- New Orleans Sketches*, edited by Carvel Collins. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1958. Republished. Jackson: University of Mississippi, 2002.
- Faulkner in the University: Class Conferences at the University of Virginia, 1957–1958*, edited by Frederick L. Gwynn and Joseph Blotner. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1959.
- The Mansion*. New York: Random House, 1959.
- The Reivers*. New York: Random House, 1962.
- Early Prose and Poetry*, edited by Collins. Boston: Little, Brown, 1962.
- Faulkner at West Point*, edited by Joseph L. Fant III and Robert Ashley. New York: Random House, 1964. Republished. University Press of Mississippi, 2002.
- The Wishing Tree*. New York: Random House, 1964.
- Essays, Speeches & Public Letters*, edited by James B. Meriwether. New York: Random House, 1966. Revised. New York: Modern Library, 2004.
- The Faulkner-Cowley File: Letters and Memories, 1944–1962*, edited by Malcolm Cowley. New York: Viking, 1966.
- Lion in the Garden: Interviews with William Faulkner 1926–1962*, edited by Meriwether and Michael Millgate. New York: Random House, 1968.
- The Big Sleep*, by Faulkner, Jules Furthman, and Leigh Brackett. New York: Irvington, 1971.
- The Marionettes: A Play in One Act*. Charlottesville: Bibliographical Society, University of Virginia, 1975.
- Mayday*. South Bend, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1976.
- Selected Letters of William Faulkner*, edited by Blotner. New York: Random House, 1977.
- Mississippi Poems*. Oxford, Miss.: Yoknapatawpha, 1979.
- Uncollected Stories of William Faulkner*, edited by Blotner. New York: Random House, 1979.
- To Have and Have Not*, by Faulkner and Furthman. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1980.
- The Road to Glory*, by Faulkner and Joel Sayre. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1981.
- Helen: A Courtship*. Oxford, Miss.: Yoknapatawpha, 1981.
- Faulkner's MGM Screenplays*, edited by Bruce F. Kawin. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1982.
- Elmer*, edited by Dianne Cox. Northport, Ala.: Seajay, 1983.

LIGHT IN AUGUST

WILLIAM FAULKNER

HARRISON SMITH & ROBERT HAAS

Title page for Faulkner's seventh novel. He explained that the title, which has no direct connection to the story, referred to "a peculiar quality to the light" in the South during the month of August.

- Father Abraham*, edited by Meriwether. New York: Red Ozier Press, 1983; New York: Random House, 1984.
- The DeGaulle Story*, edited by Louis Daniel Brodsky and Robert W. Hamblin. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1984.
- Vision in Spring*, edited by Judith Sensibar. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1984.
- Battle Cry*, edited by Brodsky and Hamblin. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1985.
- William Faulkner Manuscripts*, 25 volumes, edited by Blotner, Thomas L. McHaney, Millgate, and Polk. New York & London: Garland, 1986–1987.
- Country Lawyer and Other Stories for the Screen*, edited by Brodsky and Hamblin. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987.
- Stallion Road*, edited by Brodsky and Hamblin. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989.

Dust jacket for Faulkner's 1936 novel in which four unreliable narrators combine to tell the story of Thomas Sutpen's tragic career

Novels, 1936–1940: Absalom, Absalom!, The Unvanquished, If I Forget Thee, Jerusalem [The Wild Palms], The Hamlet, edited by Polk. New York: Library of America, 1990.

Novels, 1930–1935: As I Lay Dying, Sanctuary, Light in August, Pylon, edited by Polk. New York: Library of America, 1994.

Novels, 1942–1944: Go Down, Moses, Intruder in the Dust, Requiem for a Nun, A Fable, edited by Polk. New York: Library of America, 1994.

Conversations with William Faulkner, edited by M. Thomas Inge. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

Novels, 1926–1929: Soldiers' Pay, Mosquitoes, Flags in the Dust, The Sound and the Fury, edited by Polk. New York: Library of America, 2006.

Studying William Faulkner

William Faulkner wrote a total of nineteen novels and more than one hundred short stories between 1919 and his death in 1962. His career can be divided into roughly three periods: an apprenticeship period, consisting of sketches, poems, short fiction, and his earliest novels; his period of greatness, beginning with THE SOUND AND THE FURY in 1929 and continuing until WORLD WAR II; and his later years, during which he finished the last two novels of the SNOPEs TRILOGY.

Students wishing to study Faulkner should probably start with works published 1929–1942, which represent the height of his achievement. Because he set most of his work in his fictional YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, based on Lafayette County, Mississippi, some commentators have attempted to read Faulkner as a kind of historical chronicle of the county, and/or as a microcosm of the South. For readers who would like to attempt such a reading, a good starting point is the novel THE UNVANQUISHED (1938), a Civil War novel about the Sartoris family, which also has the advantage of being relatively easy to read, lacking many of the rhetorical flourishes and highly experimental prose forms common in other works. Other accessible novels from this period include AS I LAY DYING (1930), which is “told” via monologues by fifteen different speakers, and SANCTUARY (1931).

More difficult, both in length and subject matter, are LIGHT IN AUGUST (1932), with a large cast of characters and serious subject matter, and Go Down, Moses (1942), a sprawling novel about the McCaslin family that includes one of Faulkner's great stories, “The Bear.” THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929) and ABSALOM, ABSALOM! (1936), the two novels most often regarded as Faulkner's masterpieces, require a great deal of readers, and the experience of reading them has often been described as requiring a reader to learn how to read all over again. The difficulties of comprehending these novels is, in fact, part of the effect Faulkner intended, as both works are concerned at least in part with the difficulties of forming meaning out of narrative.

Anyone wishing to study the life of Faulkner would be advised to begin with Joseph Blotner's Faulkner: A Biography, originally published by Random House in two volumes in 1974, then as a revised one-volume edition (New York: Random House, 1984). David Minter's William Faulkner: His Life and Work (Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1980) combines highlights from Faulkner's life with corresponding moments in the fiction. Other commendable biographies and histories include Jay Parini's One Matchless Time: A Life of William Faulkner (New York: HarperCollins, 2004); Joel Williamson's William Faulkner and Southern History (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993); and Don Doyle's The Roots of Yoknapatawpha: A History of Lafayette County, Mississippi (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001).

Faulkner has been the subject of countless critical studies, a list that by one reckoning has been exceeded only by William Shakespeare. Acclaimed studies of Faulkner include Olga Vickery's The Novels of William Faulkner: A Critical Interpretation (Third edition; Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995), Michael Millgate's The Achievement of William Faulkner (New York: Random House, 1966; Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1978), and Cleanth Brooks's The Yoknapatawpha Country (1963; Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990) and Toward Yoknapatawpha and Beyond (1978; Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990), the latter of which is largely about his non-Yoknapatawpha novels. The Faulkner Journal, published twice a year, is also a good source for criticism.

For close focus on selected works, the "Reading Faulkner" series by the University Press of Mississippi in Jackson offers line-by-line reading of several novels, including The Sound and the Fury (by Stephen M. Ross, 1996), Sanctuary (by Edwin T. Arnold, 1996), The Unvanquished (by James C. Hinkle and Robert McCoy, 1995), and Light in August (by Hugh M. Ruppersburg, 1994), and a volume on Collected Stories (by Theresa M. Towner and James B. Carothers, 2006), with additional books in the series forthcoming. Garland Publishers in New York, in addition to publishing twenty-five volumes of Faulkner manuscripts (1986–1987), has an "Annotations to the Novels" series that offers similar guides to several other novels, including Absalom, Absalom! (by David Paul Ragan, 1991), As I Lay Dying (by Dianne C. Luce, 1990), Go Down, Moses (by Nancy Drew Taylor, 1994), Sanctuary (by Melinda McLeod Rousselle, 1989), The Hamlet (by Catherine D. Holmes, 1996), and The Town (by Merrill Horton, 1996). Twayne Publishers in New York has published several studies of individual novels, including The Sound and the Fury: Faulkner and the Lost Cause, by John T. Matthews (1990); Light in August: A Study in Black and White, by Alwyn Berland (1992); As I Lay Dying: Stories Out of Stories, by Warwick Wadlington (1992); Go Down, Moses: The Miscegenation of Time, by Arthur F. Kinney (1996); and Absalom, Absalom!: The Questioning of Fictions, by Robert Dale Parker (1991).

A few recent (or recently reissued) works are also indispensable resources for the study of Faulkner. William Faulkner A to Z: The Essential Guide to His Life and Work, by A. Nicholas Fargnoli and Michael Golay (New York: Facts on File, 2002), provides an affordable single-volume reference on titles, themes, and even characters and places that appear in his fiction, as well as comprehensive listings of Faulkner's publications and bibliographies for further research. A William Faulkner Encyclopedia, edited by Robert W. Hamblin and Charles A. Peek (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999), also serves as a reference guide to Faulkner's titles and themes via articles by various contributors that are a bit more scholarly in scope and intent than entries in Fargnoli and Golay's guide. Two books by Edmund L. Volpe, one published originally in the 1960s but recently republished, are handy guides to Faulkner's novels and short stories, respectively: A Reader's Guide to William Faulkner: The Novels (1964; Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2003), and A Reader's Guide to William Faulkner: The Short Stories (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2004). Students may also want to investigate William Faulkner on the Web (<[http://www.mcsr.](http://www.mcsr.olemiss.edu/~egjbp/ Faulkner) [olemiss.edu/~egjbp/ Faulkner](http://www.mcsr.olemiss.edu/~egjbp/ Faulkner)>) and join the online Faulkner Discussion List by sending the message "subscribe faulkner" to md@listserv.olemiss.edu.

—John B. Padgett

Fauset, Jessie Redmon (1882–1961) editor, writer, educator

An important figure in the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, Jessie Redmon Fauset was denied admission to Bryn Mawr College because of her race and instead attended Cornell University, where she graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1905. After teaching in public schools in Washington, D.C., she earned an M.A. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1919. Moving to New York, she became the literary editor of THE CRISIS (1919–1926), where she fostered the talents of such writers as Countee CULLEN, Claude MCKAY, Jean TOOMER, and Langston HUGHES. Hughes credited Fauset, Charles Johnson, and Alain Locke as "the three people who mid-wifed the so-called New Negro literature into being. Kind and critical—but not too critical for the young—they nursed us along until our books were born." With W. E. B. DU BOIS, she founded Brownies' Book (1920–1921), for which she wrote the dedication: "To children, who with eager look / Scanned vainly library shelf, and nook, / For History or Song or Story / That told of Colored People's glory,— / We dedicate the Brownies' Book." In 1927 Fauset returned to teaching at DeWitt Clinton High School in New York City, where she taught French until 1944. In addition to the writing she did for periodicals, Fauset published four novels—There is Confusion (1924), Plum Bun (1929), The Chinaberry Tree (1931), and Comedy: American Style (1933)—in which she presents mainly middle-class African American characters confronting racial and sexual barriers as they seek happiness.

Source

McLendon, Jacquelyn Y. The Politics of Color in the Fiction of Jessie Fauset and Nella Larsen. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.

Fearing, Kenneth (1902–1961) poet, novelist

The Chicago-born Kenneth Fearing moved to New York City after he graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1924. Fearing, who early in his career wrote pseudonymously for PULP MAGAZINES, initially made his reputation as a poet, publishing Angel Arms, the first of his seven volumes of poetry, in 1929. He became well known in the 1930s as a proletarian poet, capturing the atmosphere and vernacular of the city in hard-boiled verse. In his prose as well as his poetry, Fearing wrote satirically about the disintegration of middle-class values in contemporary society. In his first novel, Hospital (1939), Fearing depicts several crises occurring at a large metropolitan hospital at three in the afternoon, just after a drunken janitor has turned off the power, from the perspectives of multiple first-person narrators—a technique he employed in his six subsequent novels. Fearing's most successful novel was The Big Clock (1946), a thriller in which the multiple perspectives add to the suspense of a witness to a murder being pursued by the murderer.

Sources

Barnard, Rita. The Great Depression and the Culture of Abundance: Kenneth Fearing, Nathanael West, and Mass Culture in the 1930s. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Fearing, Kenneth. Complete Poems, edited by Robert M. Ryley (Orono, Maine: National Poetry Foundation, 1993).

Federal Theatre Project (1935–1939)

One of several arts programs established under the Works Progress Administration during President Franklin Roosevelt's first term, the Federal Theatre Project was created to provide work for unemployed theater workers—actors, writers, directors, stage technicians, and support people—during the GREAT DEPRESSION. At its height the project employed more than 12,000 people, nine out of ten of whom had been on relief rolls. The project operated in more than forty cities in twenty-two states and also formed companies that toured rural areas. Among its innovations, the project produced the “Living Newspaper,” which dramatized social and economic issues. The project also subsidized original, experimental theater, new playwrights, and lowered ticket prices with the aim of maintaining and revitalizing theater in the United States.

Sources

Flanagan, Hallie. Arena: The Story of the Federal Theater. New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1940.

Gagey, Edmond. Revolution in American Drama. New York: Columbia University Press, 1947.

The New Deal Stage <<http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/fedtp/ftthome.html>>.

Federal Writers' Project (1935–1943)

The Federal Writers' Project, established as part of the Federal Works Progress Administration, provided work for unemployed white-collar workers during the GREAT DEPRESSION. Project writers, who were paid a subsistence wage of $20 a week, produced state guidebooks, now considered classics of Americana—book-length histories of the people, places, culture, and geography of the individual states. Writers also worked on life histories, almanacs, historical pamphlets, collections of folklore, and other writing assignments concerned with local and national history and culture. Government employment of writers was a controversial policy attacked by conservatives and others who believed that the arts should not receive direct support from public funds. The Federal Writers'

Project, like many other New Deal programs, ceased to operate by the beginning of WORLD WAR II. At its peak, the project employed in its local and state branches some 6,500 writers.

Source

Mangione, Jerre. The Dream and the Deal: The Federal Writers' Project, 1935–1943. Boston: Little, Brown, 1972.

Ferber, Edna (1885–1968) short story writer, playwright, novelist

Edna Ferber became a popular writer with her stories about a businesswoman named Emma McChesney, which were collected in three volumes published in 1913–1915. But Ferber's reputation is founded on her novels, especially So Big (1924), for which she became the first Jewish-American woman to win the PULITZER PRIZE, Show Boat (1926), Cimarron (1930), and Giant (1952). In her fiction Ferber portrayed career women, gamblers, the land rush in Oklahoma in the 1880s, the logging industry in Wisconsin, the oil industry in Texas, and modern Alaska. Showboat was made into a popular and often-revived classic stage musical.

Ferber also had considerable success as a playwright, especially with The Royal Family (1928), a satire about an acting family based on the Barrymores; Dinner at Eight (1932), a light comedy about a fashionable dinner party; and Stage Door (1936)—all works she wrote with George S. KAUFMAN.

Sources

Gilbert, Julie Goldsmith. Edna Ferber: A Biography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978.

Shaugnessy, Mary Rose. Women and Success in American Society in the Works of Edna Ferber. New York: Gordon Press, 1977.

Fields, Dorothy (1905–1974) lyricist

Dorothy Fields was the only major woman lyricist in an era dominated by male songwriters. Her father was vaudeville star Lew Fields, part of the comedy duo of Weber Fields. Dorothy went to work on Tin Pan Alley, where she became known as “The Fifty-Dollar-A-Night Girl” because she could create a lyric overnight to fit a composer's melody.

With composer Jimmy McHugh, Fields wrote songs for revues at Harlem's Cotton Club as well as for Broadway, where they created such hits as “I Can't Give You Anything but Love” (1928) and “On the Sunny Side of the Street” (1930), in which Fields showed that she could weave colloquial expressions—“Gee, I'd like to see you looking swell, baby,” “If I never made a cent, I'd be rich as Rockefeller”—into unsentimental but still romantic lyrics. When Fields and McHugh followed the westward migration of songwriters to Hollywood, they created such classic songs as “I Feel a Song Comin' On” and “I'm in the Mood for Love” (1935).

RKO teamed Dorothy Fields with Jerome Kern for several motion pictures starring Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers. Fields took an abbreviated Kern melody, sixteen-bars long instead of the usual thirty-two-bar chorus, and fashioned "Lovely to Look At," which fit into the fashion-model theme of the show Roberta (1935). Fields also added new lyrics to "I Won't Dance," a song Kern had originally written with Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II. In Hammerstein's lyric, the singer refuses to dance because he is not a very good dancer; in Fields's revision, the singer refuses to dance because he feels the physical proximity will be sexually irresistible: "For heavens rest us / I'm not asbestos." Fields and Kern wrote their best score together for Swing Time (1936), which featured the witty "A Fine Romance" ("You're calmer than the seals in the Arctic Ocean / At least they flap their fins to express emotion") and the plangent ballad "The Way You Look Tonight."

She continued to write both "book" and "lyrics" for successful shows in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, at a time when rock music was pushing most other traditional songwriters aside. With Arthur Schwartz, she wrote the songs for A Tree Grows in Brooklyn (1953) and By the Beautiful Sea (1954), and, with Cy Coleman, Sweet Charity (1966), which produced such rousing hits as "Big Spender" and "If My Friends Could See Me Now."

Source

Winer, Deborah Grace. On the Sunny Side of the Steeet: The Life and Lyrics of Dorothy Fields. New York: Schirmer, 1997.

—Philip Furia

"Fifty Grand" (1927) short story

Originally published in the Atlantic Monthly and collected in Men Without Women (1927), Ernest HEMINGWAY's "Fifty Grand" is based on a 1922 championship fight in New York between Benny Leonard and Jack Britton. In the story, welterweight fighter Jack Brennan, convinced that he no longer has the endurance to defeat Jimmy Walcott, bets $50,000 on Walcott. Through seven rounds Brennan fights well but takes a beating thereafter. In the eleventh round, with the fight in Walcott's control, Walcott deliberately hits Brennan with a low blow that should have disqualified him. Determined to preserve his $50,000, Brennan remains on his feet, tells the referee that the blow was not low, and then brings Walcott down with his own low blow, clearly a foul. The fight is awarded to Walcott, and Brennan has averted an apparent double cross by Walcott and the gamblers.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on Ernest Hemingway. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2002.

Baker, Carlos. Hemingway: The Writer as Artist, fourth edition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.

—John C. Unrue

Finney, Charles (1905–1984) novelist

Charles Finney published his first and most famous novel, The Circus of Dr. Lao, in 1935. Detailing the arrival of a Chinese man's fantastic circus of comic, bizarre, and mythological creatures in a small, sleepy Arizona town, The Circus of Dr. Lao won the American Booksellers Association Prize for the "most original" novel of the year. But it received mixed reviews and struggled to stay in print until the 1950s when it was rediscovered and reprinted. Working mainly as a reporter for the Arizona Daily Star in Tucson, Finney published two other novels, The Unholy City (1937) and Past the End of the Pavement (1939), and a memoir of his time as a young soldier in China, The Old China Hands (1962).

—R. John Williams

Fisher, Vardis (1895–1968) novelist

Vardis Fisher grew up in Idaho and set much of his fiction in the West. His early novels Toilers of the Hills (1928) and Dark Bridwell (1931), which dealt with the harshness of frontier life, put him in the regionalist tradition (see REGIONALISM). He wrote a tetralogy—In Tragic Life (1932), Passions Spin the Plot (1934), We Are Betrayed (1935), and No Villain Need Be (1936)—about the life of Vridar Hunter, an autobiographical character who grows up on a Western farm, experiences war, and becomes a professor at a Mormon college. Fisher's reputation reached its peak in 1939 with the publication of Children of God, an historical novel about Joseph Smith and the Mormons. In the 1940s Fisher began a series of twelve novels known as his Testament of Man series, which traced the development of humanity from its beginnings. The series begins with Darkness and the Deep (1943), The Golden Rooms (1944), and Intimations of Eve (1946)—novels that treat the evolution of humans from ape-man to Neanderthal to hunters and gatherers—and culminates with Orphans in Gethsemane (1960), a revision and enlargement of his tetralogy.

Sources

Chatterton, Wayne. Vardis Fisher: The Frontier and Regional Works. Boise, Idaho: Boise State College, 1972.

Flora, Joseph M. Vardis Fisher. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott (1896–1940) novelist, short-story writer

... sometimes I think the impersonal and objective quality of my talent, and the sacrifices of it, in pieces, to preserve its essential value has some sort of epic grandeur.

—letter to Scottie Fitzgerald

The dominant influences on F. Scott Fitzgerald's life and career were literature, Princeton, aspiration, money, alcohol, and his wife, Zelda Sayre FITZGERALD. He grew up in St. Paul, Minnesota, and was raised a Catholic but left the Church in his twenties. The son of an unsuccessful businessman, Fitzgerald developed in his boyhood and at school intense feelings about wealth and the American class system, which he wrote into his fiction.

F. Scott Fitzgerald, circa 1924

After Newman, a New Jersey Catholic prep school, Fitzgerald entered Princeton as a member of the Class of 1917. At college he neglected his studies in order to serve a literary apprenticeship. He wrote for the Nassau Literary Magazine and the Tiger humor magazine, and he provided the lyrics for three Triangle Club musicals. He was about to flunk out of college when he took an army commission in 1917; to his lasting regret he did not experience battle. In the army he wrote a novel, which he rewrote as THIS SIDE OF PARADISE. Stationed at Camp Sheridan, Alabama, he fell in love with an archetypal Southern belle, Zelda Sayre.

Fitzgerald was an exemplary figure for America during his times. He achieved early success during the 1920s—which he named “The Jazz Age”—when his fiction and conduct expressed the ebullience of the postwar boom. As a member of the expatriate group in France during the 1920s, he formed a difficult friendship with Ernest HEMINGWAY. In the 1930s he was regarded as a failure whose work was irrelevant to the concerns of the GREAT DEPRESSION.

During his lifetime his fiction was underrated or dismissed as trivial because the reputation-makers regarded his characters and their values as trivial. He was better known and more widely read as the author of popular magazine stories—which provided most of his income—than as a novelist. His brilliant style, wit, warm tone, and the poetry of his prose were regarded as facile; he was labeled an irresponsible writer who had squandered his gifts to make money. But Fitzgerald was a painstaking writer and rewriter who labored to achieve readability and emotional power. He was a hard-working professional with high literary ambitions who published four novels, a play, and four volumes of short stories between 1920 and 1935.

One of the glamor figures in American literature, Fitzgerald achieved success and celebrity with his first novel, This Side of Paradise (1920), set at Princeton, and embarked on an extravagant life with his eccentric wife. Despite his alcoholism and the strain of her eventual insanity, he published two masterpiece novels—one of which, THE GREAT GATSBY (1925), is a leading contender for designation as “the great American novel.” Jay Gatsby is the best-known figure in American fiction and is recognized by people who have not read the novel.

Fitzgerald was the first celebrated young writer associated with the great editor Maxwell PERKINS at CHARLES SCRIBNER’S SONS, whose stable of geniuses came to include Ernest Hemingway and Thomas WOLFE. Fitzgerald’s second novel, The Beautiful and Damned (1922), which examined the ruin of an attractive weak couple, was not an advance in his novelistic technique. Since Fitzgerald’s novels earned comparatively little money when they were published, most of his writing time went into the 160 stories published in mass-circulation magazines—principally THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. Although written to sell, they included “WINTER DREAMS” (1922), “THE LAST OF THE BELLES” (1929), “ONE TRIP ABROAD” (1930), and “BABYLON REVISITED” (1931). His three novelettes are classics of the form: “MAY DAY” (1920), “THE DIAMOND AS BIG AS THE RITZ” (1922), and “THE RICH BOY” (1926).

The Great Gatsby (1925)—a short novel of 50,000 words, published before Fitzgerald was thirty—achieved a control of structure and point of view previously absent in his work. A study of romantic commitment and betrayal, it is also an examination of the American Dream and American society during the boom years. Fitzgerald’s name and work are closely connected with the 1920s because he was a brilliant social historian who utilized details to evoke the feelings and moods associated with time and place. The description of Gatsby’s party and the guest list evoke the excitement and vulgarity of “the greatest, gaudiest spree in history.” The reviews for the novel were mixed, with the favorable ones very strong; but the sales of about 23,000 copies were disappointing.

Fitzgerald's fourth and best novel, TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934), was published nine years after The Great Gatsby; and the delay, which partly resulted from the necessity to write commercial stories that would pay Zelda Fitzgerald's medical bills, damaged its reception when it appeared during the Depression. Most of the reviewers were unimpressed or unfriendly. The flashback structure was unappreciated, and the causes for the deterioration of the hero, Dick Diver, were largely misunderstood. James Dickey, who admired the novel, remarked that "If they could get Dick Diver, none of us is safe."

Following the failure of Tender Is the Night to restore or advance Fitzgerald's literary standing, he experienced a physical and nervous breakdown, accompanied by financial worries, which he wrote about in the Esquire confessional essays posthumously collected in THE CRACK-UP (1945). Unable to continue writing popular magazine fiction, he went to Hollywood in 1937 to work for MGM on screenplays—at which he was not successful. At his death he was writing a Hollywood novel, published as a work in progress as The Last Tycoon (see THE LOVE OF THE LAST TYCOON) in 1941. In its unfinished form it is one of the best novels inspired by the movie industry.

During his lifetime and into the twenty-first century Fitzgerald had two reputations: as a playboy and as a gifted writer—with his wastrel image predominating among general readers and Fitzgerald groupies. He became the subject of exaggerated or false anecdotes that interfered with the proper judgment of his work. Fitzgerald died believing himself a failure, and the obituaries treated him as a casualty of the 1920s: a writer who had wasted his ability and sold out. A spontaneous reappraisal generated by readers began in the mid 1940s with the reprintings of The Great Gatsby; this reappraisal became a revival in the 1950s. John O'HARA wrote in 1945, "All he was was our best novelist, one of our best novella-ists, and one of our finest writers of short stories." At the end of the 1960s F. Scott Fitzgerald was safely positioned among the greatest American writers.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Principal Books by Fitzgerald

- Fie! Fie! Fi-Fi!* Cincinnati, New York & London: The John Church Co., 1914. Fie! Fie! Fi-Fi: A Facsimile of the 1914 Acting Script and Musical Score. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.
- The Evil Eye*. Cincinnati, New York & London: The John Church Co., 1915.
- Safety First*. Cincinnati, New York & London: The John Church Co., 1916.
- This Side of Paradise*. New York: Scribners, 1920.
- Flappers and Philosophers*. New York: Scribners, 1920.
- The Beautiful and Damned*. New York: Scribners, 1922.
- Tales of the Jazz Age*. New York: Scribners, 1922.
- The Vegetable*. New York: Scribners, 1923.

Dust jacket for Fitzgerald's first novel, which was read as announcing the rebellious young generation of the Jazz Age

- The Great Gatsby*. New York: Scribners, 1925. Cambridge Edition, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- All the Sad Young Men*. New York: Scribners, 1926.
- Tender Is the Night*. New York: Scribners, 1934. Tender Is the Night, "With the Author's Final Revisions," edited by Malcolm Cowley. New York: Scribners, 1951. Everyman Centennial Edition, edited by Bruccoli. London: Dent, 1996.
- Taps at Reveille*. New York: Scribners, 1935.
- The Last Tycoon*, edited by Edmund Wilson. New York: Scribners, 1941. The Love of the Last Tycoon: A Western, Cambridge Edition, edited by Bruccoli.. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- The Crack-Up*, edited by Wilson. New York: New Directions, 1945.
- The Stories of F. Scott Fitzgerald*, edited by Cowley. New York: Scribners, 1951.
- Afternoon of an Author*, edited by Arthur Mizener. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Library, 1957.

Dust jacket for Fitzgerald's fourth novel, his most personal work, which treats the "intricate destiny" of Richard Diver, who wanted "to be a good psychologist—maybe to be the greatest one that ever lived"

The Pat Hobby Stories, edited by Arnold Gingrich. New York: Scribners, 1962.

The Apprentice Fiction of F. Scott Fitzgerald, 1909–1917, edited by John Kuehl. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1965.

Thoughtbook of Francis Scott Key Fitzgerald, edited by Kuehl. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Library, 1965.

F. Scott Fitzgerald In His Own Time: A Miscellany, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli and Jackson R. Bryer. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1971.

The Basil and Josephine Stories, edited by Bryer and Kuehl. New York: Scribners, 1973.

F. Scott Fitzgerald's Ledger, edited by Bruccoli. Washington, D.C.: Bruccoli Clark/NCR Microcard Books, 1973.

Bits of Paradise: 21 Uncollected Stories by F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, edited by Scottie Fitzgerald Smith and Bruccoli. New York: Scribners, 1973.

F. Scott Fitzgerald's Screenplay for Three Comrades by Erich Maria Remarque, edited by Bruccoli. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1978.

The Notebooks of F. Scott Fitzgerald, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Bruccoli Clark, 1978.

F. Scott Fitzgerald's St. Paul Plays: 1911–1914, edited by Alan Margolies. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Library, 1978.

The Price Was High: The Last Uncollected Stories of F. Scott Fitzgerald, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Bruccoli Clark, 1979.

Poems 1911–1940, edited by Bruccoli. Bloomfield Hills, Mich. & Columbia, S.C.: Bruccoli Clark, 1981.

The Stories of F. Scott Fitzgerald, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Scribners, 1989.

F. Scott Fitzgerald Manuscripts, edited by Bruccoli. 18 volumes. New York & London: Garland, 1990–1991.

F. Scott Fitzgerald: A Life in Letters, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 1995.

F. Scott Fitzgerald on Authorship, edited by Bruccoli with Judith Baughman. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.

Before Gatsby: The First Twenty-Six Stories, edited by Bruccoli with Baughman. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

Studying F. Scott Fitzgerald

F. Scott Fitzgerald's literary career covered two decades. In the 1920s he enjoyed celebrity and financial rewards; in the 1930s he experienced critical neglect and money troubles. Although he wrote that "there are no second acts in American lives," his career had two posthumous acts: the rediscovery or revival during the late 1940s and early 1950s, followed by the critical reappraisal of the 1960s and 1970s that made THE GREAT GATSBY (1925) the most widely taught American novel and elevated Fitzgerald to a secure position among the major American writers.

Study of Fitzgerald properly starts with his first novel, THIS SIDE OF PARADISE (1920), which launched him as a key literary figure in what he christened "THE JAZZ AGE." His astonishing technical development was proclaimed five years later in The Great Gatsby—which, nonetheless, was not a marked popular or critical success at the time of its publication. Fitzgerald's most substantial financial rewards and fame resulted from his 160 short stories published in the mass-circulation magazines. There was a close literary relationship between his commercial stories and his novels; he tested themes and characters in his magazine work for development in his novels. Fitzgerald's greatest novels, The Great Gatsby and TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934), cannot be fully appreciated without knowledge of the stories connected with them. Fitzgerald's stories and novelettes merit close study apart from their connections with his novels. Fitzgerald published four volumes of stories during his lifetime, and nearly all of his previously uncollected stories have been republished.

The standard Fitzgerald biography is Matthew J. Bruccoli's Some Sort of Epic Grandeur (Second Revised Edition. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002); The Romantic Egoists: A Pictorial Autobiography from the Scrapbooks and Albums of F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, edited by their daughter Scottie and others (New York: Scribners, 1974), supplements the biographies. There has been considerable biographical writing—some of it meretricious—about Fitzgerald and his tragic wife; indeed, there is a Zelda Fitzgerald industry that punishes him for her insanity. All of the Zelda-inspired books should be used with caution. The standard primary bibliography is Bruccoli's F. Scott Fitzgerald: A Descriptive Bibliography (Revised Edition. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1987). Fitzgerald was a brilliant letter writer; his letters have been published in five collections and are essential for the study of his life and work. The most convenient volume is F. Scott Fitzgerald: A Life in Letters (New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 1995), edited by Bruccoli.

The wide range of critical material about Fitzgerald is to be used cautiously. Some of it is far-fetched; some of it is misleading; and some of it is bad for Fitzgerald. Henry Claridge edited the comprehensive four-volume collection F. Scott Fitzgerald: Critical Assessments (Near Robertsbridge, East Sussex, U.K.: Helm Information, 1991). The Fitzgerald/Hemingway Annual was published from 1969 to 1979. The F. Scott Fitzgerald Review began publication in 2002. The Great Gatsby has generated far more scholarship and criticism than Fitzgerald's other novels, and it varies greatly in quality and good sense. Some is very bad. Two reliable guides are Roger Lathbury's Gatsby volume in the Literary Masterpieces series (Detroit: Manly/Gale Group, 2000) and Bruccoli's F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby: A Documentary Volume (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 219. Detroit: Bruccoli Clark Layman/The Gale Group, 2000). Tender Is the Night has received much less attention than The Great Gatsby; but it is well served by The Reader's Companion to F. Scott Fitzgerald's Tender Is the Night, edited by Bruccoli with Judith S. Baughman (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996), and F. Scott Fitzgerald's Tender Is the Night: A Documentary Volume, edited by Bruccoli and George Parker Anderson (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 273. Detroit: Bruccoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2003).

Fitzgerald study has been plagued by untrustworthy texts—especially for classroom use. The best in-print Gatsby text is in the Cambridge University Press Fitzgerald edition. The best Tender Is the Night text is the 1996 British Everyman edition, unavailable in the United States. All current Scribner editions of Fitzgerald are to be used with caution—especially Gatsby.

Writings about Fitzgerald are listed in Jackson Bryer's The Critical Reputation of F. Scott Fitzgerald (Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1967) and Supplement One Through 1981 (Hamden, Conn.: Archon, 1984). These secondary bibliographies can be updated by reference to the annual

Dust jacket for Fitzgerald's third novel. In August 1924, he wrote to a friend, "That's the whole burden of this novel—the loss of those illusions that give such color to the world that you don't care whether things are true or false as long as they partake of the magical glory."

MLA bibliographies available in print or online in major libraries.

Fitzgerald's manuscripts are at Princeton. The most comprehensive Fitzgerald research collection is described in the illustrated catalogue compiled by Park Bucker: The Matthew J. and Arlyn Bruccoli Collection of F. Scott Fitzgerald at the University of South Carolina (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004). The University of South Carolina Fitzgerald Centenary Website can be accessed at <<http://www.sc.edu/fitzgerald/index.html>>.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Fitzgerald, Zelda Sayre (1900–1948) novelist

The eccentric wife of F. Scott FITZGERALD, Zelda Fitzgerald has become a feminist cult figure and the subject of exaggerated claims about her putative collaboration with him. She was certainly a powerful influence on his life and work—but not necessarily a good one. Zelda Fitzgerald published one unsuccessful novel in her lifetime, Save Me the Waltz (1932). Her writing—including short stories—is witty but undisciplined. She suffered a mental breakdown in 1930 and spent most of her remaining life in sanitariums.

Sources

Fitzgerald, Zelda. The Collected Writings of Zelda Fitzgerald, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. New York: Scribners, 1991.
Milford, Nancy. Zelda: A Biography (New York: Harper & Row, 1970).

—Morris Colden

Flanner, Janet (1892–1978) journalist

Janet Flanner spent much of her life in Paris. As “Genet,” she contributed a fortnightly column “Letter from Paris” to THE NEW YORKER from 1925 to 1975. She also wrote a novel, The Cubical City (1926), and An American in Paris (1940), a memoir. Three volumes of her Paris Journal appeared in 1965, 1971, and 1972.

Source

Wineapple, Brenda. Genet: A Biography of Janet Flanner. New York: Ticknor & Fields, 1989.

Flappers and Philosophers by F. Scott Fitzgerald

(New York: Scribners, 1920) short-story collection

F. Scott FITZGERALD’s first volume of stories—all of which had been published in magazines—followed THIS SIDE OF PARADISE (1920). “The Offshore Pirate,” “The Ice Palace,” and “Bernice Bobs Her Hair” were SATURDAY EVENING POST stories that shaped his reputation as a “flapper writer” whose stories were limited to the concerns of youth.

Source

Bruccoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

“Flowering Judas” (1930) short story

“Flowering Judas,” originally published in The Hound & Horn, is one of six stories by Katherine Anne PORTER inspired by the Mexican cultural revolution of the early 1920s. As the title story in her first collection, Flowering Judas (1930), it established her reputation in American letters. The protagonist of the story, Laura, is an idealistic young American woman who has come to Mexico to participate in the revolution. But she has quickly become disenchanted with revolutionary leaders who have replaced noble passion with cynical self-interest. After Laura delivers drugs to Eugenio, a fellow revolutionary, to help him endure his miserable incarceration in a vermin-infested jail, he takes them all at once and dies.

The title of the story is taken from T. S. ELIOT’s poem “Gerontion,” but the allusion is to Judas Iscariot, the prototypical betrayer. Betrayal is the theme of the story, for Laura, participating in death instead of life, has betrayed her essential female self—a common theme in Porter’s canon.

Source

Carr, Virginia Spencer, ed. “Flowering Judas”: Katherine Anne Porter. Women Writers: Texts and Contexts. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1993.

Porter, Katherine Anne. The Collected Stories of Katherine Anne Porter. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1965.

—Darlene Harbour Unrue

Fortune (1930– ) periodical

A magazine about business, Fortune was established by Henry Luce, the founder of Time. Although it has concentrated on the development of industry, finance, and technology, the magazine has also employed distinguished literary figures such as Archibald MACLEISH, and James AGEE.

For Whom the Bell Tolls by Ernest Hemingway (New York: Scribners, 1940) novel

Often considered Ernest HEMINGWAY’s best novel, For Whom the Bell Tolls reveals Hemingway’s commitment to truth and his determination to present an honest view of the SPANISH CIVIL WAR and the people involved in it. Robert Jordan, a Spanish teacher from Montana fighting on the Loyalist side against the Fascists, joins a small group of guerillas in the Guadarrama Mountains whose help he needs to blow up a bridge at the beginning of a Loyalist attack on Fascist forces. Despite resistance of the guerrilla leader Pablo, Pilar, Pablo’s “woman,” pledges her support, and others of the group follow her lead. Jordan quickly falls in love with Maria, a young woman brutalized and raped by the Fascists, who has been rescued by the guerilla band from a Fascist train. Jordan recognizes that both sides commit atrocities during the war and that human nature cannot be superceded by political dogma: “[To] get a full picture of what is happening you cannot read only the party organ,” he says. Jordan and the guerillas successfully destroy the bridge, but at the beginning of their escape Jordan’s leg is broken when his horse is knocked down by an exploding shell, making it impossible for him to continue. Jordan remains behind to defy the approaching Fascist patrol. Against her will, Maria is put on a horse and forced to leave Jordan, who faces certain death.

Source

Baker, Carlos. Hemingway: The Writer as Artist. Fourth edition. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.

—John C. Unrue

The Four Million by O. Henry (New York: McClure, Phillips, 1906) short story collection

The second short-story volume by O. Henry, the pen name for William Sydney PORTER, The Four Million is comprised of twenty-five stories. It features some of O. Henry's most distinguished stories, including the "The Gift of the Magi" and "The Furnished Room." Typical of much of O. Henry's fiction, the stories are set in New York and generally conclude with the surprise endings for which the author is famous. Refuting Ward McAllister's famous comment that only four hundred people in New York matter, O. Henry says in the preface that the census taker's "larger estimate of human interest has been preferred in marking out the field of these little stories of the 'Four Million.'" As well as explaining the title, O. Henry's comment exemplifies the warm sentiments for ordinary people revealed throughout the collection.

Source

Current-Garcia, Eugene. O. Henry: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1993.

—Laurie Champion

Four Quartets by T. S. Eliot (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1943) poems

Four Quartets, a long meditation on the meaning of being in time and the possibility of being redeemed from time, is T. S. ELIOT's last major work and the summit of his achievement. It consists of four parallel poems, published individually between 1935 and 1942, and as a sequence in 1943. The series seeks to capture those rare moments in which one is conscious of intersections between time and eternity. It draws upon decades of Eliot's reflection on idealist philosophy, Eastern religion, Christian mysticism, and the language of poetry; it also draws upon his experience in contemporary history (personal distress, including a failed marriage, and public disasters, including two world wars and a world depression). A major idea, contained in the epigraph from Heraclitus, is that the way up and the way down are one and the same. Both thematic and structural, this motif suggests that the ascent to wisdom and to God requires an emptying of the senses and a descent into darkness. The religious content, universal in the beginning, gradually coalesces through allusions to the Bible, Dante, St. John of the Cross, and Julian of Norwich into a Christian revelation of the Logos.

The individual poems in Four Quartets have much in common. Each is named for a particular place; each has five parts and is related to one of the four seasons and one of the four elements. Each has a similar structure: part one consists of a meditation on time and place suggested in part by the place named in its title; part two begins with a highly poetic lyric, followed by a prosaic meditation; part three suggests a horizontal journey in time and a vertical journey into the self; part four is a lyrical prayer; and part five is a meditation on time and art, concluding with a return to the beginning. As suggested by the title, the sequence is analogous to a musical composition with contrapuntal arrangements of ideas, symbols, and themes.

The first Quartet, "Burnt Norton," is named for an English house with a rose garden visited by Eliot in the summer of 1934. It is associated with spring and with the element of air. The second, "East Coker," is named for the English village from which Eliot's ancestors set out for the New World in the seventeenth century and to which Eliot's ashes were to be returned. It is associated with summer and with the earth. The third, "The Dry Salvages," is named for a group of rocks in the north Atlantic near the Massachusetts coast, where Eliot spent his boyhood summers; it also contains descriptions of the Mississippi River near his childhood home in St. Louis. It is associated with autumn and with water. The final poem, "Little Gidding," is named for a seventeenth-century religious community that became a sanctuary during the English Civil War. Composed in 1942 during the bombing of London, "Little Gidding" is a meditation on wartime suffering and the providence of God. It incorporates the accumulated wisdom of Christian mystics and poets and is associated with fire and with winter. The last movement completes both the individual poem and the four-part sequence by recapitulating major themes and returning to the images of "Burnt Norton," the first poem in the series.

Sources

Blamires, Harry. Word Unheard: A Guide Through Eliot's Four Quartets. London: Methuen, 1969.

Gardner, Helen. The Composition of Four Quartets. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Frank, Waldo (1889–1967) critic, novelist

Raised in an upper-middle-class Jewish family in New Jersey, Waldo Frank graduated with high honors from Yale in 1911. He began to make a name for himself in 1916 when he and others founded THE SEVEN ARTS, a short-lived avant-garde literary magazine. His first book, Our America (1919), promoted as a "psychoanalysis of a nation," established Frank as a leading intellectual. His novels include The Dark Mother (1920), in which a young man's mystical vision leads him on a search for a fulfilling identity; Rahab (1922), a story of a prostitute who keeps her faith in God; Holiday (1923), a depiction of racism in the South; and The Bridegroom Cometh (1938), which charts a woman's life through seven crises. Frank published several more works of nonfiction that probed the American past and present, the development of American industrialism, and the need for revolutionary change. Among his more noteworthy titles are The Re-Discovery of America (1929), In the American Jungle (1937), and Chart for Rough Water (1940).

Source

Carter, Paul J. Waldo Frank. New York: Twayne, 1967.

From Death to Morning by Thomas Wolfe (New York: Scribners, 1935) short-story collection

The only collection of WOLFE's stories published during his lifetime, From Death to Morning includes "The Web of Earth," "The Four Lost Men," and "Gulliver." The reviewers complained that Wolfe did not write conventionally structured short stories.

—Morris Colden

The Front Page (produced 1928) play

A fast-paced, brash, no-holds-barred comedy-melodrama on political corruption and the excesses of yellow journalism in 1920s Chicago, The Front Page, co-authored by Ben HECHT and Charles MACARTHUR, is one of the most frequently revived plays of its era. The original production, directed by George S. KAUFMAN, premiered on August 14, 1928, at the Times Square Theatre in New York City and ran for 276 performances. The framing device for the play is the attempt of reporter Hildy Johnson to quit the "newspaper racket" to marry a small-town girl. His editor, Walter Burns, convinces his top reporter to cover one last story—the escape of Earl Williams, a death row inmate and alleged Bolshevik, on the eve of his execution for accidentally shooting a black policeman. The two newspapermen must contend with an unscrupulous sheriff and a corrupt mayor—both of whom are running for reelection on a platform of reforming the "Reds with a rope"—to get the true story and prevent the execution. Filled with pithy, often racist, language and the colorful character types and atmosphere of the Jazz Age, The Front Page spawned three major Broadway revivals as well as movie, television, and other stage adaptations.

Sources

Hecht, Ben, and Charles MacArthur, The Front Page. New York: Covici-Friede, 1928.

Hilton, George W., ed. The Front Page: From Theater to Reality. New York: Smith & Kraus, 2002.

—James Fisher

Frost, Robert (1874–1963) poet

I am one of the few artists writing. I am one of the few who have a theory of their own upon which all their work down to the least accent is done. I expect to do something to the present state of literature in America.

—letter to a former student, August 6, 1913

The recipient of many honors, including PULITZER PRIZES for four of his collections—New Hampshire (1923), Collected Poems of Robert Frost (1930), A Further Range (1936), and A Witness Tree (1942)—Robert Frost presented to the public an image of himself as a kindly poet-farmer and became the most popular major poet in twentieth-century America. Unlike modernist poets (see MODERNISM), Frost wrote in the tradition and forms of the nineteenth-century English romantic poets, crafting accessible verse that seemed to many readers to evoke an uncomplicated, rural world at odds with modern culture. But Frost was by no means old-fashioned, and, as his posthumously published private letters show, he was no less sophisticated or self-consciously an artist than were contemporaries such as Ezra POUND, T. S. ELIOT, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Wallace STEVENS. As one of the poets who reinvigorated American verse in the wake of WORLD WAR I, Frost responded to the tenor of his time and tragedy in his private life, often writing poems in which he used metaphors drawn from nature to confront modern anxieties and fears. In his 1939 essay "The Figure a Poem Makes," Frost wrote that a poem provides "a momentary stay against confusion."

Although Robert Frost has always been associated with New England, he was born in San Francisco on March 26, 1874, to Easterners who had moved West. His Harvard-educated father, William Prescott Frost Jr., had brought his wife to California, where he planned to make his career in

Robert Frost, 1915

For Stewart from Robert
On the Day January 1961

DEDICATION

~~Summery~~

~~Summery~~ artists to participate

In the august occasions of the state

Seems something for us all to celebrate.

This day is for my cause a day of days,

And his be poetry's old-fashioned praise

Who was the first to think of such a thing.

This tribute verse to be his own I bring

Is about the new order of the ages

That ~~in~~ the Latin of the founding sages

God nodded His approval of as good.

So much those sages knew and understood

( The mighty four of them were Washington, John Adams, Jefferson, and Madison ) -

So much they saw as consecrated seers

They must have seen how in two hundred years

Revised typescript for the poem Robert Frost planned to read at John F. Kennedy's presidential inauguration. Blinded by the sun, he instead recited a poem he had written earlier. This copy was inscribed to Stewart Udall, whom Kennedy appointed secretary of the interior.

Dust jacket for Frost's last book journalism and politics, but he succumbed to tuberculosis in 1885. Frost's mother, Isabelle, then returned to the East to become a schoolteacher in New Hampshire and Massachusetts.

Frost graduated from Lawrence High School in Massachusetts as class poet and coaledictorian with his future wife, Elinor Miriam White, who went on to earn a college degree—unlike Frost, who dropped out of Dartmouth after his first term and later attended Harvard for eighteen months as a special student. In the last years of the century, Frost wrote poetry without much success as he worked as a mill worker, reporter, and teacher. His marriage to Elinor was filled with tensions, to which was added a great grief when the couple's first child died at three years of age in 1900—one of the events that later inspired "Home Burial," a poem that treats a couple whose affections are alienated by their different ways of grieving for their child.

From 1900 to 1909, the Frosts lived on a farm in Derry, New Hampshire. During these years, as his family grew to include five children, Frost continued to work on his poetry, writing many of the poems that later made his reputation but managing to place only a few of them in American periodicals. Leaving the farm, Frost taught school in Plymouth, New Hampshire, and in 1912, fearing his work would not be recognized in America, he moved his family to England. In an intense three-month period, he assembled A Boy's Will (1913), a volume of verse that traced a boy's maturation, which received mixed reviews. But his next book, North of Boston (1914), which includes such poems as "MENDING WALL," "After Apple-Picking," and "The Wood-Pile" as well as dramatic-dialogue poems such as "THE DEATH OF THE HIRED MAN" and "Home Burial," was a triumph. In letters Frost explained that in his poetry he was consciously seeking to "make music" out of what he called "the sound of sense." Frost was able to combine the vernacular and patterns of New England speech with blank verse, finding a productive tension between the irregularity of speech and the constraints imposed by even a loose iambic pentameter line—an original contribution to prosody.

When the forty-year-old Frost returned to the United States in 1915, North of Boston had established him as a leading poet, and he began to give public readings and accept university appointments, first at Amherst College and later at the University of Michigan, Harvard, and Dartmouth, before settling at Amherst in 1949. His fame grew with the publication of Mountain Interval (1916)—which included "THE ROAD NOT TAKEN," "An Old Man's Winter Night," and "Birches"—and with his subsequent collections. Frost's poems are so frequently anthologized that perhaps no other American poet has made as great a mark on the American consciousness. Whether it is "STOPPING BY WOODS ON A SNOWY EVENING," the poem he called his "best bid for remembrance," "Fire and Ice," "Acquainted with the Night," "Neither Out Far or In Deep," "Provide, Provide," or "Design," Frost's crafted verse transforms colloquial speech into profound commentary on the human condition. The eighty-six-year-old poet recited his poem "The Gift Outright" at the 1961 inauguration of President John F. Kennedy.

Since Frost's death, revelations about his personal life, depicting him as a jealous, selfish, distrustful man who struggled with depression and guilt, have tarnished the persona he so carefully created. But nothing he was as a man detracts from the enduring value of his achievement as a poet.

—George Parker Anderson

Principal Books by Frost

A Boy's Will. London: David Nutt, 1913. New York: Holt, 1915.

North of Boston. New York: Holt, 1914.

Mountain Interval. New York: Holt, 1916.

Selected Poems. New York: Holt, 1923.

New Hampshire. New York: Holt, 1923.

Several Short Poems. New York: Holt, 1924.
Selected Poems. New York: Holt, 1928.
West-Running Brook. New York: Holt, 1928.
A Way Out: A One Act Play. New York: Harbor Press, 1929.
The Lovely Shall Be Choosers. New York: Random House, 1929.
Collected Poems of Robert Frost. New York: Holt, 1930.
The Lone Striker. New York: Knopf, 1933.
Selected Poems: Third Edition. New York: Holt, 1934.
From Snow to Snow. New York: Holt, 1936.
A Further Range. New York: Holt, 1936.
Collected Poems of Robert Frost. New York: Holt, 1939.
A Witness Tree. New York: Holt, 1942.
Come In and Other Poems, edited by Louis Untermeyer. New York: Holt, 1943. Enlarged as The Road Not Taken. New York: Holt, 1951.
A Masque of Reason. New York: Holt, 1945.
The Pocket Book of Robert Frost's Poems, edited by Untermeyer. New York: Pocket Books, 1946.
The Poems of Robert Frost. New York: Modern Library, 1946.
Steeple Bush. New York: Holt, 1947.
A Masque of Mercy. New York: Holt, 1947.
A Sermon. New York: Spiral Press, 1947.
Complete Poems of Robert Frost, 1949. New York: Holt, 1949.
Hard Not To Be King. New York: House of Books, 1951.
Aforesaid. New York: Holt, 1954.
A Remembrance Collection of New Poems. New York: Holt, 1959.
You Come Too. New York: Holt, 1959.
Dedication/The Gift Outright/The Inaugural Address. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1961.
In the Clearing. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1962.
Selected Poems of Robert Frost. New York, Chicago, San Francisco & Toronto: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1963.
Robert Frost: Farm-Poultryman, edited by Edward Connery Lathem and Lawrance Thompson. Hanover, N.H.: Dartmouth Publications, 1963.
Selected Letters of Robert Frost, edited by Thompson. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1964.
Selected Prose of Robert Frost, edited by Hyde Cox and Lathem. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966.
The Poetry of Robert Frost, edited by Lathem. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1969.
Robert Frost on Writing, edited by Elaine Barry. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1972.
Robert Frost: Poetry and Prose, edited by Lathem and Thompson. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1972.

Studying Robert Frost

Robert Frost's creative longevity, great popularity, and critical acclaim have made him one of the most written about poets in America. But students should begin with the works themselves. The Poetry of Robert Frost, edited by Edward Connery Lathem (1969), should be supplemented with Robert Frost: Poetry and Prose, edited by Lathem and Lawrance Thompson (1972), and Selected Prose of Robert Frost, edited by Hugh Cox and Lathem (1966). A convenient one-volume collection is Robert Frost: Collected Poems, Prose, and Plays, edited by Richard Poirier and Mark Richardson (New York: Library of America, 1995).

To get a sense of the man himself, students should read Selected Letters of Robert Frost, edited by Thompson (1964), along with Interviews with Robert Frost, edited by Lathem (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966), and Raymond L. Cook's Robert Frost: A Living Voice (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1974), which includes transcripts of twelve talks Frost gave at the Bread Loaf School of English, Middlebury College, during the last decade of his life. Recommended recordings are Robert Frost Reads His Poetry (New York: Caedmon Records, TC1060, 1957) and Robert Frost Reads from his Works: Yale Series of Recorded Poets (New York: Decca Records, DL 9127, 1966). Robert Frost: A Poet's Quarrel with the World (1963) is an Academy Award-winning black-and-white documentary.

Biographical studies of Robert Frost are numerous and divergent. Early positive portraits include Sidney Cox's A Swinger of Birches: A Portrait of Robert Frost (New York: New York University Press, 1957) and Elizabeth Shepley Sergeant's Robert Frost: The Trial by Existence (New York: Holt, Rinehart, & Winston, 1960). John Evangelist Walsh's Into My Own: The English Years of Robert Frost, 1912–1915 (New York: Grove, 1988) is a detailed study of Frost's life during a critical period. The official biographer of Frost, Lawrance Thompson, unmasked the dark side of the poet, showing him to be a manipulator, gossip, and abuser, and thereby changed the way the poet was perceived. His three-volume biography of Frost began in 1966 with Robert Frost: The Early Years, 1874–1915, was followed in 1970 by Robert Frost: The Years of Triumph, 1915–1938, and in 1976 by the final volume, written with R. H. Winnick, Robert Frost: The Later Years, 1935–1963. All three were published by Holt Rinehart, and Winston; a one-volume version, Robert Frost: A Biography, was published in 1982. Subsequent biographers of Frost have attempted to correct—some would say whitewash—Thompson's presentation and have provided new perspectives on Frost's place in American letters. More-recent biographies include Stanley Burnshaw's Robert Frost Himself (New York: G. Braziller, 1986), William H. Pritchard's Frost: A Literary Life Reconsidered (second edition, Amherst, Mass.: University of Massachusetts Press, 1993), Jeffrey Meyers's Robert Frost: A Biography (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1996), and Jay Parini's Robert Frost: A Life (New York: Holt, 1999). Parini's biography has a useful supplement, "Afterword: Robert Frost and His Biographers."

The large number of critical studies of Frost and collections of essays on his life and works are daunting. A good general study is Philip L. Gerber's Robert Frost (revised edition, Boston: Twayne, 1982), which includes a helpful overview, "Testing Greatness: Frost's Critical Reception." Important essays on Frost are included in Robert Frost: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by James M. Cox (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1962); the three volumes of Frost: Centennial Essays, edited by Jac L. Tharpes (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1974, 1976, 1978); Robert Frost: The Critical Reception, edited by Linda Wagner (New York: Burt Franklin, 1977); and Robert Frost: Studies of the Poetry, edited by Kathryn Gibbs Harris (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979). Since 1991 The Robert Frost Society has published an annual Robert Frost Review that provides readers with a sense of the trends in Frost scholarship.

Useful guides for serious research on Frost are Robert Frost: A Bibliography, 1913–1974, a primary bibliography compiled by Frank Lentricchia and Melissa Christensen Lentricchia (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1976), and Peter Van Egmond's Robert Frost: A Reference Guide, 1974–1990 (Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1991), which can be supplemented with the Modern Language Association's annual bibliography. Students might also wish to consult Robert Frost Encyclopedia, edited by Nancy Lewis Tuten and John Zubizarreta (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001), Cambridge Companion to Robert Frost, edited by Robert Faggen (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001), and Critical Companion to Robert Frost: A Literary Reference for His Life and Work, edited by Deirdre Fagan (New York: Facts on File, 2007). Collections of Frost's papers are at the University of Virginia, Amherst College, Dartmouth College, and the Huntington Library in San Marino, California.

—Gary L. Kerley

Fuchs, Daniel (1909–1993) novelist, screenwriter, short-story writer

Daniel Fuchs wrote three respected novels about poor Jews in Brooklyn during the Depression: Summer in Williamsburg (1934), Homage to Blenheim (1936), and Low Company (1937). They are proletarian fiction—social realism—but not political protest works. The novels were overlooked by critics and sold poorly. Fuchs went to Hollywood and did not publish another novel until West of the Rockies (1971). His screenplays included Criss Cross, Panic in the Streets, and Love Me or Leave Me—for which he won an Academy Award. Fuchs's fiction was rediscovered in the 1960s.

Sources

Fuchs, Daniel. "Introduction," in Homage to Blenheim. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1990.

Miller, Gabriel. Daniel Fuchs. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

—Morris Colden

The Fugitives

The poets and critics known as the Fugitives evolved from an informal discussion group that brought together people from Nashville and from Vanderbilt University. The original discussants were most interested in philosophy, but in the 1920s the interests of the participants turned primarily to poetry as members brought their poems for close reading, analysis, and discussion. The coterie attracted national attention when they published The Fugitive (1922–1925), a magazine of poetry and criticism that Robert Penn WARREN later described as "a manifestation of modernism, or rather a battleground for debating modernism and traditionalism." The sixteen Fugitives who contributed to the magazine included John Crowe RANSOM, Donald DAVIDSON, Merrill MOORE, Allen TATE, Warren and Laura RIDING. As their name implies, the Fugitives thought of themselves as outside the literary mainstream. In a whimsical foreword to the first issue of The Fugitive, the group described itself as fleeing "from nothing faster than from the high-caste Brahmins of the Old South," who they held responsible for what was "known rather euphemistically as Southern Literature." Some of the Fugitives later became AGRARIANS, a group that published their political and social views in I'LL TAKE MY STAND (1930).

Sources

Bradbury, John M. The Fugitives: A Critical Account. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1958.

Cowan, Louise. The Fugitive Group: A Literary History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana

State University Press, 1959.

Davidson, Donald, and others. The Fugitives: An Anthology of Verse. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1928.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

Fahrenheit 451 by Ray Bradbury (New York: Ballantine, 1953) novel

Ray BRADBURY's most popular work, Fahrenheit 451 (referring to the temperature at which paper burns), is a dystopian science-fiction novel that imagines a world in which firemen do not put out fires: they burn books. Written in nine days and originally titled The Fireman, the novel critiques current-day events through a projection of the future, inspiring comparisons to George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949). In Bradbury's antiutopia the government bans books, determined to keep the masses sedated on trivia and popular entertainment. The novel's hero is a book-burning fireman named Guy Montag, who has begun to question his work.

Although many contemporary readers saw Bradbury's allegorical fiction as a critique of the paranoia surrounding the Red Scare led by Senator Joseph McCarthy, the two forces that compel book burning in the novel are more likely mass entertainment—television and radio—and the assumption that books have the potential to offend and confuse people. In a central scene, Montag's supervisor, Beatty, reads a list of decontextualized quotations from great books, all of which seem to contradict one another: what use, Beatty asks, is all of this contradiction? Fahrenheit 451 has been adapted for the stage and produced as a motion picture, directed in 1967 by the French director François Truffaut.

Source

Touponce, William F. Ray Bradbury and the Poetics of Reverie: Fantasy, Science Fiction, and the Reader. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Research Press, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Faust, Irvin (1924– ) novelist

A New Yorker, Irvin Faust saw action in Europe and the Philippines during World War II. After the war he attended CCNY and then earned an M.A. and an Ed.D. from Columbia University. While working most of his life as a guidance director at Garden City High School, Faust published seven novels and two collections of stories. His most successful novel, Willy Remembers (1971), exemplifies Faust's technique of melding social history with fiction; he relies heavily on the emotions associated with songs, athletes, public figures and public events to generate reader responses. Readers are expected to recognize the references in novels that are set in the 1900 Boxer Rebellion (Foreign Devils, 1973) or the Italo-Ethiopian War (Jim Dandy, 1994). Irvin Faust has been unlucky. The critics have denied him his proper place in twentieth-century American fiction, and his books have become unfashionable.

—Morris Colden

Sources

"Irvin Faust on his Novels," American Writing Today, edited by Richard Kostelanetz. Troy, N.Y.: Whitson, 1991, pp. 212–218.

"Irvin Faust," Conversations with Writers II. Detroit: Brucoli Clark / Gale, 1978, pp. 46–72.

Feminist Literary Criticism

Feminist literary criticism examines, interprets, and seeks to redress the marginalization of women through a critical response to literature, within the larger context of a male-dominated literary establishment. Feminist literary criticism also challenges, and aims to correct, broader assumptions and prejudices about female behavior, both within and without the realm of literature. Though this brand of criticism can trace its roots to women's suffragette movements of the late nineteenth century, feminist criticism as an institutional presence within college humanities programs did not truly assert itself until the 1960s.

One of the most influential works of feminist thought published after the war, and a lasting touchstone for many contemporary feminist critics, is French writer Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex (1949). In this work, Beauvoir reexamines not only women's role within Western culture but also the way major male literary figures have depicted female characters within their work. Back in the United States, Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique (1963), while it did not focus on literature per se, nevertheless provided many subsequent feminist critics with a model for detecting the ways in which an antifemale bias is sustained and enforced in a wide range of cultural artifacts. These two books influenced a great many American feminist critics who emerged in the late 1960s, particularly Kate Millet, who in Sexual Politics (1969) traced what she saw as the tacit misogyny evident in the work of male writers including Norman MAILER and Henry Miller; and Mary Ellman, whose Thinking About Women (1968) disclosed how such writers as Jane Austen and Mary McCARTHY, among others, shaped assumptions about female identity. Two major works from the late 1970s solidified this first wave of U.S. feminist criticism: Elaine Showalter's A Literature of their Own (1977), which typified what she called "gynocriticism," that is, criticism focusing exclusively on female experience, and Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar's The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the 19th Century (1979), which analyzed the motif mentioned in the title as one of the key expressions of female dissatisfaction in nineteenth-century literature.

By the early 1980s, women's studies programs had become the norm on U.S. college campuses, and with this new visibility came a shift in feminist scholarship. Drawing inspiration from the so-called French feminism of writers such as Hélène Cixous and Julia Kristeva, these new U.S. critics began to change their focus from a study of female roles to an exploration of feminine discourse, examining the role of gender in writing itself. During the 1990s, the scope of feminist criticism expanded to incorporate techniques drawn from psychoanalysis, race theory, and Marxist criticism. More than fifty years after Simone de Beauvoir's landmark work, the basic principles of feminist thought have been clearly established. The work of redefining the literary tradition, recommending responses to it, and attempting to understand the effect of social and literary gender bias has been energetically pursued.

Sources

Felski, Rita. Literature after Feminism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Flynn, Elizabeth A. Feminism beyond Modernism. Carbondale: University of Southern Illinois Press, 2002.

Gallop, Jane. Around 1981: Academic Feminist Literary Theory. New York: Routledge, 1992.

Warhol, Robyn R., and Diane Price Herndl. Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, revised edition. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1997.

—Marshall Boswell

Ferlinghetti, Lawrence (1920– ) publisher, poet, novelist

One of the founders of the San Francisco BEAT movement, Lawrence Ferlinghetti was born in Yonkers, New York, and brought up by relatives. He graduated from the University of North Carolina with a journalism degree and served in the U.S. Navy during WORLD WAR II. He returned to New York and studied at Columbia University, then in Paris at the Sorbonne, where he completed a dissertation in French, "The City as a Symbol in Modern Poetry." In 1950 Ferlinghetti settled in San Francisco. He consorted with local artists and wrote reviews for the San Francisco Chronicle and the Arts Review. In 1953 he established the City Lights Bookstore and publishing house, which was at the center of the SAN FRANCISCO RENAISSANCE. City Lights became notable for its pocket editions of poetry; Ferlinghetti collected his own poems in Pictures of the Gone World (1955). He also initiated poetry readings. Allen GINSBERG read his acclaimed HOWL (1956) at City Lights, and the poem was subsequently published in the pocket series. Ferlinghetti came into his own as a popular poet with the publication of A Coney Island of the Mind (1958). It remains his best-selling work, and is praised for its unpunctuated free form that seems inspired by jazz. Open Eye, Open Heart (1973) has also received considerable critical praise. He published the City Lights Anthology in 1974.

Sources

Silesky, Barry. Ferlinghetti, the Artist in His Time. New York: Warner, 1990.

Smith, Larry. Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Poet-At-Large. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1983.

Fiedler, Leslie (1917–2003) critic, novelist

Born in Newark, New Jersey, Leslie Fiedler attended New York University, where he received a B.A. in 1938. He continued his education at the University of Wisconsin, where he completed his M.A. in 1939 and his Ph.D. in 1941. He taught at several universities, including Montana State and the State University of New York at Buffalo. Fiedler's most important work is his first work in a trilogy that critically examines American literature, Love and Death in the American Novel (1960). Along with Waiting for the End (1964), a collection of essays about American culture and society, Fiedler has written with a flair and iconoclasm rare among intellectuals in academia. He has challenged, for example, the idea of the literary canon and its exclusion of popular culture in What Was Literature: Class Culture and Mass Society (1982). His Collected Essays appeared in 1971; Fiedler on the Roof: Essays on Literature and Jewish Identity, in 1991; and A New Fiedler Reader, in 1999. His work as a short-story writer and novelist is less well known.

