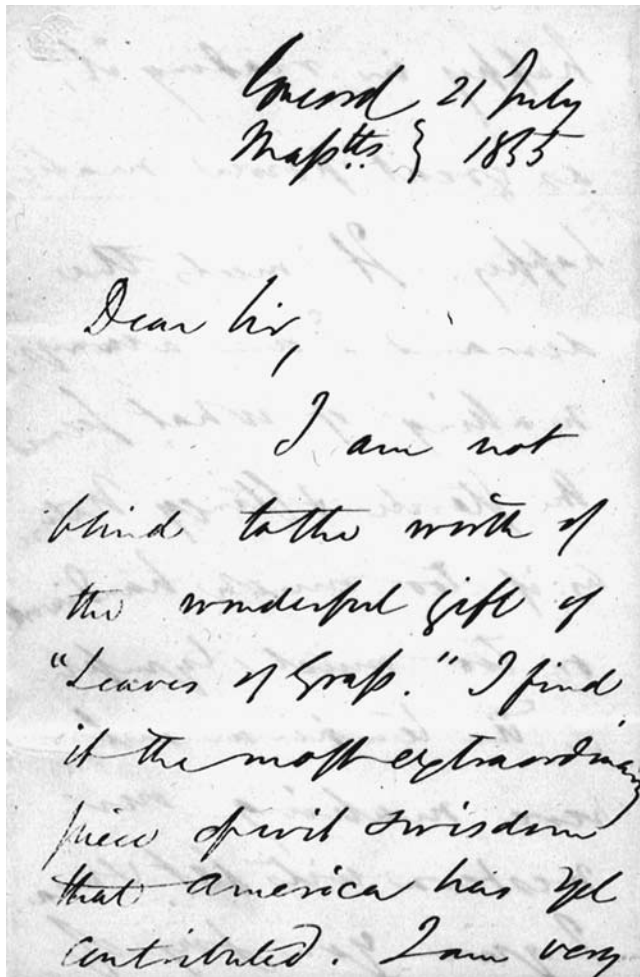

Emerson spread his ideas not only through essays and lectures but also through his magazine, THE DIAL, which became the home publication for many transcendentalists. Emerson was influential in extending the interests of transcendentalists to include direct engagement with public affairs and politics, endorsing, for example, strong opposition to slavery (see ABOLITIONISM).

By the early 1840s, Emerson had earned both a national and an international reputation. He published his first volume of verse, Poems, in 1847. Like the work of Emily DICKINSON, Emerson's poetry is gnomic and metaphysical. His poetry tends toward the abstract in works like "Threnody," "Compensation," and "Each and All." Nevertheless, his deep probing of nature had a profound influence on twentieth-century poets, especially on Robert Frost.

Emerson's engagement with more worldly subjects is evident in REPRESENTATIVE MEN (1850), a study of heroes throughout history. A friend of Thomas Carlyle's, Emerson traveled in England and published English Traits in 1856. During this period he expressed a growing concern for ethical behavior in books such as The Conduct of Life (1860) and Society and Solitude (1870). Emerson continued to lecture and to publish books in the 1870s; Letters and Social Aims (1876) and Natural History of Intellect (1893) collect his last lectures.

First page of Emerson's letter to Walt Whitman praising Leaves of Grass, July 21, 1855

Principal Books by Emerson

- Nature*, anonymous. Boston: Munroe, 1836.
An Oration, Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, at Cambridge. Boston: Munroe, 1837.
An Address Delivered before the Senior Class in Divinity College, Cambridge. Boston: Munroe, 1838.
An Oration, Delivered before the Literary Societies of Dartmouth College. Boston: Little & Brown, 1838.
Essays. Boston: Munroe, 1841; republished as Essays: First Series. Boston: Munroe, 1847.

The Method of Nature: An Oration, Delivered before the Society of the Adelphi. Boston: Samuel G. Simpkins, 1841.

Essays: Second Series. Boston: Munroe, 1844.

An Address Delivered in the Court-House in Concord, Massachusetts . . . on the Anniversary of the Emancipation of the Negroes in the British West Indies. Boston: Munroe, 1844.

Poems. Boston: Munroe, 1847.

Nature: Addresses and Lectures. Boston: Munroe, 1849; republished as Miscellanies: Embracing Nature, Addresses, and Lectures. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1856.

Representative Men: Seven Lectures. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1850.

English Traits. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1856.

The Conduct of Life. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1860.

May-Day and Other Pieces. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1867.

Society and Solitude: Twelve Chapters. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1870.

Parnassus, edited by Emerson. Boston: Osgood, 1874.

Letters and Social Aims, edited by James Elliot Cabot and Edward Waldo Emerson. Boston: Osgood, 1876.

Fortune of the Republic: Lecture Delivered at the Old South Church. Boston: Houghton, Osgood, 1878.

The Early Lectures of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 3 volumes, edited by Stephen E. Whicher, Robert E. Spiller, and Wallace E. Williams. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1959–1972.

The Journals and Miscellaneous Notebooks of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 16 volumes, edited by William H. Gilman, Alfred R. Ferguson, George P. Clark, Merrell R. Davis, A. W. Plumstead, Harrison Hayford, Ralph H. Orth, J. E. Parson, Linda Allardt, Susan Sutton Smith, Merton M. Sealts Jr., David W. Hill, Ruth H. Bennett, Ronald A. Bosco, and Glen M. Johnson. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1960–1982.

The Poetry Notebooks of Ralph Waldo Emerson, edited by Orth and others. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1986.

The Complete Sermons of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 4 volumes, edited by Albert J. von Frank and others. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1989–1992.

The Topical Notebooks of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 3 volumes, edited by Orth and others. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1990–1994.

Emerson's Anti-Slavery Writings, edited by Len Gougen and Joel Myerson. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

The Later Lectures of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1843–1871, 2 volumes, edited by Ronald Bosco and Myerson. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

Letters

The Letters of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 10 volumes, edited by Ralph L. Rusk and Eleanore Tilton. New York: Columbia University Press, 1939–1995.

The Selected Letters of Ralph Waldo Emerson, edited by Joel Myerson. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.

Studying Ralph Waldo Emerson

In his own time, Emerson was widely known as a lecturer; many of the essays in his eight published essay collections were first given as lectures. Between 1840 and 1844 he published essays, poems, and book reviews in the transcendentalist literary journal, THE DIAL, which he co-edited with Margaret FULLER. Emerson also published two volumes of original poetry during his lifetime, Poems (1847) and May-Day and Other Pieces (1867), as well as an anthology of his favorite works by other poets: Parnassus (1874).

Emerson also produced an enormous body of writings, sermons, lectures, notebooks, and correspondence that remained unpublished, most of the originals of which are archived at Harvard University and have been collected and published in various editions since his death in 1882. In 1903, the one-hundred-year anniversary of Ralph Waldo Emerson's birth, Edward Emerson edited a twelve-volume "Centenary Edition" of his father's works. Harvard began publishing its definitive critical edition, The Collected Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, in 1971, and the project continues with the next volume in the series scheduled for publication in 2008. Other Harvard editions include two multivolume series, The Early Lectures and The Journals and Miscellaneous Notebooks. Students may wish to consult the journals in particular to see how the ideas for the later essays began and developed. Emerson's correspondence is collected in the ten-volume The Letters of Ralph Waldo Emerson, edited by Ralph L. Rusk and Eleanor Tilton (1939–1995), and four volumes of sermons appear in The Complete Sermons of Ralph Waldo Emerson, edited by Albert J. von Frank and others (1989–1992). New editions of previously unpublished or uncollected works still regularly appear, such as The Later Lectures of Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1843–1871, edited by Ronald Bosco and Joel Myerson (2001).

The student researcher may want to use more concise annotated collections of Emerson's writings, such as the Norton critical edition by Joel Porte and Sandra Morris, Emerson's Prose and Poetry: Authoritative Texts, Contexts, Criticism (New York: Norton, 2001) or Joel Myerson's Transcendentalism: A Reader (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000); the latter focuses on the Transcendentalist period of the 1830s through the 1850s and places Emerson in the context of his many colleagues who were part of that movement. While earlier biographers emphasized Emerson's role as a philosopher rather than social reformer, more-recent scholars have shown interest in Emerson's relationship to nineteenth-century reform movements, such as abolition and women's rights. Len Gougeon and Joel Myerson's Emerson's Anti-Slavery Writings (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995) is recommended as a place to begin studying Emerson as an abolitionist. A good collection of scholarly essays on this topic is The Emerson Dilemma: Essays on Emerson and Social Reform, edited by

T. Gregory Garvey (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001).

Critical interest in Emerson has never waned, and scholarly writing on Emerson is immense, constituting a separate field of study in itself. Although some still-important scholarly works on the Transcendentalists date back to the 1950s and 1960s, with the 2003 bicentennial of Emerson's birth, interest in Emerson has recently reached new heights. Students will find focused Emerson studies on a range of topics, from his views on religion and science to philosophy and social reform. Ralph Waldo Emerson, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2006), is a useful collection of significant critical articles.

Biographies appear regularly. Gay Wilson Allen's Waldo Emerson (New York: Viking, 1981) is still an important starting point for an overview of the man and his career, and a useful family biography is provided in Phyllis Cole's Mary Moody Emerson and the Origins of Transcendentalism: A Family History (New York: Oxford University Press, 1998). The standard intellectual biography, however, is now Robert D. Richardson Jr.'s Emerson: The Mind on Fire (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995). Lawrence Buell's Emerson (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2003), published more recently, is more concise.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

"Ethan Brand" by Nathaniel Hawthorne (1850)

short story

The title character in Nathaniel HAWTHORNE's allegorical tale "Ethan Brand: A Chapter from an Abortive Romance" is a former lime burner who is searching for the Unpardonable Sin. The story centers on Brand's return home from his search after eighteen years away. The Unpardonable Sin remains undefined throughout the story, though Brand declares that he has found it within his own soul. Most of the townspeople react to Brand's reappearance with fear. It is largely through conversations with Bartram, the man who has succeeded him at the limekiln, that Brand's voice is heard. After working at the limekiln throughout the night, Brand decides to join with the flames, leaving as his only remains a piece of marble in the shape of a human heart within the ribcage. The tale displays several characteristic Hawthorne motifs: the nature of sin, the tension between intellect and spirituality, and the importance of interpersonal connections. "Ethan Brand" appeared in the Boston Weekly Museum in January 1850.

Sources

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. The Snow-Image, and Other Twice-Told Tales. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1852 [i.e., 1851].

Hawthorne. Nathaniel Hawthorne's Tales, edited by James McIntosh. New York: Norton, 1987.

—Julie M. Cox

"Ethnogenesis" by Henry Timrod (1861)

poem

Written on the eve of the CIVIL WAR and published in Littell's Living Age on March 30, 1861, Henry TIMROD's "Ethnogenesis" commemorates the first Confederate Congress, hailing the "birth of a nation" (as the title may be translated). The ode's first stanza celebrates the Confederacy as the appearance of "another star." The second stanza proclaims a willingness to fight. The third stanza obliquely addresses the issue of slavery, portraying the North as hypocritical and indifferent to poverty and the South as faithful, honorable, and charitable. In the last stanza's vision of a wealthy and glorious future, the new nation, in a plan ordained by God, provides "labor to the poor" of the whole world. The poem was well received in the South and earned Timrod the personal congratulations of William Gilmore SIMMS.

Source

Timrod, Henry. The Poems of Henry Timrod. New York: Hale, 1873.

—Brett Barney

Eureka: A Prose Poem by Edgar Allan Poe

(1848) essay

Edgar Allan POE called this lengthy metaphysical piece "an essay on the material and spiritual universe." It is both a meditation on science and philosophy and an attempt to reconcile the two. For the French poet Paul Valéry, whom the essay greatly influenced, Eureka was "the intuitive progenitor of Einstein's theory" of relativity. In Poe's vision of the universe, atomic particles radiate outward from a divine unity to form an infinite multiplicity of matter, governed by the countervailing forces of attraction and repulsion. According to Poe, all things, including literature, are explicable in terms of this harmonious, ordered existence—and just as all elements in a well-ordered plot are interdependent, so are good and evil. The essay is a literary philosopher's attempt to justify the ways of God to men: "God—the material and spiritual God—now exists solely in the diffused Matter and Spirit of the Universe." By reuniting this diffused matter, God, "the purely Spiritual and individual God," can be re-created. Such concepts as "Inexorable Fate" are thus rendered comprehensible as burdens humans have imposed upon themselves.

Sources

Halliburton, David. Edgar Allan Poe: A Phenomenological View. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1973.

McCaslin, Susan. Eureka, Poe's Cosmogonic Poem. Salzburg, Austria: Institut für Anglistik und Amerikanistik, Universität Salzburg, 1981.

Evangeline by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1847)

poem

Evangeline: A Tale of Acadie is a long poem set in unrhymed hexameters that shows the influence of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Hermann and Dorothea, among other European stories. The poem tells the story of the Acadians' expulsion from Nova Scotia, tracing its effects through the lives of Evangeline Bellefontaine and her fiancé, Gabriel Lajeunesse, who are separated by this event. Focusing on Evangeline's faithful endeavor to find Gabriel, the story spans several decades and follows the heroine to Philadelphia, where she becomes a Sister of Mercy. Reunited there with Gabriel, whom she tends on his deathbed, Evangeline herself dies and is buried next to her former lover in the Catholic churchyard. Nathaniel HAWTHORNE suggested the story to Longfellow, who is said to have called it "the best illustration of faithfulness and the constancy of woman that I have ever heard or read." Strongly praised in England and in America in its own time, Evangeline's reception has been less positive in the last century; however, the poem's several striking lines and extended similes reward attention.

—C. Love

Evans, Augusta Jane (1835–1909) novelist

...[A]s I lost my property (negroes and Confederate bonds) during that revolution, I must attend to the question of "bread and butter," and am trying to write out a novel, the plan of which has been vaguely straying through my mind for some time. My history, I intend to make the great end of all my labors in the realm of letters. . . .

—Letter from Evans to J. L. M. Curry

Augusta Jane Evans was born in Augusta, Georgia, into a family of wealth and position; however, her father's business and the family real estate holdings were adversely affected by the Depression of 1830, and by the time she was ten, her father had moved the family to San Antonio, Texas, to try to regain some of his fortune. The family returned to the South in 1849. Evans attended school for a brief time, but was for the most part educated by her mother, who was well read. When Evans was nearly twenty, she began writing to help with the family income and she published her first novel, Inez: A Tale of the Alamo (1855), anonymously. Even though she wrote for money, she also wrote to uplift the morals of her readers, employing the domestic and sentimental fiction techniques of the time, but creating female characters who were noted for their intelligence rather than their beauty. Her second novel, Beulah (1859), was much better received critically than her first novel had been, and it was also a financial success. Her third novel, Macaria:

or, Altars of Sacrifice (1863), was considered to be a Southerner's response to Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1852), and her most popular novel, St. Elmo (1867), became one of the most popular novels of the later nineteenth century, selling more than one million copies in the first four months of its publication. The novel, which has been called the "Gone with the Wind of its time" because of Evans's sympathetic portrayal of the South and her devotion to the Confederacy, owed a great deal to Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847) and Shirley (1849). Even though Evans privately deplored the effects of slavery on Southern women, publicly she was proslavery and a Confederate loyalist.

After Evans had established her reputation as a novelist, she, like the heroines of her novels, married. She chose a wealthy widower, Colonel Lorenzo Madison Wilson, who was older than her father and had the wealth and position that her father had lost. She took over the management of Wilson's home and four children, continuing to write. Despite the fact that her later novels never matched the success of her early ones, she continued to have a loyal following of readers until her death.

Sources

Fidler, William Perry. Augusta Evans Wilson, 1835–1909, A Biography. University: University of Alabama Press, 1951.

Riepma, Anna Sophia Roelina. Fire & Fiction: Augusta Jane Evans in Context. Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000.

—Vicki Martin

East Goes West by Younghill Kang (New York & London: Scribners, 1937) novel

East Goes West: The Making of an Oriental Yankee is the second volume of a two-volume fictionalized autobiography written by Younghill Kang (1903–1972), recognized as the founder of Korean American literature. In the first volume, The Grass Roof (1931), Kang treats his upbringing in Korea and his immigration to the United States via Canada. East Goes West, one of the earliest literary texts to chronicle Asian American realities, picks up the story of his eighteen-year-old protagonist who arrives in New York in 1921, imagining himself a “young Benjamin Franklin arriving in Philadelphia.” Through the eyes of his fictional persona, Chung-pa Han, Kang portrays the Asian immigrant experience in a richly detailed work that combines social commentary with episodic adventures.

Source

Kim, Elaine H. “Younghill Kang: Searching For a Door to America,” in her Asian American Literature: An Introduction to the Writings and Their Social Context. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1982, pp. 32–43.

—Seongho Yoon

Eastman, Max (1883–1969) poet, editor, social critic, historian, autobiographer

Max Eastman began his literary career as editor of the radical journals THE MASSES (1912–1917) and The Liberator (1918–1922). His first and most successful book of literary criticism, Enjoyment of Poetry (1913), showed his interest in linking art to society, making art criticism and social criticism a single, radical way of both enjoying and assessing life itself. He collected his own poetry in Poems of Five Decades (1954). His other important books include Marx, Lenin, and the Science of Revolution (1926) and The Literary Mind: Its Place in an Age of Science (1931). Eastman, who opposed Stalinist communism and favored Trotsky’s view, translated Trotsky’s History of the Russian Revolution in three volumes (1932–1933). His attack on Stalin appears in Stalin’s Russia and the Crisis in Socialism (1940). Like many radicals, Eastman became disenchanted with the collective state; his growing conservatism is expressed in Reflections on the Failure of Socialism (1955). Active in social as well as political circles, Eastman also wrote Great Companions: Critical Memoirs of Some Famous Friends (1959).

Sources

Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left: Episodes in American Literary Communism. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1961.

Cantor, Milton. Max Eastman. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Eaton, Edith Maude (1865–1914) short-story writer, journalist

Sui Sin Far’s key concern is with women who emerge from the shadows and demand visibility.

—Annette White-Parks, Sui Sin Far/Edith Maude Eaton (1995)

The author who earned recognition under the pseudonym Sui Sin Far and became the first writer of Chinese origin to be published in North America was born Edith Maude Eaton in England to an English father and Chinese mother. Her family immigrated to North America when she was young and eventually settled in Montreal, Canada. In the 1880s, while working as a stenographer, she began her career as a freelance journalist. She did not begin publishing stories focusing on Chinese-immigrant themes until the mid 1890s.

During the first decade of the twentieth century she lived and worked in San Francisco, Seattle, and Los Angeles. In Canada, Sui Sin Far had experienced racial prejudice because of her Chinese heritage. In San Francisco's Chinatown she faced intolerance toward her English heritage. At the age of thirty-three, she came to regard herself as Chinese rather than as a Eurasian caught between American and Chinese culture. In 1909 she moved to Boston where she compiled her only collection of short stories, Mrs. Spring Fragrance (1912). She died in Montreal in 1914.

In her early writing published under her own name, Eaton wrote romantic stories in the Victorian style of her contemporaries that gave the reader careful, but nevertheless stereotypical, portrayals of local characters. Sui Sin Far got her break in the United States in 1897 through a series of short stories in which she began addressing the issues of identity and gender relations that became central to her later writing. The main characters were young Chinese and Chinese American women caught between the two cultures. Told from a woman's perspective, these stories give voice to an otherwise silenced group in American society.

The subject of exile is central to Sui Sin Far's later stories, often set in West Coast Chinatowns—a ghettoized space, isolated from the rest of America. Her sympathetic portrayal of life in the Chinatowns contrasted with the often sensationalistic and pejorative representations of Chinese Americans in the contemporary popular press. Other subjects of importance are the assimilation process and Americanization among Chinese Americans. In Sui Sin Far's stories assimilation is not inevitable but rather a matter of choice. After moving to Boston, Sui Sin Far entered her most productive period. During this time she published "Leaves from the Mental Portfolio of an Eurasian" (1909), an autobiographical account in which she discusses her mixed heritage.

The significance of Sui Sin Far's writing was acknowledged by her American audience during her lifetime. Her work has received increased attention since the 1970s as her importance as a founding mother of Asian American literature has been remembered.

Sources

Sui Sin Far. Mrs. Spring Fragrance and Other Writings, edited by Amy Ling and Annette White-Parks. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

White-Parks. Sui Sin Far/Edith Maude Eaton: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

—Joanna Daxell

Edmonds, Walter D. (1903–1998) novelist

Walter D. Edmonds graduated from Harvard University in 1926. He wrote historical fiction, stories, and novels, mainly set in the Mohawk Valley region in upstate New York. His most famous novel is Drums Along the Mohawk (1936), set during the American Revolution.

Source

Wyld, Lionel D. Walter D. Edmonds, Storyteller. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1982.

The Education of Henry Adams by Henry Adams (Washington, D.C.: Privately printed, 1907; Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1918) autobiography

Historian Henry Adams's most important work is less a personal history (he mentions his wife's suicide only in passing) than a history of the times. In this book Adams refers to himself in the third person, using his own name "for purpose of model, to become a mannikin on which the toilet of education is to be draped in order to show the fit or misfit of the clothes." Subtitled A Study of Twentieth-Century Multiplicity, the book was meant to complement Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1904), in which Adams declared Europe in the thirteenth century to be "the point of history when man held the highest idea of himself as a unit in a unified universe."

Adams's own century, by contrast, is bewilderingly complex. As a result, he declares, his own education—and, by extension, everyone else's—is a failure. In a remarkable chapter titled "The Virgin and the Dynamo," he contrasts the symbol of the Virgin Mary, the worship of whom had unified medieval Europe, with the modern mechanical dynamo and finds that electrical energy makes a poor substitute for faith. In The Education of Henry Adams, the far-sighted Adams predicted that modern society's production of power and the ever accelerating development of technology would end in chaos if man did not learn to control it. Toward the end of his book, Adams elaborates a dynamic theory of history and proposes the development of a new class of leaders educated by scientific means.

Sources

Chalfant, Edward. Better in Darkness: A Biography of Henry Adams, His Second Life, 1862–1891. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1994.

Chalfant. Both Sides of the Ocean: A Biography of Henry Adams, His First Life, 1838–1862. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1982.

Rowe, John Carlos, ed. New Essays on The Education of Henry Adams. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Eliot, T. S. (1888–1965) poet, playwright, literary critic, editor

No poet, no artist . . . has his complete meaning alone. You must set him, for contrast and comparison, among the dead. . . . The existing monuments form an ideal order among themselves, which is modified by the introduction of the new (the really new) work of art among them.

—“Tradition and the Individual Talent” (1919)

Thomas Stearns Eliot was born into a distinguished American family in St. Louis on September 26, 1888. His forbears, from Boston, included political and church leaders in colonial America and presidents of the United States and Harvard University; his grandfather, a Unitarian clergyman in St. Louis, was the founder of Washington University. His family's values remained a reference point throughout his life, and his American youth provided him with a storehouse of images for poetry.

T. S. Eliot, 1956

Eliot was educated at Harvard and Oxford Universities. He also studied in Paris, where he met one of his closest friends, Jean Verdenal. When Verdenal was killed in WORLD WAR I, Eliot was dispirited, and in 1917 he dedicated his first volume of poems to the memory of his French friend. Eliot's Oxford year, 1914–1915, was a turning point in his life, for in September 1914, he met the American poet Ezra POUND, who arranged for the first publication of his poems, and in April 1915 he met Vivienne Haigh-Wood. Encouraged by Pound, Eliot married Miss Haigh-Wood in June 1915. He decided to remain in London and pursue a literary career, a decision that distressed his family, who feared that he was wasting his splendid education. Nevertheless, by the end of the war, Eliot had committed himself to England.

Eliot's marriage was a disaster for both parties. Vivienne was ill when they married, and her illness worsened and cast a long shadow over every aspect of his life, including his poetry. He spent the first few years of his marriage teaching school, working in a bank, and reviewing books. In 1917 he published his early poems as Prufrack and Other Observations, and in 1920 his early essays as THE SACRED WOOD. Despite illness and financial hardship, he continued to write, and in 1922, with assistance from Pound, he published the century's most famous poem, THE WASTE LAND. The same year, he founded the Criterion, one of the most influential interwar journals in Europe.

In 1925 Eliot joined the publishing house of Faber and Faber, an association that endured for the rest of his life and enabled him to be helpful to some of the century's best writers. In 1927 he became a British citizen and a member of the Church of England. His religious commitment is evident in all of his subsequent work, beginning with ASH-WEDNESDAY (1930) and MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL (1935). In the 1930s, spurred by the perilous times (GREAT DEPRESSION, rise of Nazism, impending war), Eliot began to write about political, religious, and social issues. Just before the outbreak of WORLD WAR II he ended publication of the Criterion with a farewell editorial expressing grave concern about the deteriorating situation in Europe. When war arrived, he remained in London and served as a fire watcher during the Blitz, and after the war he devoted himself to international reconciliation.

Eliot published his last major poem, FOUR QUARTETS (1943), during the war, after which he turned to the theatre. Having been inclined toward drama from the start, having written several dramatic fragments, the choruses for an ecclesiastical pageant, and two full-length plays, he devoted what remained of his creative energy to writing comedies. Between the end of the war and his death he received nearly every honor the West had to offer to an artist, including honorary degrees, the Nobel Prize, and the Order of Merit of the British Empire. His last years were darkened by the death in

First page of the first U.S. publication of T. S. Eliot's poem. It won the second annual Dial Magazine Award of $2000 given to a young American writer in recognition of his service to letters. Sherwood Anderson won the first award.

1947 of his wife and by his own decreasing vitality but brightened by his reputation as an elder statesman of letters and by his surprising marriage in 1957 to his longtime secretary, Valerie Fletcher. He died in London in January 1965.

Eliot's career can be divided into four periods. In 1909–1911, while a student in Boston and Paris, he wrote “THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK” and other poems that became landmarks in the transition from Romanticism to MODERNISM in the arts. These poems are existential in theme (angst, alienation, the absence of God) and antiromantic in style (objective, ironic). In the early London years, 1918–1925, in poems such as “Gerontion” (1919) and The Waste Land (1922), he turned to larger themes related to the war and the survival of Western civilization. “Gerontion” is a study of the mind of Europe from the Battle of Thermopylae in the fifth century B.C. to the battles of the Great War in 1914–1918. The Waste Land deals not only with the literal wasteland of the Western Front and the spiritual wasteland of postwar civilization but also with the personal struggle of an artist living in a chaotic age. In the years following his conversion, 1927–1942, Eliot wrote his most personal poem, Ash-Wednesday, an elegant sequence of lyrics on the difficulty of repentance, and his most impersonal poem, Four Quartets, a sequence of philosophic meditations, the last of which, “Little Gidding,” is a wartime theodicy. The last period in Eliot's career was devoted to his plays. The first two, Murder in the Cathedral (produced 1935) and The Family Reunion (produced 1939), were written before the war, and the last three, of which The Cocktail Party (produced 1949) has been the most popular, were written between 1948 and 1958. The comedies continued his attempt to foster community in a world fractured by war. Eliot was also an important literary critic. His work was spread over several volumes, of which The Sacred Wood (1920) and Selected Essays (1932) are the most important.

Eliot had difficulty publishing the poems of the Prufrock period, but by the time The Waste Land appeared, he was recognized as a major figure in modern letters. The Waste Land quickly achieved landmark status and is still accepted as the most important poem of the twentieth century. Four Quartets, which appeared a generation later, was warmly received; in the opinion of many critics, it stands as Eliot's greatest poetic achievement. His criticism is also highly valued, and his “Tradition and the Individual Talent” (1919) remains the century's most celebrated literary essay. When Eliot died in 1965, the obituary in Life magazine referred to the first half of the century as the “Age of Eliot.” At the end of the century, Time listed him as the “poet of the century” and The Waste Land as the century's most influential poem.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Principal Books by Eliot

Prufrock and Other Observations. London: Egoist, 1917.

Ezra Pound: His Metric and Poetry. New York: Knopf, 1918.

Poems. Richmond, Surrey: Leonard & Virginia Woolf at The Hogarth Press, 1919.

Ara Vos Prec. London: Ovid Press, 1920. Revised as Poems. New York: Knopf, 1920.

The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Criticism. New York: Knopf, 1921.

The Waste Land. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922.

Homage to John Dryden: Three Essays on Poetry of the Seventeenth Century. London: Leonard & Virginia Woolf at The Hogarth Press, 1924.

Poems 1909–1925. London: Faber & Gwyer, 1925; New York & Chicago: Harcourt, Brace, 1932.

Journey of the Magi. New York: Rudge, 1927.

Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca. London: Oxford University Press, 1927.

A Song for Simeon. London: Faber & Gwyer, 1928.
For Lancelot Andrewes: Essays on Style and Order. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1929.
Dante. London: Faber & Faber, 1929.
Animula. London: Faber & Faber, 1929.
Ash-Wednesday. New York: Fountain Press / London: Faber & Faber, 1930.
Marina. London: Faber & Faber, 1930.
Thoughts After Lambeth. London: Faber & Faber, 1931.
Triumphal March. London: Faber & Faber, 1931.
Charles Whibley: A Memoir. London: Oxford University Press, 1931.
Selected Essays 1917–1932. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1932.
John Dryden: The Poet, The Dramatist, The Critic. New York: Terence & Elsa Holliday, 1932.
Sweeney Agonistes: Fragments of an Aristophanic Melodrama. London: Faber & Faber, 1932.
The Use of Poetry and The Use of Criticism: Studies in the Relation of Criticism to Poetry in England. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1933.
After Strange Gods: A Primer of Modern Heresy. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934.
The Rock: A Pageant Play. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934.
Elizabethan Essays. London: Faber & Faber, 1934. Revised as Essays on Elizabethan Drama. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1956.
Murder in the Cathedral, acting edition. Canterbury: H. J. Goul- den, 1935. Complete edition. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.
Essays Ancient & Modern. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1936.
Collected Poems 1909–1935. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1936.
The Family Reunion. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.
Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.
The Idea of a Christian Society. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1940.
East Coker. London: Faber & Faber, 1940.
Burnt Norton. London: Faber & Faber, 1941.
The Dry Salvages. London: Faber & Faber, 1941.
The Classics and the Man of Letters. London, New York & To- ronto: Oxford University Press, 1942.
The Music of Poetry. Glasgow: Jackson, Son, Publishers to the University, 1942.
Little Gidding. London: Faber & Faber, 1942.
Four Quartets. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1943.
Reunion by Destruction. London: Pax House, 1943.
What Is a Classic? London: Faber & Faber, 1945.
Die Einheit der Europäischen Kultur. Berlin: Carl Habel, 1946.
Milton. London: Geoffrey Cumberlege, 1947.
A Sermon. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1948.
Selected Poems. Harmondsworth, U.K.: Penguin/Faber & Faber, 1948; New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1967.
Notes Towards the Definition of Culture. London: Faber & Faber, 1948; New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1949.

Cover for the program for the London premiere of Eliot's most popular drama

From Poe to Valéry. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1948.
The Aims of Poetic Drama. London: Poets' Theatre Guild, 1949.
The Cocktail Party. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1950.
Poems Written in Early Youth. Stockholm: Privately printed, 1950; New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1967.
Poetry and Drama. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1951.
The Film of Murder in the Cathedral, by Eliot and George Hoel- lering. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.
The Complete Poems and Plays. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.
American Literature and the American Language. St. Louis: De- partment of English, Washington University, 1953.
The Three Voices of Poetry. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1954.
The Confidential Clerk. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1954.
Religious Drama: Mediaeval and Modern. New York: House of Books, 1954.

- The Cultivation of Christmas Trees*. London: Faber & Faber, 1954; New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1956.
- The Frontiers of Criticism*. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1956.
- On Poetry and Poets*. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1957.
- The Elder Statesman*. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1959.
- Collected Plays*. London: Faber & Faber, 1962.
- George Herbert*. London: Longmans, 1962.
- Collected Poems 1909–1962*. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1963.
- Knowledge and Experience in the Philosophy of F. H. Bradley*. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1964.
- To Criticize the Critic and Other Writings*. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1965.
- The Waste Land: A Facsimile and Transcript of the Original Drafts Including the Annotations of Ezra Pound*, edited by Valerie Eliot. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.
- Selected Prose of T. S. Eliot*, edited by Frank Kermode. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1975.
- The Varieties of Metaphysical Poetry: The Clark Lectures at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1926, and the Turnbull Lectures at the Johns Hopkins University, 1933*, edited by Ronald Schuchard. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1994.
- Inventions of the March Hare: Poems, 1909–1917*, edited by Christopher Ricks. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1996.

Studying T. S. Eliot

T. S. Eliot's career as a man of letters spans five decades and includes poetry, criticism, and plays. Some critics, emphasizing the differences in theme and style between his early and late writings, divide his work into two roughly equal periods, with his 1927 baptism in the Church of England as the dividing line. The first period includes existentialist poems of the divided self such as "THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK" (1909) and postwar poems of cultural trauma such as THE WASTE LAND (1922). The second includes the elegant philosophical verse of FOUR QUARTETS (1943) and the mildly amusing drawing-room comedies of his later years. Immediately before the conversion, Eliot wrote his most pessimistic poem, "The Hollow Men" (1925), and immediately after, his most measured, ASH-WEDNESDAY (1930). Other critics, emphasizing continuity between the early and late Eliot, point out that the division is not primarily temporal, but psychological and spiritual. From beginning to end, his poetry projects a divided self, torn between memory and desire, horror and acceptance. From the beginning, his poetry has a Romantic tone touched by wildness and chaos, and his criticism a classical tone touched by a longing for tradition and order. These points of view can be reconciled if one thinks not of an abrupt change on June 29, 1927, but of a willed shift of emphasis. In the early work, personal emotion and the chaos of contemporary history are on the surface, with serenity a distant dream; in the later work, serenity is on the surface, with disorder held at bay through the discipline of faith.

Eliot's published works are enumerated in Donald Gallup's T. S. Eliot: A Bibliography (revised edition, New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1969). J. L. Dawson, P. D. Holland, and D. J. McKitterick have produced A Concordance to The Complete Poems and Plays of T. S. Eliot (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1995). Eliot's letters, the first volume of which was published as The Letters of T. S. Eliot: 1898–1922 (San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1988), are being edited by his widow, Valerie Eliot, and Hugh Haughton. Several biographers have written on Eliot, although no one has had unrestricted access to his papers. Peter Ackroyd's T. S. Eliot: A Life (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984) contains the known facts, and Lyndall Gordon's T. S. Eliot: An Imperfect Life (London: Vintage, 1998) attempts to integrate his life with his poetry.

Critical reviews of all of Eliot's writings are collected in T. S. Eliot: The Contemporary Reviews, edited by Jewel Spears Brooker (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004). The Cambridge Companion to T. S. Eliot, edited by A. David Moody (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994), includes essays on major aspects of his work. His poetry, shaped by his classical education, is richly allusive, with references to the Bible, Greek and Latin writers, Dante, Shakespeare, seventeenth- and nineteenth-century English and French writers, and Eastern religious texts. The allusions are briefly identified in B. C. Southam's A Guide to the Selected Poems of T. S. Eliot (sixth edition, San Diego: Harcourt Brace, 1994) and Grover Smith's T. S. Eliot's Poetry and Plays (second edition, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974). Readers of The Waste Land will want to consult the critical edition of the poem edited by Michael North (New York: Norton, 2001), with its carefully selected background materials, as well as A Facsimile and Transcripts of the Original Drafts of The Waste Land, edited by Valerie Eliot (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1971), with its account of the poem's genesis and development. Readers of Four Quartets will benefit from Helen Gardener's The Art of T. S. Eliot (London: Cresset, 1949) and her The Composition of Four Quartets (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978). Recommended bibliographies of secondary materials are Mildred Martin's A Half-Century of Eliot Criticism: An Annotated Bibliography of Books and Articles in English, 1916–1965 (Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1972), Beatrice Ricks's T. S. Eliot: A Bibliography of Secondary Works (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1980), and Sebastian D. G. Knowles and Scott A. Leonard's An Annotated Bibliography of a Decade of T. S. Eliot Criticism: 1977–1986 (Orono, Maine: National Poetry Foundation, 1992). The Modern Language Association bibliography has current items. T. S. Eliot on the Web (<<http://web.missouri.edu/~umcastselist/tselinks.html>>) is an excellent resource, with primary and secondary materials and links to other valuable sites.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Elmer Gantry by Sinclair Lewis (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1927) novel

When it was originally published, Sinclair LEWIS's controversial portrait of a hypocritical evangelical minister was denounced as blasphemy. The novel's flawed hero, the Rev. Elmer Gantry, was modeled on Billy Sunday and other famous evangelists. Gantry is a husky roughneck who bellows powerful but empty sermons. After being kicked out of the church for drinking and womanizing, he becomes assistant to the glamorous evangelist Sharon Falconer. After she dies in a fire at her new Waters of Jordan Tabernacle, he wangles his way back into the good graces of the Methodists and rises to ever bigger churches, masking his lusty nature by sanctimony, exploiting his talent for publicity through headline-grabbing vice crusades, and using business methods and advertising slogans to boost attendance. While he prospers, his divinity-school classmate, Lewis's model minister Frank Shallard, despairs. As sincere and questioning as Elmer is hypocritical, Shallard loses his faith, becomes a radical, and is beaten up by the Ku Klux Klan. Gantry's climb in the church is interrupted when he is trapped with a married woman. Extricated by a wealthy parishioner, he relentlessly pursues power and glory. The novel at times reads like a debate, and Gantry is too unrelievedly a villain. But Lewis's slashing satire exposes the gap between religious aspiration and human fallibility.

Source

Hutchinson, James M. The Rise of Sinclair Lewis, 1920–1930. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
Lingeman, Richard. Sinclair Lewis: Rebel from Main Street. New York: Random House, 2002.

—Richard Lingeman

"The Emperor of Ice-Cream" by Wallace Stevens (1922) poem

The subject of Wallace STEVENS's "The Emperor of Ice-Cream," which was originally published in THE DIAL and collected in his first book, Harmonium (1923), is the funeral of a poor woman. The central tension that is not resolved until the end of the poem is an ambivalence over the proper response to death—to conceal or to reveal, to disguise or to recognize.

In the first stanza of the two-stanza poem, the speaker describes those who attend the funeral, which has a party atmosphere. Acting as the host, the speaker calls for those who are attending to act naturally and enjoy themselves, suggesting that unpleasant reality should not be covered up or ignored. In a world where death is commonplace "the only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream." This line, which concludes both stanzas, may suggest an enigmatic replacement for an omnipotent God as the king of the universe. Ice cream with its associations of coldness and sweetness symbolizes both death and the temporary pleasures of the earth.

"The Emperor of Ice-Cream" concludes with the host ordering the corpse's face covered with a sheet taken from her cheap dresser, but visitors are enjoined to see the world as it is and not to ignore the reality of death:

*If her horny feet protrude, they come
To show how cold she is, and dumb.
Let the lamp affix its beam.
The only emperor is the emperor of ice-cream.*

Source

Stevens, Wallace. The Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens. New York: Knopf, 1954.

—Allan Chavkin

The Emperor Jones by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1920) play

In The Emperor Jones, Eugene O'NEILL presents a classically-constructed single-act tragedy of an African American man haunted by his past and destroyed by his pride. Premiering on November 1, 1920, at the Provincetown Playhouse for a run of 204 performances, the play dramatizes (see EXPRESSIONISM) the descent of Brutus Jones from self-declared Emperor of "an island in the West Indies as yet not self-determined by white Marines" to a stomach-crawling human sacrifice to a vengeful pagan god.

The expressionistic drama (see EXPRESSIONISM) opens in a deserted throne room. Smithers, a white cockney trader, soon learns from a terrified native woman that the island's populace has begun a revolt against Jones. O'Neill describes Jones entering wearing an overly-grand Napoleonesque military uniform but adds that he "has a way of carrying it off." The realistic first scene between Jones and Smithers details Brutus Jones's ascent from "stowaway to Emperor in two years." Jones rationalizes his looting of the nation's treasuries as comparable to the unfair business practices of the white capitalists he served as a Pullman porter: "For de little stealin' dey gits you in jail soon or late. For de big stealin' dey makes you Emperor and puts you in de Hall of Fame when you croaks." The scene ends with the sound of tom-toms timed according to O'Neill at "a rate exactly corresponding to normal pulse beat—72 to the minute—and continues at a gradually accelerating rate from this point uninterruptedly to the very end of the play."

In his planned escape from the island Jones tries to cross through the jungle—a metaphor for his confused consciousness—entering into a Freudian and Jungian nightmare peopled with ghosts both from his individual past and from his racial past. All the figures Jones meets in the jungle move like automatons with repetitive, programmed movement. O'Neill punctuates almost every scene with Jones firing vainly at the apparitions.

The Emperor Jones was a critical and financial triumph. Actor James Earl Jones, who played the title character twice in revivals, described the role as the “first fully heroic African-American hero for the stage,” remarking also that “Brutus Jones was the ultimate capitalist, the ultimate exploiter. And that’s not black, that’s American.”

Sources

O'Neill, Eugene. The Emperor Jones. New York: Boni and Liveright, 1921.

Shafer, Yvonne. Performing O'Neill: Conversations with Actors and Directors. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

—Park Bucker

The Enormous Room by E. E. Cummings (New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922) novel

One of the classic American novels of WORLD WAR I, E. E. CUMMINGS's The Enormous Room was based on the three months he spent in a French detention camp—a large, chapel-like room he shared with other aliens suspected of undesirable activities. Cummings, like many American intellectuals and writers, including John Dos Passos and Ernest HEMINGWAY, volunteered for duty with the ambulance service of the Red Cross. He attracted the attention of French intelligence officers mainly through his association with his friend William Slater Brown, whose letters home included alarming opinions on the war and French morale. Cummings's linguistically experimental, anti-authoritarian novel, which is written as an ironic version of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678), expresses his vision of a world where freedom is elusive. The paradox of dispossession, for Cummings, is that it makes true freedom possible. Cummings was dissatisfied with the first American edition of his book, which included only one of his drawings, omitted material, and translated many of his French passages into English.

Source

Cummings, E. E. The Enormous Room: A Typescript Edition with Drawings by the Author, edited by George James Firmage. New York: Liveright, 1978.

—Tom Bristow

Esquire Magazine (1933– ) periodical

Esquire: The Magazine for Men was launched on October 15, 1933. Edited by Arnold Gingrich, who had a background in the fashion industry, the magazine was envisioned as a guide to men's clothing. Gingrich created an editorial plan that he described as promoting “the improvement of the art of living and the new leisure.” Though it appeared during the Great Depression and cost 50¢ per issue, five or ten times the price of popular magazines of the day, Esquire was an immediate success. The first issue set the editorial tone; it contained nonfiction by Ernest Hemingway, Gilbert Seldes, and Ring Lardner Jr.; an interview with Nobel Peace Prize winner and president of Columbia University Nicholas Murray Butler; fiction by John Dos Passos, Morley Callaghan, Erskine Caldwell, and Dashiell Hammett; sports commentary by Bobby Jones, Gene Tunney, Benny Leonard, and Olympic sprinting champion Charley Paddock. In addition, there were sexy cartoons by various artists, notably Alberto Vargas, and full-color photos of men's clothing. Esquire soon became a monthly and continued its editorial excellence for three decades. F. Scott Fitzgerald's seventeen Pat Hobby Stories were published in Esquire in 1940 and 1941.

Gingrich resigned as editor in 1946, but the magazine continued to attract respected as a literary magazine until its last notable fiction editor, Rust Hills, retired in 1963. Gingrich edited several anthologies, with titles such as The Bedside Esquire (1940), The Esquire Treasury (1953), The Armchair Esquire (1958), and The Esquire Reader (1961).

Source

Harold T. P. Hayes, “Arnold Gingrich, Esquire,” New Republic, 175 (September 14, 1976): 33–37.

Ethan Frome by Edith Wharton (New York: Scribners, 1911) novel

In this brief, ironic tale about imprisonment in a loveless marriage, Edith WHARTON's protagonist is a Massachusetts farmer who barely manages to make a living out of his hard-scrabble land. He escaped his family's farm only once, when as a youth he briefly studied science before his parents' illness called him back. Left alone by their deaths, he marries a distant cousin, Zeena, who had nursed his mother. When Zeena herself becomes neurasthenic, Ethan turns to Zeena's impoverished cousin Mattie, who nurses Zeena and helps her with the housework.

Because of Ethan's attraction to Mattie, who shares his love of the stark New England landscape, Zeena decides to send her away. Ethan's attempt to die with Mattie by steering their sled into a giant elm leaves both injured—Mattie horribly so. She is brought back to the house, where Zeena begins to nurse the woman who once nursed her. As Zeena's health and vigor return, Mattie assumes the place formerly occupied by her cousin, becoming the crabbed hypochondriac Zeena once was.

Ethan Frome—stark, economical, and ironic—is often cited as Wharton's best work. Although she imbued the novel with autobiographical elements—in particular her sense of suffocation in an unworkable marriage—Wharton herself did not regard her work in this light, choosing instead to see it as an allegory.

Sources

Springer, Marlene. Ethan Frome: A Nightmare of Need. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Wharton, Edith. Ethan Frome: Authoritative Text, Backgrounds and Contexts, Criticism. Edited by Kristin O. Lauer and Cynthia Griffin Wolff. New York: Norton, 1995.

Everson, William (1912–1994) poet, critic

William Everson published his first volume of poetry, These Are the Ravens, in 1935, beginning a literary career that spanned sixty years. His life's work of more than fifty books includes thirty-five collections of poetry and seven volumes on the poet Robinson JEFFERS, who Everson regarded as his "spiritual father." The poetic career of the California-born Everson can be divided into distinct stages. His life as a farmer in the San Joaquin Valley and the three years he spent in a federal detention facility as a conscientious objector during WORLD WAR II (1943–1946) are represented in The Residual Years: Poems 1934–1948 (1968). Following the war, he became involved with Kenneth Rexroth and the writers of the San Francisco Renaissance. He converted to Catholicism and in 1951 became Brother Antoninus, a lay monk without vows, in the Dominican Order. This period of his life is represented by the collection The Veritable Years, 1949–1966 (1978). After breaking with the Dominicans in 1969, Everson lived with his third wife in the coastal mountains north of Santa Cruz. The Blood of the Poet: Selected Poems was published in 1993.

Source

Bartlett, Lee. William Everson: The Life of Brother Antoninus. New York: New Directions, 1988.

Everybody's (1899–1920) periodical

Founded as an internal publication of Wanamaker's department store in Philadelphia, Everybody's became an independent magazine in 1903 and almost immediately plunged into the MUCKRAKING MOVEMENT, publishing articles by such writers as Upton SINCLAIR and Lincoln STEFFENS. As the movement waned, in 1910 Everybody's became an outlet for popular fiction and features. Eventually, it was absorbed into the journal Romance; it had ceased to exist by 1920.

Expressionism

Expressionism as a term became popular in early-twentieth-century art criticism to describe painting in which the artist seeks to express emotional experience rather than impressions of the physical world. As an American literary term, it has been chiefly used in theater. Two of Eugene O'NEILL's early plays, THE HAIRY APE and THE EMPEROR JONES, feature an expressionist style that creates the effect of the world closing in on characters whose freedom of action is slowly circumscribed. Elmer RICE's THE ADDING MACHINE has often been cited as a good example of expressionist drama because the playwright uses exaggeration and distortion to express the state of his characters' minds.

Source

Valgemae, Mardi. Accelerated Grimace: Expressionism in the American Drama of the 1920s. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1972.

Edel, Leon (1907–1997) biographer, critic

Leon Edel was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and educated at McGill University in Montreal and at the University of Paris where he received his Ph.D. in 1931. He worked as a journalist in the 1930s and in 1950 began his academic career at New York University, where he established himself as an authority on Henry James. Edel edited editions of James's plays and tales and then embarked on an ambitious and controversial biography of the novelist, a five-volume opus published between 1953 and 1972. Some critics praised Edel for changing the form of biography—he relied on psychological analysis and scene-setting techniques favored by novelists—while other critics argued that he manipulated the facts more than is justifiable in biography. His influence on modern biography, however, is undeniable. Published in a one-volume edition as Henry James: A Life (1985), the biography won the 1963 Pulitzer Prize and a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD.