Sources

Kellman, Steven G., and Irving Malin, eds. Leslie Fiedler and American Culture. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1999.

Winchell, Mark Royden. Leslie Fiedler. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Fierstein, Harvey (1954– ) playwright

A Brooklyn native, Harvey Fierstein went to Brooklyn public schools and received a B.F.A. degree in art from Pratt Institute in 1973. In the early 1970s he began a career as a drag performer in New York City clubs and played a lesbian in Andy Warhol's only play, Pork (1971). Fierstein wrote a series of unpublished plays (Freaky Pussy [produced 1974], Flatbush Tosca [produced 1975], and Cannibals Just Don't Know Better [produced 1978]). As an actor he appeared in the films Garbo Talks, The Harvest, and Mrs. Doubtfire as well as in television shows. But he is best known for the Tony Award–winning Torch Song Trilogy (produced 1981), which concerns the life of Arnold Beckoff, a professional female impersonator, and Safe Sex (produced 1987), a trilogy of one-act plays. He wrote the book for the Broadway musical La Cage aux Folles; although the book was not published until 1987, the 1983 production won Fierstein a Tony Award for distinguished achievement in theater. Fierstein writes candidly and eloquently about gay life and has managed a career in and out of the mainstream. The Sissy Duckling (2002) is an illustrated children's book.

Flanagan, Thomas (1923–2002) novelist, educator

Born in Connecticut, Thomas Flanagan received his B.A. from Amherst (1945) and his M.A. (1949) and Ph.D. (1958) from Columbia University. He taught at the University of California, Berkeley, and at the State University of New York at Stony Brook as a specialist in Irish literature. His first historical novel, The Year of the French (1979), won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and was highly praised for both its style and its understanding of history. The novel is set in 1798, the year of a failed Irish rebellion. The Tenants of Time (1988) begins with the Fenian movement in Ireland in 1867 and ends with the death of the great Irish politician Charles Stewart Parnell in 1891. The End of the Hunt (1994) continues the story of modern Ireland's history to the Easter Rising of 1916 and its aftermath in the 1920s.

Fool for Love by Sam Shepard (produced 1983) play

Fool for Love is one of the major plays of Sam SHEPARD's mature style. While retaining some of the expressionistic qualities of his early work, the play is a work of psychological realism that looks back to the theater of Eugene O'Neill and Tennessee Williams. The entire play—which Shepard's stage directions indicate should “be performed relentlessly without a break”—takes place in a squalid motel room. The principal characters are May, a dissatisfied short-order cook, and her wayward lover—and half brother—Eddie, a cowboy stuntman who has just returned to May after an affair with an elusive countess, who waits offstage in a Mercedes Benz. As the couple fights, a figure called the Old Man watches from the side of the stage, interacting with the actors from a different, but somehow connected, plane of reality. Later, May's lover, a gentle custodian named Martin, shows up at the hotel, late for his date, while the countess shoots up, then sets fire to, Eddie's car. As the play proceeds, it is revealed that both Eddie and May, who cannot let each other go despite their sharp differences, are linked by the loss of their shared father, represented here by the mysterious Old Man. The play uses conventional figures from pop culture—the big-hearted waitress, the swaggering cowboy, both of them star-crossed lovers—to create a unique blend of surreal Postmodern theater and dramatic realism.

Sources

DeRose, David J. Sam Shepard. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Shepard, Sam. Fool for Love. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1983.

—Marshall Boswell

Foote, Shelby (1916–2005) novelist, historian

The novelist and the historian are seeking the same thing: the truth—not a different truth, the same truth—only they reach it, or try to reach it, by different routes. . . . I have combined the two. Accepting the historian's standard without his paraphernalia, I have employed the novelist's methods without his license.

—Mississippi Quarterly (1964)

Shelby Foote was born in Mississippi and educated at the University of North Carolina. After WORLD WAR II he began to write novels heavily influenced by William Faulkner. His most notable work is generally considered to be his three-volume history of the Civil War, The Civil War: A Narrative (1958–1974), which brings to history all the skills of a novelist. The trilogy scrupulously re-creates history and uses language at a level of eloquence rarely attained by professional historians. Foote is one of few twentieth-century American writers to treat the writing of history as literature. His early novels also describe the details and effects of the Civil War, including Follow Me Down (1950) and Shiloh (1952). Foote researched the Civil War for twenty years before returning to fiction, producing the novel September (1977), the story of whites who kidnap an African American boy. In 1981 Foote published The Novelist's View of History. Foote achieved popular recognition as the chief commentator for Ken Burns's PBS documentary The Civil War (1990).

Sources

Foote, Shelby. Conversations with Shelby Foote, edited by William C. Carter. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989.
Panabaker, James. Shelby Foote and the Art of History: Two Gates to the City. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2004.
Phillips, Robert L., Jr. Shelby Foote: Novelist and Historian. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1992.

Forché, Carolyn (1950– ) poet

Carolyn Forché was born in Detroit, Michigan. She earned her B.A. at Michigan State University in 1972 and her M.F.A. from Bowling Green State University in 1975. Her poetry collections are Gathering the Tribe (1976), The Country between Us (1981), The Angel of History (1994), and Blue Hour (2003). She won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD in 2003 for the poem "Blue Hour." Forché has also edited an anthology, Against Forgetting (1993), in which she collected poetry written from various "contexts of extremity" of the previous hundred years. Further, she has translated the Spanish poetry of Claribel Alegria, the French poetry of Robert Desnos, and the Arabic work of Mahmoud Darwish.

Source

Smith, Leonora. "Carolyn Forché: Poet of Witness," in Still the Frame Holds: Essays on Women Poets and Writers, edited by Shelia Richards and Yvonne Pacheco Tevis. San Bernardino: Borgo, 1993, pp. 15–28.

—Tod Marshall

Ford, Richard (1944– ) novelist, short-story writer

... what I am a proponent of is forgetting. Forgetting dreams, grievances, old flaws in character—mine and others'. To me there is no hope unless we can forget what's said and gone before, and forgive it.

—The Sportswriter (1986)

Richard Ford was born in Jackson, Mississippi, home of Eudora Welty, who placed him in charge of her literary estate just before her death. His father was a traveling salesman; as a result, Ford spent much of his youth living in Little Rock, Arkansas, at the Marion Hotel, managed by his grandfather. Ford received his B.A. in 1966 from Michigan State University and his M.F.A. in 1970 from the University of California, Irvine. His first novel, A Piece of My Heart (1976), is a Southern novel in the grim and violent tradition of William Faulkner and Erskine Caldwell. Partly in response to the poor critical reception of his next book, The Ultimate Good Luck (1981), Ford put his literary career on hold to take a job as a writer for Inside Sports. When publication of the magazine ended, Ford returned to fiction with the book that made his career, The Sportswriter (1986), whose title character is wry, intelligent Frank Bascombe, a once-promising literary novelist who now works as a sportswriter while coming to terms with his new single life after his amiable divorce from someone he refers to only as X. The book was favorably compared to John UPDIKE's Rabbit novels (see RABBIT ANGSTROM) and to Walker PERCY's THE MOVIEGOER (1961), and was a finalist for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD.

Ford followed up The Sportswriter with a short-story collection of violent tales set in the modern American West, Rock Springs (1987), written in the grim, minimalist style (see MINIMALISM) of Raymond CARVER and Tobias Wolff. Wild Life (1990) is a novel about adultery and firefighting set in the mountains of Montana. Independence Day (1995), his most successful novel, is a sequel to The Sportswriter, picking up Frank Bascombe's story ten years later. Now a realtor living and working in New Jersey, Bascombe spends this second installment on a Fourth of July road trip with his teenage son. The novel became the first book ever to win both the Pulitzer Prize and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD.

After the triumph of Independence Day, Ford concentrated on shorter works, first with a trio of novellas, Women with Men: Three Stories (1997), and later with a more traditional collection of tales focused on contemporary relationships, A Multitude of Sins: Stories (2001). The third installment of the Frank Bascombe saga, The Lay of the Land, appeared in 2006.

Sources

Guagliardo, Huey, ed. Perspectives on Richard Ford. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.
Walker, Elinor Ann. Richard Ford. New York: Twayne, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

Fox, Paula (1923– ) novelist, children's writer, memoirist

Paula Fox has earned acclaim for both her children's books and her adult novels. The daughter of writers, she was born in New York and lived for three years in Cuba with her grandmother. She attended Columbia University from 1955 to 1958. Her first book for children, Maurice's Room, was published in 1966, followed quickly by Poor George (1967), a novel for adults. Her most important and successful adult novel is a slim, emotionally taut novel about a crumbling marriage, Desperate Characters (1970), set amid the intellectual class in late 1960s New York. As a children's author, Fox has received many awards, including the Newbery Medal for The Slave Dancer (1973), the Christopher Award and the Newbery Honor Book Award for One-Eyed Cat (1984), and the Newbery Honor Book Award for The Village by the Sea (1989). In 2001 she published the first volume of her memoirs, Borrowed Finery, which was followed in 2005 by The Coldest Winter: A Stringer in Liberated Europe.

Source

Townshend, John Rowe. A Sense of Story: Essays on Contemporary Writers for Children. New York: Lippincott, 1971; revised as A Sounding of Storytellers, 1979.

—Marshall Boswell

Frank, Pat (1907–1964) novelist, journalist

Pat Frank was born Harry Hart Frank in Chicago in 1907. He attended the University of Florida in 1925–1926. Frank worked as a journalist throughout Florida before serving in the Office of War Information during WORLD WAR II, after which he moved to Washington, D.C., to launch a career as a novelist. Under the pseudonym Pat Frank, he published his first novel, Mr. Adam, in 1946. Frank's other books include Hold Back the Night (1952) and Forbidden Area (1956). Frank is best known for his Alas Babylon (1959), a tale about a group of people in Florida trying to survive the aftermath of a Soviet-led nuclear attack.

—Marshall Boswell

Franzen, Jonathan (1959– ) novelist, essayist

At the heart of my despair about the novel had been a conflict between my feeling that I should Address the Culture and Bring News to the Mainstream, and my desire to write about the things closest to me, to lose myself in the characters and locales I loved. . . . As soon as I jettisoned my perceived obligation to the chimerical mainstream, my third book began to move again.

—“Perchance to Dream” (1996)

Jonathan Franzen is the author of the best-selling novel of 2001, THE CORRECTIONS, winner of the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. He was born in Chicago and grew up in Webster Groves, Missouri, an affluent suburb of St. Louis. He attended Swarthmore College, where he received his B.A. degree in 1981; he spent a year at Free University in West Berlin on a Fulbright fellowship.

His first novel, The Twenty-Seventh City (1988), was published when he was twenty-eight. A story of city politics and race in St. Louis (the twenty-seventh largest city in the United States), the novel received positive reviews and earned Franzen a Whiting Writers' Award. His next novel, Strong Motion (1992), is about a pair of lovers investigating strange seismic activity in Massachusetts, which they think might be tied to the activities of a major chemical company in the area.

When this novel, too, was greeted with favorable reviews but modest sales, Franzen fell into a period of depression and doubt about his career, recounted in his essay “Perchance to Dream,” which appeared in Harper's in 1996. In the essay Franzen called for serious literary writers of his generation to try to reconnect with a wide-ranging readership. His prescription was for authors to write what was closest to their hearts in the hope that readers would connect again with fiction that shared their own confusion and anguish. He accomplished this goal with his third novel, The Corrections, a novel about a modern family dissolving in depression, self-deception, and drug addiction. The book reprised Franzen's longtime interest in the perils of big business and the New Economy, not to mention in the general commodification of contemporary life, and yet these weighty concerns were presented in the context of an emotionally resonant, and at times hilariously funny, family drama. Franzen was criticized when he asked that his book, which won the National Book Award, be withdrawn as a selection by the Oprah Winfrey Book Club.

He followed The Corrections with How to Be Alone (2002), a collection of his essays for The New Yorker and Harper's. His most recent book is a humorous, self-effacing memoir of growing up in the 1970s, The Discomfort Zone: A Personal History (2006).

Sources

Annesley, James. “Market Corrections: Jonathan Franzen and the ‘Novel of Globalization,’” Journal of Modern Literature, 29, no. 2 (2006): 111–128.

Green, Jeremy. “Jonathan Franzen, Oprah Winfrey, and the Future of the Social Novel,” in Late Postmodernism: American Fiction at the Millennium. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.

—Marshall Boswell

Frazier, Charles (1950– ) novelist, travel writer

At another time the scene might have had about it a note of the jaunty. All the elements . . . suggested the legendary freedom of the open road: the dawn of day, sunlight golden and at a low angle. . . . But after such wet and miserable nights . . . Inman felt like God's most marauded bantling.

—Cold Mountain (1997)

Charles Frazier was born in Asheville, North Carolina, home of legendary Southern writer Thomas Wolfe. Frazier earned both his B.A. and his Ph.D. from the University of South Carolina (in 1973 and 1976 respectively) and taught American literature at the University of Colorado and at the University of North Carolina. In 1985 he published a Sierra Club Travel Guide to Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, the Amazon Basin, and the Galapagos titled Adventuring in the Andes, which he co-authored with Donald Seacrest. The real-life Civil War experiences of his great-great-uncle, W. P. Inman, served as the basis for his first novel, Cold Mountain (1997), which became one of the biggest-selling novels in the history of Atlantic Books and won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. The product of seven years of research and rewriting, Cold Mountain is the story of Inman's three-hundred-mile journey home after the Civil War to be with the woman he loves; it is also a gripping tale of female survival and solidarity as well as a hymn to the stark, unforgiving beauty of the southern Appalachians. The terse lyricism and harsh violence of the book recall the work of William Faulkner, Ernest Hemingway, and, most directly, Cormac McCARTHY. Thirteen Moons (2006), another historical novel, is about a man's memories of running a trading post on the edge of the Cherokee Nation in the early nineteenth century.

Sources

Gifford, Terry. "Terrain, Character and Text: Is Cold Mountain by Charles Frazier a Post-Pastoral Novel?" Mississippi Quarterly, 55 (Winter 2001–2002): 87–96.

Piacentino, Ed. "Searching for Home: Cross-Racial Bonding in Charles Frazier's Cold Mountain," Mississippi Quarterly, 55 (Winter 2001–2002): 97–116.

—Marshall Boswell

French, Marilyn (1929– ) novelist, nonfiction writer

Born in New York City, Marilyn French was educated at Hofstra University (B.A. 1951) and later at Harvard, where she earned an M.A. (1964) and a Ph.D. (1972). She is a feminist author who studies the treatment of women throughout history. Her most influential work is The Women's Room (1977), a novel about the growth of a woman pursuing graduate studies at Harvard in the 1960s. French's other works include Beyond Power: On Woman, Men, and Morals (1985); a generational saga of mothers and daughters, Her Mother's Daughter (1987); and From Eve to Dawn: A History of Women (2002). A Season in Hell: A Memoir (1998) is a bitter account of her four-year experience with esophageal cancer.

Source

Pearlman, Mickey, ed. Mother Puzzles: Daughters and Mothers in Contemporary American Literature. New York: Greenwood Press, 1989.

—Marshall Boswell

Friedman, Bruce Jay (1930– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Born in New York, Friedman most often writes about the neurotic Jewish male. Stern (1962), his first novel, signaled his penchant for black humor. A Mother's Kisses (1964) satirizes the Jewish mother by dramatizing her negative influence on a neurotic son. About Harry Towns (1974), one of Friedman's best-known works, is a collection of connected stories about a middle-aged screenwriter. Friedman's later fiction includes The Slightly Older Guy (1995) and A Father's Kisses (1996).

Friedman has also produced popular plays, including Scuba Duba (produced 1967) and Steambath (produced 1971). His stories are collected in Far from the City of Class (1963), Black Angels (1966), Let's Hear It for a Beautiful Guy (1984), and The Collected Short Fiction of Bruce Jay Friedman (1995). He tends to see contemporary life as ridiculous and comic. He has also published The Lonely Guy's Book of Life (1978), a parody of self-help manuals. Even the Rhinos Were Nymphos: Best Nonfiction appeared in 2000.

Source

Schulz, Max F. Bruce Jay Friedman. New York: Twayne, 1974.

From Here to Eternity by James Jones (New York: Scribners, 1951) novel

James JONES's classic war novel about the U.S. Army just before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor is set in Hawaii and is dominated by three characters. First Sergeant Milton Anthony Warden is tough, but he commands his company's respect. Warden seduces Karen, the wife of Captain Holmes, an incompetent officer. Warden begins the affair only with pleasure and vengeance in mind—he hates officers—but he falls in love. Because he wants to marry Karen, he agrees to her plan that he apply for an officer's commission, which will protect him and allow Karen to retain custody of her son should the affair be discovered.

Angelo Maggio, a young soldier from Brooklyn, has joined the army only to escape his job as a shipping clerk. Even though he is a complainer, he has a cheerful personality and the men like him, especially Robert Prewitt, Maggio's drinking buddy. When Maggio misses curfew and refuses to sneak back to base, he is sentenced to six months of hard labor. Maggio is now so desperate to get out of the army that he conceives of committing an offense that will put him in solitary confinement and lead to his discharge from the army for insanity. Put in the so-called hole for twenty-four days, Maggio survives beatings and interrogations and is discharged from the army.

Prewitt, Maggio's friend, comes from Harlan County, Kentucky, and has joined the army after several years on the road. At age thirty he is still a private, but the army means everything to him. A capable boxer, "Prew" nevertheless refuses to join the company boxing team, after blinding a friend in the ring. Prew is given "the treatment"—harsh physical punishment, heavy surveillance, and hard labor—for his obstinacy. On furloughs in Honolulu he finds solace with a prostitute, Lorene, with whom he falls in love. Prewitt's friend Sergeant Judson kills Berry, and Prewitt kills Judson in a knife fight that leaves him badly cut. He deserts but feels guilty because he cannot join the action after the attack on Pearl Harbor. When a patrol spots him trying to return to his company, he keeps on running and is shot to death.

This novel provided an inside view of the army with an authenticity that surpassed other successful war novels such as Norman MAILER's THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1948) and Irwin SHAW's The Young Lions (1948). Jones's vivid, fluent writing established his reputation as a major American writer.

Sources

Garrett, George. James Jones. San Diego: Brucoli Clark / Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984.

Giles, James R. James Jones. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Waldmeir, Joseph J. American Novels of the Second World War. The Hague: Mouton, 1969.

Fuller, Charles (1939– ) playwright

Charles Fuller grew up in Philadelphia and attended Villanova University and La Salle College. His first play, The Village: A Party, later retitled The Perfect Party, was produced in 1968. He devoted his career to plays about blacks in a racist society. His Zooman and the Sign (produced 1980), about a family faced with the murder of their young daughter, won two Obie Awards. He is best known for A Soldier's Play (produced 1981) which was made into the motion picture A Soldier's Story and is only the second play by an African American playwright to win a Pulitzer Prize. In this work, Fuller presents the trial of a black soldier accused of murder.

Source

Anadolu-Okur, Nilgun. Contemporary African American Theater: Afrocentricity in the Works of Larry Neal, Amiri Baraka, and Charles Fuller. New York: Garland, 1997.

Galloway, Joseph (circa 1731–1803) statesman

Joseph Galloway, a well-known LOYALIST, was born in West River, Maryland, into a wealthy mercantile family known for its large estates, particularly in Pennsylvania. He moved to Philadelphia as a young man and took up the practice of law. In October 1753 he married Grace Growden, uniting his fortunes with the wealth of one of the richest and most important families in Pennsylvania. In 1756, while still in his twenties, Galloway won election to the colonial assembly, returning to office until 1776 with only one interruption. From 1766 to 1775 he served as Speaker of the Assembly.

Galloway wrote about the relationship between Great Britain and her North American colonies. His A Candid Examination of the Mutual Claims of Great-Britain and the Colonies (1775) is a classic statement of the Loyalist position on the imperial-colonial relationship. In it, Galloway asserts Parliament's right to govern the colonies but denies the wisdom of taxation. Realizing that American representation in Parliament was not practical and thus was not a solution to the problem of "no taxation without representation," in 1774, as a delegate to the Continental Congress, Galloway proposed the creation of an American legislature to share power with Parliament over colonial affairs. This Plan of Union required a written constitution that would clearly establish the powers of and limitations upon both governments. The Congress narrowly defeated his compromise plan, and Galloway fell from favor with his American colleagues.

In Galloway's A Candid Examination he defended both his compromise plan and his own behavior during the deepening political crisis. Now considered solidly in the Loyalist camp, Galloway refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the Second Continental Congress; Galloway insisted that there was no legitimate American government, and thus each colony must negotiate its own settlement with Great Britain. As a result, he was forced to flee his home in Philadelphia for the safety of his country estate. When the British occupied Philadelphia in 1776, however, Galloway returned to the city to serve as a magistrate of police and superintendent of the port. By 1778 the American army had reclaimed Philadelphia, and Galloway sailed to England. Hoping to preserve his estate, he left his wife behind to occupy their townhouse. The strategy failed, and the couple was never reunited.

In England, Galloway quickly emerged as one of the chief advocates for the Loyalists in exile. He testified before Parliament in 1779, expressing the frustration of the Loyalists and voicing their conviction that the war could have been easily won had General William Howe and Admiral Richard Howe provided solid military leadership. Galloway also continued to make his case for a written constitution that established limits on Parliamentary supremacy in his Historical and Political Reflections on the Rise and Progress of the American Rebellion, written in exile in 1780. The surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown made his argument moot.

Despite his loyalty to the Crown and his opposition to independence, Galloway's identity as an American remained strong. In 1793 he petitioned the Pennsylvania government for permission to return home, but his request was denied. Joseph Galloway died on August 29, 1803, after twenty-five years in exile.

Works

Galloway. A Candid Examination of the Mutual Claims of Great-Britain, and the Colonies: With a Plan of Accommodation, on Constitutional Principles. New York: J. Rivington, 1775; Early American Imprints, 14059.

Galloway, Joseph. Historical and Political Reflections on the Rise and Progress of the American Rebellion. . . . London: Printed for G. Wilkie, 1780; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1986.

Sources

Ferling, John E. The Loyalist Mind: Joseph Galloway and the American Revolution. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1977.

Newcomb, Benjamin H. Franklin and Galloway: A Political Partnership. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1972.

The Generall Historie of Virginia by John Smith (London: I. D. & I. H., 1624) history

The Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles is a five-volume account of the colonization of Virginia from the first attempts to establish a colony at ROANOKE in 1585 to the later founding of JAMESTOWN in 1607. In the opening chapters Smith criticizes the initial leaders for poor management and the colonizers for having a weak work ethic. He describes the period of his own leadership of Jamestown, from September 1608 to August 1609, as one of stabilized living and economic conditions. Throughout The Generall Historie, Smith refers to himself in the third person, as Captain John Smith. Perhaps one of the best-known sections appears in book 3, chapter 2, when Smith describes his capture by Chief Powhatan and his rescue by Powhatan's daughter, Pocahontas:

. . . having feasted him after their best barbarous manner they could, a long consultation was held, but the conclusion was, two great stones were brought before Powhatan: then as many as could layd hands on him, dragged him to them, and thereon laid his head, and being ready with their clubs, to beate out his braines, Pocahontas the Kings dearest daughter, when no intreaty could prevaile, got his head in her armes, and laid her owne upon his to save him from death: whereat the Emperour was contented he should live to make him hatchets and her bells, beads, and copper; for they thought him as well of all occupations as themselves.

John Smith's The Generall Historie serves as an historical narrative, a personal account, and as one of the first examples of creative nonfiction.

Sources

Lemay, J.A. Leo. Did Pocahontas Save Captain John Smith? Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992.

Schmidt, Susan. Landfall along the Chesapeake: In the Wake of Captain John Smith. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.

Gill, John (1732–1785) printer

Born May 17, 1732 in Charlestown, Massachusetts, John Gill was apprenticed at an early age to a Boston printer, Samuel Kneeland, whose daughter he married in 1756. Gill's career in publishing took its most positive turn when he established a partnership with Benjamin EDES. In 1755 Gill and Edes published the BOSTON GAZETTE, or, Country Journal. Their printing business flourished; along with newspapers, Edes and Gill published PAMPHLETS and American editions of English books.

Beginning with the protests against the STAMP ACT in 1765, the Gazette became a major organ for anti-British articles and editorials, and Gill and Edes became important printers of patriotic literature. As a result, the offices of Gill and Edes also evolved into one of the key locations for meetings of the PATRIOT leadership, allegedly serving as a meeting place for participants in the Boston Tea Party (1773).

Unlike his partner, who was active in the rebellion, Gill remained aloof from active participation. During the British occupation of the city in 1775, Edes fled Boston for Watertown. Edes continued to publish the Gazette from Watertown, but the partnership was effectively dissolved. Gill remained in Boston and was arrested for sedition.

Following the British evacuation in 1776, Gill began his own newspaper, the Continental Journal and Weekly Advertiser. In contrast to the Gazette, the Continental Journal reflected a conservative perspective, adopting many of the positions advocated by the nationalists. After supporting James Bowdoin (1726–1790) for governor in 1785, Gill became the official printer for Massachusetts. He was relatively successful, but he quit the publishing business in 1785 in protest of a state tax that was attempting to control the news through taxation. He found the legislation reminiscent of the British Stamp Act. Gill died in 1785, leaving his family in serious debt.

Work

The Boston Gazette, or, Country Journal. Boston: B. Edes & J. Gill, 1755–1793; New Canaan, Conn.: Readex Microprint, n.d.

Source

Copeland, David A. Colonial American Newspapers: Character and Content. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1997.

Goddard Family (Sarah Updike Goddard [circa 1700–1770], Mary Katherine Goddard [1738–1816], William Goddard [1740–1817]) printers

The Goddard newspaper dynasty began with Sarah Updike Goddard, born in Rhode Island to Lodowick and Abigail

Newton Updike. The family name, originally Opdyck, was Anglicized by Sarah's father, who amassed a modest fortune as a landowner and holder of public offices. In her youth, Sarah Updike received instruction in both French and Latin from a tutor. She remained single for perhaps thirty-five years, then married Dr. Giles Goddard of Groton, Connecticut, in December 1735. The couple settled in New London, Connecticut, where Giles practiced medicine until his death in 1757.

Sarah's son William carried the family into the newspaper business in 1762, when he established the first printing shop in Providence and produced the first issue of The Providence Gazette and Country Journal. William edited the newspaper, but it was Sarah who financed it. Moving to Providence soon after the paper was launched, she and her daughter Mary Katherine immediately began work in the print shop and became accomplished printers.

The only member of his printing family to learn the trade through apprenticeship, William had trained with James Parker, a highly regarded New Haven printer. Ironically, Parker was the controller of the British postal service, which William set out to destroy during the revolutionary crisis; and it was from Parker, of course, that William acquired his knowledge of the colonial postal system. On his twenty-first birthday, William celebrated the end of his apprenticeship by becoming a journeyman printer in New York City. Armed with this experience, he returned to Providence, Rhode Island, in 1762 to establish the newspaper.

Despite the family's talent and determination, The Providence Gazette failed in 1765. The Goddards could not break the monopoly on the Rhode Island printing business held by Ann FRANKLIN, widow of the brother of Benjamin FRANKLIN. Contributing to his failure, however, was William's tendency to be combative rather than diplomatic; he quarreled aggressively with Franklin and other Newport printers. William's temper also threatened to sabotage his later success in Philadelphia, where he feuded with his partners, the politically and socially well-established Joseph GALLOWAY and Thomas Wharton (1735–1778), and insulted a rival printer in his newspaper. Sarah Goddard urged her son to be more diplomatic.

After the failure of the Gazette, William moved to New York City, leaving Sarah, then a widow in her sixties, to manage the print shop. She produced ALMANACS and PAMPHLETS and in 1766 revived the Gazette. For the next two years Sarah published the weekly newspaper, ran a bookstore, and established a bookbindery, creating a printing business successful enough to be sold at a profit in 1768. Sarah Goddard used her position as the city's second printer to express her commitment to women's rights; she printed the first American edition of the Letters of the Right Honourable Lady M—y W—y M—e (Mary Wortley Montague). She also showed her patriotic leanings, reprinting John DICKINSON's Letters from a Pennsylvania Farmer.

After the sale of her printing and publishing business, Sarah moved to Philadelphia to assist her son William in his new publishing ventures. By this time William was printing the Pennsylvania Chronicle, and once again Sarah provided funds for its operation. The Chronicle was a success, with a circulation of more than 2,500 by 1770. On the whole, Sarah preferred to remain in the background as her son established himself as a local editor and printer, but she did supervise their print shop when he went away on business. Sarah died in January 1770.

Mary Katherine Goddard had also joined William in Philadelphia in the late 1760s. When her brother decided to expand his business, opening a new printing shop in Baltimore in 1773 and publishing that city's first newspaper, the Maryland Journal, and the Baltimore Advertiser, Mary Katherine moved to Maryland to manage both enterprises. This allowed William, an ardent PATRIOT, to undertake the project of establishing an intercolonial postal system in opposition to the British system.

By May 1775 the masthead of the Maryland Journal read "Published by M. K. Goddard." Efficient and widely respected, Mary Katherine not only ran the paper but also served as Baltimore's only printer throughout the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. In January 1777 she published the first copy of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE to include the names of the signers. In 1775 the city named her postmaster of Baltimore, making her probably the first woman to hold such a position.

The success of William's most ambitious printing ventures, in Maryland, depended heavily on Mary Katherine's steady management of the Maryland Journal. She gave the newspaper its identity as a strongly patriotic organ, providing full coverage of the Battle of Bunker Hill (1775) and other pre-Revolutionary and Revolutionary events. When William turned his attention back to the newspaper following the adoption of his postal system by the Continental Congress, he immediately began to involve the paper in controversy. Without Sarah Goddard to act as intermediary and restraining influence, William was soon engaged in a feud with his sister that ended decades of family partnership.

In 1784 William took control of the Maryland Journal, and Mary Katherine countered by publishing an almanac to rival the annual offering the two had traditionally issued together. Mary Katherine's almanacs, both those done in partnership with her brother and those published independently, were profitable and of a high literary caliber. They carried scientific essays, fables, maxims, anecdotes, and her own nature descriptions such as "Some Remarkable Observations & Reflections on that Remarkable Bird the Stork." She created a literary character, the "Allegany Philosopher," who appeared in several of the almanacs. It was generally acknowledged that Mary Katherine was a better printer than her brother, evidenced by the cleaner, neater print of her almanacs and by their more uniform spelling and capitalization.

Mary Katherine abandoned printing when efforts to reconcile with her brother failed. She remained in her postmaster office until 1789, when she was dismissed on the grounds that it was not appropriate for a woman to travel alone. More than two hundred leading Baltimore businessmen endorsed her petition to remain in her job. Unsuccessful in her appeal, Mary Katherine spent the next twenty years managing a bookshop. She died in 1816 at the age of seventy-eight.

Shortly after the break with Mary Katherine, William traveled to Rhode Island, returning to Maryland with a bride, Abigail Angell, and her brother, James Angell, who joined William as a business partner. William later sold his interest in the Maryland Journal and retired to Rhode Island with his wife and five children. There he remained in semiretirement until his death in 1817.

The Goddard family record in publishing and printing remains impressive. They published newspapers in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Maryland; they operated successful printing shops, bookstores, and bookbinderies; they established reputations as high quality printers and made their newspapers outlets for radical views on both politics and women's rights. Sarah and Mary Katherine Goddard broke new ground for women in business, putting their names on the masthead of major newspapers, holding appointive positions for the government ordinarily occupied by men, and demonstrating a talent for entrepreneurial capitalist ventures. With William they formed a modest but influential family empire in the field of publishing.

Works

The Pennsylvania Chronicle and Universal Advertiser. Philadelphia: W. Goddard, 1767–1774; Early American Imprints.

Goddard, William. The Partnership: or, The History of the Rise and Progress of the Pennsylvania Chronicle, &c. Wherein the Conduct of Joseph Galloway, Esq; Speaker of the Honourable House of Representatives of the Province of Pennsylvania, Mr. Thomas Wharton, Sen., and Their Man Benjamin Towne, My Late Partners, with My Own, Is Properly Delineated, and Their Calumnies against Me Fully Refuted. By William Goddard. Philadelphia: Printed by the author, 1770; Early American Imprints, 11669, 11670, 11671.

The Maryland Journal, and the Baltimore Advertiser. Baltimore: William Goddard, 1773–1794; Early American Imprints.

Goddard. The Plan for Establishing a New American Post-Office. Boston, 1774.

Source

Miner, Ward L. William Goddard, Newspaperman. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1962.

Godfrey, Thomas (1736–1763) poet, playwright

Thomas Godfrey's The Prince of Parthia (1767) was the first play to be written and professionally staged by an American. Godfrey's work is crucial to the understanding of early American literature, as it represents the maturation of the American writer, blending European influences with American experience.

Born in Philadelphia, Godfrey was the son of Thomas Godfrey Sr., who invented the navigator's quadrant. After his father's early death in 1749, Godfrey was apprenticed to a watchmaker. He had begun to write at a young age, and his early talent attracted the attention of William SMITH, the provost of the College, Academy, and Charitable School of Philadelphia, who would become his patron. Smith introduced Godfrey to the literary and artistic circles of Philadelphia, which included Benjamin West (1738–1820) and Francis HOPKINSON.

In 1758 Smith's American Magazine introduced Godfrey's first poems. (These were later also published in London.) In that same year Smith secured a commission for Godfrey as an ensign in the Pennsylvania militia. The military service was uneventful (garrison duty at Fort Henry), but it provided some of the ideas for poems collected posthumously in Juvenile Poems on Various Subjects (1765), such as the pastoral, "To the Memory of General Wolfe" and "Victory. A Poem." Godfrey made the acquaintance of a group of North Carolinians, and in 1759, he moved south to Wilmington.

Godfrey's The Court of Fancy (1762) was the first, and most pronounced, American use of Chaucerian work (in this case Geoffrey Chaucer's The Parlement of Foules; circa 1378–1381) that broke free of traditional eighteenth-century verse. Included in Juvenile Poems on Various Subjects, it emphasized collegiality, which was a testament to Godfrey's appreciation of the circle of artists he had befriended in Philadelphia. This theme is evident in his drinking song, "Dithyrambic on Wine":

Come! Let Mirth our hours employ,
The jolly God inspires;
The rosy juice our bosom fires,
And tunes our souls to joy.

Godfrey is most remembered, however, as the author of The Prince of Parthia, a blank verse tragedy produced in 1767. The play was based on Nicholas Rowe's Tamerlane, an allegorical eulogy of William III and an attack on Louis XIV. Tamerlane was widely performed in London in the early half of the eighteenth century, and because of its frequent production it was one of the chief means for the dissemination of Whig and Lockean ideas. Thus, The Prince of Parthia stands as not only a significant achievement for early American theater, but also as a cultural artifact of the political philosophy shared by many eighteenth-century colonial Americans. It spoke of the danger of excessive human passion when it fuels absolute power and the need for a responsible government to tame this passion. Parthia was staged at a time when Americans were still reeling from the STAMP ACT and when the fears of despotic British government were growing in the colonies.

Godfrey died unexpectedly in August 1763 after contracting fever due to exposure to the sun. His work was posthumously published by his friend Nathaniel Evans.

Works

Godfrey, Thomas. The Court of Fancy. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by William Dunlap, 1762; Early American Imprints, 9127.

Godfrey. Juvenile Poems on Various Subjects. With the Prince of Parthia, a Tragedy. Philadelphia: Printed by Henry Miller, 1765; Early American Imprints, 9983.

Sources

Henderson, Archibald. Introduction to The Prince of Parthia, a Tragedy by Thomas Godfrey. Boston: Little, Brown, 1917.

Meserve, Walter J. An Emerging Entertainment: The Drama of the American People to 1828. Bloomington & London: Indiana University Press, 1977.

Shuffelton, Frank. "The Voice of History: Thomas Godfrey's Prince of Parthia." Early American Literature, 13 (1978): 12–23.

Gookin, Daniel (1612–1687) historian

A Puritan and missionary, Daniel Gookin was born near Kent, England around 1612. He spent his early childhood in county Cork, Ireland, before coming to Virginia in November 1621. Although he was politically and socially successful in Virginia, a ban on religious nonconformity led Gookin to resettle in Massachusetts in 1644. In Cambridge, Gookin served as a deputy in the assembly in 1649 and again from 1651 to 1652. He was a member of the General Court of Assistants from 1653 to 1675 and from 1677 to 1687. Gookin held the rank of sergeant major in the militia from 1676 to 1680 and then major general from 1680 to 1687. He was the colony's Indian Supervisor for more than twenty-five years (1656–1657; 1661–1687). In the Petition of the Poor Distressed Pequits [sic] Now Living at Poquatuck, 21 May 1664, attributed to Gookin, he argues that the Native Americans be granted eight-thousand acres, "a convenient Track of land elsewhere in the woods."

Inspired by John ELIOT's missionary efforts to convert the ALGONQUIAN and other local tribes, Gookin became deeply involved with establishing the Praying Towns (see PRAYING INDIANS) and facilitating the propagation of Christianity. As the Indian Supervisor for the colony of Massachusetts, Gookin spent some twenty years amassing knowledge of the local tribes. His Historical Collections of the Indians in New England Of Their Several Nations, Numbers, Customs, Manners, Religion and Government Before the English Planted There (1792), completed in 1674, is one of the best sources for information on Indian religion, political organization, culture, and farming practices. It also gives a detailed account of Eliot and other missionaries who attempted to convert the Indians to Christianity. Gookin argued that Indians who were converted ought to face no barriers in their assimilation into English culture. Although he hoped that the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts would print his work, the missionary society declined.

Gookin's sympathy for the Indians who embraced Christianity is even more evident in his An Historical Account of the Doings and Sufferings of the Christian Indians in New England in the Years 1675, 1676, 1677 (1836). The book details the mistreatment of Indians during KING PHILIP'S WAR, a series of battles between colonists and Native Americans in 1675 and 1676. Gookin's account is an attempt to counter the biased treatment of these Indians in histories by Increase MATHER and William Hubbard (1621–1704). Gookin supported Metacomb's War, apparently to the dismay of fellow colonists, and noted in Historical Collections that converting Native Americans "in the beginning of the war," would have prevented "many and great mischiefs." Gookin's frank defense of the Christianized or "praying Indians" alienated many colonists, but he regained his popularity by opposing the King's efforts to revoke or reform the Massachusetts CHARTER.

Gookin died on March 19, 1687. His oldest son, Daniel Gookin Jr., carried on his father's commitment to the local Native Americans, serving as the Congregationalist minister to the Indians at Natick.

Work

Gookin, Daniel. Historical Collections of the Indians in New England Of Their Several Nations, Numbers, Customs, Manners, Religion and Government Before the English Planted There . . ., in Massachusetts Historical Society Collections, first series 1, 1792: 141–227; New York: Arno, 1972; Early American Imprints, 24362, 24530.

Sources

Connole, Dennis A. The Indians of the Nipmuck Country in Southern New England, 1630–1750: A Historical Geography. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2000.

Gookin, Frederick William. Daniel Gookin, 1612–1687: Assistant and Major General of the Massachusetts Bay Colony: His Life and Letters and Some Account of His Ancestry. Chicago: Privately printed [R. R. Donnelley], 1912; Chicago: Library Resources, 1970.

Gothic Romance

The Gothic romance is a type of novel characterized by sensational plots, romantic settings, and horrifying themes, initiated by British authors such as Ann Radcliffe (The Mysteries of Udolpho [1794]), Matthew G. Lewis (The Monk [1796]), and Mary Shelley (Frankenstein [1818]). In early America the Gothic romance modified the British landscapes by substituting dilapidated mansions and country houses for castles and dense woods for the cultivated English countryside. Gothic style uses rich, ornate language to create fantastic scenarios and sensationalized themes, while the use of unreliable narrators complicates the plot psychologically. In the NEW REPUBLIC, in particular, the Gothic served as a critique of values and assumptions of human rationality. Cathy N. Davidson elaborates: "the Gothic can subtly challenge the status quo of so-called traditional or premodern society, especially progressive philosophical or economic theories (liberalism, deism, rationalism) based on a notion of human perfectability."

Title page for Charles Brockden Brown's third novel in the Gothic tradition

Charles Brockden BROWN was the most notable Gothic novelist of eighteenth-century America. In his novels the Gothic form intensifies a critique of ENLIGHTENMENT ideals, so that the plots of WIELAND (1798), Ormond (1799), Edgar Huntly (1799), and Arthur Mervyn (1799) include characters who display erratic behavior overwhelming those with more rational intentions. In this regard the Gothic novel is both subversive and thrilling.

Works

- Brown, Charles Brockden. Wieland; Or the Transformation. An American Tale. New York: Printed by T. & J. Swords for H. Caritat, 1798. Edited by Emory Elliott. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998; Early American Imprints, 33461, 35247.
- Brown. Edgar Huntly; Or Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker. Philadelphia: H. Maxwell, 1799; Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1984.
- Brown. Ormond; Or the Secret Witness. New York: Printed by G. Forman for H. Caritat, 1799; Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1982.
- Brown. Arthur Mervyn; Or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, part 1, Philadelphia: H. Maxwell, 1799; part 2, New York: George F. Hopkins, 1800; 1 volume, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1980.
- Brown. Clara Howard; In a Series of Letters. Philadelphia: Asbury Dickins, 1801; Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.
- Brown. Three Gothic Novels. New York: Library of America, 1998.
- Mitchell, Isaac. The Asylum, or, Alonzo and Melissa. . . . Poughkeepsie, N.Y.: Joseph Nelson, 1811; Early American Imprints, second series, 23406.
- Rush, Rebecca. Kelroy, A Novel. Philadelphia: Bradford & Inskeep; New York: Inskeep & Bradford, 1812; New York: Oxford University Press, 1992; Early American Imprints, second series, 26670.
- Wood, Sally Sayward Barrell Keating. Julia, and the Illuminated Baron. . . . Portsmouth, N.H.: C. Peirce, 1800.
- Wood. Dorval; Or, The Speculator. . . . Portsmouth, N.H.: Printed at the Ledger Press by Nutting & Whitelock, for the Author, 1801.
- Wood. Amelia, or, The Influence of Virtue an Old Man's Story. Portsmouth, N.H.: W. Treadwell, 1802.
- Wood. Ferdinand & Elmira: A Russian Story. Baltimore, Md.: Printed for Samuel Butler, by John West Butler, 1804; Early American Imprints, second series, 7795.

Sources

- Davidson, Cathy N. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Elliott, Emory. Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic 1725–1810. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Kafer, Peter. Charles Brockden Brown's Revolution and the Birth of American Gothic. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Recommended Writings

- Brown, Charles Brockden. Wieland; Or the Transformation (1798)
- Brown. Edgar Huntly; or Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker (1799)
- Brown. Ormond; or the Secret Witness (1799)
- Brown. Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793 (1799–1800)
- Brown. Clara Howard; in a Series of Letters (1801)
- Rush, Rebecca. Kelroy (1812)

Studying the Early American Gothic Novel

The Gothic novel has its origins in England in the late eighteenth century, and for a background of these works students should consult: Kate Ferguson Ellis's The Contested Castle: Gothic Novels and the Subversion of Domestic Ideology (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989); Maggie Kilgour's The Rise of the Gothic Novel (London: Routledge, 1995); Jerrold E. Hogle's The Cambridge Companion to Gothic Fiction (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); and Paula R. Backscheider and Catherine Ingrassia's A Companion to the Eighteenth-Century English Novel and Culture (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005). General reference sources on the Gothic novel include Dan J. McNutt's The Eighteenth-Century Gothic Novel: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism and Selected Texts (New York: Garland, 1975), and Diane Long Hoeveler and Tamar Heller's Approaches to Teaching Gothic Fiction: The British and American Traditions (New York: Modern Language Association of America, 2003).

For a study of the Gothic novel in America, see Mary Mauritia Redden's The Gothic Fiction in the American Magazines (1765–1800) (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1900); Frederick S. Frank's Through the Pale Door: A Guide to and through the American Gothic (New York: Greenwood Press, 1990); Teresa A. Goddu's Gothic America: Narrative, History, and Nation (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997); Marek Wilczyński's The Phantom and the Abyss: The Gothic Fiction in America and Aesthetics of the Sublime, 1798–1856 (New York: Peter Lang, 1999); Allan Lloyd Smith's American Gothic Fiction: An Introduction (New York: Continuum, 2004); Peter Kafer's Charles Brockden Brown's Revolution and the Birth of American Gothic (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004); Dorothy Zayatz Baker's America's Gothic Fiction: The Legacy of Magnalia Christi Americana (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2007).

Students interested in learning more about Charles Brockden Brown should consult the Study Guide following the Brown entry in this volume.

Grainger, James (1721?–1766?) physician, poet, farmer

Yet, planter, let humanity prevail.—
Perhaps thy Negroe, in his native land,
Possess large fertile plains, and slaves, and herds:
Perhaps, whene'er he deign'd to walk abroad,
The richest silks, from where the Indus rolls,
His limbs invested in their gorgeous pleats:
Perhaps he wails his wife, his children, left
To struggle with adversity. . . .

—The Sugar-Cane (1764)

Poet, physician, and West Indian sugarcane farmer, James Grainger was born in Scotland about 1721. His father, John Grainger, Esq., was by some accounts a gentleman who fell onto hard times financially; at one point he had held a position as a customs agent. Grainger entered the University of Edinburgh at age thirteen or fourteen, not unusual for his time, to study medicine. From 1745 to 1748 his studies were interrupted by the War of the Austrian Succession, which caused troops from England and Hanover to occupy Edinburgh at various times. Grainger consequently served a three-year term as an army surgeon before returning to study and receiving his doctor of medicine degree on March 14, 1753. Grainger then moved to London, where he enjoyed a modest career as a physician and writer, contributing from May 1756 to May 1758 to the Monthly Review, which according to John Gilmore was “one of the most successful and best regarded periodicals of the day,” known as well for its “generous payment.”

Grainger continued to compose POETRY, which was not an uncommon practice for medical men of his day. His “Solitude. An Ode,” published in the fourth volume of Robert Dodsley's Collection of Poems . . . By Several Hands (1755), gave Grainger some notoriety. During this time he also developed associations with major literary figures of the day, such as lexicographer Samuel Johnson, and rising figures such as novelist Oliver Goldsmith. In 1754 Grainger became acquainted with John Bourryau, a young man whom Grainger tutored and later collaborated with on literary projects, including translations of poems by Roman poets, Tibullus, and Ovid's Epistolae Heroïdum (Letters of Heroines). The former project drew Grainger into heated debates on translations with Tobias Smollett (1721–1771), novelist and critic. In 1756 Grainger met the Reverend Thomas Percy (1729–1811), with whom Grainger shared a longtime correspondence. Percy often served as a sounding board for Grainger's literary pursuits, and through the letters, Grainger's biography was preserved.

When Bourryau inherited property in St. Kitts, West Indies, he offered Grainger the opportunity for four years of travel and upon their return, an annual sum of £200 a year for life. In 1759, even though Grainger was enjoying a modest career in London, he decided to accompany Bourryau to the West Indies. Grainger, however, was not to continue on with Bourryau, for while onboard the ship, Grainger was asked to attend to a widow's family that was suffering from smallpox. He married one of the daughters, Daniel Mathew Burt, a wealthy heiress, shortly after arriving in St. Kitts.

In keeping with his earlier literary interests, Grainger continued writing, focusing now on his Caribbean home and writing long poems in the georgic style, based upon the Roman poet Virgil's Georgics, which depicted idealized rural life, or in his case, plantation culture. In 1763 Grainger returned to London for a visit and presented his literary friends with his poem, The Sugar-Cane (1764), a detailed rendition of the West Indian sugarcane industry and plantation culture on St. Christopher's Island (St. Kitts). In his writing, Grainger detailed slave life, describing housing, health, work, and the habits and beliefs of slaves. Central to Grainger's portrait were the virtuous planter and slave as "The Genius of Africa," each image serving to justify plantation culture while providing a comprehensive commentary on slave plantation society.

The scholar Thomas Krise identifies The Sugar-Cane as one of best depictions of an eighteenth-century sugar plantation and notes the skill in which Grainger combines poetics with detailed information: "The effect of reading the full poem with the full footnotes is to enjoy a tour de force of the West Indies at the height of the sugar-and-slavery system when these small island colonies produced more wealth for Great Britain than all the North American colonies combined." In 1766 Grainger moved his family to a new home on St. Kitts. Although he had plans to continue writing poetry, he died within the year.

Work

The Sugar-Cane: A Poem. In Four Books. With Notes. London: Printed for R. & J. Dodsley, 1764.

Source

Gilmore, John. The Poetics of Empire: A Study of James Grainger's The Sugar Cane. London & New Brunswick, N.J.: Athlone Press, 2000.

The Great Awakening

The Great Awakening refers to a period of religious fervor that began in early America around the 1730s and 1740s. (The dates of these revivals vary. A. Owen Aldridge, for example, marks the emergence of the Great Awakening from New England to Georgia as either 1739–1744 or 1734–1749.) Historian and minister Joseph Tracy first applied the term in the 1840s to describe the awakenings as "a single, grand movement on an inter Colonial scale." From Maine to Georgia, charismatic ministers led revivals that inspired mass conversions in the churches and communities.

Characterized by revivalist camp meetings led by itinerant preachers and connections to abolitionism, the revivals of the Great Awakening crossed age, class, gender, and race lines. Gatherings attracted crowds of one thousand on more than sixty occasions. Twenty thousand people gathered in Boston and Philadelphia to hear Britain's Reverend George WHITEFIELD, a famous Anglican preacher whose tour of the colonies helped spark the spread of Evangelicalism. Some scholars attribute this interest in Evangelicalism to a rejection of conventional church structures, especially in terms of class and race. By contrast, the Great Awakening was more inclusive in its membership.

Jonathan EDWARDS described the revival in a May 30, 1735 letter to Benjamin COLMAN. The letter, which serves as the basis for Edwards's A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (1736), testifies to the spreading "concern about the great things of religion" and to the subsequent shift from small-mindedness to community consciousness:

The town seems to be full of the presence of God; our young people when they get together instead of frolicking as they used to are altogether on pious subjects. . . . This work seems to be upon every account an extraordinary dispensation of Providence. 'Tis extraordinary upon the account of [the] universality of it in affecting all sort, high and low, rich and poor, wise and unwise, old and young, vicious and moral . . . 'tis very extraordinary as to the degrees of gracious communications, and the abundant measures in which the Spirit of God has been poured out in many persons . . . and its making such swift progress from place to place.

Edwards represents public enthusiasm as a reaction to spontaneous events that, once introduced into a community, naturally inspired a change in spirit.

As the revivals moved into the southern colonies, slaves attended services and joined congregations. Itinerant Evangelical preachers welcomed black members and supported the abolitionist tenet that all Christians were equal before God. Olaudah EQUIANO, who became a Methodist, reported on the mass appeal of the evangelical services:

I came to a church crowded with people; the church-yard was full likewise, and a number of people were even mounted on ladders, looking in at the windows. I thought this a strange sight, as I had never seen churches, either in England or the West Indies, crowded in this manner before.

In 1739, Benjamin FRANKLIN described his first impression of Whitefield's preaching:

The Multitudes of all Sects and Denominations that attended his Sermons were enormous and it was matter of Speculation to me who was one of the Number, to observe the extraordinary Influence of his Oratory on his Hearers, and how much they admir'd and respected him, notwithstanding his common Abuse of them, by assuring them they were naturally half Beasts and half Devils.

Franklin had "silently resolved that [Whitefield] should get nothing" when the collection plate was passed along; however, he was so moved when Whitefield finished his sermon, that he emptied his "Pocket wholly into the Collector's Dish."

Phillis WHEATLEY celebrated the Great Awakening in "On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield" with praises for Whitefield's preaching:

*Thy sermons in unequalled accents flowed,
And ev'ry bosom with devotion glowed;
Thou didst, in strains of eloquence refined,
Inflame the heart, and captivate the mind.*

Speaking to the emotional and intellectual appeal of the Great Awakening, Edwards, Franklin, and Wheatley all illustrate its impact on popular culture in early America.

The Great Awakening was not without critics, however. Charles CHAUNCY, whose rationalist philosophy was expressed in Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England (1743), found the revivalism to be characterized by “convulsions and distortions” rather than by genuine spirituality. Chauncy is representative of the Old Lights who opposed the New Lights of the Great Awakening.

Sources

Conforti, Joseph A. Jonathan Edwards, Religious Tradition, and American Culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Elliott, Emory, and Timothy D. Hall. Contested Boundaries: Itinerancy and the Reshaping of the Colonial American Religious World. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1994.

Lambert, Frank. Inventing the “Great Awakening.” Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Green, Anne Catherine Hoof (circa 1720–1775) printer

Known as the “printer to the province of Maryland,” Anne Catherine Hoof Green was probably born in Holland and came to Pennsylvania as a child. In April 1738 she married Jonas Green (1712–1767), a journeyman printer from a noted Boston printing family who had moved to Philadelphia. In late 1738 Anne and Jonas Green resettled in Annapolis, Maryland, where Jonas began publishing colonial records and documents and printing business advertisements for local merchants and shippers. In 1745 he revived the colony’s weekly newspaper, the Maryland Gazette, filling its four pages with news from abroad and from neighboring colonies, letters to the editor, obituaries, marriage announcements, and advertisements.

While her husband slowly established his reputation within the Maryland community, serving as an Annapolis alderman and postmaster, as well as its only newspaper editor, Anne Green earned a secondary income as an entrepreneur, selling “Choice good Coffee” and “very good Chocolate.” Her business was limited by her domestic duties, which included the care of fourteen children. When her husband died in 1767, leaving her with five dependent children, Anne Green quickly moved to take over his printing business. The Gazette continued without a break, her son William joining her at the press. The masthead read “Anne Catherine Green & Son.”

The colonial government was at first reluctant to acknowledge Anne Green as a “public” printer, or to pay her a salary as they had paid her late husband, but by the end of the year their doubts had dissolved. Over the years Green printed the colony’s official records, including the Acts and Votes and Proceedings of the assembly and such legal works as the Deputy Commissary’s Guide (1774), a large volume by Elie Valette detailing the procedures and forms to be used in probating wills and settling estates.

In addition to the newspaper, Green published a yearly ALMANAC, several political PAMPHLETS, and some satirical works. Indeed, as the only newspaper in Maryland until the summer of 1773, Anne Green’s Gazette played a critical role in the pre-Revolutionary crisis. It carried communications from the northern colonies and news of protests against British trade acts, including the Boston Tea Party (1773) and the nonimportation agreements (1765–1775), and Britain’s passage of the Coercive Acts in 1774. Although the paper had a decided patriotic bias, Green allowed both the pro- and anti-British positions to be aired in her newspaper. Green died on March 23, 1775.

Work

Maryland Gazette. Annapolis, Md.: J. Green, 1745–1813; Early American Imprints.

Source

Walker, Gay. Women Printers in Early American Printing History. New Haven: Yale University Library, 1987.

Green, Joseph (circa 1706–1780) pamphleteer

Joseph Green, sometimes known as “Josey” Green or “Stillier Josey,” was a rum distiller who proudly wore the mantle of New England’s “anti-laureate.” A graduate of HARVARD, Green quickly emerged as Boston’s chief tavern wit in the 1720s. His satirical manuscripts circulated widely, amusing readers in merchants’ clubs from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, to Newport, Rhode Island. Using skeptical commentary and parody, Green targeted everyone from officious public servants to pompous political orators, and the writers of obsequious and overblown obituaries. More than most, Green understood the role of print as a medium in his colonial society—and he was masterful at marketing his own work. He often gave his PAMPHLETS lurid titles, suggesting that inside the covers readers would find shocking exposés and revealing accounts of such subjects as the rituals of the Freemasons. He frequently distributed his work in manuscript form in order to convey the notion that the contents were so dramatic that he did not dare to publish them.

The issues Green raised were serious even though his style was mocking. Offended by the self-righteousness and hypocrisy of some New Light or evangelical ministers, Green exposed the sexual hypocrisy of evangelists such as the Reverend William Cooper (1694–1713). In “The Disappointed

Cooper” (written in 1743, published in 1774), Green lampoons the old man’s marriage to a young redheaded woman half his age:

*A Cooper there was, he Work’d at his Trade
Old barrells he mended, & new ones he made
So stiff in his way, he had Will for his Name
Yet he liv’d a long while in good credit & fame
Chorus: But his credit Will lost—lost how? do ye ask
Why he put an old bung in a new red-oak cask.*

Green did not spare the Old Light, or conservative, ministers either. In the 1720s and early 1730s, he parodied the poems of Mather Byles as each of them appeared in print. His goal in works like Parody of a Psalm by Byles (1733) was to deflate his victim’s vanity and to gain literary recognition. In the parody, Green transforms Byles’s musings on the wonders of the sea in his “A Psalm at Sea” into an evocation of seasickness. Byles responded with his own attempt at parody in which he condemned Green’s poem as “doggerell.” Noting that Byles wrote of his cat named Muse, Green expressed his confidence that the cat “purr’d in metre” and “mew’d in rhyme.”

As his friends knew, Green was more than a sensationalist and a satirist. He was a cultured man, a classical scholar who owned one of the largest private libraries in Boston. Despite his penchant for bawdy verse, he was a religious man and a charter member of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Indeed, Green was capable of writing poetry that reflected a deep spiritualism, including An Eclogue Sacred to the Memory of . . . Jonathan Mayhew (1766), a pastoral ELEGY that demonstrated the poet’s mastery of this genre’s form and conventions.

Conservative in his politics, Green nevertheless opposed arbitrary power of any sort. He refused a royal appointment as a member of the Massachusetts council in 1774 when the British government revoked the CHARTER of Massachusetts following the Boston Tea Party (1773). Yet, Green could not support the Revolution when it came. In 1775, already a man in his late sixties, he joined other LOYALISTS in their flight from New England. Unlike many exiles, however, Green went well prepared: he took some £25,000 in cash and stocks.

Joseph Green died in London on December 11, 1780, with no heirs despite his marriage in 1761 to Elizabeth Cross Austin. A friend captured Green’s personality in this epitaph:

*Siste Viator, here lies one,
Whose life was whim, whose soul was pun,
And if you go too near his hearse
He’ll joke you, both in prose and verse.*

Works

Green, Joseph. The Dying Speech of Old Tenor, on the 31st of March 1750; Being the Day Appointed for his Execution. Boston: Sold by Rogers & Fowle, 1750; Tarrytown, N.Y.: W. Abbatt, 1923; Early American Imprints, 40538.

Green. Entertainment for a Winter’s Evening: Being a Full and True Account of a Very Strange and Wonderful Sight Seen in Boston on the Twenty-Seventh of December [1749] at Noon-Day. Boston: Printed and sold by G. Rogers, 1750; Early American Imprints, 6510, 6511, 28766.

Sources

Duggan, Thomas Vincent. Joseph Green—the Boston Butler. Master’s thesis, Columbia University, 1942.

Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Shields. Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.

Griffitts, Hannah (1727–1817) poet, essayist

Hannah Griffitts was born into a QUAKER household in Philadelphia on July 29, 1727. Her mother, Mary Norris, came from one of the colony’s most prominent families; her father, Thomas Griffitts, was mayor of the city and sat on the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Hannah never married, remaining within her parents’ household until they died.

Griffitts was a devout Quaker and dedicated her poetic gifts to God. In keeping with the Quaker pacifist tradition, she expressed some reservations about the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, especially the revolutionaries’ hostility to Quakers who refused to serve in the army. In a poem, “On the Death of John Roberts and Abraham Carlisle,” she lamented the injustice of the arrest, imprisonment and execution as traitors of two such pacifists:

*And you, the guiltless victims of the day
 . . . have fallen
 A Prey to Laws . . .
 Long shall your Names survive the brutal deed
 And fair, transmitted down to better times
 Stand the reproach of ours.*

By 1777, however, Griffitts seemed ready, and even eager, to proclaim her patriotism.

Griffitts’s energy during her long life was devoted to literary pursuits. She is among the most prolific writers of her era, leaving behind more than two hundred manuscript poems, all signed “Fidelia,” as well as a number of essays and an extensive correspondence with other female colonial poets such as Susanna WRIGHT and Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON.

Although Griffitts wrote from age ten to ninety, she never allowed her POETRY to be published, preferring to share her intellectual involvement in the religious, political, and social issues of the day with her trusted friends. She was part of a network of female belletrists who also preferred to circulate their work in manuscript rather than see it appear in print. She died on August 24, 1817, having dedicated elegies, mediations, SATIRES, and political poems to the muse of poetry, “long banished and disused.”

Sources

- Blecki, Catherine La Courreye, and Karin A. Wulf, eds. Milcah Martha Moore's Book: A Commonplace Book from Revolutionary America. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.
- Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

The Galaxy (1866–1878) periodical

William Conant Church and Francis Pharcellus Church founded the Galaxy in 1866 as a New York magazine intended to compete with the major New England literary monthlies, particularly THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. The Churches edited the magazine during its twelve-year existence, though a number of contributing editors worked under them. The most famous of these was Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), who wrote and edited the “Memoranda” column between 1870 and 1871.

Like other American miscellanies such as LIPPINCOTT’S, The Galaxy published multiple genres on diverse topics. Its pages included editorials, literary criticism and reviews, as well as articles on science and history. Many of the magazine’s essays, particularly those on literature, were transatlantic in content. Appropriately, Henry JAMES contributed regularly; The Galaxy published a number of his travel essays and his literary criticism. For literature, The Galaxy relied heavily on serialized fiction, especially that of British authors. Serials by American women were also a common feature of the magazine; Rebecca Harding DAVIS, Rose Terry COOKE, and Constance Fenimore WOOLSON appeared with some frequency. Four of Walt WHITMAN’s poems first appeared in its pages, as did poems by Joaquin MILLER and Alice and Phoebe CARY.

The Galaxy’s circulation peaked during Twain’s tenure as editor of the “Memoranda” column, but it was never financially successful. The last issue of The Galaxy appeared in January 1878.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Garland, Hamlin (1860–1940) short-story writer, novelist

Haskins worked like a fiend, and his wife, like the heroic little woman that she was, bore also uncomplainingly the most terrible burdens. They rose early and toiled without intermission till the darkness fell on the plain, then tumbled into bed, every bone and muscle aching, to rise with the sun the next morning to the same round of the same ferocity of labor.

—Under the Lion’s Paw (1889)

Born in western Wisconsin, Hamlin Garland moved with his family to Iowa in 1869. In 1881, when his family moved again to a homestead in what was then the Dakota Territory, Garland found employment in Illinois and Wisconsin before working his own homestead near present-day Leola, South Dakota, for a year in 1883. The experience of farming in the harsh conditions typical of frontier homesteads in the upper Midwest informed his later writing.

After his 1884 graduation from Cedar Valley Seminary in Osage, Iowa, Garland went east to teach at the Boston School of Oratory. In Boston he came under the dual influences of Henry GEORGE’s social theories and William Dean HOWELLS’s literary REALISM. Returning home to what had become known as the Middle Border region, Garland combined these influences with his own experience to produce the six stories published as Main-Travelled Roads in 1891. The collection was published in four enlarged American editions between 1899 and 1930 and eventually included twelve stories that were characterized by detailed observations and dedicated reflection of regional values—a combination Garland labeled veritism in his 1894 critical work, Crumbling Idols.

Garland wrote three political reform novels, including Jason Edwards: An Average Man (1892), which endorsed Henry George's theory of taxation. Returning to the settings and plots with which he was most familiar, he wrote Rose of Dutcher's Cooley (1895), which tells the story of a Wisconsin farm girl's attempt to become a writer in Chicago. Much of Garland's later work was autobiographical; A Son of the Middle Border (1917) narrates his family's story to the author's thirty-third year, and the Pulitzer Prize-winning sequel to that book, A Daughter of the Middle Border (1921) treats the next decade and a half. Garland died at age seventy-nine, having written more than forty books.

Sources

McCullough, Joseph B. Hamlin Garland. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Nagel, James, ed. Critical Essays on Hamlin Garland. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.

Pizer, Donald. Hamlin Garland's Early Work and Career. New York: Russell & Russell, 1969.

Garrison, William Lloyd (1805–1879) editor, essayist

I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse—I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard!

—Revolution adopted by the Anti-Slavery Society (1843)

Born into poverty in Newburyport, Massachusetts, William Lloyd Garrison grew up to be a radical reformer. He began his career in 1829 editing The Genius of Universal Emancipation in Baltimore with antislavery pioneer and editor Benjamin Lundy (1789–1839), but was imprisoned for libel the following year. On January 1, 1831, he published the first issue of THE LIBERATOR, an abolitionist weekly he continued for the next thirty-four years, until the declaration of the Emancipation Proclamation made its thesis obsolete. Despite its relatively small circulation, The Liberator was enormously influential.

Garrison also organized the Anti-Slavery Society, which drew in important writers and orators. After Congress passed the thirteenth amendment outlawing slavery in 1865, Garrison took up the causes of women's suffrage, temperance, and world peace. His works include Thoughts on African Colonization (1832); Sonnets (1843); and Selections (1852), which includes speeches as well as polemical writings.

Sources

Alonso, Harriet Hyman. Growing up Abolitionist: The Story of the Garrison Children. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2002.

Mayer, Henry. All on Fire: William Lloyd Garrison and the Abolition of Slavery. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Merrill, Walter McIntosh. Against Wind and Tide: A Biography of William Lloyd Garrison. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1963.