Edel published more than twenty-five books, including biographies on Henry David Thoreau and Willa Cather. A prolific scholar, he edited or co-edited more than twenty-five additional collections. In Writing Lives: Principia Biographica (1984), a revision of his Literary Biography (1957), Edel explained his philosophy as a biographer. He also published several notable books of literary criticism, including The Modern Psychological Novel (1955) and Stuff of Sleep and Dreams: Experiments in Literary Psychology (1982). He helped to found the Center for Biographical Research at the University of Hawaii, where he taught from 1972 to 1997.

Sources

Fromm, Gloria G., ed. Essaying Biography: A Celebration for Leon Edel. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1987.

Powers, Lyall H., ed. Leon Edel and Literary Art. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1988.

Edgerton, Clyde (1944– ) novelist, short-story writer

Southern novelist Clyde Carlyle Edgerton was born in Durham, North Carolina, in 1944. An only child, Edgerton grew up amid the conservative ambience of the Southern Baptist Church, and he worked for Barry Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign while he was a junior at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. His views changed after he served in the VIETNAM WAR as a U.S. Air Force pilot, winning the Distinguished Flying Cross. After receiving his Ph.D. from the University of North Carolina in 1977, he taught English while struggling to establish himself as a novelist. He published his first book, Raney, in 1985. The story of a modern Southern marriage as narrated by a small-town Baptist girl coming to grips with her husband's liberalism, Raney won Edgerton a readership that has expanded with such works as Walking across Egypt (1987), The Floatplane Notebooks (1988), Killer Diller (1991), Where Trouble Sleeps (1997), Lunch at the Piccadilly (2003), and Solo (2005). Edgerton's humorous fiction satirizes the pretensions and hypocrisies of small-town Southern life, with particular attention to the Southern Baptist colleges and churches that are such a large presence in his native North Carolina.

Source

Pearson, Michael. "Stories to Ease the Tension: Clyde Edgerton's Fiction," in Twayne Companion to Contemporary Literature in English, I, edited by R. H. W. Dillard and Amanda Cockrell. New York: Twayne/Thomson Gale, 2003, pp. 259–266.

—Marshall Boswell

Eggers, Dave (1970– ) memoirist, novelist, publisher

Dave Eggers was raised in Lake Forest, Illinois, a suburb of Chicago, and attended the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. He is the author of a memoir, A Heartbreaking Work of Staggering Genius (2000), novels—You Shall Know Our Velocity (2002), and What Is the What (2006)—and a short-story collection, How We Are Hungry (2004).

After witnessing the deaths of both of his parents within five weeks of each other, Eggers moved to San Francisco to raise his eight-year-old brother on his own. Eggers's attempt to adjust to both his parents' deaths and the unexpected role of parenthood as a single twenty-one-year-old forms the central thrust of his memoir, which became a nonfiction best-seller. The book's hyper-self-conscious style integrates mock-didactic foreword, appendix, and acknowledgment sections into the text, creating a Post-modern collage that challenges the reader to consider what is real in the already-problematic memoir genre. In 1997 Eggers helped to found the now-defunct Might magazine in San Francisco, for which he served as an editor; he then moved on to McSweeney's, an influential and unconventional literary magazine that publishes clever and avant-garde writing. Most recently he has expanded the McSweeney's empire to include a sister publication, The Believer, and a publishing company that has published his own work as well as important works by Stephen DIXON, Lydia DAVIS, and William VOLLMANN.

Source

Official Dave Eggers website: <www.mcsweeneys.net> (viewed May 23, 2007).

—Anna Teekell

Eiseley, Loren (1907–1977) anthropologist, poet, autobiographer

A professional anthropologist, Loren Eiseley attracted a broad literary audience for his autobiographical books, including The Immense Journey (1957), an account of how life established itself on earth, and The Man Who Saw Through Time (1973), a biographical meditation on Francis Bacon, the seventeenth-century philosopher and scientist. Eiseley humanized science and wrote about his personal involvement with it. He wrote poetry as well, collected in Notes of an Alchemist (1972) and Another Kind of Autumn (1977).

Source

Christianson, Gale E. Fox at the Wood's Edge: A Biography of Loren Eiseley. New York: Holt, 1990.

Eisenberg, Deborah (1945– ) short-story writer, playwright

Like Canadian writer Alice Munro, with whom she is often compared, Deborah Eisenberg has built her reputation exclusively on her short stories, which depict urbane sophisticates adrift and unsettled in both foreign countries and more-familiar urban landscapes. Born in 1945 in Chicago, Illinois, Eisenberg graduated with a B.A. from Marlboro College in 1968. She moved to New York and worked in a series of secretarial jobs before beginning to write in 1975. Her first play, Pastorale, was produced in 1981. Several years later she began writing short stories, publishing her first collection, Transactions in a Foreign Currency, in 1986. Critics singled out for praise the elegance of her prose, the freshness of her imagery and metaphors, and her unusual blend of sophisticated irony and lyrical openness. That book and its follow-up, Under the 82nd Airborne (1992) were collected into a single volume, The Stories (So Far) of Deborah Eisenberg (1997). Two additional collections followed: All Around Atlantis (1997) and Twilight of the Superheroes (2006). She is a professor of creative writing at the University of Virginia.

Source

Bartos, Eileen. "An Interview with Deborah Eisenberg," Iowa Review, 23 (Spring–Summer 1993): 67–82.

—Marshall Boswell

Elkin, Stanley (1930–1995) novelist

Stanley Elkin's work is often described as black humor, as the author takes a satirical, verging on sardonic, view of American life. His first novel, Boswell (1964), is a comic story about a young man who attaches himself to famous people. The Dick Gibson Show (1971) exploits what Elkin saw as the surrealistic nature of mass entertainment—in this case, radio and the life of a radio announcer. In a similar vein, The Franchiser (1976) explores the life of a man whose life is creating motels and restaurants. Elkin's later work includes Pieces of Soap (1992), a collection of essays; Van Gogh's Room at Arles: Three Novellas (1993); and Mrs. Ted Bliss (1995), a novel set in Florida. Elkin produced several collections of his shorter pieces, including Criers and Kibitzers, Kibitzers and Criers (1965), Searches and Seizures (1973), Stanley Elkin's Greatest Hits (1980), and Early Elkin (1985).

Source

Dougherty, David C. Stanley Elkin. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Ellis, Bret Easton (1964– ) novelist, short-story writer
 Born in 1964, Bret Easton Ellis grew up in Los Angeles and then moved across the country to attend Bennington College, from which he graduated in 1986. His creative-writing teacher at Bennington helped alert publishers to Ellis's first novel, which was also his senior thesis. Written in an emotionless, minimalist style influenced by Joan DIDION's PLAY IT AS IT LAYS (1970), Ellis's Less Than Zero (1985) is the story of a college student named Clay who returns home to Beverly Hills during one Christmas break to join his overprivileged friends in an aimless cycle of drug use, conspicuous consumption, and casual sex. The novel attracted attention, both for its lurid subject matter and for the relatively young age of the author, and Ellis became a celebrity of sorts. He soon became associated with the so-called Brat Pack, a group that also included Jay MCINERNEY and Tama Janowitz. Ellis's follow-up novel, The Rules of Attraction (1987), was another emotionally arid document of drug-filled ennui, this time on a New England college campus.

Ellis is best known for his American Psycho (1991) and for the public outrage that greeted its initial publication. Narrated by Patrick Bateman, a twenty-six-year-old investment banker, serial killer, and representative 1980s yuppie who lists the name brands on his clothes and facial-care products with the same zombie-like detachment with which he describes his slow, deliberate torturing of young women, the book was originally rejected by Simon and Schuster, thereby reversing Ellis's six-figure advance. The book was eventually published in trade paperback. The Los Angeles chapter of the National Organization for Women (NOW) boycotted the publisher, while reviewers dismissed the book as exploitative, misogynist, and inept. A small cadre of supporters—including Norman MAILER and Gore VIDAL—argued that the book should be read as a critique of consumer culture.

Ellis's other books include the short-story collection The Informers (1994) and the novels Glamorama (1999) and Lunar Park (2005).

Source

Annesley, James. Blank Fictions: Consumerism, Culture, and the Contemporary American Novel. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

—Marshall Boswell

Ellison, Ralph (1913–1994) novelist, essayist, short-story writer

The thing that Americans have to learn over and over again is that they are individuals and they have the responsibility of individual vision.

—Conversations with Ralph Ellison (1995)

Ralph Ellison

Ralph Waldo Ellison was born in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, where his parents—both of whom were children of former slaves—had moved to escape the more racially divided South. Oklahoma, where Ellison spent his first twenty years, engendered in him a sense of independence and frontier optimism that remained with him and served as a primary theme in his writing.

When Ellison was three, his father died after being accidentally stabbed by a shard of ice, and his mother struggled to support her two sons, working primarily as a maid. Ellison found access to books and read constantly. In 1933 he was awarded a music scholarship to Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. Too poor to afford bus fare, Ellison traveled to Tuskegee by hopping freight trains. Upon his arrival he was disturbed by both the racism he observed and the complacency with which most blacks were taught to respond to their condition, yet he remained optimistic and ambitious, a self-proclaimed Renaissance man, playing music as well as football and reading and writing poetry in his leisure time.

Ellison has cited his discovery of T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922) as the event that marked "the beginning of my transformation (or shall we say, metamorphosis) from a would-be composer into some sort of novelist." Informed

INVISIBLE MAN

BY RALPH ELLISON

I am an invisible man. No, I am not a spook such as those who haunted Edgar Allan Poe; nor one of your Hollywood movie ectoplasms. I am a man of substance; of flesh and bone, fiber and liquids--I might even be said to possess a mind. I am invisible, you see, simply because people refuse to recognize me. I am not complaining, nor am I protesting either. It is sometimes advantageous to be unseen, although it is most often rather wearing on the nerves. Then too you're constantly being bumped by those of poor vision. Or again, you <sup>often</sup> ~~sometimes~~ doubt if you really exist. You wonder whether you aren't simply a phantom in other people's minds. Say a figure in a nightmare which the sleeper tries with all his strength to destroy. It's when you feel <sup>like</sup> this ~~way~~ that, out of resentment, you begin to bump people back. And, let me confess, you feel that way most of the time. You <sup>ache with</sup> ~~feel~~ the need to convince yourself that you do exist in the real world, <sup>that you're a part of all the</sup> and you strike out with your fists, you curse and swear to make them recognize you. And it <sup>also seldom</sup> ~~isn't always~~ successful.

Once I accidentally bumped into a man in the dark, and perhaps because of the darkness he saw me and called me an insulting name. I sprang at him, seizing his coat lapels and demanded that he apologize. He was a tall blond man and as my face came close to his he looked insolently out of his blue eyes and cursed me, his breath hot in my face as he struggled, and I pulled his chin down sharp upon the crown of my head, butting him as I had seen the West Indians do, and I felt that his scholarship funds had been exhausted after his junior year, he traveled to New York City to work and study sculpture. There he met Langston Hughes and Richard Wright, who encouraged him to pursue his literary interests. In 1937 Wright published the first of Ellison's many book reviews in New Masses and encouraged him to try fiction writing. Two years later Ellison published his first short story, "Slick Gonna Learn" (1939). Continuing to publish fiction and essays, Ellison joined the merchant marines during the final two years of WORLD WAR II, and in 1945 he began seven years of work on his landmark novel, INVISIBLE MAN (1952). During the next four decades, Ellison worked on a second novel, publishing eight excerpts in magazines, but he failed to complete it before his death. A version heavily edited from his manuscript-in-progress was published in 1999 as Juneteenth.

Ellison published only three books during his lifetime, but the publication of Invisible Man immediately established him as a major contemporary novelist whose innovative style and thematic universality quickly earned the praise of such writers as Saul BELLOW. Ellison had set out to write a novel about a black American pilot taken prisoner by the Germans and appointed leader of the prison camp. It was, he claimed, to be a novel about identity, as the pilot would be challenged "to function with white men and at the same time exercise the fullest potentialities of his personality." Ellison abandoned his original plotline after typing the now famous opening sentence and considering its possibilities: "I am an invisible man." The struggle to establish one's identity remained the focus of Ellison's new novel. "I am invisible," the unnamed narrator continues, "simply because people refuse to see me." Invisible Man chronicles the narrator's transformation from the compliant valedictorian of his Southern black high school into a rioter on the streets of Harlem, or as Ellison notes, from "illusion to reality." The novel won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1953.

Ellison's next two books, Shadow and Act (1964) and Going to the Territory (1986), are collections of essays, lectures, and speeches published between 1942 and 1985. Reviewing Shadow and Act, Stanley Edgar Hyman praised Ellison's "hard doctrine of freedom, responsibility, and fraternity," calling him "the profoundest cultural critic that we have." Ellison's essays address many of the subjects he explored in Invisible Man, namely the search for identity; the social, cultural and political experience of African Americans; and the arts—particularly literature and music. The best-known piece in Shadow and Act, "The World and the Jug," is Ellison's response to the critic Irving Howe's accusation that unlike the work of Wright, Ellison's writing lacked the protest and unrestrained anger he felt should characterize an African American novel. The most esteemed essay in Going to the Territory, "The Little Man at Chehaw Station," celebrates cultural pluralism and artistic integrity, two of Ellison's enduring concerns.

Dust jacket for Ellison's book, called the most distinguished postwar American novel in a 1965 New York Herald Tribune Book Week poll of two hundred authors, editors, and critics

During the 1960s and 1970s he taught at such institutions as Rutgers, Yale, and New York University. An opponent of black nationalism, he was criticized by blacks during the 1970s, even labeled an Uncle Tom. During the 1980s, however, many critical studies devoted to his writing appeared, and three volumes of his own work were published posthumously in the 1990s, The Collected Essays of Ralph Ellison (1995), Flying Home and Other Stories (1996), and Juneteenth: A Novel. Like Invisible Man, Juneteenth explores the complexities of race and identity. While its eclecticism and the grandeur of isolated passages recall the earlier novel, it is a fragment of the epic Ellison had hoped would eclipse his masterpiece. A fourth new book of Ellison's work, Living with Music: Ralph Ellison's Jazz Writings, appeared in 2002.

—John Cusatis

Principal Books by Ellison

Invisible Man. New York: Random House, 1952.

Shadow and Act: Essays. New York: Random House, 1964.

Going to the Territory: Essays. New York: Random House, 1986.

Flying Home and Other Stories, edited by John F. Callahan. New York: Random House, 1996.

Juneteenth: A Novel, edited by Callahan. New York: Random House, 1999.

Studying Ralph Ellison

The study of Ralph Ellison should focus on Invisible Man, with moderate attention given to selected essays and short stories. The paperback edition of Invisible Man (New York: Vintage, 1995) is the most accessible and contains the introduction that Ellison wrote for the thirtieth-anniversary edition. The Collected Essays of Ralph Ellison, edited by John F. Callahan (New York: Modern Library, 1995) includes all of the essays, lectures, and interviews contained in Shadow and Act (1953, 1964) and Going to the Territory (1986) as well as eighteen previously uncollected pieces. The essays are particularly helpful for their autobiographical content and additional insight into Ellison's ideas on American culture. In addition, Flying Home and Other Stories (1996), also edited by Callahan, collects Ellison's early fiction and provides a useful look at his development during the years before the publication of Invisible Man. Another helpful primary source is Trading Twelves: The Selected Letters of Ralph Ellison and Albert Murray, edited by Callahan and Murray (New York: Modern Library, 2000), which collects Ellison's correspondence with his friend from 1949 until 1960. Students who desire a more complete exposure to Ellison's work should also read Juneteenth: A Novel (1999), edited by Callahan.

Most of the secondary sources concerning Ellison devote their attention to Invisible Man; however, a few comprehensive critical volumes exist. Mark Busby's Ralph Ellison (Boston: Twayne, 1991) provides the best overview by a single author and includes a primary and secondary bibliography. Ralph Ellison, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003), and Speaking for You, edited by Kimberly W. Benston (Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1987), collect critical essays from various scholars. Two biographies have been written, Lawrence Jackson's Ralph Ellison: Emergence of Genius (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 2002) and Arnold Rampersad's Ralph Ellison: A Biography (New York: Knopf, 2007). Rampersad was given access to Ellison's Library of Congress collection of papers; consequently, his book provides the more thorough account of Ellison's life. Ellison granted an unusually large number of interviews between 1952 and 1994, many of which are collected in Conversations with Ralph Ellison, edited by Maryemma Graham and Amritjit Singh (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1995), an essential reference that helps elucidate Ellison's creative process, particularly in regard to Invisible Man.

Useful companions to the study of Invisible Man include A Casebook on Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man, edited by Joseph F. Trimmer (New York: Crowell, 1972), which examines the racial and artistic heritage of the novel and includes critical reactions; Cultural Contexts for Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man, edited by Eric J. Sundquist (Boston: Bedford Books of St. Martin's Press, 1995), which includes excerpts from the works of such influential black figures as Booker T. Washington, Richard Wright, and Marcus Garvey, as well as African American songs and folktales; Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man, edited by Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1999); and a collection of essays. Ralph Ellison and the Raft of Hope: A Political Companion to Invisible Man, edited by Lucas E. Morel (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 2004), explores a variety of political perspectives on the novel. The Society for the Study of Southern Literature Bibliography on the Mississippi Quarterly website (<<http://www.missq.msstate.edu/sssl>> viewed July 6, 2007) provides the most current annotated list of secondary sources.

—Student Guide by John Cusatis

Ellmann, Richard (1918–1987) biographer, literary critic

Richard Ellmann was born in Highland Park, Michigan. Educated at Yale, he became a professor at Northwestern University and ended his career at Oxford University. His early critical and biographical studies in Irish literature, especially Yeats: The Man and the Masks (1948) and The Identity of Yeats (1954), led him to write the biography James Joyce (1959; revised 1982). Ellmann and Leon Edel are often cited as the two most important biographers in modern literary study. Ellmann did not employ the psychological analysis and novelistic techniques that Edel exploited, however; in his Golden Codgers (1973) Ellman acknowledged the importance of psychology in modern biographies and predicted that its use would increase, while he expressed reservations about Edel's approach.

Ellmann's biography Oscar Wilde was published after his death. The biography was a popular success and won a Pulitzer Prize.

Sources

Dick, Susan, ed. Essays for Richard Ellmann: Omnium Gatherum.

Kingston, Ontario: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1989.

Heaney, Seamus. The Place of Writing. Atlanta, Ga.: Scholars Press, 1989.

Elroy, James (1948– ) novelist, memoirist

James Elroy was born Lee Earle Elroy in Los Angeles, California. His parents separated when Elroy was still a child, and in 1958 his mother was strangled to death while Elroy, then ten years old, was staying with his father. This event, which he chronicled in My Dark Places: An L.A. Crime Memoir (1996), left a lasting mark on him and has affected all of his novels.

Elroy was arrested some thirty times for petty crimes and drug use before he wrote his first novel, Brown's Requiem (1981), a private-eye melodrama that drew upon his own experiences. His most significant achievement is his L.A. Quartet, which consists of the novels The Black Dahlia (1987), The Big Nowhere (1988), L.A. Confidential (1990), and White Jazz (1992). Taken altogether, the tetralogy provides a wide-ranging portrait of Los Angeles from the 1940s to the 1950s, touching upon not only its crime history but also its racial divisions and its central role in the Red Scare of the 1950s. American Tabloid (1995) takes on J. Edgar Hoover's FBI and the Bay of Pigs, and The Cold Six Thousand (2001) follows a trio of crime fighters who, in the aftermath of John F. Kennedy's assassination, get caught up in drug running to Vietnam and the assassinations of Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy.

Source

Wolfe, Peter. Like Hot Knives to the Brain: James Ellroy's Search for Himself. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2006.

Epoch (1947– ) periodical

First established in 1947, Epoch is a major literary magazine published by Cornell University. Edited by Michael Koch and published three times a year by the university's creative-writing students, the magazine features essays, poems, short stories, screenplays, and graphic art. The novelist Baxter Hathaway launched the magazine in concert with his inauguration of the Cornell creative-writing program, and by the 1950s Epoch had become a prestigious launching pad for up-and-coming writers. Thomas Pynchon, Philip Roth, and Joyce Carol Oates all published some of their earliest work in Epoch.

—Marshall Boswell

Erdrich, Louise (1954– ) novelist, poet

I'm so glad to talk about being a native writer because the other pressure I get is being talked about as a "commercial" writer versus a "literary" writer. The fact is, you write what you can write. I don't have a lot of choice. I still write in the same way. I curl up in my chair and just write it like I'm writing a poem.

—Interview (1996)

Karen Louise Erdrich grew up in Wahpeton, a small town in North Dakota. Her grandfather was tribal chair of the Turtle Mountain Band of the Ojibwa Nation. Her father, Ralph Erdrich, was a German immigrant who taught at the American Indian boarding school in Wahpeton. Erdrich earned degrees in creative writing from Dartmouth (B.A., 1976) and Johns Hopkins University (M.A., 1979). In 1981 she married Michael Dorris, a professor of anthropology and head of the Native American-studies program at Dartmouth. The couple collaborated on several works, including The Broken Cord (1989), which deals with fetal alcohol syndrome, an issue the couple confronted when they adopted children from alcoholic mothers. The marriage was troubled, and Dorris committed suicide in 1997 in the wake of allegations of child abuse.

Louise Erdrich

Erdrich's early work, including her first novel, Love Medicine (1984, revised in 1993), was heavily influenced by William Faulkner. She was impressed with his handling of the broad spectrum of human experience, his family sagas, and his comic genius. Critics praised Erdrich's novel, an interweaving of fourteen stories of mixed-blood and Chipewewa families, for the poetic quality of her prose and sense of humor. Erdrich's second novel, The Beet Queen (1986), explores the background of her German ancestors. Set in a town similar to Wahpeton, it is an historical family saga covering the period from 1932 to 1972. Tracks (1988) and The Bingo Palace (1994) cover more-concentrated periods of time but continue the stories of characters in the earlier novels. The Antelope Wife (1998) introduces a new set of characters but continues the author's major themes: the interrelatedness of American Indian and white characters, the connections between the past and the present, and the influence of the Midwestern environment on the histories of families and individuals.

Dust jacket for Erdrich's first book, 1984, winner of the National Book Critics Circle for Fiction and the American Book Award

Erdrich has also published two volumes of poetry, Jacklight (1984) and Baptism of Desire (1989); three volumes of nonfiction, including The Blue Jay's Dance: A Birth Year (1995), and several novels for children, including The Birchbark House (1999). She continued her sequence of novels about Native American life in The Last Report on the Miracles at Little No Horse (2001). The Master Butcher's Singing Club (2003) is about German immigrants to North Dakota after World War I. The Game Silence (2006), a children's book set among the Ojibwe people, won the Scott O'Dell Award for Historical Fiction.

Principal Books by Erdrich

Imagination. Westerville, Ohio: Merrill, 1981.

Jacklight. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1984.

Love Medicine. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1984.

The Beet Queen. New York: Holt, 1986.

Tracks. New York: Holt, 1988.

Baptism of Desire. New York: Harper & Row, 1989.

The Crown of Columbus, by Erdrich and Michael Dorris. New York: HarperCollins, 1991.

Route Two, by Erdrich and Dorris. Northridge, Calif.: Lord John, 1991.

The Bingo Palace. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.

The Blue Jay's Dance: A Birth Year. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Dust jacket for the second of Erdrich's six novels in her autobiographical North Dakota cycle about Chippewa life in the twentieth century

- Tales of Burning Love*. New York: HarperCollins, 1996.
Grandmother's Pigeon. New York: Hyperion Press, 1996.
The Antelope Wife. New York: HarperCollins, 1998.
The Birchbark House. New York: Hyperion, 1999.
The Last Report on the Miracles at Little No Horse. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.
Books and Islands in Ojibwe Country. Washington, D.C.: National Geographic, 2003.
The Master Butchers Singing Club. New York: HarperCollins, 2003.
Four Souls. New York: HarperCollins, 2004.
The Game of Silence. New York: HarperCollins, 2005.
The Painted Drum. New York: HarperCollins, 2005.