The Gates Ajar by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps (Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1868) novel

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps was twenty-four years old when The Gates Ajar was published by TICKNOR & FIELDS. The novel is written in the form of a diary by a young woman, Mary Cabot, whose brother has been killed in a CIVIL WAR battle. Royal's death has left his sister doubting her faith in God, but she is comforted by her aunt Winifred, a minister's wife, who believes in a material, domestic Heaven, where Mary will live with her brother for eternity. The Gates Ajar sold more than eighty thousand copies in the United States by the end of the century. It had a powerful impact on those who had lost loved ones in the Civil War, but it also inspired controversy within the American religious community.

Source

Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart. Three Spiritualist Novels, edited by Nina Baym. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2000.

—Jenny Putzi

The Gentleman's Magazine (1837–1840) magazine

After trying to establish a monthly magazine in England, William E. Burton immigrated to the United States in 1834. Here, he launched the Gentleman's Magazine in July 1837 while working as an actor and theater manager. During different periods of its brief, three-year run, the magazine also went by the names Gentleman's Magazine and Monthly American Review and Burton's Gentleman's Magazine.

Burton intended The Gentleman's Magazine to include articles on art, literature, sports, and theater. Having previous experience as a contributor to KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE, Burton, especially at first, did much of the writing for The Gentleman's Magazine. In 1839 he brought in Edgar Allan Poe as a co-editor. While Poe held this position, his "THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER" and "Silence" appeared in the magazine. In June 1840, the editors parted company, and six months later Burton sold the Gentleman's Magazine to George R. Graham, who merged the periodical with one of his own to create GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE.

—Elizabeth Lorang

George, Henry (1839–1897) economist, editor

So long as all the increased wealth which modern progress brings goes but to build up great fortunes, to increase luxury and make sharper the contrast between the House of Have and the House of Want, progress is not real and cannot be permanent.

—Progress and Poverty (1879)

Born in Philadelphia, Henry George left home at the age of sixteen and traveled to Calcutta. Serving as a foremast boy, he saw firsthand the degrading conditions that both citizens of the Indian subcontinent and common sailors endured. After his return to the United States, in 1857 he went to San Francisco, where for nearly a decade he struggled, barely making a living working in a printer's office, in gold mining, and as a freelance editor and writer.

In 1868 the OVERLAND MONTHLY printed George's article "What the Railroad Will Bring Us," which anticipated the ramifications of the transcontinental railroad completion and his later economic theory that social progress promotes unequal distribution of wealth. This latter idea he expanded in his greatest work, Progress and Poverty (1879), written while George was working as editor of the newly established Democratic newspaper the Oakland Transcript.

Initially printed at the author's own expense, Progress and Poverty went through more than one hundred editions and proved highly influential among the populace at large and with some writers, particularly William Dean HOWELLS and Hamlin GARLAND. George elaborated the book's thesis in six other books as well as in his own weekly, The Standard (1886–1892), and he used the popularity it won him with labor unions to stage two unsuccessful campaigns, in 1886 and 1897, for the New York mayor's office. Already ill before he undertook the second campaign, George died before the election.

Sources

Rose, Edward J. Henry George. New York: Twayne, 1968.
Wenzer, Kenneth C., ed. An Anthology of Henry George's Thought. Rochester, N.Y.: University of Rochester Press, 1997.

Georgia Scenes by Augustus Baldwin Longstreet (Augusta, Ga.: Sentinel Press, 1835) travel narrative

Augustus Baldwin LONGSTREET insisted that his motive in writing Georgia Scenes, Characters, Incidents &c, in the First Half Century of the Republic was historiographic: Longstreet aimed to record and preserve "the manners, customs, amusements, wit, dialect, as they appear in all grades of society" in Augusta, Georgia, and its environs. Often cited as an early prototype of SOUTHWESTERN HUMOR, Georgia Scenes is a collection of eighteen sketches by Longstreet and one written by his friend, Oliver H. Prince. Longstreet's two narrators, Lyman Hall and Abraham Baldwin, represent the speech and attitudes of the educated upper class and serve as foils for the various, mostly white, lower-class characters they encounter. This contrast is the basis for much of the humor of the volume, which is also leavened with scenes of gory violence. Most critics agree with Edgar Allan POE's enthusiastic approval of Georgia Scenes and value it as a pioneering work of LOCAL COLOR and as a glimpse into Southern vernacular culture in the early republic. A few critics, however, have objected to Longstreet's portraits as fundamentally classist or even sadistic.

—Brett Barney

Source

Longstreet, Augustus Baldwin. Augustus Baldwin Longstreet's Georgia Scenes Completed: A Scholarly Text, edited by David Rachels. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1998.

The Gettysburg Address (1863) speech

On November 19, 1863, President Abraham Lincoln spoke at the dedication of a national cemetery at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania—the site, on July 1–3, 1863, of one of the bloodiest battles of the CIVIL WAR. Lincoln's stated purpose was to deliver a "few remarks," and when he uttered the scant three paragraphs he had written—in the wake of a two-hour oration delivered by Edward Everett—his address was thought to be of little significance. The audience seemed barely to have heard him, and Lincoln felt he had botched the job. In retrospect it is clear, however, that Lincoln had written one of the most eloquent and compelling arguments in favor of nationhood in American history.

Six versions of the address exist. The first, written at the White House, was revised on the way to the ceremony. The speech Lincoln delivered was a variation on what he had written. At Everett's request he wrote still another version, copies of which were sold at a fair with the proceeds benefiting Union army veterans. Two more versions were written for similar purposes.

Sources

Borrit, G. S. The Gettysburg Gospel: The Lincoln Speech That Nobody Knows. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2006.
Dos Passos, John, and Allan Nevins, eds. Lincoln and the Gettysburg Address: Commemorative Papers. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1964.
White, Ronald. The Eloquent President: A Portrait of Lincoln through His Words. New York: Random House, 2005.
Wills, Garry. Lincoln at Gettysburg: The Words That Remade America. Thorndike, Me.: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Gift Books

Highly popular in the mid 1800s (from roughly 1825 to 1865), gift books were annual miscellanies—collections of poetry, essays, and stories—that were customarily of a didactic nature. These books were typically bound in hard covers and had lavish illustrations. Patterned after the European literary almanacs that flourished in France, Germany, and England, the first American gift book, Le Souvenir, or Picturesque Pocket Diary; Containing an Almanac, Ruled Pages for Memoranda, Literary Selections, and a Variety of Useful Information for 1825, appeared in Philadelphia in 1824. A second volume appeared the next year, as did a competitor, the Philadelphia Souvenir; A Collection of Fugitive Pieces from the Philadelphia Press, with Biographical and Explanatory Notes, By J. E. Hall.

The first truly literary American gift book was The Atlantic Souvenir, which was published annually in Philadelphia from 1826 to 1832, and afterward in Boston, where it was combined with a competing publication and then appeared as The Token and Atlantic Souvenir from 1833 to 1842. Other East Coast gift books included New York's The Talisman. The formula took hold elsewhere in the country, inspiring books such as Cincinnati's The Western Souvenir, Detroit's The Souvenir of the Lakes, The Charleston Book, and The New-Orleans Book. During this period more than a thousand different gift books were produced—some once, some annually. These books were beautifully bound, sometimes in tooled leather, varnished papier-mâché, or inlaid mother-of-pearl.

Writers such as William Gilmore SIMMS, Lydia SIGOURNEY, Sarah Josepha HALE, and Harriet Beecher STOWE contributed work to gift books. Ralph Waldo EMERSON first appeared in print—anonously—in a gift book called The Offering, for 1829. Among the leading writers of the era probably only Herman MELVILLE, Henry David THOREAU, and Walt WHITMAN resisted selling work to such collections. In fact, gift books bucked the trend toward reprinting pirated English works, instead offering a paying venue for American writers.

Gift books performed other services as well, printing polemical works in favor of abolitionism and temperance and, during the CIVIL WAR, serving as an outlet for Union propaganda. Around the end of the war, however, the publication of gift books declined as monthly magazines increased in number and circulation.

Source

Thompson, Ralph. American Literary Annuals & Gift Books, 1825–1865. New York: Wilson, 1936.

The Gilded Age by Mark Twain and Charles Dudley

Warner (Hartford: American Publishing, 1873) novel
Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) and Charles Dudley WARNER (Twain's friend and neighbor) collaborated to write The Gilded Age, a scathing comic indictment of the greed and excesses of the late nineteenth century. The book centers on a Tennessee family who moves to Missouri and whose fate intertwines with those of others seeking their fortunes. The title plays upon “Golden Age,” which Twain and Warner viewed as an inaccurately optimistic description of their times. In calling the age “gilded” rather than “golden,” the authors implied that the usual indicators of national success, such as a booming economy and philanthropy, were in fact a veneer laid over a much bleaker social picture, in which the wealthy were corrupt and the poor were hopelessly trapped in their poverty. The title seemed to many Americans so accurate that “Gilded Age” became the common name for the era spanning from about 1865 to 1910. The book itself was not very well received by critics and today is considered one of Twain's minor works.

Source

Twain, Mark. The Gilded Age and Other Novels, edited by Hamlin L. Hill. New York: Library of America, 2002.

—Amanda Gailey

Gilder, Jeanette (1849–1916) critic

Born in Flushing, New York, Jeanette Gilder was the sister of editor and poet Richard Watson GILDER; she worked with him as an assistant editor at SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY, to which she also contributed a column called “Chats About Books,” the first literary gossip column in the country. Jeanette also wrote drama and music criticism for a variety of newspapers. With her other brother, Joseph, she founded and co-edited The Critic from 1881 to 1885, after which she served as the sole editor until 1906. She and Joseph also collaborated on Essays from “The Critic” (1883) and Authors at Home (1888). Gilder published The Autobiography of a Tomboy (1900) and The Tomboy at Work (1904), in which she humorously described her encounters with literati.

Gilder, Richard Watson (1844–1909) editor, poet

Born in Bordentown, New Jersey, Richard Watson Gilder was a poet who made his living as an editor, first of a newspaper in Newark, New Jersey, and later of SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY and its successor, CENTURY MAGAZINE, in New York City. Gilder and his wife, the artist Helena de Kay, made their home into a literary salon where the Authors' Club, a literary society that included Brander MATTHEWS and Edward EGGLESTON, was founded in 1882. Gilder published sixteen volumes of poetry, including The New Day (1876), as well as books about Presidents Abraham Lincoln (1909) and Grover Cleveland (1910).

Source

John, Arthur. The Best Years of the Century: Richard Watson Gilder, Scribner's Monthly, and the Century Magazine, 1870–1909. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

Gilman, Caroline H. (1794–1888) memoirist, poet

Born in Boston, Caroline Howard married Samuel Gilman, a Unitarian minister, in 1819 and moved with him to Charleston, South Carolina. There, in 1832, she began a journal for youth—one of the first in the nation—called Rose Bud (later Southern Rose). Gilman collected the sketches she had written for the journal in her first domestic narrative, Recollections of a Housekeeper (1834). She followed that with Recollections of a Southern Matron (1838), another domestic narrative that reflected her affection for Charleston and included a justification of slavery. She also published several volumes of poetry, including The Poetry of Travelling in the United States (1838).

Source

Saint-Amand, Mary Scott. A Balcony in Charleston. Richmond, Va.: Garrett and Massie, 1941.

Gilman, Charlotte Perkins (1860–1935) novelist, short-story writer, reformer

John is a physician, and perhaps—(I would not say it to a living soul, of course, but this is dead paper and a great relief to my mind)—perhaps that is one reason I do not get well faster.

You see, he does not believe I am sick! And what can one do?

—The Yellow Wallpaper (1892)

Born in Hartford, Connecticut, Charlotte Perkins was related through her father, the editor and biographer Frederick Beecher Perkins, to Lyman Beecher, Henry Ward BEECHER, Catharine Esther BEECHER, and Harriet Beecher STOWE. Frederick Perkins deserted the family shortly after his only daughter's birth, and Charlotte suffered throughout her childhood from his continuing rejection and her mother's constant need to move in search of work or to aid relatives. After a brief period at the Rhode Island School of Design, Charlotte Perkins taught art and designed greeting cards. In 1883, the same year she married the artist Charles Stetson, she published her first poem, which begins, "In duty bound, a life hemmed in. . ."

In 1885, following the birth of a daughter, Perkins sought treatment for postpartum depression from neurologist and writer S. Weir MITCHELL. The experience, including his prescription for total bed rest without intellectual stimulation and a rededication to domestic life, led Perkins to what she said was the brink of "utter mental ruin" and later provided the inspiration for her story "The Yellow Wallpaper" (1892). An indictment of the sexual status quo, the story is about a woman who is driven to madness by the well-meaning but destructive care administered by her husband, a physician. Perkins's story was also influenced by her separation from her husband. She moved with her daughter from Providence, Rhode Island to Pasadena, California in 1887 and later to Oakland, where she became active in various socialistic reform movements. Perkins lived with her mother and an apparent lover, Adeline Knapp. During Perkins's protracted divorce proceedings, her mother died of cancer and her three-year relationship with Knapp ended. In 1894 when the divorce was finalized, Perkins relinquished custody of their daughter to her former husband—an action for which she was publicly condemned.

Perkins edited the Pacific Monthly from 1889 to 1891. During the 1890s Perkins toured the United States, lecturing on behalf of women's rights. She also wrote half a dozen well-received books on the subject; the most popular was Women and Economics (1898), which concluded that women's economic dependence on men harmed all of humanity.

In 1900 Perkins married her cousin George Houghton Gilman, and they remained together until his death in 1934, one year before her own. She continued to lecture and publish prolifically, producing a monthly magazine from 1909 to 1916 called The Forerunner. Gilman wrote poetry, some two hundred short stories, and three utopian novels, including the feminist classic Herland (1915), concerning an all-female society. Suffering from terminal breast cancer, Gilman committed suicide in 1935.

Sources

Davis, Cynthia J. Charlotte Perkins Gilman and Her Contemporaries: Literary and Intellectual Contexts. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2004.

Golden, Catherine J., and Joanna Schneider Zangrando, eds. The Mixed Legacy of Charlotte Perkins Gilman. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2000.

Karpinski, Joanne B., ed. Critical Essays on Charlotte Perkins Gilman. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Lane, Ann J. To Herland and Beyond: The Life and Work of Charlotte Perkins Gilman. New York: Pantheon, 1990.

Gloux, Oliver (1818–1883) novelist

Born in Paris, Oliver Gloux originally traveled to the United States as a cabin boy by way of Mexico. For ten years he lived in Arkansas and other parts of the Old Southwest, where he was supposedly adopted by an Indian tribe. Later travels took him to Spain, Turkey, and the Caucasus, but he returned to America to collect more material for his popular but clumsily written Westerns published under the pseudonym Gustave Aimard, such as The Indian Chief (1861) and The Prairie Flower (1861). He wrote more than eighty such novels between 1848 and 1875, earning him the nicknames "The Dumas of the Indians" and "The French James Fenimore Cooper." His novels were widely translated and were as popular in Europe as in America.

Godey's Lady's Book (1830–1898) magazine

Louis A. Godey established Godey's Lady's Book in 1830 as a magazine for women that would both instruct and entertain. From its first issues, the magazine published a variety of material, including literature, advice, fashion, and sheet music. Godey's essays featured history and biography, as well as travel and art, but intentionally left out politics. The magazine was renowned for its spectacular engravings and illustrations, including its fashion plates. One of the most successful periodical publications of the nineteenth century, Godey's Lady's Book reached a circulation of 150,000 shortly before the CIVIL WAR. Though the magazine's circulation declined in later years, Godey's remained an important publication until it was purchased by Frank Munsey in 1892 and was joined with Munsey's Puritan.

In addition to its illustrations and engravings, a major factor in Godey's success was Sarah Josepha HALE's literary editorship, which began in 1837 and lasted until 1877. Prior to the arrival of Hale, literature in Godey's was mediocre at best, but under her direction the Lady's Book earned recognition as a literary magazine. Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, Frances Osgood, Catharine Maria SEDGWICK, Lydia SIGOURNEY, Harriet Beecher STOWE, and Bayard TAYLOR all appeared in Godey's during Hale's editorship. Despite this list of powerful contributors, contemporary reviewers often faulted Godey's for relying on sentimental fiction; nothing scandalous ever appeared in the magazine—aside, perhaps, from Edgar Allan POE's circulation-boosting series "The New York Literati."

—Elizabeth Lorang

Godwin, Parke (1816–1904) journalist, editor, biographer

Born in Paterson, New Jersey, Parke Godwin graduated from Princeton University and took a job with the New York Evening Post, where he worked for editor William Cullen BRYANT, who later became his father-in-law. Godwin was a transcendentalist (see TRANSCENDENTALISM) and a reformer. He published a variety of polemical tracts and monographs, including Democracy, Constructive and Pacific (1844), and A Popular View of the Doctrines of Charles Fourier (1844). He used the Post and later the Fourierist (see FOURIERISM) journal THE HARBINGER, which he edited from November 1846 to February 1849, as outlets for his views. In 1846 and 1847, Godwin edited a two-volume translation of the autobiography of the German romantic writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832), and from 1852 to 1857 he was political editor of PUTNAM's MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In 1883 he wrote a two-volume biography of Bryant, whom he had succeeded as the Post's editor in chief after Bryant's death in 1876. In 1883 and 1884 he edited four volumes of Bryant's works.

Source

Baker, Carlos. "Parke Godwin, Pathfinder in Politics and Journalism," in The Lives of Eighteen from Princeton, edited by Willard Thorp. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1946, pp. 212–231.

"The Gold Bug" by Edgar Allan Poe (1843) short story
Featured in the June 1843 Dollar Newspaper, "The Gold Bug"—with more than three hundred thousand copies in circulation by the end of its first year in print—was the most popular story by Edgar Allan POE published in his lifetime. Set on Sullivan's Island near Charleston, South Carolina, it details William Legrand's attempts to discover treasure buried by the notorious pirate Captain William Kidd. The story revolves around the question of Legrand's sanity after he has been bitten by a gold-colored scarab: Does Kidd's treasure really exist, or is this a wild-goose chase led by a madman? The narrator's Watson-like rationality and the comic dialect of Legrand's servant, Jupiter, act as foils for Legrand's obsessive behavior.

By having a cipher play a key role in Legrand's treasure hunt, Poe took advantage of the public's obsession with cryptography, the art of writing in or solving codes. The tale's adventurous plot, unusual setting, contrasting characters, and beguiling cryptography have ensured that "The Gold Bug" remains one of Poe's most-read stories.

Sources

Poe, Edgar Allan. Collected Works of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Thomas Ollive Mabbott. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1969.

Poe. Tales. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1845.

—Andy Lilley

The Golden Era (1852–1895) journal

Founded in San Francisco in 1852 by J. Macdonough Ford and Rollin M. Daggett, The Golden Era was a literary weekly that played a major role in the development of the literary traditions of California and the American West. The Golden Era emerged out of San Francisco's burgeoning newspaper market in the aftermath of the gold rush, and soon after its founding circulation reached nine thousand, making it the most widely read journal of its kind in California. The editors emphasized scenes of California life and sought contributions from local writers, including miners, making it a favorite of readers and a target for critics. Several contributors became national literary figures and chroniclers of the Western experience, among them Bret HARTE, Joaquin MILLER, Charles Warren STODDARD, and Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS. In 1886 the paper moved to San Diego, and it folded there in 1895.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Goodrich, Samuel Griswold (1793–1860) children's writer, editor

I have sought to give you pleasure, but I am more anxious that you should be wise and good. I have not forgotten that you have a life to live here and hereafter, and I hope you will never forget that happiness is the lot of the virtuous, and misery the certain doom of the wicked.

—Peter Parley's Tales about the Sun, Moon, and Stars (1842)

Born in 1793 in Ridgefield, Connecticut, Goodrich was self-educated and he served in the War of 1812. He became a partner with George Sheldon in a bookselling business in Hartford, Connecticut, in 1816, assuming sole ownership after Sheldon's death. In 1823 he visited Europe and met many of the famous British literary figures of the day, including Sir Walter Scott and George Gordon, Lord Byron; on his return Goodrich began to write the Peter Parley children's books, a series that eventually comprised more than one hundred volumes. As "Peter Parley," Goodrich introduced juvenile literature into the mainstream, beginning with The Tales of Peter Parley about America in 1827. In addition to educational texts, Goodrich published volumes of verse, prose sketches, advice to parents, and a periodical, Parley's Magazine (1833–1844). He moved his bookselling and publishing business to Boston in 1826, and in 1828 he started publishing The Token (1828–1843; see GIFT BOOKS), an annual that introduced Nathaniel HAWTHORNE to the reading public and included works by Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW. Goodrich's Recollections of a Lifetime (1856) describes his relationships with other writers, including Hawthorne, whom he had hired to help write the Peter Parley books.

Source

Roselle, Daniel. Samuel Griswold Goodrich, Creator of Peter Parley: A Study of His Life and Work. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1968.

Graham's Magazine (1840–1858) periodical

From its start as a forum for mediocre sensational literature, Graham's Magazine quickly became a significant outlet for important works of American literature during the 1840s. As was common in the period, Graham's was founded through the merger of two unsuccessful periodicals and the purchase of their subscription lists. George R. Graham acquired the Casket in 1839 and The Gentleman's Magazine in November 1840. The first issue of Graham's Magazine appeared in December 1840. Among the major authors the journal featured were William Cullen BRYANT, James Fenimore COOPER, Oliver Wendell HOLMES, James Russell LOWELL, Frances OSGOOD, and Edgar Allan POE. For little more than a year (1841–1842) Poe also worked as the magazine's literary editor; his successors included Rufus GRISWOLD and Bayard TAYLOR. By the middle of the 1840s, Graham's was a true miscellany, its pages supplying stories, poetry, biographies, essays on manners, travel articles, and reviews. Well known for the illustrations created exclusively for the magazine, Graham's featured many styles of art, including fashion plates similar to those in GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK and art of the American West, such as that of Karl Bodmer.

Graham's was an incredibly successful venture for its proprietor, but other risky business decisions ultimately cost him his fortune. In 1848 Graham sold the magazine to Samuel D. Patterson & Company. In 1850 Graham was once again in control, but the magazine's circulation was declining and never regained heights it had attained in the middle of the 1840s, when it had reached a circulation of perhaps forty thousand. In late 1857 or early 1858 Graham again sold the magazine, this time to Charles Godfrey Leland, and the last issue of Graham's was published in December 1858.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Greeley, Horace (1811–1872) editor, reformer

Go West, young man, go West.

—slogan popularized by Greeley

Horace Greeley was born in Amherst, New Hampshire, and served an early newspaper apprenticeship in his home state before traveling to New York City, where he first worked as a printer; he founded his own weekly, The New Yorker, in 1834. Greeley also edited two periodicals for the conservative Whig Party, and in 1841 he combined one of them, Log Cabin, with the New Yorker to form the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE, a daily newspaper that he edited for the next thirty years.

The success of the Tribune owed much to Greeley's editorials, which proved highly influential in the northern and western parts of the country. In his column Greeley advocated organized labor and FOURIERISM and expressed his opposition to monopolies. A reformer, Greeley favored temperance (see TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT), women's suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM), and a protective tariff to foster domestic production of goods. Although he opposed many of Abraham Lincoln's policies, Greeley was instrumental in securing Lincoln's presidential nomination. Greeley was an abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM), yet he opposed the stringent measures imposed on the South after the CIVIL WAR by the Radical Republicans who controlled Congress.

In 1872 Greeley was nominated for the presidency by both the Liberal Republican and Democratic parties, but he was defeated by Ulysses S. Grant. Greeley published several nonfiction works, among them a two-volume history of abolitionism and the Civil War, The American Conflict (1864–1866); and a memoir, Recollections of a Busy Life (1868).

Sources

Cross, Coy F. Go West, Young Man!: Horace Greeley's Vision for America. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1995.

Schulze, Suzanne. Horace Greeley: A Bio-Bibliography. New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.

Williams, Robert Chadwell. Horace Greeley: Champion of American Freedom. New York: New York University Press, 2006.

Green, Anna Katharine (1846–1935) novelist, short-story writer, poet

"There was no robbery. There is nothing missing," he again interrupted. "The whole affair is a mystery." "A mystery?" "An utter mystery."

—The Leavenworth Case (1878)

A Brooklyn native and a graduate of Ripley College in Vermont, Anna Katharine Green wanted initially to be a poet. With her first novel, The Leavenworth Case: A Lawyer's Story (1878), however, Green became the first best-selling female detective fiction writer in America. In a career that spanned forty-five years she produced more than thirty detective novels, several short-fiction collections, a drama in verse, and a collection of poetry. Green was one of the most significant early contributors to the detective-fiction genre, which had been introduced some thirty years earlier by Edgar Allan Poe's "THE MURDERS IN THE RUE MORGUE" (1841).

Green's mother died in childbirth when Anna was three, and she was raised by her older sister and by her father, who later remarried. Influenced by her father's work as a criminal lawyer, Green provided exacting details in her novels of police procedure, attorney protocol, and investigative strategies; she also realistically portrayed the psychological and emotional motives of the criminal mind. Although she referred to her books as "criminal romances" to stress the importance of personal relationships in her novels, the emotional nature of her work did not overshadow the accuracy of her accounts, which were often inspired by true events.

In her writing Green gave characters evenhanded treatment regardless of class or gender: A lower-class man with good sense could be more gentlemanly than an awkward man born of the upper class, and although Green opposed SUFFRAGISM, her female detectives at times implicitly challenged the stereotypes of the period. Antedating Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's (1859–1930) Sherlock Holmes by almost a decade, Green introduced the series detective—in her first mysteries, Ebenezer Gryce; later, Amelia Butterworth and Violet Strange. As a creative device the series detective is one of Green's several contributions that continues to influence writers of detective fiction.

Green married Charles Rohlf in 1884 and thereafter signed her work Mrs. Charles Rohlf; the couple had three children.

Source

Maida, Patricia D. Mother of Detective Fiction: The Life and Works of Anna Katharine Green. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1989.

—Elizabeth Leverton

Grimké, Sarah (1792–1873) and Angelina Grimké (1805–1879) pamphleteers

Sarah Moore Grimké and Angelina Emily Grimké were born into a family of wealthy South Carolina planters. They received no formal education, although Sarah taught herself law. She was denied an opportunity to practice her chosen profession. In the early 1820s the Grimké sisters renounced their parents' values and moved to Philadelphia, where they became Quakers and antislavery leaders. Both sisters were devoted to the causes of women's rights and ABOLITIONISM, and in 1836 Angelina published her Appeal to the Christian Women of the South, beseeching her peers to work for abolition.

The Grimké sisters were bold and effective orators and prolific pamphleteers. In 1837 Angelina published her Appeal to the Women of the Nominally Free States and, when attacked in print by the educator Catharine BEECHER for her unwomanly outspokenness, she responded with a pamphlet titled Letters to Catharine Beecher in Reply to an Essay on Slavery and Abolitionism Addressed to A. E. Grimké (1838).

Although both Grimké sisters equated slavery with sexism, Sarah was more dedicated to the cause of women's rights. She wrote the first women's rights pamphlet to appear in the United States, Letters on the Equality of the Sexes and the Condition of Women (1838). Sarah never married; when Angelina married in 1838, Sarah moved in with her sister and new brother-in-law, the antislavery orator Theodore Weld. Retired from public life, the Grimkés maintained their commitment to activism.

Sources

Ceplair, Larry, ed. The Public Years of Sarah and Angelina Grimké: Selected Writings, 1835–1839. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.

Lerner, Gerda. The Grimké Sisters from South Carolina: Pioneers for Women's Rights and Abolition, revised and expanded edition. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.

Yellin, Jean Fagan. Women and Sisters: The Antislavery Feminists in American Culture. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989.

Griswold, Rufus (1815–1857) editor, journalist, critic

Born in Vermont, Rufus Griswold left home at age fifteen. Upon arrival in New York in 1837, Griswold became the protégé of Horace GREELEY. Griswold achieved national fame with his anthology The Poets and Poetry of America (1842) and went on to publish The Poets and Poetry of England (1844), The Prose Writers of America (1847), and The Female Poets of America (1849) in the next seven years. Griswold is best remembered as the literary executor of Edgar Allan POE's estate. He edited the first extensive collection of Poe's works and wrote a "Memoir" of Poe that many consider overly condemnatory, even slanderous.

Source

Bayless, Joy. Rufus Wilmot Griswold: Poe's Literary Executor. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt University Press, 1943.

—Sara Elizabeth Klotz

Gale, Zona (1874–1938) short-story writer, novelist, playwright

A Midwestern REGIONALIST, Zona Gale grew up in Wisconsin and set much of her fiction there. After graduating from the University of Wisconsin, she worked for newspapers in Milwaukee and New York City and as a freelance writer for magazines before returning to settle permanently in the town of her birth, Portage, in 1904. Gale published more than thirty books, including twenty-two volumes of fiction and seven plays. She found her main subject, the small Midwestern town, in her third book, Friendship Village (1908), a collection of twenty stories. After World War I, Gale became involved in progressive politics and her fiction became more critical of small-town life. In the novel Birth (1918), set in the grim town of Borage, Gale depicts a door-to-door salesman who is abandoned by his materialistic wife and who in turn abandons his young son. Her most acclaimed novel is Miss Lulu Bett (1920), the story of a woman serving as a domestic helper in her married sister's household. She won a PULITZER PRIZE for the dramatization of this novel. Portage, Wisconsin and Other Essays (1928) includes essays on Gale's life and parents and the role of the writer in American culture.

Sources

Derleth, August. Still Small Voice: The Biography of Zona Gale. New York: Appleton-Century, 1940.
Simonson, Harold P. Zona Gale. New York: Twayne, 1962.
Williams, Deborah Lindsay. Not in Sisterhood: Edith Wharton, Willa Cather, Zona Gale, and the Politics of Female Authorship. New York: Palgrave, 2001.

Gardner, Erle Stanley (1889–1970) novelist

A California lawyer who began writing for PULP MAGAZINES in the 1920s, Erle Stanley Gardner created the detective-fiction hero Perry Mason, a defense attorney who solves mysterious cases and always clears his client. Beginning with The Case of the Velvet Claws (1933), Mason appeared in more than eighty novels, winning his last verdict in The Case of the Postponed Murder (1973). Gardner, who also used the pseudonyms A. A. Fair and Carleton Kendrake, wrote other series as well as nonfiction and short stories and became the best-selling American author, with more than 200 million copies of his works sold. The Perry Mason character has appeared in a radio serial, several movies, and a long-running television program.

Source

Hughes, Dorothy B. Erle Stanley Gardner: The Case of the Real Perry Mason. New York: Morrow, 1978.

Gellhorn, Martha (1908–1998) journalist, novelist

Martha Gellhorn grew up in St. Louis and attended Bryn Mawr College for three years before beginning her career as a journalist. Her first mature book was The Trouble I've Seen (1936), a collection of stories based on her work for the Federal Emergency Relief Administration during the Depression (see GREAT DEPRESSION). Beginning with the SPANISH CIVIL WAR she became a war correspondent and covered most of the major world conflicts thereafter. During her time in Spain she met Ernest HEMINGWAY, whom she married in 1940 and divorced in 1945. Her other books include A Stricken Field (1940), based on her firsthand observations of Czechoslovakia on the eve of the German invasion; The Wine of Astonishment (1948), a novel about WORLD WAR II; and The Face of War, a collection of her war reporting interspersed with commentary on her life and career (1959; revised, 1986). Gellhorn's forte as a fiction writer was the novella form, which led to the publication of the collection of The Novellas of Martha Gellhorn (1993).

Source

Rollyson, Carl. Beautiful Exile: The Life of Martha Gellhorn. London: Aurum Press, 2001.

"General William Booth Enters into Heaven"

by Vachel Lindsay (1913) poem

Originally published in the January 1913 issue of POETRY, "General William Booth Enters into Heaven" won the magazine's prize for best poem of the year and established Vachel LINDSAY as a significant American poet. The poem was inspired by, and quoted a refrain line from, Elisha A. Hoffman's popular hymn "Are You Washed in the Blood." It also included marginal notes suggesting a musical accompaniment. Collected in General William Booth Enters into Heaven and Other Poems (1913), Lindsay's work was praised for its American theme, its experimental form, and its elevation of popular lyrics.

—Brian McAllister

Gershwin, Ira (1896–1984) lyricist

Like so many songwriters of his era, Ira Gershwin was the son of Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe. Studious and scholarly, he was designated as the family representative to meet with the principal when his younger brother George got into trouble, as he frequently did, in grade school. George's life changed, however, when a piano entered the household, and after a few years of taking lessons, he quit school to go to work as a piano player for one of Tin Pan Alley's sheet-music publishing firms. Soon, George was writing his own songs and had the biggest hit of his career with "Swanee" (1919) and his first Broadway musical score with La, La, Lucille (1921).

As George's musical career soared, Ira drifted from odd job to odd job as he worked on writing light verse for New York's daily newspapers. In 1918 he tried writing song lyrics but used the pen name of "Arthur Francis," based on the names of his sister and another brother, so as not to seem he was riding on George's success. After collaborating with other composers, in 1924 he settled into a partnership with George with their first successful Broadway musical, Lady, Be Good!, which starred another pair of siblings, Fred and Adele Astaire and produced such hits as "Fascinating Rhythm," "Oh, Lady Be Good," and, even though it was cut from the production, "The Man I Love."

During the remaining years of the "Roaring Twenties," the Gershwin brothers wrote a series of musical comedies that captured the frothy energy of the era and produced such songs as "Someone to Watch Over Me" (1926), "S Wonderful" (1927), and "I've Got a Crush on You" (1928). The brothers Gershwin saw the culmination of such musicals with Girl Crazy (1930), which featured such songs as "But Not For Me," "Embraceable You," and "I Got Rhythm."

For all their success with musical comedy, the Gershwin brothers aspired to more ambitious musical fare. The onslaught of the GREAT DEPRESSION made American audiences more receptive to political satire, and the Gershwins wrote scores for several satirical operettas in the tradition of Gilbert and Sullivan, one of which, OF THEE I SING (1931), became the first musical to win the PULITZER PRIZE for drama. The Gershwins moved into even more ambitious territory in 1935 with PORGY AND BESS, an opera based on DuBose HEYWARD's novel and successful stage play Porgy. Initially, George Gershwin collaborated with Heyward on such songs as "Summertime" and "My Man's Gone Now," but because Heyward was primarily a poet, Ira Gershwin was brought in to help join words with music. Ira also contributed several lyrics on his own, such as "It Ain't Necessarily So."

Like many songwriters during the Depression, the Gershwins moved to Hollywood where movie musicals afforded work. Despite studio executives' fears that the Gershwins were too "highbrow" for the movies, George assured them that he and Ira were coming out to "write hits." Irving BERLIN observed that no other songwriters could match the output of the Gershwin brothers during their year in Hollywood. The fact that they were writing songs for Fred Astaire movies spurred the brothers to their jazzy, witty, vernacular best in "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" (1937), "They Can't Take That Away from Me" (1937), "A Foggy Day" (1937), and other classic songs.

Just as they were at the height of their creative collaboration, George Gershwin died of a brain tumor at the age of thirty-eight. Ira Gershwin was devastated at the loss of the brother he always considered the genius of the family and for years could not work. In 1941 he was drawn out of his grief to collaborate with composer Kurt Weill and playwright Moss HART on the experimental musical Lady in the Dark, and he continued to work on other musical shows and movies, most notably A Star Is Born in 1954, where he and composer Harold Arlen created one of Judy Garland's signature songs, "The Man That Got Away."

Ira Gershwin once described writing lyrics as a "mosaic" art, where the lyricist takes musical phrases and fits them with syllables, words, and phrases "with the infinite patience of a gemsetter." Other composers, such as Jerome Kern and Richard Rodgers, gave their lyricist long flowing melodies, but George's Gershwin's "stenciled style" built melodies around abrupt, staccato phrases that, as Ira once complained, gave a lyricist little room in which to "turn around." Yet, Ira fitted those brief musical phrases brilliantly, as when George built a melody around a three-note phrase and Ira Gershwin took a four-syllable phrase “It’s wonderful” and truncated it to “S Wonderful.” Like other lyricists, he took his lyrical phrases “literally out of the air”—from slang, catchphrases, and ordinary colloquial speech. In doing so, he made the American vernacular sing.

Although Ira Gershwin wrote successfully with Arlen, Kern, and other great composers, his reputation rests primarily on the songs he wrote with his brother during their thirteen years of major collaboration. Among other songwriters, Ira Gershwin was known as “The Jeweller” for his ability to fashion witty, colloquial lyrics to his brother’s complex, abrupt melodies.

Sources

Furia, Philip. Ira Gershwin: The Art of the Lyricist. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Gershwin, Ira. The Complete Lyrics of Ira Gershwin, edited by Robert Kimball. New York: Knopf, 1993.

—Philip Furia

Gibbsville, Pennsylvania setting

The fictional city of Gibbsville in the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania is based on Pottsville, John O’HARA’s home town. He developed and augmented this community and the surrounding territory for thirty-five years. Most of his fiction is set elsewhere, but most of his best fiction is set in Gibbsville: APPOINTMENT IN SAMARRA (1934), “THE DOCTOR’S SON” (1935), Ten North Frederick (1955), and “Imagine Kissing Pete” (1960).

Source

John O’Hara. Gibbsville, PA, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.

—Morris Colden

Gibson, Charles Dana (1867–1944) illustrator

Charles Dana Gibson began his career as an illustrator in 1886 when he placed a drawing with the satirical weekly Life. He became a regular contributor to Life and other magazines; he also illustrated books, including those of Richard Harding Davis. In 1894 he published Drawings, the first of his own books that consisted of his illustrations and observations. His most lasting creation was the “Gibson Girl,” a refined, aristocratic version of the ideal American woman—tall, athletic, beautiful, independent—whose dress, hairstyle, and manner were so widely imitated that the image became an emblem of 1890s culture. As modeled on the artist’s wife, the Gibson Girl was featured in his The Education of Mr. Pipp (1899), a series of illustrations chronicling the European tour of a mismatched American couple with two beautiful daughters. The book was made into a popular play of the same name and produced in 1905.

Source

Gibson, Charles Dana. The Best of Charles Dana Gibson, edited by Woody Gelman. New York: Bounty Books, 1970.

—Tilly Newell

Gilmer, Elizabeth Meriwether (1861–1951)

journalist

Elizabeth Meriwether married George O. Gilmer in 1882. Two years later he suffered a nervous breakdown from which he never recovered. His wife supported him financially for the remainder of his life. Gilmer began writing a weekly column for the New Orleans Daily Picayune in 1896 under the pen name Dorothy Dix. Her advice to the lovelorn proved to be highly popular, and in 1901 she went to work for the New York Journal, taking her column with her. The column appeared three times per week, but Gilmer also managed to exercise her reportorial skills, covering such events as murder trials involving women. In 1917 Gilmer and her column went back to the Picayune, where “Dorothy Dix Talks” was published for the next thirty-three years, becoming the longest-running column in the world and ending with her death. The column also generated two books: Dorothy Dix—Her Book: Every-Day Help for Every-Day People (1926) and How to Win and Hold a Husband (1939).

Source

Kane, Harnett T. Dear Dorothy Dix: The Story of a Compassionate Woman. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1952.

Glasgow, Ellen (1873–1945) novelist

Born in Richmond, Virginia, Ellen Glasgow was largely self-educated and read widely, with the thinking of Charles Darwin being especially important to her development. Finding her father’s strict Puritanism and conservative Southern society stifling, she began to write fiction in the late 1880s, publishing the first of her nineteen novels, The Descendant, in 1897. Glasgow later wrote of this story of a self-destructive man and an unnecessarily self-sacrificing woman that “the germ of my future work, as well as my philosophy of life, lay hidden in that immature effort.” With her third novel, The Voice of the People (1900), Glasgow began to explore life in the South..

Barren Ground (1925), considered her masterpiece, focuses on Dorinda Oakley, who hopes to marry Dr. Jason Greylock and escape her poverty. When Greylock betrays her and marries another woman, Dorinda, already pregnant, loses her baby and has to return home to rural Virginia. Further setbacks fail to crush her, and she manages not only to master her fate but also to become a successful farmer. For its breadth of social observations and psychological perception as well as its presentation of a fully realized, strong woman, Barren Ground is unequaled in Glasgow's body of work. Glasgow's subsequent novels—The Romantic Comedians (1926), They Stooped to Folly (1929), and The Sheltered Life (1932)—demonstrate her gifts as a novelist of manners and her astute analysis of relations between the sexes and Southern womanhood. Glasgow won a PULITZER PRIZE for the last novel published before her death, In This Our Life (1941), in which she tells the story of a prominent but declining Virginia family. Her autobiography, The Woman Within, was published in 1954, The Letters of Ellen Glasgow in 1958, and The Collected Stories of Ellen Glasgow in 1963.

Sources

- Goodman, Susan. Ellen Glasgow: A Biography. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998.
- Inge, M. Thomas, ed. Ellen Glasgow: Centennial Essays. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1976.
- Matthews, Pamela R. Ellen Glasgow and a Woman's Traditions. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1994.
- Scura, Dorothy M., ed. Ellen Glasgow: New Perspectives. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.

Glaspell, Susan (1876–1948) playwright, novelist, biographer

Iowa-born Susan Glaspell graduated from Drake University in 1899 with a degree in journalism. She worked at Des Moines newspapers before turning to a freelance fiction career in popular magazines. Her melodramatic first novel, The Glory of the Conquered (1909), was a best-seller. In 1913 she married George Cram Cook, one of the founding members of the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS, a group that launched Glaspell's career as a dramatist as well as that of Eugene O'NEILL. Her early play Trifles (produced 1916) has become a standard text in American literature anthologies and a classic of feminist literature. In this short drama, Glaspell probes the lives of women in a society dominated by men, exploring male and female points of view as investigators try to understand a woman's motivation for murdering her husband. Her first three-act play, Bernice (produced 1919), is a psychological study of male vanity, as a woman contrives to let her husband believe that her death is a suicide, the consequence of her passionate love for him. Her next two plays, Inheritors (produced 1921) and The Verge (produced 1921), showed the influence of Henrik Ibsen and confirmed Glaspell's stature as an acute analyst of the female mind.

Glaspell published dozens of short stories and also wrote a biography of George Cram Cook, The Road to the Temple (1926). Her later work includes Alison's House (produced 1930), a play based on the life of Emily Dickinson that won a PULITZER PRIZE, and the novels Brook Evans (1928), Fugitive's Return (1929), Ambrose Holt and Family (1931), The Morning Is Near Us (1940), and Judd Rankin's Daughter (1945).

Sources

- Ben-Zvi, Linda, ed. Susan Glaspell: Essays on Her Theater and Fiction. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995.
- Waterman, Arthur E. Susan Glaspell. New York: Twayne, 1966.

The Glass Key by Dashiell Hammett (New York: Knopf, 1931) novel

Dashiell HAMMETT regarded his fourth novel, The Glass Key, as his best. It is, in the words of Raymond CHANDLER "the record of a man's devotion to a friend." Told in strictly objective limited-third-person narration, the novel is set in an unnamed city modeled on Baltimore. The primary character is Ned Beaumont, the right-hand man to political boss Paul Madvig. It is an election year, and Madvig has fallen stupidly in love with Janet Henry, the daughter of his party's senator, who does not share his affection. When the senator's son is murdered, Madvig is set to take the fall until Beaumont saves his friend against his will, finding himself romantically entangled with Miss Henry in the process. During the course of the novel, Beaumont uncovers unpleasant truths, which the characters are forced to face. Thus the title, referring to Janet Henry's dream in which she and Beaumont come upon a house in the forest with a locked door. They open the door with a glass key, which breaks in the lock, releasing a houseful of snakes that slither over them.

Source

- Thompson, George. Hammett's Moral Vision. San Francisco: Emery Books, 2007.

—Richard Layman

The Glass Menagerie by Tennessee Williams (produced 1944) play

Tennessee WILLIAMS wrote The Glass Menagerie, his first successfully produced full-length play, as a dramatic rendering of his family, particularly as a portrait of his emotionally disturbed sister, Rose. His sister's 1942 lobotomy served as an artistic catalyst for Williams's composition. He described writing the play in a 1944 letter as "an act of compulsion, not love. Just some weird necessity to get my sister on paper." Williams experimented with various genres for the story of his "sister's tragedy"—first writing a short story titled "Portrait of a Girl in Glass" and then a screenplay titled "The Gentleman Caller"—before settling on a play for the stage. The chosen title may have been inspired by Hart CRANE's poem "The Wine Menagerie."

Most of the action of The Glass Menagerie takes place in the memory of its narrator, Tom Wingfield, who begins the play speaking from a fire escape, symbolic of the emotional escape he must make from his overbearing mother, Amanda, and his dependant sister, Laura. Tom immediately contrasts his role as narrator to a stage magician, insisting that the “illusions” of his memories will convey the emotional truth of his past. According the stage directions, as Tom introduces his family, a solid brick wall becomes translucent, revealing the Wingfields in their modest Depression-era St. Louis apartment. Williams’s use of back-lit muslin scrim emphasizes the haziness and sentimentality of Tom’s memory. In his production notes Williams defended the play’s “unrealistic” form: “When a play employs unconventional techniques, it is not, or certainly shouldn’t be, trying to escape its responsibility of dealing with reality, or interpreting experience, but is actually, or should be attempting to find a closer approach, a more penetrating and vivid expression of things as they are.”

Williams separates the drama into two parts: “Preparation for a Gentleman Caller” and “The Gentleman Calls.” The simple plot serves primarily as a frame through which the playwright can reveal character. In the play’s character list Williams describes Tom Wingfield’s nature as “not remorseless, but in order to escape from a trap he has to act without pity.” To help support the family Tom works at a stifling shoe warehouse where his coworkers call him Shakespeare because of his habit of writing poetry. His mother fears that Tom will emulate the destructive habits of her husband who abandoned the family many years previous.

Tom’s father haunts the play through a “larger-than-life-size” grinning photograph, and his mother dominates the family’s apartment with her “confused vitality clinging to another time and place.” Amanda grew up as the socialite daughter of a rich planter, pursued by many wealthy gentlemen callers, but made the “tragic mistake” of marrying beneath her social station. She now supports her family by selling lingerie at a downtown department store. Amanda’s purpose in life is to provide for her family, especially the painfully shy Laura, who exists primarily in a fantasy world of her music records and a collection of small delicate glass animals.

The Gentleman Caller, whose absence or presence defines the structure of the play, is Jim O’Connor, a boy Laura worshiped from afar in high school who Tom coincidentally brings home to meet his sister. But as Tom explained in his opening monologue, the Gentleman Caller symbolizes “the long delayed but always expected something that we live for.”

The Glass Menagerie premiered in Chicago on December 26, 1944, in the midst of WORLD WAR II. Although ticket sales initially lagged, the Chicago theatre critics championed the show and it quickly became both a critical and popular success. The Chicago Tribune described the play as “[e]tched in the shadow’s of a man’s memory, it comes alive in the theatre terms of words, motion, lighting, and music.” The play quickly moved to Broadway where it won 1945 Drama Critics Circle Award for best play. Williams most popular play,

The Glass Menagerie continues to be produced throughout the world and remains one of the greatest examples of American poetic drama.

Source

Williams. The Selected Letters of Tennessee Williams, edited by Albert J. Devlin and Nancy M. Tischler. New York: New Directions, 2000–2004.

—Park Bucker

God’s Little Acre by Erskine Caldwell (New York: Viking, 1933) novel

This Erskine CALDWELL novel focuses on the family of Ty Ty Walden, a Georgia cracker who has convinced two of his sons, Buck and Shaw, that there is gold waiting to be dug up somewhere on the family farm. Because Ty Ty is a “religious man” and has dedicated an acre of his land to his maker, he frequently shifts the location of “God’s little acre” lest he have to give any discovered gold to the church. An obese candidate for sheriff named Pluto Swint and an albino named Dave feature in this part of the narrative.

One major sub-plot involves a factory strike led by Ty Ty’s son-in-law, Will Thompson. Another involves a third son, named Jim Leslie, who has become wealthy, if corrupted, in the city. Beyond Ty Ty’s irrepressible version of sage commentary, the plot elements are dramatically and thematically linked by the carnal passions expressed by and for Ty Ty’s youngest daughter, Darling Jill, and his daughter-in-law, Griselda.

—Martin Kich

Gold, Michael (1893–1967) novelist, playwright, editor

The writer known as Michael Gold was born Itzok Granich and grew up in an impoverished family on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, a refuge but also a site of exploitation for the teeming immigrant masses looking for a better world. He attended New York University for a year and entered Harvard as a provisional student but soon dropped out. A prominent exponent of PROLETARIAN LITERATURE, Gold early in his career became a Communist Party member and frequently contributed to THE MASSES. Three of his one-act plays were produced by the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS between 1916 and 1920. He wrote as Irwin Granich until 1921, when he took the name Michael Gold because he feared that his own name had become too closely associated with radical organizations. Gold first coined the term proletarian literature in his article “Towards Proletarian Art,” which appeared in The Liberator in February 1921. During the 1920s he served as an editor for The Liberator and then for The New Masses. His first book was Life of John Brown (1924) and his early fiction was collected in The Damned Agitator and Other Stories (1926). He continued to write plays, including Hoboken Blues, an experimental play intended for an entirely black cast, which was produced in 1928. His most famous work was the autobiographical novel Jews without Money (1930), at once a sympathetic treatment of the people who preserved their dignity in the ghetto and an expression of rage at their economic oppression. Remaining committed to the Communist movement, Gold in 1933 became a columnist for the Daily Worker. The Hollow Men (1941) is a collection of columns in which he criticizes writers such as Ernest HEMINGWAY, Archibald MACLEISH, Waldo FRANK, Robinson JEFFERS, and Sherwood ANDERSON for their literary faults and political defection.

Sources

Bloom, James D. Left Letters: The Culture Wars of Mike Gold and Joseph Freeman. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.

Pyros, John. Mike Gold: Dean of American Proletarian Writers. New York: Dramatika Press, 1979.

—Tilly Newell

Gone with the Wind by Margaret Mitchell (New York & London: Macmillan, 1936) novel

Selling almost 1.5 million copies in its first year, Gone with the Wind is often cited as the fastest-selling book in U.S. publishing history. The success of the PULITZER PRIZE-winning novel surprised Margaret Mitchell, a lifelong Atlanta resident, who described her only book as “a simple yarn of fairly simple people.” The novel, which runs to 1037 pages, presents a romanticized version of the Old South as it follows the fortunes of heroine Scarlett O’Hara from her pre-Civil War life as a spoiled Southern belle on Tara, her family’s Georgia plantation, through the war and its aftermath. Mitchell evoked strong sympathies for her Southern characters, especially the strong-willed Scarlett. In the background were the slaves, who served—especially in the hugely successful 1939 movie based on the novel—only to recapitulate the stereotype of slaves devoted to their masters. The aura of the plantation, of a relaxed way of Southern living, captured the national imagination and distorted the period of Civil War and Reconstruction in which African Americans struggled to forge their own identities even as the states imposed segregation statutes that made African Americans second-class citizens.

Sources

Pyron, Darden Asbury. Southern Daughter: The Life of Margaret Mitchell. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Taylor, Helen. “Gone with the Wind and Its Influence.” The History of Southern Women’s Literature, edited by Carolyn Perry and Mary Louise Weaks. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2002.

—Monica F. Jacobe

Gordon, Caroline (1895–1981) novelist, short-story writer

The Kentucky-born Caroline Gordon was educated by her father, James Morris Gordon, a classics teacher. She graduated from Bethany College with a B.A. degree in 1916 and married the FUGITIVE poet Allen TATE in 1925. The couple divorced in 1946 but soon married a second time; they divorced again in 1959.

Gordon began her literary career when the British novelist Ford Madox Ford, for whom she was serving as a secretary, encouraged her in her work. Her first novel, Penhally (1931), embodies the author’s concern with family history and classical values. Her second novel, Alex Maury, Sportsman (1934) is a character study of a sportsman and a scholar. None Shall Look Back (1937) explored the Civil War and Gordon’s Southern roots even more intensely, while The Garden of Adonis (1937) and The Women on the Porch (1944) were set in the contemporary South. After the author converted to Roman Catholicism in 1947, her novels Strange Children (1951) and The Malefactors (1956) focused on spiritual themes and the search for grace. While Gordon considered herself a novelist and professed a distaste for writing short stories, she nevertheless published two collections during her lifetime, The Forest of the South (1945) and Old Red, and Other Stories (1963). She was also a literary critic, publishing The House of Fiction: An Anthology of the Short Story, with Commentary (1950; revised, 1960), which she edited with Tate, and How to Read a Novel (1957).

Source

Waldron, Ann. Close Connections: Caroline Gordon and the Southern Renaissance. New York: Putnam, 1987.

Gordon, Mack (1904–1959) lyricist

Born in Poland, Morris Gittelson came to America with his family when he was three and grew up in Brooklyn. He quit high school to join a minstrel show and changed his name to “Mack Gordon.” Moving up to vaudeville as a singing comedian, he began writing songs and had early hits such as “Time on My Hands, You in My Arms” (with co-lyricist Harold Adamson and composer Vincent Youmans, 1930) and “Did You Ever See a Dream Walking?” with composer Harry Revel for the 1933 movie Sitting Pretty.

His collaboration with Revel at Paramount Studios produced more hits, such as “With My Eyes Wide Open I’m Dreaming” (1934), but Gordon was lured away by Darryl F. Zanuck, head of production at 20th Century-Fox, who paired him with composer Harry Warren on a series of escapist wartime musicals. Gordon and Warren created such songs as “Chattanooga Choo-Choo” (1941), “I Had the Craziest Dream” (1942), “There Will Never Be Another You,” “I’ve Got a Gal in Kalamazoo,” “Serenade in Blue,” “At Last” (1942), “You’ll Never Know” (1943), and “The More I See You” (1945).

Gordon's lyrics are casually vernacular, breezily witty, and, ebulliently youthful. Although his longest collaborations were with Revel and Warren, his most enduring song, "You Make Me Feel So Young," was written with composer Joseph Myrow for the 1946 motion picture Three Little Girls in Blue. With its lyrical urgency to "go play hide and seek" and "bounce the moon just like a toy balloon," the song exemplifies the effervescently buoyant touch Mack Gordon brought to a lyric.

—Philip Furia

The Grapes of Wrath by John Steinbeck (New York: Viking, 1939) novel

Set in the historic Oklahoma Dust Bowl (1934–1935) and in California's orchard and stoop-crop fields, The Grapes of Wrath is considered by many as John STEINBECK's masterpiece and provides enduring images of America during the GREAT DEPRESSION. The narrative chapters of novel, which follow a representative Okie family, the Joads, alternate with essays on the land and the social conditions, chapters which allowed the author a platform to criticize the greed and selfishness of the growers and the discrimination and suffering endured by the migrants as a group as well as individually.

The Joads's long, arduous journey from their arid Oklahoma homesteads to the "promised land" of milk and honey in the West offers a parallel to the Biblical exodus of the Jews from Egypt to Canaan but with a far different outcome. Instead of relief, they suffer persecution after their arrival in California from the owners of the land. Steinbeck's accurate depiction of discrimination drew loud protests from many residents of the lush valleys near his hometown of Salinas, who labeled the author a Red sympathizer and organized protests against the novel's obvious sympathy for socialistic/communistic principles.

Moreover, with its sexual innuendoes and off-color humor, The Grapes of Wrath was also an immediate target for censors. Some critics considered it more propaganda than fiction while other criticized Steinbeck for what they labeled blatant sentimentality and bathos in his portrayal of Rosasharn Joad's ultimate self-sacrifice in offering her breast to a dying man in one of the novel's last scenes. Moreover, religious conservatives were offended by the portrait of the former evangelical preacher Jim Casy, who proclaimed, "There ain't no sin. There's just the things people do."

Yet, Steinbeck's poetic imagery and strong narrative, with its message of an unfair and uncompromising upper-class elite, attracted a broad readership and left a lasting impact. Considering its frequent allusions to Transcendental thought, the Bible, Greek mythology, and historical parallels (specifically the Civil and Mexican Wars), the complexity of the novel is unquestionable. The struggle of the "haves" and the "have nots" continues to resonate with readers and will no doubt continue to do so, as Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of The Republic" suggests, until the Lord return to "trample out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored."

Sources

DeMott, Robert, ed. Working Days: The Journals of The Grapes of Wrath, 1938–1941. New York: Viking, 1989.

Lisca, Peter with Kevin Hearle, eds. The Grapes of Wrath. The Viking Critical Edition. New York: Viking, 1997.

Wyatt, David. New Essays on The Grapes of Wrath. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Owens, Louis. The Grapes of Wrath: Trouble in The Promised Land. Twayne's Masterwork Series No. 27. New York: Twayne, 1989.

—Michael J. Meyer

Great Depression (1929–1941)

In its severity and its length, the Great Depression marks the worst period of economic, social, and political turmoil in the history of the United States. The Great Depression seemed all the worse because it was preceded in the 1920s by one of the greatest economic booms in American history, marked by extravagant optimism and changes in social manners.

The flourishing economy of the 1920s culminated in the stock market crash of November 1929. Initially, both the government and business regarded this event as no more than a harbinger of a brief recession: stocks would recover and industrial productivity would bring the nation out of its slump. But lessening demand and falling prices provoked further cuts in production. Banking panics eroded confidence that the capitalist system could protect people's money. Although President Herbert Hoover made a belated effort to employ people and to aid business through government programs, his optimism at the time of the crash and his speeches in which he predicted that the economy would correct itself seemed callous and out of date by the time he was defeated by Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932.

President Roosevelt promised a "New Deal," and during the first one-hundred days of his administration he proposed sweeping measures. For example, the National Industrial Recovery Act (later declared unconstitutional) aimed to stabilize prices and stimulate industrial activity. His administration later provided government support to writers with the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT and the FEDERAL WRITERS' PROJECT. To conservatives, Roosevelt's policies seemed like socialism or communism. Indeed, although Roosevelt did not seek the endorsement of communists, during some periods in the 1930s his administration drew considerable support from the American Communist Party, which formed a "Popular Front" with liberals to campaign on behalf of government programs that provided work and welfare.

In the short term, Roosevelt's policies resulted in some economic improvement and inspired hope among Americans. Under Harry Hopkins, head of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, for example, people on relief were put to work in building programs. John STEINBECK provided a vivid picture of a government work camp in THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939). Writers such as John DOS PASSOS and James T. FARRELL wrote with great sympathy about the government effort to help the poor and the labor classes. By 1935 the economy had made a small recovery, but it was not until 1943–1944, during the height of WORLD WAR II, that the nation experienced virtually full employment. Already in the late 1930s, Dos Passos and other writers were reevaluating their faith in government action and in liberalism.

Sources

Garraty, John A. The Great Depression: An Inquiry into the Causes, Course, and Consequences of the Worldwide Depression of the Nineteen-Thirties, As Seen by Contemporaries and in the Light of History. New York: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1987.

Louis, L. J., ed. The Depression of the 1930's. Melbourne, Australia: Cassell, 1968.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

The Great Gatsby by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1925) novel

The leading candidate for recognition as “the great American novel” and “the greatest twentieth-century American novel,” F. Scott FITZGERALD's third novel was not recognized as a masterpiece when it was published. It has become the defining novel of the 1920s and the most widely taught American novel, as well as a respected examination of American values and the theme of aspiration—what narrator Nick Carraway terms Gatsby's “heightened sensitivity to the promises of life.” But in 1925 it was regarded as sensational or sub-literary because it dealt with a racketeer's endeavor to regain his lost love by means of lavish parties and displays of conspicuous consumption. When Fitzgerald wrote an introduction for the 1934 reprint of his novel, he protested: “. . . I had recently been kidded half haywire by critics who felt that my material was such as to preclude all dealing with mature persons in a mature world. But, my God! It was my material, and it was all I had to deal with.” His material is now identified with American history and idealism. The Great Gatsby was resuscitated in 1945 as the key text in the Fitzgerald revival and has become a world classic.

Fitzgerald's previous novels did not promise the technical achievement of The Great Gatsby, which is complexly structured to provide the truth and lies about Jay Gatsby (born James Gatz) for the reader to assess. Much of the effectiveness of the novel derives from Nick Carraway, the partially-involved narrator who functions as the conscience of the novel. Gatsby, the romantic idealist who believes that he can repeat the past, is destroyed by his devotion to a worthless woman and by his confusion of money with love. The poor boy who becomes a millionaire by extra-legal activities endeavors to recapture Daisy Buchanan by means of his newly acquired wealth. This ostentatious, mysterious character becomes the exemplar of the American dream and its flaws.

The effectiveness of the story and characters is reinforced through style. The novel is filled with phrases, sentences, and paragraphs that excite good readers: “The lights grow brighter as the earth lurches away from the sun and now the orchestra is playing yellow cocktail music and the opera of voices pitches a key higher. Laughter is easier, minute by minute, spilled with prodigality, tipped out at a cheerful word.” The Great Gatsby has been widely reprinted in untrustworthy texts. With a stylist of F. Scott Fitzgerald's genius, every word matters.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J., ed. F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 219. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/ The Gale Group, 2000.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Great Gatsby, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Fitzgerald. The Great Gatsby: A Facsimile of the Manuscript, edited by Brucoli. Washington: Brucoli Clark/NCR, 1973.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

The Green Pastures by Marc Connelly (produced 1930) play

Marc CONNELLY reached the peak of his career when he received a PULITZER PRIZE for The Green Pastures, a “fable” in eighteen scenes adapted from Roark Bradford's folktales of African American life. Connelly directed the original production, which opened at the Mansfield Theatre on February 26, 1930, with an all-black cast—a rarity on Broadway at the time—and ran for 644 performances.

In the play, “De Lawd”—whose entrance is announced by the angel Gabriel shouting, “Gangway! Gangway for de Lawd God Jehovah!”—assists the minister of a small Southern church in recounting stories from the Old Testament that lead to the climactic story of the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. The depiction of familiar Bible tales filtered through stereotypical images of black life pleased Depression-era audiences, and the play was made into a hit movie in 1936. A 1954 revival failed as a result of changing attitudes about race and what were deemed racist images in the play.

—James Fisher

Green, Paul (1894–1981) playwright

A North Carolina native who graduated from and taught at the University of North Carolina, Paul Green made his reputation as the author of provocative one-act folk dramas and later was known for his outdoor “symphonic dramas,” which blended music, drama, and dance in epic productions celebrating historic events. Green entered the university in 1916 but left to fight in WORLD WAR I. At the end of the war he was stationed in Paris, where he was exposed to a cosmopolitan culture and attended operas and ballets. Upon his return to the North Carolina, he became actively involved in the Carolina Playmakers, a regional theater group directed by Frederick Henry Koch. His play The Lord’s Will (produced 1922) created controversy with its depiction of exploited mill workers. Green won the PULITZER PRIZE for In Abraham’s Bosom, a sympathetic exploration of black lives in the South that premiered at the Provincetown Playhouse in 1926 before transferring to Broadway for a successful run the next year. His early collections of plays include The Lord’s Will and Other Plays (1925), Lonesome Road: Six Plays for the Negro Theater (1926), In the Valley and Other Carolina Plays (1928), and The House of Connelly and Other Plays (1931). His play The House of Connelly (produced 1931), which depicted the decline of a Southern plantation, became the first play performed by the GROUP THEATRE, which later also put on Green’s Johnny Johnson: The Biography of a Common Man (produced 1936), an antiwar play with music by Kurt Weill. Green’s first outdoor drama, The Lost Colony: A Symphonic Drama of Sir Walter Raleigh’s Ill-fated Colony on Roanoke Island in the Late Sixteenth Century, was successfully produced in North Carolina on July 4, 1937. During the next forty years, he produced more than a dozen such plays in eight states, mainly in the South, including Faith of Our Fathers: A Symphonic Drama of George Washington and the Revolutionary War (produced in Washington, D.C., 1950), Cross and Sword: A Symphonic Drama of the Spanish Settlement of Florida (produced in St. Augustine, Fla., 1965), and The Lone Star: A Symphonic Drama of Sam Houston and the Winning of Texas Independence from Mexico (produced in Galveston, Tex., 1977).

Sources

Avery, Laurence G. A Southern Life: Letters of Paul Green, 1916–1981. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
 Kenny, Vincent S. Paul Green. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Grey, Zane (1872–1939) novelist

Born in Zanesville, Ohio, Zane Grey studied dentistry at the University of Pennsylvania and upon graduation in 1896 opened a practice in New York City. Inspired by his reading of James Fenimore Cooper and dime novels, he published his first novel, Betty Zane (1903), based on the exploits of his Ohio ancestors in defense of Fort Henry during a British attack in the Revolutionary War. At the invitation of Colonel C. J. “Buffalo” Jones, a former buffalo hunter who made his living selling captured mountain lions, Grey spent summer 1907 on a Northern Arizona ranch, which turned his thoughts to the West as a setting and subject. He first wrote of his experience in a nonfiction work about Jones and mountain-lion hunting, The Last of the Plainsman (1908), but then began writing WESTERNS, putting his stamp on the genre Owen WISTER had established in THE VIRGINIAN (1902). He achieved his first popular success with the best-selling Riders of the Purple Sage (1912), a complicated work that features a gang of cattle rustlers, villainous Mormons, and evocative descriptions of the Western landscape. A notable theme developed in Grey’s novels, many of which were adapted for motion pictures, is that of a weak Easterner who finds strength of body and character in the redemptive West. The prolific Grey, who also wrote nonfiction books on travel and outdoor living as well as children’s fiction, produced work so quickly that his publisher, Harper, built up a backlog of his books, publishing more than twenty of his Western titles posthumously.