Studying Louise Erdrich

As of 2007 and since the appearance of her first poetry collection, Jacklight, and first novel, Love Medicine, both in 1984, Louise Erdrich has published ten novels, two poetry collections, four children's books, and three books of nonfiction. Most critical attention has been paid to her novels, the first three of which—Love Medicine, The Beet Queen (1986), and Tracks (1988)—are most often considered her important works. However, more-recent critics have shifted focus toward Erdrich's work published since the death of her husband, Michael Dorris, in 1997. Since the publication of her memoir, The Blue Jay's Dance: A Birth Year (1985), a slight shift in focus away from the romantic relationships between adults toward the connections between parents and children (especially between mothers and daughters) can be discerned in her work. This shift corresponds also to her production of children's literature, the first work of which was Grandmother's Pigeon (1996).

Study of her treatment of native culture and belief should begin with Love Medicine, Tracks, The Antelope Wife (1998), and Four Souls (2004). The life of European immigrants along the border are treated at greater length in The Beet Queen, The Last Report on the Miracles at Little No Horse (2001), and The Master Butchers Singing Club (2003).

Critical work on native identity can be found in The Chippewa Landscape of Louise Erdrich, edited by Allan Chavkin (Birmingham: University of Alabama Press, 1999), and in Jeanne Rosier Smith's Writing Tricksters: Mythic Gambols in American Ethnic Literature (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997). Louise Erdrich's Love Medicine: A Casebook, edited by Hertha D. Sweet Wong (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000), provides a comprehensive discussion of native identity and other themes, aesthetic choices, and characterizations found in the first novel. In her Demythologizing the Romance of Conquest (New York: Greenwood Press, 2000), Jeanne Armstrong provides extended analysis of native-immigrant conflict in Tracks.

Peter Beidler and Gay Barton's A Reader's Guide to the Novels of Louise Erdrich (Jackson: University Press of Missouri, 1999) provides character analysis, genealogies, and plot summaries for the early novels through Tales of Burning Love. Connie Jacobs's The Novels of Louise Erdrich: Stories of Her People (New York: Peter Lang, 2001) addresses the importance of storytelling in the Native American experience. Lorena Laura Stookey's Louise Erdrich: A Critical Companion (New York: Greenwood Press, 1999) devotes a chapter to each novel published to that time, with basic analysis and a general secondary bibliography.

The author's personal interest and reaction to Native American concerns, as well as extensive discussion of craft and collaboration as revealed in interviews, can be found in Conversations with Louise Erdrich and Michael Dorris, edited by Allan and Nancy Feyl Chavki (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994).

—Student Guide by Paul Plisiewicz

Estleman, Loren (1952– ) fiction writer

Loren Estleman was born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and earned his B.A. at Eastern Michigan University in 1974. He is best known as a writer of hard-boiled mysteries and westerns. He won the Golden Spur Award from the Western Writers of America in 1982 for Aces and Eights (1981), and the Shamus Award for Sugartown (1984). His mystery series protagonists are private detective Amos Walker and contract killer Peter Macklin; his western series hero is U.S. Marshall Page Murdock.

Eugenides, Jeffrey (1960– ) novelist

Jeffrey Eugenides was born in an affluent suburb of Detroit called Grosse Point, which has featured prominently in both of his acclaimed novels, The Virgin Suicides (1993) and the Pulitzer Prize-winning Middlesex (2002). He attended Brown University, receiving his B.A. in 1983 and later attended the writing workshop at Stanford, where he earned an M.F.A. in 1986. Before committing himself to his writing, Eugenides worked with Mother Teresa in Calcutta and traveled in the Middle East and in North Africa. In 1991 he published an excerpt from a novel-in-progress in the Paris Review, for which he was awarded the Aga Khan Prize. The finished novel, The Virgin Suicides, appeared two years later; a novel about sexual confusion in a 1970s suburb, the book is narrated by a chorus of male voices who focus on a mysterious family of lovely daughters, each of whom attempts suicide. Critics praised the novel for its daringly unconventional point of view—first-person plural—and for its lyrical restraint. Nine years later, Eugenides published his much-anticipated follow-up, the multigenerational epic Middlesex, narrated by Cal (Calliope) Stephanides, a hermaphrodite who has a female childhood and a male adulthood. Cal's personal story of sexual transformation in 1960s suburbia is embedded within a tale of immigrant triumph and racial strife in postwar Detroit.

Everett, Percival (1956– ) novelist, short-story writer
Percival Everett's novels blend social satire with impressive erudition. Born in Ft. Gordon, Georgia, Everett received an A.B. from the University of Miami in 1977, attended the University of Oregon, and received an M.A. degree from Brown University (1982). His novels include Suder (1983), Cutting Lisa (1986), Zulus (1989), God's Country (1994), and Glyph (1999). His Frenzy (1996), retells the myth of Dionysus. A trip to a chain bookstore was the inspiration for his most important work to date: upon realizing that all of his fiction, including his forays into science fiction and fantasy, was being shelved in the African American Literature section, Everett wrote Erasure (2002), a viciously funny satire on modern publishing.

Source

Russett, Margaret. "Race under Erasure: for Percival Everett, 'a Piece of Fiction,'" Callaloo: A Journal of African Diaspora Arts and Letters, 28 (Spring 2005): 358–368.

—Marshall Boswell

Evergreen Review (1957–1973) periodical

This influential avant-garde magazine published the BEATS and promising writers of the 1960s. Barney Rossett, the founder and editor, became famous for assembling an impressive collection of work by such controversial writers as Susan SONTAG, Henry Miller, and Jack KEROUAC. Evergreen Review also devoted itself to the graphic arts, music (especially jazz), and social issues. The magazine's stance exemplified what came to be called the counterculture in the 1960s.

Existentialism

Existentialism, a complex philosophy often oversimplified, has its roots in the nineteenth-century writings of Søren Kierkegaard and Friedrich Nietzsche, among others. It was a term adopted by Jean-Paul Sartre for his speculations, shared by other European philosophers, notably Martin Buber, Martin Heidegger, and Albert Camus, about the isolation of man, the absence of a model for human morality, and the burden of obligatory moral choices without the certainty of guiding principles—a condition that Sartre generalized as the burden of freedom and otherwise was characterized as man's futile search for a connection with the divine. That philosophy, which blossomed in Europe, especially France, after Sartre's 1946 statement, L'Existentialisme est un humanisme, frequently informed literary expression and became a convenient label retrospectively applied to Modernist writers in the United States, beginning with Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, Nelson Algren, and Dashiell Hammett, among others of the so-called hard-boiled school. Perhaps more than any other American, Norman MAILER has used the term to define his life and work. One of his collections of essays is titled Existential Errands (1972). To some degree, Saul BELLOW, Paul BOWLES, Ralph ELLISON, William STYRON, Walker Percy, and Richard Wright have been influenced by existentialism: they have created characters who exist on the margins of society or who have been oppressed by society's institutions and seek ways to master their own fates.

Sources

Finkelstein, Sidney. Existentialism and Alienation in American Literature. New York: International Publishers, 1965.

Lehan, Richard. A Dangerous Crossing: French Literary Existentialism and the Modern American Novel. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1973.

Exley, Frederick (1929–1992) novelist

On Sunday, the eleventh of November, 196–, while sitting at the bar of the New Parrot Restaurant . . . awaiting the telecast of the New York Giants–Dallas Cowboys football game, I had what, at the time, I took to be a heart attack.

—A Fan's Notes (1968)

Frederick Exley was born in Watertown, New York, in 1929. He received his B.A. degree in 1953 from the University of Southern California. Exley is best known for A Fan's Notes (1968), a thinly veiled fictional memoir of his alcoholic misadventures. The book frankly describes his divorces, his hard drinking, and his various sexual encounters, not to mention his suicide attempt, all organized around the narrator's lifelong obsession with professional football. A Fan's Notes was received favorably and earned him a teaching position at the University of Iowa's writing workshop. His two subsequent works, Pages from a Cold Island (1975) and Last Notes from Home (1988), continue the fictionalized portrait of Exley's life, though neither volume generated the enthusiasm that greeted his first book. He died in 1992 after two strokes.

Source

Yardley, Jonathan. Misfit: The Strange Life of Frederick Exley. New York: Random House, 1997.

—Marshall Boswell

F

Faugères, Margaretta V. Bleeker (1771–1801)

poet

Margaretta Bleeker was born October 11, 1771, the daughter of John J. Bleeker and the poet Ann Eliza Schuyler BLEECKER. Margaretta grew up in the village of Tomhanick, a frontier town eighteen miles north of Albany. Her childhood was marked by several Indian attacks, her family's flight from an invading British army, and the sudden deaths of her sister and her mother. Following her mother's death when Margaretta was thirteen, she and her father moved to New York City. Margaretta married a Frenchman named Peter Faugères at the age of twenty. He was a radical who supported the revolution in his own country and was a physically abusive man. When he died of yellow fever in 1795, he left his wife and daughter in poverty.

During the years of her marriage Faugères edited the prose and poetry of her mother, Ann Bleeker. Faugères published Bleeker's work in 1793, including with it thirty-four of her own poems, which she had formerly published in The New-York Magazine under the pseudonym "Ella," and four of her own short essays. Many of Faugères's poems that appear in this collection are confessional. They focus on her troubled life and on her struggle to rebel against the repressive social environment she faced as a woman in eighteenth-century America. The poem "Evening" (1793) recalls the death of her brother, her father, her mother, and another loved one. These tragedies have apparently left her without hope, and she seems to want only to endure until her own death releases her from life. Faugères, however, remained stubbornly committed to radicalism in both politics and religion. Two of her poems supported the French Revolution, and in "To the Reverend J*** N*****" (1793), she honored the evangelical writer John Newton.

Faugères's poems were also marked by worship of nature. In "The Hudson" (1793) Faugères traced the Hudson River from its source. The poem narrates the progression of human development, bringing to life the towns that cluster on the river's shores, and describes the scenery that frames the river. As Faugères follows the river to New York City, she relates historical events such as the Revolutionary-era murder of a young Loyalist woman, Jane McCrea; the American victory against the British at Saratoga; and Benedict Arnold's treason at West Point.

Faugères's major work, Belisarius: A Tragedy (1795), is a blank-verse drama that tells the story of a king who is "a blind, abandoned beggared old man." Belisarius's circumstances are analogous to those of the French in their political crisis: the fictional king, like the true patriots of France, is surrounded by corruption, heartless revolutionaries, and degenerate courtiers. Faugères attempted to interest the John Street Theatre in New York in the play, but the theater rejected it. In The Ghost of John Young the Homicide (1797) she dramatizes a gory murder, but rather than focus on the details of the crime, she explores the murderer's motives, comments on the cruel treatment he received at the hands of the court, and asserts the ineffectiveness of capital punishment in deterring crime.

After her husband died, Faugères taught school at an academy in New Brunswick and later in Brooklyn. She died January 9, 1801.

Works

Faugères, Margaretta V. Belisarius: A Tragedy. London: P. Vailant, 1767; Early American Imprints, 28652.

Bleeker, Ann Eliza and Faugères, Margaretta V. Posthumous Works of Ann Eliza Bleeker, in Prose and Verse: to Which Is Added a Collection of Essays, Prose and Poetical by Margaretta V. Faugères. New York: Printed by T. & J. Swords, 1793; Early American Imprints, 25208.

Source

Detsi-Diamanti, Zoe. Early American Women Dramatists 1775–1860. New York: Garland, 1998.

Federalist

Americans who supported the proposed CONSTITUTION were referred to as Federalists. They advocated the formation of a strong centralized government, one that would be less swayed by the passions and tumult of the general populace. When the Constitution came to a vote, it was ratified; the Federalists proved successful because of their keen organizational and rhetorical skills. THE FEDERALIST PAPERS (1787) were a series of essays written individually under the pseudonym “Publius,” later assumed to be James MADISON, Alexander HAMILTON, and John JAY. Samuel Low’s comedy The Politician Out-Witted (1788) is a SATIRE on the ANTI-FEDERALIST opposition to the Constitution.

Sources

Ferling, John E. A Leap in the Dark: The Struggle to Create the American Republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Kammen, Michael G. A Machine That Would Go of Itself: The Constitution in American Culture. New York: Knopf, 1986.

Rakove, Jack N. Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Knopf, 1996.

The Federalist (The Federalist Papers)

by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay (1787–1788) essays

Under the pen name “Publius” (the pseudonym was chosen to imply that they spoke for the best interests of the public), Alexander HAMILTON, James MADISON, and John JAY wrote eighty-five essays to persuade the voters at the New York State convention to support ratification of the CONSTITUTION of the United States. These essays, which were a clause-by-clause defense of the Constitution, appeared in newspapers such as the Independent Journal from late 1787 to 1788. Later, they were published together under the title The Federalist (also called The Federalist Papers). The identity of “Publius” was kept secret at the time, but it is now generally accepted that Hamilton wrote fifty-one of the essays; Madison wrote twenty-six; Jay wrote five; and Hamilton and Madison jointly wrote three. Madison wrote the two most famous essays, numbers 10, “The Utility of the Union as a Safeguard Against Domestic Faction and Insurrection,” and 51, “The Structure of the Government Must Furnish the Proper Checks and Balances Between the Different Departments.”

The authors of The Federalist argued that the new constitution would guarantee a well-organized national government. Defending the creation of the new republic, Madison stressed that the success of a free government was to be measured by its ability to control “an interested and overbearing majority.” Madison continued: “To secure the public good and private rights against the danger of such a faction, and at the same time to preserve the spirit and form of popular government, is then the great object to which our enquiries are directed.”

Both Madison and Hamilton defended provisions in the Constitution that guarded against governmental abuse. In essay number 51, for example, Madison emphasized that the separation of the departments of governments and a system of checks and balances would protect the public good:

It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place, oblige it to control itself.

Hamilton argued that the creation of federal courts with power over the legislature—in other words, judicial review—would provide additional security against excesses of government. In essay number 78, “The Judiciary Department,” he stated: “The courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. . . . Where the will of the legislature declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people declared in the constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter, rather than the former.”

Jay spoke to the importance of unity among the states. Given the pressing domestic and foreign problems facing the United States at the end of the eighteenth century, Jay emphasized the importance of entrusting Congress with power:

. . . Congress was composed of many wise and experienced men. That being convened from different parts of the country, they brought with them and communicated to each other a variety of useful information. . . . That they were individually interested in the public liberty and prosperity, and therefore that it was not less their inclination, than their duty, to recommend only such measures, as after the most mature deliberation they really thought prudent and advisable.

The eighty-five essays in The Federalist expressed the belief that the Constitution was the best plan of government that could have been created in 1787. Because the three authors did not stress the conflicts and compromises that had taken place at the convention in Philadelphia, they placed the Constitution in its most favorable light. The authors admitted that the new national government had considerably more power than the national government under the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, but as a federal republic its powers were limited and would be used to protect rather than violate the rights of the people. The Federalist remains the most authoritative and profound explanation of the Constitution, and the most famous contribution to American discourse on government.

Work

The Federalist: A Collection of Essays, Written in Favour of the New Constitution, as Agreed upon by the Federal Convention, September 17, 1787. . . . 2 volumes. New York: J. & M. Lean, 1788; Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 2000; Early American Imprints, 21127, 35581.

Sources

- Bailyn, Bernard. The Debate on the Constitution: Federalist and Antifederalist Speeches, Articles, and Letters during the Struggle over Ratification. New York: Library of America, 1993.
- Ferling, John E. A Leap in the Dark: The Struggle to Create the American Republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Furtwangler, Albert. The Authority of Publius: A Reading of The Federalist Papers. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Kesler, Charles R., ed. Saving the Revolution: The Federalist Papers and the American Founding. New York: Free Press, 1987.
- Wills, Garry. Explaining America: The Federalist. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1981.

Fenno, John (1751–1798) editor, essayist

John Fenno, born on August 12, 1751, was probably the son of an alehouse keeper and leather dresser, Ephraim Fenno, and his wife, Mary Chapman. Fenno attended The Old South Writing School on Boston Common and graduated circa 1768. He worked as an assistant teacher in a Massachusetts school and seems to have served during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION as secretary to General Artemas Ward (1727–1800). In May 1777 Fenno married Mary Curtiss. The couple moved to New York in 1789 to escape financial problems that threatened to overwhelm them in Boston.

An ardent supporter of the CONSTITUTION and of the government of George WASHINGTON, Fenno set out to create a political organ dedicated to the FEDERALIST Party. By April 15, 1789, the first issue of his Gazette of the United States (1789–1790; 1791–1798) appeared just in time to announce the preparations for Washington's inauguration. Fenno saw himself as the editor of the newspaper rather than its publisher or printer, and pledged to his readers that he would publish not only the formal proceedings of Congress, but also complete descriptions of congressional debates. He declared that he would publish essays on "great subjects of government." Fenno's goal was to reach not only the elite Federalists of New York City but also its "mechanics" or artisans. Although Fenno insisted on the integrity of his reportage, opponents quickly accused him of being biased and inaccurate.

When the national government relocated to Philadelphia in 1790, Fenno moved his struggling newspaper there, too. Leading Federalists, such as Alexander HAMILTON, recognizing the importance of a progovernment paper, helped fund the Gazette and rescue Fenno from debt. Hamilton, in particular, used the pages of Fenno's paper to rally support for his national fiscal policies, publishing essays under the pseudonym "T. L." and "An American." Fenno was a mixed blessing for the Federalists. Many criticized him for his combative journalistic style. The more-elite Federalists, who preferred to rule without popular interference, were shocked by his insistence that there should be public discussion of political affairs.

Despite objections to Fenno's style and to his participatory ideology, the Gazette developed the largest national circulation of any newspaper in the 1790s. Fenno remained an admirer of George Washington and of a strong, active Congress. He believed the Constitution was inviolate, and he vigorously opposed any amendments to it. From his perspective, any criticism of the government or its policies dishonored the nation itself. Thomas JEFFERSON, increasingly opposed to the policies of Washington's administration, financially supported the rival newspapers of Philip FRENEAU and Benjamin Franklin BACHE and used them to air his political views.

Fenno did not hesitate to criticize those who opposed the federal government, and by 1791 the battles in print between the Jeffersonian Freneau and the Federalist Fenno frequently carried over into the streets. Yet, despite the brawls in print and in pubs, Fenno's Gazette continued to publish serious philosophical essays on politics, including John ADAMS's Discourses on Davila (1805); to carry foreign news from Europe; and to print essays on such controversial topics as slavery and religious tolerance. Fenno also occasionally published POETRY.

When the yellow-fever epidemic broke out in Philadelphia in 1793, Fenno refused to evacuate the city despite a panic so great that, as he wrote, "Husbands deserted their wives; wives their husbands; children their parents." Fenno, his wife, and their fourteen children survived. When a second epidemic broke out, Fenno again refused to flee to safety, saying that it was his "duty to continue here as long as other printers remain at their posts." He succumbed to the fever on September 14, 1798.

Works

Gazette of the United States. New York: John Fenno, 1789–1793; Early American Imprints.

Fenno, John. Letters of John Fenno and John Ward Fenno, 1779–1800: Part 1: 1779–1790, edited by John B. Hench. Worcester: American Antiquarian Society, 1980.

Source

Pasley, Jeffrey L. The Tyranny of Printers: Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Fergusson, Elizabeth Graeme (1737–1801) poet, translator, diarist

Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson was born in Philadelphia on February 3, 1737, the youngest of nine children of the socially prominent Ann Diggs and Dr. Thomas Graeme. Her parents, advocates of ENLIGHTENMENT child-rearing theories, saw that their sons and daughters were well educated. Elizabeth Graeme studied philosophy and theology, and by the age of fifteen, was conversant in French and German and could translate Latin. She took up literary pursuits as a distraction, undertaking an ambitious project, the translation of François de Salignac de la Mothe-Fénelon's (1651–1715) Le Télémaque: des écoles ou Les aventures de Télémaque, fils d'Ulysse (The Adventures of Telemachus, the Son of Ulysses).

Fergusson organized one of the earliest American literary salons, modeled after the French gatherings. The Graeme Park Club met every Saturday, bringing together a group of women that included the poets Susanna WRIGHT, Annis Boudinot STOCKTON, and Hannah GRIFFITTS. Eventually, the Club absorbed its male counterpart, the SWAINS, a group of writers and painters organized by William SMITH. Throughout the 1750s and 1760s the artist Benjamin West (1738–1820) and writers Joseph Reed (1741–1785) and Jacob Duché (1737–1798), together with Elizabeth Graeme's talented female circle, advanced the reputation of belles lettres in the colonies.

Fergusson contributed verses to the weekly meetings, using the pseudonym "Laura." Her "A Parody on the Foregoing Lines by a Lady, assuming the Name of LAURA" parodied Alexander Pope:

*How happy is the country Parson's lot?
Forgetting Bishops, as by them forgot
Tranquil of spirit, with an easy mind,
To all his Vestry's votes he sits resign'd:
Of manners gentle, and of temper even,
He jogs his flocks, with easy pace, to heaven.*

Following a trip to England, where she was befriended by literary people such as the novelist Laurence Sterne (1713– 1768), Elizabeth circulated to the Club the journal she had kept while in London.

In 1765 Elizabeth's mother died, and she returned from England to assume the domestic management of the family's estate. In April 1772, despite her father's objections, the thirty-five-year-old Elizabeth married a poor Scottish immigrant, Henry Hugh Fergusson. Soon after the marriage, Dr. Graeme died, leaving Graeme Park to his daughter. The Fergussons lived together only three years, for in 1775 Henry Fergusson left for England, perhaps to handle some family business. He returned in 1777, in the midst of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, arriving in Philadelphia with General Howe's army of occupation. American officials, noting his LOYALISM, would not allow him to join his wife on the estate. To dispel suspicions that she too was a British sympathizer, Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson donated generously to the American cause.

General George WASHINGTON allowed Elizabeth several opportunities to visit her husband in British-held Philadelphia. She proved impolitic, however, agreeing on several occasions to carry incriminating notes or to serve as an intermediary in questionable negotiations between the Revolutionary government and its enemies. At war's end Henry was branded a traitor, and his wife's estate was confiscated. Elizabeth and Henry, separated by an ocean, never saw each other again.

For several years after the war, Elizabeth sustained a vigorous effort to have Graeme Park returned to her. She petitioned the Pennsylvania government, insisting that the estate belonged solely to her and that she was being unjustly punished for her husband's political sins. In a petition to the government she challenged the legal assumption that a wife's property became her husband's property, insisting on married women's property rights (which Abigail ADAMS urged her husband to champion in the new nation). Fergusson's struggle to regain her property dragged on, and her financial condition worsened. The state government restored her rights to Graeme Park in 1791, but by then Fergusson was impoverished, and was forced to sell the estate.

Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson spent the remainder of her life assisting in the upbringing of her late sister's children, and, as she told a friend in 1798, "reading the letters of departed friends," including those from her husband, before burning them all. To the end, she spoke affectionately of her "own dear Henry," yet denied that she shared his political beliefs. "I was," she wrote to John DICKINSON, "ever on the side of my country." Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson died on February 23, 1801.

Sources

Ousterhout, Anne M. The Most Learned Woman in America: A Life of Elizabeth Graeme Fergusson. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2003.

Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Filson, John (circa 1753–1788) historian

An early American adventurer, John Filson was born in East Fallowfield, Pennsylvania, the son of Davison Filson, a farmer, and Eleanor Clarke Filson. Filson is best remembered for his contribution to the early frontier history of Kentucky, and for his hand in creating the legend of Daniel Boone (1734–1820). His early education included the local common school and West Nottingham Academy in Maryland, where he studied the classics, mathematics, and surveying. Having inherited his father's farm in 1776, Filson preferred to work as a surveyor. He was drawn to Kentucky by opportunities for surveyors and by speculation in military land warrants or bounties paid to Revolutionary War veterans, which could be bought at a depreciated value. Having established himself in Kentucky, Filson succeeded in securing title to some thirteen thousand acres, most by warrant and some by purchase. Filson quickly seized on a scheme to increase the value of his land.