Sources

Jackson, Carlton. Zane Grey. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
 Kimball, Arthur G. Ace of Hearts: The Westerns of Zane Grey. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1993.
 —George Parker Anderson

Grimké, Angelina Weld (1880–1958) poet, dramatist

Born in Boston, Angelina Weld Grimké as a six-year-old was sent to live with her mulatto father by her white mother, who explained to her estranged husband that the child needed the “love and sympathy of one of her own race.” Her father, Archibald Henry Grimké, was a former slave, the nephew of the abolitionists and women’s rights advocates Sarah Grimké and Angelina Grimké. A distinguished lawyer, he educated his daughter at prestigious Massachusetts schools and Carleton Academy at Northfield, Minnesota. Following her 1902 graduation from the Boston Normal School of Gymnastics, Grimké moved to Washington, D.C., where she taught at Armstrong Manual Training School and Dunbar High School. She published a few stories and poetry—which focused on unfulfilled love and racial injustice—in African American literary journals. Her three-act drama Rachel (1920) dramatizes the devastating effect of racism on a refined and sensitive young black woman. First performed in Washington in 1916, the play was a vehicle for the NAACP to denounce the lynching and the subjugation of African Americans, as was stated in the program for the performance: “This is the first attempt to use the stage for race propaganda in order to enlighten the American people relative to the lamentable condition of ten million of Colored citizens in this free Republic.”

Sources

Hull, Gloria T. “‘Under the Days’: The Buried Life and Poetry of Angelina Weld Grimké,” in Conditions: Five (Black Women’s Issue), edited by Lorraine Bethel and Barbara Smith (1979), pp. 17–25.

Miller, Jeanne-Marie A. “Angelina Weld Grimké: Playwright and Poet.” CLA Journal, 21 (June 1978): 514–519.

—Patricia A. Young

The Group Theatre (1931–1941) organization

An avant-garde organization of actors and directors, the Group Theater was founded in New York by Harold Clurman, Lee Strasberg, and Cheryl Crawford. The founders, inspired in part by the theories of the Russian theatrical director, teacher, and actor, Konstantin Stanislavsky, envisioned ensemble productions without stars that would serve progressive social aims—a force for MODERNISM on the Broadway stage. Their first success was Paul GREEN’s The House of Connelly (produced 1931). Clifford ODETS, who acted in that production, wrote several works specifically for the Group, including Waiting for Lefty and Awake and Sing!, both produced in 1935. The following year Odets remarked, “I don’t think I would ever have written a play if it hadn’t been for the Group.” Other notable productions included Sidney KINGSLEY’s Men in White (produced 1933), a play dedicated to selfless medical professionals; Irwin Shaw’s The Gentle People (produced 1939), about the determination of common Americans to resist Fascism; and William SAROYAN’s My Heart’s in the Highlands (produced 1939). Many of the Group Theatre figures, including directors and teachers Strasberg and Clurman, had a lasting impact on American drama.

Sources

Clurman, Harold. The Fervent Years: The Story of the Group Theatre and the Thirties. New York: Knopf, 1945.

Smith, Wendy. Real Life Drama: The Group Theatre and America, 1931–1940. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1990.

Gunther, John (1901–1970) journalist

John Gunther, who began his career as a reporter in Chicago on the Daily News in 1922, became one of the best-known journalists in the world by combining news reporting with travel and history writing. He made his reputation with his “Inside” travel books, beginning with Inside Europe (1936). He continued these well-informed accounts of life in continents and countries with books on Asia, Latin America, the United States, Africa, Russia, South America, and Australia. He also wrote a classic memoir, Death Be Not Proud (1949), about the death of his seventeen-year-old son.

Source

Cuthbertson, Ken. Inside: The Biography of John Gunther. Chicago: Bonus Books, 1992.

Gaddis, William (1922–1998) novelist

—Why, it's just like that story about Father's dying wish to have his bust sunk in Vancouver harbor . . . about James and Thomas . . . and the storm coming up . . . blowing his ashes back into their beards.
—There never was a bust of Father, Anne. . . .
—That's just what I mean, about stories getting started.

—JR (1975)

William Gaddis was born in New York. He attended Harvard and published humorous articles in its magazine The Lampoon, but he left before graduating. He worked as a fact checker at The New Yorker, traveled widely in Europe and Central America, and published his first novel, The Recognitions, in 1955. Although the novel was well received, its reputation took on a kind of mystique accorded only to a few authors such as Thomas Pynchon. Gaddis seemed to have an encyclopedic knowledge of the world with a Joycean penchant for recondite allusions. Gaddis's second novel, JR (1975), was just as sophisticated: it contained not only penetrating observations on the contemporary world but also an exploration of the disinformation that confuses issues and daily life in the form of corporate life and shoddy business practices. JR won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1975.

Carpenter's Gothic (1985) seemed more accessible but no less concerned with a world that may be exhausting itself with information and pseudo-inventiveness. Gaddis's work has been called entropic because like Henry Adams in his autobiography Gaddis explores the extent to which the modern world's energy is enervating as well as inspiring. His last novel published before his death, A Frolic of His Own (1994), explores the role of the law and litigiousness in American life. Like John BARTH and Don DeLillo, Gaddis is particularly attuned to the uses of language, of how institutions and professions use language to obscure rather than to illuminate meaning. Agape Agape—a history of the player piano—and The Rush for Second Place: Essays and Occasional Writings were both published in 2002.

Sources

Knight, Christopher J. Hints and Guesses: William Gaddis's Fiction of Longing. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1997.

Moore, Steven. William Gaddis. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Gaines, Ernest J. (1933– ) novelist

“Yes, I’m the teacher,” I said. “And I teach what the white folks around here tell me to teach—reading, writing, and ’rithmetic. They never told me how to keep a black boy out of a liquor store.”

—A Lesson before Dying (1993)

Ernest J. Gaines was born on a Louisiana plantation, and by the age of eight he was cutting sugar cane. He moved to California to attend high school. His first stories were published in Transfer magazine while he was attending San Francisco State College, where he earned his bachelor's degree in 1957 before graduate study at Stanford University. A regionalist, Gaines sets his fiction in Louisiana. His experience of racism informs all of his work. The works of

Ernest J. Gaines

William Faulkner also were a major influence as Gaines tried to come to terms with the sharecropping system in the South and the denigration of African Americans. Gaines's first two novels, Catherine Carmier (1964) and Of Love and Dust (1967), explore the passions and the conflicts of white-black relationships. The second novel is told in the first person, an approach that Gaines used successfully in his following works, Bloodline (1968) and The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman (1971). The strong sense of history and the individual voice in the latter work brought Gaines a large audience of readers, and the book was made into a television movie. Gaines's In My Father's House (1978), A Gathering of Old Men (1983), and A Lesson before Dying (1993) are later examples of his skill in characterization and in grasping Southern manners and history.

Principal Books by Gaines

Catherine Carmier. New York: Atheneum, 1964.
Of Love and Dust. New York: Dial, 1967.
Bloodline. New York: Dial, 1968.

A Long Day in November. New York: Dial, 1971.

The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman. New York: Dial, 1971.

In My Father's House. New York: Knopf, 1978.

A Gathering of Old Men. New York: Knopf, 1983.

A Lesson before Dying. New York: Knopf, 1993.

Mozart and Leadbelly: Stories and Essays, edited by Marcia Gaudet and Reggie Young. New York: Knopf, 2005.

Studying Ernest J. Gaines

Though Gaines has authored six novels as of 2007, a novella (A Long Day in November [1971]), and a collection of short fiction (Bloodline [1968]), students are well advised to begin with Gaines's two most famous works, The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman (1971) and A Lesson Before Dying (1993).

Students interested in the life and artistic development of Ernest J. Gaines—as told by Gaines in his own words—should begin with Porch Talk with Ernest Gaines: Conversations on the Writer's Craft, edited by Marcia Gaudet and Carl Wooten (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1990). Also of interest are Conversations with Ernest Gaines, edited by John Lowe (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995), and the recently published autobiographical writings Mozart and Leadbelly: Stories and Essays (New York: Knopf, 2005). The only biography of Gaines published to date is Anne Key Simpson's A Gathering of Gaines: The Man and the Writer (Lafayette: Center for Louisiana Studies, 1991).

The standard annotated bibliographical reference for Gaines's work is Mary Ellen Doyle's "Ernest J. Gaines: An Annotated Bibliography, 1956–1988" (Black American Literature Forum, 24, no. 1 [Spring 1990]: 125–150). This bibliography should be supplemented with those contained in the above-mentioned Critical Reflections on the Fiction of Ernest J. Gaines with Valerie M. Babb's Ernest Gaines (Boston: Twayne, 1991), and with the Modern Language Association's annual bibliography.

The student studying Gaines's work and its cultural context should begin with Babb's Ernest Gaines, taking note of the selected bibliography not only for the list of crucial secondary sources for Gaines's work but also for the list of selected books on black history and culture, Louisiana history and culture, and American history and culture—all of which a student will find useful as they navigate through Gaines's fictionalized Louisiana landscape. Karen Carmean's Ernest J. Gaines: A Critical Companion (New York: Greenwood, 1998) is a useful introduction to his works, with chapters on six of his most important novels and one on his short fiction, preceded by a biographical essay and concluding with a checklist of works by and about Gaines. Other essential book-length studies are Critical Reflections on the Fiction of Ernest J. Gaines, edited by David C. Estes (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1994); Herman Dust jacket for Gaines's 1993 novel, winner of the National Book Critics Circle Award for Fiction.

Beavers's Wrestling Angels into Song: The Fictions of Ernest J. Gaines and James Alan McPherson (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995); Keith Clark's Black Manhood in James Baldwin, Ernest J. Gaines, and August Wilson (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002); and Mary Ellen Doyle's Voices from the Quarters: The Fiction of Ernest J. Gaines (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2002).

—Student Guide by Jeremy Cagle

Gallant, Mavis (1922– ) novelist, short-story writer

Montreal-born Mavis Gallant attended boarding school in Canada and completed high school in New York. She worked in Canada where she published articles in Standard Magazine. In 1950 she traveled to Paris to become a writer. She attracted the attention of The New Yorker, where many of her most important stories have appeared. Her first collection, The Other Paris (1956), explores the differences between American and European sensibilities, a theme that reappears in her first novel, Green Water, Green Sky (1959). Gallant has published one collection of nonfiction, Paris Notebooks: Essays and Reviews (1986), and one play, What Is to Be Done? (produced 1982). Her other fiction collections include Paris Stories (2002).

Source

Smythe, Karen E. Figuring Grief: Gallant, Munro and the Poetics of Elegy. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1992.

Gardner, John (1933–1982) novelist

If fiction is really working well the reader curls up in his chair and forgets time. You know, you sit down after lunch and somebody is shaking you suddenly and saying aren't you gonna come to supper. . . .

—Interview (1978)

The novelist John Gardner was born in Batavia, New York, where two of his novels, The Resurrection (1966) and The Sunlight Dialogues (1972), are set. His father was a farmer and his mother an English teacher. Gardner graduated from Washington University in 1955 and earned a Ph.D. in classical and medieval literature from Iowa State University in 1958. He taught at several colleges including Southern Illinois University and the State University of New York at Binghamton, where he founded and directed the writing program. Gardner's interest in medievalism and earlier periods of English literature informs his work, particularly the novel Grendel (1971), a reworking of Beowulf. Because of his philosophical experiments with point of view, he has been compared to John BARTH and William GASS. Gardner wrote a controversial nonfiction book, On Moral Fiction (1978), which some of his fellow writers thought of as moralizing—that is, putting moral beliefs before the creation of literature. Gardner wrote five other novels, including Mickelsson's Ghosts (1982), and two short-story collections: The King's Indian (1974) and The Art of Living (1981). His controversial biography of Chaucer, The Life and Times of Chaucer (1977), brought charges of plagiarism. Gardner also wrote books for children, including Dragon, Dragon (1975). He died in a motorcycle accident.

Sources

Chavkin, Allan, ed. Conversations with John Gardner. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990.

McWilliams, Dean. John Gardner. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Garrett, George (1929– ) poet, novelist, biographer, children's playwright

*I changed the model of the book [Death of the Fox]
... from term paper to test. Which are the only two models we have when we come out of college: you write a paper or a test. So I changed it over to test ... and wrote it off the top of my head.*

—Interview (1985)

George Garrett was born in Florida and took undergraduate and graduate degrees at Princeton. His novels Do, Lord, Remember Me (1965), about an evangelist's visit to a southern town, and Death of the Fox (1971), which imagines the life of Sir Walter Raleigh, are among his most popular works. The latter is part of a trilogy of historical novels that also includes The Succession: A Novel of Elizabeth and James (1983); and Entered from the Sun (1990), a fictional biography of Christopher Marlowe.

Garrett is an astute critic and commentator on American literary life. His biography of James JONES appeared in 1984. My Silk Purse and Yours: The Publishing Scene and American Literary Art and The Sorrows Of Fat City: A Selection Of Literary Essays and Reviews were published in 1992. Some of his early short fiction is collected in A Wreath for Garibaldi, and Other Stories (1969), and his Collected Poems appeared in 1984. In 2000 Garrett retired from a forty-two-year career as a creative-writing professor, notably at the University of Virginia. In 2001 he published the nonfiction collection Going to See the Elephant: Pieces of a Writing Life. Garrett has published more than thirty books.

Source

Dillard, R. H. W. Understanding George Garrett. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Gass, William H. (1924– ) novelist

Born in Fargo, North Dakota, William H. Gass was educated at Wesleyan University before being stationed in China and Japan for three years in the navy. He resumed his studies at Kenyon College, receiving his B.A. in 1947. At Cornell he wrote a dissertation, "A Philosophical Investigation of Metaphor." There he studied under the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, whose theories of language influenced Gass's own view of literature as a self-contained universe. Gass has been a professor at Washington University in St. Louis since 1969.

Gass's first novel, Omensetter's Luck (1966), demonstrates his ability to weld literary and philosophical concerns. Both his fiction and criticism have complemented the efforts of such writers as John BARTH, Donald BARTHELME, and Thomas PYNCHON and have encouraged them to see fiction as a verbal construct, a made thing sufficient to itself, and not as a representation of the world. Gass's fiction, as he explains, is more about language and style than about the world outside the work of fiction. Gass's other novels include Willie Masters' Lonely Wife (1968) and The Tunnel (1994). He has also written short fiction and nonfiction, including Finding a Form: Essays (1996), Tests of Time (2002), and A Temple of Texts (2006).

Sources

Ammon, Theodore G. Conversations with William H. Gass. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 2003.

Hix, H. L. Understanding William H. Gass. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Kellman, Steven G., and Irving Malin, eds. Into the Tunnel. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1998.

Gates, David (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer, journalist

David Gates grew up in the Connecticut towns of Essex and Clinton. He attended Bard College and later the University of Connecticut, where he received his undergraduate degree in 1972 and later attended graduate school.

David Gates has earned acclaim for his two novels of contemporary male anxiety, Jernigan (1991) and Preston Falls (1998). Before launching his own literary career, Gates was married for a brief time to fellow writer Ann BEATTIE. While both of his novels feature cynical, middle-aged alcoholics bent on self-destruction, they are written in an acerbic style that redeems the bleakness of the subject matter. Gates has admitted that his hero is Samuel Beckett, while critics have compared his work to that of John UPDIKE, Philip ROTH, Richard FORD, and Frederick EXLEY. Gates has published a short-story collection, The Wonders of the Invisible World (1999). He became a senior writer for Newsweek magazine in 1993, covering books and music.

—Marshall Boswell

Gates, Henry Louis Jr. (1950– ) essayist, critic

Cultural tolerance comes to nothing without cultural understanding.

—Loose Canons (1992)

Henry Louis Gates Jr. was born and grew up in Keyser, West Virginia. His father worked at a paper mill by day and as a janitor by night, and his mother cleaned houses. Gates's school was integrated while he was a student, and his mother became the first black PTA member in their community. He graduated in 1968 as class valedictorian and began attending Potomac State College of West Virginia University; he soon transferred to Yale University. Gates graduated summa cum laude from Yale in 1973 and moved to England on a scholarship to Cambridge University. In 1979, after switching his concentration from history to English, Gates became the first black person to receive a Ph.D. from Cambridge. He taught at Yale from 1976 to 1985, eventually directing their Afro-American Studies department. He held professorships at Cornell University and Duke University from 1985 to 1990, and in 1990 he became the W. E. B. Du Bois Professor of the Humanities, Chairperson of the Department of African and African American Studies, and director of the W. E. B. Du Bois Institute for Afro-American Research at Harvard University.

Gates has written thirteen books and edited more than fifty books and anthologies of African American literature. His 1983 rediscovery and republication of Harriet Wilson's Our Nig, the first novel published in the United States by a black person, placed Gates at the forefront of black scholars and was the first of his many successful recoveries of lost African American narratives, particularly narratives written by women. In 2002 Gates edited and published The Bonds-woman's Narrative, by Hannah Crafts, the first known novel written by a black woman or a female former slave.

Gates considers his Africana: The Encyclopedia of the African and African American Experience (1999) to be a fulfillment of W. E. B. Du Bois's dream for an African counterpart to the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Gates's 1988 American Book Award-winning The Signifying Monkey: Towards a Theory of Afro-American Literary Criticism (1987) theorizes that black writers throw off the weight of their oppressors by first mimicking and then transforming their works.

Gates has helped establish social, artistic, academic, and political credence for the field of African American Studies. In 1998 He was awarded a National Humanities Medal, and he was elected to the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1999.

Sources

African American Literary Theory: A Reader, edited by Winston Napier. New York: New York University Press, 2000.

Gates, Henry Louis Jr. Colored People: A Memoir. New York: Knopf, 1994.

—Anna Teekell

Gay and Lesbian Literature

The concept of a distinct body of work categorized under the rubric of "gay and lesbian literature" has been a part of academic practice only since the early 1980s. The field emerged in tandem with the development of gay and lesbian studies. Both fields can trace their inception to the summer 1969 riots that followed a police raid of a New York City gay bar, the Stonewall Inn. The Gay Liberation Movement, which had been gaining strength since the 1950s, coalesced directly as a result of those riots, inaugurating a fresh intellectual interest in and awareness about the social and political characteristics of gay and lesbian culture.

One of the witnesses to those riots was Texas-born writer Edmund WHITE, whose second novel, a bildungsroman titled A Boy's Own Story (1982), became a best-seller upon its publication and has since become recognized as one the most significant works of contemporary gay and lesbian literature. White followed this success with The Beautiful Room Is Empty (1988), The Farewell Symphony (1997), and The Married Man (2000). In all three works, White depicts his gay protagonist's struggles with sexuality and identity.

David LEAVITT's short story "Territory" appeared in The New Yorker, marking the first time a story dealing openly with homosexual themes appeared in that magazine. That story was later included in Leavitt's first story collection, Family Dancing (1984).

White's and Leavitt's efforts were buttressed by important contemporaneous memoirs that helped shape the new field. African American poet Audre LORDE explored her lesbianism in her second memoir, Zami, a New Spelling of My Name (1982), a work she described as a "biomythography," that is, a work that combines elements of biography, fiction, and personal mythology. In Joan Nestle's A Restricted Country (1987), stories, essays, and speeches trace the author's experiences as a gay- and lesbian-rights activist from the 1950s to the 1980s. Paul Monette detailed losing his lover to AIDS in his memoir, Borrowed Time (1988). Monette won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD four years later for his autobiographical account of his years in the closet, Becoming a Man: A Half Life Story (1992). The poet James MERRILL described his coming-out in his memoir, A Different Person (1993).

As the field of gay and lesbian studies continued to develop in the academy throughout the 1980s and 1990s, an expanding canon of gay and lesbian literature began to take shape. Among American writers included are Walt Whitman, Henry David Thoreau, Herman Melville, Henry James, Elizabeth BISHOP, Hart Crane, Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Gertrude Stein, Tennessee Williams, Edward ALBEE, James BALDWIN, Allen GINSBERG, Truman CAPOTE, Alice WALKER, and Adrienne RICH. Some of the most significant contemporary works included are Dorothy ALLISON's Bastard Out of Carolina (1992), Lisa ALTHER's Kinflicks (1975), Rita Mae BROWN's Rubyfruit Jungle (1973), Michael CHABON's The Mysteries of Pittsburgh (1988), Michael CUNNINGHAM's THE HOURS (1998), Julia Glass's Three Junes (2002), Jim Grimsley's Dream Boy (1995), Randall Kenan's Let the Dead Bury Their Dead (1992), Leavitt's The Lost Language of Cranes (1986), Alison LURIE's The Last Resort (1998), Armistead Maupin's Tales of the City Series (1978–1991), Paul Monette's Halfway Home (1991), Paul Russell's The Coming Storm (1999), and Walker's THE COLOR PURPLE (1982), to name only a few.

Homosexual themes have long been accepted in the theatre. Tennessee Williams's Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (produced 1955) was a particularly bold postwar presentation, and, especially in the last twenty years, gay and lesbian playwrights have increasingly dominated American Drama. Major contemporary works of gay and lesbian theater include Jane Chambers's Last Summer at Bluefish Cove (produced 1980), Nilo Cruz's Anna in the Tropics (produced 2002), Margaret Edson's Wit (produced 1995), Harvey Fierstein's Torch Song Trilogy (produced 1981), Richard Greenberg's Take Me Out (produced 2002), Larry Kramer's The Normal Heart (produced 1985), Jonathan Larson's Rent (produced 1995), Terrence McNally's Love! Valour! Compassion! (produced 1994), Lanford Wilson's The Fifth of July (produced 1978), and Doug Wright's I Am My Own Wife (produced 2003). Tony Kushner's epic two-part play about the AIDS epidemic, Angels in America (produced 1991, 1993), has been recognized as one of the most significant American dramatic works of the last fifty years.

In 1971 an autonomous committee introduced the annual Gay Book Award. Fifteen years later it became an official award of The American Library Association. Beginning in 1990 the award was given in two categories—fiction and nonfiction—and by 1995 the awards committee reported that there were more than eight hundred eligible titles published that year. In 2002, after several permutations, the awards were renamed the Stonewall Book Award: Barbara Gittings Literature Award for Fiction and Stonewall Book Award: Israel Fishman Award for Nonfiction.

Sources

Jones, Sonya L. Gay and Lesbian Literature Since World War II: History and Memory. New York: Haworth Press, 1998.

McRuer, Robert. The Queer Renaissance: Contemporary American Literature and the Reinvention of Lesbian and Gay Identities. New York: New York University Press, 1997.

Stonewall Book Awards: <<http://www.ala.org/ala/glbtr/stonewall/stonewallbook/htm>> (viewed May 23, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Gibbons, Kaye (1960– ) novelist

Kaye Gibbons was born in Wilson, North Carolina, on a tobacco farm run by her father, Charles Gibbons. She was educated at North Carolina State University and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Her fiction is usually set in rural communities in North Carolina similar to the area in which she grew up and features strong-willed female characters. Her first novel, Ellen Foster (1987), along with A Virtuous Woman (1989), was chosen by Oprah Winfrey in 1997 for her television book club. Told in retrospect by its tenacious eleven-year-old title character, Ellen Foster follows Ellen's tumultuous life as she endures her mother's suicide, her father's drunken sexual advances, and the violent abuse of an unstable grandmother. Her subsequent novels—including A Cure for Dreams (1991), Sights Unseen (1995), and Divining Women (2004)—similarly celebrate the determination and wisdom of Gibbons's female heroines, most of whom speak in their own distinctive voices.

Source

DeMarr, Mary Jean. Kaye Gibbons: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Gibson, William (1914– ) playwright

Born in New York, Gibson attended City College. His published works included a collection of poems, Winter Crook (1948), and a novel, The Cobweb (1954), before he achieved acclaim with his play Two for the Seesaw (produced 1958)—the comic story of a romance between a Bronx girl and a Nebraska lawyer. The Miracle Worker (1959), based on the life of Helen Keller, was his major success. He also wrote Dinny and the Witches, a fantasy produced off-Broadway in 1959, and Golda (1978), a play about Golda Meir. In 1964 he adapted Golden Boy, a play by Clifford Odets, for the musical stage. The Seesaw Log (1959) details the life of Gibson's play on the road.

Source

Olsen, Lance. William Gibson. San Bernadino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1992.

Gilchrist, Ellen (1935– ) short-story writer, novelist

Ellen Gilchrist was born in Vicksburg, Mississippi, and grew up at the Hopedale Plantation in Grace, Mississippi. She ran away from home at the age of nineteen, married, divorced, and married again—four marriages and divorces altogether. She earned a B.A. degree from Millsaps College in 1967, but she did not begin her professional career until she was forty, working then for the Vieux Carre Courier newspaper in New Orleans. After taking a creative-writing class, Gilchrist published her first book, a collection of poetry called The Land Surveyor's Daughter (1979). But her métier proved to be the short story, in which she explored the often comic plight of privileged Southern white women. Her breakout book was In the Land of Dreamy Dreams (1981), a popular and critical success, which she followed with a novel, The Annunciation (1983). By the time she won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for her story collection, Victory over Japan (1984), she was a popular writer noted for her droll delivery of stories on National Public Radio. Her collected stories, Drunk with Love, appeared in 1986 and another collected edition, Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle, in 1989. The Blue-Eyed Buddhist was published in 1990. Three novellas are collected in I Cannot Get You Close Enough (1990). Her other novels include The Anna Papers (1988), Net of Jewels (1992), Anabasis: A Journey To The Interior (1994), Starcarbon: A Meditation On Love: A Novel (1994), and Sarah Conley: A Novel (1997). She has been compared to Carson McCULLERS, Eudora Welty, and Flannery O'CONNOR for her ability to create striking characters. Like them, she combines humor with a taste for eccentrics and tragicomic domestic stories. Of her contemporaries, she has been compared to Lee SMITH, Lee Zacharias, and Bobbie Ann MASON. Her The Age of Miracles: Stories was published in 1995; The Courts of Love: Stories, in 1996; and Flights of Angels: Stories, in 1998. She has also published Falling through Space: The Journals of Ellen Gilchrist (1987). Her memoir The Writing Life was published in 2005.

Sources

- Bauer, Margaret Donovan. The Fiction of Ellen Gilchrist. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1999.
 Hooper, Brad. The Fiction of Ellen Gilchrist: An Appreciation. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005.
 McCay, Mary A. Ellen Gilchrist. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Ginsberg, Allen (1926–1997) poet

Visions! omens! hallucinations! miracles! ecstasies! gone down the American river!

—“Howl” (1956)

Born in Newark, New Jersey, Allen Ginsberg attended public schools in Paterson, New Jersey, and went on to Columbia University, where he was expelled in 1943 for apparently writing an anti-Semitic obscenity on a classroom window and for criticizing the university president. He worked at odd jobs, then was readmitted to Columbia, graduating in 1948 but staying on to do graduate work there.

In the late 1940s Ginsberg began to experience mystical visions of the poet William Blake, which seem to have contributed to his search for an alternative to conventional standards of behavior and belief. He began to travel to the West Coast and to Mexico, making friends with such writers as Lawrence FERLINGHETTI and becoming part of what came to be called the “beat generation” (see BEATS), a term applied to writers who were disenchanted with the conformity of 1950s America, critical of the status quo, and who prized the creativity of the societal dropout.

Ginsberg made his mark as a poet with “HOWL,” a lament for the lost generation of the 1950s, a group of younger writers who did not fit conventional roles. Ginsberg was openly gay in a time before such meaning of the word and way of life came into common parlance. He used drugs, especially marijuana, and celebrated poets like William Carlos Williams and Walt Whitman, who embraced America in all of its diversity and creativity. Indeed, many of Ginsberg's opinions, his style of dress, and political views were later seen as precursors of the 1960s counterculture.

Ginsberg favored Whitman's long, prose-like poetic line and free verse. Although some of Ginsberg's poetry angrily protests American culture, much of his work is also playful and cheerful—as in his amusing fantasy that he spots Whitman in “A Supermarket in California.” The titles of Ginsberg's poems can give the impression that he was a casual, offhand poet, and yet he was deeply read in world literature and wanted poetry to reflect not only this world consciousness but also poetry's connection to everyday life and to the language people actually speak. Among his important poetry collections are Kaddish and Other Poems (1961), innovative poems that draw on his Jewish heritage, Reality Sandwiches (1963), and The Fall of America (1972).

Unlike some of the poets of the beat generation, Ginsberg continued to write excellent poetry well beyond the 1950s. His Collected Poems 1947–1980 was published in 1984. Allen Verbatim, Lectures on Poetry, Politics, Consciousness appeared in 1974.

Sources

- Miles, Barry. Ginsberg: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989.
 Morgan, Bill. The Response to Allen Ginsberg, 1926–1994: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
 Schumacher, Michael. Dharma Lion: A Critical Biography of Allen Ginsberg. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.
 Schumacher. Family Business: Selected Letters between a Father and Son. New York: Bloomsbury, 2001.

Gioia, Dana (1950– ) poet, essayist

Dana Gioia is a poet and essayist who has become both famous and controversial for his reaffirmation of traditional form and his rejection of free verse. He was born in Hawthorne, California, a suburb outside of Los Angeles, and he received his B.A., in 1973 from Stanford University. Two years later he earned an M.A. in literature from Harvard University, where he came under the tutelage of Elizabeth BISHOP and others. Rejecting academia as a vocation, Gioia entered the Stanford Business School in 1977 and, after completing his master's degree, took a job with General Foods, where he stayed until 1992. After publishing a series of chapbooks, he brought out his first major poetry collection, Daily Horoscope, in 1986. The following year his work appeared in David Lehman's Ecstatic Occasions, Expedient Forms (1987), thus allying him with the so-called New Formalists. His other collections are The Gods of Winter (1991) and Interrogations at Noon (2001), the latter of which won the 2002 NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Poetry. His widely read 1992 book of essays about contemporary poetry, Can Poetry Matter? was a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK CRITIC'S CIRCLE AWARD. Gioia is the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts.

Sources

Dana Gioia Online: <<http://www.danagioia.net/index.html>> (viewed July 10, 2007).

McPhillips, Robert. "Reading the New Formalists," Sewanee Review, 97 (Winter 1989): 73–96.

—Marshall Boswell

Giovanni, Nikki (1943– ) poet

*We are strong enough to stand tall tearlessly
We are brave enough to bend to cry
And sad enough to know we must laugh again
We are Virginia Tech*

—"Chant—Poem" (2007)

Yolande Cornelia "Nikki" Giovanni Jr. was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1943. Educated at Fisk University (B.A., 1967), she embraced and supported the BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT of the 1960s. Her first two collections of poetry, Black Feeling, Black Talk (1967) and Black Judgment (1968), explored African American identity and angrily responded to the assassination of black leaders, calling blacks—black men, in particular—to violent action. Beginning with the birth of her son in 1969, Giovanni's poetry became much more personal, though no less blunt. Her subsequent work, marked by sharply direct expression and plainspoken humor, explored the relationships between men and women and showed gradually broadening social concerns, though always expressed from the perspective of a black woman. Love Poems was published in 1997, followed by the collections Blues for All the Changes: New Poems (1999) and The Collected Poetry of Nikki Giovanni: 1968–1998 (2003), which includes the first five of Giovanni's fourteen volumes of poetry. She has often written for children, beginning with her sixth collection, Spin a Soft Black Song (1971). Her ninth volume of children's poetry, The Grasshopper and the Ant, was published in 2007. In 2002 Giovanni recorded The Nikki Giovanni Poetry Collection, audio versions of her poems. She teaches creative writing at Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University.

Source

Fowler, Virginia C. Nikki Giovanni. New York: Twayne, 1999.

—Tod Marshall

Go Tell It on the Mountain by James Baldwin (New York: Knopf, 1953) novel

JAMES BALDWIN's first novel, set in Harlem in the mid 1930s, focuses on John Grimes, a young African American boy who tries to reconcile his spiritual aspirations with his fleshly desires as he struggles to connect with his strict, religious stepfather.

Told in three parts using flashbacks, the main action takes place on John's fourteenth birthday. Returning home from a movie—forbidden in his strictly religious household—John finds his brother Roy bleeding from a knife wound. Stung by the deference his imperious stepfather shows toward Roy, John escapes to the family's church, the Temple of the Fire Baptized, where he finds his handsome youth minister, Elisha, toward whom John has confused feelings. Later that same evening, John has an ecstatic religious vision. Upon waking, he turns to his stepfather, hoping that this religious conversion will heal the rift, but Gabriel rejects him once again. Years after its publication, Baldwin described Go Tell It on the Mountain as a novel "about what happens to you if you're afraid to love anybody."

Source

Harris, Trudier, ed. New Essays on Go Tell It on the Mountain. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

—Marshall Boswell

Godwin, Gail (1937– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Birmingham, Alabama, Gail Godwin was educated at Peace Junior College in Raleigh, North Carolina, and at the University of North Carolina. After obtaining her bachelor's degree in 1959, she worked at the Miami Herald and in London, and then returned to the United States to obtain an M.A. and Ph.D. in English (1971) from the University of Iowa. Her early novels, The Perfectionists (1970), Glass People (1972), and The Odd Woman (1974), center on women who feel oppressed by their husbands. Her later fiction—notably Violet Clay (1978),

A Mother and Two Daughters (1982), and The Finishing School (1984)—also portray women who are determined to establish their autonomy. Godwin creates enormous tensions between her characters' will (or lack thereof) and the conditions (the fate, the destiny) of their lives. Godwin is constantly questioning the extent to which women can liberate themselves—or even understand clearly what it is they want. Her later novels include Evensong (1999), Evenings at Five (2004), and Queen of the Underworld (2007). A best-selling author, Godwin has also won critical acclaim for her work. Her short stories, frequently anthologized, have been collected in Dream Children (1977) and Mr. Bedford and the Muses (1983).

Sources

Gail Godwin: <<http://www.gailgodwin.com/index.htm>> (viewed February 2, 2007).

Hill, Jane. Gail Godwin. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Xie, Lihong. The Evolving Self in the Novels of Gail Godwin. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.

Gold, Herbert (1924– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, Herbert Gold attended Columbia University, served four years in the army, and then resumed his studies, graduating from Columbia in 1946. He received his M.A. from Columbia in 1948 and then attended the Sorbonne on a Fulbright Fellowship. His first novel, Birth of a Hero, appeared in 1951. Gold is perhaps best known for Fathers: A Novel in the Form of a Memoir (1967), which recounts his family life and presents a portrait of his Russian Jewish immigrant father. Therefore Be Bold (1960) draws on Gold's experience to tell the story of a Jewish adolescent in the Midwest. Family (1981) pursues the immigrant experience further. Gold has published some twenty novels and several collections of short stories and essays. His Bohemia: Where Art, Angst, Love, and Strong Coffee Meet appeared in 1993.

The Goldbug Variations by Richard Powers (New York: Morrow, 1991) novel

Richard Powers's epic third novel is, at one level, a love story: Frank Todd, a graduate student of art history, meets and falls for Jan O'Deigh, a brilliant and underutilized research librarian. Yet, the novel is also an exploration of the connections between DNA, computer intelligence, and the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. This link is formed by the character of Stuart Ressler, a molecular biologist who, according to the novel, nearly cracked the genetic code before he was outdone by Watson and Crick—and who, thirty years later, is working the graveyard shift as a computer programmer. The novel interweaves an account of Todd and O'Deigh's love affair and their budding friendship with Ressler with the story of Ressler's race to crack the genetic code, an effort undermined by his doomed love for a member of his research team, Jeanette Koss. These two narrative strands are woven together in a double-helix design that echoes the structure of DNA, while Powers has modeled the novel's thirty chapters upon the structure of Bach's piano masterpiece, The Goldberg Variations, which consists of a four-note aria (similar to the four peptide bonds that constitute the DNA code) followed by thirty variations. In its self-conscious formal design and overloaded erudition, the novel recalls the work of William GADDIS and Thomas PYNCHON. Powers has been widely praised for his effort to forge an imaginative link between science and the arts.

Source

Dewey, Joseph. Understanding Richard Powers. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

The Golden Apples by Eudora Welty (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1949) story collection

Eudora Welty's The Golden Apples is a story cycle about the people of the fictional town of Morgana, Mississippi, and the impact upon their lives of a philandering town lothario named King MacLain. An example of Southern Modernism, the book combines the story-cycle strategy of James Joyce's Dubliners (1914) with the mythic method introduced in his Ulysses (1922). Rather than arrange her stories chronologically, Welty has organized the collection so that it evokes a musical composition: the stories begin with an introduction, or overture, followed by a series of long movements in which various themes are taken up and developed, concluding with a recapitulation of all that has come before.

The collection consists of seven stories; three of them—"June Recital," "Moon Lake," and "The Wanderers"—are novella length. In the opening story, a dramatic monologue titled "Shower of Gold," Miss Katie Rainey tells the history of King MacLain. "June Recital" introduces Katie's daughter, Virgie, a restless musical prodigy who longs to escape Morgana. "Moon Lake" recounts the budding friendship between two respectable daughters of the town and a charismatic orphan named Easter. Two linked stories, "The Whole World Knows" and "Music From Spain," touch upon the adult lives of Ran and Eugene MacLain, respectively, while the concluding story, "The Wanderers," returns the collection's focus to Virgie Rainey, whose mother has passed away and left her free to escape Morgana.

The book includes mythic parallels through invocations of Zeus and Hera (King and his albino wife, Snowdie) and Atalanta (Virgie) and the golden apples—and explores the myth of Perseus and the Medusa, the latter of which serves as the book's emblem for the female artist calcified by provincial mores. Musical borrowings in the book include the four-movement sonata structure of the appropriately titled "June Recital" and Eugene MacLain's flamenco dance through San Francisco in "Music from Spain."

Source

Mark, Rebecca. The Dragon's Blood: Feminist Intertextuality in Eudora Welty's The Golden Apples. Oxford: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.

—Marshall Boswell

"A Good Man Is Hard to Find" (1955) short story

In "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," Flannery O'CONNOR offers a vivid illustration of her conception of the grotesque via a characteristic exploration of Christianity in a secular world. The plot of the story follows a family's brief vacation, during which the family car is crashed, and the father, mother, three children, and grandmother are all killed by escaped convicts. The characterization and plot details are hyperbolically sketched by O'Connor so as to provide a comic-bookish backdrop to the grandmother's confrontation with her own religious conviction.

From the comic foreshadowing of the family's death ("Toomsboro" is one of the towns through which they drive) to the selfish, superficial, and supposedly "ladylike" grandmother to the misbehaving "modern" children, O'Connor forces the reader to realize that the story is both a realistic tableau rife with details from the actual world and an overblown morality play where good and evil clash for human souls.

Utilizing The Misfit, the leader of the escapees and one of O'Connor's most memorable characters, O'Connor shows the reader how the grandmother's superficial religiosity can be tested, as she forces the elderly woman into what O'Connor has called an "unlike gesture": just before he kills her—in fact, as further motivation to kill her—the grandmother reaches out to comfort the deranged man, and through that action, she attains grace. Bizarre, Gothic, and darkly humorous, "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" is one of O'Connor's most compelling short stories.

Sources

Asals, Frederick, ed. "A Good Man Is Hard to Find": Women Writers: Texts and Contexts. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1993.

O'Connor, Flannery. A Good Man Is Hard to Find. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1955.

—Tod Marshall

Goodbye, Columbus and Five Short Stories by Philip Roth (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1959) novella and stories

Published when Philip ROTH was twenty-seven, Goodbye, Columbus earned its author his first of two NATIONAL BOOK

AWARDS and ignited a controversy within the American Jewish community that has continued to fuel Roth's work after more than two dozen novels. In the title piece, Neil Klugman, a working-class Jewish college graduate who works in a public library and lives with his aunt and uncle in Newark, meets and falls in love with an affluent Radcliffe student named Brenda Patimkin (whose brother had been an athlete at Ohio State University in Columbus, Ohio). Through the course of Roth's acutely observed, tightly constructed story, the Patimkins come to represent the entire burgeoning class of Jewish suburbanites who, only one generation removed from their immigrant forebears, have begun to assimilate into what Roth depicts as the crass, bland banality of Protestant America. The five remaining stories stage similar clashes between ethnic solidarity and the desire for assimilation. In "Conversion of the Jews," a twelve-year-old boy named Ozzie Freedman asks an oppressive rabbi named Binder why God couldn't "let a woman have a baby without intercourse," while in "Defender of the Faith," a Jewish sergeant named Marx finds himself torn between his allegiance to the Army and the dishonest demands of a fellow Jew in his charge. The latter story, when it first appeared in THE NEW YORKER, incited the wrath of Jewish leaders all over the country, many of whom accused Roth of anti-Semitism and ethnic self-hatred. A decade later, Roth addressed those charges with the publication of PORTNOY'S COMPLAINT.

—Marshall Boswell

Source

Lee, Hermione. Philip Roth. New York: Methuen, 1982.

Goodman, Paul (1911–1972) social critic, psychoanalyst, novelist, playwright, poet

Born in New York, Paul Goodman earned his B.A. in 1931 at the City College of New York and completed his dissertation at the University of Chicago in 1940; asked to leave the university because of "nonconformist sexual behaviour," he did not formally receive his Ph.D. until 1954. In 1947 he published Communitas: Means of Livelihood and Ways of Life, a book about city planning. In 1951 he published Gestalt Therapy, based on his own work as a psychoanalyst. A nontraditional thinker who often attacked conventional American institutions, Goodman won his greatest audience with a polemical book, Growing Up Absurd: Problems of Youth in the Organized System (1960), one of the key works of the 1960s, which argued for a complete reformation of the way American youth were educated and employed. Although he was best known for his nonfiction, Goodman also published fiction, including The Empire City (1959), a novel that charted the changes in American society from the 1930s to the 1950s. His other novels include The Grand Piano (1942), The Dead of Spring (1950), and Making Do (1963). Goodman also published plays, including The Young Disciple (1965); a collection of short stories, The Break-Up of Our Camp (1949); and his Collected Poems (1974).

Sources

Parisi, Peter, ed. Artist of the Actual: Essays on Paul Goodman. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1986.

Widmer, Kingsley. Paul Goodman. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Gordon, Mary (1949– ) novelist

The child of Catholic parents, Mary Gordon grew up on Long Island, New York. She was educated at Barnard College (B.A., 1971) and Syracuse University (M.A., 1973) and taught at several colleges before becoming a professor of English at Barnard. Her novels often feature religious and feminist themes. She is still perhaps best known for her novel, Final Payments (1978), which won the Kafka Prize. Her other noteworthy fiction includes The Company of Women (1981), Men and Angels (1985), and The Other Side (1989). She is also the author of Good Boys and Dead Girls: And Other Essays (1991); and two collections of short fiction: Temporary Shelter: Short Stories (1987) and Spending: A Utopian Divertimento (1998). Her eighth novel, The Pearl (2005), is about a Catholic mother and her rebellious daughter. The Stories of Mary Gordon was published in 2007. She has written two volumes of memoirs: The Shadow Man: A Daughter's Search for Her Father (1996), about her discovery that her father was Jewish, and Seeing through Places: Reflections on Geography and Identity (2000), a collection of eight autobiographical essays.

Source

Kessler-Harris, Alice, and William McBrien, eds. Faith of a Woman Writer. New York: Greenwood Press, 1988.

Grau, Shirley Ann (1929– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in New Orleans and educated at Tulane University, Shirley Ann Grau has been described as a regionalist concerned with racial issues. She won a Pulitzer Prize for her novel The Keepers of the House (1964), which dealt with interracial marriage, politics, and the Ku Klux Klan. Grau has written novels that track the lives of generations of Louisianians in New Orleans and in its outlying areas and islands, including The Hard Blue Sky (1958), The House on Coliseum Street (1961), The Condor Passes (1971), and Evidence of Love (1977). Her short stories are collected in The Black Prince (1955), The Wind Shifting West (1973), and Nine Women (1985). In the novel Roadwalkers (1994) she portrays the lives of African American women and the subject of homelessness. Her Selected Stories was published in 2003.

Sources

Kissel, Susan S. Moving On: The Heroines of Shirley Ann Grau, Anne Tyler, and Gail Godwin. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1996.

Schlueter, Paul. Shirley Ann Grau. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Gravity's Rainbow by Thomas Pynchon (New York: Viking, 1973) novel

A Postmodern American novel (see POSTMODERNISM), Gravity's Rainbow is a vast epic set in England, France, and Occupied Germany during the final years of World War II.

Conjoining subjects such as rocket science and Pavlovian psychology with cartoonish humor and slapstick comedy, the book has an intellectual reach and structural complexity that have been compared to Herman Melville's Moby-Dick and James Joyce's Ulysses. When Gravity's Rainbow first appeared in 1973, it became an unexpected best-seller, and largely on the strength of its critical reception; the book earned Thomas PYNCHON the 1974 NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Fiction. However, it proved to be a challenging novel for many general readers.

At the novel's center is Tyrone Slothrop, an American lieutenant who suspects that, through coinciding geographic locations, his sexual experiences are somehow predicting landing sites of the German V-2 rocket. Surrounding Slothrop as he moves from London and into the lawless "zone" of underground black markets and drug smugglers is an enormous cast—some four hundred characters—of scientists, generals, psychologists, prostitutes, and other figures, all of whom are caught up in the invisible system of wartime control, which Pynchon refers to, vaguely, as Them. In place of a linear plot, the novel outlines a series of seemingly unrelated episodes that eventually begin to connect and interlock in complex and unexpected ways.

Connecting all of the disparate strands is Pynchon's overriding characterization of the war itself as a shadow play that hides an invisible but palpable nexus of control. The phallic rocket remains the novel's most important symbol, localizing Slothrop's paranoia, the quest for global power, and the whole panorama of sex and death that Pynchon identifies as the inspiration for war.

Since its publication, the novel has inspired dozens of scholarly works, hundreds of essays, and several readers' guides. Meanwhile, its author has remained mysterious, hidden from the public eye.

Sources

Weisenburger, Steven. A Gravity's Rainbow Companion: Sources and Contexts for Pynchon's Novel. Athens, Georgia: University of Georgia Press, 1988.

Moore, Thomas. The Style of Connectedness: Gravity's Rainbow and Thomas Pynchon. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.

—Marshall Boswell

Grisham, John (1955– ) novelist

John Grisham, the most commercially successful novelist of the 1990s, was born in Jonesboro, Arkansas, and attended college at Mississippi State University, where he majored in accounting. After receiving his law degree from the University of Mississippi in 1981, he spent a decade working as a criminal defense attorney in Southaven, Mississippi. Although his first novel, A Time To Kill (1989), saw poor sales, Grisham conceived a second book, The Firm (1991), by taking notes on what books were topping the best-seller lists. The story of an idealistic lawyer who gets hired by a corrupt and deadly Memphis law firm, The Firm was the first of seventeen straight number-one best-sellers, many of which have been adapted into major motion pictures. Grisham's novels, almost all of which are set in the Mississippi Delta, examine complex legal issues through Hollywood-influenced storytelling. His other well-known legal thrillers include The Pelican Brief (1992), The Client (1993), The Chamber (1994), The Rainmaker (1995), The Runaway Jury (1996), The Brethren (2000), The Summons (2002), and The Broker (2005). His first book of nonfiction, The Innocent Man (2006), is about a man on death row proven innocent by DNA testing. Grisham's books have been translated into more than thirty languages.

Sources

Pringle, Mary Beth. Revisiting John Grisham: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007.

Runyon, Randolph Paul. "John Grisham: Obsessive Imagery," in Southern Writers at Century's End, edited by Jeffrey J. Folks and James A. Perkins. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1997, pp. 44–59.

—Marshall Boswell

Guard of Honor by James Gould Cozzens

(New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1948) novel

Based on Major Cozzens's service on the staff of General H. H. Arnold, commander of the air force during World War II, Guard of Honor is the best American novel of the war; but it does not deal with combat. Although written by a civilian in uniform, Guard of Honor does not attack the military establishment. Cozzens makes the case for the patriotism and professionalism in the air force and its officers. Set at Ocanara Airbase in Florida, the novel examines the testing of General Bus Beal during seventy-two hours in 1943. The principal problem Beal faces is the threatened mutiny by black officers who have been denied admission to the base officers' club. The central intelligence is Colonel Norman Ross, Beal's troubleshooter, a judge in civilian life who formulates the deontological code of conduct for Cozzens's hero: "Downheartedness was no man's part. A man must stand up and do the best he can with what there is." Ross achieves a compromise that restores order.

Cozzens's purpose was to convey that "what I felt to be the important meaning of this particular human experience, was its immensity and its immense complexity." Guard of Honor is complexly structured and utilizes flashbacks to provide background on the characters and to enlarge the scope of the novel. The novel was awarded the Pulitzer Prize.

Source

Cozzens, James Gould. A Time of War: Air Force Diaries and Pentagon Memos, 1943–45, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Columbia, S.C. & Bloomfield Hills, Mich.: Bruccoli Clark, 1984.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Gunther, John (1901–1970) journalist

John Gunther made his reputation with his "Inside" travel books, well-informed accounts of life in Africa, Europe, South America, and other continents, including Inside U.S.A. (1947), an account of Gunther's thirteen-month trip across the country during which he interviewed some twenty people a day. Gunther's best-known work is his memoir, Death Be Not Proud (1949), about the death of his teenage son. Gunther was known for combining news reporting with travel and history writing. A Fragment of Autobiography was published in 1962.

Source

Cuthbertson, Ken. Inside: The Biography of John Gunther. Chicago: Bonus Books, 1992.

Guterson, David (1956– ) novelist, short-story writer, journalist

David Guterson was born in Seattle, and he received his B.A. and his M.A. from the University of Washington (in 1978 and 1982, respectively). Guterson is the author of the best-selling novel Snow Falling on Cedars (1994). This lyrical novel about a racially charged murder is set in the misty landscape of the Pacific Northwest. The book won the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. Before Snow Falling on Cedars made him a best-selling author, Guterson had already published a story collection, The Country Ahead of Us, the Country Behind (1989), and a book-length defense of homeschooling, Family Matters: Why Homeschooling Makes Sense (1992). His subsequent novels include East of the Mountains (1998) and Our Lady of the Forest (2003), about a young girl who claims to have visions of the Virgin Mary.

Source

Haytock, Jennifer. David Guterson's Snow Falling on Cedars: A Reader's Guide. New York: Continuum, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

Guthrie, A. B. (1901–1991) novelist, short-story writer

Alfred Bertram Guthrie was born in Indiana and grew up in Montana, becoming a regionalist writer whose territory encompassed a good part of the West. He earned a degree in journalism from the University of Montana in 1923. The Big Sky (1947), a novel set in the 1830s and 1840s about a mountain man from Kentucky who travels west and lives with the Indians, is perhaps his best-known work. Guthrie won a Pulitzer Prize for The Way West (1949), a novel about a pioneer trip from Missouri to Oregon in 1846. The Big It (1960) collects his stories. He also wrote an autobiography, The Blue Hen's Chick (1965), and the screenplay for one of Hollywood's most famous westerns, Shane (1953).

Source

Ford, Thomas W. A. B. Guthrie. Austin, Tex.: Steck-Vaughn, 1968.

Half-Way Covenant

The Half-Way Covenant was an agreement between church members and congregations that allowed for less stringent qualifications for church membership. Puritans who arrived in NEW ENGLAND during the 1620s formed a community of “visible saints” operating within a covenant of grace, and allowed only communicants who had publicly professed their faith and their children into the church as full members. The second-generation, however, was less forthcoming with public testimonials of conversion, and communicants felt that if this trend were left unchecked, it would undermine church memberships, which also carried voting rights. In Boston in 1662, a compromise, drafted by Richard MATHER and approved by the synod, allowed the grandchildren of full members to be baptized, despite their own parents’ unregenerate status: “if a person born and baptized in the church did not receive faith he could still continue his membership and have his own children baptized, by leading a life free from scandal, by learning and professing the doctrines of Christianity, and by making a voluntary submission to God and His church.” Thus, even if baptized parents failed to apply for membership by providing public conversion narratives, their children could still be baptized and potentially achieve partial membership by renewing or “owning” their baptismal covenant. Critics of this compromise measure derisively called it the “half-way covenant,” for its apparent relaxing of church membership requirements.

Source

Morgan, Edmund Sears. Visible Saints: The History of a Puritan Idea. New York: New York University Press, 1963.

Hall, Prince (circa 1735–1807) civic leader

Prince Hall was a civic leader in Boston who advanced the causes of education, representation, and freedom for African Americans. An advocate and activist, Hall was born around 1735 in an unknown location and lived in Boston in the 1740s as a slave to William Hall, a leather dresser. Drawing upon biblical examples and building on PATRIOT rhetoric, Prince Hall advocated equal treatment of blacks and the end to slavery in Massachusetts. On March 6, 1775 Hall and fourteen fellow blacks were initiated into the Irish Military Lodge, No. 441; in 1784, Hall founded the first black chapter of Freemasons in America, African Lodge No. 459, which was officially chartered in April 1787. Hall’s close friend John MARRANT was one of the chaplains. The African Lodge was renamed Prince Hall Grand Lodge in honor of Hall after his death on December 4, 1807.

Hall was manumitted on April 9, 1770, after which he worked as a leather dresser, caterer, and merchant. He was married twice, to Sarah Ritchie from 1763 to 1770, and in 1778 to Flora Gibb. His notable works include an anti-slavery petition, To the Honorable Council & House of Representatives for the State of Massachusetts-Bay in General Court Assembled January 13th 1777 and a speech to fellow black freemasons, A Charge, Delivered to the African Lodge, June 24, 1797, at Menotomy.

Sources

Brooks, Joanna. American Lazarus: Religion and the Rise of African-American and Native American Literatures. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Brooks. “Prince Hall, Freemasonry, and Genealogy,” African American Review, 34 (2000): 197–216.

Wallace, Maurice. "Are We Men?": Prince Hall, Martin Delany, and the Masculine Ideal in Black Freemasonry, 1775–1865," American Literary History, 9 (1997): 396–424.

Hamilton, Alexander (1712–1756) physician, writer

Dr. Alexander Hamilton, one of the founding members of the literary group the TUESDAY CLUB, was a central figure in the cultural life of eighteenth-century colonial Maryland. Just as important, he left behind a body of work that both represents the social mores of his time and provides detailed, if irreverent, glimpses into life in the colonies.

Born in Edinburgh, Scotland, Hamilton was the son of William Hamilton, a professor of divinity and principal at the University of Edinburgh, and Mary Robertson. He received his medical degree in 1737 and left for Maryland in 1738 to establish a medical practice. In 1739 he joined the Ugly Club of Annapolis, the forerunner to the Tuesday Club, and in 1743 was elected common councilman of Annapolis, a position he held until his death.

By 1744 Hamilton was showing symptoms of tuberculosis. To improve his health, he embarked on a round-trip journey from Annapolis, Maryland to York, Maine from May 30 to September 27. This 1,624-mile excursion resulted in his first literary effort, the Itinerarium (first published in 1907), a travel narrative valued for its detailed observations of customs and habits, along with descriptions of architecture, plants, and physical surroundings. The witty Hamilton offered candid descriptions of northerners and their environment. On July 10 he made his way into Long Island and had this to say about some of the residents:

We had no sooner sat down, when there came in a band of the town politicians in short jackets and trousers, being probably curious to know who them strangers were who had newly arrived in town. Among the rest was a fellow with a worsted cap and great black fists. They styled him doctor. Flat [Platt] told me he had been a shoemaker in town, and was a notable fellow at his trade, but happening two years ago to cure an old woman of a pestilent mortal disease, he thereby acquired the character of a physician, was applied to from all quarters, and finding the practice of physic a more profitable business than cobbling, he laid aside his awls and leather, got himself some gallipots [small vessels used to hold medicines], and instead of cobbling of soales fell to cobbling of human bodies.

Upon returning to Maryland, Hamilton aided in the creation of the Tuesday Club of Annapolis, which for a time included Benjamin FRANKLIN as an honorary member. Hamilton recorded the club's minutes and eventually compiled "Record of the Tuesday Club," which he revised from 1752 until his death. It appeared in print as The History of the Ancient and Honorable Tuesday Club (first published in 1990), a three-volume, 1,900-page fictionalized account of the club's proceedings written under the pseudonym of Loquacious Scribble, Esq. The book is of interest primarily for its reflection of the issues that vexed colonial Americans, primarily the colonial concern with the protection of liberty through personal virtue. It also includes the club's antics and playful activities.

Hamilton's other publications include periodical pieces, which, also in the guise of humor, deal with concerns about human vices and their ultimate consequences. Among these pieces were the aptly titled "A Humorous Attack against Idleness," and "A Humorous Defense of Luxury" (both published in 1746). Hamilton published A Defence of Dr. Thomson's Discourse on the Preparation of the Body for the Small Pox (1751), which defended inoculation as a prevention for the disease.

The Tuesday Club ceased its meetings just before Hamilton's death from tuberculosis in May 1756.

Works

Hamilton, Alexander. A Defence of Dr. Thomson's Discourse on the Preparation of the Body for the Small Pox. Philadelphia, Pa.: Printed by William Bradford, 1751; Early American Imprints, 6689.

Hamilton. Hamilton's Itinerarium; Being a Narrative of a Journey from Annapolis, Maryland, through Delaware, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts and New Hampshire, from May to September, 1744, by Doctor Alexander Hamilton, edited by Albert Bushnell Hart. Saint Louis, Mo.: Printed only for private distribution by W. K. Bixby, 1907; republished as Gentleman's Progress: The Itinerarium of Dr. Alexander Hamilton, 1744, edited by Carl Bridenbaugh. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1948.

Hamilton. The History of the Ancient and Honorable Tuesday Club, 3 volumes, edited by Robert Micklus. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.

Sources

Imbarrato, Susan. "Genteel Confusion: Reading Class Structure in Dr. Alexander Hamilton's Itinerarium," in Finding Colonial Americas: Essays Honoring J. A. Leo Lemay, edited by Carla Mulford and David S. Shields. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2001, 153–169.

Micklus, Robert. The Comic Genius of Dr. Alexander Hamilton. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.

Hamilton, Alexander (circa 1755–1804) statesman

Why has government been instituted at all? Because the passions of men will not conform to the dictates of reason and justice without constraint.

—The Federalist, 11 (1787)

Alexander Hamilton rose from humble beginnings to become the first secretary of the treasury. His notable contribution to American literature was as a polemicist, collaborating with James MADISON and John JAY on the essays known as The Federalist Papers (later published as THE FEDERALIST), which helped ensure New York ratification of the new Constitution. These seventy-seven essays—eighty-five were later published—ran in various New York newspapers from October 7, 1787 to April, 1788. In them, Hamilton stressed the need for competing interests to be coordinated under a strong central government, urging readers to see

The utility of the Union to your political prosperity—The insufficiency of the present Confederation to preserve that Union—The necessity of a government at least equally energetic with the one proposed, to the attainment of this object—The conformity of the proposed Constitution to your new State constitution—and lastly, The additional security, which its adoption will afford to the preservation of that species of government, to liberty, and to property.

Hamilton allayed fears that a strong central government might suppress personal freedoms by emphasizing that the new Constitution sanctioned a strict separation of powers among the branches of the government.

Born about 1755 in the British West Indies to Rachel Fawcett Lavien and her lover James Hamilton, Alexander Hamilton began life with the stigma of illegitimacy. When his mother died in 1768, young Alexander and his brother were left in poverty. Fortunately, Hamilton showed a precocious talent for business and distinguished himself in the local trading firm of Beekman and Cruger. With Nicholas Cruger's help Hamilton immigrated to the British mainland colonies in 1772, spending a year in New Jersey to complete his college preparatory schooling. Within a year he had enrolled in King's College (later Columbia University). Here Hamilton immediately entered the newspaper debates over the new British taxation policies. Responding in 1774 to a PAMPHLET denouncing the impending boycott of British goods, he anonymously published A Full Vindication of the Measures of the Congress. His opponent, the Reverend Samuel Seabury, issued a rebuttal, prompting Hamilton to reply with The Farmer Refuted in February 1775. In this essay Hamilton boldly argued that Parliament had no right to regulate colonial trade, because the colonists were not represented in that governing body. The colonists, he contended, were not only exercising their constitutional rights, they also were protecting their material self-interests. New Yorkers were amazed to learn that the radical champion of the Congress was a young college student. His reputation as a spokesman for American interests was established immediately.

In 1776, with war declared, Hamilton organized his own artillery battalion. After his company fought alongside General George WASHINGTON in the battles of Trenton and Princeton in December 1776 and January 1777, Washington invited the young officer to serve as his aide-de-camp. Hamilton served as a lieutenant colonel on Washington's staff for the next four years, during which time he condemned the war profiteering of Maryland congressman Samuel Chase (1741–1811). He also frequently criticized the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION for poorly dictating administration of the war and for failing to give Congress the power to raise enough money to supply the army. In 1780 Hamilton wrote to Congressman James Duane (1733–1797) suggesting that a convention be called to revise the Articles and establish a more efficient, empowered federal government. This theme reappeared in a series of six essays by Hamilton that appeared in the New York Packet written under the name "The Continentalist." Here Hamilton called for an increase in the power of the Federal government over the states and for the centralized regulation of trade and commerce.

On December 14, 1780, Hamilton married Elizabeth Schuyler, daughter of General Philip Schuyler, a major landowner and political force in New York state politics. In February 1781 Hamilton resigned from Washington's staff, and by 1782 he had completed an intensive study of the law that allowed him to pass the bar in July of the same year. He served briefly in the Continental Congress, resigning in 1783 to set up his legal practice in New York City. He immediately became active in the business, civic, and political affairs of the city, serving as the driving force in the creation of the Bank of New York in 1784 and joining John Jay to found the Society for the Manumission of Slaves.

In 1786 Hamilton served as a New York delegate to the Annapolis convention, a gathering called to discuss possibilities for trade among the states. Plans for a convention to reevaluate and amend the Articles of Confederation also came out of the Annapolis meeting. Hamilton had been instrumental in orchestrating this call for the Philadelphia convention. He continued on as one of the strongest proponents for the new Constitution. President George Washington, a longtime mentor and friend to Hamilton, invited him to serve as the secretary of the treasury in September 1789. As the nation's new chief financial officer, Hamilton lost no time in submitting to the House of Representatives a series of proposals designed to put the United States economy on a sound footing.

The first of these papers, The Support of the Public Credit (January 1790) urged that government securities be redeemed at face value, without discriminating between original purchasers of those securities and speculators. Although many of the original holders of the securities had been forced to sell their investments at a loss, Hamilton argued that market principles must apply. Hamilton also insisted that the federal government take over the war debts of the states. Both proposals drew heated opposition in the House from forces led by James MADISON, Hamilton's former collaborator on The Federalist Papers. Fearing the plan might fail, Hamilton agreed to the location of the nation's capitol on the Potomac in exchange for southern support of assumption and redemption.

In December 1790 Hamilton submitted The Second Report on the Further Provisions Necessary for Establishing Public Credit, which called for the creation of a national bank. Madison, representing agrarian interests, argued that the government had no power to create such an institution, but the bill passed Congress and was signed by Washington in February 1791. Hamilton had written his Report on a Mint in January of that year, establishing the national mint in Philadelphia. The final piece of his economic program was his Report on the Subject of Manufactures, also presented in 1791, in which he argued that domestic manufacturing should be financed through public duties in order to increase the national wealth. The growth of the manufacturing sector, said Hamilton, would benefit farmers as well, as these new enterprises would begin "creating, in some instances, a new, and securing, in all, a more certain and steady demand for the surplus value of the soil." This time, Congress refused to support Hamilton and his vision of rapid economic growth and change.

On January 31, 1795, Hamilton resigned from office. He continued to be a voice in American politics, criticizing Thomas JEFFERSON and his allies for their pro-French stance in the late 1790s, supporting John JAY's controversial 1794 treaty that preserved peace with Great Britain, and calling for military preparedness in the face of a possible war with France. He played a critical role in preventing Aaron Burr from becoming president in 1800, throwing his support behind his old foe Jefferson, whom he considered honest if misguided. Hostility between Burr and Hamilton did not diminish after 1800. Hamilton consistently attacked Burr's character and his political motives, and in 1804 he destroyed Burr's gubernatorial chances in New York. The angry Burr challenged his nemesis to a duel and, on July 11, 1804, mortally wounded Hamilton with his pistol shot. Hamilton died the following day.

Works

The Federalist: A Collection of Essays, Written in Favour of the New Constitution, as Agreed upon by the Federal Convention, September 17, 1787 . . ., 2 volumes. New York: J. & M. Lean, 1788; Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus, 2000; Early American Imprints, 21127, 35581.

Hamilton, Alexander. The Papers of Alexander Hamilton, 27 volumes, edited by Harold C. Syrett. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961–1987.

Hamilton. Writings, edited by Joanne B. Freeman. New York: Library of America, 2001.

Sources

Chernow, Ron. Alexander Hamilton. New York: Penguin, 2004.

Freeman, Joanne B. Affairs of Honor: National Politics in the New Republic. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2001.

Harper, John Lamberton. American Machiavelli: Alexander Hamilton and The Origins of U.S. Foreign Policy. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

MacDonald, Forest. Alexander Hamilton: A Biography. New York: Norton, 1979.

Hammon, Jupiter (1711–circa 1790) poet

Fair wisdom's ways are paths of peace, And they that walk therein, Shall reap the joys that never cease, And Christ shall be their king.

—"An Address to Miss Phillis Wheatly [sic], Ethiopian Poetess" (1778)

Jupiter Hammon, the first African American writer to publish a poem in America, lived as a slave in New York and Connecticut. He was born on October 17, 1711, in servitude to a prominent Long Island landholding and mercantile family, the Lloyds. It is likely that his mother and father were part of the first shipment of slaves to the Lloyds' Oyster Bay estate in 1687. During the course of his life, Hammon had three masters. The first, Henry Lloyd, died when Hammon was fifty-two years old. The second, Joseph Lloyd, removed his household behind PATRIOT lines in Hartford, Connecticut, when the British army invaded New York; soon afterward Joseph committed suicide after hearing a false rumor that Charleston, South Carolina, had fallen to the British. The final master, John Lloyd, brought Hammon back permanently to Long Island. Hammon was one of only two slaves that the Lloyd family kept for the duration of their lives; the other, known as "Opium," may have been Jupiter Hammon's father.