In 1784 he published the first written history of Kentucky, The Discovery, Settlement, and Present State of Kentucke. Filson's history was based in part on his own experience and in part on interviews he conducted with frontiersmen, including Daniel Boone. In a manner similar to Thomas JEFFERSON's Notes on the State of Virginia, Filson included information about Kentucky's topography, soil quality, and climate. Although the information he provided is purported to be factual, his descriptions fell just shy of paradise, a practice in keeping with Filson's plan to attract settlers to the region.

The appendix contained "The Adventures of Col. Daniel Boon," an allegedly first-person report that was probably written by Filson. It served as an endorsement of Filson's claims and, at the same time, helped to establish the Boone legend:

This account of my adventures will inform the reader of the most remarkable events of this country. —I now live in peace and safety, enjoying the sweets of liberty, and the bounties of Providence, with my once fellow-sufferers, in this delightful country, which I have seen purchased with a vast expence of blood and treasure, delighting in the prospect of its being, in a short time, one of the most opulent and powerful states on the continent of North-America; which, with the love and gratitude of my countrymen, I esteem a sufficient reward for all my toil and dangers.

The most accurate portion of the book was an engraved map of Kentucky. Despite its flaws, Filson's Discovery sold in numerous editions, including publications in London and Paris.

In 1785 Filson returned to Kentucky and established himself as a merchant. He never married, and his fortunes, like those of many speculators, continued to rise and fall throughout his career. During Filson's first year in Kentucky, he served as a teacher in a private school in Lexington. He continued to make exploratory and surveying trips into the frontier in Illinois and Ohio. During one of those trips, Filson disappeared.

Work

Filson, John. The Discovery, Settlement, and Present State of Kentucke . . . Wilmington, Del.: James Adams, 1784; New York: Corinth Books, 1962; Early American Imprints, 18467, 25648.

Sources

Faragher, John Mack. Daniel Boone: The Life and Legend of an American Pioneer. New York: Holt, 1992.

Hallock, Thomas. From the Fallen Tree: Frontier Narratives, Environmental Politics, and the Roots of a National Pastoral, 1749–1826. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Walton, John. John Filson of Kentucke. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1956.

Fiske, Sarah Symmes (1652–1692) theologian

Little is known about the life of Sarah Symmes Fiske, whose spiritual biography, A Confession of Faith; Or, a Summary of Divinity, was written in 1677 when Fiske was twenty-five years old. She was born in Charleston, Massachusetts, and probably was reared on her parents' farm. Around 1671, at the age of nineteen, she married the Reverend Moses Fiske, who served as minister in the Congregational church at Braintree from 1672 to 1708. The couple had fourteen children; only eight survived infancy.

Fiske's only literary work, A Confession was prompted by her acceptance to full membership in the Braintree church. Fiske's command of language, grammar, and style in this brief, eight-page narrative suggests that she had received a solid education despite her rural environment, modest circumstances, and gender.

A Confession moves logically and steadily through subjects of theology not considered by seventeenth-century Calvinists to be appropriate topics for a woman's spiritual biography. Instead of emphasizing internal matters of grace and the inner turmoil of the salvation-seeking writer, the work is devoted to sketching Puritan theology and logic. Fiske's discussion of Puritan theology—including the nature of Christ, sin, predestination, death, and grace—reveals considerable erudition, as do her discussions of the sacraments and the detrimental impact of guilt on individual character. A Confession also contains a Puritan historiography that details God's redemptive plan for the world. The narrative was published in 1704, twelve years after Fiske's death.

Work

Fiske, Sarah. A Confession of Faith: or, A Summary of Divinity. Drawn Up By a Young Gentle-Woman, in the Twenty-Fifth Year of Her Age. . . . Boston: Printed for Benjamin Eliot, 1704; Early American Imprints, 1156.

Source

Rothman, Ellen K., ed. New England Women and Their Families in the 18th and 19th Centuries—Personal Papers, Letters, and Diaries Series A, Manuscript Collections from the American Antiquarian Society. Bethesda, Md.: University Publications of America, 1997.

Foster, Hannah Webster (1758–1840) novelist

You have now emerged from that mist of fanciful folly, which, in a measure obscured the brilliance of your youthful days. True, you figured among the first rate coquettes; while your friends, who knew your accomplishments, lamented the misapplication of them; but now they rejoice at the returning empire of reason.
—The Coquette (1797)

Hannah Webster Foster's THE COQUETTE, OR, THE HISTORY OF ELIZA WHARTON was one of the first epistolary novels—a work written as a series of letters—in American literary history. Born on September 10, 1758, in Salisbury, Massachusetts, Hannah Webster was the daughter of Hannah Wainwright and her merchant husband, Grant Webster. Hannah's mother died when she was four years old, and her father sent her to boarding school in 1762. While in her early twenties, she met the Reverend John Foster of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and in April 1785 she married the young Dartmouth graduate. The couple settled in Brighton, Massachusetts, where Reverend Foster served as pastor of the First Church for forty-five years. The Fosters had six children, one of whom died in infancy. It was not until after the birth of their last child, Harriet, that Hannah Foster published The Coquette, or, The History of Eliza Wharton.

Published anonymously "By a Lady of Massachusetts," The Coquette followed the formula of the SENTIMENTAL NOVEL, which was then popular in England. The book recounts the seduction of a young woman and the destruction of her reputation. Advertisements for the novel claimed it was "Founded on Fact"; Foster based her tale on the life of Elizabeth Whitman of Hartford, Connecticut, who had run away with a dishonorable lover, been abandoned, and died, alone and friendless, after giving birth to an illegitimate child. The account was first reported on July 29, 1788 in The Salem Mercury, and was widely read. Foster skillfully adapted the story, creating a villain—the seducer, Major Peter Sanford—in the style of English novelist Samuel Richardson. Her heroine, Eliza Wharton, is a complex character who rebels against society's gender norms; although her life ends in tragedy and disgrace, Eliza has chosen to be a victim of self-destruction rather than a victim of social restraints.

When published in 1797, The Coquette was immediately successful. It was reprinted in 1802 and eight more times between 1824 and 1828. By the end of the nineteenth century, the novel saw a total of thirteen editions. The author remained anonymous until 1866, when Hannah Webster Foster's name appeared on the title page. Foster's only other published work, The Boarding School; or Lessons of a Preceptress to her Pupils (1798), took the form of popular advice manuals of the day, and offered instruction on reading and writing, needlework and dance, through a series of lectures from a teacher to her students.

Little is known of Foster's life following publication of The Coquette. She moved from Massachusetts to Montreal, Canada, to live with Eliza Cushing, her daughter. Foster died in Montreal on April 17, 1840, at the age of eighty-one.

Work

Foster, Hannah Webster. The Coquette, or, The History of Eliza Wharton. Boston: Printed by Samuel Etheridge for E. Larkin. Early American Imprints, 32142.

Sources

- Barnes, Elizabeth. States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Bontatibus, Donna R. The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation: A Call for Socio-Political Reform. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.
- Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Stern, Julia A. The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Franklin, Ann Smith (1696–1763) printer

One of the first women printers in the American colonies, Ann Smith Franklin was born in Boston, the daughter of Samuel and Anna Smith. In 1723 she married James Franklin (1697–1735), a printer who had trained in England. The couple had five children.

James Franklin had established his own printing business and newspaper, the NEW-ENGLAND COURANT, in Boston prior to his marriage. He also had a reputation as a voice for the anti-Puritan opposition. Patterned after Joseph Addison's (1672–1719) and Richard Steele's (1672–1729) Spectator, the Courant relentlessly attacked the Puritan hierarchy through one of its principal leaders, Cotton MATHER, an influential clergyman. In 1722 Franklin was arrested, censured and jailed for libel. In 1723 the assembly prohibited publication of the Courant without a prior review of its contents. James continued to publish the paper, avoiding censorship by placing it under the temporary control of his half brother and apprentice, Benjamin FRANKLIN.

In 1723 the two brothers had a falling-out. Benjamin left the business and the city for Philadelphia, and from this point forward Ann Franklin filled the role of assistant printer and shopkeeper. The Courant ceased publication in 1726, when the Franklins relocated to Newport, a busy port city in the relatively liberal colony of Rhode Island. They established the first printing press in Rhode Island, publishing the Rhode-Island Almanack, which was also known as Poor Robin's Almanack (see ALMANACS). In 1732 the Franklins started a second periodical, the Rhode-Island Gazette, with James as the editor and Ann as assistant printer. It failed within eight months, but the business was sustained by the almanac, government printing contracts, and a bookstore.

James died in 1735 following a lengthy illness. Ann Franklin thereupon assumed full responsibility for the business, which flourished under her management. She quickly issued her first solo publication, A Brief Essay on the Number Seven (1735). In 1736 she became the official printer for the Rhode Island assembly, retaining this lucrative position until her death. From 1736 to 1741 she continued to publish the almanac under the original pseudonym of "Poor Robin." Beginning in 1738 she wrote most of the material for the almanac herself.

Successful as a printer and businesswoman, Franklin also assumed the responsibilities of a master craftsman, training her two surviving daughters as typesetters and shopkeepers. Her surviving son, James Jr., was dispatched to Philadelphia to apprentice with his uncle, Benjamin Franklin, returning to Newport in 1748 as a partner in his mother's business. In 1758 Franklin and her son launched the Newport Mercury, the first successful newspaper in Rhode Island. James Jr. served as editor and publisher, and Ann, who was ill and semiretired, wrote some of the copy.

When Franklin's surviving children died, she was once again forced to assume full responsibility for the business. In partnership with Samuel Hall, Franklin continued to publish the newspaper, making her the fourth female publisher in colonial America. The business was legally dissolved after her death in 1763.

Works

Franklin, Ann. A Brief Essay on the Number Seven. Newport: Printed by the author, 1735; Early American Imprints, 3879.
Newport Mercury. Newport, R.I.: James Franklin; June 19, 1758–Dec. 30, 1820; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Chapin, Howard M. Ann Franklin of Newport, Printer, 1736–1763. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1924.
 Ford, Margaret Lane. "Types and Gender: Ann Franklin, Colonial Printer," in A Living of Words: American Women in Print

Culture, edited by Susan L. Albertine. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995, 1–17.

Rushmore, Edna Keeler. Ann Franklin and Elizabeth Timothy: Colonial Women Printers. Madison, N.J.: Golden Hind Press, 1937.

Franklin, Benjamin (1706–1790) printer, philosopher, writer, scientist

Without Freedom of Thought, there can be no such Thing as Wisdom; and no such Thing as publick Liberty, without Freedom of Speech.

—"Silence Dogood," no. 8 (July 9, 1722)

Benjamin Franklin, statesman, inventor, printer, and polymath, was one of the few early Americans to secure a European reputation as a natural philosopher, or scientist. His AUTOBIOGRAPHY (1773) was first published in Paris, in French. An English translation appeared two years later. Back home in the colonies, Franklin's common-sense brand of philosophy combined with his cleverly turned phrases gained public attention, especially in his Poor Richard's Almanack (1732–1757). The maxims of Poor Richard became standard American proverbs.

Portrait of Benjamin Franklin, 1778, by Joseph-Siffred Duplessis

Statesman, diplomat, and signer of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, Franklin was born January 17, 1706, in Boston, Massachusetts, the youngest son of Josiah Franklin, a tallow maker and a Puritan immigrant from England, and his second wife, Abiah Folger. Franklin received his early education at the South Grammar School (predecessor to the Boston Latin School), where students were prepared for a career in the ministry. His father apparently decided against the ministry, however, and Benjamin was sent to George Brownell's English School. Although Franklin's formal education came to an end by the time he had reached the age of ten, he continued to read widely on his own.

Franklin's career was redirected to the crafts, but he disliked his father's trade and had no interest in the other local crafts. Franklin was finally apprenticed to his half brother James Franklin (1697–1735), who had only recently returned from England where he had been apprenticed as a printer. James opened his own business in 1717, and by 1721 he was publishing his own newspaper, the NEW-ENGLAND COURANT. Benjamin set type, delivered papers, and completed all of the less-desirable duties of an apprentice. Eager to write but convinced that James would not print his work, Benjamin submitted a series of articles under the pseudonym Silence Dogood. The articles attacked the Puritan establishment and in particular Cotton MATHER, the influential Puritan minister. Benjamin's articles were consistent with James's anti-Puritan editorials. At the same time, his pseudonym assumed the identity of a knowledgeable and levelheaded goodwife, which was in diametric opposition to his brother's sexist editorial policy. Nevertheless, James published the Dogood articles.

In 1722 the Puritan authorities responded to the articles by censoring and imprisoning James for libel. Benjamin operated the printing shop in his brother's absence. In 1723 the assembly prohibited James from publishing the Courant without submitting the copy for official review. James avoided censorship by "satisfying" Benjamin's indenture and thus placing the newspaper under his younger brother's control. Benjamin became the publisher in name only; he continued as his brother's apprentice under a newly executed secret indenture. Although they had joined forces to oppose the authorities, the two brothers were not compatible. As Benjamin Franklin noted in his autobiography, he may have been a troublesome apprentice, but James was an abusive master.

In September 1723, following a major quarrel with his brother, Benjamin Franklin left Boston for Philadelphia and for a job as a printer with Samuel Keimer. Although his apprenticeship ended in turmoil, Franklin had benefited from the experience. From the beginning his career was founded on his experience as a printer and publisher. He made a number of important contacts as a printer in Philadelphia, including Pennsylvania governor Sir William Keith (1680–1749). Keith encouraged Franklin to establish his own printing shop, promising him a lucrative contract for the government's printing needs and offering to underwrite the start-up costs. The governor suggested, however, that Franklin travel to England in order to purchase the necessary equipment and supplies. After arriving in London in 1724, Franklin learned that the promised loan from Keith did not exist. Thus stranded, he found a job at Samuel Palmer's print shop. He also found time to write, publishing an anonymous, satirical PAMPHLET questioning the existence of God, called A Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain (1725). The popularity of the pamphlet opened the doors to London's dissident intellectual community, and Franklin used the opportunity to expand his knowledge of contemporary British philosophy and politics. In 1726, by a prearranged plan, Franklin returned to Philadelphia with his new employer, a QUAKER merchant named Denham. After Denham died in 1727, Franklin returned to Samuel Keimer's printing shop as manager. Having experienced the benefits of London's intellectual life, Franklin started the JUNTO, a club devoted to politics and philosophy.

In 1728 he entered into a partnership with one of his friends. The two established their own printing shop and made plans to start a newspaper. Instead, they found themselves involved in an ugly competition with Keimer. Franklin responded with a series of essays highly critical of Keimer's new paper, the Universal Instructor in All Arts and Sciences: and Pennsylvania Gazette. The strategy worked; Keimer's circulation dropped, and Franklin and Meredith were able to buy the paper cheaply the following year. They shortened the name to the PENNSYLVANIA GAZETTE. In the early 1730s Franklin borrowed money from his friends in the Junto and purchased Meredith's share of the business. As sole proprietor of the Pennsylvania Gazette, Franklin emerged as a serious and dedicated craftsman, who benefited from his earlier experience as a printer, writer, and merchant. The Gazette was immediately successful.

On September 1, 1730, Franklin and Deborah Read entered into a common-law marriage. Deborah Read was still legally married to John Rogers (d. 1745?), who had deserted her to flee debtors but whose official death had not been reported. Franklin already had an illegitimate son, William (1731–1813), whose mother is unknown. Franklin and Deborah Read had two children, a son, Francis Folger (1732–1736); and a daughter, Sarah (1743–1808).

In 1732 Franklin published the first volume of Poor Richard's Almanack. Over the next twenty-five years it became one of the most widely read and quoted journals in the British colonies. Franklin used the Almanack and its fictitious author, Richard Saunders, to showcase his wit and philosophy. Along with information about the weather, Franklin offered an array of aphorisms, some the creations of his own imagination, others recycled and updated to fit an eighteenth-century American audience. Franklin's aphorisms blended style and wit with practical advice, as in:

*A little neglect may breed mischief . . .
for want of a nail, the shoe is lost;
for want of a shoe the horse is lost;
for want of a horse the rider is lost.*

Franklin remained active as a printer and publisher until 1748. In 1731 he helped establish the Library Company of Philadelphia, the first subscription library in America, and served as its first president. Franklin also taught himself to read, write, and speak German fluently, and, to a lesser degree, to read French, Spanish, Italian, and Latin. He became interested in science, supporting John BARTRAM's botanical field trips, conducting his own experiments into the new science of electricity, and corresponding with scientists in England. Franklin's scientific findings were so significant that his letters were published in London as Experiments and Observations on Electricity (1751). During this period he also helped found the American Philosophical Society, the first major American institution dedicated to science. Franklin's interests had a decidedly practical side as well: borrowing on his knowledge as a printer, Franklin devised a new technique to print paper currency that could not be easily counterfeited. He was also keenly interested in fire prevention.

Eager to break free of his day-to-day responsibilities, Franklin formed a partnership with David Hall in 1748. Under the agreement, Hall assumed full responsibility for the printing shop and Franklin shared in the profits for the next eighteen years, at which time Hall became the sole proprietor.

Franklin's plans for an undisturbed life of science and philosophy were complicated by his popularity and influence. In 1748 he was elected to the Philadelphia city council, and the following year he was appointed a justice of the peace. In 1751 he was elected to the state assembly. Beginning in 1753 he served as deputy postmaster general for the British colonies, and in 1754 he was appointed as a delegate from New England and the middle colonies to the Albany Congress. Franklin's "Plan of Union" called for formal coordination among the colonies as a defensive and developmental initiative. Although it garnered much interest, the "Plan of Union" failed to pass in the various state legislatures. It did, however, establish Franklin as a leading advocate for the American colonies.

Despite his many political duties, Franklin still found time to write and publish on a wide variety of subjects, including

A DISSERTATION
ON
Liberty and Necessity,
PLEASURE and PAIN.

---

*Whatever is, is in its Causes just Since all Things are by Fate; but purblind Man
Sees but a part o' th' Chain, the neareſt Link,
His Eyes not carrying to the equal Beam
That poises all above.*

Dryd.

L O N D O N:
Printed in the Year MDCCXXV.

Title page for Benjamin Franklin's first pamphlet, which he wrote and typeset himself education, science, politics, and religion. His accomplishments as an author and scientist were widely recognized. In 1753 he received honorary master's degrees from HARVARD and Yale along with a prize for scientific achievement from the Royal Society. In 1756 he was elected to membership in the Royal Society and was awarded an honorary master's degree, from the College of William and Mary, his third.

In 1757 Franklin made his second trip to England, as an agent for Pennsylvania. He immediately concerned himself with British attitudes toward the colonies, which were viewed there as adjuncts and dependencies of England. In 1759 Franklin published the first in a series of pro-American propaganda pieces, "A Defense of the Americans." This and subsequent pieces, including The Interest of Great Britain Considered (1760), argued that given their economic and military importance to England, the colonies should be treated as crucial and therefore equal members of the imperial system.

Although he was unable to influence major changes in English colonial policy, Franklin made numerous important political and social contacts in England. He used the opportunity to tour Great Britain, meeting with a number of leading ENLIGHTENMENT thinkers, including Adam Smith (1723–1790) and David Hume (1711–1776). He also became active in science organizations, including the Royal Society and in the Club of Honest Whigs. In 1759 Franklin received an honorary doctorate from the University of St. Andrews in Scotland. Oxford University bestowed a similar degree in 1762.

Following his return to Philadelphia in 1762, Franklin remained active in colonial politics, playing a leading role in the movement to end proprietary government in Pennsylvania. In 1764 he was appointed as colonial representative to England to petition for a change from proprietary to royal government. However, events altered Franklin's mission prior to his departure, and he assumed a dual role as Pennsylvania's representative in the dispute over the STAMP ACT. Once again Franklin became the unofficial voice of the colonies in London, writing a series of pieces protesting the Stamp Act and testifying before a Parliamentary committee. The position became official when Georgia appointed Franklin as its agent in 1768. New Jersey and Massachusetts followed Georgia's lead in 1769 and 1770, respectively. Franklin continued to write essays in support of the American position, including his "Causes of the American Discontents before 1768" (1768) and "Rules by Which a Great Empire May be Reduced to a Small One" (1773). He also used his third trip to England as an opportunity to make important new contacts on the Continent, visiting Germany in 1766 and France in 1767, at which time he was presented to King Louis XV (1710–1774).

Despite Franklin's many individual successes, his mission to England ended in failure. He was unable to win official support for the colonies, and he left England in 1775 convinced that rebellion was eminent. When he arrived in Philadelphia, the battles of Lexington and Concord had already occurred. Franklin was immediately appointed as a delegate to the Second Continental Congress, where he joined forces with John ADAMS to promote a formal DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE from England. After a lengthy and bitter debate, Congress voted in favor of the Declaration, appointing Franklin, Adams, and Thomas JEFFERSON to the committee to draft the appropriate document. Although Jefferson was the author of the original draft, Franklin helped with the revisions. He also helped draft the original and notably democratic Pennsylvania state constitution of 1776.

Franklin returned to Europe for a fourth time in 1776, when he received a congressional appointment as commissioner to France, an appointment he held jointly with Silas

Deane (1737–1789) and Arthur Lee (1740–1792). Their mission met with mixed results. On the personal level, Franklin immediately became a favorite of the French court and society. On the diplomatic level, negotiations for French financial and military support progressed slowly until news arrived concerning the American victory at Saratoga in 1777. Appointed as minister plenipotentiary, Franklin busied himself with all aspects of foreign diplomacy, negotiating loans, passports, and prisoner exchanges. In 1781 Franklin joined Adams, Jefferson, John JAY, and Henry Laurens (1724–1792) as a member of the commission to negotiate peace with England. Franklin cosigned the final peace accord on September 3, 1783, and subsequently remained in Europe to negotiate recognition and treaties with other nations.

In 1785 Franklin finally returned to Philadelphia. He continued to write and experiment despite illness, but his interests took a decidedly practical turn. He served on the supreme council of Pennsylvania, accepted an appointment as president of the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery, and represented Pennsylvania as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention. In 1788 he formally ended his public career. Franklin died of pleurisy on April 17, 1790, at his home in Philadelphia.

Works

Franklin, Benjamin. Poor Richard, 1733. An Almanack . . ., as Richard Saunders. Philadelphia: Printed by the author, 1732; subsequent editions, 1733–1746; Poor Richard Improved, 1748–1757; Early American Imprints.

Franklin. The Papers of Benjamin Franklin, edited by Leonard W. Labaree and others, 38 volumes to date. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959– .

Franklin. Poor Richard 1733: A Facsimile of the Only Copy Known . . . Philadelphia: Phillip H. & A. S. W. Rosenbach Foundation, 1977.

Franklin. Benjamin Franklin's Autobiography: An Authoritative Text, Backgrounds, Criticism. 1868. Edited by J. A. Leo Lemay and P. M. Zall. New York: Norton, 1986.

Franklin. Writings, edited by J. A. Leo Lemay. New York: Library of America, 1987.

Sources

Brands, H. W. The First American: The Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin. New York: Doubleday, 2000.

Gaustad, Edwin S. Benjamin Franklin. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Lemay, J. A. Leo. The Life of Benjamin Franklin. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.

Talbot, Page, and Richard S. Dunn. Benjamin Franklin: In Search of a Better World. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2005.

Recommended Writings

The Silence Dogood Letters (Nos. I, II, IV, VII) (1722)

"A Witch Trial at Mount Holly" (1730)

Poor Richard's Almanack (1733–1758)
 “Hints for Those That Would Be Rich” (1736)
 “The Speech of Miss Polly Baker” (1747)
 “On Transported Felons” (1751)
 “Join or Die” (1754)
 “The Way to Wealth” (1758)
 “An Edict by the King of Prussia” (1773)
 “The Sale of the Hessians” (1777)
 “On the Morals of Chess” (1779)
Dialogue Between Franklin and the Gout (1780)
Information to Those Who Would Remove to America (1784)
 “Remarks Concerning the Savages of North America” (1784)
 Constitutional Convention, Speech at the Conclusion of Deliberations (1787)
 Constitutional Convention, Speech on Subject of Salaries (1787)
An Address to the Public for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery (1789)
 “Plan for Improving the Condition of the Free Blacks” (1789)
The Autobiography (1868)

Studying Benjamin Franklin

Benjamin Franklin, elder statesman, inventor, diplomat, editor, and scientist, was also a compiler of ALMANACS and the author of PAMPHLETS, essays, letters, and an autobiography. Franklin studies have attracted literary scholars, historians, and the general public, inspiring a rich collection of materials; more than five thousand books and more than six hundred biographies are listed in the Library of Congress catalogue. With the recent celebration of the three-hundredth anniversary of Franklin's birth, interest in his life and work continues to grow. For a study of Franklin's life, students have a wide array of recent biographies to choose from and should consider consulting J. A. Leo Lemay's authoritative first two volumes of a projected seven-volume biography, The Life of Benjamin Franklin, Volume 1. Journalist, 1706–1730 (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005) and Lemay, The Life of Benjamin Franklin, Volume 2. Printer and Publisher, 1730–1747 (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005). Also see Gordon S. Wood's The Americanization of Benjamin Franklin (New York: Penguin, 2004); Walter Isaacson's Benjamin Franklin: An American Life (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003); Edmund Sears Morgan's Benjamin Franklin (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2002); H. W. Brands's The First American: The Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin (New York: Doubleday, 2000); and Claude-Anne Lopez's My Life with Benjamin Franklin (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000).

For a collection of scholarly essays, see Benjamin Franklin: In Search of a Better World, edited by Page Talbott, Richard S. Dunn, and John C. Van Horne (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2005); Reappraising Benjamin Franklin: A Bicentennial Perspective, edited by Lemay (Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1993); and The Oldest Revolutionary: Essays on Benjamin Franklin, edited by Lemay (Philadelphia:

University of Pennsylvania Press, 1976). For Franklin and politics, see Robert Middlekauff's Benjamin Franklin and His Enemies (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996). For Franklin and science, see Joyce E. Chaplin's The First Scientific American: Benjamin Franklin and the Pursuit of Genius (New York: Basic Books, 2006); Philip Dray's Stealing God's Thunder: Benjamin Franklin's Lightning Rod and the Invention of America (New York: Random House, 2005); Stanley Finger's Dr. Franklin's Medicine (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005); Brandon Brame and Deborah Jean Warner's Franklin & His Friends: Portraying the Man of Science in Eighteenth-Century America (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999); and I. Bernard Cohen's Benjamin Franklin's Science (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990). For a solid starting point in researching Franklin as a diplomat and his life in Paris, see Stacy Schiff's A Great Improvisation: Franklin, France, and the Birth of America (New York: Holt, 2005) and Claude-Anne Lopez's Mon Cher Papa: Franklin and the Ladies of Paris (revised edition; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1990).

The Benjamin Franklin papers are located at Yale University, and since 1959 thirty-eight volumes from this authoritative collection have been published and more volumes will continue to appear in print: The Papers of Benjamin Franklin, edited by Leonard W. Labaree and others (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959– ).

Electronic databases include The Papers of Benjamin Franklin, sponsored by the American Philosophical Society and Yale University (<<http://www.yale.edu/franklinpapers/index.html>> viewed April 27, 2007); a digital version of the Franklin Papers, created and maintained by the Packard Humanities Institute: (<<http://www.franklinpapers.org/>> viewed April 27, 2007); and the most comprehensive electronic source, from Lemay, Benjamin Franklin: A Documentary History (<<http://www.english.udel.edu/lemay/franklin/>> viewed April 27, 2007). For a good overview of Franklin along with images and facsimiles, see Franklin & Friends at the University of Delaware Library (<<http://www.lib.udel.edu/ud/spec/exhibits/franklin/index.htm>> viewed May 15, 2007). Another excellent site for students is The Benjamin Franklin Tercentenary (<<http://www.benfranklin300.com/>> viewed April 27, 2007).

French and Indian War (1754–1763)

The territorial conflicts between French and British for dominance of the Ohio valley and Canadian lands and their important fur and trading routes were known as the French and Indian War or (once it had spread to Europe in 1756) the Seven Years' War. General Edward Braddock (1695–1755) commanded the British; General WASHINGTON and Sir William Johnson (1715–1774), the colonists, and Louis-Joseph de Montcalm-Grozon, Marquis de Montcalm (1712–1759), the French. These three forces engaged in a series of battles:

in the fight for Fort Necessity (1754), Washington defeated the French; the British prevailed over the French at Fort Duquesne (1758); the French captured Fort William Henry (1757) and Fort Ontario (1758); and the British, Montreal (1760). The French then surrendered their territories in the St. Lawrence valley and west to the Mississippi with the signing of the Treaty of Paris in 1763. Throughout these conflicts, both the British and the French tried to solicit Indian alliance with the IROQUOIS, Shawnee, and DELAWARE. Though Iroquois and Mohawk aided the combatants at various moments during the war and for substantial payment in goods and lands, the Six Nations confederacy largely remained neutral in this empire-driven conflict. In 1758, when the French withdrew from Fort Duquesne, the Iroquois and Mohawk understood that a key shift in trading dominance had occurred and agreed to support the British for a final victory over the French at Fort Niagara on Lake Ontario in 1759.

Literary works that commemorate or draw upon the French and Indian War in particular include Ann Eliza BLEECKER's The History of Maria Kittle (1797), James Fenimore Cooper's (1759–1851) The Last of the Mohicans (1826) and The Deerslayer (1841); Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's (1807–1882) “Evangeline, A Tale of Acadie” (1847); and John Gardiner Calkins Brainard's (1796–1828) Letters Found in the Ruins of Fort Braddock: Including an Interesting American Tale (1824).

Sources

Calloway, Colin Gordon. The American Revolution in Indian Country: Crisis and Diversity in Native American Communities. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Grenier, John. The First Way of War: American War Making on the Frontier, 1607–1814. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Jennings, Francis. Empire of Fortune: Crowns, Colonies, and Tribes in the Seven Years War in America. New York: Norton, 1990.

Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.

Freneau, Philip (1752–1832) poet, journalist

*An age employed in edging steel
Can no poetic raptures feel . . .
No shaded stream, no quiet grove
Can this fantastic century move.*

—“To an Author” (1795)

Philip Morin Freneau was the first professional American journalist as well as one of the earliest lyric poets in America. As a newspaper editor, Freneau became an influential propagandist and satirist for the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and, later, for Jeffersonian democracy. Freneau also secured a legacy through his political and satirical poems, but he is recognized in American literature chiefly for his journalism and poetry.

Portrait of Philip Morin Freneau

Known as the “Poet of the Revolution,” Freneau was born in New York City on January 2, 1752, the son of a Pierre Freneau, a French Huguenot merchant and Agnes Watson, his Scottish wife. The family moved to Monmouth County, New Jersey, when Freneau was five, and he was tutored there by the evangelist William Tennent Jr. In 1768 he went to the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University) where he became a member of the American Whig Society and an enthusiastic participant in political debates with fellow students, such as James MADISON of Virginia and Hugh Henry BRACKENRIDGE of Pennsylvania. During this time Freneau began developing his skills as both a poet and a satirist, and collaborated with Brackenridge and Madison on a picaresque romance titled “Father Bombo’s Pilgrimage to Mecca,” which may stand as the first piece of prose fiction written in Amer-

Account of the Capture of the Ship Aurora -
 On the 25. of May in beating down Delaware Bay we unfortunately met with a small sloop from the British loaded with Corn which hindered us from standing out to Sea that night whereby in all probability we should have avoided the Enemy which afterwards captured us - Friday Morning May, 26. The Air very smoky and the Wind somewhat faintish, though it afterwards freshened up. The Wind was so that we stood off N.E. after putting the Pilot on board the small sloop, putting Handcuffing the Prisoner, and sending the Prize for Cape May. About three o'clock in the afternoon we discovered three Sail bearing from us about E.N.E. they were not more than two leagues from us when we discovered them from the fore top, at the same time we could see them from the Quarter Deck, one appeared to be a pretty large ship, the other two Brigs. we soon found they were in chase of us: we therefore tacked immediately, so all sail we could crowd and stood back for the Bay. My di-vice to the officers was to stand for Cape Hatteras or any part of the Jersey shore and run the ship on the flab rather than be taken. but this was disregarded. we still continued to stand in till we saw Cape Hatteras the frigate in the mean time gaining on us ahead, about ten half an hour

Manuscript page from Freneau's July 14, 1780 "Account of the Capture of the Ship Aurora" by a British frigate off the coast of Delaware, in which he recounts the hardships of his captivity ica. On September 25, 1771, Freneau and Brackenridge wrote their commencement poem, A Poem on the Rising Glory of America (1772), which expresses an optimism for America's cultural and political future.

After graduation, Freneau continued to write poetry while working briefly as a schoolteacher. In 1775, he returned to New York City, where he spent his time writing anti-British verses. When full-scale war threatened, he left the city for work on a sugar plantation in the West Indies. He returned home in 1778 and joined the militia. He also tried his hand at privateering for the Americans, but he was soon arrested by the British and incarcerated for six weeks on a British prison ship in the New York harbor. By the time he was released, Freneau was a passionate advocate for the American cause and deeply committed to republican ideals.

Freed from the prison ship, Freneau moved to Philadelphia where he found work as an editor and contributor of poetry for several periodicals, including the Freeman's Journal and the United States Magazine. In 1786 he published a slim volume titled The Poems of Philip Freneau, Written Chiefly

During the Late War. Of the 111 poems, all but thirteen had explicitly American or patriotic themes. Stylistically, some of the most interesting and successful poems were those lampooning Britain's key figures in the American military campaigns. Using irony and outright mockery, poems like "General Gage's Soliloquy," "The Midnight Consultations," and "General Gage's Confession" rendered their subjects, and the British cause itself, futile and ridiculous. On the other hand, the ELEGY "On Walking over the Ground of Long Island, near New-York, Where Many Americans Were Interred from the Prison Ships, during the War with Great Britain," and "The Tomb of the Patriots" balanced the glory of battle with the horrors of casualties. Freneau's awareness of the personal sacrifices made for the sake of the country by Revolutionary soldiers is evident in "The American Soldier," in which he reminds his readers to show consideration for "He, who once warred on Saratoga's plains, [who] sits musing o'er his scars and wooden leg."

A second volume of poems, The Miscellaneous Works of Mr. Philip Freneau, containing his Essays and Additional Poems, appeared in 1788. These essays and tales highlight Freneau's gift for SATIRE, sense of humor, and moral convictions.

Freneau produced some of his best-known verse on nature in the mid 1780s. "The Wild Honey-Suckle" (1786) presents "Nature's self" as a benevolent, romantic force that protects the "Fair flower, that dost so comely grow," by providing "guardian shade." In the "Indian Burying-Ground," (1787) Freneau espouses deist beliefs and honors native traditions.

His "On the Emigration to America, and Peopling the Western Country" (1784) addresses his contempt for slavery:

*O come the time, and haste the day,
When man shall man no longer crush,
When Reason shall enforce her sway,
Nor these fair regions raise our blush,
Where still the African complains,
And mourns his yet unbroken chains.*

In another antislavery poem, "To Sir Toby" (1792), Freneau draws on his visit to Jamaica in 1784 and condemns the cruelty he witnesses there. Although Freneau owned slaves at one time, he manumitted his slaves before New Jersey abolished slavery.

On April 15, 1790 Freneau, married Eleanor Forman, a member of a wealthy New Jersey family. The couple had four daughters. Shortly after their marriage, the Freneaus moved to Philadelphia where Philip worked in the office of the Secretary of State. He soon began editing the Jeffersonian National Gazette (1790–1793). In 1795 Freneau attempted a short-lived retirement from politics and urban life, returning to Monmouth County and editing the Jersey Chronicle. When the opportunity arose, however, he moved to New York to edit the Time Piece and Literary Companion, which he hoped would find success as a nonpartisan periodical; it did not. Disappointed, Freneau settled into another semiretirement, returning in 1800 to Monmouth County and writing verse. In 1832 he lost his way in a snowstorm and died of exposure on December 18.

Although at least three volumes of his collected work were published in his lifetime, Freneau's reputation seems to have suffered because his work was associated so closely and exclusively with the American Revolution. It can be argued, however, that his poems, which reflected a deep love of nature and a sentimental regard for the American countryside and home life, are precursors to the Romantic movement of the nineteenth century.

Works

Freneau, Philip Morin. Unpublished Freneauana, edited by Charles F. Heartman. New York: Printed for the editor, 1918.
Freneau. Letters on Various Interesting and Important Subjects. 1799. Edited by Harry Hayden Clark. New York: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1943.

Freneau. The Last Poems of Philip Freneau, edited by Lewis Gaston Leary. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1945.

Freneau. Prose. New Brunswick, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1955.

Freneau. The Poems of Philip Freneau, Poet of the American Revolution, edited by Fred Lewis Pattee. New York: Russell & Russell, 1963.

Freneau. The Newspaper Verse of Philip Freneau: An Edition and Bibliographical Survey, edited by Judith R. Hiltner. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1986.

Sources

Austin, Mary Stanislas. Philip Freneau, the Poet of the Revolution: A History of His Life and Times. Detroit: Gale Research, 1968.

Bowden, Mary Weatherspoon. Philip Freneau. Boston: Twayne, 1976.

Marsh, Philip Merrill. The Works of Philip Freneau, a Critical Study. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1968.

Recommended Writings

"The Power of Fancy" (1770)

"A Political Litany" (1775)

"The Wild Honey-Suckle" (1786)

"The Indian Burying Ground" (1787)

"To Sir Toby" (1792)

"The Country Printer" (1794)

"On the Causes of Political Degeneracy" (1798)

"On the Universality and Other Attributes of the God of Nature" (1815)

"On Observing a Large Red Streak Apple" (1822)

Studying Philip Freneau

Philip Freneau was a printer, essayist, and poet whose creative talents and rhetorical skills significantly contributed to the Revolutionary War effort. In addition to supporting and commemorating the PATRIOT's cause, Freneau's POETRY addressed philosophical topics, such as DEISM and rationalism; literary elements of SATIRE and eulogy; and environmental and social interests in nature and Native Americans. Students will benefit from a long and continued interest in Freneau studies, beginning with the earliest biographies that include: Mary S. Austin and Helen Kearny Vreeland's Philip Freneau, the Poet of the Revolution: A History of His Life and Times (New York: A. Wessels, 1901; Detroit: Gale Research, 1968); Fred Lewis Pattee's Bibliography of Philip Freneau (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1902); and Lewis Gaston Leary's That Rascal Freneau; A Study in Literary Failure (New York: Octagon Books, 1964). Critical essays and studies on Freneau include Philip M. Marsh's The Works of Philip Freneau, A Critical Study (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1968) and Richard C. Vitzthum's Land and Sea: The Lyric Poetry of Philip Freneau (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1978). For more general studies that also treat Freneau's contemporaries, student should consult Emory

Elliott's Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic, 1725–1810 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982) and William C. Dowling's Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990). For general historical background on printers in early America see Trish Loughran's The Republic in Print: Print Culture in the Age of U.S. Nation Building, 1770–1870 (New York: Columbia University Press, 2007); Jeffrey L. Pasley's "The Tyranny of Printers": Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001); Julie Hedgepeth Williams's The Significance of the Printed Word in Early America Colonists' Thoughts on the Role of the Press (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999); and Michael Warner's The Letters of the Republic: Publication and the Public Sphere in Eighteenth-Century America (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990).

Although students should consult the MLA Bibliography for more-recent titles about Philip Freneau, two references that might be helpful include Victor Hugo Paltsits's A Bibliography of the Separate and Collected Works of Philip Freneau, Together with an Account of His Newspapers (New York: B. Franklin, 1968) and Philip M. Marsh's Freneau's Published Prose; A Bibliography (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1970). A major collection of Freneau papers is located in the Philip Morin Freneau Collection at Princeton University.

Friendly Club (1785–1807)

A literary society in early America, the Friendly Club had two locations: one in Hartford, Connecticut, which operated from circa 1785 to 1807; and one in New York City, which formed in 1789. The Hartford Friendly Club was composed of members from the CONNECTICUT WITS, including Richard Alsop (1761–1815), Joel BARLOW, Timothy DWIGHT, physician Elihu Hubbard Smith (1771–1798), and John TRUMBULL. These writers contributed works of SATIRE and wit to the journal The Echo (1785–1807). The New York Friendly Club, formed by Smith, was a continuation of the defunct Philological Society, focusing its attention on patriotic works and promoting American literature. Members included Alsop, Charles Brockden BROWN, William DUNLAP, James Kent (1763–1847), and Smith. The New York club provided support for two prominent literary periodicals, The American Review (1799–1800) and The Monthly Magazine (1799–1802).

Sources

Waterman, Bryan. Republic of Intellect: The Friendly Club of New York City and the Making of American Literature. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2007.

Warner, Michael. The Letters of the Republic: Publication and the Public Sphere in Eighteenth-Century America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.

A Fable for Critics by James Russell Lowell (New York: Putnam, 1848) poetry collection

This book of satirical poems was originally published anonymously, although James Russell LOWELL, a well-known literary critic and editor, was quickly identified as the author. A Fable for Critics presents humorous critiques of many of Lowell's contemporaries, the mid nineteenth century's leading writers and intellectuals, including Thomas Carlyle, James Fenimore COOPER, Lydia Maria CHILD, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Margaret FULLER, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Oliver Wendell HOLMES, and Edgar Allan POE. Although his criticisms are often harsh, Lowell is also good-natured enough to satirize himself as a would-be intellectual: "There is Lowell, who's striving Parnassus to climb, / With a whole bale of isms tied together with rhyme."

—Tiffany K. Wayne

"The Fall of the House of Usher" by Edgar Allan Poe (1839) short story

Featured in the September 1839 Burton's Gentleman's Magazine (see THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE), this masterpiece of Gothic literature by Edgar Allan POE uses the uncertain mental states of the three main characters—an unnamed narrator and twins Roderick and Madeline Usher—to weave a tale of isolation, madness, and mystery. The narrator, a visitor to the Usher estate, learns that Madeline has died, and though he tries to comfort her brother the two men become increasingly agitated in the house. By utilizing a story-within-a-story technique and showing images in pairs, Poe creates a sense of disorientation and fear. A rising cacophony of noises in the house builds until Madeline herself appears and collapses on her brother, embracing him in death. Mirroring Roderick's mental deterioration, the house splits in two and collapses as the narrator flees. Poe's use of enigmatic imagery leaves the story open to a variety of symbolic interpretations.

Sources

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Selected Writings of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Gary Richard Thompson. New York: Norton, 2004.

Woodson, Thomas, ed. Critical Interpretations of "The Fall of the House of Usher." Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1969.

—E. N. S.

Farley, Harriet (1813–1907) editor, essayist, poet, fiction writer

Harriet Farley was born in Claremont, New Hampshire, the daughter of Reverend Stephen and Lucy Saunders Farley. At age fourteen, she began contributing to her family's income with such occupations as plaiting straw, sewing, and teaching school. In 1838, Farley moved to Lowell, Massachusetts, to work in the textile mills. She contributed essays, fiction, and poetry to THE LOWELL OFFERING (1840–1845). In 1842, she was chosen to be one of its editors, becoming in 1843 an owner and publisher as well. After The Lowell Offering ceased, Farley revived it as The New England Offering (1847–1850), which she edited single-handedly. Her other publications include Shells from the Strand of the Sea of Genius (1847), Operatives' Reply to Hon. Jere. Clemens (1850), Happy Nights at Hazel Nook (1854), and Fancy's Frolics (1880). Farley married John I. Donlevy in 1854, had one child, and spent the later decades of her life in New York City.

Source

Robinson, Harriet Hanson. Loom and Spindle; or, Life among the Early Mill Girls, revised edition. 1898. Kailua, Hawaii: Pacifica, 1976.

—Judith Ranta

Fashion by Anna Mowatt Ritchie (1850) play

Fashion! or, Life in New York was Anna Mowatt RITCHIE's first play to be professionally produced. It premiered on March 26, 1845 to an audience that included literary figures such as Edgar Allan POE, Mordecai M. Noah, and Nathaniel Parker WILLIS; the play had a run of twenty performances. Fashion is significant historically because it is considered to be the most successful nineteenth-century play written by an American female. Through the characters of the Tiffany family, Ritchie examines the lives of America's elite and their fixation on European culture. Mrs. Tiffany is preoccupied with status and goes to outrageous lengths to appear sophisticated. Meanwhile, Mr. Tiffany is a detached husband who resorts to illegal activities to keep up with his wife's spending. Fashion features the stock characters of the Yankee and the minstrel black, though Ritchie makes these normally flat characters act as moral compasses.

Source

Richards, Jeffrey H. Early American Drama. New York: Penguin, 1997.

—Jennifer M. Smith

Fern, Fanny

See Parton, Sara Payson Willis

Field, Eugene (1850–1895) journalist, poet

Born in St. Louis, Missouri, Eugene Field worked for newspapers in St. Joseph and Kansas City, as well as for the Denver Tribune, before settling in 1883 in Chicago. Writing for the Chicago Daily News, he became one of the first featured columnists in American newspapers. Over the next twelve years he filled his column, "Sharps and Flats," with humor and verse that had enormous popular appeal. Field reused much of his material in his books, which include the parody Tribune Primer (1881), A Little Book of Western Verse (1889), and A Little Book of Profitable Tales (1889). His Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac (1896) addressed his interest in book collecting. Today he is remembered mostly for his children's poetry, such as "Little Boy Blue" and the "Dutch Lullaby" (better known as "Wynken, Blynken, and Nod").

Sources

Conrow, Robert. Field Days: The Life, Times, & Reputation of Eugene Field. New York: Scribner, 1974.

Saum, Lewis O. Eugene Field and His Age. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2001.

Fields, Annie Adams (1834–1915) poet, essayist, novelist

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, Annie Adams became the second wife of publisher and author James Thomas FIELDS in 1854. After his death in 1881, Fields lived with her best friend and companion, Sarah Orne JEWETT, until Jewett's death in 1909. Fields was a central figure in Boston's literary circles; her home on Charles Street became a gathering place for some of the most successful writers of the day, including Willa Cather, William Dean HOWELLS, Henry JAMES, Rudyard Kipling, Harriet Beecher STOWE, Alfred Tennyson, Samuel L. CLEMENS, Sarah Wyman Whitman, and Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW. While primarily recognized for her skill and generosity as a patron of other literary talents, Fields also wrote several books and essays that have lasting historical value, including a biography of Stowe, two volumes of poetry, and memoirs of her many friendships.

Source

Gollin, Rita K. Annie Adams Fields: Woman of Letters. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2002.

—Sabrina Ehmke Sergeant

Fields, James Thomas (1817–1881) editor, poet

Born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, James Thomas Fields migrated to Boston, where he started out in the book industry as a clerk at the Old Corner Bookstore. There, he helped to expand the store's publishing business, eventually rising to become one of the nation's most influential publishers. It was at Fields's encouragement that Nathaniel HAWTHORNE transformed a short story into his first novel, THE SCARLET LETTER (1850). In addition to being W. D. TICKNOR's partner at what became TICKNOR & FIELDS publishing house, Fields was an active poet, and, between 1861 and 1871, he edited THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. After his retirement, Fields published poetry as well as several volumes of memoirs, including Yesterdays with Authors (1872).

Source

Tryon, Warren Stenson. Parnassus Corner: A Life of James T. Fields, Publisher to the Victorians. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1963.

Finley, Martha (1828–1909) children's author

The creator of one of the most popular children's book series, Martha Finley was born in Chillicothe, Ohio, and spent her adolescence and early adulthood in South Bend, Indiana. After teaching school for a few years, in 1856 Finley began writing exemplary children's tales for the Presbyterian Board in Philadelphia, using the pseudonym Martha Farquharson. In the novels that established Finley's fame—Elsie Dinsmore (1867) and its sequels—traditional Protestant Christian virtues also figure prominently. Finley began the series inspired, she said, by an answer to prayers offered during a time of infirmity and financial difficulty. The Elsie Dinsmore novels were published over a course of three and a half decades and followed the title character from childhood to old age through twenty-eight volumes. Between their first appearance and World War II, they sold over five million copies. Never a favorite of critics, Finley's books find few admirers among today's readers, who are likely to be put off by the heavy-handed moralizing, stylistic ineptitude, and offensive characterizations of the lower classes, blacks, Mormons, and Catholics exhibited in the series. Finley continued her extremely prolific output well into her seventies, having produced more than ninety books for children and adults by the time of her death.