There is no evidence that Hammon ever married or produced a family. It is also uncertain how he was employed by the Lloyd family, although he may have worked as a clerk in their mercantile house. He was provided with some education, however, possibly through the assistance of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which came to Oyster Bay in 1726. The Lloyd family appears to have encouraged him as a writer and, along with the QUAKER community on Long Island, helped him find a publisher for both his poems and sermons or addresses. These works bore the mark of Hammon's intense religiosity.

Hammon's religious commitment began with the onset of a serious illness in spring 1730. Still ailing in 1733 and seeking comfort, Hammon bought a Bible from his master. The dramatic religious conversion that followed led him to regular church attendance and to a belief that all people could exercise free will and choose salvation.

Of Hammon's work, four poems, one sermon, and two broadsides remain. The poems, composed in BALLAD stanza style, show the strong influence of Methodist hymns. All employ religious themes and images, with frequent references to God's deliverance of the enslaved Israelites. In his work

Hammon condemned slavery as satanic, yet he never declared himself an advocate of abolition, saying he was willing to remain in bondage if this was God's will.

The poem, An Evening Thought: Salvation by Christ, with Penitential Cries Composed by Jupiter Hammon, a Negro Belonging to Mr. Lloyd, of Queens-Village on Long Island (1760), is typical of Hammon in its style and themes. It contains four beats to a line—common to both the sermons of the GREAT AWAKENING and to African American a cappella hymns—and throughout its twenty-two stanzas it assures readers that God will redeem everyone seeking his blessings, not simply a chosen few.

In his An Address to Miss Phillis Wheatly, Ethiopian Poetess, in Boston, Who Came from Africa at Eight Years of Age, and Soon Became Acquainted with the Gospel of Jesus Christ (1778), Hammon appealed to the young New England poet and slave Phillis WHEATLEY to serve as a role model for the youth of Boston, demonstrating through her faith that God's salvation is available to all. Here, as in many of his works, the theme of eternal reward is prominent.

Yet, Hammon did not deny the earthly value of freedom and liberty. Liberty, he wrote in An Address to the Negroes of the State of New-York (1787), "is a great thing." White Americans were willing to wage a revolution to attain it; Hammon hoped that their quest for freedom would someday lead them to "think of the state of the poor blacks, and to pity us." Hammon maintained that faith in God was the only effective weapon African Americans could wield against slavery and believed in the universal redemption of slaves after death.

Work

Hammon. America's First Negro Poet; the Complete Works of Jupiter Hammon of Long Island, edited by Stanley Austin Ransom Jr. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1970.

Source

O'Neale, Sondra Ann. Jupiter Hammon and the Biblical Beginnings of African-American Literature. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1993.

Hanson, Elizabeth (1684–1737) captivity narrative writer

Little is known about Elizabeth Hanson that does not come from her own account of her captivity by Indians in 1724. She was born in 1684 and was a forty-year-old wife and mother when she was taken from her farm near Dover Township in New Hampshire. Her husband, John Hanson, was a QUAKER pacifist; he was unprepared, and perhaps unwilling, to defend his farm on the night of August 27, 1724, when a party of French and Indians raided their home. Elizabeth Hanson, four of her children, and her maid were taken in the attack and spent almost a year in Indian captivity until ransomed by the French. They remained in French captivity until John Hanson rescued them. Elizabeth Hanson returned to her colony in 1725, along with three of her children and her maid. Her eldest daughter chose not to return and later married a Frenchman.

Hanson's captivity narrative, God's Mercy Surmounting Man's Cruelty (1728), is significant because it marks a transition for the genre, differing in form from both Mary ROWLANDSON's famous account and the Reverend John WILLIAMS's narration of the early morning Deerfield raid by French and Indian forces in February 1704. Hanson's work demonstrates a concern for writing style and language refinement absent from those works.

As a Quaker, Hanson was less concerned with drawing out lessons for the larger Christian community, and she offered no JEREMIAD or warning that the raid and capture were punishments for sin or lapses in religious commitment. The narrative focused instead on her internal, personal reactions to the experience. She was motivated to write, she explained, by a desire to give an accurate account of her "remarkable trials and wonderful deliverances" and thus to show the kindness of God.

Hanson's narrative speaks of harsh treatment, such as the murder of children in front of their parents, and physical hardship (she had given birth only two weeks before her capture): "By this time, what with fatigue of spirits, hard labor, mean diet, and want of natural rest, I was brought so low that my milk was dried up, my babe very poor and weak, just skin and bone." However, Hanson provides a more sentimentalized account than the traditional works mentioned above, which include detailed descriptions of every moment in captivity.

Work

Hanson, Elizabeth. God's Mercy Surmounting Man's Cruelty, Exemplified in the Captivity and Redemption of Elizabeth Hanson. Philadelphia: Sold by Samuel Keimer & W. Heurtin, 1728; Early American Imprints, 2996.

Sources

Derounian-Stodola, Kathryn Z., ed. Women's Indian Captivity Narratives. New York: Penguin Books, 1998.

Scheick, William J. Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Harriot, Thomas (1560–1621) cartographer, explorer, historian, travel writer

It resteth I speake a word or two of the naturall inhabitants, their nature and manners . . . as that you may know, how that they in respect of troubling our inhabiting and planting, are not to be feared, but that they shall have cause both to feare and love us, that shall inhabit with them.

—A Briefe and True Report of the New Found
Land of Virginia (1588)

Thomas Harriot was a mathematician and astronomer who founded the English approach to algebra and is recognized in American literature for his writings during a trip to Roanoke Island, off the coast of North Carolina, in 1585. He was born in St. Mary's Parish, Oxford, England. Very little is known of his life before his college days at Oxford, where he took his degree in 1580. After graduating, Harriot settled in London, where he worked for Sir Walter Raleigh (circa 1552–1618), serving as a tutor in mathematics and science and instructing the sea captains who would participate in an exploratory voyage to Virginia in navigational techniques. In 1585 the twenty-five-year-old Harriot joined the first colonizing effort to Virginia, serving as its historian, surveyor, and cartographer. The group of 109 Englishmen and 2 Native Americans reached North Carolina's Pamlico Sound in June of 1585 and settled at nearby Roanoke Island.

While he was at the Roanoke colony, Harriot wrote The Chronicle or Discourse of Virginia according to the course of the time, a detailed description of the area's natural resources and of the local Indian population. The colonists returned to England in 1586, and Harriot busied himself composing an abstract of his Chronicle, which he published as A Briefe and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia in 1588. Raleigh and Harriot hoped that the Report would revive interest in colonizing the New World and that thoughtful readers would, as Harriot put it, "consider how your dealing therein if it proceede, may returne you profit and gaine; bee it by inhabiting & planting or otherwise in furthering thereof. . . ."

As Harriot explains in his introduction, his treatise is divided into three parts. The first contains a "declaration of such commodities there already found or to be raised" that might produce a profit for the planter; the second, an account of "all the commodities which wee know the country by our experience doeth yield of its selfe for victuall, and sustenance of mans life"; and the third and final part, a discussion of commodities "which specially concerne building, as also some other necessary uses" as well as a "briefe description of the nature and manners of the people of the country."

Although Harriot declared his intention to eventually publish the entire Chronicle, no edition ever appeared. Instead, he spent the rest of his active career in the service of William Percy, ninth Earl of Cumberland (1655–1702). As a result of this connection to Cumberland, he was imprisoned briefly for his role in the Gunpowder Plot—a desperate attempt in 1604 to reestablish the Catholic religion in England by blowing up of the House of Lords. Harriot died of cancer in 1621 after several years of illness.

Work

Harriot, Thomas. A Briefe and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia of the Commodities There Found and to Be Raised, As Well Merchantable As Others. London: Printed by George Bishop and Ralph Newberie, 1589.

Sources

Rukeyser, Muriel. The Traces of Thomas Harriot. New York: Random House, 1971.

Rukeyser, ed. Thomas Harriot; Renaissance Scientist, Thomas Harriot Symposium (1971: University of Delaware). Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1974.

Shirley, John William. Thomas Harriot, a Biography. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

Harris, Benjamin (17th century–1720) printer, bookseller, pamphleteer

Benjamin Harris was a political radical and author, but little is known about his personal life and education prior to 1673. He established the first newspaper in the colonies and owned a bookshop that was a center for intellectual life in Boston. Born in London, Harris was married and had at least one son. Beginning in 1673, he published a series of inflammatory anti-Catholic and anti-QUAKER articles. He followed this by supporting an unsuccessful campaign mounted by Whigs and antipapists to exclude James II from the throne on the basis of his Catholicism.

In 1679 Harris compiled and printed The Protestant Tutor, an anti-Catholic instruction book designed to help children learn to spell. Also in 1679 he established a Whig newspaper, Domestick Intelligence; or, News both from City and Country, one of the earliest English papers to feature both international and local news. In the same year he was convicted of sedition for publishing a pamphlet attributed to Charles Blount, An Appeal from the Country to the City. Sentenced to the pillory and fined £500, Harris was unable to pay the fine and was sent to the King's Bench Prison. Immediately following his release, he published a second pamphlet, Henry Care's English Liberties, which angered the authorities both in its content and its timing. Harris continued to publish his newspaper, despite constant government harassment, until it was completely suppressed in 1681.

Harris left England to avoid arrest and imprisonment, arriving in Boston in 1686 with his wife, children, and a supply of books. In Boston Harris opened a bookshop in partnership with Joseph Sewall (1688–1769), adding coffee and tea service to the shop's amenities and following an unusual policy of admitting women as customers. The shop grew into the London Coffee House and became the center of Boston's political and intellectual life (see COFFEEHOUSES). Harris also operated his own printing shop, as did many other colonial booksellers. Over the next ten years he published ten books, including the influential NEW ENGLAND PRIMER and multiple editions of John Tulley's Almanach. Harris's Primer was the only elementary textbook in America for nearly a half a century.

Sensing great potential in the news and information that flowed through his shop, Harris established PUBLICK OCCURRENCES, the first newspaper in the British colonies. Planned as a monthly, the first issue, published on September 25, 1690, offered a combination of commercial news and European and American political news gathered from dispatches and from the reports of Harris's customers. Harris also offered his own editorial opinion in brief statements tacked on to the end of the articles.

As an independent public voice in a largely autocratic environment, Publick Occurrences, Both Foreign and Domestick, challenged the authority of the Puritan elite. Pointing specifically to Harris's interpretations of Indian policy and to his commentary on the morality of the royal family in France as a potential source of public disorder, local political and religious officials succeeded in suppressing Publick Occurrences within four days of its initial publication. The actual legal challenge centered on his right to publish without a license from the royal governor. Unable to resist official pressure, Harris ceased publication of his newspaper after its first issue.

Benjamin Harris continued to live and work in Boston, operating his coffeehouse and serving as the official printer for the colony until 1695. Responding to improved conditions for political and religious expression, Harris returned to London in 1695, where he attempted to establish several newspapers and succeeded with the London Post (1699–1705). He continued to operate a bookstore and printing shop. During this time he published The Holy Bible in Verse (1698).

Works

Harris, Benjamin. The New England Primer. London: Printed for the author, 1679; New York: Garland, 1977.

Harris. The Protestant Tutor. . . . London: Printed for the author, 1679.

Source

Pasley, Jeffrey L. "The Tyranny of Printers": Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001.

Hart, Oliver (1723–1795) minister

Reflecting the widespread, grassroots influences of the evangelical movement known as the GREAT AWAKENING of the 1730s and 1740s, Pennsylvanian Oliver Hart became a key figure in the South Carolina church. A PATRIOT and an evangelist, Hart was as devoted to bringing in new ministers and members to the Baptist church as he was to supporting the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and his Charleston community.

Oliver Hart was born in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, on July 5, 1723 to John and Eleanor Crispin Hart. Largely self-taught, Hart studied the classics, theology, and science. During these formative years, Hart heard ministers as renowned as Jonathan EDWARDS, William and Gilbert TENNANT, and George WHITEFIELD, along with other "awakeners" (participants and leaders in the Great Awakening). These experiences inspired Hart to make a public profession of faith in the spring of 1741 in Southampton, Pennsylvania. He became licensed to preach on December 20, 1746, and was ordained a year later. On February 25, 1748, Hart married Sarah Brees, and they had eight children, four of whom survived. After Sarah died, Hart married Anne Maria Sealey, and they had two sons; only one survived childhood.

In September 1749 during the annual meeting of the Philadelphia Baptist Association, an appeal was read for ministers to serve in South Carolina. On November 13, 1749, Hart departed for Charleston, arriving on December 2, and on February 16, 1750, he became the pastor of the Charleston Baptist Church. He remained there for the next thirty years, interrupted only by a three-month military duty in 1775. Hart traveled the back roads of western Carolina, urging backcountry settlers to support the struggle for independence. The diary he kept during this political campaign, published as "Oliver Hart's Diary to the Backcountry" (1975), provides a glimpse of politics on the frontier.

During his pastorate in Charleston, Hart founded the first Baptist Association in the South, and became a leading advocate for the educated Baptist clergy and interdenominational cooperation. In 1769, in recognition of such efforts, Hart was awarded an honorary master's degree from Rhode Island College (now Brown University).

In several of his sermons of the 1770s, Hart infused religion with politics as he spoke out on issues of morality. In The Character of a Truly Great Man Delineated, and His Death Deplored as a Public Loss. Occasioned by the Death of the Rev. William Tennant (1777), Hart endorsed the disestablishment of the ANGLICAN CHURCH in South Carolina. In Dancing Exploded (1778) he attacked the luxury and decadence of those balls and social gatherings dear to the hearts of Charleston's elite. He admonished the city's residents to remember that a war was raging around them, and this was a time to forsake the "vanities of life." Although Hart wrote in an unadorned style, his reputation as a spiritual leader in the community grew steadily, and he came to be known as the "Bishop of the Baptists." When Charleston fell to the British in 1780, Hart and his family fled to the safety of New Jersey, and he eventually became pastor of the Hopewell Baptist Church, where he remained until his death fifteen years later. In 1789 he published his last work, America's Remembrancer, which celebrated the Revolution as America's destiny and a sign of God's hand in history. He died in Hopewell, New Jersey, on December 31, 1795.

Works

Hart, Oliver. Dancing Exploded. A Sermon, Shewing the Unlawfulness, Sinfulness, and Bad Consequences of Balls, Assemblies, and Dances in General. Delivered in Charlestown, South-Carolina, March 22, 1778. Charlestown, S.C.: Printed by David Bruce, 1778; Early American Imprints, 15848.

Hart. A Gospel Church Portrayed, and Her Orderly Service Pointed Out: A Sermon, Delivered in the City of Philadelphia at the Opening of the Baptist Association, October 4, 1791. Trenton, N. J.: Printed by Isaac Collins, 1791; Early American Imprints, 23429.

Hart. America's Remembrancer, with Respect to Her Blessedness and Duty: A Sermon, Delivered in Hopewell, New Jersey, on Thanksgiving Day, November 26, 1789. Philadelphia: Printed by T. Dobson, 1791; Early American Imprints, 23428.

Hartford Wits

See CONNECTICUT WITS.

Harvard College (1636– )

The first institution of higher learning in North America was founded in 1636 by the Great and General Court of the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY in New Towne, now Cambridge, Massachusetts, with a donation of £400. Drawing upon classical curriculum and Puritan philosophy, the college trained both ministers and laymen, choosing not to be affiliated with any one denomination. In 1638 the college received a bequest of £780 from the estate of minister John HARVARD, in addition to his library of more than four hundred volumes. In 1639 the General Court named the school Harvard College. The election of a layman, John Leverett (1616–1679), to the presidency in 1708 signaled an academic and intellectual departure from PURITANISM. Leverett served as president until 1724. In 1782 Harvard established a school of medicine. The college was funded by Massachusetts until 1823, when it received its final state grant. Increase MATHER, an essayist and minister who graduated from Harvard in 1656, served as Harvard's president from 1685 to 1701. Other notable Harvard graduates relevant to early American literature and culture include: Michael WIGGLESWORTH, poet (1561); Samuel SEWALL, diarist (1671); Cotton MATHER, historian and minister (1678); Thomas PRINCE, minister (1707); and Royall TYLER, dramatist (1776).

Sources

Bailyn, Bernard. Glimpses of the Harvard Past. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986.

Fiering, Norman. Moral Philosophy at Seventeenth-Century Harvard: A Discipline in Transition. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.

Morison, Samuel Eliot. Harvard College in the Seventeenth Century, 2 volumes. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1936.

Harvard, John (1607–1638) minister

Benefactor of the first college in the English colonies, John Harvard was the second son of a prosperous English butcher and brewer, Robert Harvard, and his wife, Katherine Rogers Harvard. Otherwise not a notable figure in American literature, Harvard is best known through the institution that bears his name to this day. He grew up in Stratford-upon-Avon and was educated at St. Saviour's Grammar School, where he studied grammar, the classics, and the Scriptures. His pleasant childhood ended abruptly in 1625 when an outbreak of the plague carried off his father and four of his siblings. John's mother quickly remarried but was widowed again within five months. Like Robert Harvard, Katherine's second husband left his widow the bulk of his property. Thus, John Harvard came into a considerable estate upon her death in 1636.

Harvard entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1627, intent on preparing for the ministry. Emmanuel College's Puritan orientation was well known, and its graduates included many of the leading opponents of King Charles I during England's Civil War. While at Cambridge, Harvard earned a bachelor's degree (1631/1632) and a master's degree (1635), and met his future wife, Ann Sadler; the couple were married in 1636. Soon after his marriage and the death of his mother, Harvard began to consider emigration to the colonies. The attacks on dissenters by the king and Archbishop Laud disturbed Harvard, and like many Puritan clergy, he looked to NEW ENGLAND as a refuge. Early in 1637 he began to dispose of property in England, and that spring Ann and John Harvard sailed for America. Anticipating the frontier quality of his new home, Harvard had taken care to purchase and bring with him an extensive collection of books.

The Harvards settled in Charlestown, and by November John had been granted the status of freeman of the colony (which carried voting and office-holding privileges) and had also been appointed teacher at the Charlestown Congregational church. As teacher rather than pastor, Harvard's duties were to explain and defend the doctrine of the Scripture. Soon after he arrived in Massachusetts, he became an avid supporter of plans to establish a college in the colony. When Harvard died of consumption in 1638 at the age of thirty-one, this college became a reality: he left half of his considerable estate and his personal library of some four hundred books to the college. In recognition of Harvard's role in establishing the first institution of higher learning in the English colonies, the government of Massachusetts ordered "that the college agreed upon formerly to be built at Cambridge shall be called Harvard College." It later became Harvard University.

Sources

Bailyn, Bernard. Glimpses of the Harvard Past. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986.

Fiering, Norman. Moral Philosophy at Seventeenth-Century Harvard: A Discipline in Transition. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.

Morison, Samuel Eliot. Harvard College in the Seventeenth Century, 2 volumes. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1936.

Haynes, Lemuel (1753–1833) minister, writer

Liberty is a Jewel which was handed Down to man from the cabinet of heaven, and is Coeval with his Existence.

—Liberty Further Extended: Or Free Thoughts on the Illegality of Slave-Keeping (1776)

Lemuel Haynes was born July 18, 1753 in West Hartford, Connecticut, the son of a white mother and a black father. Because his mother abandoned him shortly after birth, his parents' identity is uncertain; however, biographers have speculated that his mother was either Alice Finch, a Scottish servant in the John Haynes household in West Hartford, Connecticut, or a woman from the wealthy Goodwin family of Hartford. His father may have been a local slave or a waiter in a Hartford hotel. At the age of five months Haynes was bound as an indentured servant in the David Rose family and raised in Middle Granville, Massachusetts. In this evangelical household of frontier farmers, Haynes was allowed to attend the district school, where he learned to read and write. In keeping with the Rose household's adherence to scriptural study, Haynes memorized the hymns of Isaac Watts, studied the writings of Rev. George WHITEFIELD, and the poetry of Edward Young. In 1774, at the age of twenty-two and with his indentures completed, Haynes enlisted as a Minuteman and joined the militia at Roxbury. He later returned to Granville, where he farmed and pursued his ministerial license, which he received on November 29, 1780. After preaching in Granville for five years, Haynes was ordained as an evangelical minister on November 9, 1785, in Torrington, Vermont, where he preached until 1778. Haynes was thus one of the first African Americans to be ordained by an organized church in America. During this period, in 1773, Haynes married Elisabeth Babbitt, a white schoolteacher from the Granville congregation. Elizabeth and Lemuel Haynes had ten children.

In keeping with the tumult of the GREAT AWAKENING, Haynes's ministry was affected by the changes and evolutions within religion and by the subsequent change in opinion of congregations, some of whom supported an "itinerant ministry," and some of whom favored a "settled ministry." As a result, Haynes, like others, moved frequently as parishes formed, dissolved, and reconfigured. Following his position in Torrington, Haynes was asked to become the second pastor in Rutland, Vermont, in the west parish. In 1804 Haynes was awarded a master's degree, honoris causa, from Middlebury College.

This was also a prolific period for Haynes, who over the next forty years wrote and delivered over 5,500 sermons, 400 of which were funeral sermons. His most famous sermon, delivered in 1805, was his Universal Salvation, which was, as Richard Newman describes it, "remarkable for its satire, its brevity, and the fact that it was reprinted throughout the Northeast in over seventy editions until as late as 1865." In 1818 the Haynes family moved to Manchester, Vermont, after which Haynes relocated for his last ministerial position in Granville, New York. He preached in Granville for eleven years, until four months before his death on September 28, 1833.

Haynes's earliest writings, such as "The Battle of Lexington," drew upon his military experience. Although Haynes generally did not raise issues of race from the pulpit, he did call into question the hypocrisy of enslaved blacks engaged in a battle for American freedom from British tyranny. In the essay Liberty Further Extended (1776), he called for the emancipation of blacks in America. Haynes was a hardworking champion of civil rights and equality.

Works

Haynes, Lemuel. Universal Salvation: A Very Ancient Doctrine. . . 1805. Rutland, Vt.: Printed by William Fay, 1806; Early American Imprints, second series, 10539.

Newman, Richard, ed. Black Preacher to White America: The Collected Writings of Lemuel Haynes, 1774–1833. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1990.

Sources

Newman, Richard. Lemuel Haynes: A Bio-Bibliography. New York: Lambeth Press, 1984.

Saillant, John. Black Puritan, Black Republican: The Life and Thought of Lemuel Haynes, 1753–1833. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Hazard, Ebenezer (1744–1817) diarist

Ebenezer Hazard, a collector of historical documents, was born in Philadelphia on January 15, 1744, the first child of the prominent businessman and publisher Samuel Hazard and Catherine Clarkson Hazard. As a boy Hazard was educated at an academy established by his uncle, the Reverend Samuel Finley (1715–1766), a Presbyterian minister and supporter of the GREAT AWAKENING. Hazard later studied at the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University), receiving a bachelor's degree in 1762 and a master's in 1765. During his college days Hazard began to collect historical documents, and he continued the practice during his years as a bookseller in Philadelphia. He organized his collection chronologically, covering the discovery and settlement of the colonies in one volume and the history of NEW ENGLAND up to 1664 in another.

Beginning in 1775, Hazard held a variety of government posts. Ultimately, he became the postmaster general of the Confederation, serving from 1782 to 1789. When the CONSTITUTION ushered in a new government, Hazard fell from political favor and turned to a career as an investor and broker. As one of the original organizers of the Insurance Company of North America, he became financially secure and devoted most of his last seventeen years to promoting and encouraging historical writing. In 1791 he published Proposals for Printing by Subscription, a Collection of State Papers Intended as Material for a History of the United States. In this publication he made clear that his primary goal was to establish an American nationality and identity through historical consciousness. He consistently advocated a focus on national history rather than on state or local studies. Ebenezer Hazard died at his home in Philadelphia on June 13, 1817, after completing a long trip to the Alabama territory.

Work

Hazard, Ebenezer. Historical Collections, Consisting of State Papers, and Other Authentic Documents, Intended as Materials for an History of the United States of America, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: T. Dobson, for the author, 1792–1794; Early American Imprints, 24388, 27105.

Source

Brodsky, Alyn. Benjamin Rush: Patriot and Physician. New York: Truman Talley, 2004.

Henry, Patrick (1736–1799) orator, statesman

Patrick Henry is known for his radical visions expressed with sharp wit. He is most renowned for his fiery speeches, many of which were transcribed. Henry was born on May 29, 1736, in Hanover County, Virginia, and began his career as a shopkeeper and farmer. Failing at both, the self-educated Henry decided to try his hand at the law. In 1760 he was admitted to the Virginia bar. By 1763 Henry had become one of the colony's most prominent lawyers, and two years later he entered Virginia's legislature, the House of Burgesses. Henry immediately established his radicalism, denouncing King George III for the change in English-colonial relations marked by the STAMP ACT. Speaking on the floor of the legislature, Henry warned the King: "Caesar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third—may profit by their example." When the Speaker of the House shouted "Treason!" Henry replied, "If this be treason, make the most of it."

Henry's Virginia Resolves or resolutions against the Stamp Act earned him a colonieswide reputation as a radical. In 1775 he again took the floor of the Burgesses to urge rebellion against Great Britain. Legend has it that he ended his call to arms with the stirring declaration: "I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me Liberty or give me death!" In 1776 the state of Virginia elected Henry as its first governor, a seat he held for five terms.

Patrick Henry played a central role in creating Virginia's government, helping to draft the state's constitution. His sensitivity to the dangers of corrupt government and acts of tyranny continued in the early years of the new nation. Believing that the proposed U.S. CONSTITUTION threatened the rights of states and individuals, he opposed its ratification. Henry was instrumental in ensuring that a Bill of Rights was added to that Constitution. Despite the urgings of local and national political leaders, Patrick Henry refused a seat in the U.S. Senate as well as a cabinet post under President George WASHINGTON. He preferred to remain in his own state of Virginia.

Henry died on June 6, 1799. His remarkable, often extemporaneous oratory was preserved for history by William Wirt, Henry's first biographer, whose careful research allowed him to reproduce Henry's speeches to the Burgesses.

Work

Henry, William Wirt, ed. Patrick Henry: Life, Correspondence and Speeches, 3 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1891; New York: Burt Franklin, 1969.

Sources

Beeman, Richard R. Patrick Henry: A Biography. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974.

Mayer, Henry. A Son of Thunder: Patrick Henry and the American Republic. New York: Grove, 2001.

History of Plymouth Plantation by

William Bradford (Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1856, written 1630) history
History of Plymouth Plantation is an account of the Pilgrims' settlement in the New World, written over sixteen years, from 1630 to 1646. The book, later published as Of Plymouth Plantation, chronicles the Pilgrims' journey from Leyden, Holland to Plymouth Colony. In an entry dated November 11, 1620, William Bradford describes the drawing up of the Mayflower Compact as a document that hoped to "enact, constitute and frame . . . just and equal Laws, Ordinances, Acts, Constitutions and Offices." In chapter 9 of book 1, Bradford describes their landing:

But here I cannot but stay and make a pause, and stand half amazed at this poor people's present condition; and so I think will the reader, too, when he well considers the same. Being thus passed the vast ocean, and a sea of troubles before in their preparation (as may be remembered by that which went before), they had now no friends to welcome them nor inns to entertain or refresh their weatherbeaten bodies; no houses or much less towns to repair to, to seek for succor.

Bradford makes clear the hardships of the Pilgrims, a depiction that was perhaps meant to remind the second generation of both their parents' sacrifices and of the divine providence that allowed for their survival. In book 2, chapter 11, Bradford describes the “most sad and lamentable” time, when half of their company died from hunger and sickness: “. . . of 100 and odd persons, scarce fifty remained.” Established as a religious refuge for SEPARATISTS, Plymouth Plantation was intended as a family settlement that would become self-sufficient through agriculture and trade.

Governed first by John Carver and later by Bradford, who served from 1621 to 1656, the Plymouth Colony eventually merged with the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1684. Although Bradford intended for his history to present Plymouth Colony as divinely sanctioned and guided, his record reveals the everyday problems and conflicts that the community experienced, especially as a settlement with such high expectations. History of Plymouth Plantation does not, therefore, end on a triumphant note, but rather, and perhaps appropriately, with the humility of uncertainty, as Edward Winslow prepares for departure and discontent arises within the colony.

Sources

Anderson, Douglas. William Bradford's Books: Of Plimmoth Plantation and the Printed Word. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.

Philbrick, Nathaniel. Mayflower: A Story of Courage, Community, and War. New York: Viking, 2006.

Holt, John (1721–1784) publisher

John Holt was born in Williamsburg, the colonial capital of Virginia, in 1721. Little is known of his childhood. By 1749 he was married to Elizabeth Hunter, whose brother helped Holt obtain an appointment as the deputy postmaster of New Haven, Connecticut. It seems his brother-in-law also taught Holt the printing trade; by 1755 Holt was listed on the masthead of the Connecticut Gazette, the first newspaper in the colony of Connecticut, as both a partner and an editor. By 1760 he was in New York City, working on the more prestigious New-York Gazette and Weekly Post-Boy. The Gazette quickly became an organ for colonial protest, publishing announcements of upcoming meetings of the Sons of Liberty and defying the STAMP ACT requirement that all newspapers be printed on stamped paper. Soon Holt was embroiled in editorial duels over British policy with the conservative editors of Rivington's New-York Gazetteer.

Holt's polemical style was honed by these battles, but he was inept at handling his finances. In debt in the early 1770s, he had to put up his home at public auction. When the British occupied New York, Holt joined other PATRIOTS in flight from the city, returning briefly to Connecticut before settling in Kingston, New York in the summer of 1777. When the British army burned Kingston the following October, he sought refuge in Poughkeepsie, managing despite these moves to publish a newspaper, The New York Journal. During the economically strained years of the war, Holt accepted butter, beef, or corn in exchange for a subscription to his paper. His last issue appeared in January 1782.

For the remainder of his life, Holt worked as a state printer. He managed to launch one last incarnation of his newspaper, the Independent New-York Gazette, or the New-York Journal Revived. When he died on January 30, 1784, his vital role in keeping the public informed during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and in waging a propaganda battle against Loyalist editors was acknowledged by the presence at his funeral of several high-ranking New Yorkers, including the governor of the state.

Works

New-York Gazette, or, The Weekly Post-Boy. New York: Holt, 1762–1766; Early American Imprints, 9216.

The Independent Gazette; or, The New-York Journal Revived. New York: Holt, 1783–1784; Early American Imprints, 17985.

Source

Paltsits, Victor Hugo. John Holt, Printer and Postmaster: Some Facts and Documents Relating to His Career. New York: Public Library, 1920.

Hooker, Thomas (1586–1647) minister

Throughout his life Thomas Hooker was one of the most influential of NEW ENGLAND's Puritan clergymen. Nearly one hundred of his sermons were published, including a series on the preparation of the soul for salvation, The Soules Preparation (1632), The Soules Humiliation (1637), The Soules Implantation (1637), The Soules Exaltation (1638), The Soules Ingrafting into Christ (1637), The Soules Possession of Christ (1638), and The Soules Vocation (1638). A single sermon, The Poore Doubting Christian Drawne to Christ, first published in 1629, went through twenty-three printings. His Survey of the Summe of Church-Discipline (1648), a scholarly treatise rather than a sermon, studied the locally controlled, New England congregational form of church government and rebutted the more structured Presbyterian model of church organization.

Hooker was born into a yeoman family in Leicestershire, England, on July 7, 1586. He received an excellent formal education, attending the Market Bosworth grammar school and Queen's and Emmanuel Colleges, in Cambridge, England. He received a bachelor's degree in 1608 and a master's degree in 1611, both from Emmanuel College. Influenced by Puritan leaders at Emmanuel such as JOHN COTTON (1584–1652), Hooker experienced his own religious conversion and dedicated himself to the ministry. He served as rector at St. George's in Surrey, where he was personal chaplain to the family of Sir Francis Drake (circa 1543–1596). In Surrey, Hooker married Susanna Garbrand, a member of Drake's household staff. Their first child was named Joanna, probably in honor of Drake's wife, Joan. Seven additional children followed.

Surrey was in Essex County, a hotbed of Puritan radicalism. Hooker was outspoken in his support for the reforms advocated by Puritans, and he preached against government repression of Puritan ministers. Loyalty to God, he declared, came before loyalty to kings. It was exactly such sentiments that enraged supporters of Charles I (1600–1649), and by 1629 a petition had been sent to the Archbishop William Laud (1573–1645) demanding Hooker's arrest. Learning that he was to be called before the Court of High Commission, Hooker left Surrey and lived secretly in England for several months. In spring 1631 he fled to Holland, leaving his wife and family behind. On April 31 of that year he preached the poignant The Danger of Desertion, describing the painful experiences of exile and separation from his family. Despite his sadness, Hooker remained defiant, warning Charles I in this sermon that even a king was not safe from God's wrath. "God is heading west," Hooker said. "New England shall be a refuge for his Noahs and Lots, a rock and a shelter for his righteous ones . . ."

In 1632 Hooker moved to the town of Delft in the Netherlands. Here he composed a lengthy preface to a work by Puritan minister William Ames (1576–1633) titled A Fresh Suit against Humane Ceremonies, in which Hooker reiterated his conviction that the authority of God was greater than any earthly authority, including the Church. A year later, in 1633, he joined other "Noahs and Lots," migrating to New England on the same ship as the noted theologians John Cotton and Samuel Stone (1602–1663).

With Stone, Hooker organized a church at Newe Town (now Cambridge), Massachusetts. There his views on the necessary steps to religious conversion divided him from Cotton, who did not accept Hooker's multistep system for receiving grace. Hooker did not waver in his conviction that salvation was a process. In sermons full of imagery, analogies, metaphors, and dialogues among characters, he stressed that grace and salvation were available to all, to educated people as well as to uneducated ones, to the poor as well as the rich, as long as they prepared themselves to receive it. In the pulpit, Hooker was dynamic, threatening and frightening the audience, and then cajoling and comforting them.

In 1636 Hooker became involved in a smoldering dispute between colonial governor Thomas Dudley (1576–1653) and Massachusetts governor John WINTHROP. That year he and a large part of his congregation followed Dudley into Connecticut, settling in Hartford. When the General Court of Connecticut, the colonial state legislature, met for the first time in May 1638 to draw up its constitution, the Fundamental Orders, Hooker was invited to deliver the sermon outlining the relationship between the people and their governors. Thomas Hooker died in an epidemic on July 7, 1647 at age sixty-one.

Works

Hooker, Thomas. Redemption: Three Sermons, 1637–1656. 1637; Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1956.

Williams, George H., ed. Thomas Hooker: Writings in England and Holland, 1626–1633. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1975.

Hooker. The Immortality of Mans Soule, Proved Both by Scripture and Reason. London: P. Cole, 1645; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1978.

Sources

Ball, John H. Chronicling the Soul's Windings: Thomas Hooker and His Morphology of Conversion. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1992.

Bush, Sargent. The Writings of Thomas Hooker: Spiritual Adventure in Two Worlds. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1980.

Gordis, Lisa M. Opening Scripture: Bible Reading and Interpretive Authority in Puritan New England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Shuffelton, Frank. Thomas Hooker, 1586–1647. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977.

Hopkins, Samuel (1721–1803) minister

Samuel Hopkins is perhaps best known for his biography of Jonathan EDWARDS, The Life and Character of the Late Reverend . . . Jonathan Edwards, which he published in 1765. As custodian and editor of Edwards's manuscripts, Hopkins was able to draw on a large collection of primary sources for this first account of Edwards's life. Mentored by Edwards and inspired by his work, Hopkins was an orator whose views remained compelling in American religious life until after the Civil War. He was also one of the first ministers in NEW ENGLAND to denounce the slave trade and slavery.

Hopkins was born into a comfortable farming family in Waterbury, Connecticut, on September 17, 1721. Because his father had urged him to prepare for the ministry, the sixteen-year-old Hopkins enrolled at Yale rather than take up farming. While at college, he was stirred by the commencement sermon delivered by Jonathan Edwards, the voice of revivalism in the earliest days of the GREAT AWAKENING. When he left Yale, Hopkins went to live with Edwards in Northampton, preaching from his mentor's pulpit on occasion. In 1743 he was called to his own pastorate in what was to become Great Barrington, Vermont.

Although by this time thoroughly dedicated to strict CALVINISM and to his mission to preach it, Hopkins faced a difficult life in Great Barrington. He did not prove to be a particularly compelling preacher; his congregation responded negatively both to his style and to his demand for strict adherence to Calvinist doctrine. Tensions increased in the 1760s when Hopkins attempted to nullify the HALF-WAY COVENANT, which allowed the children of those who had not yet experienced conversion to receive baptism. The community responded by terminating his position. In 1769 Hopkins became minister at Newport, Rhode Island, a move that marked the beginning of a satisfying career. There he became the leading spokesperson for the New Divinity, a theological and social school of thought formulated by Hopkins, Joseph Bellamy (1719–1790), and Jonathan Edwards, that defended Calvinist orthodoxy against the rationalism of the eighteenth century. Hopkins's opponents labeled this philosophy, laid out in his Dialogue Between a Semi-Calvinist and a Calvinist (1805), "Hopkinsianism." It required complete acceptance of the doctrine of predestination; in his Dialogue, Hopkins agreed with the idea that a true believer must be willing "to be damned for the glory of God."

Hopkins's most comprehensive work, synthesizing Edwards's and his own interpretations of the New Divinity, was The System of Doctrines Contained in Divine Revelation Explained and Defended (1793). It is still considered the most comprehensive account of the New England school of theology. As a critical aspect of the New Divinity, Hopkins also introduced the notion of "disinterested benevolence," modifying Edwards's earlier doctrine of true virtue. Disinterested benevolence, whose principles are laid out most clearly in Hopkins's An Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773), was, in effect, a doctrine that preached the practice of selfless values, which led to social activism. Preaching in a colony that owed much of its wealth to the slave trade, Hopkins mounted an active campaign for the abolition of slavery. His sermons and tracts against slavery are his best works, most notably his A Dialogue Concerning the Slavery of the Africans (1776). Hopkins, who freed his own slaves, hoped that the AMERICAN REVOLUTION would spark broad social reform and that self-interest would give way to benevolence in the new nation. Hopkins died in 1803. His commitment to abolition led the novelist Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811–1896) to make him the hero of The Minister's Wooing, published in 1859.

Work

Hopkins, Samuel. The Works of Samuel Hopkins, 3 volumes. Boston: Doctrinal Tract and Book Society, 1852–1854; New York: Garland, 1987.

Sources

- Conforti, Joseph A. Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement: Calvinism, the Congregational Ministry, and Reform in New England between the Great Awakenings. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Christian University Press, 1981.
- Post, Stephen Garrard. Christian Love and Self-Denial: An Historical and Normative Study of Jonathan Edwards, Samuel Hopkins, and American Theological Ethics. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1987.
- Stevens, Laura M. The Poor Indians: British Missionaries, Native Americans, and Colonial Sensibility. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Hopkinson, Francis (1737–1791) poet, satirist

Francis Hopkinson was born in Philadelphia on October 2, 1737, the eldest of eight children from a notable family. His father, Thomas Hopkinson, had migrated from London to Philadelphia, where he became a prominent attorney, a member of the colonial government, and a cofounder of both the College of Philadelphia and, with Benjamin FRANKLIN, the American Philosophical Society and the Library Company. Hopkinson's mother, Mary Johnson Hopkinson, was the daughter of an eminent English family. Hopkinson benefited from his family's position and prestige. He was in the first class at Franklin's Academy of Philadelphia and in the first class to graduate from the College of Philadelphia. His classmates included the poet Nathaniel Evans (1742–1767) and the playwright Thomas GODFREY. After graduation Hopkinson trained as a lawyer and subsequently used his training to secure positions as a justice in the Pennsylvania Supreme Court and later as collector of customs in Salem, New Jersey.

In 1766 Hopkinson traveled to England in search of a political appointment. He was unsuccessful but used his time in London to explore the polite circles of English society, which included the expatriate circle of Benjamin West (1738–1820) and Benjamin Franklin. Following his return to America, Hopkinson opened a retail business in Philadelphia selling imported goods. He was married to Ann Borden in 1768, served a brief term as collector of customs in Delaware, and eventually relocated to Bordentown, New Jersey. Hopkinson made a successful return to his legal practice and was able to secure appointments to the governor's council and as a delegate from New Jersey to the Continental Congress, where he became a signer of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Hopkinson's political prowess was matched by a flair for artistic endeavors. He drew portraits and helped to design a number of state, federal, and organizational seals. A self-taught musician, Hopkinson performed on the harpsichord in public and wrote music, matching it to various psalms and poems. He also wrote POETRY, for which he is still known today. Some of his poems were published in the AMERICAN MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY CHRONICLE as early as 1757. He continued to write during the 1760s, and in 1774 he began his career as a political critic with the pseudonymous publication of A Pretty Story in the Year of Our Lord 2774, a SATIRE of state politics in Massachusetts.

In 1775 Hopkinson became a contributor, along with Thomas PAINE, to the short-lived Pennsylvania Magazine, or American Monthly Museum. As a PATRIOT, he also wrote a number of important PAMPHLETS, including A Letter to Lord Howe (1777), which protested British treatment of civilians; and A Letter to Joseph Galloway (1778), a critique of Loyalism. Borrowing on his earlier experience with poetry and music, Hopkinson also contributed a number of Patriot verses, including "The Battle of the Kegs" (1778), a satire of a plan to sink British ships in the Philadelphia harbor by floating barrels of gunpowder down the Delaware River. This verse exemplifies Hopkinson's facility with wit and with the structural demands of poetry:

*Sir William, he, snug as a flea,
Lay all this time a snoring,
Nor dream'd of harm as he lay warm.
In bed with Mrs. L—g.*

Hopkinson also flourished as a politician and a writer during the postwar period. In 1789 George WASHINGTON named him justice of the United States district court in Pennsylvania, and he became an influential FEDERALIST. During this period he wrote some of his most influential essays, including the satirical critique of newspaper debates, "Art of Paper War" (1786), and the Federalist allegory, "The New Roof" (1787). Beginning in 1786, Hopkinson became a major contributor to the Columbian Magazine and to the American Museum, which were both widely distributed. In 1788 he published Seven Songs, a collection of his writings. He prepared a second collection, The Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings of Francis Hopkinson, which was published after his death in 1791.

Work

Hopkinson, Francis. Comical Spirit of Seventy-Six: The Humor of Francis Hopkinson, 3 volumes, edited by Paul M. Zall. San Marino, Calif.: Huntington Library, 1976.

Sources

- Barthelmas, Della Gray. The Signers of the Declaration of Independence: A Biographical and Genealogical Reference. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1997.
- Shuffelton, Frank. "Binding Ties: Thomas Jefferson, Francis Hopkinson, and the Representation of the Notes on the State of Virginia," in Periodical Literature in Eighteenth-Century America, edited by Mark L. Kamrath and Sharon M. Harris. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2005, 255–276.

Hoskens, Jane Fenn (1693–circa 1770) minister, writer

Like other traveling ministers, Jane Fenn Hoskens believed it was her mission to spread the QUAKER gospel to the broadest possible audience. Throughout her career she relied on other Quaker women for emotional and material support. Her autobiography, The Life and Spiritual Sufferings of that Faithful Servant of Christ (1771), is an example of the SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY, one of the first literary forms that allowed women public expression.

Jane Fenn Hoskens was born in London in 1693. Despite a strict Anglican upbringing, she remembered her childhood as a happy one in which she learned to sing and play music. At sixteen, however, a near-fatal illness struck, leading Hoskens to make a contract with God. In her narrative she recalled promising that if she survived, "the remain'g part of my days should be dedicated to his service." Several years later she journeyed to Pennsylvania, borrowing money from a man named Robert Davis. When Hoskens arrived in America on March 16, 1712 she was nineteen years old.

To Hoskens's surprise, Davis soon tried to force her to become an indentured servant to a stranger for four years. She resisted, and Davis had her jailed. Several people offered financial assistance to Hoskens, but she refused to accept their aid. Instead, in exchange for the necessary money, she indentured herself for three years to a group of Quaker families in Plymouth, serving as a schoolmistress to their children.

In 1719 Hoskens became a servant in the household of David Lloyd, a noted Quaker. The Lloyds "adopted" Jane, encouraging and participating in her religious development. Hoskens began her official career as a minister in 1722, visiting Quaker communities in Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Barbados, Rhode Island, Nantucket, and New Jersey. Hoskens traveled with other female preachers, whom she called her "yoke-fellows." She described the support she and Elizabeth Levis, her first companion, provided to one another, "sympathizing with each other under the various exercises whether of body or mind, which we had to pass through." Before the tour ended, Hoskens had covered more than 1,700 miles.

In 1728 Hoskens sailed for Ireland, intent upon holding "meetings" and visiting friends in Dublin. While there she also returned to London, where she delivered sermons in the city and throughout the countryside. In her public preaching she felt "the doctrine of the truth descended as the small rain upon a tender grass, whereby many were refreshed, and a living greenness appeared. . . ."

Hoskens returned to Barbados in 1732 (inadvertently printed as 1742 in her narrative), and in 1744 she received permission from her Quaker meeting to revisit the Southern colonies. As in the past, she had female companions on these trips. Her last known trip, taken to England and Ireland, began in 1748—and what happened to her afterward is unknown. Any record of Hoskens's life ends with the account of this difficult ocean voyage.

Work

Hoskens, Jane. The Life and Spiritual Sufferings of that Faithful Servant of Christ Jane Hoskens, a Public Preacher among the People Called Quakers. Philadelphia: Printed by William Evitt, 1771; Early American Imprints, 12078.

Source

Larson, Rebecca. Daughters of Light: Quaker Women Preaching and Prophesying in the Colonies and Abroad, 1700–1775. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.

Humphreys, David (1752–1818) poet, playwright, essayist

David Humphreys was born on July 10, 1752, in Derby, Connecticut. At the age of fifteen he entered Yale, where he met Timothy DWIGHT, John TRUMBULL, Joel BARLOW, and Lemuel Hopkins (1750–1801). All became associated with the CONNECTICUT WITS, a group of conservative FEDERALIST poets living around Hartford, Connecticut. The group is considered to be among the first schools of American poetry. Humphreys was probably the originator of their most noted work, The Anarchiad (1786–1787), to which Barlow, Trumbull, and Hopkins also contributed. Humphreys wrote at least five full numbers of this series, which was a sustained satiric attack on democratic forces in America, including the ANTI-FEDERALISTS and the mobs responsible for SHAYS'S REBELLION in 1786 and 1787. As a Federalist, Humphreys feared that the common people would repudiate their upper-class leaders and republicanism and embrace democracy, or mob rule. Shays's Rebellion, an uprising of poor Massachusetts farmers, brought to life the Federalists' worst fears.

Humphreys, like many college graduates, tutored for several years but left the classroom to join the Revolutionary army in 1776. He spent four years in military service, rising to the rank of lieutenant colonel and serving as aide-de-camp for generals Israel Putnam (1718–1790) and Nathanael Greene (1742–1786) before a staff appointment by George WASHINGTON led Humphreys into a career as a government official.

After the war Humphreys was named secretary to a United States Commerce Commission in Europe. While abroad, he worked for Thomas JEFFERSON, John ADAMS, and Benjamin FRANKLIN, the peace commissioners in Paris. Humphreys's association with George Washington continued during the 1780s, and in 1787 he became a permanent member of Washington's Mount Vernon household. He remained at Mount Vernon until 1790, when President Washington sent him to Lisbon and Madrid. The following year he was named minister plenipotentiary to Portugal, but bad relations with Thomas Jefferson led to his recall when Jefferson became president. Humphreys did not serve in government again.

Throughout his life Humphreys continued to maintain his interest in literary pursuits. As a member of the Connecticut Wits he wrote nationalistic verse, asserting that God had graced America, and warning against the nation succumbing to excessive democracy. A PATRIOT, he was also a social and political conservative. Much of his poetry was ornate in construction and style as he tried to convey a sense of the sublime through elaborate descriptions of earthquakes, stormy seas, lightning, firing cannons, and other grand effects of nature or human ingenuity. In these praise-laden poems, his use of apostrophes, exclamations, and personification strike the modern reader as excessive. One of his most important poems, A Poem on the Death of General Washington, appeared in 1804, the same year as the collected Miscellaneous Works. Humphreys died in 1818.

Works

Humphreys, David. Poems. Philadelphia: Printed by Mathew Carey, 1789; Early American Imprints, 21897.

Humphreys. The Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys. New York: Printed by Hodge, Allen & Campbell, 1790; Early American Imprints, 22578.

Humphreys, Joel Barlow, John Trumbull, and Lemuel Hopkins. The Anarchiad: A New England Poem, edited by Luther J. Riggs. New Haven: Thomas H. Pease, 1861.

Humphreys. David Humphreys' "Life of General Washington": With George Washington's "Remarks." Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991.

Sources

Cifelli, Edward M. David Humphreys. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Collier, Christopher. All Politics Is Local: Family, Friends, and Provincial Interests in the Creation of the Constitution. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 2003.

Molloy, Leo T. General David Humphreys (1752–1818). Derby, Conn.: Derby Historical Society, 2005.

Husband, Herman (1724–1795) writer

Herman Husband, who was considered the leader of the North Carolina Regulator movement, was born into the Maryland family of William and Mary Husband on October 3, 1724. The family moved frequently during Herman's childhood, settling at last in North Carolina in 1761. Although Herman was raised in the ANGLICAN CHURCH, his religious odyssey carried him from Anglicanism to Presbyterianism and finally into the QUAKER fold. In 1764 he was expelled from the Quaker meeting for marrying a non-Quaker, but he never abandoned the tenets of this faith.

Husband was a farmer and a spokesman for human rights. As tensions between Carolina farmers and the established planter elite of the coastal region increased, Husband frequently was called upon by his western Carolina neighbors to draw up their list of grievances. Husband never formally joined their Regulator Movement, yet he was a passionate agitator for the cause, and was acknowledged as the group's leader by enemies and adherents alike.

In 1768 Husband was arrested for allegedly inciting a riot, but a jury acquitted him of all charges. He was immediately elected to the North Carolina assembly. Reelected in 1770, Husband was expelled for promoting riots and publishing libels. This time he was jailed, but he was released when the grand jury refused to indict him.

Husband's contribution to American literature is his two-part account of the Regulator Movement, published anonymously in 1770. In An Impartial Relation of the First Rise and Cause of the Recent Differences, in Public Affairs, in the Province of North-Carolina and in A Continuation of the Impartial Relation, Husband uses the Christian tradition and the British Constitution to defend the protests of Carolina backcountry farmers against the political and economic injustices they felt had been imposed on them. The colonial government was guilty of more than petty acts of greed or incompetence, Husband insisted; they had committed such political crimes as illegal taxation, the rejection of majority rule, and the disruption of citizens' gatherings and assemblies. Husband declared that the blame for the injustice that ultimately led to rebellion must be shared by the clergy, who kept congregants ignorant rather than urging them to right the wrongs being perpetrated, and by the lawyers, who saw the opportunity for personal gain in the despair of others. In A Continuation Husband gave a sophisticated analysis of the weaknesses of the colonial legal system. He called for the reform of the jury system, urging that juries be allowed to decide law as well as fact and arguing for truth as a protection against libel charges.

In 1771 the Regulators armed themselves and began a rebellion against the established colonial government. These backcountry farmers, poorly armed and without military experience, were quickly crushed by government forces at the Battle of Alamance. Husband, a pacifist, refused to join the armed confrontation. Nevertheless, the North Carolina government exiled him, destroyed his farm, and forced him to flee the colony. Husband and his family settled in western Pennsylvania, where he continued to struggle for the rights of small farmers against the rich and powerful. He took a leadership role in the Whiskey Rebellion of 1794, when western Pennsylvania farmers unsuccessfully confronted more than thirteen thousand United States troops—a force larger than George WASHINGTON's Continental Army—to protest the federal government's tax on the whiskey they produced and marketed. Husband was captured, tried, convicted, and condemned to death. Leading Pennsylvanians, grudging admirers of his, interceded, and President Washington pardoned him in 1795. Husband died on the way home.

Works

Husband, Herman. An Impartial Relation of the First Rise and Cause of the Recent Differences, in Public Affairs, in the Province of North-Carolina . . . Newbern, N.C.: Printed for the author, 1770; Early American Imprints, 11689.

Husband. Proposals to Amend and Perfect the Policy of the Government of the United States; or: The Fulfilling of the Prophecies in the Latter Days, Commenced by the Independence of America. Baltimore: Printed for the author, 1782; Early American Imprints, 17679.

Sources

Hogeland, William. The Whiskey Rebellion: George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, and the Frontier Rebels Who Challenged America's Newfound Sovereignty. New York: Scribner, 2006.

Lazenby, Mary Elinor. Herman Husband, a Story of His Life. Washington, D.C.: Old Neighborhoods Press, 1940.

Mobley, Joe A., ed. The Way We Lived in North Carolina. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2003.

Hutchinson, Anne (1591–1643) Puritan

“. . . when they preach a covenant of works for salvation, that is not truth.”

—Examination of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson
(1637)

Anne Hutchinson was born in 1591 and was a member of John COTTON's congregation in England that immigrated to the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY in 1634. Hutchinson fell into disfavor with the church leaders when she questioned whether they were indeed following a “covenant of grace,” in which only divine grace determines spiritual status, or actually practicing a “covenant of works,” wherein individual acts merit status. In addition, Hutchinson held widely attended prayer meetings in her home, adhered to the bodily resurrection, and claimed to communicate directly with God. These collective actions brought forward the accusation that Hutchinson was “antinomian,” or above the law, and she was tried in the court under Governor John WINTHROP's leadership. Apparently well-versed in church doctrine, Hutchinson contributed to exchanges with the magistrates and church leaders in which the complexity of Puritan spiritual law was illustrated. In her 1637 trial she responded to questioning by the Puritan leaders with an understanding of the doctrines and precepts of her faith.

The following excerpt, from “The Examination of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson at the court at Newtown (November 1637),” which appears in the second volume of Thomas HUTCHINSON's History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay (Boston, 1767), is illustrative of Hutchinson's defense. When she is questioned about holding weekly prayer meetings in her house, Hutchinson explains:

The ground of my taking it up was, when I first came to this land because I did not go to such meetings as those were, it was presently reported that I did not allow of such meetings but held them unlawful and therefore in that regard they said I was proud and did despise all ordinances. Upon that a friend came unto me and told me of it and I to prevent such aspersions took it up, but it was in practice before I came therefore I was not the first.

As the examination proceeds and Governor Winthrop asks why Hutchinson has continued to hold meetings in her home, Hutchinson says, “there lies a clear rule in Titus, that the elder women should instruct the younger, and then I must have a time wherein I must do it.” She then poses this question to the court: “Do you think it not lawful for me to teach women and why do you call me to teach the court?” to which Winthrop retorts: "We do not call you to teach the court but to lay open yourself." As this exchange suggests, Hutchinson's trial addressed central issues related to the authority and doctrine of the church.

In 1638 the court ordered Anne Hutchinson's excommunication and her family's banishment from Massachusetts Bay Colony. The Hutchinsons resettled on the island of Aquidneck (Rhode Island), where they lived until 1643 when the family was killed in a Native American raid.

Sources

Hall, David. D. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1968.

Lang, Amy Schräger. Prophetic Woman: Anne Hutchinson and the Problem of Dissent in the Literature of New England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

LaPlante, Eve. American Jezebel: The Uncommon Life of Anne Hutchinson, the Woman Who Defied the Puritans. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 2004.

Hutchinson, Thomas (1711–1780) historian

Thomas Hutchinson's literary legacy is his ambitious history of Massachusetts, drawn from manuscript sources he had collected since his college days. The work is scholarly in tone, but infused with his own conservative values. Hutchinson abhorred extremism in any form, whether in what he condemned as the political frenzy of revolution or the religious frenzy of the Salem witch-hunts. The three volumes, The History of the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay [to] . . . 1691 (1764), The History of the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay . . . 1691, Until the Year 1750 (1767), and The History of the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay, from the Year 1750 Until June, 1774 . . . (written 1776–1778; published 1828) remain one of the fullest accounts of the settlement and growth of a colony within the British empire.

In volume one Hutchinson presented his central political thesis: that the colonists' understanding of their role within the empire was flawed from the start. He argued that the founders of the colony could not expect to enjoy British protection and claim the rights of Englishmen if they refused to give allegiance to the supreme authority of the king and Parliament. Volume two covered the imperial wars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and the struggles for power between royal governors and local assemblies. While the first volume ends with a plea that the rights of Englishmen be preserved in the colony, the second volume closes with a plea that colonists obey British trade regulations. Ten years later, in volume three, the exiled Hutchinson provided an account of his own administration and expressed his firm belief that the AMERICAN REVOLUTION was a conspiracy of a small group of ambitious malcontents, demagogues who duped the people and destroyed an empire. He accused the lawyer James Otis Sr. of being the leader of these conspirators.

Hutchinson was born in Boston on September 9, 1711. The great-great-grandson of religious leader Anne HUTCHINSON, Thomas shared none of his ancestor's anti-authoritarian tendencies. He attended HARVARD COLLEGE, receiving both a bachelor's and a master's degree, but he had no interest in a career in the ministry. Instead, he began a public career at the age of twenty-four when he published an anonymous proposal to retire Massachusetts paper currency. An economic conservative, he finally achieved his goal of eliminating paper money in 1749. He considered this his greatest political achievement.

By 1740 Hutchinson had become a well-established Boston merchant who actively sought and accepted multiple political offices throughout his career. He held his colony's most important legislative, judicial, and executive offices, often simultaneously. He was a member of the Assembly from 1737 to 1749, its Speaker from 1746 to 1749, and a member of the elected upper house, the Council, from 1749 to 1766. From 1752 until the Revolution, Hutchinson's ambitions led him into appointive positions. He became both a county judge and a member of the provincial probate court in 1752, despite his lack of legal training. In 1758, while still sitting on the bench, he became lieutenant governor of the colony, a position he did not relinquish when he was named chief justice of the Massachusetts Superior Court two years later. His appointment to the high court infuriated other Massachusetts hopefuls, including James Otis Sr. Several prominent Bostonians later insisted that the Hutchinson-Otis feud was the spark that ignited the American Revolution.

Hutchinson refused to join the popular protest against British policies that began in the 1760s because he believed that Parliament should have supreme and indivisible sovereignty. Although he privately voiced the view that the STAMP ACT was unwise, he did not consider the new taxation an abuse of power. Hutchinson's determination to obey and administer British laws earned him the enmity of local radicals. In 1765, during the organized protest against the Stamp Act, Hutchinson's home was destroyed by an angry mob. Lost in this destructive outbreak were many priceless historical documents Hutchinson had gathered in order to complete his multivolume History of the Province of Massachusetts Bay.

Hutchinson continued to oppose the growing radical movement for independence. He drafted but did not publish two essays in response to John DICKINSON's anti-Stamp Act Letters from a Pennsylvania Farmer (1768). One leading historian of the Revolution declared that the second of these essays, presented as a dialogue between a European and an American, demonstrated a "lucidity and penetration" of mind that marked it as a major literary feat of the era.

In 1773 radicals acquired and published a private correspondence between Hutchinson and English official Thomas Whately (1728–1772), written during the Stamp Act crisis. Hutchinson's comment that American rights would have to be abridged if Britain hoped to rule the colonies effectively shocked and enraged many colonials. He was branded a co-conspirator in imperial efforts to enslave Americans. Hatred increased when Hutchinson, serving as acting governor of Massachusetts, refused to let British tea ships leave Boston Harbor until the new tea tax had been paid. The Boston Tea Party and the Coercive Acts that followed were to some degree the result of Hutchinson's determination to obey the law.

Aware that his life was endangered, Hutchinson sailed for England in 1774. He was warmly received by the king and his ministers and served as the government's American adviser through the early years of the war. Not all British political leaders saw Hutchinson as a victim of demagogues and rabble-rousers, however. Pro-American members of Parliament denounced him in the House of Commons as the man responsible for the Revolution. As the war progressed, Hutchinson and his Loyalist colleagues found themselves increasingly ignored and forgotten by the government. He died on June 3, 1780, bitter and depressed by the death of his two children and by the fear that his exile from his homeland was permanent.

Works

- Hutchinson, Thomas. The History of the Colony and Province of Massachusetts-Bay. 1764; edited by Lawrence Shaw Mayo. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1936; Early American Imprints, 9705, 13348.
- Hutchinson. Strictures Upon the Declaration of the Congress at Philadelphia; in a Letter to a Noble Lord, &c. London: N.p., 1776; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1986.
- Hutchinson. The Diary and Letters of His Excellency Thomas Hutchinson, Esq. 2 volumes. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle & Rivington, 1883–1886; New York: AMS Press, 1973.

Sources

- Bailyn, Bernard. The Ordeal of Thomas Hutchinson. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1974.
- Beeman, Richard R. Varieties of Political Experience in Eighteenth-Century America. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Ferling, John E. A Leap in the Dark: The Struggle to Create the American Republic. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Pencak, William. America's Burke: The Mind of Thomas Hutchinson. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1982.
- Walmsley, Andrew S. Thomas Hutchinson and the Origins of the American Revolution. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

Hale, Edward Everett (1822–1909) short-story writer, memoirist

He loved his country as no other man has loved her, but no man deserved less at her hands.

—“The Man without a Country” (1863)

Born in Boston, Edward Everett Hale graduated from Harvard in 1839 and became a Unitarian minister, serving as chaplain of the United States Senate from 1903 until his death, a mark of the enormous respect he earned during his lifetime. He wrote prolifically, editing or authoring more than sixty books and many more pamphlets, most of which addressed the social reforms he advocated. He also wrote literary criticism (he was the first to write warmly about Walt WHITMAN’s LEAVES OF GRASS) and short stories. His best-known story was “THE MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY,” which first appeared anonymously in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in 1863. The protagonist of the tale, a naval officer who makes a wish never to see America again, was Hale’s invention, but the character, Philip Nolan, quickly became mythic. Exiled and without a sense of national belonging, the fictitious Nolan inspired intense patriotism during the CIVIL WAR.

Sources

Adams, John R. Edward Everett Hale. Boston: Twayne, 1977.
Holloway, Jean. Edward Everett Hale: A Biography. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1956.

Hale, Lucretia Peabody (1820–1900) children’s writer
Sister of Edward Everett HALE, Lucretia Hale was born in Boston and educated at Elizabeth PEABODY’s progressive school. Hale wrote to become self-supporting, beginning with stories and instructional pieces in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. Her most successful work came in the late 1860s when she began publishing amusing stories, often about the fictional Peterkin family, in children’s magazines. The stories were collected in The Peterkin Papers (1880) and The Last of the Peterkins, with Others of Their Kin (1886). These stories have never gone out of print.

Source

Madelyn C. Wankmiller. “Lucretia Peabody Hale and The Peterkin Papers,” Hornbook Magazine, 34 (April 1958): 95–103.

Hale, Sarah Josepha (1788–1879) editor, polemical writer

Born near Newport, New Hampshire, Sarah Josepha Buell ran a private school from 1806 until 1813, when she married David Hale. Her husband died nine years later, leaving her with five children and no means of support. She turned to writing domestic poetry—including “MARY HAD A LITTLE LAMB”—and prose, with her highly acclaimed novel Northwood (1827). Then, in 1836, she began a career as an editor, working at the Ladies’ Magazine (later GODEY’S LADY’S BOOK) until 1877. Owing to the popularity of the magazine, Hale gained enormous influence, and she used it to promote education reforms for women and female property ownership. She wrote or edited more than fifty books, the most significant of which was the Women’s Record (1855), an encyclopedia comprising more than 1600 entries of “distinguished women” from “the creation to A.D. 1854.”

Sources

Okker, Patricia. Our Sister Editors: Sarah J. Hale and the Tradition of Nineteenth-Century American Women Editors. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995.

Tonkovich, Nicole. Domesticity with a Difference: The Nonfiction of Catharine Beecher, Sarah J. Hale, Fanny Fern, and Margaret Fuller. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Halleck, Fitz-Greene (1790–1867) poet

Born in Guilford, Connecticut, Fitz-Greene Halleck was a banker and secretary to the tycoon John Jacob Astor (1763–1848). He was also a literary man by avocation and a leading member of the KNICKERBOCKER GROUP. With Joseph Rodman Drake (1795–1820) he co-authored the “Croaker Papers” (1819), a series of comic verses that appeared in the New York Evening Post. Drake’s death in 1820 occasioned one of Halleck’s best-known verses, an elegy that begins: “Green be the turf above thee, friend of my better days.” Two other long poems, Fanny (1819), and Marco Bozzaris (1825)—the first a burlesque of Lord Byron and the second an admiring imitation—are among Halleck’s best work.

Source

Hallock, John W. The American Byron: Homosexuality and the Fall of Fitz-Greene Halleck. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2000.

The Harbinger (1845–1849) periodical

This weekly journal, edited by George RIPLEY, was for its first two years the official publication of BROOK FARM. Fourierist in orientation (see FOURIERISM), The Harbinger, Devoted to Social and Political Progress was dedicated to “the examination and discussion of the great questions in social science, politics, literature, and the arts, which command the attention of all believers in the progress and elevation of humanity.” It published writers such as James Russell LOWELL; John Greenleaf WHITTIER; Horace GREELEY; and John S. Dwight, whose music criticism made The Harbinger the leading outlet in the nation for this branch of journalism. After the Brook Farm experiment ended, Ripley, Dwight, and Parke GODWIN edited the journal in New York City, where it became connected with the American Union of Associationists, another group of like-minded idealists.

Source

Delano, Sterling F. The Harbinger and New England Transcendentalism: A Portrait of Associationism in America. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983.