Source

Brown, Janet E. "The Saga of Elsie Dinsmore," University of Buffalo Studies, 17 (1945).

—Brett Barney

Flint, Timothy (circa 1780–1840) novelist, editor

Born in North Reading, Massachusetts, Timothy Flint graduated from Harvard in 1800 and entered the ministry, eventually becoming a missionary in Arkansas and Missouri. He recounted his experiences there in Recollections of the Last Ten Years (1826) and used them as background material for several novels that are among the earliest examples of FRONTIER FICTION. From 1827 to 1830 he also published The Western Monthly Review, a literary journal. He edited and probably largely wrote the Personal Narrative of James Ohio Pattie (1831) and Biographical Memoir of Daniel Boone (1833).

Source

Folsom, James K. Timothy Flint. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Folklore

Washington IRVING was the first American author to gain a literary reputation by exploiting the rich resources of American folklore, an amalgam of the preliterate legends, beliefs, and practices of a common people. In "RIP VAN WINKLE," for example, he drew upon traditional German tales that would have been familiar to New York's Dutch settlers. Using the frame of the folktale and its indulgence in fantasy and whimsy to comment on political and social situations, Irving tells the story of a man whose twenty-year sleep spans the American Revolution, allowing him to observe aspects of both change and continuity in American life.

Other myths, TALL TALES, and outsized characters grew out of the folklore of westward expansion as well as of the CIVIL WAR and its aftermath. American folk heroes include Daniel Boone, whose opening of the wilderness is recounted in Timothy FLINT's Biographical Memoir of Daniel Boone (1833); Davy CROCKETT, the bear-fighting pioneer and war hero; and Mike Fink, the rowdy boatman. In the characters of Billy the Kid and Jesse James, the romance of the hero and the outlaw fuse. Native Americans such as Crazy Horse and Sitting Bull became legendary figures as well in the epic battles of the American West. William Cody, as "Buffalo Bill," seized on the American obsession with frontier heroes and the noble Indians they fought in his popular shows that toured the United States and Europe.

During this period scholars such as Henry Rowe SCHOOLCRAFT began to make the study of folklore a science, taking special care to collect and preserve the stories and traditions of Native Americans. Other writers who drew heavily on the rich stock of American folklore include Bret HARTE and Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS).

The rich store of black folklore that had been accumulating for two centuries by the time of the Civil War was reflected in slave narratives that flourished during the Abolition Movement and during Reconstruction; in fiction by black writers, such as William Wells Brown, whose CLOTEL was published in 1853; and in popular works by white writers such as Harriet Beecher STOWE—UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1852)—and Twain—ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884). Even so, black folklore, as primarily an oral tradition, went largely untapped in written literature, and when presented for a white audience, it was most often in distorted form, as in the MINSTREL SHOWS popular during the mid and late 1800s.

Sources

Beardslee, Karen E. Literary Legacies, Folklore Foundations: Selfhood and Cultural Tradition in Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century American Literature. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2001.

Brown, Carolyn S. The Tall Tale in American Folklore and Literature. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1987.

Dorson, Richard M. America in Legend: Folklore from the Colonial Period to the Present. New York: Pantheon, 1973.

Prahlad, Anand, ed. The Greenwood Encyclopedia of African American Folklore. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2006.

Foote, Mary Hallock (1847–1938) short-story writer, novelist, illustrator

And it is a pleasure to record that both Nancy and the ditch are behaving as dutifully as girls and water can be expected to do, when taken from their self-found paths and committed to the sober bounds of responsibility.

—"The Watchman" (1894)

The youngest of four children born to a close-knit Quaker family near Milton, New York, Mary Hallock grew up to lead a self-described “exiled” existence in the West. A promising artist, she attended the Cooper Union School of Design for Women in New York City, where she mastered the woodcutting techniques that became the mainstay of her illustrating career. By 1870, she was regularly contributing woodcuts to magazines such as ST. NICHOLAS and SCRIBNER’S MONTHLY, and, through her friendship with classmate Helena de Kay, Hallock had become part of a social circle of gifted and elite artists. Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW commissioned her to illustrate a GIFT-BOOK edition of his The Hanging of the Crane (1874); Hallock also illustrated Nathaniel HAWTHORNE’s gift edition of THE SCARLET LETTER (1876).

In 1876 she married Arthur DeWint Foote, a Yale educated mining engineer, and moved to California, where Arthur had a position with the New Almaden mine. “No girl ever wanted less to ‘go West’ with any man, or paid a man a greater compliment by doing so,” she said. From California she maintained her career as an illustrator and wrote sketches of Western life to accompany her correspondence back east. At the urging of an editor at Scribner’s Monthly (later THE CENTURY), Foote started writing fiction as well. Though she considered herself a “romancer” by nature, stories such as the acclaimed “In Exile” (1881) are marked by realistic portrayals of relationships and feminine sacrifice in a Western landscape. William Dean HOWELLS, Helen Hunt JACKSON, and Rudyard Kipling were among Foote’s many admirers.

While many nineteenth-century writers celebrated the West as a land of new opportunities, rugged independence and almost limitless resources, Foote focused instead on the losses associated with Western migration, of the loss of culture, society, and family that led to her sense of rootlessness. Her first novels—The Led-Horse Claim: A Romance of a Mining Camp (1883), John Bodewin’s Testimony (1886), and The Last Assembly Ball (1889)—are based on her Leadville, Colorado, experiences and chronicle Western development through the lens of competing, endlessly contested mining claims. The Chosen Valley (1892) and Coeur d’Alene (1894) are based on experiences from her days in Boise, Idaho.

In 1895 the Footes settled in Grass Valley, California. Foote published The Desert and the Sown, considered one of her finest novels, in 1902. She later wrote historical novels and three autobiographical novels: The Valley Road (1915), Edith Bonham (1917) and The Ground Swell (1919). As Lee Ann Johnson notes, Foote’s strongest writing is her late fiction, written after the author had accepted and embraced the West as her home. Whereas Foote’s novels before the turn of the century typically portray the East as stable cultural foundation and the West as unstable, in the later novels the values are reversed: the East is unsteady and the West becomes a haven.

By the time of her death at age ninety-one, Foote’s work had fallen into relative obscurity. Interest was revived with Wallace Stegner’s Pulitzer Prize-winning novel The Angle of Repose (1971), which is based on Foote’s life and which draws upon a trove of Foote’s personal correspondence. Although Stegner’s novel borrows directly from Foote’s history for characters and settings, even quoting heavily from her letters throughout, it remains a work of fiction rather than biography. In 1972, Rodman Paul edited a collection of Foote’s unpublished reminiscences, A Victorian Gentlewoman in the Far West (1972).

Source

Johnson, Lee Ann. Mary Hallock Foote. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
—Deborah Evans

Ford, Paul Leicester (1865–1902) bibliographer, historian, editor, novelist

When Paul Leicester Ford was born in Brooklyn, New York, his father owned what was probably the finest collection of Americana in the nation. As an infant Ford was injured in a fall that permanently damaged his spine. He used his family’s enormous personal library to educate himself and at the age of eleven published his first book, a genealogy of his famous great-grandfather, Noah Webster. With his father, Gordon Lester Ford, and his brother, Worthington Ford, Paul compiled the bibliographies Winnowings in American History (1890–1891) and made available scholarly editions of such historically important works as the ten-volume Writings of Thomas Jefferson (1892–1894), The True George Washington (1896), and The Many-Sided Franklin (1899). Ford also used his intimate knowledge of American history to write two highly popular novels: Honorable Peter Stirling and What People Thought of Him (1894), generally taken to be a portrait of Grover Cleveland; and Janice Meredith: A Story of the American Revolution (1899). As co-editor of Library Journal (1890–1893), Ford proposed a number of practical reforms that have since been widely adopted, including interlibrary loan. After the deaths of his parents, he and Worthington donated most of the family’s books to the New York Public Library. Ford was shot and killed by a brother, Malcolm, who had been left out of their father’s will.

Source

DuBois, Paul Z. Paul Leicester Ford: An American Man of Letters, 1865–1902. New York: Burt Franklin, 1977.

Fourierism

Based on the theories of French sociologist Charles Fourier, Fourierism was a popular social movement in the United States during the 1840s and 1850s. Fourier advocated a reorganization of society into “phalansteries” or “phalanxes”—units of approximately 1,600 individuals of different but complementary talents who would live together as one family, each contributing his or her skills to the general support of the community. Fourierism was introduced in the United States by the reformer Albert Brisbane, whose Social Destiny (1840) discussed its philosophy. Fourier's first important American disciple was Parke GODWIN, a journalist who published A Popular View of the Doctrines of Charles Fourier in 1844.

Fourierist colonies sprang up around the country—the North American Phalanx in Red Bank, New Jersey; FRUITLANDS, a Bronson ALCOTT endeavor in Harvard, Massachusetts; an outpost in Texas founded by Fourier's lieutenant, Victor Considérant; and, most famously, BROOK FARM in West Roxbury, Massachusetts. Under Brisbane's leadership, the Brook Farm collective, which was associated with such literary figures as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE and Margaret FULLER, published the Fourierist journals The Phalanx and THE HARBINGER. Fourierism was a short-lived social experiment; the phalanxes all failed, and toward the end of the 1850s what had been a popular movement faded from the public consciousness.

Sources

Guarneri, Carl. The Utopian Alternative: Fourierism in Nineteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1991.

Kessous, Naaman. Two French Precursors of Marxism: Rousseau and Fourier. Brookfield, Vt.: Avebury, 1996.

Spencer, M. C. Charles Fourier. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper (1855–1922) newspaper

Seven years after arriving in New York from London with the goal of starting his own illustrated weekly, Frank LESLIE published the first issue of his Illustrated Newspaper on December 15, 1855. Leslie modeled his publication on the London Illustrated News, for which he had worked for several years. Though Frank Leslie's was not the first illustrated paper in the United States, it played a significant part in reconfiguring the role and status of pictorial reporting in the last half of the nineteenth century.

Since the 1830s, American newspapers had included illustrations, but the engravings were rarely, if ever, timely. In addition, they were expensive to produce, so by the 1850s illustration had largely disappeared in the daily press. In the daily papers, pictures were seen as ancillary to the text, and thus, as expendable. Leslie imagined a publication in which pictures were primarily responsible for relaying the news, but such an ambition ran contrary to popular perceptions of illustrations, which many literate Americans viewed as an inferior form of communication.

Leslie, therefore, had two major barriers to overcome—financial and cultural—before his newspaper could be successful. To tackle the expense of creating engravings, Leslie devised a new specialized production process that allowed multiple craftsmen to work on a single engraving; with multiple engravers working on one piece, Leslie could publish illustrations more quickly and more cheaply than his competitors. This innovation allowed him to print timely illustrations for current news stories.

From the beginning, the newspaper reached out to a wide, inclusive audience, publishing sensational stories and illustrations to draw in readers, and pairing the sensational with calls for municipal reform. Although the newspaper struggled during its first few years, its circulation had reached 142,000 by the beginning of 1860. At the end of the year, circulation topped 164,000.

Leslie's established a reputation as the newspaper with the most, and the widest array of, illustrations. While competing illustrated papers borrowed engravings from other publications, nearly all of Leslie's were original. But even with its originality and the boon for pictorial reporting brought on by the CIVIL WAR, Leslie's struggled in the years following the war.

Leslie continued to build his publishing empire in the 1870s, starting several new periodical and book publications, but he continued to amass debt as well, and his Illustrated Newspaper suffered. When Leslie died in 1880, his wife, Miriam Leslie, took control of his publishing house and of the Illustrated Newspaper. Under her direction, the paper again flourished for a time; in 1889, Miriam Leslie sold the newspaper to the Judge Publishing Company, under whose direction Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper was published until 1898. In that year, one of the newspaper's editors bought Leslie's and made it successful in the first decades of the twentieth century. Eventually retitled Frank Leslie's Weekly, the newspaper was last published on June 24, 1922.

Source

Brown, Joshua. Beyond the Lines: Pictorial Reporting, Everyday Life, and the Crisis of Gilded Age America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly (1876–1905) periodical

Founded during the zenith of Frank LESLIE's publishing career, Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly became the ninth periodical in the Leslie family. At its founding, the family miscellany cost $2.50, compared to the standard $4.00 for similar monthlies. The magazine did well from the outset and within several years had amassed a circulation of sixty thousand, despite Leslie's financial troubles and bankruptcy of the late 1870s. At Frank Leslie's death in 1880, he had published the magazine for less than four years. His wife Miriam, whom he had married in 1873, then legally changed her name to Frank Leslie, and she continued to publish the Popular Monthly, as well as several additional publications that had been founded and edited by her late husband. Under her control, the magazine prospered until the 1890s, when the magazine began to face competition from new, cheaper family magazines like McClure's (1893). Leslie gradually relinquished her responsibilities to the publishing house and the magazine, but she kept ties to the Popular Monthly until 1905. The new editor, Ellery Sedgwick, eventually renamed the publication the American Magazine, which survived until 1956.

In addition to its artwork and pictorial reporting, the magazine published a variety of material, including short stories and serialized fiction, travel literature, humor, and informative articles. Joaquin MILLER, Harriet Prescott SPOFFORD, and Horatio ALGER, among others, wrote fiction for the magazine. Though not frequent contributors, both John Greenleaf WHITTIER and Bret HARTE were published in the Monthly as well. Late in the magazine's life and during Sedgwick's editorship, the work of Stephen CRANE appeared in its pages.

Source

Mott, Frank Luther. A History of American Magazines, volume 3. Cambridge: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1938.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Frederic, Harold (1856–1898) novelist, short-story writer

He simply got into deep water, poor soul, and we've floated him out again, safe and sound. That's all. But all the same, I was right in what I said. He was a mistake in the ministry.

—The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896)

Born and educated in Utica, New York, Harold Frederic began his professional career as a photographer's assistant. He later became a reporter for his hometown newspaper, the Utica Observer, where he was eventually promoted to editor. He went on to become editor of the Albany Evening Journal and London correspondent for THE NEW YORK TIMES. Although he remained in journalism, he was able to parlay the skills of observation acquired in that field into a career as a writer of realist fiction (see REALISM).

Frederic published contemporary novels set in his native Mohawk Valley, including Seth's Brother's Wife (1887) and its sequel, The Lawton Girl (1890). After publishing In the Valley (1890), a romance set during the Revolutionary War, he began to produce his most distinguished realist works, novels set during the CIVIL WAR and told from a civilian's point of view: The Copperhead (1893), Marsena (1894), and In the Sixties (1897). His best-known novel, The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896), tells the story of a Methodist minister's fall from grace after his exposure to the higher criticism of the Bible, the new science's emphasis on sensory perception, and contemporary aestheticism.

Sources

Bennett, Bridget. The Damnation of Harold Frederic: His Lives and Works. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997.

Briggs, Austin. The Novels of Harold Frederic. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1969.

Myers, Robert M. Reluctant Expatriate: The Life of Harold Frederic. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995.

Free Religious Association

This nonsectarian, almost secular association had no church or creed and was meant to be a spiritual society for thinking individuals. Founded in 1865, it was supported by such luminaries as Bronson ALCOTT, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, and Thomas Wentworth HIGGINSON. The Index, a socioreligious weekly promoting freethinking, was affiliated with the group.

Source

Persons, Stow. Free Religion: An American Faith. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1947.

Freeman, Mary E. Wilkins (1852–1930) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Randolph, Massachusetts, Mary E. Wilkins was educated at Mount Holyoke College and the Glenwood Seminary in West Brattleboro, Vermont. She lived in Brattleboro with her parents until their deaths. In 1884 she returned to Randolph, where she lived with a childhood friend, Mary Wales, for almost twenty years. In 1902, after a decade-long courtship, she married Dr. Charles M. Freeman and moved to Metuchen, New Jersey, which remained her home for the remainder of her life.

Freeman's best work was published before her marriage and drew heavily on rural New England life. Although she published more than thirty books, she is best known for her first two publications, A HUMBLE ROMANCE AND OTHER STORIES (1887) and A NEW ENGLAND NUN AND OTHER STORIES (1891). A keen observer of human psychology, Freeman made a powerful contribution to the LOCAL-COLOR movement with her portrayals of repressed people trapped in the decaying Puritanism of the New England of her day. Many of her early stories focus on the struggles of aging, unmarried women in New England villages.

In the 1890s Freeman turned to the novel, producing such works as Pembroke (1894), perhaps her most popular work of long fiction. She also wrote historical and social novels, a drama about the Salem witchcraft trials, and a volume of stories on the supernatural. Late in life she turned back to her original métier, producing Edgewater People (1918), a collection of stories whose strength rivals that of her earliest literary productions.

Sources

- Glasser, Leah Blatt. In a Closet Hidden: The Life and Work of Mary E. Wilkins Freeman. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1996.
- Marchalonis, Shirley, ed. Critical Essays on Mary Wilkins Freeman. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991.
- Westbrook, Perry D. Mary Wilkins Freeman. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

French, Alice (1850–1934) short-story writer

"Octave seemed to view humanity as having three sexes—men, women, and Octave Thanet. . . . Thanet saw only the model of heterosexuality around her and never questioned its morality."

—Lillian Faderman, Surpassing the Love of Men (1981)

Alice French, a pioneering author of Midwestern regionalist fiction, was born in Andover, Massachusetts, but moved with her family to Davenport, Iowa, when she was six years old. The oldest of six children, French enjoyed a comfortable childhood thanks to her father's prosperous manufacturing business. Her family's fortune permitted French to receive the best schooling available, and when she was sixteen she was sent back to Andover to be educated at the prestigious all-female Abbot Academy and then to Vassar College in Poughkeepsie, New York. Though unhappy at school, at the Abbot Academy French met Octavia Putnam, the beloved roommate whose first name inspired French's androgynous pen name, "Octave Thanet."

French began to focus seriously on her writing after completing her education in 1871. That year, while French was touring Europe with her family, her short story "Hugo's Waiting" was published in the Davenport Gazette. Trips to Europe provided French with literary inspiration for years to come, as can be seen in her story, "My Lorelei" (1880), a self-described "Heidelberg Romance." This story, written in diary form, recounts the blossoming friendship/romance between the frank narrator Constance and the beautiful, mysterious Undine—the seductive "lorelei," or mythological siren, of the story's title.

"My Lorelei" touches on a theme that permeates much of French's fiction: the love, or "romantic friendship" that can exist between two women, and how these relationships are affected by the hetero-normative injunction to marry men. This subject was very close to French's own heart; when she was twenty-six, she had moved in with her companion Jane Crawford. The two women combined their fortunes and their households, dividing their time between a home in Davenport and a plantation in Arkansas, which they called "Thanford," a name derived from the combination of their last names.

One might expect French, who was raised by a feminist mother and who shared her life with another woman, to be a staunch advocate of women's rights. Though a good portion of her fiction, most notably her short-story collections A Book of True Lovers (1897) and A Slave to Duty & Other Women (1898), deals with issues surrounding women's independence from men, French was a social conservative, an antisuffragist (see SUFFRAGISM), and a Social Darwinist. This conservative viewpoint complicates her fiction. Though French's regionalist, or LOCAL-COLOR short stories contain many positive Midwestern characters, the narrator is often a transplanted New Englander (like French) who, albeit admiringly, describes life in the heartland from the position of an outsider.

French lived out her days with Crawford, mentoring fellow Midwestern and female authors until her death at age eighty-four. At the time of her death, she was a well-regarded literary figure, lauded with awards and honorary degrees for her contributions to Midwestern literature. Though she faded into obscurity along with many female regionalists during the ensuing decades, recent efforts by feminist scholars to recover these local colorists as well as lesbian authors has led to a revived interest in her work.

Sources

- Faderman, Lillian. Surpassing the Love of Men: Romantic Friendship and Love between Women from the Renaissance to the Present. New York: Morrow, 1981.
- McMichael, George. Journey to Obscurity: The Life of Octavia Thanet. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1965.

—Robin Smith

Frontier Fiction

The notion of a frontier in American literature stems from the earliest period of European settlement, when the continent seemed a vast wilderness. Settlers took it as their mission to civilize this New World, which was populated by indigenous peoples whom the settlers considered, paradoxically, both uncivilized savages and noble innocents living close to nature. These contradictory attitudes toward Native Americans were mirrored in the fundamentally conflicted idea American pioneers had of their own relationship to the land. On the one hand, the pioneers saw themselves as bringing civilization to the wilderness. On the other hand, the pioneer was—as the French observer of early American life Hector de Crèvecoeur argued—a "new man" spurning the corruption of Europe and seeking to re-establish a bond with nature similar to that which the Native Americans already enjoyed. This idea of a regenerative frontier accords with the writing of European Romantics such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau and William Wordsworth, whose term "natural piety" expresses the idea that man is good by virtue of his proximity to nature, not because of a closeness to religious doctrine or to the state. For the Puritans, however, the frontier was lawless territory; the untamed forest and wilderness were breeding grounds for the machinations of the devil and of the ungodly.

The works of James Fenimore COOPER and Nathaniel HAWTHORNE offer examples of these contradictory attitudes toward the frontier. Cooper's Natty Bumppo consorts with the Indians and regards the steady encroachment of white civilization as a corruption of the pristine lands on which he has roamed and hunted. The civilization of the town constricts Natty's freedom of movement, and he bitterly resents the officious and tyrannous methods of settlers—particularly in THE PIONEERS (1823), the first novel in the LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

Hawthorne, on the other hand, often portrays his Puritan ancestors' distrust of the unsettled wilderness. In THE SCARLET LETTER (1850) he suggests that the strict guidelines of Puritanism are in part understandable as a way of disciplining anarchic individualism—passions that in Romanticism have dignity but also threaten the existence of community. When Hester Prynne enters the wilderness in The Scarlet Letter, she may be expressing her individualism, but she is also isolating herself from the community; she is in danger of exulting in passions that lead to self-indulgence. Hawthorne does not attempt to resolve the romantic and Puritan tensions his characters face in living on the frontier of wilderness and civilization.

Outside of New England and upstate New York, where Hawthorne and Cooper set their fiction and where their sensibilities were shaped, writers in the South, Southwest, and West developed still other visions of the frontier. Writers such as William Gilmore SIMMS produced works that portray the South as a place where the frontier was unburdened by Puritan moralizing. Although Simms, among others, acknowledged the violence at the heart of a slave-owning and Indian-fighting society, he equated the exploration of the frontier, the agrarian economy, and the eventual growth of an aristocratic landowning class with progress.

In the Southwest and West, writers such as Bret HARTE and Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) provided a robust and rollicking version of frontier life. This was the land of folklore and TALL-TALE heroes, including Davy CROCKETT, Daniel Boone, and later Paul Bunyan. After the CIVIL WAR, WESTERNS, often published in DIME NOVELS portraying the lawman's confrontation with the outlaw, became a dominant vehicle of frontier fiction. Figures such as Wild Bill Hickok, lawman, and Billy the Kid, outlaw, represented not so much conflicting tensions in frontier fiction and folklore as aspects of the same drive to express the energy of unbridled individualism.

Mark Twain's ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN is perhaps the definitive statement about the frontier in American literature. Huck finds civilization confining, yet his difficulties are not resolved by heading out for new territory. Still, by the end of the story his adventures in the wilderness of the river have catalyzed his growth and made him wise. Rather than return to the civilization that Aunt Sally represents, he decides to go west. The novel thus illustrates the allure of the frontier as a place of possibilities but also shows that neither individual nor societal problems can be resolved by a simple removal to the frontier.

Sources

- Jacobs, Wilbur R. On Turner's Trail: 100 Years of Writing Western History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994.
- Nobles, Gregory H. American Frontiers: Cultural Encounters and Continental Conquest. New York: Hill & Wang, 1997.
- Slotkin, Richard. The Fatal Environment: The Myth of the Frontier in the Age of Industrialization, 1800–1890. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1998.
- Smith, Henry Nash. Virgin Land: The American West as Symbol and Myth. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1950.

Fruitlands

This utopian cooperative community was founded in Harvard, Massachusetts, in 1844 by Bronson ALCOTT. Originally Alcott had planned a rural location where members would live off the land as vegetarians and, through education and labor, achieve “the harmonic development of their physical, intellectual, and moral natures.” Like most other nineteenth-century communes, this one was short-lived: the collective disbanded after only seven months. Louisa May ALCOTT later satirized the extreme idealism of the Fruitlands experiment in “Transcendental Wild Oats,” a sketch that appeared in 1876.

Source

- Francis, Richard. Transcendental Utopias: Individual and Community at Brook Farm, Fruitlands, and Walden. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1997.

Fuller, Henry B. (1857–1929) novelist, poet, critic

A Chicago native, Henry B. Fuller's name became associated with the city after the publication of his best-known work, The Cliff-Dwellers (1893). Focused on the lives of office workers in one high-rise building, the book became known as the first important American novel of the city and a forerunner of literary naturalism.

Fuller was a well-traveled book critic whose first novel, The Chevalier of Pensieri-Vani (1890), published under the pen name Stanton Page, was about the differences between European and American culture. Fuller continued to alternate between fiction about continental refinement and gritty American REALISM throughout his novel-writing career. He also published two collections of verse, The New Flag (1899) and Lines Long and Short (1917), and was active in Chicago literary circles, particularly in the group that kept the influential magazine Poetry vital.

Sources

- Pilkington, John. Henry Blake Fuller. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Scambray, Kenneth. A Varied Harvest: The Life and Works of Henry Blake Fuller. Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1987.

Fuller, Margaret (1810–1850) editor, poet, critic, polemicist

Male and female represent the two sides of the great radical dualism. But, in fact, they are perpetually passing into one another. . . . There is no wholly masculine man, no purely feminine woman.

—Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845)

Margaret Fuller was born into Boston's Brahmin class (Oliver Wendell Holmes Sr.'s term for the Boston aristocracy) and educated by her father. By the age of six she could recite Latin translations. She had a gift for languages and great literary aspirations that, when they threatened to set her too far apart from her contemporaries, resulted in her parents' sending her to a girls' school in Groton, Massachusetts, where she was socialized as a young lady. Fuller first made her way in the world as a schoolteacher but soon found a better outlet for her talents in the seminar-style "conversations" for women held every Saturday afternoon at Elizabeth PEABODY's home in Boston. These sessions, held from 1839 to 1844, provided Fuller with the material for her most significant work, Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845).

The seminars also brought Fuller to the attention of Boston's male intellectual elite, starting with Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, who married Elizabeth Peabody's sister Sophia in 1842. Later Fuller was chosen by the members of the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB as editor of their journal, THE DIAL. Her book Summer on the Lakes, in 1843 (1844) attracted the attention of Horace GREELEY, who invited Fuller to become the literary critic for his newspaper, the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE. Her criticism of writers such as Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW and James Russell LOWELL put her in bad standing with some members of the Boston literati, but her work for the newspaper was held in such high esteem that she was able to continue writing for it as a foreign correspondent. Lowell, stung by her humiliating remarks about him, reciprocated by criticizing her egotism and malevolence in his A FABLE FOR CRITICS (1848).

Fuller went to Europe in 1846 and stayed for nearly five years. Finally settling in Italy, she met the Italian nobleman Giovanni Angelo, Marchese Ossoli. Ossoli and Fuller had a son together and married. Ossoli became involved in the Italian revolutionary cause, and Fuller began to write a book about its leader, Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–1872). When the revolution faltered, the Ossolis boarded a ship bound for the United States, which sank off the New York coast during a storm. Fuller and her family did not survive, and although some of their belongings were recovered, her Mazzini manuscript was lost.

July 1846 daguerreotype of Margaret Fuller—the best-known likeness of her

Fuller was an apparent model for Zenobia in Hawthorne's novel THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE (1852).

Principal Books by Fuller

Summer on the Lakes, in 1843. Boston: Little & Brown / New York: C. S. Francis, 1844.

Woman in the Nineteenth Century. New York: Greeley & McElrath, 1845.

Papers on Literature and Art, 2 volumes. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

Memoirs of Margaret Fuller Ossoli, edited, with contributions, by Ralph Waldo Emerson, James Freeman Clarke, and William Henry Channing, 2 volumes. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1852.

At Home and Abroad, or Things and Thoughts in America and Europe, edited by Arthur B. Fuller. Boston: Crosby, Nichols, 1856.

Life Without and Life Within; or, Reviews, Narratives, Essays, and Poems, edited by Arthur B. Fuller. Boston: Brown, Taggard & Chase / New York: Sheldon / Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1859.

Art, Literature, and the Drama, edited by Arthur B. Fuller. Boston: Brown, Taggard & Chase / New York: Sheldon / Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1860.

"Lines written in her Brother's Journal."
 R F Fuller

The temple round
 Spread green the pleasant ground;
 The fair colonnade
 Of pure marble pillars made;
 Strong to sustain the roof
 Time and tempest-proof;
 Yet amid which the lightest breeze
 Can play as it pleases;
 The sublime hall
 Be free to all
 Who can receive
 The power which first we see,
 The guide of youth,
 Unswerving truth;
 In the inner shrine
 Stands the image divine
 Only seen
 By those whose deeds have worthy been Priestlike clean,
 But who initiated are Declare,

Margaret and Her Friends or Ten Conversations with Margaret Fuller upon the Mythology of the Greeks and Its Expression in Art, reported by Caroline W. Healey. Boston: Roberts Brothers, 1895.

Letters

The Letters of Margaret Fuller, 6 volumes, edited by Robert Hudspeth. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1983–1994.

Studying Margaret Fuller

Margaret Fuller is now recognized as one of the founders of the women's rights movement, and much of her work is on this theme. Phyllis Cole's "Stanton, Fuller, and the Grammar of Romanticism" (New England Quarterly, 73, no. 4 [2000]: 533–559) offers concrete examples of Fuller's influence on Elizabeth Cady STANTON. Fuller's earliest work is transcendental, including various essays she published while editor of the transcendentalist journal THE DIAL. While at The Dial in July of 1843 Fuller published the essay "The Great Lawsuit. Man versus Men. Woman versus Women," which she eventually revised and expanded as Woman in the Nineteenth Century, published in 1845. Her 1844 Summer on the Lakes, in 1843, is a travel narrative that traces her journey to Chicago and the Wisconsin Territory. Her observations of Native Americans and of the pioneer families she saw, especially the women, are a combination of the Romantic and realistic, a quality characteristic of Fuller's work during this period. Fuller began a job at Horace GREELEY'S NEW-YORK TRIBUNE in the fall of 1844. While at the Tribune she wrote reviews of literature and art, as well as social criticism. Fuller had always concerned herself with the social condition, but this motif became much more prominent in her work during this period. She is especially well known for visiting women's prisons and asylums and for her work to draw attention to the conditions found in those institutions. After traveling to Europe in 1846 Fuller wrote more than thirty dispatches for the Tribune over four years. The dispatches are epistolary in nature and taken as a whole are often regarded as her finest work. Especially noteworthy are the dispatches she wrote while running a hospital for wounded soldiers during the Italian Revolution of 1848. Their stark realism is striking, and their origin from behind the walls of Rome offer an inside perspective on the Revolution.

A good beginning text of Fuller's work is The Essential Margaret Fuller, edited by Jeffrey Steele (New York: Rutgers University Press, 1992). This compilation includes the full texts of Woman in the Nineteenth Century and Summer on the Lakes, as well as some of the shorter essays she wrote for The Dial early in her career and selected poetry, letters, and columns from the New-York Tribune. It also includes "Autobiographical Romance," a memoir that Fuller wrote in her thirties but did not publish during her lifetime.

Any study of Fuller must begin with Woman in the Nineteenth Century, a text that was often criticized in her day for being too disorganized and difficult to follow. More-recent scholarly work has focused on the rhetorical strategies Fuller used to construct this treatise on women's rights. Three introductory perspectives are Judith Mattson Bean's "Conversation as Rhetoric in Margaret Fuller's Woman in the Nineteenth Century" (In Her Own Voice: Nineteenth Century American Women Essayists, edited by Sherry Lee Linkon. New York: Garland, 1997: pp. 27–40), Sandra Gustafson's "Choosing a Medium: Margaret Fuller and the Forms of Sentiment" (American Quarterly, 47, no. 1 [1995]: 34–65), and Annette Kolodny's "Inventing a Feminist Discourse: Rhetoric and Resistance in Margaret Fuller's Woman in the Nineteenth Century" (Nineteenth Century American Women Writers, edited by Karen Kilcup. Malden: Blackwell, 1998: pp. 206–230).

Research on Summer on the Lakes should begin with Nicole Tonkovich's "Traveling in the West, Writing in the Library: Margaret Fuller's Summer on the Lakes" (Legacy, 10, no. 2 [1993]: 79–102) and Christina Zwarg's "Footnoting the Sublime: Margaret Fuller on Black Hawk's Trail" (American Literary History, 5, no. 4 [1993]: 616–642).

There are several good studies of Fuller's body of work as a whole. Margaret Fuller's Cultural Critique: Her Age and Legacy is a collection of essays by Fuller scholars edited by Fritz Fleischmann (New York: Peter Lang, 2000). Jeffrey Steele examines themes found in all of Fuller's work in Transfiguring America: Myth, Ideology, and Mourning in Margaret Fuller's Writing (Columbia & London: University of Missouri Press, 1993).

Critics have also been interested in the ways Fuller interacted with other authors of her time, especially fellow Transcendentalists such as Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Nathaniel HAWTHORNE. Christina Zwarg offers a book-length study of Fuller's relationship with Emerson in Feminist Conversations: Fuller, Emerson, and the Play of Reading (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1995). Thomas Mitchell examines Fuller's relationship with Nathaniel Hawthorne in "This Mutual Visionary Company: Nathaniel Hawthorne and Margaret Fuller" (Margaret Fuller's Cultural Critique: Her Age and Legacy, 109–120).

Reading of criticism on Fuller's Tribune years should begin with Annamaria Formichella Elsdén's "Margaret Fuller's Tribune Dispatches and the Nineteenth-Century Body Politic" (The Only Efficient Instrument: American Women Writers and the Periodical, 1837–1916, edited by Aleta Feinsod Cane and Susan Alves. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2001: pp. 23–44).

There are many biographical studies of Fuller, but the most comprehensive is Charles Capper's two-volume An American Romantic Life (New York & Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992, 2007). Also noteworthy are Minerva and the Muse: A Life of Margaret Fuller by Joan von Mehren (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994), The Woman and the Myth: Margaret Fuller's Life and Writings by Bell Gale Chevigny (Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1994), and Margaret Fuller: Writing a Woman's Life by Donna Dickenson (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993).

There is much yet to be done on Fuller's life and work; Larry Reynolds's "Prospects for the Study of Margaret Fuller" (Resources for American Literary Study, 26, no. 2 [2000]: 139–158) is a survey of the work left to do.

—Student Guide by Michelle Fankhauser

A Farewell to Arms by Ernest Hemingway (New York: Scribners, 1929) novel

Often called a “study in doom” in love and war, A Farewell to Arms firmly established Ernest HEMINGWAY’s literary reputation as a major American writer. Narrator Frederic Henry, an American volunteer ambulance driver in the Italian army during WORLD WAR I, falls in love with nurse Catherine Barkley after an Austrian mortar shell severely wounds his legs. Near the conclusion of his recuperation in a Milan hospital, Henry learns that Catherine is pregnant. When he returns to the front, the war goes badly, and during the Italians’ retreat Henry becomes aware of the chaos and madness of the war and barely escapes execution by Italian battle police. Henry deserts the army and returns to Catherine, whom he finds northwest of Milan in Stresa on holiday. Warned that he is about to be arrested for desertion, Henry rows Catherine up Lake Maggiore to Switzerland. After spending a happy winter in a mountain house near Montreux, Henry and Catherine go to Lausanne in March to be near a hospital. Catherine’s baby, delivered by caesarian section, is stillborn. Catherine dies, and Henry is left to walk back to their hotel alone in the rain. The novel underscores Hemingway’s conviction that in a world whose dispensations defy reason, one must live life fully and cultivate a stoic discipline that will enable one to meet whatever fate lies ahead.

Sources

Baker, Carlos. Hemingway: The Writer as Artist. Fourth edition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.

Oliver, Charles M., ed. Ernest Hemingway’s A Farewell to Arms: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 308. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2005.

Reynolds, Michael S. Hemingway’s First War: The Making of A Farewell to Arms. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1976.

—John C. Unrue

Farrell, James T. (1904–1979) novelist, short-story writer

James T. Farrell grew up among Irish-American working-class families on the South Side of Chicago who provided the material for his fiction. He saw both poverty and middle-class affluence in the lives of his parents and grandparents, and he used his observations in works that explore the inequality of circumstances and upbringing in his characters’ lives. Farrell went to Catholic schools in Chicago and attended classes at De Paul University and the University of Chicago, dropping out before graduating, to pursue his writing. During his long career he published more than fifty books, including twenty-four novels and seventeen volumes of short stories. Although Farrell is often labeled a naturalist (see NATURALISM), biographer Edgar M. Branch maintains that he may more accurately be described as a “critical realist” who depicted the destinies of his characters “shaped by their milieu and the period, by their particular roles in society, and by their qualities of character.” According to Branch, Farrell “conceived of his writing as an evolving but single body of work: a complex sequence encompassing his several cycles of novels and other fiction.”

Farrell’s most admired achievement is the Studs Lonigan trilogy: Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in Chicago Streets (1932), The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment

Day (1935), which told the story of a young man's struggle to succeed while recording the effect of the GREAT DEPRESSION on the Irish Catholic enclave in Chicago. Farrell dramatized the opportunities and the corruption of city life in a style reminiscent of Theodore Dreiser, whom he acknowledged as an influence.

Farrell also published the O'Neill-Flaherty series: A World I Never Made (1936), No Star Is Lost (1938), Father and Son (1940), My Days of Anger (1943), and The Face of Time (1953). The main character, Danny O'Neill, differs from Studs Lonigan in that Danny is able to cope with the forces that threaten to overwhelm him. In the trilogy comprised of Bernard Clare (1946), The Road Between (1949), and Yet Other Waters (1952), Farrell shifts his attention to struggling artists and radical political activists in Depression-era New York City, with flashbacks set in Chicago. Farrell's nonfiction includes A Note on Literary Criticism (1936) and The Fate of Writing in America (1946).

Sources

- Branch, Edgar M. James T. Farrell. New York: Twayne, 1971.
 Branch. Studs Lonigan's Neighborhood and the Making of James T. Farrell. Newton, Mass.: Arts End Books, 1996.
 Wald, Alan M. James T. Farrell: The Revolutionary Socialist Years. New York: New York University Press, 1978.

Fast, Howard (1914–2003) novelist

Howard Fast wrote in a range of genres but is best known for his historical fiction, especially Citizen Tom Paine (1943), one of several works he wrote about the Revolutionary War era, and Freedom Road (1944), set during Reconstruction. His novel Spartacus (1951) chronicles a Roman slave revolt. Fast also worked as a screenwriter in Hollywood. A man of outspoken radical beliefs, he wrote about his membership in the Communist Party from 1943 to 1956 in The Naked God (1957).

Source

- Macdonald, Andrew. Howard Fast: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Faulkner, William (1897–1962) novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter

I discovered that my own little postage stamp of native soil was worth writing about and that I would never live long enough to exhaust it, and by sublimating the actual into apocryphal I would have complete liberty to use whatever talent I might have to its absolute top.

—Interview, The Paris Review (1956)

One of the most innovative and critically acclaimed writers of the twentieth century, William Faulkner remained throughout his life very much a son of Mississippi. He was born September 25, 1897, in New Albany, Mississippi, the oldest son of Murry and Maud Butler Falkner—he added the “u” to the spelling of his name as an adult. He was named for his great-grandfather, William Cuthbert Falkner, who had achieved prominence as a lawyer, politician, railroad entrepreneur, a colonel in the Civil War, and best-selling novelist, and who was killed by a former business partner some eight years before his great-grandson's birth.

William Faulkner, 1954

Faulkner grew up in Oxford, Mississippi, home of the University of Mississippi. A prolific reader, he blossomed as a writer under the tutelage of Phil Stone, a lawyer who arranged for the publication of his first book, a poetry collection titled The Marble Faun (1926). Another key relationship from Faulkner's youth was a romance with Estelle Oldham; when she agreed to marry a law student with better prospects in 1918, Faulkner enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force as a cadet pilot, hoping to fly combat missions in WORLD WAR I. The war ended before he was commissioned.

During his apprenticeship years, Faulkner lived for a time in New Orleans, where he fostered a relationship with writer Sherwood ANDERSON, who encouraged him to write about his home in Mississippi. Faulkner wrote two novels—

Soldiers' Pay (1926), about the return home of a wounded, disfigured soldier, and Mosquitoes (1927), about artists in New Orleans—before beginning to explore his Mississippi material in fiction, beginning with Sartoris (1929). In 1929 he and Estelle married following her divorce from her first husband, and the following year he bought a decrepit antebellum mansion on the outskirts of Oxford that he named Rowan Oak, after a legendary tree with protective powers described in James Frazer's The Golden Bough. It was his home and sanctuary for the rest of his life.

Even though Faulkner published work regularly—including ten novels in the 1930s and 1940s—hard times and poor book sales forced him to take work in Hollywood, usually for director Howard Hawks; he received screenwriting credits for six movies, most notably To Have and Have Not (1944) and The Big Sleep (1946). He also wrote short stories to make quick money. Despite favorable reviews, nearly all of his novels were out of print by 1945.

The neglect of Faulkner's accomplishments began to change when Malcolm Cowley edited a compendium of Faulkner's fiction for VIKING's Portable series. The Portable Faulkner (1946) initiated a resurgence in critical and popular interest in Faulkner's work, which culminated when he was awarded the Nobel Prize in literature for 1949. Faulkner continued to be productive, publishing five more novels before his death. In 1957 he began a stint as writer in residence at the University of Virginia, partly to be nearer his daughter and grandchildren. For the next several years he divided his time between Oxford and Charlottesville. He died of a heart attack July 6, 1962, in Byhalia, Mississippi.

Most of Faulkner's fiction after Sartoris was set in his fictional YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY—his “postage stamp of native soil”—which was based closely on Lafayette County, Mississippi. After he had to make drastic cuts in Sartoris to please his publisher (it was published uncut as Flags in the Dust in 1973), Faulkner said that he wrote his fourth novel, THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929), for himself, with little hope of publication. He had been experimenting with stylistic innovations, but in this novel, his experimentation reached new heights as he employed modernistic techniques (see MODERNISM) such as fragmented prose, STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS, and broken time to tell the moving story of the decline of the Compsons, a once-proud Southern family.

Over the next decade or so, Faulkner built upon this artistic success with novels now regarded as masterpieces. AS I LAY DYING (1930) tells of the death and burial of Addie Bundren, the matriarch of a poor farm family, through a series of first-person monologues by fifteen narrators. SANCTUARY (1931), one of Faulkner's few early bestsellers, recounts a sordid tale of Temple Drake, a University of Mississippi coed who is raped and abducted into an underworld of bootleggers, gangsters, and prostitutes in a Memphis whorehouse.

Dust jacket for Faulkner's fourth novel, which takes its title from William Shakespeare's Macbeth, 5.5: "... a tale, / Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, / Signifying nothing"

LIGHT IN AUGUST (1932) is Faulkner's first great novel on the subject of race, in which the possible black lineage of Joe Christmas, seemingly white, leads to his downfall. Faulkner revisited the heritage of Southern racism in many of his other works, particularly in ABSALOM, ABSALOM! (1936), regarded by many as his greatest novel. The focus of the work is Thomas Sutpen, a mysterious stranger who comes to Yoknapatawpha County in the 1830s, builds a plantation and starts a family only to have his dream of an aristocratic dynasty shattered because of a secret from his past. The attempts of the novel's narrators to understand and make sense of Sutpen's story reveal how the past continues to affect and haunt the present.

The Civil War is a crucial element in Absalom, Absalom! and other Faulkner novels, especially THE UNVANQUISHED (1938), which began as a series of short stories about young Bayard Sartoris and his black friend Ringo as they grow up during the war. Go Down, Moses (1942) also began as a series of stories revealing the history of the McCaslin family, whose patriarch committed miscegenation compounded by incest by fathering a child with a slave who was his own daughter. The book focuses on the complexities of race relations and Southern history; it also is Faulkner's most sustained treatment of the relationship of humans with the land, represented most potently in "The Bear," a hunting story in which the death of a legendary bear presages the destruction of the wilderness.

Dust jacket for Faulkner's scandalous 1931 novel centered on the rape of a Mississippi coed

Faulkner's later novels are not generally as well regarded as those from his earlier period. Intruder in the Dust (1948) is a murder mystery involving Lucas Beauchamp, a key black character who had appeared in Go Down, Moses. Part-prose and part-drama, Requiem for a Nun (1951) is a sequel to Sanctuary, in which a married Temple Drake must deal with the murder of her child by her black nursemaid. Faulkner considered his magnum opus to be A Fable (1954), an allegorical novel set during WORLD WAR I about a Christlike corporal who succeeds, briefly, in stopping the war.

His greatest accomplishment during the second half of his career is the SNOPEs TRILOGY, which chronicles the movement into Yoknapatawpha of the Snopes, poor whites who begin to become one of the most important families in the county, marking the passing of the old aristocratic hierarchy. The first novel in the trilogy, The Hamlet (1940), documents Flem Snopes's rise to prominence at a rural country store, first as clerk and then as husband to the store owner's pregnant daughter, Eula. As the novel ends, Flem and Eula move to the town of Jefferson, thus paving the way for the second novel in the trilogy, The Town (1957), in which Flem consolidates his wealth and power. In The Mansion (1959), Flem meets his downfall when an angry kinsman takes revenge against him.

Faulkner's writing style—whose rhetorical complexity is a marked contrast to the work of his contemporaries such as F. Scott FITZGERALD and Ernest HEMINGWAY—is notable for its innovations in narrative technique, but equally compelling are the philosophical, cultural, and sociological ramifications of his fiction. His novels, particularly those set in Yoknapatawpha County, may be read as an epic chronicle of Southern life—as many early critics tended to do—but by no means should his work be read solely from a regionalist or historical perspective. The "universal truths" in his fiction about "the human heart in conflict with itself," as Faulkner phrased it in his Nobel Prize speech, have afforded thousands of published interpretations of his work from every possible critical approach.

—John B. Padgett

Principal Books by Faulkner

- The Marble Faun*. Boston: Four Seas, 1924.
Soldiers' Pay. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926.
Mosquitoes. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.
Sartoris. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1929. Original, uncut version edited by Douglas Day as Flags in the Dust. New York: Random House, 1973. Original version newly edited by Noel Polk in Novels, 1926–1929. New York: Library of America, 2006.
The Sound and the Fury. New York: Cape & Smith, 1929.
As I Lay Dying. New York: Cape & Smith, 1930.
Sanctuary. New York: Cape & Smith, 1931. Unrevised version edited by Polk as Sanctuary: The Original Text. New York: Random House, 1981.
These 13. New York: Cape & Smith, 1931.
Idyll in the Desert. New York: Random House, 1931.
Miss Zilphia Gant. Dallas: Book Club of Texas, 1932.
Light in August. New York: Smith & Haas, 1932.
A Green Bough. New York: Smith & Haas, 1933.
Doctor Martino and Other Stories. New York: Smith & Haas, 1934.
Pylon. New York: Smith & Haas, 1935.
Absalom, Absalom! New York: Random House, 1936.
The Unvanquished. New York: Random House, 1938.
The Wild Palms. New York: Random House, 1939.
The Hamlet. New York: Random House, 1940; revised, New York: Random House, 1964.

- Go Down, Moses and Other Stories*. New York: Random House, 1942.
- Intruder in the Dust*. New York: Random House, 1948.
- Knight's Gambit*. New York: Random House, 1949.
- Collected Stories of William Faulkner*. New York: Random House, 1950.
- Requiem for a Nun*. New York: Random House, 1951.
- Mirrors of Chartres Street*. Minneapolis: Faulkner Studies, 1953.
- A Fable*. New York: Random House, 1954.
- Big Woods*. New York: Random House, 1955.
- Faulkner at Nagano*, edited by Robert A. Jelliffe. Tokyo: Kenkyusha, 1956.
- The Town*. New York: Random House, 1957.