Harland, Henry (1861–1905) editor, novelist, short-story writer

Some sources indicate that Henry Harland was born in Russia of American parents and educated at Harvard University. Others indicate that this background was the invention of Harland himself, a native New Yorker who attended City College. He began his literary career using the pen name Sidney Luska, under which he produced several easily dismissed novels of Jewish immigrant life with such titles as The Yoke of the Torah (1887) and My Uncle Florimond (1888).

In 1889 Harland moved to Paris where, under his own name, he published in quick succession a collection of short stories and four novels. In 1890 he moved to England and came into his own as a man of letters. Associating himself with the fin de siècle aesthetic movement, he was the cofounder and original literary editor of The Yellow Book (1894–1897), a journal of arts and letters that was a primary outlet for art-for-art’s-sake adherents such as art editor Aubrey Beardsley (1872–1898) and caricaturist Max Beerbohm (1872–1956). During his years in England Harland also produced several romances, the best known of which is The Cardinal’s Snuff Box (1900), about the love affair of an English novelist and an Italian duchess.

Source

Beckson, Karl E. Henry Harland, His Life and Work. London: The Eighteen Nineties Society, 1978.

Harper and Brothers (1817– ) publishing house

The Harper brothers—John, James, Wesley, and Fletcher—established one of the most influential publishing houses of the nineteenth century. At first, the brothers primarily published reprints of British authors, nonfiction by American authors, and textbooks, but by the end of the century they were a major publisher of American fiction, both in Harper periodicals and in books with the Harper imprint.

The company later known as Harper and Brothers was founded by John and James Harper in 1817 as J. and J. Harper, Printers. Eager to enter the arena of book publishing, John and James first took on printing jobs. In their printing, and later in publishing, the Harpers relied on the superiority of their product to secure new business. By the 1820s, the firm was publishing books—most of which (taking advantage of the lack of an international COPYRIGHT law) were American editions of English works. By 1825, the younger Harper brothers, Fletcher and Wesley, had joined the business; in 1833 the name of the company was officially changed to Harper and Brothers to reflect the partnership.

The company continued to grow throughout the 1830s. At the beginning of the decade, the brothers began grouping books together as libraries. Such libraries, including the extremely successful Harper’s Family Library, were sold as units. As the decade wore on, however, the publication of fiction became less and less profitable. Not only did the absence of international copyright mean that multiple American publishers could simultaneously publish editions of English books, flooding the market with the same titles, but new periodicals of the era provided readers with full-length and serialized novels at a price lower than books. Harper and Brothers therefore diversified its list of books to include additional important works of nonfiction. An indication of this shift was the company's replacement of the Harper's Family Library with the New Miscellany series in 1845, in which Charles Darwin's Voyage of the Beagle was featured.

Beginning in 1850, Harper and Brothers launched the first of several periodicals that attracted a large national readership. Harper's New Monthly Magazine began in June 1850 (and was later continued under the name HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE). Seven years later, the brothers launched HARPER'S WEEKLY, an illustrated periodical similar to Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper founded two years earlier. Then, in 1867, Fletcher Harper convinced his brothers to start a women's fashion magazine that also included articles and literature. This magazine was Harper's Bazar. Despite initial concern about the magazine's viability, the Bazar did extremely well for the company, and much of Harper's most notable fiction appeared in its pages. The last of the Harper periodicals, Harper's Young People, appeared in 1879.

Following the CIVIL WAR, Harper and Brothers continued to grow, thanks in part to the volume of work it published on the war, as well as to the enormous demand for reading material in the postbellum years. Further, American fiction flourished during the final three decades of the century, and beginning around 1875 Harpers amassed a strong list of American authors. Hamlin GARLAND, William Dean HOWELLS, Henry JAMES, Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), and Constance Fenimore WOOLSON all appeared in Harper's periodicals and books. The company had further success with British authors in the 1880s and 1890s, especially after a law was passed making it possible for foreign authors to obtain copyright protection in the United States. Though the Harper brothers had stood on both sides of the international copyright issue at various times, beginning in 1884, Joseph W. Harper played a prominent role in the eventual passage of the new law.

By this time, a second and third generation were running Harper and Brothers. The 1880s marked the peak of the company's success; by the end of that decade Harper and Brothers was the largest publishing operation in the country, with four periodicals and over four thousand books in print. During the 1890s—an extremely rough period for publishers generally—the company's finances suffered. For a period of time early in 1899, the publishing company came under the control of S. S. McClure. By the close of the century, the Harpers had borrowed $850,000 from J. P. Morgan & Company and the company was officially bankrupt. Following an agreement with Morgan, the firm was reorganized under the control of George M. Harvey, owner of the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Under his leadership, Harper and Brothers again established itself in the twentieth century as a major American publisher.

Source

Exman, Eugene. The House of Harper: One Hundred and Fifty Years of Publishing. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Harper, Frances Ellen Watkins (1825–1911) poet, novelist, short-story writer, essayist

I have essayed to weave a story which I hope will subserve a deeper purpose than the mere amusement of the hour, that it will quicken and invigorate human hearts and not fail to impart a lesson of usefulness and value.

—Trial and Triumph (1889)

Born to free parents in a slave state and orphaned by age three, Frances Ellen Watkins grew up in Baltimore, Maryland, under the influence of her uncle, William Watkins, a civil rights activist and teacher at the Academy for Negro Youth. As a teenager she worked as a live-in maid for a white Baltimore family who owned a bookstore and encouraged her literary activities. In 1839, Watkins's poetry began appearing in abolitionist publications, and it is thought that in about 1846 she published her first collection of poetry, Forest Leaves, though there are no extant copies.

Steel engraving of Frances E. W. Harper

When, with the passage of the Fugitive Slave Act in 1850, Watkins's uncle moved to Canada, Watkins left Baltimore and took a teaching job at the Union Seminary near Columbus, Ohio. She was the first woman to hold a faculty position there. In 1853 she moved to Little York, Pennsylvania, where she met Underground Railroad activist William Grant Still. As she became increasingly involved with the Underground Railroad, Watkins came to see her call in ABOLITIONISM. She became a full-time speaker and writer and, in 1854, published Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects, the popularity of which increased her influence in abolitionist causes.

Watkins launched her career as a fiction writer with "The Two Offers" (1859), which appeared in Anglo-African Magazine and is the first known short story by an African American author. The obviously autobiographical story juxtaposes the choices of two women: one marries, and the other pursues a life of authorship and activism.

Following her marriage in 1860 to Fenton Harper, a widower with three children, and the birth of a daughter, Mary, much of Frances Harper's time was taken up with family responsibilities. Even so, she continued to write and lecture for the abolitionist cause. Upon Fenton Harper's death in 1864, Frances was forced to pay his debts, leaving her and her children with few monetary resources.

After returning briefly to Pennsylvania in 1867, Harper traveled for three years as a lecturer in support of temperance and morality and against white violence. In the South she witnessed firsthand the difficulties that confronted newly emancipated American blacks, especially black women. She also published both her first novel, Minnie's Sacrifice (1869), and what is sometimes considered her most important poetic work, Moses: A Story of the Nile (1869), a book-length poem in blank verse. Shortly after she returned permanently to Philadelphia in 1871, Harper published two further poetry collections: Poems (1871) and Sketches of Southern Life (1872).

The experiences and knowledge Harper had gained during her tenure in the South continued to permeate the work she undertook in the North as both activist and author. For the remaining forty years of her life she remained committed to social and political reform, particularly to the cause of expanded rights for blacks and women. As one of the first black women to be associated with three predominantly white women's organizations—the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the American Woman Suffrage Association, and the National Council of Women—Harper sought the eradication of racism within such charitable groups while simultaneously working to achieve mutual goals. Among the other organizations with which she was affiliated were the YMCA Sabbath School, the American Association of Education of Colored Youth, the National Association of Colored Women, and the AME Church. Harper's enduring crusade for racial uplift and women's rights through temperance, morality, suffrage, and humanitarianism are reflected in several long works of fiction: Sowing and Reaping: A Temperance Story (1876–1877); Trial and Triumph (1888–1889); and her final and best-known novel, Iola Leroy: Or, Shadows Uplifted (1892). In later years, Harper published several collections of poetry, including The Sparrow's Fall and Other Poems (n.d.), Atlanta Offering: Poems (1895), The Martyr of Alabama and Other Poems (n.d.), Light beyond the Darkness (n.d.), and Idylls of the Bible (1901).

—Linda L. Rodriguez

Principal Books by Harper

Forest Leaves. N.p., ca. 1845.

Poems on Miscellaneous Subjects. Boston: J. B. Yerrinton & Sons, 1854; enlarged, Philadelphia: Merrihew & Thompson, Printers, 1857.

Moses: A Story of the Nile, second edition. Philadelphia: Merrihew & Son, Printers, 1869; enlarged, Philadelphia: The Author, 1889; enlarged again, Philadelphia: The Author, 1893; enlarged again as Idylls of the Bible, Philadelphia: 1006 Bainbridge Street, 1901.

Poems. Philadelphia: Merrihew & Thompson, Printers, 1871.

Sketches of Southern Life. Philadelphia: Merrihew & Son, Printers, 1872; enlarged, Philadelphia: Ferguson Bros. & Co., Printers, 1886.

Light Beyond Darkness. N.p., ca. 1892.

Iola Leroy: Or, Shadows Uplifted. Philadelphia: Garrigues Brothers, 1892.

The Sparrow's Fall and Other Poems. N.p., ca. 1894.

Martyr of Alabama and Other Poems. N.p., ca. 1895.

Atlanta Offering: Poems. Philadelphia: George S. Ferguson, 1895.

Poems. Philadelphia: The Author, 1895; enlarged, Philadelphia: 1006 Bainbridge Street, 1900.

Studying Frances Ellen Watkins Harper

Harper's work fell out of print quickly and has only slowly begun to be available again. For accurate and well-edited texts of Harper's work, students should begin with Frances Smith Foster's A Brighter Coming Day: A Frances Ellen Watkins Harper Reader (New York: Feminist Press at the City University of New York, 1990), which prints a selection of Harper's previously uncollected newspaper and magazine essays, all of her poetry, and much of her prose fiction. In addition, the Reader prints a selection of Harper's letters and public lectures and provides an excellent introduction, appendix, and bibliography. In 1988, Oxford University Press in its Schomburg Library of Nineteenth-Century Black Women Writers published Iola Leroy, edited by Foster (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988), and the

Frontispiece and title page for the enlarged edition of Harper's book-length poem, originally published in 1869 as Moses: A Story of the Nile

Complete Poems of Frances E. W. Harper, edited by Maryemma Graham (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988). The Schomburg edition of the poems has been largely superseded by Foster's Reader, though it remains valuable for Graham's introduction and for its appendices, which record the contents of many of Harper's hard-to-locate volumes, bibliographic information for other ephemeral sources, and the Harper holdings at three major repositories. Similarly, Iola Leroy exists in several recent reprintings, but the Schomburg edition, with its introduction and appendices, is the best available.

The most important recent development in Harper scholarship was the rediscovery of three novels that Harper serialized in the Christian Recorder between 1869 and 1889. These are available in Minnie's Sacrifice, Sowing and Reaping, Trial and Triumph: Three Rediscovered Novels by Frances E. W. Harper, edited by Foster (Boston: Beacon, 1994).

In addition to the introductions discussed above, good starting points for criticism of Harper's work are Elizabeth Ammons's "LEGACY Profile: Frances Ellen Watkins Harper (1825–1911)," (Legacy, 2, [1985]: 61–66); Hazel V. Carby's "'Of Lasting Service for the Race': The Work of Frances Ellen Watkins Harper" in her Reconstructing Womanhood: The Emergence of the Afro-American Woman Novelist (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987, pp. 62–94); and Foster's "Doers of the Word: The Reconstruction Poetry of Frances Ellen Watkins Harper," in her Written by Herself: Literary Production by African American Women, 1746–1892 (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, pp. 131–153).

—Randi Lynn Tanglen

Harper's Monthly Magazine (1850– ) periodical

For the first fifty years this magazine bore the title Harper's New Monthly Magazine. Like HARPER'S WEEKLY, it was founded by Fletcher Harper of the New York publishing firm HARPER AND BROTHERS. It began by reprinting serial British fiction—initially pirated—by writers such as Charles Dickens and Anthony Trollope. In a decade Harper's circulation had grown to two hundred thousand, an unprecedented number for an expensive magazine (a year's subscription cost $3.00). Gradually the magazine introduced material written by American authors, originally in its internal departments; the editor's column, which commented on the arts and on public affairs, was called the "Editor's Easy Chair." In 1869, after Henry Mills ALDEN became its editor and the magazine was challenged by SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY, Harper's published an increasing amount of American literature, featuring authors as diverse as Herman MELVILLE, Sarah Orne JEWETT, and Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS). By 1885, under the editorial influence of William Dean HOWELLS, the magazine began to endorse realistic fiction (see REALISM). By century's end Harper's had made a commitment to addressing contemporary problems, publishing contributions by Woodrow Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt in a magazine that had also taken on a new moniker: Harper's Monthly Magazine.

After World War I the magazine took on a markedly more liberal tone and by the 1960s the periodical—called simply Harper's Magazine since 1925—became the property of the Minneapolis Tribune. By the early 1980s it was nearly defunct when the MacArthur Foundation purchased the magazine and turned it into a not-for-profit endeavor.

Harper's Weekly (1857–1916) periodical

Fletcher Harper, of the New York publishing firm Harper and Brothers, was responsible for founding in 1857 what he thought of as his "Journal of Civilization"—the magazine's subtitle. Like the older HARPER'S MONTHLY, it carried serialized fiction, but Harper's Weekly was primarily a journal of opinion intent on influencing national politics. It was known for its illustrations—first woodcuts, then halftones. Drawings by Thomas NAST helped bring the CIVIL WAR into the homes of average Americans, and Nast's 1871 campaign against the New York political strongman Boss Tweed and his corrupt circle, known as the Tweed Ring, marked an intense period in American political cartooning. Charles Dana Gibson's drawings of his wife, the idealized "Gibson Girl," also appeared in Harper's Weekly. The magazine was never profitable, and in 1914 it was sold to the McClure organization, which sold it again two years later. In 1916 Harper's Weekly was merged with THE INDEPENDENT.

Source

Konwenhoven, John A. Adventures of America 1857–1900; A Pictorial Record from Harper's Weekly. New York: Harper, 1938.

Harris, George Washington (1814–1869) humorist

Born in Pennsylvania, Harris held jobs as a jeweler, a Tennessee River steamboat pilot, and a railroad superintendent before he found his niche as a political writer and dialect humorist. During his lifetime, Harris enjoyed popularity, especially in the South. His admirers included Mark Twain (see SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS) during his lifetime and William Faulkner a generation after his death. Harris is best known for his newspaper and magazine pieces—he was a regular contributor to THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES—and for his collection of TALL TALES and humorous Old Southwest pieces collected as Sut Lovingood: Yarns Spun by a "Nat'ral Born Durn'd Fool" (1867).

Sources

Caron, James E., and M. Thomas Inge, eds. Sut Lovingood's Nat'ral Born Yarnspinner: Essays on George Washington Harris. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1996.

Piacentino, Edward J. The Enduring Legacy of Old Southwest Humor. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2006.

Harris, Joel Chandler (1848–1908) short-story writer, novelist, journalist

Tar-baby ain't sayin' nuthin', en Brer Fox, he lay low.

—Uncle Remus and His Friends (1892)

Joel Chandler Harris was born in Georgia, and at the age of thirteen he was apprenticed to the printer of a weekly called The Countryman, which was published at Turnwold, a Georgia plantation. At Turnwold, Harris received some formal education from the publisher's son and even published some of his own work anonymously in the newspaper. When he was fifteen he went to work for newspapers in Macon, Georgia; New Orleans, Louisiana; and Savannah, Georgia. In 1876 he joined the staff of the Atlanta Constitution, with which he remained associated for the next thirty years.

Harris began his career at the Constitution writing humorous short pieces that featured African Americans and the African American dialect with which he had become familiar at Turnwold. Three years later, inspired by an article about African American folklore, Harris invented Uncle Remus, who made his debut in the story "Negro Folklore. The Story of Mr. Rabbit and Mr. Fox, as Told by Uncle Remus." This story first appeared in the Constitution on July 20, 1879, and later formed the introduction to Harris's first collection of stories, UNCLE REMUS, HIS SONGS AND HIS SAYINGS (1880).

An example of LOCAL COLOR, Harris's Uncle Remus stories were among the earliest in the school of black folk literature. Although some critics have viewed the characterizations of African Americans in Harris's work as racist, it has also been argued that his ear for the spoken word helped to expand the genre of the folktale. Harris published “Brer Rabbit, Brer Fox, and the Tar Baby” in the Constitution on November 16, 1879, and some seven volumes of folktales featuring Uncle Remus followed—some written for a juvenile audience. In 1907 Harris and his son Julian founded Uncle Remus’s Magazine (which was later merged with Home Magazine).

Harris also published numerous other stories, novellas, and two novels that feature Georgia settings similar to those in the Uncle Remus stories. Perhaps the best of these is Mingo and Other Sketches in Black and White (1884), in which Harris explored the relationship between blacks and whites and the disparity between the Southern aristocracy and its middle class.

Sources

- Bickley, Bruce R. Joel Chandler Harris. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
 Bickley, ed. Critical Essays on Joel Chandler Harris. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.
 Brasch, Walter M. Brer Rabbit, Uncle Remus, and the “Cornfield Journalist”: The Tale of Joel Chandler Harris. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 2000.
 Cousins, Paul M. Joel Chandler Harris: A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1968.

Harte, Bret (1836–1902) editor, short-story writer, novelist

Born in Albany, New York, Francis Harte was largely self-educated but still managed to publish his first literary work, a poem, in The Sunday Morning Atlas when he was eleven years old. In 1854 he and his sister sailed to San Francisco to join their mother. In California, Harte taught school, worked an unsuccessful gold-mining claim, and perhaps even served as a guard for the Pony Express, among other pursuits, before beginning his career as a writer with “The Valentine,” which appeared in The Golden Era (March 1857) under the name Bret Harte.

Harte published steadily—humorous sketches, poetry, and the short stories that made him famous. Together with the newspaperman Charles H. Webb, Harte started The Californian in 1864, where many of his pieces appeared, and in 1868 he became editor of the OVERLAND MONTHLY, where he stayed for the next two years. The Monthly published some of Harte’s most celebrated LOCAL COLOR stories, including “The Luck of Roaring Camp” (1868), a story about the spiritual transformation of a frontier gold-mining settlement under the spell of an orphaned child. His “THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT,” a mix of Wild West humor and nineteenth-century sentimentalism, appeared in 1869. When his collection, The Luck of Roaring Camp and Other Sketches, was published in 1870, Harte became famous nationwide.

In 1871 Harte moved back east after accepting a $10,000 offer from THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY to contribute a story or poem each month for a year. When the editor grew weary of Harte’s sentimentality and what was referred to as his “unmoral treatment of immoral subjects,” Harte’s contract was not renewed. Soon Harte was in financial straits from which neither a lecture tour nor publication of a novel, Gabriel Conroy, could save him.

Like some other writers who failed to make a living from their craft—including Nathaniel HAWTHORNE and Herman MELVILLE—Harte sought a government appointment, and in 1878 he served as U. S. consul at Crefeld in Prussia, then as consul in Glasgow, Scotland, from 1880 to 1885. He lived the remainder of his life in London, where he was published regularly, recirculating ideas from his earlier work about California without the inspiration that had made him famous. Still, he is remembered as the original practitioner of the local-color movement, for having helped make San Francisco a literary capital, and for serving as the leader of a group of Western writers that included his friend and sometime-collaborator Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS).

Sources

- Nissen, Axel. Bret Harte: Prince and Pauper. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.
 O’Connor, Richard. Bret Harte: A Biography. Boston: Little, Brown, 1966.
 Scharnhorst, Gary. Bret Harte: Opening the American Literary West. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2000.

Hawthorne, Julian (1846–1934) novelist, historian, biographer

The son of Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Julian Hawthorne was born in Boston but spent much of his early life abroad when his father was engaged in foreign service. In addition to writing books about his family, such as Nathaniel Hawthorne and His Wife (1884) and Hawthorne and His Circle (1903), Julian Hawthorne wrote his own memoirs and fiction such as the melodramatic novel Bressant (1873).

Source

- Bassan, Maurice. Hawthorne’s Son: The Life and Literary Career of Julian Hawthorne. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1970.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel (1804–1864) short-story writer, novelist

The founders of a new colony, whatever Utopia of human virtue and happiness they might originally project, have invariably recognized it among their earliest practical necessities to allot a portion of the virgin soil as a cemetery, and another portion as the site of a prison.

—The Scarlet Letter (1850)

Portrait by Charles Osgood of Nathaniel Hawthorne at age thirty-six

Born in Salem, Massachusetts, Nathaniel Hawthorne descended from a distinguished Puritan family, including a judge who had presided at the Salem witchcraft trials. After his father died in 1808, Nathaniel's mother brought up her son in virtual seclusion; he had a lifelong tendency toward solitary behavior and a brooding temperament. An imaginative child, Hawthorne immersed himself in romances and poetry. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1825 and returned to Salem to write his first tales, many of them symbolic and allegorical and set in colonial New England.

Hawthorne's first significant work was TWICE-TOLD TALES, published in 1837 and expanded in 1842. Many of his most important stories appeared in this volume, including "THE MAY-POLE OF MERRYMOUNT," "Endicott and the Red Cross," "THE MINISTER'S BLACK VEIL," "Dr. Heidegger's Experiment," "The Gray Champion," and "The Ambitious Guest." In these early works, as in his mature novels, there is a hint of the supernatural, an evocation of incidents that challenge the rationality of the modern mind. Hawthorne was much impressed by the Puritan religious consciousness and its belief that human reason was fallible and even misguided. Although he also revealed the narrow-mindedness and antidemocratic tendencies of Puritanism, his work is informed by a tension between past and present values. Compared to Puritan convictions, the beliefs of nineteenth-century characters seem somewhat shallow. Hawthorne recognizes the value of science, for example, but he also sees in science's claims a human pride that would defeat itself.

The publication of Twice-Told Tales initiated a new phase in Hawthorne's life, taking him out of his isolation of the late 1820s and early 1830s. He began editing and writing for publications such as American Magazine of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge (1836); and he wrote books for children, including Grandfather's Chair (1841), Famous Old People (1841), Liberty Tree (1841), and Biographical Stories for Children (1842). His work in the Boston Custom House (1839–1841) was explored in the introduction to his masterpiece, THE SCARLET LETTER (1850). This government job made him acutely conscious of the common run of humanity that he had largely ignored in his earlier reclusive period.

Hawthorne's other great change came with his attempt at communal living at BROOK FARM, the Utopian community set up by several transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). Altogether he spent about six months there, he found life in a commune incompatible with his aloof temperament. Indeed, the idea of establishing an ideal community later struck him as rather absurd, if well meaning, and he dealt shrewdly with this passion to build model communities in THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE (1852).

After he left Brook Farm, Hawthorne married Sophia Peabody, who successfully encouraged him to be more outgoing. During this time he was also writing some of his greatest short stories, such as "YOUNG GOODMAN BROWN," "The Celestial Railroad," "RAPACCINI'S DAUGHTER," "The Artist of the Beautiful," "THE BIRTH-MARK," and "ROGER MALVIN'S BURIAL"—all of which were collected in Mosses from an Old Manse (1846). It was this volume that inspired Herman MELVILLE to rank Hawthorne as a genius comparable to Shakespeare. Melville spoke of Hawthorne's power of blackness, for he saw in Hawthorne a willingness to confront the dark depths of human nature in a way that no other American writer had.

Hawthorne confirmed Melville's hopes with the publication of The Scarlet Letter in 1850, a work of surpassing beauty and moral depth. Hawthorne created a great Romantic heroine in Hester Prynne, and yet the novel also provides one of the greatest critiques of ROMANTICISM. Toward Puritanism—always his main subject—Hawthorne is both highly critical and admiring.

Although Hawthorne never equaled the success of The Scarlet Letter, his following publications, THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES (1851) and The Blithedale Romance, demonstrate considerable achievement. He also continued to produce classic short fiction, like "ETHAN BRAND" in The Snow-Image and Other Twice-Told Tales (1851). He wrote another book for children, Tanglewood Tales (1853).

Frontispiece for A Wonder Book for Girls and Boys (1851), Hawthorne's retelling of six Greek legends

In the 1850s Hawthorne became involved in politics and in 1852 wrote a campaign biography for his friend Franklin Pierce. When Pierce was elected president, Hawthorne was given a diplomatic post in Liverpool. He spent much of the 1850s in Europe, publishing his last complete novel, THE MARBLE FAUN, in 1860. After he returned home in 1860, Hawthorne worked on a collection of essays, Our Old Home (1863), which is full of penetrating observations about his European experience. He did not complete any subsequent longer works of fiction, but fragments of his efforts have been published as Septimus Felton (1872), The Dolliver Romance (1876), Dr. Grimshawe's Secret (1883), and The Ancestral Footstep (1883).

Hawthorne's nonfiction has been collected in Passages from the American Note-Books (1868), Passages from the English Note-Books (1870), and Passages from the French and Italian Note-Books (1871).

Alongside Edgar Allan Poe, Hawthorne is credited with creating the first mature, fully realized American short stories. Poe seemed intent on portraying states of mind and what might be called an ontological dread; Hawthorne instead sought the moral underpinnings of society. Hawthorne's work can be read as commentary on the transition of Puritanism into Romanticism, except that Hawthorne himself cannot be put clearly in either tradition: he had an affinity for both and could see both Puritanism and Romanticism as incomplete in themselves. His work appeals to the modern skeptical mind because he is willing to face squarely the nature of human doubt. At the same time, he treats the human quest for perfection with enormous sympathy and expresses regret at the discovery that no heaven on earth is possible.

Principal Books by Hawthorne

Fanshawe. Boston: Marsh & Capen, 1828.

Twice-Told Tales. Boston: American Stationers, 1837.

The Gentle Boy: A Thrice Told Tale. Boston: Weeks, Jordan / New York & London: Wiley & Putnam, 1839.

Grandfather's Chair: A History for Youth. Boston: E. P. Peabody / New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1841.

Famous Old People: Being the Second Epoch of Grandfather's Chair. Boston: E. P. Peabody, 1841.

Liberty Tree: With the Last Words of Grandfather's Chair. Boston: E. P. Peabody, 1841.

Daguerreotype of Hawthorne, center, with his publishers,
James T. Fields and William D. Ticknor, 1863

First-day cover for the U.S. postage stamp honoring Hawthorne

The Celestial Rail-Road. Boston: Wilder, 1843; Boston: James F. Fish, 1843.

Mosses from an Old Manse, 2 volumes. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

The Scarlet Letter, a Romance. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1850.

The House of the Seven Gables, a Romance. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1851.

A Wonder-book for Girls and Boys. Boston: Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1851.

The Snow-Image, and Other Twice-told Tales. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1852 (i.e., 1851).

The Blithedale Romance, 2 volumes. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1852.

Life of Franklin Pierce. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1852.

Tanglewood Tales for Girls and Boys: Being a Second Wonder-book. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1853.

The Marble Faun; or The Romance of Monte Beni, 2 volumes. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1860; originally published as Transformation: or, The Romance of Monte Beni, 3 volumes. London: Smith, Elder, 1860.

Our Old Home: A Series of English Sketches. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1863.

Passages from the American Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, 2 volumes. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1868.

Passages from the English Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, 2 volumes. Boston: Fields, James R. Osgood, 1870.

Passages from the French and Italian Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne, 2 volumes. Boston: James R. Osgood, 1872.

Septimius Felton; or The Elixir of Life. Boston: James R. Osgood, 1872; originally published as Septimius: A Romance. London: Henry S. King, 1872.

The Dolliver Romance and Other Pieces. Boston: James R. Osgood, 1876.

Doctor Grimshawe's Secret: A Romance. Boston: James R. Osgood / London: Longmans, Green, 1883.

The Centenary Edition of the Works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, 23 volumes, edited by William Charvat, and others. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1962–1988.

Studying Nathaniel Hawthorne

Nathaniel Hawthorne published three short-story collections, five novels, and many lesser works during his lifetime. His writing is generally divided into an earlier period, during which he labored in obscurity, and a later period, when the fame of THE SCARLET LETTER brought him widespread national popularity. In the early works, which included TWICE-TOLD TALES, Mosses from an Old Manse, and The Scarlet Letter, Hawthorne used the rich history of Puritan New England as a backdrop for his primary interests: questions of morality and the tensions between the individual and society. Though his later novels explore similar thematic territory and maintain the same self-conscious narrative voice, most critics agree that their more-contemporary settings and preoccupations interfere with the clarity of Hawthorne's moral vision.

The study of Hawthorne's fiction should begin with the tales—many good collections of which are available—and The Scarlet Letter, generally considered his masterpiece. These should be followed by the later novels. The definitive editions of Hawthorne's works are in the Centenary Edition published by the Ohio State University Press.

The student's understanding of Hawthorne's works will be enhanced by a study of his journals, collected in three volumes: The American Notebooks (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1973), The French and Italian Notebooks (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1980), and The English Notebooks, published as Our Old Home: A Series of English Sketches (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1970). Nina Baym's The Shape of Hawthorne's Career (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1976) is the most influential study of Hawthorne's literary development overall; Frederick Crews's The Sins of the Fathers: Hawthorne's Psychological Themes (New York: Oxford University Press, 1966) provides a psychological examination of his work and is also considered a standard volume. Richard Harter Fogle's Hawthorne's Fiction: The Light and the Dark (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1964) is an in-depth study of Hawthorne's shorter fiction. Twentieth Century Interpretations of The Scarlet Letter, edited by Donald Pfizer (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1968), includes many important essays about the novel. The first resource for those seeking collections of essays is that edited by Harold Bloom, Nathaniel Hawthorne (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003).

Students focusing on Hawthorne's lesser writings will benefit from The Shape of Hawthorne's Career, mentioned above. Neil Frank Doubleday's Hawthorne's Early Tales: A Critical Study (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1972) is useful for those wishing to understand Hawthorne's early development as a fiction writer. The only study of Hawthorne's writing for children is Laura Laffrado's Hawthorne's Literature for Children (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992). Edward Davidson's Hawthorne's Last Phase (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1949) examines the four romances that Hawthorne left unfinished at the time of his death.

Brenda Wineapple, Hawthorne: A Life (New York: Knopf, 2003) is the recommended full-length biography of Hawthorne. It should be supplemented by Edwin Haviland Miller's Salem Is My Dwelling Place: A Life of Nathaniel Hawthorne (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1991).

C. E. Frazer Clark's Nathaniel Hawthorne: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1978) is the standard primary bibliography. Jeanetta Boswell's Nathaniel Hawthorne and the Critics: A Checklist of Criticism, 1900–1978 (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1982) is a good secondary bibliography. Students should consult the Hawthorne chapters in American Literary Scholarship: An Annual (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1963– ) as well as the annual MLA Bibliography. Gary Scharnhorst's Nathaniel Hawthorne: An Annotated Bibliography of Commentary and Criticism before 1900 (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1988) provides a listing of nineteenth-century critical work on Hawthorne.

—Student Guide by Morgan Goode

Hayne, Paul Hamilton (1830–1886) poet, editor, biographer

Born in Charleston, South Carolina, and educated at Charleston College, Paul Hamilton Hayne was a distinctly Southern poet considered the “last of the literary cavaliers.” Prior to the CIVIL WAR, Hayne was known for his nature poetry. He contributed to the SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER and worked on the staff of the Southern Literary Gazette. In 1857 he founded Russell's Magazine, named for the Russell's Bookstore Group (a literary group to which Hayne belonged in Charleston).

With Confederate secession, Hayne's magazine and literary orientation changed. Poor health prevented him from seeing more than limited service during the war, but his powerful feelings about his native South were expressed in ardently patriotic verses. During General William Tecumseh Sherman's (1820–1891) march to the sea in 1864, Hayne's home was destroyed. Retreating to a small estate amid the Georgia pines, Hayne continued to support his impoverished family with his writings, publishing Legends and Lyrics (1872), Lives of Robert Young Hayne and Hugh Swinton Legaré (1878), and an edition of his friend Henry TIMROD's poems.

Sources

Aiken, David. Fire in the Cradle: Charleston's Literary Heritage. Charleston, S.C.: Charleston Press, 1999.

Moore, Rayburn S. Paul Hamilton Hayne. New York: Twayne, 1972.

A Hazard of New Fortunes by William Dean

Howells (New York: Harper, 1890) novel
Serialized in Harper's New Monthly (See HARPER'S MONTHLY) before being published as a book, A Hazard of New Fortunes follows Basil March (an authorial stand-in who appears often in Howells's work) as he moves from Boston to New York to start a literary magazine, Every Other Week. The venture is bankrolled by a Midwestern transplant, Jacob Dryfoos, newly wealthy from a natural-gas discovery on his farm. Conflict arises between Dryfoos and Berthold Lindau, a German socialist whom March has hired as a translator, and Dryfoos calls for Lindau's termination. A Hazard of New Fortunes exemplifies Howells's literary REALISM, blending plausible psychological portraiture and attention to the broad socioeconomic landscape of urban life.

Source

Howells, William D. A Selected Edition of W. D. Howells, Volume 16: A Hazard of New Fortunes, edited by David J. Nordloh. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1976.

—Perry Trolard

Hearn, Lafcadio (1850–1904) journalist, novelist, travel writer

Born on the Greek island of Santa Maura, Lafcadio Hearn was the son of a British army surgeon and a local Greek woman; he was raised by relatives in Dublin, Ireland, and educated in England and France. In 1869 Hearn immigrated to the United States, where he lived for the next eighteen years. From 1875 to 1878 he worked as a reporter for the Cincinnati Commercial, but he lost his job there over a scandal occasioned by his living with, and probably marrying, a mulatto woman. He subsequently moved to New Orleans, where he worked for the New Orleans Item (1878–1881) and for the New Orleans Times-Democrat (1881–1887) before leaving for the island of Martinique, where he wrote for Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Hearn's first book, One of Cleopatra's Nights (1882), was a translation of stories by the French writer Théophile Gautier (1811–1872). His following publications included Stray Leaves from Strange Literature (1884), a reconstruction of stories taken from exotic sources; Gombo Zhêbes (1885), a collection of Creole proverbs; and Some Chinese Ghosts (1887), a collection of Chinese legends. His travels to Grand Isle in Louisiana resulted in the novel Chita: A Memory of Last Island (1889), and after living in Martinique he wrote Two Years in the French West Indies (1890) and Yourma (1890), a novel set during the island slave rebellion of 1848. Also in 1890, Hearn did some hackwork in New York City to raise money for a trip to Japan, where he spent the remainder of his life. Marrying into a samurai family, Hearn took the name Koizumi Yakumo. He became a Japanese citizen in 1895. While he continued to write prolifically, he turned his attention toward his adopted country. A year spent teaching in the small town of Matsue allowed him to observe closely the feudal customs he relates in Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan (1894). He held the chair in English literature at the Imperial University of Tokyo for a decade, during which time he published a dozen books detailing the look, smell, and feel of Japan. His collections of stories, such as Out of the East (1895), were often written in the form of essays. In Japan: An Attempt at Interpretation (1904), Hearn summarized his observations and feelings about the people of Japan.

Sources

Hirakawa, Sukehiro, ed. Rediscovering Lafcadio Hearn: Japanese Legends, Life & Culture. Folkestone, Kent, England: Global Oriental, 1997.

Murray, Paul. A Fantastic Journey: The Life and Literature of Lafcadio Hearn. Folkestone, Kent, England: Japan Library, 1993.

Stevenson, Elizabeth. The Grass Lark: A Study of Lafcadio Hearn. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction, 1998.

Hearth and Home (1868–1875) periodical

This New York-based weekly began in 1868 as a source of agricultural information and literary entertainment for rural audiences. Its early editors included Harriet Beecher STOWE, Mary Mapes DODGE, and Frank R. STOCKTON. The magazine went into a decline until it was rescued by Edward EGGLESTON, who not only took over as literary editor but who also contributed his novel The Hoosier School-Master (1870–1871) as a serial publication. The work proved to be popular enough to save Hearth and Home, which went on to publish work by Rebecca Harding DAVIS, Louisa May ALCOTT, and Edward Everett HALE. The magazine folded in 1875.

Hentz, Caroline Lee (1800–1856) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Massachusetts, Caroline Lee Whiting married the entomologist and painter Nicholas Marcellus Hentz in 1824. After 1827 the couple resided in six western and southern states, including Florida. The peak of Hentz's literary career came in the early 1850s, when her novels sold 93,000 copies in the course of three years. Among her most popular books were Linda (1850) and its sequel, Robert Graham (1855).

The protagonist of the novel Eoline, or the Heiress of Magnolia Vale (1852) works as a music teacher after rejecting a marriage proposal, although she ultimately acknowledges her feelings for her suitor and accepts his offer. A supporter of the institution of slavery, although she never owned slaves, Hentz published two antiabolition novels, Marcus Warland (1852) and The Planter's Northern Bride (1854), which can be considered responses to Harriet Beecher STOWE's abolitionist novel UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1852).

Source

Kelley, Mary. Private Woman, Public Stage: Literary Domesticity in Nineteenth-Century America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

—Amy Cummins

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth (1823–1911)
editor, essayist

Although Thomas Wentworth Higginson was an accomplished man of letters in his own right, he is best remembered for the editorial service he provided to another writer, the poet Emily DICKINSON. Born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Higginson became a Unitarian minister (see UNITARIANISM) and ardent abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM). During the CIVIL WAR he served as the colonel of the first regiment of African American soldiers, an experience he would later describe in Army Life in a Black Regiment (1870). After the war he devoted himself to writing and to social reform, particularly in the areas of equal rights for African Americans and women's suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM).

In 1862, after publishing an essay in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY that urged writers to seek an audience for their work, he received an unsolicited letter from Dickinson, who wanted to know "if my Verse is alive?" Higginson encouraged her, and the two kept up a correspondence for many years. After her death Higginson and Dickinson's friend Mabel Loomis TODD edited two volumes of Dickinson's poetry. Celebrated for bringing such an original talent to the world's attention, Higginson has also been heavily criticized for regularizing Dickinson's eccentric style, which he considered "spasmodic."

Higginson came to know most of the major literary lights of his day, whom he would later recall in the autobiographical Cheerful Yesterdays (1898) and in biographies of Margaret FULLER (1884), John Greenleaf WHITTIER (1902), and Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW (1902).

Sources

Broadbuss, Dorothy C. Genteel Rhetoric: Writing High Culture in Nineteenth-Century Boston. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Tuttleton, James W. Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Hildreth, Richard (1807–1865) journalist, historian, philosopher

He who reads the story of the human race with a calm, an impartial, a philosophic mind, will learn to rise above prejudices, and passions, and narrow notions of those who have written it.

—Despotism in America (1840)

Richard Hildreth entered Phillips Exeter Academy at age nine and Harvard at age fifteen. In 1832 he cofounded an anti-Jacksonian newspaper, the Boston Atlas. An extended stay in Florida prompted America's first antislavery novel (and Hildreth's only novel), The Slave: or Memoirs of Archy Moore (1836), along with a nonfiction abolitionist treatise, Despotism in America (1840). Hildreth's many nonfiction works on topics such as bank reform, religion, temperance, and nativism elucidated his belief in the ethical application of scientific thought to human action. His History of the United States of America (1849–1852), although influential with later historians, sold disappointingly and was abandoned incomplete. Hildreth spent the last decade of his life as editor of the New York Tribune, where he continued his spirited attack on slavery.

Sources

Bentley, Nancy. "White Slaves: The Mulatto Hero in Antebellum Fiction," American Literature, 65 (1993): 501–522.

Emerson, Donald E. Richard Hildreth. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1946.

Pingel, Martha M. An American Utilitarian: Richard Hildreth as a Philosopher. New York: Columbia University Press, 1948.

—Brett Barney

Historical Novel

The historical novel, in which fictional characters and events are placed in an historical setting, was popularized in the early part of the nineteenth century by the Scottish novelist Sir Walter Scott, whose works had wide influence in the United States. Although not a novel in the formal sense, Washington IRVING's History of New York (1809), which was begun as a burlesque of historical methods, developed into a more serious work that helped give the American people a sense of their own past. "Before the appearance of my work," Irving wrote, "the popular traditions of our city were unrecorded; the peculiar and racy customs and usages derived from our Dutch progenitors were unnoticed or regarded with indifference, or adverted to with a sneer." James Fenimore COOPER took up where Irving left off, transporting the ROMANTICISM of Scott to American soil, where the rugged individualist Natty Bumppo became the embodiment of the frontier spirit in the LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

The historical novel in midcentury was dominated by two figures: Nathaniel HAWTHORNE and Herman MELVILLE. Hawthorne turned back to the history of the nation and to his own family's past in order to produce two classics of American literature. THE SCARLET LETTER and THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES both take as their subject the consequences of Puritan intolerance. In the famous "Custom House" essay that acts as a preface to The Scarlet Letter, Hawthorne spells out his own connection, through a direct forebear, to the Salem witchcraft trials that serve as a muted backdrop to his masterpiece.

Melville's ISRAEL POTTER (1855) exhibited the modernist technique of basing a fictional narrative on the life of an historical figure, the eponymous Revolutionary War soldier. In South Carolina, around the same time, William Gilmore SIMMS was revisiting the colonial and revolutionary periods from a Southern perspective in his Border Romances and Revolutionary Romances series.

The CIVIL WAR gave rise to a surfeit of historical novels concerning the war, perhaps the most notable of which was Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage (1895), a naturalistic account of daily life on the front lines from the point of view of a young man who had not yet seen battle. As the postwar period itself faded into history, American literature began to fracture into regionalism, giving rise to the LOCAL COLOR movement, with its emphasis on what was close at hand rather than on the broader canvas of history.

Sources

- Clark, Robert. History and Myth in American Fiction, 1823–52. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- Gould, Philip. Covenant and Republic: Historical Romance and the Politics of Puritanism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Kennedy, J. Gerald, and Daniel Mark, eds. American Letters and the Historical Consciousness: Essays in Honor of Lewis P. Simpson. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

Hobomok by Lydia Maria Child (Boston: Cummings, Hilliard, 1824) novel

Hobomok: A Tale of Early Times was written by Lydia Maria CHILD in 1824, when she was twenty-two. Child got the idea for her story after reading the narrative poem Yamoyden: A Tale of the Wars of King Philip (1820), by James Eastburn and Robert C. Sands. Considered a sentimental novel, Hobomok tells the story of an Indian chief named Hobomok. As an embodiment of the “noble savage” he remains loyal to a small New England settlement in a time of increasing hostility between white settlers and American Indians. He marries a white woman, Mary Conant, who has been driven to despair by the death of her mother and the purported drowning of her lover. Although Hobomok and Mary are happily married and have a young son, when Mary's lover returns several years later, Hobomok sacrifices his own happiness by going west to die—an act that both signifies his nobility and foreshadows the fate of his race. The novel is sometimes regarded as one of the first antiracist and antipatriarchal texts. However, while Hobomok is an admirable character, the story's resolution implies a belief that Indians are, inevitably, a fading race—a popular and romanticized view held by many nineteenth-century white Americans.

—Sabrina Ehmke Sergeant

Source

- Child, Lydia Maria. Hobomok and Other Writings on Indians, edited by Carolyn L. Karcher. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.

Hoffman, Charles Fenno (1806–1884) editor, novelist, poet

Born in New York City, Charles Fenno Hoffman was trained as a lawyer but he practiced only briefly, preferring a career as a writer. In addition to contributing to THE AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE, KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE, and the New-York Mirror, Hoffman acted as editor of each of these periodicals at various times. In 1835 Hoffman published an account of his journey across the Alleghenies and the prairies, A Winter in the West. He also wrote fiction, most notably Greyslaer (1840), an account of a sensational murder case in Kentucky; the novel was successfully adapted for the stage. Hoffman was also well known for his poetry, which was collected in the 1873 volume Poems. In 1849 Hoffman suffered a mental breakdown and was committed the following year to an institution; he never published again.

Source

- Barnes, Homer F. Charles Fenno Hoffman. New York: Columbia University Press, 1930.

Holley, Marietta (1836–1926) humor writer, travel writer

“Id’no,” sez he, “and I told her so, what wimmen want rights for, or to vote; I never wanted wimmen to vote, I told her they wuz too good, they wuz too near angels to have rights. . . .”

—Samantha at the St. Louis Exposition (1904)

The youngest of seven children, Marietta Holley grew up on a farm near Lake Ontario in New York. In twenty-one books published between 1873 and 1914, she created the memorable comic persona of Samantha Smith Allen (usually called “Josiah Allen’s wife”). With Samantha Allen as her spokesperson, Holley staked out positions on issues such as TEMPERANCE, Mormonism, and race relations. Far more than any other concern, though, the “WOMAN QUESTION” dominates Holley’s fiction, which is a forum for Samantha’s common-sense advocacy that women should receive not only the vote but also equal pay, an increased role in church governance, and more freedom in both fashion and marriage options. Although Holley declined to speak on such themes in public, her folksy alter ego, Samantha, offers strong opinions at humorous length.

The Samantha books share a tradition of humor writing with works by authors such as Seba SMITH, Frances WHITCHER, Benjamin SHILLABER, and Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS). As with those, the comic fulcrum in Holley’s sketches is the personable and quirky narrator brought to life through her own colorful vernacular speech. Several of the Samantha books are presented as travel narratives. In producing these, Holley relied almost entirely on maps and other printed sources, without ever visiting the places that she had Samantha Smith describe.

The Samantha books were extremely successful and consistently profitable. At the height of her popularity in 1890, Holley negotiated a one-book contract for $14,000—the equivalent of more than $300,000 in 2007. In her posthumously published memoir, Holley noted the irony of her success: she had only reluctantly agreed to write the first Samantha book, convinced that “none would ever want to read it.” Indeed, she thought poetry her “real language.” Holley did publish some poetry, as well as some sentimental fiction.

Sources

Curry, Jane. Marietta Holley. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Holley, Marietta. The Story of My Life, in Watertown Daily Times, February 5, 1931–April 9, 1931.

Winter, Kate H. Marietta Holley: Life with “Josiah Allen’s Wife.” Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1984.

—Brett Barney

Holmes, Oliver Wendell (1809–1894) poet, essayist, novelist, biographer

Science is a first-rate piece of furniture for a man’s upper chamber, if he has common sense on the ground floor.

—The Poet at the Breakfast-Table (1872)

A member of the Boston Brahmin class (of privileged people, a term he coined), Oliver Wendell Holmes was the son of the Cambridge, Massachusetts, Congregational clergyman Abiel Holmes (1763–1837) and a direct descendant of the Puritan poet Anne Bradstreet (circa 1612–1672). Holmes first studied law before turning to medicine, receiving his medical degree from Harvard in 1836. He had, however, already begun publishing—a series of reunion poems about his Harvard undergraduate class of 1829 as well as the poem “Old Ironsides” (1830), which proved to be a successful protest against the proposed destruction of the War of 1812 ironclad ship, the Constitution. Holmes published two pieces in The New England Magazine in 1831–1832, “THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE” (precursors of the famous essay series he later published in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY). However, after the 1836 publication of Poems, Holmes turned his attention to medicine.

Holmes was a professor of anatomy at Dartmouth College from 1838 to 1840, after which he published two important medical books. From 1847 until his retirement in 1882, he was Parkman Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Harvard, where he also served for six years as dean of the medical school. It was not long, however, before his superior skills as a lecturer brought him before the general public on the lyceum circuit (see LYCEUM MOVEMENT). A staple of Boston society and club life, he was a noted conversationalist and composer of occasional verse, especially when it came to Harvard occasions; at least 108 of his 408 poems deal in some way with his alma mater. Holmes was also a humanitarian reformer and a militant Unitarian (see UNITARIANISM) who attacked the Calvinist faith, perhaps most notably in his poem “The Deacon’s Masterpiece” (1858) and in his novel Elsie Venner: A Romance of Destiny (1861), an allegorical work meant “to test the doctrine of ‘original sin’ and human responsibility.”

Like most of his later work, Elsie Venner first appeared in The Atlantic Monthly. After this magazine was founded in 1857—its name bestowed on it by Holmes—Holmes’s identity was primarily that of a man of letters. Between 1858 and 1881 Holmes contributed his Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table series, his own admixture of verse and narrative, conversation and soliloquy, anecdote and essay. In addition to these submissions, he wrote verse, fiction, addresses, and lectures, as well as two biographies, one of Ralph Waldo EMERSON and another of John Lothrop Motley. His son, Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. (1841–1935), was a United States Supreme Court justice.

Sources

Broadus, Dorothy C. Genteel Rhetoric: Writing High Culture in Nineteenth-Century Boston. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Dowling, William C. Oliver Wendell Holmes in Paris: Medicine, Theology, and The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. Durham: University of New Hampshire, 2006.

Henry Holt and Company (1873–1960) publishing house

The beginnings of Henry Holt and Company can be said to date to 1863, when German immigrant Frederick Leypoldt began publishing a handful of titles from his Philadelphia bookstore. Henry Holt, a Yale-educated lawyer, became Leypoldt’s partner in 1866, after the business transferred to New York. Following a series of name changes that marked the departure of Leypoldt and the arrival and departure of fellow Yale graduate Ralph Williams, the firm officially became known as Henry Holt and Company in 1873. During these early years, the company published mostly foreign works, including Ivan Turgenev’s Fathers and Sons (1867), Hippolyte Taine’s History of English Literature (1871), John Stuart Mill’s Autobiography (1873), and Thomas Hardy’s Under the Greenwood Tree (1873).

In the absence of international COPYRIGHT, American publishing during the middle of the century operated under the “courtesy principle,” an unwritten code whereby the first publisher to announce publication plans for a foreign author’s work was generally given exclusive rights to that author’s work in exchange for a share of the profits. As this informal system broke down and Holt faced competition from less reputable publishers who reprinted Holt authors without payment, the firm turned increasingly to American writers, including Henry ADAMS and William JAMES.

By this point science and textbooks had become the mainstay of the firm’s business, though it also saw popular success with such fictional works as Paul Leicester FORD’s The Honorable Peter Stirling (1894), Anthony Hope’s The Prisoner of Zenda (1894), and H. G. Wells’s The Time Machine (1895). In the twentieth century, noteworthy Holt authors included Robert Frost, Marcel Proust, Albert Einstein, Albert Schweitzer, Bertrand Russell, A. E. Housman, and Frederick Jackson Turner.

Henry Holt involved himself in the various aspects of the company to an unusual extent, acting not only as publisher but also as recruiter and editor. Following the hire of Alfred Harcourt in 1910, Holt's control began to wane, and after his death in 1926 the firm was transferred to public ownership. It continued under the same name, however, until 1960, when a three-way merger created Holt, Rinehart, and Winston.

Source

Holt, Henry. Garrulities of an Octogenarian Editor. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1923.

—Brett Barney

Hope Leslie by Catharine Maria Sedgwick (New York: White, Gallaher & White, 1827) novel

Catharine Maria SEDGWICK's third novel, Hope Leslie; or, Early Times in the Massachusetts, is also usually considered her best. An historical ROMANCE, the book blends conventional romance—in this case a Puritan love story—with an historical setting and events—the Puritans' subjugation of the natives in seventeenth-century New England. The novel depicts the intertwined lives of two heroic women. The title character, Hope, is the foster daughter of a Puritan leader; Magawisca is the daughter of a Pequot leader. Sedgwick's novel is unusual in its presentation of the Pequot War from the Native Americans' rather than the Puritans' perspective. Hope Leslie is also noteworthy for the parallels it draws between the women who struggle against Puritanism's patriarchal society and the Native Americans who fight the Puritans to retain their land. The novel received both positive and negative criticism when it was published, the major criticism being that readers found it difficult to accept Magawisca as a moral character. More recently critics have also focused on Magawisca's morality, celebrating the novel as the first to present a female Native American character that defied popular stereotypes. Also important is Sedgwick's representation of Magawisca's spiritual beliefs; her pantheistic belief in God is as valid as Hope's Christianity.

Source

Sedgwick, Catharine Maria. Hope Leslie; or, Early Times in the Massachusetts, edited with an introduction, by Mary Kelley. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1987.

—Vicki Martin

Houghton Mifflin and Company (1880–1908) publishing house

Houghton Mifflin and Company came into being with the demise of Houghton, Osgood, and Company in 1880 (see James R. OSGOOD and Company). Henry Houghton had been partner in several other publishing firms and had a long history in printing. The new firm's other partner, George Mifflin, had entered the business in 1868 as a worker at Houghton's Riverside Press, and by 1872 he had risen to become Houghton's publishing partner.

One of Houghton Mifflin's early strengths was the valuable list of authors inherited from its predecessor, in which New England authors figured prominently. These included John Greenleaf WHITTIER, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, James Russell LOWELL, and Oliver Wendell HOLMES. The company also took over as publisher of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. Among several popular series that Houghton Mifflin inaugurated, its Riverside Literature series is especially noteworthy. With the formation of the Educational Division in 1882, this began as a line of inexpensive editions aimed at schools and universities and featured works by Whittier, Emerson, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Edgar Allan POE, and many prominent English authors. Authors of later titles in the series include William Dean HOWELLS, Thomas Bailey ALDRICH, and Sarah Orne JEWETT.

After the turn of the century, Houghton Mifflin increasingly relied upon educational publishing. By the time of its incorporation in 1908 as Houghton Mifflin Company, education was the company's largest and most profitable segment. Under the leadership of editor Ferris Greenslet, the firm also published important literary works by Willa Cather, Amy Lowell, Conrad Aiken, and H.D. (Hilda Doolittle). In recent decades the focus on the education market has increased even further, and numerous mergers and ownership changes have all but obliterated connections between the original company and the current one, owned by a group of investment firms.

Source

Ballou, Ellen B. The Building of the House: Houghton Mifflin's Formative Years. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1970.

—Brett Barney

The House of the Seven Gables by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Boston: Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1851) novel

In this dark romance, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE explores the debilitating effects of the past upon the present. The narrative draws upon an incident involving Hawthorne's own great-grandfather, Judge John Hathorne, one of the judges at the Salem Witchcraft trials, who (it was thought) had elicited a curse that continued into later generations.

The house in the novel is itself cursed, blighting the lives of its inhabitants, the Pyncheons. When the novel opens, the house is already two centuries old, built on land that had been obtained fraudulently by Colonel Pyncheon from Wizard Maule, whom the former had helped to condemn to death for witchcraft. With his dying breath, Maule had issued a curse that continues to influence the Pyncheons generations later.

Written in the style of a Gothic romance, THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES makes an interesting companion with its immediate predecessor, THE SCARLET LETTER (1850), and much critical commentary has focused on a comparison of the two works. Early critics (and Hawthorne himself) considered The House of the Seven Gables to be superior, though it is now usually viewed as a lesser achievement. Together, the novels constitute a masterful and multidimensional portrait of Hawthorne's—and New England's—spiritual history.

Sources

Robinson, Enders A. Salem Witchcraft and Hawthorne's House of the Seven Gables. Bowie, Md.: Heritage Books, 1992.

Rosenthal, Bernard, ed. Critical Essays on Hawthorne's The House of the Seven Gables. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.

—Brett Barney

Hovey, Richard (1864–1900) poet, playwright

Richard Hovey was born in Illinois and published his first volume of verse at the age of sixteen. He published his first play, Launcelot and Guinevere: A Poem in Dramas, in 1891. That same year he left for Europe, where he came under the influence of the French Symbolist poets and translated eight plays written by the Belgian dramatist Maurice Maeterlinck. Returning to the United States in 1892, he left for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with his friend, the Canadian poet Bliss Carman. Inspired by the Canadian Maritimes, the two writers collaborated on three volumes of poetry that celebrated the idea of the open road and the camaraderie of youth: Songs from Vagabondia (1894), More Songs from Vagabondia (1896), and Last Songs from Vagabondia (1901).

The outbreak of the Spanish-American War in 1898 brought out a streak of American nationalism in Hovey, who published a collection, Along the Trail (1898), which extolled American virtues in poems such as “Unmanifest Destiny” and “The Word of the Lord from Havana.” During this period he also renewed his interest in Arthurian legend, laboring over what was to be a three-volume cycle of poetic dramas inspired by Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur (1485). At the time of Hovey's early death, all but a few fragments of this project—posthumously published as The Holy Grail (1907)—were unfinished.

Sources

Linneman, William R. Richard Hovey. Boston: Twayne, 1976.

Macdonald, Allan H. Richard Hovey: Man and Craftsman. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1957.

Howard, Bronson (1842–1908) journalist, playwright

Born in Detroit, Bronson Crocker Howard moved to New York in 1865. He worked as a newspaper reporter even after the success of his play Saratoga (1870), a pioneering farce. After The Banker's Daughter became a hit in 1878, Howard quit his newspaper job, becoming the first American dramatist to earn a living entirely from playwriting. His most popular work was Shenandoah (1889), a CIVIL WAR drama. Howard was unconcerned about fame, but he took great pride in his craft, in 1891 organizing the American Dramatists' Club (later the Society of American Dramatists and Composers). He also worked actively to secure international COPYRIGHT protection for American writers. Howard's The Autobiography of a Play (1914), a history of his The Banker's Daughter, provides insight into both his craft and his character.

Source

Howard, Bronson. The Autobiography of a Play. New York: Printed for the Dramatic Museum of Columbia University, 1914.

Howe, Julia Ward (1819–1910) poet, editor

*Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord;
... His truth is marching on.*

—“Battle Hymn of the Republic” (1862)

In 1843 New York City native Julia Ward married Samuel Gridley Howe, a prominent humanitarian and teacher of the blind, with whom she edited the Boston Commonwealth, an abolitionist paper (see ABOLITIONISM). After her husband's death, Howe continued her work on behalf of the abolitionist cause, also taking up the causes of women's suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM), prison reform, and international peace. She was a prodigious worker, lecturing around the country and writing prolifically, turning out several volumes of verse as well as works such as Sex and Education (1874) and a life of Margaret FULLER (1883). Howe is best remembered, however, for “The Battle Hymn of the Republic,” which she wrote after watching Union soldiers march off to the CIVIL WAR in November 1861. The song has retained a central position in the canon of American patriotic music.

Sources

Clifford, Deborah Pickman. Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory: A Biography of Julia Ward Howe. Boston: Little, Brown, 1979.

Williams, Gary. Hungry Heart: The Literary Emergence of Julia Ward Howe. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999.

Ziegler, Valarie H. Diva Julia: The Public Romance and Private Agony of Julia Ward Howe. Harrisburg, Pa.: Trinity Press International, 2003.

Howells, William Dean (1837–1920) novelist

People who get up in the world by service to others—through letters, or art, or science—may have their modest little misgivings as to their social value, but people that rise by money—especially if their gains are sudden—never have.

—A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890)

William Dean Howells circa 1900

The Ohio-born William Dean Howells worked in his father's printing office and got most of his education by reading the books there. One of his first publications was a campaign biography for Abraham Lincoln, which he published in 1860. The work led him to a job in the consulate in Venice, Italy, and provided material for two books: Venetian Life (1866) and Italian Journeys (1867). Much later he demonstrated his knowledge of Italian literature in his Modern Italian Poets (1887).

Howells returned to the United States in 1865, worked briefly at THE NATION, and then became an editor at THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, serving as editor in chief from 1871 to 1881. His base was now Boston, and he became one of the important figures in the city's literary life. He rapidly produced several novels that compared American and Italian manners: A Chance Acquaintance (1873), A Foregone Conclusion (1875), The Lady of Aroostook (1879), and A Fearful Responsibility (1881).

Howells then embarked on his mature period as a novelist, producing A Modern Instance (1882) and THE RISE OF SILAS LAPHAM (1885), two novels that embodied his desire to portray American characters in realistic settings confronting problems of everyday and business life. The former has some vestiges of the melodrama and simplistic characterization that Howells would soon abandon, but the latter is a careful, critical, yet affectionate portrait of an American businessman.

In the late 1880s Howells moved to New York, a decision that signaled the growing importance of that city and the eclipse of Boston as a literary center. He reported on current events for HARPER'S MAGAZINE and wrote one of his finest novels, A Hazard of New Fortunes (1890), which presents a picture of daily life in New York that still resonates today.

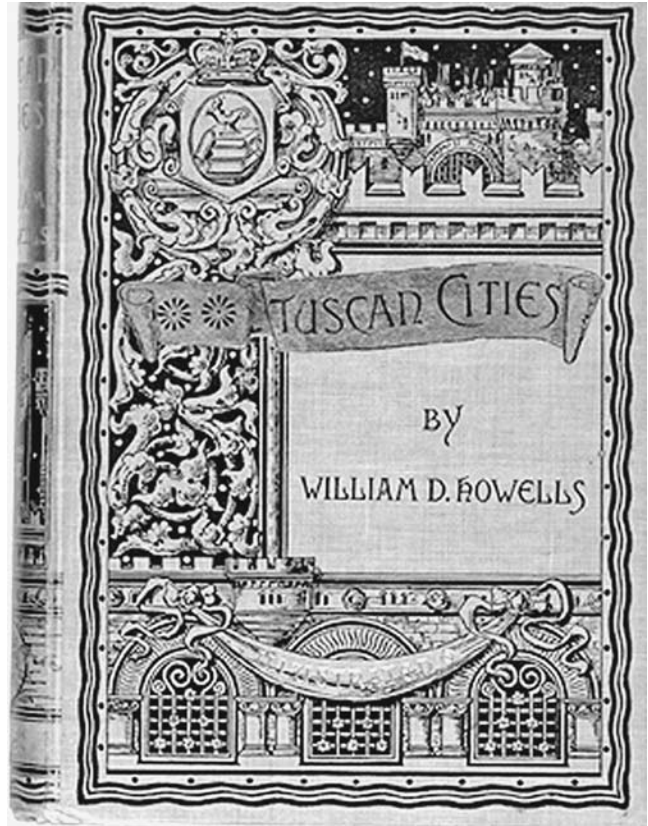

The social and political problems Howells wrote about in his nonfiction also became the subject of novels such as A TRAVELER FROM ALTRURIA (1894) and Through the Eye of the Needle (1907). In Criticism and Fiction (1891), My Literary Passions (1895), and Literature and Life (1902), Howells wrote extensively about fiction and REALISM, establishing himself as the preeminent man of letters of his day. He traveled widely throughout the United States and abroad and helped to advance the careers of such writers as Stephen Crane and Frank Norris.

Howells believed that literature should accurately reflect the way ordinary Americans actually lived and spoke and worked. This adherence to realism, however, was somewhat contradicted by his aversion to the seamy side of life and his observance of Victorian conventions in his fiction. The naturalists, such as Crane and Norris, dealt more candidly with the violent, criminal, and corrupt aspects of American civilization, refusing to accept Howells's belief that fiction should teach sound morality.

Principal Books by Howells

- Venetian Life*. New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1866; revised and expanded, Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1907.
- Italian Journeys*. New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1867; enlarged, Boston: Osgood, 1872; revised, Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1901.
- No Love Lost: A Romance of Travel*. New York: Putnam, 1869.
- Suburban Sketches*. New York: Hurd & Houghton, 1871; enlarged, Boston: Osgood, 1872.
- Their Wedding Journey*. Boston: Osgood, 1872; Edinburgh: Douglas, 1882.
- A Chance Acquaintance*. Boston: Osgood, 1873; Edinburgh: Douglas, 1882.
- Poems*. Boston: Osgood, 1873; enlarged, Boston: Ticknor, 1886.
- A Foregone Conclusion*. Boston: Osgood, 1875 [i.e., 1874].
- Sketch of Life and Character of Rutherford B. Hayes . . . also a Biographical Sketch of William A. Wheeler*. New York: Hurd & Houghton / Boston: Houghton, 1876.
- The Parlor Car: Farce*. Boston: Osgood, 1876.
- Out of the Question. A Comedy*. Boston: Osgood, 1877.
- A Counterfeit Presentment: Comedy*. Boston: Osgood, 1877.
- The Lady of the Aroostook*. Boston: Houghton Osgood, 1879.
- The Undiscovered Country*. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1880.
- A Fearful Responsibility and Other Stories*. Boston: Osgood, 1881.

Dr. Breen's Practice: A Novel. Boston: Osgood, 1881.
A Day's Pleasure and Other Sketches. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1881.
A Modern Instance: A Novel. Boston: Osgood, 1882.
The Sleeping Car: A Farce. Boston: Osgood, 1883.
A Woman's Reason: A Novel. Boston: Osgood, 1883.
A Little Girl among the Old Masters. Boston: Osgood, 1884.
The Register: Farce. Boston: Osgood, 1884.
Three Villages. Boston: Osgood, 1884.
The Elevator: Farce. Boston: Osgood, 1885.
The Rise of Silas Lapham. Boston: Ticknor, 1885.
Tuscan Cities. Boston: Ticknor, 1886.
Poems. Boston: Ticknor, 1886.
The Garroters: Farce. New York: Harper, 1886.
Indian Summer. Boston: Ticknor, 1886.
The Minister's Charge; or, The Apprenticeship of Lemuel Barker. Boston: Ticknor, 1887.
Modern Italian Poets: Essays and Versions. New York: Harper, 1887.
April Hopes: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1888.
A Sea-Change; or, Love's Stowaway: A Lyricated Farce in Two Acts and an Epilogue. Boston: Ticknor, 1888.
Annie Kilburn: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1889.
The Mouse-Trap and Other Farces. New York: Harper, 1889.
A Hazard of New Fortunes. New York: Harper, 1890 [i.e., 1889].
The Shadow of a Dream: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1890.
A Boy's Town Described for "Harper's Young People." New York: Harper, 1890.
Criticism and Fiction. New York: Harper, 1891.
The Albany Depot: Farce. New York: Harper, 1891.
An Imperative Duty: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1892 [i.e., 1891].
The Quality of Mercy. New York: Harper, 1892.
A Letter of Introduction: Farce. New York: Harper, 1892.
A Little Swiss Sojourn. New York: Harper, 1892.
Christmas Every Day and Other Stories Told for Children. New York: Harper, 1893.
The World of Chance: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1893.
The Unexpected Guests: A Farce. New York: Harper, 1893.
My Year in a Log Cabin. New York: Harper, 1893.
Evening Dress: Farce. New York: Harper, 1893.
The Coast of Bohemia: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1893.
A Traveler from Altruria: Romance. New York: Harper, 1894.
My Literary Passions. New York: Harper, 1895.
Stops of Various Quills. New York: Harper, 1895.
The Day of Their Wedding: A Novel. New York: Harper, 1896.
A Parting and a Meeting: Story. New York: Harper, 1896; republished in Idyls in Drab.
Impressions and Experiences. New York: Harper, 1896.
A Previous Engagement: Comedy. New York: Harper, 1897.
The Landlord at Lion's Head. Edinburgh: Douglas, 1897; New York: Harper, 1897.
An Open-Eyed Conspiracy: An Idyl of Saratoga. New York & London: Harper, 1897.

Front cover for Tuscan Cities, 1886. The Atlantic Monthly reviewer commented that the illustrations in this travel book are "like the cover, neither the best nor the worst of their kind."

Stories of Ohio. New York, Cincinnati & Chicago: American Book, 1897.
The Story of a Play: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1898.
Ragged Lady: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1899.
Their Silver Wedding Journey, 2 volumes. New York & London: Harper, 1899.
Bride Roses: A Scene. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1900.
Room Forty-Five: A Farce. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1900.
An Indian Giver: A Comedy. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1900.
The Smoking Car: A Farce. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1900.
Literary Friends and Acquaintance: A Personal Retrospect of American Authorship. New York & London: Harper, 1900.
A Pair of Patient Lovers. New York & London: Harper, 1901.
Heroines of Fiction, 2 volumes. New York & London: Harper, 1901.

William Dean Howells and his closest literary friend, Samuel Langhorne Clemens, from the 1950 illustrated edition of The Rise of Silas Lapham, published by Dodd, Mead

- The Kentons: A Novel*. New York & London: Harper, 1902.
The Flight of Pony Baker: A Boy's Town Story. New York & London: Harper, 1902.
Literature and Life. New York & London: Harper, 1902.
Questionable Shapes. New York & London: Harper, 1903.
Letters Home. New York & London: Harper, 1903.
The Son of Royal Langbrith: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1904.
Miss Bellard's Inspiration: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1905.
London Films. New York & London: Harper, 1905.
Certain Delightful English Towns with Glimpses of the Pleasant Country Between. New York & London: Harper, 1906.
Through the Eye of the Needle: A Romance. New York & London: Harper, 1907.
Between the Dark and the Daylight: Romances. New York: Harper, 1907.
Fennel and Rue: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1908.
Roman Holidays and Others. New York & London: Harper, 1908.
The Mother and the Father: Dramatic Passages. New York & London: Harper, 1909.
Seven English Cities. New York & London: Harper, 1909.
My Mark Twain: Reminiscences and Criticisms. New York & London: Harper, 1910.

- Imaginary Interviews*. New York & London: Harper, 1910.
Parting Friends: A Farce. New York & London: Harper, 1911.
New Leaf Mills: A Chronicle. New York & London: Harper, 1913.
Familiar Spanish Travels. New York & London: Harper, 1913.
The Seen and Unseen at Stratford-On-Avon: A Fantasy. New York & London: Harper, 1914.
The Daughter of the Storage and Other Things in Prose and Verse. New York & London: Harper, 1916.
The Leatherwood God. New York: Century, 1916.
Years of My Youth. New York & London: Harper, 1916.
The Vacation of the Kelwyns: An Idyl of the Middle Eighteen-Seventies. New York & London: Harper, 1920.
Hither and Thither in Germany. New York & London: Harper, 1920.
Mrs. Farrell: A Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1921.
Criticism and Fiction and Other Essays, edited by Clara Marburg Kirk and Rudolf Kirk. New York: New York University Press, 1959.
The Complete Plays of W. D. Howells, edited by Walter J. Meserve. New York: New York University Press, 1960.
W. D. Howells as Critic, edited by Edwin H. Cady. London & Boston: Routledge, 1973.
The Early Prose Writings of William Dean Howells 1853–1861, edited by Thomas Wortham. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1990.
A Selected Edition of William Dean Howells, edited by Edwin H. Cady, David J. Nordloh, Don L. Cook, Christoph K. Lohmann, 23 volumes. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968–1993.

Letters

- Life in Letters of William Dean Howells*, 2 volumes, edited by Mildred Howells. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1928.
The Correspondence of Samuel L. Clemens and William D. Howells, 1872–1910, 2 volumes, edited by Henry Nash Smith and William M. Gibson. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1960.
Selected Letters, 1852–1920, 6 volumes. Boston: Twayne, 1979–1983.
John Hay–Howells Letters, edited by George Monteiro and Brenda Murphy. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Studying William Dean Howells

Between 1860 and his death in 1920 William Dean Howells published over one hundred books, including volumes of poetry, biographies, travel writing, memoirs, short stories, essays, and novels. These are in addition to his regular entries in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE, and other periodicals. Howells's early novels emphasize characters facing internal conflicts, while his later works develop his concern for issues of race, gender, and labor. Despite Howells's lasting influence on American literature and regular attention from critics, his works are rarely taught—a fact largely due to his longstanding reputation as a “genteel” writer. Only one of his works, the short story “Editha” (1905), commonly appears in anthologies.

A study of Howells’s novels should begin with his important novels of the 1880s and 1890s, especially A Modern Instance, THE RISE OF SILAS LAPHAM (his most widely read book), and A HAZARD OF NEW FORTUNES. An appreciation of Howells’s novels and of his contributions to literary theory will be enhanced by reading his Criticism and Fiction (1891) and his Harper’s “Editor’s Study” columns, edited by James W. Simpson (Editor’s Study, Troy, N.Y.: Whitson Publishing Company, 1983). Several of Howells’s novels are reprinted in A Selected Edition of W. D. Howells, edited by Edwin H. Cady, Ronald Gottesman, Don L. Cook, and David J. Nordloh (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968–1993). These volumes include introductions and textual notes to explain the historical and stylistic context of each text. Book reviews and criticism about Howells’s works written during his lifetime can be located using Clayton L. Eichelberger, Published Comment on William Dean Howells through 1920: A Research Bibliography (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1976).

Biographical study of Howells should begin with his own Literary Friends and Acquaintance: A Personal Retrospect of American Authorship (New York: Harper, 1900). The recommended biographies of Howells are Edwin H. Cady’s The Road to Realism: The Early Years 1837–1885 of William Dean Howells (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1956); Cady’s The Realist at War: The Mature Years 1885–1920 of William Dean Howells (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1958), and Kenneth S. Lynn’s William Dean Howells: An American Life (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971). These biographies should be supplemented with Susan Goodman and Carl Dawson’s William Dean Howells: A Writer’s Life (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005).

Students interested in Howells’s relationship with Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) should consult his My Mark Twain: Reminiscences and Criticisms (New York: Harper, 1910) and The Correspondence of Samuel L. Clemens and William D. Howells, edited by Henry Nash Smith and William M. Gibson (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1960). Those interested in Howells’s other literary relationships should, after consulting his Literary Friends and Acquaintance, see the six volumes of his Selected Letters (Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1979–1983).

The William Dean Howells Society website (<<http://www.wsu.edu/~campbelld/howells/index.html>> viewed July 30, 2007) provides regular updates on Howells scholarship and includes annotated bibliographies of books and articles concerning Howells and his work, online texts, teaching resources, and answers to student queries.

— Student Guide by Derek Driedger

A Humble Romance and Other Stories by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (New York: Harper, 1887)
short-story collection

In this well-received collection, Mary E. Wilkins FREEMAN depicts the attitudes, traits, and foibles of New Englanders, using both humor and attention to detail to emphasize the Puritan quirks of what she called “an old and disappearing type.” Described by editor and author William Dean HOWELLS as “peculiarly American” works with “unity of spirit, of point of view, of sympathy,” the stories in this volume paint quaint but realistic pictures of village life, emphasizing the distinctions of local speech and customs (see LOCAL COLOR). In the title tale, a psychological study of rebellion and romance, a shy orphan girl unexpectedly stands up to her overly demanding employer, walking out on her to marry an honest but poor traveling tinker. This revolt doesn’t come without a price; however, Sally discovers inner strength and determination. The theme of women’s emerging (albeit not always desired or easy) economic independence in traditionally male-dominated rural towns also recurs in such stories as “A Mistaken Charity,” “A Taste of Honey,” “An Honest Soul,” and “A Conflict Ended.”

Source

Reichardt, Mary R. Mary Wilkins Freeman: A Study of the Short Fiction. Twayne’s Studies in Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1997.

—Susan M. Stone

“Haircut” by Ring Lardner (1925) short story

“Haircut,” the best known of Ring LARDNER’s 130 short stories, first appeared in Liberty and was collected in THE LOVE NEST AND OTHER STORIES (1926). “Haircut” is a monologue spoken by a barber, Whitey, to a customer who is new to the small Midwestern town where the story is set. While “Haircut” gains much of its appeal from Lardner’s characteristic use of humor, irony, and working-class dialect, the story is actually a biting satire that scorns provincial mores. In acquainting his new client with the town, Whitey unwittingly reveals the ignorance and insensitivity that characterize him and his barbershop cronies, who have built a legend out of the mischievous adventures of the late town prankster, Jim Kendall, an adulterer whose helpless spouse “could of divorced him, only she couldn’t.” As Whitey’s tale implies, Jim—also a heartless, abusive drunkard—derived satisfaction from inflicting pain and humiliation on his family, neighbors, and even complete strangers. Yet, Whitey remembers him as “a good fella at heart.” He views Jim’s death at the hands of a mentally-handicapped man he had long tormented as an unfortunate loss to the quiet town, which he feels Jim had invigorated with his antics.

—John Cusatis

The Hairy Ape by Eugene O’Neill (produced 1922) play

Eugene O’NEILL concluded his formative years as a dramatist under the producing wing of the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS with an eight-scene drama, The Hairy Ape, which opened on March 9, 1922 for 120 performances at the Provincetown Theatre. Enhancing the classically inspired use of masks and choral chants O’Neill featured in the play, expressionistic scene designs by Robert Edmond Jones and Cleon Throckmorton added a nightmarish quality admired by critics who found The Hairy Ape among O’Neill’s most successful theatrical experiments.

The central confrontation in the play occurs when “Yank” Smith, a brutish, inarticulate stoker on a passenger liner, meets Mildred Douglas, pampered daughter of the ship line’s president, as she tours the boiler room. Her crying out in horror and fainting at the sight of Yank sparks his soul-searching journey that ends in his death. Subtitled “A Comedy of Ancient and Modern Life,” the play limited its “comedy” to an ironic absurdity evident in its examination of the alienation of the individual in a technological, capitalist society. It is among the most frequently revived of O’Neill’s early works.

Sources

O’Neill, Eugene. The Hairy Ape. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.

Walker, Julia A. “‘De New Dat’s Moiderin’ de Old’: Oedipal Struggle as Class Conflict in Eugene O’Neill’s The Hairy Ape,” in Art, Glitter, and Glitz: Mainstream Playwrights and Popular Theatre in 1920s America, edited by Arthur Gerwitz and James J. Kolb. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

—James Fisher

Halper, Albert (1904–1984) novelist, short-story writer
Born to Lithuanian Jewish immigrants in Chicago—“in a raw slangy city in a raw slangy neighborhood”—Albert Halper is best known for his fiction about the working people he knew growing up (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE). Before committing himself to a writing career, he worked for years in low-level jobs. Union Square (1933), his first novel, depicts the desperate economic plight of workingmen, realistically treating the lives of a dozen individuals who live in tenements near the square. On the Shore, Young Writer Remembering Chicago (1934) is a collection of stories arranged to show the experiences and growth of the narrator on the West Side of the city (his 1953 story collection, The Golden Watch, treats the same material). He based his novels The Foundry (1934) and The Chute (1937) on his work experiences in an electrotype factory and a mail-order house. For his last novel about life in Chicago, Little People (1942), Halper drew on the employees he knew when he was a delivery boy for a downtown fur and clothing store. Halper later wrote novels set in New York and Florida, including Atlantic Avenue (1956), which is set in Brooklyn. Good-Bye, Union Square: A Writer's Memoir of the Thirties was published in 1970.

Source

Hart, John E. Albert Halper. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

—Tilly Newell

Hammerstein, Oscar, II (1895–1960) lyricist

If you would achieve the rhyming grace and facility of W. S. Gilbert or Lorenz Hart, my advice would be never to open a rhyming dictionary. Don't even own one. While I might, on occasion, place a timid, encroaching foot on the territory of these two masters, I never carry my invasion very far. I would not stand a chance with either of them in the field of brilliant light verse. I admire and envy them their fluidity and humor, but I refuse to compete with them. Aside from my shortcomings as a wit and rhymester—or, perhaps, because of them—my inclination led me to a more primitive type of lyric.

—Lyrics (1949)

Although Oscar Hammerstein II's grandfather had been an impresario of opera and his uncle was a producer, his father was determined to save his son from what he what deemed "the humbug of show business." William Hammerstein insisted Oscar attend Columbia University to study law, but there Hammerstein worked on several collegiate musicals with other students, including Richard Rodgers and Lorenz HART. His uncle Arthur agreed to let him be a stage manager for productions so that he could learn the craft of playwriting.

Oscar was then apprenticed to Otto HARBACH, a master lyricist and librettist, and the two collaborated on such musicals as Rose-Marie (1924), Sunny (1925), and The Desert Song (1926). Hammerstein absorbed Harbach's aesthetic principle that songs should emerge organically out of the characters and dramatic situations of a musical—a rare commitment to dramatic "integration" between song and story in the frothy musicals of the Jazz Age. In 1927 Hammerstein had his greatest early triumph with composer Jerome Kern on Show Boat, which brilliantly established the principle of integration between song and story. He also had success with Sigmund Romberg on The New Moon (1928) and Kern on Sweet Adeline (1929). During the 1930s Hammerstein suffered a series of flops.

Along with most other songwriters, Hammerstein worked in Hollywood during the GREAT DEPRESSION, but his commitment to dramatic integration ran afoul of Hollywood's insistence that most songs be presented as "performances" by characters portraying singers and dancers putting on a theatrical show. Few of Hammerstein's songs for movies were successful, with the exception of "The Folks Who Live on the Hill" for the 1937 musical High, Wide, and Handsome. Discouraged by his Hollywood failures and the disappointingly short run of Very Warm for May (1939), even though it contained "All the Things You Are," Hammerstein retreated to his Pennsylvania farm to work on a labor of love—a libretto for Carmen Jones, a recasting of Bizet's opera for an all-black cast.

It was there that he was sought out by Richard Rodgers, who after years of trying to work with the alcoholic, undependable, and self-destructive Lorenz Hart, had decided to break off the collaboration when Hart refused to write a musical about the opening of the Oklahoma territory. Hammerstein agreed to the project and, despite virtually universal fears that it too would be a flop, when OKLAHOMA! opened in 1943, its enormous success established the principle that songs should be rooted in the story and characters of a musical. Rodgers and Hammerstein pushed that principle to more and more ambitious lengths in such musical dramas as CAROUSEL (1945), South Pacific (1949), and The King and I (1951).

Temperamentally, Rodgers and Hammerstein were more suited to each other than Rodgers and Hart had been: both were disciplined artists with a shrewd sense for business. Their extraordinary collaboration came to an abrupt halt as they were working on The Sound of Music (1959) and Hammerstein was diagnosed with inoperable cancer. Before he retreated to his Pennsylvania farm to die, he told the company of The Sound of Music not to allow their concerns about the show's sentimentality to blind them to the dramatic power that would make it and its songs a success.

Unlike most lyricists of his generation, Hammerstein wrote the book as well as the lyrics for his musical comedies, which allowed him to create dramatic moments when dialogue flowered into song. In his early collaborations, he followed the standard practice of letting his musical collaborator create a melody before he began to work on the lyric. When Kern opened a chorus on a sustained whole note, Hammerstein placed on it the syllable "Who" in the line "Who stole my heart away?," the long vowel allowing the singer to sustain it for several beats. For Show Boat, Hammerstein followed Kern's melodies that were based on simple popular song formulas but created such lyrics as "Ol' Man River," "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man," and "Make Believe," that resonate powerfully with character and dramatic context.

When he collaborated with Rodgers, Hammerstein had the opportunity to write lyrics first, though he usually wrote them with a makeshift "dummy" melody in mind. Such a procedure enabled Hammerstein to anchor lyrics even more integrally into his libretto, and when Rodgers looked at the lyrics, he was inspired to create equally "integrated" music. When Rodgers read the lyric for "The Surrey with the Fringe on Top," for example, he saw that at the end of the opening line, "Chicks and ducks and geese better scurry," the melody should leap upward in imitation of the birds fleeing the oncoming equipage. As a librettist and lyricist, Hammerstein pushed the American musical to greater maturity as he dealt with issues such as racism and xenophobia, creating shows that were more musical "dramas" than comedies.

Hammerstein is the major figure in the transition of the American musical from a show with a lot of gags, dance numbers, and freestanding hit songs to a musical drama where songs grow integrally out of character and dramatic context. While some may decry the soaring sentiments of his lyrics, comparing them to the wry urbanity of Lorenz Hart and Cole Porter, Oscar Hammerstein's dramatically integrated lyrics deeply influenced the next generation of lyricists—Alan Jay Lerner, Sheldon Harnick, Stephen Sondheim.

Sources

Citron, Stephen. The Wordsmiths: Oscar Hammerstein 2nd and Alan Jay Lerner. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Nolan, Frederick. The Sound of Their Music: The Story of Rodgers and Hammerstein. London: Dent, 1978.

—Philip Furia

Hammett, Dashiell (1894–1961) short-story writer, novelist

Dashiell Hammett was born in 1894 in rural St. Mary's County, Maryland, and grew up in Baltimore. He dropped out of high school after his first semester to help support his family. In 1915, when he was twenty-one, he began work in Baltimore as a private detective for Pinkerton's National Detective Service, where his assignments seem to have been primarily in the theft division, shadowing suspects and recovering stolen goods. He interrupted his career in 1918 to join the U.S. Army. He was assigned to an ambulance unit at Camp Meade, near his home, and within four months he contracted Spanish Influenza, which caused activation of latent tuberculosis, probably traceable to his mother. Less than a year after his induction, Hammett was discharged with a serious disability that plagued him for the next decade. He returned to work part-time as a detective first in Baltimore, then in Spokane, before a physical breakdown caused him to be hospitalized in Tacoma, Washington. There he fell in love with his nurse, and after his release from the hospital in 1921, they were married.

Dashiell Hammett, circa 1940

Hammett's poor health caused him to be bedfast in the early 1920s, and with a new wife and young daughter to support, he turned to writing as a source of income. He began writing for magazines, primarily the adventure pulp BLACK MASK, using his past experience as a detective for material. At a time when the pulps encouraged action stories, the more violent the better, Hammett attempted to temper his fiction with reality, and he soon gathered a loyal readership. Most of his stories featured the nameless Continental Op, an agency detective who simply did his job, without resorting to unnecessary violence. After a brief attempt to pursue a full-time career in advertising in 1926 at the time of his second daughter's birth, Hammett had a physical relapse. He turned once again to fiction, this time concentrating on longer works with the encouragement of new Black Mask editor Joseph T. Shaw.

Hammett's first novel (like his next three) was serialized in Black Mask, and he sent it unsolicited to Alfred A. Knopf, who was establishing a new line of mysteries. With the pub-

Dust jacket for Hammett's first novel, in which the Continental Op is hired to clean up Personville, a town controlled by criminals and corrupt police lication and favorable reception of Red Harvest (1929), Hammett became one of Knopf's star writers. He followed with his second novel, The Dain Curse, the same year. In 1930, stating that he meant to make literature from the detective novel, he published THE MALTESE FALCON (1930), which guaranteed his reputation. After two more novels in quick succession—THE GLASS KEY (1931) and The Thin Man (1934)—Hammett had finished publishing novels.

After the publication of The Maltese Falcon, Hammett spent much of his time in Hollywood, where he capitalized on his literary celebrity and his reputation for realistic crime fiction and witty dialogue. By the mid 1930s, he was among the highest paid screenwriters in Hollywood. He was also among the most disdainful of Hollywood culture. Along with his companion Lillian HELLMAN, he became a political activist, advocating Marxist theory and Communist causes. His lavish lifestyle, which included prodigious drinking, led to a series of physical and mental breakdowns in the last years of the decade. In 1939 Hammett moved permanently to the East Coast and pursued his career-long interest in stage drama, acting primarily as an adviser to Lillian Hellman.

During WORLD WAR II, Hammett again enlisted in the army, serving on the Alaskan island of Adak, where he edited the camp newspaper. After the war and his return to civilian life, he quit drinking and rededicated himself to political activism. In 1951 he refused to testify before a federal court about his involvement in a bail fund for Communists accused under the Smith Act. He received a six-month sentence in a federal prison for contempt of court. After his release he was blacklisted from work in the entertainment industry, and a lien was placed against his assets for past-due income taxes amounting to over $111,000. Hammett spent the last decade of his life in poverty. When he died in January 1961, his estate was estimated to be less than $10,000.

Before Hammett, the detective story (see DETECTIVE FICTION) came in two general types—the ratiocinative story in which a brilliant puzzle solver pieced together clues to identify a murderer in a genteel setting; or the action-packed pulp story in which a tough detective-adventurer imposed his own brand of vigilante justice, the higher the body count, the better. Hammett drew on his experience to present realistic situations in which neither criminals nor detectives were romanticized. Hammett's emphasis was the professionalism of his detective and the believability of his plots. With The Maltese Falcon and The Glass Key he determined to raise his fiction to a higher level, employing sophisticated literary techniques that emphasized dramatic conflict and creating fully drawn, morally complex characters. Hammett was strongly influenced by the techniques of stage drama and the movies, as he admitted to his editor while writing Red Harvest. That influence is most evident in The Maltese Falcon and Hammett's less serious last novel, The Thin Man, for which he used himself and Lillian Hellman as models for Nick and Nora Charles.

After 1934 Hammett quit writing for publication, but his literary celebrity was undiminished. He was considered the father of hard-boiled detective fiction, a label he abhorred, and The Maltese Falcon was hailed as an important novel without regard to genre. With the exception of the blacklist period during the 1950s, Hammett's works have been consistently in print since their first publication, and he has been regarded as one of the most influential American writers of the twentieth century, especially within the detective genre. The popularity of movies made from his works, particularly John Huston's The Maltese Falcon (1941) and the series of six Thin Man movies starring William Powell and Myrna Loy (1934–1947), contributed to Hammett's literary celebrity.

Principal Books by Hammett

Red Harvest. New York & London: Knopf, 1929.

The Dain Curse. New York: Knopf, 1929.

The Maltese Falcon. New York & London: Knopf, 1930.
The Glass Key. New York: Knopf, 1931.
The Thin Man. New York: Knopf, 1934.
Secret Agent X-9, books 1 and 2. Philadelphia: McKay, 1934.
$106,000 Blood Money. New York: Spivak, 1943.
The Continental Op. New York: Spivak, 1945.
The Return of the Continental Op. New York: Spivak, 1945.
Hammett Homicides, edited by Ellery Queen. New York: Spivak, 1946.
Dead Yellow Women, edited by Queen. New York: Spivak, 1947.
Nightmare Town, edited by Queen. New York: Spivak, 1948.
The Creeping Siamese, edited by Queen. New York: Spivak, 1950.
Woman in the Dark, edited by Queen. New York: Spivak, 1951.
A Man Named Thin, edited by Queen. New York: Ferman, 1962.
The Big Knockover, edited by Lillian Hellman. New York: Random House, 1966.
The Continental Op, edited by Steven Marcus. New York: Random House, 1974.
Woman in the Dark. New York: Knopf, 1988.
Nightmare Town, edited by Kirby McCauley, Martin H. Greenberg, and Ed Gorman. New York: Knopf, 1999.
Lost Stories, edited by Vince Emery. San Francisco: Emery Productions, 2006.

Studying Dashiell Hammett

Dashiell Hammett's career as a fiction writer essentially extends from 1922, when he was twenty-eight, to 1934, twenty-seven years before his death. During that time he wrote some seventy short stories and five novels that set the standard for tough-guy detective fiction. He is known as the father of the hard-boiled school of mystery writers. His novels are readily available in contemporary editions. His best short stories are collected in The Big Knockover (1966), edited by Lillian HELLMAN, and The Continental Op (1974), edited by Steven Marcus. The Library of America includes a two-volume set of Hammett's work, his Complete Novels and Crime Stories and Other Writings (New York: Library of America, 2001). Early and ephemeral works are included in Lost Stories (2005), edited by Vince Emery.

There are four full-length biographies of Hammett. The first, Shadow Man (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1981) by Richard Layman, is regarded as the most fact-based. William F. Nolan's Dashiell Hammett: A Life at the Edge (New York: Congdon & Weed, 1983) is a less formal approach by a writer who began his career, like Hammett, writing for pulp magazines. Diane Johnson's Dashiell Hammett: A Life (New York: Random House, 1983) is the biography authorized by Hammett's protective executrix, Lillian Hellman; although Johnson was allowed access to material denied earlier biographers, her work was restricted by Hellman. Joan Mellen's Hellman and Hammett: The Legendary Passion of Lillian Hellman and Dashiell Hammett (New York: HarperCollins, 1996) includes much new material. But the reader interested specifically in biography should begin with Jo Hammett's Dashiell Hammett: A Daughter Remembers, edited by Layman and Julie Rivett, Jo Hammett's daughter (New York: Carroll & Graf, 2001). Selected Letters of Dashiell Hammett, 1921–1960, edited by Layman with Rivett is a necessary supplement to biographical work. It includes informative biographical essays.

Dust jacket for Hammett's third novel, which centers on private detective Sam Spade, an ambiguous hero described as looking "rather pleasantly like a blond satan"

The primary bibliography is Layman's Dashiell Hammett: A Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1979). The recommended secondary bibliography is Christopher Mettress's The Critical Response to Dashiell Hammett (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994).

The fullest critical assessment of Hammett short stories is LeRoy Panek's Reading Early Hammett: A Critical Study of the Fiction Prior to The Maltese Falcon (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004). Early critical appraisals of Hammett's novels include Peter Wolfe's Beams Falling: The Art of Dashiell Hammett (Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green

Dust jacket for Hammett's fifth novel, which concluded his five year career as a novelist, featuring a photograph of the author

University Popular Press, 1980) and Sinda Gregory's Private Investigations: The Novels of Dashiell Hammett (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1985). George Thompson's Hammett's Moral Vision (San Francisco: Emery Productions, 2006) is a more recently published study of Hammett's novels drawn from the author's dissertation written in 1972. Layman's The Maltese Falcon: A Documentary Volume (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 280. Detroit: Bruccoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2003; republished as Discovering the Maltese Falcon (San Francisco: Emery Productions, 2005) and his Literary Masters: Dashiell Hammett (Gale Study Guides to Great Literature, volume 3. Detroit: Gale/Manly, 1999) are the most reliable works about Hammett's best-known novel.

John Cawelti's Adventure, Mystery, and Romance: Formula Stories as Art and Popular Culture (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976) is a good source for contextualizing Hammett's work. The most reliable website is <www.mikehumbert.com/Dashiell\_Hammett\_01\_Short\_Bio.html>. It includes links to other websites of interest.

—Richard Layman

Hapgood, Hutchins (1869–1944) journalist, autobiographer

Educated at Harvard, the Chicago-born Hutchins Hapgood made his reputation as a journalist in New York, where in the 1910s in Greenwich Village he was at the center of American radicalism. He was best known for his meticulous accounts of the underworld life of the city, beginning with his most acclaimed book, The Spirit of the Ghetto: Studies of the Jewish Quarter in New York (1902). His subsequent titles include The Autobiography of a Thief (1903), The Spirit of Labor (1907), An Anarchist Woman (1909), and Types from City Streets (1910). Hapgood described his approach as a writer in defining a radical as a person who “tries to go to the root of the matter in political, social, and industrial questions, without any compromise, and who at the same time has his mind open to all general aspects of life and culture.” In 1916 he and his spouse, Neith Boyce, wrote Enemies, a one-act dialogue between a husband and wife that was one of the first plays produced by the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS. His semi-autobiographical novel The Story of a Lover (1919) is also about their unconventional marriage. In his autobiography, A Victorian in the Modern World (1939), Hapgood claims that his journalism was especially popular among New York intellectuals, “all those people who felt the esthetic or moral need of fresh interpretations of social and political forms.”

Sources

Marcaccio, Michael D. The Hapgoods: Three Earnest Brothers. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1977.

Trimberger, Ellen Kay, ed. Intimate Warriors: Portraits of a Modern Marriage, 1899–1944: Selected Works by Neith Boyce and Hutchins Hapgood. New York: Feminist Press, 1991.

—Tilly Newell

Harbach, Otto (1873–1963) lyricist

Otto Ables Hauerbach was born in Salt Lake City to Danish immigrants. He changed his name to Harbach to avoid anti-German prejudice during WORLD WAR I. Although they were simple farmers, his parents revered education and sent Otto to Knox College. Harbach later moved to New York to pursue a graduate degree at Columbia University, but when he saw a billboard advertising a new musical starring Fay Templeton, he went to the show and decided to pursue a career in the theater. Later that year he met Karl Hoschna, a young Czech composer, and the two men collaborated on a series of comic operas that produced such hit songs as “Cuddle Up a Little Closer, Lovey Mine” (1908). With his literary background, Harbach wrote the libretto as well as the lyrics for his shows and always tried to integrate songs into character and dramatic situation.

After Hoschna's death in 1911, Harbach worked with other composers, such as Rudolf Friml, Vincent Youmans, and Louis Hirsch, with whom he had an enormous hit in "The Love Nest" (1920). In the 1920s he worked with Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II on several operettas and instilled in his young collaborator the principle that songs must be integrated into the story of a musical. The two men wrote Rose-Marie (1924) with Friml and Herbert Stothart, Sunny (1925) with Jerome Kern, and The Desert Song (1926) with Sigmund Romberg. Harbach's greatest songs were written with Kern for Roberta (1933). Both "Yesterdays" and "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" reveal Harbach's roots in the older tradition of operetta with their soaring sentiments and formal expressions such as "so I chaffed them" and "forsooth," and his rhyming of "Yesterdays" with "sequester'd days." As the Depression (see GREAT DEPRESSION) darkened Broadway, Harbach followed other songwriters to Hollywood, but there his insistence that songs be integrated into the story of a musical ran against the studio practice of presenting songs as though they were performances in theatrical productions.

—Philip Furia

Harburg, E. Y. "Yip" (1896–1981) lyricist

I doubt that I can ever say "I Love You" head on—it's not the way I think. For me the task is never to say the thing directly, and yet to say it—to think in a curve, so to speak.

—quoted in Max Wilk,
They're Playing Our Song (1973)

Born Isidore Hochberg in New York City to Russian immigrant parents, "Yip" (nicknamed for "Yips!," Yiddish for "squirrel") grew up in the poverty of the Lower East Side. The penury of his childhood filled him with the desire to free people from deprivation. At Townsend Harris, a high school for gifted students, he struck up a friendship with Ira GERSHWIN, who shared his love for light verse. When Harburg confessed his favorite light-verse poet was William Schwenck Gilbert, Ira asked if Yip knew that Gilbert's light verses were also song lyrics. "There's music to it?" asked an incredulous Harburg. Ira then brought him home and put on a recording of H. M. S. Pinafore. "There were all the lines I knew by heart, put to music!" Harburg recalled. "I was dumbfounded, staggered."

Harburg dated his aspiration to become a lyricist from that moment, but given the impoverishment of his family he went on to the City College of New York, where he prepared for a career in business. After graduation he established an electrical appliance company. But when his small business was wiped out in the Crash of 1929, Harburg turned to songwriting. "I had my fill of this dreamy abstract thing called business," he observed, "and I decided to face reality by writing lyrics."

In 1932 Harburg had success with Jay Gorney on "Brother, Can You Spare a Dime?" which became the anthem of the GREAT DEPRESSION, "April in Paris," with Russian émigré composer Vernon Duke (formerly Vladimir Dukelsky), and "It's Only a Paper Moon" with Harold Arlen. In 1934 Harburg and his old friend Ira Gershwin wrote lyrics and satirical sketches with Arlen for Life Begins at 8:40, a satirical revue typical of the 1930s when the Depression curtailed the kind of lavish revues that had flourished in the 1920s.

Only in Hollywood was the musical business booming, and Harburg and Arlen followed the trek of songwriters westward, where they wrote songs that ranged from the operatic "Last Night When We Were Young" (1935) to the witty patter of "Lydia, the Tattooed Lady" (1939). Harburg and Arlen got their greatest opportunity in Hollywood when they were given the chance to write the score for The Wizard of Oz (1939), even though they had to fight the studio to keep "Over the Rainbow" off the cutting-room floor. Their score featured numbers that, as in operetta, carried the plot for long stretches of brilliantly rhymed patter. Both the score and "Over the Rainbow" won Academy Awards.

Despite the success of The Wizard of Oz, studio heads worried about Harburg's outspoken liberal politics, and he found he had more freedom on Broadway. In 1944 he and Arlen wrote Bloomer Girl (1944), which celebrated the women's suffrage movement. Then in 1946 Harburg collaborated with composer Burton Lane on Finian's Rainbow (1947), his best Broadway score, which satirized racism, politics, and capitalism and produced such enduring songs as "How Are Things in Glocca Morra?" "Old Devil Moon," and "When I'm Not Near the Girl I Love (I Love the Girl I'm Near)." Although Harburg never equaled the blend of folk sentiment, biting satire, and witty patter he achieved in this classic show, he continued to write in those diverse veins for the rest of his career.

Source

Meyerson, Harold, and Ernest Harburg. Who Put the Rainbow in The Wizard of Oz? Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.

—Philip Furia

Harcourt, Brace (1919– ) publishing house

Harcourt, Brace was founded by Alfred Harcourt, Donald Brace, and Will D. Howe. The fiction list of the firm was strong, and its first major novel was Sinclair LEWIS's MAIN STREET (1920). Other major American authors published by Harcourt, Brace included John O'HARA (APPOINTMENT IN SAMARRA, 1934), James Gould COZZENS (starting with S.S. San Pedro, 1931), Carl SANDBURG, John DOS PASSOS (U.S.A., 1938), Robert Penn WARREN, and T. S. ELIOT. Harcourt, Brace experienced growth and prosperity after William Jovanovich became president in 1954.

Sources

Harcourt, Alfred. "Publishing since 1900." Bulletin of the New York Public Library, 41 (1937): 895–905. Reprinted in Bowker Lectures on Book Publishing. New York: R. R. Bowker, 1957, pp. 28–41.

Harcourt. Some Experiences. Riverside, Conn., 1951.

—Morris Colden

Hard-Boiled Fiction

Identified as the only purely American literary voice, the hard-boiled or tough-guy style emerged in the PULP MAGAZINES of the 1920s and found its masters in Dashiell HAMMETT and Raymond CHANDLER. The term applies to a combination of technique and material. The writing is objective and impersonal, unsentimental or anti-sentimental, and utilizes vernacular speech. The stories and novels mostly deal with crimes and criminals; the narrator or protagonist is usually a private detective or policeman who lives by a code of professionalism. BLACK MASK magazine provided an incubator for hard-boiled writers. The classics of the movement included THE MALTESE FALCON (1930) and The Big Sleep (1939). The term "hard-boiled" later became loosely applied to any kind of naturalistic or slangy writing and has lost its real meaning.

Sources

Nolan, William F., ed. The Black Mask Boys: Masters in the Hard-Boiled School of Detective Fiction. New York: Morrow, 1985.

Shaw, Joseph T., ed. The Hard-Boiled Omnibus: Early Stories from Black Mask. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1949.

—Morris Colden

Harlem Renaissance (1920s–1930s)

Although Harlem developed as a white suburb of New York City, by 1925 it had 175,000 black residents—many of them migrants from the South, the West Indies, and Africa. Painters, writers, actors—artists of all kinds—congregated in a race-conscious community that prompted commentators to call Harlem the capital of black America. Harlem also attracted white writers interested in exploring African American life, including the playwright Eugene O'NEILL and the novelist Carl VAN VECHTEN.

Several new black organizations located their offices and activities in Harlem, including the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the National Urban League, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and Maids, and Marcus Garvey's Universal Negro Improvement Association. Garvey, in particular, focused the black community's attention on Africa, suggesting that a celebration of blackness was connected to pride in African origins.

The key text associated with the advent of the Harlem Renaissance, an outpouring of African American creative energy, is The New Negro: An Interpretation, an anthology edited by Alain LOCKE and published in 1925. In the foreword to his book, Locke wrote of "a renewed race-spirit that consciously and proudly sets itself apart. Justifiably then, we speak of the offerings of this book embodying these ripening forces as culled from the first fruits of the Negro Renaissance." Along with W. E. B. Du Bois, James Weldon JOHNSON, and sympathetic whites such as Van Vechten, Locke sponsored, encouraged and advised a new generation of African American writers, including Langston HUGHES, Claude MCKAY, Jean TOOMER, Countee CULLEN, Jessie Redmon FAUSET, and Zora Neale HURSTON.

McKay's novel Home to Harlem (1928) evoked the mystique of the Negro, the idea that there was something exotic, sensual, and primitive about African life that contributed to the dynamism of not only American but also world culture. The Harlem Renaissance attracted attention in Europe and made possible the careers in Paris of African American writers such as Richard WRIGHT and James Baldwin. This period developed the notions of a black aesthetic and black power that would resound in the 1960s.

Exactly when the Harlem Renaissance ended is a matter of debate. Some scholars have placed the end as early as 1929, when the stock market crash ended the high-spirited touting of African American work and writers such as Hughes found it difficult to sustain the support of their white patrons. Other scholars point to the work of Hurston and other African Americans whose work still reflected the spirit of the Harlem Renaissance in the late 1930s. By 1940, however, with the publication of Richard Wright's NATIVE SON, the Renaissance was surely over. Wright presented a grim portrait of African American marginality and of the failure of even sympathetic whites to understand the alienation of blacks.

Sources

Bontemps, Arna, ed. The Harlem Renaissance Remembered. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1962.

Huggins, Nathan. Harlem Renaissance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Schoener, Allon, ed. Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of Black America, 1900–1968, revised edition. New York: New Press, 1995.

Wall, Cheryl A. Women of the Harlem Renaissance. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Wintz, Cary D., ed. Black Writers Interpret the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Garland, 1996.

Hart, Lorenz (1895–1943) lyricist

For me, Larry Hart was a constant revelation. His intellect, his enthusiasm, his urbanity and his sentiment all combined to give his lyrics the wit and freshness that helped to change the whole face of the musical theatre.

—Richard Rodgers, quoted in Thou Swell, Thou Witty: The Life and Lyrics of Lorenz Hart (1976)

Lorenz Milton Hart, who claimed he could trace his ancestry back to Heinrich Heine, was born in Manhattan and grew up as the quintessential, streetwise, wisecracking New Yorker. After attending Columbia Grammar School, he enrolled in Columbia University in 1913 and later transferred to the Columbia School of Journalism but never completed his degree. He wrote poetry, dramatic skits and sketches, and songs for shows at summer camps, high school, and Columbia's "Varsity" shows. In 1918 he met a sixteen-year-old composer, Richard Rodgers, and when the two discovered they shared a love of the songs that composer Jerome Kern and lyricist P. G. Wodehouse had written for a series of musicals known as the "Princess Shows," they decided to collaborate. "I left Hart's house," Rodgers recalled, "having acquired in one afternoon a career, a partner, a best friend, and a source of permanent irritation."

For years Broadway producers dismissed their witty songs as "too collegiate." Then, in 1925, a benefit revue, Garrick Gaieties, featured several Rodgers and Hart songs, one of which, "Manhattan," became a hit and launched them on a series of Broadway musicals that produced such classic songs as "Mountain Greenery" (1926), "Thou Swell" (1927), and "My Heart Stood Still" (1927).

In the 1930s Rodgers and Hart went to Hollywood, where there was work for songwriters during the GREAT DEPRESSION. At Paramount they wrote songs for several musicals, most notably Love Me Tonight (1932), in which the songs were incorporated smoothly into the action of the movie. Rodgers and Hart used rhymed dialogue to lead up to a song so that movie audiences would not find it unrealistic if actors moved from dialogue to song and then back to dialogue without even the applause that cushioned such transitions in theatrical performances.

While such movie musicals were successful, Rodgers and Hart found Hollywood gave songwriters little say in how their songs were presented. Returning to Broadway, they wrote a series of successful musicals that produced such great songs as "Little Girl Blue" (from Jumbo, 1935), "There's a Small Hotel" (from On Your Toes, 1936), and "My Funny Valentine" (from Babes in Arms, 1937). During these years, the already erratic work habits of Hart—an alcoholic and a homosexual at a time when homosexuality was shameful—became more unpredictable. He went on binges and could not be found when new songs had to be added to a show or lyrics had to be rewritten. When he could be found, he produced brilliant work virtually on the spot, and for a while the great songs continued to flow—"This Can't Be Love" (from The Boys from Syracuse, 1938), "I Didn't Know What Time It Was" (from Too Many Girls, 1939), and "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered," which was performed in PAL JOEY (1940), a groundbreaking production recognized as a step toward realism in musical comedy.

Their collaboration came to a crisis when Rodgers proposed they write a musical based on a play about the settlement of the Oklahoma territory. When Hart demurred, saying New York audiences would find a musical about cowboys and ranchers boring, Rodgers said that if Hart would not do it, he would find another collaborator. "Anyone in mind?" Hart asked. "Yes, Oscar Hammerstein." As Rodgers recalled, "Still looking at the floor, all that Larry said was, 'Well, you couldn't pick a better man.' Then, for the first time, he looked me in the eyes. 'You know, Dick,' he said. 'I've never really understood why you've put up with me all these years.'" The success of Rodgers and HAMMERSTEIN's Oklahoma! (1943) established a new songwriting team that dominated Broadway for the next two decades. Hart continued to dissipate, and succumbed to pneumonia with the dying words "What have I lived for?"

The secret to a Rodgers and Hart song, Rodgers himself said, was the "sweet-sour" mix of lovely, romantic melodies and acerbic, even cynical lyrics. To one of Rodgers's most engaging melodies, Hart wrote "I Wish I Were in Love Again" (1937), where he presents such images of love as "the furtive sigh, the blackened eye," "the conversation with the flying plates," and "when love congeals, it soon reveals / the faint aroma of performing seals /—the double-crossing of a pair of heels." Even though he invokes "The words 'I'll love you till the day I die,'" he immediately follows with "the self-deception that believes the lie."

In their early songs, however, Hart's sentiments were lighter. In "Manhattan," he views the frenetic pace of New York life as a charming pastoral where "balmy breezes" blow from the subway and "sweet pushcarts" go "gliding by." "Mountain Greenery" takes the reverse perspective and turns nature into a theatrical set where "God paints the scenery." Complex rhymes, such as "Beans could get no keener reception in a beanery" underscore the ebullience of the lyrics.

During the 1930s Hart's lyrics grew increasingly darker, and his brilliant rhymes turned lacerating, as in "Ten Cents a Dance" (1930), where a taxi dancer—a woman, barely one step up from a prostitute, who charged men a dime to dance with her—laments "Sometimes I think I've found my hero, but it's a queer ro-mance." Hart writes distrustfully of pain-free romance in "This Can't Be Love" (1938) because it brings "no sobs, no sorrows, no sighs." In "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered," he took one of Rodgers's "sweetest" melodies and created a lyric where a hardened woman relishes a purely sexual relationship with a man who, "horizontally speaking," is "at his very best." "Vexed again," she exults in a complex series of rhymes, "Perplexed again, thank God I can be over-sexed again." Hart could still summon up a note of plangent innocence and one of the last songs he wrote with Rodgers, "Wait Till You See Her" (1942) celebrates love purely and absolutely: "All of it lovely, All of it thrilling."

Lorenz Hart is regarded as the brilliant craftsman of rhyme. Alan Jay LERNER recalled how Hart once drunkenly observed, "I've got a lot of talent, kid. If I cared, I probably could have been a genius." "Whether he cared or not," Lerner concluded, “he was as close to being one as lyric writing has produced.”

Sources

Hart, Dorothy, and Robert Kimball, eds. The Complete Lyrics of Lorenz Hart. New York: Knopf, 1986; enlarged edition, New York: Da Capo Press, 1995.

Marx, Samuel, and Jan Clayton. Rodgers & Hart: Bewitched, Bothered, and Bedeviled: An Anecdotal Account. New York: Putnam, 1967;

Nolan, Frederick. Lorenz Hart: A Poet on Broadway. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Rodgers, Richard. Musical Stages: An Autobiography. New York: Random House, 1975.

—Philip Furia

Hart, Moss (1904–1961) playwright

A New Yorker who was raised in a poor family and quit school in the eighth grade to find work, Moss Hart rose to have a distinguished career as a playwright, director, author, actor, and producer. In the 1920s he began to make his name in the New York theater world, writing and directing musical comedy sketches and acting in the role of the Cockney trader Smithers in a revival of Eugene O’NEILL’s play THE EMPEROR JONES. He is best known for his collaborations with George S. KAUFMAN, which began with Once in a Lifetime (produced 1930), about a three-person vaudeville act that manages to find success in Hollywood. The legendary partnership produced many successes, including YOU CAN’T TAKE IT WITH YOU (produced 1936), winner of a PULITZER PRIZE, and THE MAN WHO CAME TO DINNER (produced 1939), inspired by the personality of Alexander WOOLLCOTT. Hart also worked on his own and with collaborators such as Irving BERLIN and Cole PORTER. One of his most notable solo efforts was the musical comedy Lady in the Dark (produced 1941), which centers on a woman editor of a fashion magazine who discusses her career and romantic relationships with a therapist. Hart also worked as a screenwriter from the 1930s to the 1950s.

Source

Bach, Steven. Dazzler: The Life and Times of Moss Hart. New York: Knopf, 2001.

Moss, Hart. Act One: An Autobiography. New York: Random House, 1959.

Harvey by Mary Coyle (produced 1944) play

Harvey, a comedy about a genial tippler who imagines a six-foot rabbit as his drinking companion, won a PULITZER PRIZE and ran for 1,775 performances at the 48th Street Theatre in its original Broadway production, which opened on November 1, 1944. Author Mary Coyle Chase, whose subsequent plays never came close to equaling the critical or commercial success of Harvey, originally named this pleasing comedy “The Pooka,” an ancient Celtic term referring to a fairy spirit in animal guise.

The relationship of the pooka named Harvey with the whimsical drunk Elwood P. Dowd causes constant distress for Dowd’s social-climbing sister, Veta Louise Simmons, and her unmarried daughter, Myrtle Mae, who wants to send Elwood to the “booby hatch.” Although at first only Elwood can see and converse with Harvey, those around him slowly begin to feel the pooka’s presence. Elwood’s benign, friendly philosophy, reflected by his relationship with Harvey, calls into question what it means to be sane. Jimmy Stewart played Elwood in a 1950 movie version of the play and a 1970 Broadway revival, attaining a permanent identification with the character.

Source

Chase, Mary Coyle. Harvey. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1944.

—James Fisher

Hearst, William Randolph (1863–1951) journalist, newspaper publisher

William Randolph Hearst was the son of a mine operator and U.S. senator who also owned the San Francisco Examiner. In 1887 the younger Hearst took control of his father’s newspaper, making such a success of the endeavor that he was able in 1895 to buy the New York Morning Journal. This acquisition marked the beginning of what was to become one of the greatest American newspaper chains.

Hearst’s fiercest competitor was Joseph Pulitzer, owner of the New York World. In an effort to best Pulitzer, Hearst’s newspapers developed a sensationalistic slant that came to be known as “yellow journalism.” Yellow journalism was blamed for inciting war with Spain in 1898, but it helped Hearst succeed in his quest for a congressional seat from New York, which he held from 1903 to 1907. Later efforts to achieve public office failed.

Hearst’s public life was colorful. His media empire—which eventually included motion-picture studios, radio stations, popular magazines such as Cosmopolitan and Good Housekeeping, and some thirty newspapers—gave him the wealth to build an extravagant mansion, San Simeon, on a hilltop overlooking the Pacific Ocean in California. At San Simeon he housed his mistress, the actress Marion Davies, and played host to celebrities. When Hearst died in 1951, San Simeon was still unfinished, but its grandeur, together with its creator’s controversial career as a public figure, had helped to inspire the Orson Welles movie Citizen Kane (1940).

Sources

Mugridge, Ian. The View from Xanadu: William Randolph Hearst and United States Foreign Policy. Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press, 1995.

Nasaw, David. The Chief: The Life of William Randolph Hearst. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

Swanberg, W. A. Citizen Hearst: A Biography of William Randolph Hearst. New York: Scribner, 1961.

Hecht, Ben (1893–1964) journalist, playwright, screenwriter, autobiographer

Ben Hecht contributed to many of the funniest plays and movies of the twentieth century. He began his wide-ranging career at age sixteen as a newspaper reporter for the Chicago Journal. In 1921 he published his first novel, Erik Dorn (1921), which he based on his experiences as a newspaper correspondent in Berlin. He collected his work as a columnist for the Chicago News in 1001 Afternoons in Chicago (1922). In 1923 he began his own short-lived newspaper, the Chicago Literary Times, which reflected his brash, entrepreneurial personality. Hecht drew on his newspaper experience in writing his most celebrated play, THE FRONT PAGE (produced 1928), with collaborator Charles MACARTHUR. This caustic play satirically exposes the cynicism and corruption of American mass media, specifically newspapers. THE NEW YORK TIMES described the on-stage reporters as uttering “some of the baldest profanity and most slattern jesting that has ever been heard on the public stage.” Their second play, Twentieth Century (produced 1932), ridiculed the theater. From the mid 1930s to his death Hecht made his career in Hollywood. Often working with MacArthur and others, he wrote several classic screenplays, including Scarface (1933), Nothing Sacred (1937), Wuthering Heights (1939), and Spellbound (1944). He contributed, uncredited, to dozens of other movies. A master of swift, overlapping dialogue in screwball comedies, Hecht was equally talented as a writer of fast-paced drama.

Sources

Fetherling, Doug. The Five Lives of Ben Hecht. Toronto: Lester & Orpen, 1977.

MacAdams, William. Ben Hecht: The Man Behind the Legend. New York: Scribner, 1990.

—Park Buckner

Held, John, Jr. (1889–1958) cartoonist and illustrator

John Held Jr.’s drawings of flat-chested young women in short skirts and bobbed hair and collegiate men in raccoon coats provided the popular image of youth in the 1920s. His influential work fostered a parodic view of “flaming youth” that trivialized the social and cultural values of the decade.

Source

Held, John, Jr. The Most of John Held. Brattleboro, Vt.: S. Greene Press, 1972.

Helicon Home Colony

This experiment in communal living was founded in 1906 near Englewood, New Jersey, by Upton SINCLAIR with royalties from his muckraking novel THE JUNGLE (1906). Residents were mostly young married writers. Visiting journalists reported that Helicon was little more than a “free-love nest.” A suspicious fire destroyed the main building in 1907, after which the colony was abandoned.

Source

Harris, Leon. Upton Sinclair, American Rebel. New York: Crowell, 1975.

Hellman, Lillian (1905–1984) playwright

The manuscript, the words on the page, was what you started with and what you have left. The production is of great importance, has given the play the only life it will know, but it is gone, in the end, and the pages are the only wall against which to throw the future or measure the past.

—Pentimento: A Book of Portraits (1973)

Lillian Hellman was the only child born to a wealthy Southern mother and salesman father. Throughout her childhood Hellman’s family alternated residences between New York

Lillian Hellman, circa 1940

City and New Orleans. She attended classes at New York University and Columbia University but never received a degree. While working as a manuscript reader for BONI & LIVERIGHT in 1925, Hellman married press agent and aspiring playwright Arthur KOBER. In 1930 Hellman and Kober moved to Hollywood where she worked as a script reader for MGM and began a relationship with hard-boiled-crime novelist Dashiell HAMMETT. Hammett claimed that Hellman, who divorced Kober in 1932, provided the model for Nora Charles, the heroine in his last novel, The Thin Man (1934).

Hammett was the most significant influence on Hellman's life and work. He became her literary mentor, partner in political radicalism, and lifelong companion. Hammett's influence on Hellman's drama can be seen in her emphasis on suspenseful plotting and use of violence to bring characters to a moment of moral crisis. The older writer supplied the source material for and guided the composition of Hellman's first single-authored play, THE CHILDREN'S HOUR (produced 1934).

Hellman and Hammett became increasingly active in leftist political causes during the late 1930s. They were both loyal supporters of the American Communist Party. In 1937 she coproduced with John DOS PASSOS and Ernest HEMINGWAY The Spanish Earth, a documentary on the SPANISH CIVIL WAR sympathetic to the Soviet-supported Loyalists. Later that year she briefly visited the front lines in Spain.

After a string of theatrical and cinematic successes, Hellman's career stalled with the rise of McCarthyism. In the anticommunist fervor in the post-WORLD WAR II period her radical political activity and beliefs became a liability. In 1951 Hammett was sentenced to jail for refusing to name contributors to a leftist bail-bond fund. The next year Hellman agreed to testify before House Committee on Un-American Activities about her own activity but refused to inform on others, arguing "I cannot and will not cut my conscience to fit this year's fashions." Although she avoided jail time, Hellman was blacklisted in the motion-picture industry for the next decade.

Hammett provided Hellman with the idea for her last original play, Toys in the Attic (produced 1960). He died the next year. With the exception of a failed adaptation in 1963, Hellman abandoned playwriting after Hammett's death. Broadway tastes had changed in favor of experimental theater and considered her well-made plays old-fashioned. She died of a heart attack in 1984.

Hellman's plays are distinguished by their superior craftsmanship and strong moral themes. At age twenty-nine Hellman achieved her first Broadway success with The Children's Hour. Its melodramatic structure and scandalous lesbian theme combined to make it a box-office hit. As with many successful playwrights, she accepted lucrative screenwriting assignments. For Hollywood producer Samuel Goldwyn she transformed The Children's Hour into These Three (1936) and adapted Sidney Kingsley's Dead End (1937). But her playwriting career floundered after the failure of her second play Days to Come (produced 1936), an overwrought pro-labor drama.

Hellman returned to Broadway with her anticapitalism masterpiece THE LITTLE FOXES (produced 1939). She followed its success with Watch on the Rhine (produced 1941), a political drama exposing the dangers of American complacency to European fascism. The success of these two plays established Hellman as a major American playwright. Hellman's career flourished both on Broadway and in Hollywood through the 1940s. In addition to adapting her own plays for the screen, she wrote the original screenplay for The North Star (1943), a pro-Russia World War II propaganda movie. In 1950 she wrote her most aesthetically ambitious—and least melodramatic—play, The Autumn Garden (produced 1951), a Chekovian examination of wasted lives.

In the late 1960s Hellman achieved literary success with her memoir An Unfinished Woman (1969), although many critics attacked her version of events and people as false. The fictional narrative "Julia" from her second memoir, Pentimento (1973), was made into a movie in 1977 starring radical actresses Jane Fonda and Vanessa Redgrave. The success of the movie greatly enhanced Hellman's celebrity. Her third memoir, Scoundrel Time (1976), recounted her experiences during the McCarthy period. In her final years she was widely feted as an accomplished playwright and a hero of the Old Left, but also attacked as an unrepentant Stalinist and self-aggrandizing fabricator.

Lillian Hellman is the most critically and commercially successful female American playwright. Like Clifford ODETS and Arthur Miller she regularly uses conventional well-made plays—often melodramatic—as vehicles for radical social and political themes. The morality depicted in her plays exhibits a rigid code of honorable behavior, with often cruel consequences for those who fail to follow it. In a 1942 introduction to her plays Hellman recognizes this aspect of her craft: "I am a moral writer, often too moral a writer, and I cannot avoid, it seems, that last summing up. I think that it is only a mistake when it fails to achieve its purpose, and I would rather make the attempt and fail, than fail to make the attempt."

But much of the critical controversy over Hellman concerns not her dramatic work but her personal political behavior. Many critics charge that Hellman failed to measure up to the high standard she sets forth in her plays. In her memoirs Hellman presents herself as a long-suffering protector of Hammett and heroic fighter against fascism and McCarthyism. Yet, many of her "remembrances" have been discounted as untruthful.

Although Hellman is alternately celebrated and reviled for her personal and political behavior, her plays continue to attract favorable critical opinion. She did not experiment with the dramatic form as did Eugene O'NEILL but rather infused the traditional melodramatic formula with contemporary urgency and vitality.

—Park Buckner

Principal Books by Hellman

- The Children's Hour*. New York: Knopf, 1934.
Days to Come. New York & London: Knopf, 1936.
The Little Foxes: A Play in Three Acts. New York: Random House, 1939.
Watch on the Rhine: A Play in Three Acts. New York: Random House, 1941.
The North Star: A Motion Picture about Some Russian People. New York: Viking, 1943.
The Searching Wind: A Play in Two Acts. New York: Viking, 1944.
Another Part of the Forest: A Play in Three Acts. New York: Viking, 1947.
Montserrat: Play in Two Acts, adapted from Emmanuel Roblès's play. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1950.
The Autumn Garden: A Play in Three Acts. Boston: Little, Brown, 1951; revised acting edition, New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1952.
The Lark, adapted from Jean Anouilh's L'Alouette. New York: Random House, 1956.
Candide: A Comic Operetta Based On Voltaire's Satire, book by Hellman, score by Leonard Bernstein, lyrics by Richard Wilbur, John Latouche, and Dorothy Parker. New York: Random House, 1957.
Toys in the Attic. New York: Random House, 1960.
My Mother, My Father and Me, adapted from Burt Blechman's novel How Much? New York: Random House, 1963.
An Unfinished Woman: A Memoir. Boston: Little, Brown, 1969.
Pentimento: A Book of Portraits. Boston: Little, Brown, 1973.
Scoundrel Time. Boston: Little, Brown, 1976.
Maybe: A Story. Boston: Little, Brown, 1980.
Eating Together: Recipes and Recollections, by Hellman and Peter S. Feibleman. Boston: Little, Brown, 1984.

Studying Lillian Hellman

Lillian Hellman was the most successful woman playwright of the twentieth century. She was significant both as a literary figure and as a cultural celebrity. Her career falls into two periods: from 1934, when her first play, THE CHILDREN'S HOUR, was produced, to 1960, the date of her last original play; and from 1969, the date of her first memoir, to her death in 1984. The first period roughly corresponds to the dates of her intimate friendship with Dashiell HAMMETT, who died in January 1961. During the last period she wrote four volumes of memoirs, mostly well received, but often faulted for their self-serving versions of the events of her time.

The study of Lillian Hellman's plays should begin with The Children's Hour (1934), The Little Foxes (1939), Watch on the Rhine (1941), and Toys in the Attic (1960). They are collected in Six Plays by Lillian Hellman (1979). Of her memoirs, the two most significant are An Unfinished Woman (1969) and Pentimento (1973), which includes the chapter "Julia," made into an award-winning movie. Scoundrel Time (1976), an account of her testimony before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, is a faulty account of the communist scare of the late 1940s and early 1950s.

There are at least seven biographies of Hellman or biographical accounts by people associated with her. The best is Joan Mellen's Hellman and Hammett (New York: Harper-Collins, 1996). Carl Rollyson's Lillian Hellman, Her Legend and Legacy (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988) should also be consulted. Hellman's literary executor and intimate friend Peter Feibleman wrote a casual memoir about her last years, Lilly: Reminiscences of Lillian Hellman (New York: Morrow, 1988). Robert Newman's The Cold War Romance of Lillian Hellman and John Melby (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989) is a solid account covering an important period of her life.

Students should consult Conversations with Lillian Hellman (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1986) early on, especially the Paris Review interview, which is included. Good general bibliographical references can be found in Barbara Lee Horn's Lillian Hellman: A Resource and Production Sourcebook (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998), Mark Estrin's Lillian Hellman: Plays, Films, and Memoirs: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980), and Steven H. Bills's Lillian Hellman: An Annotated Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1979).

For a general critical overview, Katherine Lederer's Lillian Hellman (Boston: Twayne, 1979) and Critical Essays on Lillian Hellman, edited by Mark Estrin (New York: G. K. Hall, 1989), are good places to start. Bernard Dick's Hellman in Hollywood (Rutherford, N.J. Fairleigh Dickinson, 1982) covers Hellman's screenwriting, an important aspect of her career.

—Richard Layman

Hemingway, Ernest (1899–1961) novelist, short-story writer

A country, finally, erodes and the dust blows away, the people all die and none of them were of any importance permanently, except those who practiced the arts, and these now wish to cease their work because it is too lonely, too hard to do, and it is not fashionable. A thousand years makes economics silly and a work of art endures forever, but it is very difficult to do now and it is not fashionable.

—The Green Hills of Africa (1935)

The second of six children of Dr. Clarence Hemingway and Grace Hall Hemingway, Ernest Miller Hemingway was born in the affluent, conservative community of Oak Park, Illinois, on July 21, 1899. During his youth Hemingway spent summers at his parents' house in northern Michigan. There his early hunting and fishing experiences, his associations with the Ojibway Indians, and his observations of discord between his parents provided material for many of his Nick

Ernest Hemingway, 1939

Adams stories. Following graduation from Oak Park High School, Hemingway worked as a cub reporter on the Kansas City Star, and in the spring of 1918 he joined the American Red Cross, which sent him to Italy to drive ambulances for the Italian Army. On July 8, 1918, he was wounded by an Austrian trench mortar shell. After recuperation and an affair with his nurse, Agnes Von Kurowsky, Hemingway returned home, worked briefly for the Toronto Star, and moved to Chicago, where he met Sherwood ANDERSON and Hadley Richardson, whom he married on September 3, 1921. Hemingway sailed for France in December of that same year to pursue a literary apprenticeship.

In Paris, Hemingway met people influential in his career, including his three greatest influences: F. Scott FITZGERALD, Gertrude STEIN, and Ezra POUND, who served not only as a mentor but along with Fitzgerald facilitated the publication of his work. As a stringer for the Toronto Star Hemingway traveled widely throughout Europe, covering major news events and acquiring material for his fiction. In Spain he was also introduced to bullfighting, a sport he studied passionately. Divorced from Hadley in 1927, he married Pauline Pfeiffer and in 1930 moved to Key West, Florida. Although the GREAT DEPRESSION had begun, Pauline's wealth and his own growing income enabled Hemingway to travel widely, buy a thirty-seven-foot fishing cruiser, and go on an African safari.

In March 1937 Hemingway covered the SPANISH CIVIL WAR for the North American Newspaper Alliance along with journalist/novelist Martha GELLHORN, with whom he began an extramarital affair. By the end of 1939 Hemingway's marriage to Pauline was over, and he moved from Key West to Cuba. He divorced Pauline in 1940 and married Martha Gellhorn. During most of the years of WORLD WAR II Hemingway produced no significant work. He drank heavily and remained at home, using his fishing boat to serve as a spotter for German submarines while Martha was away reporting on the war. His third marriage disintegrating, Hemingway left Cuba in May 1944 on assignment for Collier's to cover the war in Europe and in London met correspondent Mary Welsh, with whom he also had an affair. After covering the D-Day invasion and the liberation of Paris, Hemingway returned to Cuba in 1945, divorced Martha Gellhorn, and married Mary Welsh in 1946.

As long as his health permitted, Hemingway continued to visit the places he loved, while also embellishing his already larger-than-life persona. In 1958 revolutionary actions making Cuba an undesirable residence, Hemingway left behind the country in which he had lived for twenty-eight years and moved to Ketchum, Idaho. Although he seemed indestructible, having survived two near-fatal airplane crashes in Africa in 1954, his physical condition steadily declined, and he suffered increasingly severe depression, for which he was hospitalized and given electroshock therapy. His creative powers gone, Hemingway killed himself with one of his shotguns in his home on July 2, 1961.

Following the publication of two Paris small-press books (actually pamphlets), Three Stories & Ten Poems (1923) and in our time (1924), a collection of vignettes, Hemingway published his first American book, IN OUR TIME (1925), a short-story collection that brought his work needed attention, and The Torrents of Spring (1926), a satire of Sherwood Anderson and Gertrude Stein. However, his career was really launched by his first novel, THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926), in which he depicted in hard, spare, unliterary prose and original dialogue members of a post-WORLD WAR I generation whose psychic wounds bore evidence of a subsurface malady. A FAREWELL TO ARMS (1929), a story of love, war, and death set during the Great War, established his reputation as a major American writer.

During the decade of the 1930s no significant Hemingway novel appeared. He published Death in the Afternoon (1932), a bullfighting manual; Green Hills of Africa (1935), a book about big-game hunting with observations about writing; To Have and Have Not (1937), a flawed novel set in Key West and Cuba during the Depression; and an unsuccessful play, The Fifth Column, in his major story collection, The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories (1938). FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (1940), Hemingway's book about the

|   |  |   |
|---|--|---|
|    | EDWARD J. O'BRIEN "I regard this volume of short stories as a permanent contribution to the American literature of our time—a brave book not only for us but for posterity." |    |
| SHERWOOD ANDERSON "Mr. Hemingway is young, strong, full of laughter, and he can write. His people flash suddenly up into those odd elusive moments of glowing reality, the clear putting down of which has always made good writing so good."             | IN OUR TIME BY ERNEST HEMINGWAY   | GILBERT SELDES "Extraordinary in its vividness and its brutality, it is, for the most part, deliberately unliterary, in the modern style. I can see it being warmly admired as I admire it, and violently disliked as I dislike some of it. But it has too much character, too much vital energy and passion to leave anyone indifferent. To me that is a high recommendation." |
| DONALD OGDEN STEWART "After trying to make a meal out of the literary lettuce sandwiches which are being fed to this country, it is rather nice to discover that one of your own countrymen has opened a shop where you can really get something to eat." | WALDO FRANK "Not in a long time have I been so impressed by the work of a new American author. Mr. Hemingway can write. His stories are hard, passionate bits of life."      | FORD MADOX FORD "The best writer in America at this moment (though for the moment he happens to be in Paris), the most conscientious, the most master of his craft, the most consummate, is Ernest Hemingway."  |

Dust jacket for the first book by Hemingway to be published in the United States (1925), which includes seven stories about Nick Adams, his autobiographical hero

Spanish Civil War, reaffirmed his commitment to truth over propaganda and was regarded as evidence of the return of Hemingway the artist during a highly politicized era. Across the River and Into the Trees (1950), a novel set in Venice in 1948, balancing the cynicism of a dying colonel with his love for a young Venetian woman, was a critical failure. Although Hemingway had been at work on an ambitious project about "the land, sea, and air" since 1945, only one work from that effort appeared during his lifetime, The Old Man and the Sea (1952), his all-time best-selling book.

Hemingway's posthumously published works include: A Moveable Feast (1964), a memoir of the Paris years; Islands in the Stream (1970), an unfinished novel about German submarine hunting in Cuban waters; The Dangerous Summer (1985), a nonfiction account of Spanish bullfights in 1959; The Garden of Eden (1986), a heavily edited novel set largely in the south of France treating effects of sexual conflicts upon the lives of a writer and his wife; True at First Light (1999), an abridged version of Hemingway's "African book" recounting his 1953 safari; and Under Kilimanjaro (2005), an unabridged version of the same text.

Following the publication of The Sun Also Rises Hemingway was regarded as one of the most promising writers in America, and he became also one of the most imitated. Soon after the publication of his second novel, A Farewell to Arms, many critics and reviewers acknowledged him as a master. However, during the 1930s, when Marxists and far-left critics called for literature to become a weapon in the struggle of the proletariat, Hemingway's work was often attacked for his failure to address the needs of the masses.

Dust jacket for Hemingway's 1926 novel about a group of post-World War I American expatriates. The title is taken from Ecclesiastes: "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever . . . The sun also ariseth, and sun goeth down, and hasteth to the place where he arose. . . ."

Dust jacket for Hemingway's 1929 novel, in which Frederic Henry tries to escape the carnage of World War I with nurse Catherine Barkley. Hemingway disapproved of the jacket illustration, referring to it in a letter to editor Maxwell Perkins as "The tragedy of the Broken Axle."

But by 1940, when the Soviet mystique had begun to wane, many American critics highly praised For Whom the Bell Tolls. However, the most productive period of Hemingway's literary career was behind him; he had written three of America's best novels and several of its greatest short stories. In 1952 the publication of The Old Man and the Sea refocused the world's attention upon Hemingway. His novella about a Cuban fisherman and a giant marlin was awarded the PULITZER PRIZE in 1953, and it was instrumental in his being awarded the Nobel Prize in literature in 1954. Hemingway crafted a distinctive and recognizably American style whose simplicity, understatement, and objective tone had a lasting influence upon American fiction. At the time of his death he was the most famous writer in America—and possibly the world.

—John C. Unrue

Principal Books by Hemingway

- Three Stories & Ten Poems*. Paris: Contact Editions, 1923.
In Our Time. Paris: Three Mountains Press, 1924.
In Our Time. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925. Revised edition, New York: Scribners, 1930.
The Torrents of Spring. New York: Scribners, 1926.
The Sun Also Rises. New York: Scribners, 1926.
Men Without Women. New York: Scribners, 1927.
A Farewell to Arms. New York: Scribners, 1929.
Death in the Afternoon. New York: Scribners, 1932.
Winner Take Nothing. New York: Scribners, 1933.
Green Hills of Africa. New York: Scribners, 1935.
To Have and Have Not. New York: Scribners, 1937.
The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories. New York: Scribners, 1938. Republished as The Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway. New York: Scribners, 1954.
The Fifth Column: A Play in Three Acts. New York: Scribners, 1940.
For Whom the Bell Tolls. New York: Scribners, 1940.
Across the River and Into the Trees. New York: Scribners, 1950.
The Old Man and the Sea. New York: Scribners, 1952.
Hemingway: The Wild Years, edited by Gene Z. Hanrahan. New York: Dell, 1962.
A Moveable Feast. New York: Scribners, 1964.
By-Line, Ernest Hemingway: Selected Articles and Dispatches of Four Decades, edited by William White. New York: Scribners, 1967.
The Fifth Column and Four Stories of the Spanish Civil War. New York: Scribners, 1969.
Ernest Hemingway, Cub Reporter: Kansas City Star Stories, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1970.
Islands in the Stream. New York: Scribners, 1970.
Ernest Hemingway's Apprenticeship: Oak Park, 1916–1917, edited by Bruccoli. Washington, D.C.: Bruccoli Clark/NCR Micro-card Editions, 1971.
The Nick Adams Stories, edited by Philip Young. New York: Scribners, 1972.
88 Poems, edited by Nicholas Gerogiannis. New York & London: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Bruccoli Clark, 1979. Enlarged as Complete Poems. Lincoln & London: University of Nebraska Press, 1983.
Ernest Hemingway on Writing, edited by Larry W. Phillips. New York: Scribners, 1984.
The Dangerous Summer. New York: Scribners, 1985.
Dateline, Toronto: The Complete Toronto Star Dispatches, 1920–1924, edited by William White. New York: Scribners, 1985.
The Garden of Eden. New York: Scribners, 1986.
The Complete Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway. New York: Scribners, 1987.
True at First Light, edited by Patrick Hemingway. New York: Scribners, 1999. Re-edited and republished as Under Kilimanjaro, edited by Robert W. Lewis and Robert E. Fleming. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2005.

Hemingway and the Mechanism of Fame: Statements, Public Letters, Introductions, Forewords, Prefaces, Blurbs, Reviews, and Endorsements, edited by Brucoli and Judith S. Baughman. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005.

Studying Ernest Hemingway

Ernest Hemingway's career spanned four decades. During his lifetime twenty of his books were published, including one unauthorized poetry collection. Seventeen additional Hemingway volumes have been published since his death. His literary career is often divided into periods associated with his primary residences. Biographer Michael Reynolds has designated them: The Paris Years (1921–1929), The Key West Years (1930–1939), The World War II Years (1940–1945), and The Cuban Years (1945–1961).

A study of Hemingway's fiction should begin with his early work, the miniatures or vignettes in in our time (1924) reprinted as interchapters in his first story collection In Our Time (1925) and in particular "Big Two-Hearted River," works that reflect Hemingway's evolving style under the influence of MODERNISM. Hemingway's three classic novels, THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926), A FAREWELL TO ARMS (1929), and FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (1940), should be read next along with his major short stories, in particular "THE KILLERS" (1927), "THE SNOWS OF KILIMANJARO" (1936), and "The Short Happy Life of Francis Macomber" (1936). Although The Old Man and the Sea (1952) is Hemingway's best-seller, Hemingway's major work was completed by 1940.

The standard Hemingway biography is Carlos Baker's Ernest Hemingway: A Life Story (New York: Scribners, 1966). Michael Reynolds's comprehensive five-volume biography (1986–1999) supplements Baker's book and thematically links Hemingway's life and works; Reynolds's brief biography, Literary Masters: Ernest Hemingway (Detroit: Manly/Gale, 2000), provides a good introductory overview of Hemingway's life and work. Also recommended is Ernest Hemingway: A Documentary Volume, edited by Robert W. Trogdon (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 210. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/The Gale Group, 1999), which is available in paperback as Ernest Hemingway: A Literary Reference (New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002). Matthew J. Brucoli's Fitzgerald and Hemingway: A Dangerous Friendship (New York: Carroll & Graf, 1994) analyzes the troubled relationship between Hemingway and F. Scott FITZGERALD as well as demonstrating Fitzgerald's role in Hemingway's career. Conversations with Ernest Hemingway, edited by Brucoli (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989), provides informative comments by Hemingway about writing and events that informed his work.

Not all of the large number of books and articles on Ernest Hemingway are worthwhile. Among critical studies Charles A. Fenton's The Apprenticeship of Ernest Hemingway (New York: Farrar, Straus & Young, 1954) provides an excellent background for Hemingway's earliest writing and newspaper training, and Carlos Baker's Hemingway, The Writer as Artist (Princeton,

Dust jacket for Hemingway's 1940 novel, in which American Robert Jordan fights against the Fascists in Spain. Hemingway took his title from John Donne's Meditation 17: "Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee. . . ."

N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972) contributes perceptive and credible readings of Hemingway's fiction, including the posthumously published Islands in the Stream (1970). Paul A. Smith's A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Ernest Hemingway (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989) is the best reference for criticism of Hemingway's stories. Those interested in observing how Hemingway incorporated researched material about the Italian front of WORLD WAR I into A Farewell to Arms should see Reynolds's Hemingway's First War (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981). Ernest Hemingway's A Farewell to Arms: A Documentary Volume, edited by Charles M. Oliver (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 308. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2005) chronicles the making of the novel and traces its popular and critical reputation.

Ernest Hemingway: Selected Letters, 1917–1961, edited by Carlos Baker (New York: Scribners, 1981), should be read along with Hemingway's work. The Only Thing That Counts: The Ernest Hemingway/Maxwell Perkins Correspondence, 1925–1947, edited by Bruccoli, with the assistance of Trogdon (New York: Scribners, 1996), provides a record of the professional relationship between Hemingway and his legendary Scribners editor, Maxwell PERKINS.

Audre Hanneman's Ernest Hemingway: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1967) and her Supplement to Ernest Hemingway: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975) are the standard Hemingway bibliographies and indispensable research tools. Kelli A. Larson's Ernest Hemingway: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991) lists writings about Hemingway and his works from 1974 to 1989. Students should also consult the Modern Language Association bibliographies on-line and current bibliography in The Hemingway Review, which since 1981 has provided a forum for scholarship and criticism, following the Fitzgerald/Hemingway Annual (1969–1979). The principal research archive is at the Kennedy Library.

—John C. Unrue

Herbst, Josephine (1897–1969) novelist

After graduating from the University of California in 1918, the Iowa-born Josephine Herbst left for New York City to begin her career as a writer. By the 1920s she was in Paris, associating with the important American writers there. She is regarded as a proletarian writer (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE) because she was a hard-line Marxist and her fiction treats the social, economic, and political issues that affect the laboring poor. Herbst is best known for her trilogy on the Trexler family: Pity Is Not Enough (1933), The Executioner Waits (1934), and Rope of Gold (1939). This saga, based on her own family, follows the Trexlers from the late nineteenth century to the 1930s, exploring their troubles after they lose their money, grapple with the fast-changing period of the 1920s, and then confront bleak economic times during the GREAT DEPRESSION. Her memoir of her days in Spain during the SPANISH CIVIL WAR, originally published in a periodical in 1960, is the title piece of The Starched Blue Sky of Spain, and Other Memoirs (1991).

Source

Langer, Elinor. Josephine Herbst. Boston: Little, Brown, 1984.

Hergesheimer, Joseph (1880–1954) novelist, short-story writer

Hergesheimer was a best-selling and well-respected novelist of his day, whose work was often first published in The Saturday Evening Post before appearing in book form. His best-known novels are Java Head (1919), a study of the trade with China in the New England of the 1840s that deals with miscegenation, and Linda Condon (1919), a portrayal of an intense woman that shows the author's growing distaste for contemporary American culture. Hergesheimer's later books forsake REALISM for romance. He favored exotic settings—the West Indies in The Bright Shawl (1922), Cuba in Balisand (1924), Mexico in Tampico (1926). From an Old House (1925) is an essay-memoir.

Source

Gimmestad, Victor E. Joseph Hergesheimer. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Heyward, DuBose (1885–1940) playwright, novelist, poet

DuBose Heyward is chiefly remembered for the folk dramas of African American life in the early twentieth century that he based on his novels. A South Carolina native descended from Thomas Heyward Jr., a signer of the Declaration of Independence, Heyward worked as an insurance and real estate salesman in Charleston before he began to publish poetry and short stories in the early 1920s. His first books were poetry collections: Carolina Chansons; Legends of the Low Country (1922), written with Hervey Allen; and Skylines and Horizons (1924).

With the collaboration of his wife, Dorothy, who is credited with providing dramatic structure to his writing, Heyward scored his greatest theatrical success when their adaption of his first novel, Porgy (1925)—about a crippled black beggar's doomed love for a faithless woman in the fictional slum Catfish Row—was produced by the THEATRE GUILD in 1927 and won a PULITZER PRIZE. Heyward subsequently collaborated with Ira and George GERSHWIN, who composed a folk opera, PORGY AND BESS (produced 1935), adapted from this play. The enduring popularity of the Gershwin opera eclipsed that of the original play and made Heyward's story and characters a permanent fixture on American stages.

Heyward continued to be productive in the latter half of the 1920s through the 1930s, as he published six more novels and a third collection of poetry. In 1931 Brass Ankle (produced 1931), a play Heyward wrote directly for the stage about a woman who plans suicide when she learns of her Negro parentage, flopped. In 1933 he wrote the screenplay for the movie version of Eugene O'NEILL's THE EMPEROR JONES. His play Mamba's Daughters—an adaptation of his third novel, published in 1929—was well received when it was produced in 1939. A tragic melodrama depicting the tribulations of three generations of a black family, Mamba's Daughters was praised as a realistic portrait of African American life. Much of its success was attributed to the compelling performance of Ethel Waters in the lead, the first starring role for a black woman in a Broadway drama. Heyward also published a popular children's book, The Country Bunny and the Little Gold Shoes (1939).

Sources

Durham, Frank. DuBose Heyward: The Man Who Wrote Porgy. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1954.

Hutchisson, James M. DuBose Heyward: A Charleston Gentleman and the World of Porgy and Bess. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.

—James Fisher

Herrick, Robert (1868–1938) novelist, short-story writer

Educated at Harvard, Robert Herrick taught in the English department at the University of Chicago for thirty years (1893–1923). Over the course of his writing career, which began in the 1890s with stories and concluded with his last novel, Sometime, in 1933, Herrick wrote mainly as a realist (see REALISM), producing seventeen novels, five novellas, and three collections of short stories that explored the pressures Americans experienced in modern, industrialized society. He was especially concerned with what he regarded as the corrupting effects of materialism, which he called “the American sickness.”

Herrick’s most respected novels include The Common Lot (1904), about an architect who seeks to redeem himself after a shoddy tenement he designed goes up in flames, killing its inhabitants; The Memoirs of an American Citizen (1905), his only first-person narrative, which plots the rise of its businessman protagonist from grocery clerk to U.S. senator; Together (1908), perhaps his most ambitious work, which treats the tensions that arise and are resolved over the course of a complex marriage; and Clark’s Field, in which a young woman who inherits a valuable piece of family real estate must decide how to use her wealth. Herrick’s volume The World Decision (1916) collects the journalistic work he did as a correspondent for the Chicago Tribune during WORLD WAR I.

Sources

Budd, Louis J. Robert Herrick. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Nevius, Blake. Robert Herrick: The Development of a Novelist. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1962.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

Hersey, John (1914–1993) journalist, novelist

Born in Tientsin, China, to American missionaries, John Hersey was educated at Yale. He gained his first jobs as a reporter with Time and THE NEW YORKER. As a war correspondent he wrote Men on Bataan (1942), a nonfiction account of the U.S. invasion of that island. His second book, Into the Valley (1943), was a report of combat on Guadalcanal Island. The first of his fourteen novels, A Bell for Adano (1944), which received a PULITZER PRIZE, was based on his reporting on the American military governor of a Sicilian town following the liberation of the island. But it was Hiroshima (1946), Hersey’s account of the nuclear bombing of Japan, that brought him fame. For many years, this book was required reading in high schools and colleges. An equally ambitious work was Hersey’s novel The Wall (1950), an account of the uprising in the Warsaw ghetto. His later books received less attention, but the satirical novel The Child Buyer (1960) and The Algiers Motel Incident (1968), an account of the killing of three young black men by Detroit police during the race riots of summer 1967, were well received by critics.

Sources

Huse, Nancy L. The Survival Tales of John Hersey. New York: Whitston, 1983.

Sanders, David. John Hersey Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Hicks, Granville (1901–1982) critic

Granville Hicks was educated at Harvard. He is best known for his literary history, The Great Tradition (1933), a Marxist interpretation of American literature since the Civil War. This book grew out of his period as editor of The New Masses. He resigned from the Communist Party in 1939, a decision he explains in his memoir Where We Came Out (1954). For many years he was an influential reviewer for THE SATURDAY REVIEW. He collected fifteen of his essays from The Saturday Review in Literary Horizons: A Quarter Century of American Fiction (1970) and selections from his earlier criticism in Granville Hicks in the New Masses (1974). He published his autobiography, Part of the Truth, in 1965.

Sources

Levenson, Leah, and Jerry Natterstad. Granville Hicks: The Intellectual in Mass Society. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1993.

Long, Terry L. Granville Hicks. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Holiday by Philip Barry (produced 1928) play

Philip BARRY’s comedy of manners tells the story of Johnny Case, a successful lawyer and investor who hopes to go on an extended vacation while he is still young and only return to work later in life. He tells his fiancée Julia Seton that he wants to “try to find out who I am and what I am and what goes on and what about it—now, while I’m young, and feel good all the time.” Johnny’s plans encounter the opposition of Julia and her father, who try to convince Johnny to keep working so that he and Julia can afford a fashionable lifestyle. Julia’s sister Linda, however, feels drawn to Johnny’s unconventional ideas and follows him as he cancels his wedding and embarks on a trip to Europe. The play, originally titled “The Dollar,” criticizes American materialism and premiered only a few months before the 1929 stock market crash.

Sources

Barry, Philip. Holiday. New York: S. French, 1929.
 Flexner, Eleanor. American Playwrights, 1918–1938: The Theatre Retreats from Reality. Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1969, pp. 249–271.

—Claudia Wilsch Case

Hopkins, Pauline Elizabeth (1859–1930) novelist, journalist

Fiction is of great value to any people as a preserver of manners and customs—religious, political and social. It is a record of growth and development from generation to generation. No one will do this for us; we must ourselves develop the men and women who will faithfully portray the inmost thoughts and feelings of the Negro with all the fire and romance which lies dormant in our history, and, as yet, unrecognized by writers of the Anglo-Saxon race.

—preface, Contending Forces (1900)

Born in Portland, Maine, but raised in Boston by free black parents, Pauline Elizabeth Hopkins concerned herself from an early age with endeavors both reformist and literary. At the age of fifteen she won an essay contest with “Evils of Intemperance and Their Remedy”; five years later she completed her first known literary work, Slaves’ Escape, or the Underground Railroad, a musical drama that was produced in 1880.

Hopkins’s only period of productivity and fame commenced two decades later and lasted just five years. In 1900 she published Contending Forces: A Romance Illustrative of Negro Life North and South, her only novel to be published in book form in her lifetime, and became editor in chief of the Colored American Magazine. From 1900 to 1904 the magazine published three serialized novels by Hopkins—Hagar’s Daughter, A Story of Southern Caste Prejudice (1901–1902), Winona: A Tale of Negro Life in the South and Southwest (1902), and Of One Blood; or, The Hidden Self (1902–1903)—as well as seven short stories and nonfiction pieces, most notably the series “Famous Women of the Negro Race.” Her explicit and oft-stated goal was to rewrite American history to include African Americans, a goal she believed could be accomplished only by black writers. When the Colored American Magazine was bought by an ally of Booker T. WASHINGTON in 1904, the politically radical Hopkins was promptly fired. In 1905 she published Primer of Facts Pertaining to the Early Greatness of the African Race (1905), an historical text that served as a significant Pan-African counterpart to W. E. B. DU BOIS’s sociological THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK (1903). Thereafter, Hopkins largely disappeared from the literary and public records; she served as editor of the New Era Magazine in 1916 but otherwise seems to have worked as a stenographer for the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Appearing during the so-called “nadir” period of African American literature, Hopkins’s fiction, while firmly located within the clichéd tradition of the romantic novel, allowed her to accomplish her goal of portraying the “manners and customs” of African Americans. During those few years at the opening of the twentieth century she was one of the most significant African American writers. For much of the rest of the century her writings disappeared from the canon as thoroughly as she did from the public eye; but in the mid 1980s her novels began to be rediscovered, a process that culminated in the reprinting of all four novels and many of her short stories. Today she occupies a stable position alongside Charles W. CHESNUTT as the most prominent African American literary voices at the turn of the century.

Sources

Gruesser, John Cullen, ed. The Unruly Voice: Rediscovering Pauline Elizabeth Hopkins. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1996.
 Hopkins, Pauline. Contending Forces: A Romance Illustrative of Negro Life North and South, with an afterword by Gwendolyn Brooks. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1978.
 Hopkins. The Magazine Novels of Pauline Hopkins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
 Wallinger, Hanna. Pauline E. Hopkins: A Literary Biography. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005.

—Ben Railton

Horgan, Paul (1903–1995) novelist, short-story writer, historian, biographer

Paul Horgan, born in Buffalo, New York, traveled west with his family in 1915 and spent much of his life in New Mexico. While his writing is praised for capturing the relationship between landscapes and lives, he did not confine himself to a region—nor to a genre. In 1933 he won the Harper Novel Prize for the first of his fifteen novels, The Fault of Angels, a comedy of manners about a prima donna contralto that has nothing to do with the West. In the introduction for his first story collection, The Return of the Weed (1936), Horgan writes of themes that characterize the volume and his career: “We can learn from the past by thinking about its lingering walls, built by men along their way through wilderness. The men are taken away by life or death, and their houses stay until the weather and the weed render dust.” Horgan won a PULITZER PRIZE for his two-volume history, Great River: The Rio Grande in North American History (1954). He won a second Pulitzer Prize for Lamy of Santa Fe (1975), a biography of Father Jean-Baptiste Lamy.

Sources

Gish, Robert. Nueva Granada: Paul Horgan and the Southwest. College Station: Texas A & M Press, 1995.
 Gish. Paul Horgan. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

The House of Mirth by Edith Wharton (New York: Scribners, 1905) novel

Edith WHARTON was a member of the late-nineteenth-century New York high society she dissected in this classic novel. Her heroine, Lily Bart, has beauty and charm but only a trace of the proper lineage. A poor relation of those with whom she socializes, the twenty-nine-year-old Lily's only hope of survival in this refined world is to land a rich husband. Her two most ardent suitors prove unsuitable: Simon Rosedale is rich but vulgar and, even worse for Lily's prospects, Jewish; and Lawrence Selden, the man she loves, does not have enough money. The idealistic Lily loses her precarious standing in society after she is falsely accused of an adulterous affair and her aunt and protector dies. In her autobiography A Backward Glance (1934), Wharton rhetorically considered the question of why she chose to write about "a society of irresponsible pleasure-seekers": "The answer was that a frivolous society can acquire dramatic significance only through what its frivolity destroys. Its tragic implication lies in its power of debasing people and ideals. The answer, in short, was my heroine, Lily Bart."

Sources

Ammons, Elizabeth, ed. The House of Mirth: Authoritative Text, Backgrounds, and Contexts Criticism. New York: Norton, 1990.

Goodman, Susan. Edith Wharton's Women: Friends & Rivals. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1990.

How to Write Short Stories [with Samples]

by Ring Lardner (New York: Scribners, 1924) story collection

This collection of ten short stories published in popular magazines between 1914 and 1922 was planned by Ring LARDNER with the assistance of F. Scott FITZGERALD, who recommended the book to his editor, Maxwell PERKINS, at CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS. Each of the stories is preceded by a mock headnote that has nothing to do with the story that follows, a form that satirizes the popular how-to books of the time. Eight of the ten stories are about sports; and seven are in first-person colloquial narration. This collection established Lardner as a significant fiction writer. The volume includes "Some Like Them Cold," "The Golden Honeymoon," and "Champion," which have been frequently anthologized.

—Richard Layman

Howard, Sidney (1891–1939) playwright

Sidney Howard studied in George Pierce Baker's famous 47 Workshop at Harvard, which trained a generation of American playwrights and writers, including Eugene O'NEILL, Philip BARRY, and Thomas WOLFE. After serving in WORLD WAR I, Howard began writing plays, primarily adaptations and verse dramas. His first great success was THEY KNEW

WHAT THEY WANTED (produced 1924), the story of a love match by mail set in California wine country, which won a PULITZER PRIZE. Frank LOESSER made the play into a musical as The Most Happy Fella (produced 1956). Howard's other important work includes The Silver Cord (produced 1926), a portrayal of a domineering mother, and his dramatization of Sinclair LEWIS's novel Dodsworth (1934) for the stage.

Source

White, Sidney Howard. Sidney Howard. Boston: Twayne, 1977.
—Park Bucker

Hubbard, Elbert (1856–1915) publisher, editor, essayist

Elbert Hubbard made a great deal of money as a soap salesman, but at age thirty-six he sold his interest in the soap company and turned to literary endeavors. After a trip to Europe in 1894, during which he met the English designer, printer, artisan, and writer William Morris, Hubbard founded a small artist colony and the Roycroft Press in East Aurora, New York. His own books, however, were never as finely crafted as the books turned out by Morris's Kelmscott Press. His "hand-made" magazines and books were often bound by a printer in Buffalo.

Hubbard specialized in writing biographical sketches, and he produced two pretentiously arty but successful magazines, The Philistine (1895–1915) and The Fra (1908–1917). His best-known work was A Message to Garcia (1899), a brief essay originally published in The Philistine that uses the anecdote of a messenger's heroic completion of his task during the SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR to criticize lazy, incompetent workers. A Message from Garcia proved to be so popular with American business magnates that they distributed copies to their employees, hoping to encourage greater loyalty and productivity. Hubbard died on the day the Lusitania was torpedoed.

Sources

Hamilton, Charles Franklin. As Bees in Honey Drown: Elbert Hubbard and the Roycrofters. South Brunswick, N.J.: A. S. Barnes, 1973.

White, Bruce A. Elbert Hubbard's The Philistine, A Periodical of Protest (1895–1915): A Major American "Little Magazine". Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1989.

Hughes, Langston (1902–1967) poet, novelist, short-story writer, playwright, songwriter

Literature is a big sea full of many fish. I let down my nets and pulled. I'm still pulling.

—The Big Sea (1940)

Langston Hughes came of age in a nation divided by racial prejudice and discrimination, yet his fundamental belief in the American democratic ideal remained steadfast throughout his career. The son of a father who eventually abandoned his family and a mother who moved frequently, he was born in Joplin, Missouri, but mainly grew up in Lawrence, Kansas, and Cleveland, Ohio. Through his maternal grandmother's strong example and vivid storytelling, Hughes emerged from adolescence with a deep sense of racial pride.

After graduation from Cleveland's Central High School in 1920, Hughes enrolled at Columbia University in 1921 but left after his sophomore year to become a sailor, an occupation that led him to Africa and Europe. He returned to New York in November 1924 and was embraced by Harlem's intellectual and artistic community, which recognized his literary talents.

Coming of age as a writer during the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, Hughes was regarded as a boldly experimental writer, drawing from the African American vernacular and blues tradition to produce poems that captured the lives of ordinary, working-class black people. He was also a skilled essayist, novelist, and short-story writer, revealing in his work the often conflicted relationships between blacks and whites in the United States.

In the 1930s Hughes developed an international consciousness that was evident in both his life and writings. In 1932 he traveled to the Soviet Union. In 1937 he lived in Spain and reported for the Baltimore Afro-American; a year later he traveled to France to deliver a speech before an international audience of politically committed writers. During WORLD WAR II he began a weekly column for the Chicago Defender and wrote about the global implications of racism and other forms of prejudice.

Hughes became increasingly active as a playwright and songwriter in the 1940s and 1950s. Often underestimated by critics as only a simple, folksy, nonintellectual writer, Hughes was a versatile genius whose contribution to American literature included sixteen books of poems, two novels, two autobiographies, several collections of short stories, and dozens of plays, children's poems, musicals, operas, essays, and other writings.

Hughes gained early success with his first volume of poems, The Weary Blues (1926). Fascinated by the lives, patterns of speech, and musical traditions of the black, working-class masses, Hughes rejected traditional poetic subjects and forms and turned to African American blues for inspiration in his second book, Fine Clothes to the Jew (1927). His first novel, Not Without Laughter (1930), a story of black life in a Kansas town, demonstrated Hughes's talent for fiction, which matured with his first collection of short stories about race relations, The Ways of White Folks (1934).

Hughes's first autobiography, The Big Sea (1940), chronicled his life to the end of the Harlem Renaissance. Notably absent was any treatment of his political commitments and increasing radicalism, an omission also notable in his second autobiographical volume, I Wonder as I Wander (1956). In Simple Speaks His Mind (1950) and four subsequent collections of stories culled largely from his popular Chicago Defender columns, Hughes used the witty persona of the fictional folk philosopher Jesse B. Semple to offer comments on issues affecting African American communities during the era of civil rights reform. His last major volume of poetry, The Panther and the Lash (1967), published posthumously, expressed Hughes's skepticism that U.S. race relations had improved substantially in the wake of the Civil Rights Movement.

Hughes enjoyed quick success as one of the young luminaries of the Harlem Renaissance, but his literary reputation was by no means consistent. In the 1930s Hughes turned increasingly to Socialist ideas as a way of making sense of his world. Several critics and fellow writers believed that Hughes's polemical writings and desire to connect with the working masses in this decade compromised his artistic integrity. The charge that Hughes surrendered artistic talent to a desire for popularity and simplicity of expression persisted for much of his career. In a 1959 review of Hughes's Selected Poems, James Baldwin wrote: "Every time I read Langston Hughes I am amazed all over again by his genuine gifts and depressed that he has done so little with them." Despite such criticism, several generations of critics as well as general readers have recognized Hughes as the preeminent African American poet, a writer whose commitment to social equality and the promotion of African American culture was uncompromising.

—Christopher C. De Santis

Principal Books by Hughes

The Weary Blues. New York: Knopf, 1926.

Fine Clothes to the Jew. New York: Knopf, 1927.

Not Without Laughter. New York & London: Knopf, 1930.

The Negro Mother and Other Dramatic Recitations. New York: Golden Stair Press, 1931.

The Dream Keeper and Other Poems. New York: Knopf, 1932.

Scottsboro Limited: Four Poems and a Play in Verse. New York: Golden Stair Press, 1932.

Popo and Fifina: Children of Haiti, by Hughes and Arna Bon-temps. New York: Macmillan, 1932.

A Negro Looks at Soviet Central Asia. Moscow & Leningrad: Co-operative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the U.S.S.R., 1934.

The Ways of White Folks. New York: Knopf, 1934.

A New Song. New York: International Workers Order, 1938.

The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York & London: Knopf, 1940.

Shakespeare in Harlem. New York: Knopf, 1942.

Freedom's Plow. New York: Musette, 1943.

Jim Crow's Last Stand. Atlanta: Negro Publication Society of America, 1943.

Lament for Dark Peoples and Other Poems. N.p., 1944.
Fields of Wonder. New York: Knopf, 1947.
One-Way Ticket. New York: Knopf, 1949.
Troubled Island, libretto by Hughes, music by William Grant Still. New York: Leeds Music, 1949.
Simple Speaks His Mind. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1950; London: Gollancz, 1951.
Montage of a Dream Deferred. New York: Holt, 1951.
Laughing to Keep from Crying. New York: Holt, 1952.
The First Book of Negroes. New York: Franklin Watts, 1952.
Simple Takes A Wife. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1953.
The Glory Round His Head, libretto by Hughes, music by Jan Meyerowitz. New York: Broude Brothers, 1953.
Famous American Negroes. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1954.
The First Book of Rhythms. New York: Franklin Watts, 1954.
The First Book of Jazz. New York: Franklin Watts, 1955.
Famous Negro Music Makers. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1955.
The Sweet Flypaper of Life, text by Hughes, photographs by Roy DeCarava. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1955.
The First Book of the West Indies. New York: Franklin Watts, 1956; London: Bailey & Swinfen, 1956; republished as The First Book of the Caribbean. London: Edmund Ward, 1965.
I Wonder As I Wander: An Autobiographical Journey. New York & Toronto: Rinehart, 1956.
A Pictorial History of the Negro in America, by Hughes and Milton Meltzer. New York: Crown, 1956.
Simple Stakes a Claim. New York & Toronto: Rinehart, 1957.
The Langston Hughes Reader. New York: Braziller, 1958.
Famous Negro Heroes of America. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1958.
Tambourines to Glory. New York: John Day, 1958.
Selected Poems of Langston Hughes. New York: Knopf, 1959.
Simply Heavenly, book and lyrics by Hughes, music by David Martin. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1959.
The First Book of Africa. New York: Franklin Watts, 1960.
The Best of Simple. New York: Hill & Wang, 1961.
Ask Your Mama: 12 Moods for Jazz. New York: Knopf, 1961.
The Ballad of the Brown King, libretto by Hughes, music by Margaret Bonds. New York: Sam Fox, 1961.
Fight for Freedom: The Story of the NAACP. New York: Norton, 1962.
Something in Common and Other Stories. New York: Hill & Wang, 1963.
Five Plays by Langston Hughes, edited by Webster Smalley. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1963.
Simple's Uncle Sam. New York: Hill & Wang, 1965.
The Panther and the Lash: Poems of Our Times. New York: Knopf, 1967.
Black Magic: A Pictorial History of the Negro in American Entertainment, by Hughes and Meltzer. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1967.
Black Misery. New York: Knopf, 1969.
Don't You Turn Back: Poems, edited by Lee Bennett Hopkins. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Good Morning Revolution: Uncollected Social Protest Writings by Langston Hughes, edited by Faith Berry. New York & Westport, Conn.: Lawrence Hill, 1973.

Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life, by Hughes and Zora Neale Hurston, edited by George Houston Bass and Henry Louis Gates Jr. New York: HarperPerennial, 1991.

Studying Langston Hughes

Langston Hughes's literary career spanned four decades and four genres; he wrote twenty-eight produced plays and some fifty books. Students coming to his work for the first time should sample his poetry, drama, fiction, and children's writing, and the best way to do that is to start with collections of his work such as The Langston Hughes Reader (New York: Braziller, 1958), Selected Poems of Langston Hughes (New York: Knopf, 1959), The Best of Simple (New York: Hill & Wang, 1961), or Five Plays by Langston Hughes, edited by Webster Smalley (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1963), which comprises Mulatto, Little Ham, Soul Gone Home, Simply Heavenly, and Tambourines to Glory. Hughes's children's writings can be sampled in the First Book series published by Franklin Watts: The First Book of Negroes (1952); The First Book of Jazz (1955); or The First Book of Africa (1960), for example.

Langston Hughes: A Documentary Volume, edited by Christopher de Santis, volume 315 in the Dictionary of Literary Biography series (Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale, 2005) is the best introduction to Hughes's life and work. The definitive biography is Arnold Rampersad's The Life of Langston Hughes (2 volumes, New York: Oxford University Press, 1986, 1988). Faith Berry presents a less detailed and more laudatory view of Hughes's life in Langston Hughes, Before and Beyond Harlem (New York: Hill & Wang, 1983; republished by Citadel, 2000). Rampersad is the authority. Students interested in Hughes's correspondence may choose from Arna Bontemps-Langston Hughes Letters, 1925-1967, edited by Charles H. Nichols (New York: Dodd, Mead, 1980) and Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten, 1925-1967, edited by Emily Bernard (New York: Knopf, 2001). Hughes published two volumes of autobiography, The Big Sea (1940) and I Wonder as I Wander (1956).

Thomas A. Mikolyzk's Langston Hughes: A Bio-Bibliography (New York: Greenwood Press, 1990) is the only primary bibliography to recommend, and R. Baxter Miller's Langston Hughes and Gwendolyn Brooks: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1978), a secondary bibliography, is badly out of date. Students should check the MLA International Bibliography for articles of interest among the nearly four hundred published since Miller's book.

Hans Ostram's Langston Hughes Encyclopedia is a useful ready-reference guide to Hughes's works and characters. Harold Bloom's selection of criticism in the popular Chelsea House series, Langston Hughes (2007) is the place to start for an introduction to recent critical thought about Hughes's work. High school students and teachers both will benefit from Carmaletta M. Williams's Langston Hughes in the Classroom: "Do Nothin' Till You Hear from Me" (Urbana, Ill.: National Council of Teachers of English, 2006). Montage of a Dream: the Art and Life of Langston Hughes, edited by John Edgar Tidwell and Cheryl R. Ragar (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2007) offers a collection of more advanced criticism.

The Human Comedy by William Saroyan (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1943; revised edition, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971) novel

Rich with details of ordinary life in a small American town, William SAROYAN's The Human Comedy is magnanimous in its view of fundamental human decency without shrinking from tragedy. Divided into thirty-nine short episodes, the novel is set in Ithaca, a town in California's San Joaquin Valley, during the first years of America's involvement in WORLD WAR II. Fourteen-year-old Homer, the youngest son of the poor but decent Macauley family, works as a telegraph messenger. His job teaches the boy much about life as he delivers messages ranging from expressions of love and concern to news of injury and death resulting from the war. Encountering profound emotions, Homer turns to his loving family, especially his widowed mother, Katey, for support. Saroyan, who was born in California of Armenian parents, writes that his story expresses the spirit of his country, a place in which "the only foreigners here are those who forget that this is America."

—James Fisher

Hurst, Fannie (1889–1968) novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter

Fannie Hurst was one of the most popular and well-paid writers of the 1920s and 1930s. She graduated from Washington University in 1908 and traveled to New York City to pursue her writing career. The short stories she placed in magazines such as Reedy's Mirror and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST were collected in her first four books: Just Around the Corner (1914), Every Soul Has Its Song (1916), Gaslight Sonata (1918), and Humoresque (1919). In the course of her career Hurst wrote hundreds of stories and eighteen novels, including Lummox (1923), Appassionata (1926), Back Street (1931), and Imitation of Life (1933). She wrote compassionately, if sentimentally, of the downtrodden, and was particularly interested in the role of women in society. Hurst also involved herself in social and political causes, campaigning for religious tolerance and civil rights. She published her autobiography, Anatomy of Me: A Wonderer in Search of Herself, in 1958.

Sources

Kroger, Brooke. Fannie: The Amazing Rise to Fame of Author Fannie Hurst. New York: Times Books, 1999.

Ravitz, Abe C. Imitations of Life: Fannie Hurst's Gaslight Sonatas. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1997.

Hurston, Zora Neale (1891–1960) novelist, folklorist

I have been in Sorrow's kitchen and licked out all the pots. Then I have stood on the peaky mountain wrapped in rainbows, with a harp and a sword in my hands.

—Dust Tracks on a Road (1942)

An independent, adventurous, and unconventional woman, Zora Neale Hurston was the most prolific black woman author of her era, who in the course of her career published seven books as well as short stories, plays, and essays. Described by her first biographer, Robert E. Hemenway, as "flamboyant and yet vulnerable, self-centered and yet kind, a Republican conservative and yet an early black nationalist," Hurston celebrated black culture in her work; yet, she often disappointed black critics who believed she too often ignored white racism.

The core of Hurston's identity was formed in the all-black community of Eatonville, Florida, which she claimed as her birthplace. However, she was actually born in Notasulga, Alabama, in 1891. After her mother died in 1904 and her father quickly remarried, Hurston began a period of wandering between domestic positions, sometimes staying with her mother's friends or family. She was later able to attend high school in Baltimore, Maryland. In 1918 she entered Howard University in Washington, D.C., where she wrote for the campus literary magazine, publishing her first story, "John Redding Goes to Sea," in 1921.

In 1925 Hurston moved to New York, where she was introduced into HARLEM RENAISSANCE circles by Charles Johnson, the founder of OPPORTUNITY. She attained a scholarship to become the first black student to enroll at Barnard College and later studied with anthropologists Franz Boas and Ruth Benedict. With the support of a wealthy white patron, Hurston was able to make folklore-collecting trips to Louisiana, Alabama, and Florida from 1927 to 1931. Starting in the early 1930s, she supported herself as a writer and dramatist. She made several attempts to bring authentic folk traditions to the stage, but the performances were short-lived despite positive responses from critics.

Virtually all of Hurston's writing explores the experiences of rural folk. The central theme in her fiction is relationships between men and women. Her first novel, Jonah's Gourd Vine (1934), is based on the life of her father, a carpenter and Baptist preacher. Her next book was a folkloric work, Mules and Men (1935), a groundbreaking collection that Boas introduced as a valuable contribution to "understanding historically the character of American Negro life." Hurston's most celebrated novel, THEIR EYES WERE WATCH-

Zora Neale Hurston, 1938

ING GOD (1937), follows a young black woman's search for a loving relationship with a man who will not stifle her. Her second folkloric volume, Tell My Horse (1938), explores Jamaican and Haitian cultures, particularly Haitian voodoo, which she had studied on a Guggenheim Fellowship in the middle of the decade. She returned to fiction with the novel Moses, Man of the Mountain (1939), which renders the Israelites' exodus from Egypt and explores the psychology of freedom in black vernacular. Her autobiography, Dust Tracks on a Road (1942), which contains inaccuracies, won the Anisfield-Wolf Award as a contribution to better race relations, but it raised the ire of many black critics because it did not directly address racial inequality in America. Seraph on the Suwanee (1948), her final novel, is part of the 1940s trend of black writers treating white characters in what many saw as "raceless" literature. Despite her successes as a writer, Hurston failed to achieve financial security and died in poverty.

During the late 1920s Hurston was at the center of the Harlem Renaissance, but by the mid 1930s perceptions of her had changed. While white critics generally liked Hurston's books, she was increasingly at odds with the black male literary establishment. Critics such as Richard WRIGHT and Alain LOCKE accused her of exploiting racial stereotypes to attract white readers. In the late 1970s critics began reappraising Hurston's work. A substantial and still-growing body of scholarship has revealed the ways in which her work—often indirectly—explores the intersections of race, class, gender, color, humor, and language. Important collections of her work have been published since her death: I Love Myself When I Am Laughing . . . And Then Again When I Am Looking Mean and Impressive: A Zora Neale Hurston Reader (1979), edited by Alice Walker; The Complete Stories of Zora Neale Hurston (1995); and From Luababa to Polk County (2005), which makes her plays available to readers for the first time. Hurston's essay "How It Feels to Be Colored Me" has become standard reading in college courses, and she is now considered a canonical figure central to African American, American, and women's literary traditions.

—M. Genevieve West

Principal Books by Hurston

- Jonah's Gourd Vine*. Philadelphia & London: Lippincott, 1934.
Mules and Men. Philadelphia & London: Lippincott, 1935.
Their Eyes Were Watching God. Philadelphia & London: Lippincott, 1937.
Tell My Horse. Philadelphia, New York, London & Toronto: Lippincott, 1938.
Moses, Man of the Mountain. Philadelphia, New York, London & Toronto: Lippincott, 1939.
Dust Tracks on a Road. Philadelphia & London: Lippincott, 1942.
Seraph on the Suwanee. New York: Scribners, 1948.
I Love Myself When I Am Laughing . . . And Then Again When I Am Looking Mean and Impressive: A Zora Neale Hurston Reader, edited by Alice Walker. Old Westbury, N.Y.: Feminist Press, 1979.
The Sanctified Church. Berkeley: Turtle Island Foundation, 1981.
Spunk: The Selected Stories of Zora Neale Hurston. Berkeley: Turtle Island Foundation, 1985.
Mule Bone: A Comedy of Negro Life, by Hurston and Langston Hughes, edited, with an introduction, by George Houston Bass and Henry Louis Gates Jr. New York: HarperPerennial, 1991.
The Complete Stories. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.
Every Tongue Got to Confess: Negro Tales from the Gulf States, edited, with an introduction, by Carla Kaplan. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.
From Luababa to Polk County: Zora Neale Hurston Plays at the Library of Congress, edited by Jean Lee Cole and Charles Mitchell. Baltimore: Apprentice House, 2005.

Dust jacket for Hurston's second novel, which follows the life of Janie Crawford through her three marriages

Studying Zora Neale Hurston

Zora Neale Hurston published four novels, two collections of folklore, and an autobiography in her lifetime, but she also wrote short stories, poems, essays, and plays worthy of attention. Hurston's apprentice work, including poetry, appeared between 1919 and 1925. Among the most important early stories is "Drenched in Light" (1924), which is often read autobiographically as depicting Hurston's desire to see the world, her resistance to gender norms, and the primitivistic interest of white patrons in black art and culture.

By 1925 Hurston's use of folklore and idiom had matured. "Spunk" (1925), a tale of ghostly revenge, is the earliest of her stories to smoothly blend folk beliefs into fiction. "Sweat" (1926), the frequently anthologized story of an abusive marriage, blends folk and biblical motifs. Cheryl A. Wall collected it, along with relevant biographical and critical materials, in the single volume titled Sweat

(New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1997). The Complete Stories of Zora Neale Hurston collects most of Hurston's short stories (New York: HarperCollins, 1995), though it does not include recently recovered stories. Also worthy of study from this same period is a one-act play that explores the devastating impact of color prejudice within the black community. Color Struck appeared in the first and only issue of the literary magazine Fire!! in November 1926.

Their Eyes Were Watching God, Hurston's most important novel, has been central to her recovery and her recognition as a major literary figure. To aid readers, Wall's Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God: A Case Book collects essays by prominent scholars (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000). Modern Critical Interpretations: Their Eyes Were Watching God (New York: Chelsea House, 1987) and New Essays on Their Eyes Were Watching God (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990) conveniently collect other important essays. Central to debates regarding whether Hurston and/or the novel is feminist are Jennifer Jordan's "Feminist Fantasies," which was published in Tulsa Studies in Women's Literature (Spring 1988); Deborah Plant's Every Tub Must Sit on Its Own Bottom: The Philosophy and Politics of Zora Neale Hurston (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995); and Susan Edwards Meisenholder's Hitting a Straight Lick with a Crooked Stick: Race and Gender in the Works of Zora Neale Hurston (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999).

A second vital volume is Hurston's first collection of folklore, Mules and Men (1935). Every Tongue Got to Confess: Negro Tales from the Gulf States, edited by Carla Kaplan (New York: HarperCollins, 2001), is based on an earlier draft of the same material and allows readers to see many of the same tales grouped by theme or type. Hurston's later fiction includes the intriguing works Moses, Man of the Mountain (1938) and Seraph on the Suwanee (1948). Although both are ambitious, they lack the continuity and unity of Their Eyes Were Watching God. Ann duCille's discussion of Seraph on the Suwanee in The Coupling Convention: Sex, Text and Tradition in Black Women's Fiction (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993) may prove helpful in unraveling the ending of that novel.

Several of Hurston's essays are requisite to understanding the writer and her aesthetic choices: "What White Publishers Won't Print," "Art and Such," "My Most Humiliating Jim Crow Experience," and her letter to the editor opposing court-ordered desegregation provide valuable insight. These essays were included in Zora Neale Hurston Folklore, Memoirs & Other Writings, which was edited by Wall, along with Zora Neale Hurston Novels & Stories in the Library of America series (New York: Library of America, 1995).

Readers wanting to place Hurston and her work in the context of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE should consult Wall's Women of the Harlem Renaissance (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995). A broader view of her achievement is provided by M. Genevieve West's Zora Neale Hurston and American Literary Culture (Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2005). Zora Neale Hurston: A Life in Letters (New York: Doubleday, 2002) provides an unmediated glimpse into Hurston's private life. Alice Walker's In Search of Our Mother's Gardens: Womanist Prose (San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983) includes "Zora Neale Hurston: A Cautionary Tale and a Partisan View," "Looking for Zora," and "In Search of Our Mother's Gardens"—essays that were central to Hurston's canonization. Henry Louis Gates Jr. and K. A. Appiah's Zora Neale Hurston: Critical Perspectives Past and Present (New York: Amistad Press, 1993) collects Richard WRIGHT's 1937 review of Their Eyes Were Watching God as well as other reviews of Hurston's books and scholarly essays.

Those interested in Hurston's life might first read Dust Tracks on a Road (1942), an autobiography, but readers should be aware that Alice Walker called the book "the most unfortunate thing Zora ever wrote." Hurston was uncomfortable with the self-revelation expected of autobiography and effusively thanked patrons who had supported her. The result is that the first edition conceals, distorts, and misleads as much as it reveals. However, readers now have access to a second version of the autobiography. The version published in 1942 reduced Hurston's final draft by 10 percent. In 1995 for the Library of America edition of Hurston's memoirs, Wall restored deleted passages and included chapters that previously failed to see publication. The contrasts between the two versions can be stark, so readers should be aware of which version they are reading and of the ways in which editorial pressures shaped the autobiography.

More factually reliable are the full-length biographies that have appeared since Hurston's death. The first was Robert E. Hemenway's Zora Neale Hurston: A Literary Biography (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977). Lillie P. Howard's Zora Neale Hurston specifically targets undergraduate readers (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980). Both, although somewhat dated, offer accessible discussions of Hurston's life and her major works. More recently, Valerie Boyd's Wrapped in Rainbows (New York: Scribner, 2003) provides a highly readable, if sometimes speculative, look at Hurston's life.

The most recent book-length bibliography available is Rose Parkman Davis's Zora Neale Hurston: An Annotated Bibliography and Reference Guide (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997), which includes works by and about Hurston. However, many books and essays on Hurston have appeared since its publication, so students would be wise to search the Modern Language Association International Bibliography for more-recent studies.

—M. Genevieve West

Hagedorn, Jessica (1949– ) poet, playwright, novelist

Jessica Hagedorn came to the United States from the Philippines when she was thirteen years old. When she was sixteen the poet Kenneth REXROTH included her work in an anthology, Four Young Women: Poems (1973). Hagedorn produced her first collection of poetry, Dangerous Music, in 1975. A New York producer, Joseph Papp, selected Where Mississippi Meets the Amazon (produced 1978), a play Hagedorn wrote in collaboration with Thulani Davis and Ntozake SHANGE, to be performed at the Public Theater.

Hagedorn moved to New York, where she wrote Mango Tango (produced 1978). Other productions in New York venues followed, including Tenement Lover: no palm trees/ in new york city (produced 1981), TeenyTown (1988), and Holy Food (produced 1988). She won an AMERICAN BOOK AWARD for her novella, Pet Food & Tropical Apparitions (1981). Her novel Dogeaters (1990) also won an American Book Award; these two works are comic and almost surrealistic stories featuring characters of various ethnicities and races, a hallmark of Hagedorn's work. She has published short fiction, including Danger and Beauty (1993); poetry, including Visions of a Daughter, Foretold: Four Poems 1980–1993 (1994); and novels, including The Gangster of Love (1996) and Dream Jungle (2003).

Haley, Alex (1921–1990) journalist

The author of two American classics, THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MALCOLM X (1965) and the Pulitzer Prize-winning ROOTS (1976), Alex Haley was born in Ithaca, New York. He grew up in Henning, Tennessee, and attended Hawthorn College in Mississippi and Elizabeth City State Teachers College in North Carolina. In 1939 he began a twenty-year career in the Coast Guard: he gradually worked his way up from mess-boy and became chief journalist in 1950. Haley wrote short articles for Coronet magazine in the 1950s and then placed longer pieces in READER'S DIGEST, The Atlantic, and Harper's. By the 1960s he was writing high-profile pieces for The Saturday Evening Post and conducting interviews for Playboy. His work brought him into contact with the prominent African Americans of his time, including Martin Luther King Jr., Muhammad Ali, and, most important, Malcolm X. Following the popular and critical success of the Malcolm X autobiography Haley orchestrated his search for his ancestors in Roots. More than 130 million viewers in 1977 and 1979 watched the television series based on Haley's book, which stimulated a nationwide interest in genealogy as well as in the legacy of slavery. Roots is suspect as both history and autobiography; the extent to which Haley recovered the history of his family is difficult to assess, since he shaped his book to read like a novel. What is indisputable, however, is the urgency and energy Haley brought to a study of the past and to racial, political, and social issues that have haunted American life.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Alex Haley & Malcolm X's The Autobiography of Malcolm X. New York: Chelsea House, 1996.

Shirley, David. Alex Haley. New York: Chelsea House, 1994.

Hall, Donald (1928– ) poet, editor, critic

Donald Hall was born in New Haven, Connecticut. He received his B.A. from Harvard in 1951 and his D. Litt from Oxford in 1953. Hall was poetry editor of The Paris Review and a professor of English at the University of Michigan before retiring to rural New Hampshire. His first book of poems, Exiles and Marriages (1955), won several awards, including the Edna St. Vincent Millay Award of the Poetry Society of America. Donald Hall is a traditionalist who uses conventional forms with great skill. He edited an important anthology, The New Poets of England and America (1957), introducing the work of poets born between 1917 and 1935. Among his poetry collections are The Alligator Bride: Poems New and Selected (1969); Kicking the Leaves (1978); The Twelve Seasons (1983); The Happy Man: Poems (1986); The One Day (1988), which won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD; Old and New Poems (1990); Without (1998); The Painted Bed (2002); and White Apples and the Taste of Stone: Selected Poems, 1946–2006 (2006). Hall also has been a tireless promoter of poetry, writing critical prose and anthologies. Here at Eagle Pond (1990) is a nonfiction work about the poet's life in New Hampshire, and The Best Day of the Worst Day of My Life: Life with Jane Kenyon (2005) is a memoir of his relationship with his wife, who died of leukemia in 1995. His writing for children includes The Man Who Lived Alone (1984) and I Am the Dog, I Am the Cat (1994). A story collection, Ideal Bakery, appeared in 1987. He was poet laureate of New Hampshire from 1984 to 1988, and in 2006 he was named POET LAUREATE and consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress.

Source

Rector, Liam, ed. The Day I Was Older: On The Poetry of Donald Hall. Santa Cruz, Calif.: Story Line Press, 1989.

Hannah, Barry (1942– ) novelist, short-story writer

Barry Hannah has established himself as one of the most original voices to come out of the American South since Flannery O'CONNOR. In such novels as Ray (1980) and in his landmark collection of short fiction Airships (1978), his darkly comic books depicting a contemporary South are plagued by absurd and grotesque violence. Born in Meridian, Mississippi, Hannah received his B.A. from Mississippi College in 1964, his M.A. from the University of Arkansas in 1966, and his M.F.A. in fiction in 1967, also from the University of Arkansas. His first novel, Geronimo Rex (1972), a coming-of-age novel set in Mississippi, was awarded the William Faulkner Prize. In Ray Hannah chronicles the life of Ray Forrest, an alcoholic doctor and Vietnam veteran who experiences delusions of having fought in the Civil War; the novel indicates the prominent role both wars have played in his fiction. High Lonesome (1996) is a collection of thirteen stories set in Mississippi. Hannah's other notable books include Nightwatchmen (1973), The Tennis Handsome (1983), Captain Maximus (1985), Hey Jack! (1987), Boomerang (1989),

Never Die (1991), Bats Out of Hell (1993), and Yonder Stands Your Orphan (2001).

Sources

Bone, Martyn, ed. Perspectives on Barry Hannah. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2007.

Charney, Mark. Barry Hannah. New York: Twayne, 1991.

—Matthew Shipe

Hansberry, Lorraine (1930–1965) playwright

When you starts measuring somebody, measure him right child, measure him right. Make sure you done taken into account what hills and valleys he come through before he got to wherever he is.

—A Raisin in the Sun (1959)

Lorraine Hansberry grew up in a middle-class African American home in Chicago. Hansberry's parents were activists who established a foundation to further the cause of civil rights for African Americans. Hansberry attended public schools where she encountered working-class students and learned of their struggle to succeed. She studied journalism at the University of Wisconsin and involved herself in leftist causes. By 1950 she had moved to New York City. She worked at Freedom, a newspaper founded by Paul Robeson. By the mid 1950s she had earned an M.A. at New York University and had begun work on A Raisin in the Sun (produced 1959), a play about an African American family's struggle to prevail in a racist society. The play won a New York Drama Critics Circle Award and made Hansberry, at age twenty-eight, the first African American woman to win the award. Hansberry worked on several other plays after A Raisin in the Sun, but the only one she completed, The Sign in Sidney Brustein's Window (produced 1964), received mixed reviews. She died the night her play closed. The remnants of her last writings were edited for the stage by Robert Nemiroff, her former husband, in To Be Young, Gifted, and Black, the longest-running show of the 1968–1969 Off-Broadway season.

Source

Carter, Steven R. Hansberry's Drama: Commitment amid Complexity. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Hardwick, Elizabeth (1916– ) novelist, critic

Born in Kentucky and educated at the University of Kentucky, where she received her B.A. and M.A., Elizabeth Hardwick has spent virtually her entire adult life in New York City. She has written for the Partisan Review and is one of the founders of THE NEW YORK REVIEW OF BOOKS, which has also featured her work. She was married to the poet Robert LOWELL. In the 1960s and 1970s the couple created a kind of salon in New York City, nurturing the talents of many New York writers. Hardwick is a formidable critic, hard-edged and given to withering judgments. Her prose is collected in A View of My Own (1962), Seduction and Betrayal: Women and Literature (1974), A New America?: Essays (1978), Bartleby in Manhattan and Other Essays (1983), and Sight Readings: American Fictions (1998). She has also written a critical biography, Herman Melville (2000).

Hardwick's novels have earned critical praise but have not found a wide audience. She began with the autobiographical The Ghostly Lover (1945), based on her Kentucky family. The Simple Truth (1955), a penetrating psychological analysis of a college student accused of murdering his girlfriend, was largely ignored, but Sleepless Nights (1979) earned considerable attention. Hardwick considered her novel to be a "meditation" on a woman's life, calling attention to its unusual form—that of a memoir that has the character analysis and narrative drive of a novel while seeming very close to Hardwick's own experiences. Her subjects have been cultural in a very broad sense, since she has written not only about the classics of literature but also about rock concerts, civil rights, and religion. She has not promoted feminism, yet the subject of women in a male-dominated world is a recurring theme in her fiction and nonfiction.

Source

Laskin, David. Partisans: Marriage, Politics and Betrayal among the New York Intellectuals. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.

Harper, Michael (1938– ) poet

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Michael Harper received his M.F.A. from the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP in 1963. His first volume of poetry, Dear John, Dear Coltrane (1969), was published by the University of Pittsburgh Press as part of the reward for winning their U.S. Poetry Prize. Over the next thirty years he published eleven highly respected volumes of poetry and earned a reputation as an African American poet who would not bend to polemics: as he wrote, "being a Black poet and an American poet are two aspects of the same story, two ways of telling the same story. I'm both / and, not either / or." He received the Melville-Cane Award from the Poetry Society of America for Images of Kin: New and Selected Poems (1977) and was named the first poet laureate of Rhode Island in 1988. His Selected Poems was published in 2002. Harper has taught creative writing at Brown University since 1970.

—Marshall Boswell

Harris, Mark (1922–2007) novelist, biographer

Born in New York City and educated at the University of Minnesota where he received a Ph.D. in American Studies, Mark Harris taught at several colleges while writing novels about baseball: The Southpaw (1953), A Ticket for Seamstitch (1957), It Looked Like Forever (1979). The best known of this series, Bang the Drum Slowly (1956), is the story of a baseball player dying of Hodgkin's disease and the teammates who rally around him.

Harris's other novels include Wake Up, Stupid (1959), the account of a professor who writes novels, and Mark the Glove Boy, or The Last Days of Richard Nixon (1964), which draws on Harris's years in California, as does Best Father Ever Invented: The Autobiography of Mark Harris (1976). Harris collected his short nonfiction in Short Work of It (1979). The Self-Made Brain Surgeon, and Other Stories appeared in 1999. He published an unusual biography, Saul Bellow, Drumlin Woodchuck (1980), which recounts his difficulties in researching the life of his hostile subject.

A writer on wide-ranging subjects, Harris often returns to the story of naive young men who learn painfully about the nature of the world.

Source

Lavers, Norman. Mark Harris. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Harrison, Jim (1937– ) novelist, poet, short-story writer

Jim Harrison grew up in northern Michigan, graduated from Michigan State University (B.A., 1971; M.A., 1974). A versatile author—poet, novelist, short-story writer, and screenwriter—he has won both critical praise and popularity. His best-known work is Legends of the Fall (1979), three novellas that explore a violent family saga set in Montana but including scenes in Canada, France, Boston, Saratoga, San Francisco, Mexico, Havana, Mombasa, and Singapore, later made into a major motion picture. Nearly as well known is his other collection of novellas, The Woman Lit by Fireflies (1990), similar to Legends of the Fall in that Harrison explores tension-filled characters who have both an outlaw sensibility and a sense of the law—a kind of moral compass that informs their fugitive behavior. His other novels include Wolf: A False Memoir (1971); A Good Day to Die (1973); Warlock (1981); Sundog (1984; a detective story of sorts centered on the mysterious Robert Corvus Strang, who, like many Harrison characters, does not fit easily into society); Julip (1994); and The Road Home (1998). The Summer He Didn't Die (2005) is a collection of three novellas. His poetry is collected in Plain Song (1965), Locations (1968), Outlyer (1969), Letters to Yeznin (1973), Returning to Earth (1977), and After Ikkyu and Other Poems (1996). Selected and New Poems appeared in 1982 and Poems in 1998. The Beast God Forgot to Invent and The Boy Who Ran into the Woods were both published in 2000. As some of his titles suggest, Harrison's writing has a vein of regionalism and a strong feeling for the land and nature. Just Before Dark: Collected Nonfiction appeared in 1991. Off to the Side (2004) is a candid and detailed memoir.

Source

Reilly, Edward C. Jim Harrison. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Haruf, Kent (1943– ) novelist

Kent Haruf's fiction draws directly upon the flat, windblown landscape of his native Colorado prairie. Born in Pueblo, Colorado, Haruf received his B.A. from Nebraska Wesleyan University in 1965 and his M.F.A. from the University of Iowa in 1973, where he took instruction from John IRVING. After completing his M.F.A., Haruf worked at various menial jobs before securing work as a high-chool English teacher. In 1984, at the age of forty-one, he published both his first short story and his first novel, an ambitious bildungsroman, The Tie that Binds. His third novel, Plainsong (1999)—the first draft of which he wrote with a stocking cap pulled over his eyes—was both a best-seller and a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD finalist. Told by a variety of first-person narrators, Plainsong, which, like his previous books, takes place in the Colorado prairie, weaves a trio of distinct narrative lines into an elegant fugue. Eventide (2004) revisits many of the characters of its predecessor.

Source

Birnbaum, Robert. "Interview," Identity Theory.com (August 26, 2004): <<http://www.identitytheory.com/interviews/birnbaum151.php>> (viewed June 6, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Harvard Review (1986– ) periodical

Harvard Review began as a four-page mimeograph titled Erato, which Stratis Haviaras, the then Curator of the Woodberry Poetry Room of the Harvard College Library, distributed to publicize upcoming events. The first mimeograph included a poem by Seamus Heaney and an addendum of book reviews. In 1989 Haviaras expanded Erato and changed the title to Harvard Book Review. Three years later the periodical became Harvard Review, a publication that combined the artistic content typical of the original Erato with the more scholarly content of the Book Review.

Source

The Harvard Book Review: <<http://hd.harvard.edu/harvardreview/about.html>> (viewed May 23, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Hass, Robert (1941– ) poet, essayist

*New Year's morning—
Everything is in blossom!
I feel about average.*

—"After the Gentle Poet Kobayashi Issa" (1973)

Robert Hass was born in San Francisco. He received his undergraduate degree from St. Mary's College and earned a Ph.D. from Stanford University in 1971. Hass's poetry is difficult to categorize. Field Guide (1973), his first collection, chosen by Stanley KUNITZ for the Yale Series of Younger Poets Award, includes many poems that describe Hass's native landscape. The poems often climax in confrontation as the speaker of the poem grapples with humanity's relationship to nature. Hass's second book, Praise (1979), is frequently recognized as one of the most powerful books of the 1970s; "Meditation at Lagunitas" is celebrated as a poem that initiates a subgenre of poetry, the meditative lyric. Highly introspective and yet still driven by attentiveness to the natural world, the poems of Praise adapt aspects of the Wordsworthian aesthetic to a contemporary vision informed by literary theory and twentieth-century philosophy.

In the intervening decade between the publication of Praise and his next volume, Human Wishes (1989), Hass began translating the work of Nobel Laureate Czeslaw Milosz. Hass also wrote a book of critical essays, Twentieth Century Pleasures (1984). Winner of the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, this book offers considerations of James WRIGHT, Rainier Maria Rilke, Milosz, and various aspects of poetics. Hass was praised as being a tireless champion of poetry during his tenure as POET LAUREATE of the United States from 1995 to 1997; consequently, a decade elapsed before his next collection of poetry was published. Containing the most "confessional" of Hass's poetry, Sun Under Wood (1996) continues his explorations of introspective and experimental poetics. In poems such as "My Mother's Nipples" and "Shame: An Aria," Hass pushes at the boundaries of a reader's expectations when reading poetry. Although wit certainly played a role in the earlier collections, Sun Under Wood, winner of the National Book Critics Circle Award for poetry for 1997, includes more frequent, and often self-deprecating, comic moments.

Hass's body of work is among the most important contemporary poetry. From his translations of Milosz to his incisive prose, Hass's writing reveals a mind engaged with both the world and the sentence.

Source

Gardner, Thomas. "Robert Hass and the Line's Tension," in his Regions of Unlikeness: Explaining Contemporary Poetry. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

—Tod Marshall

Hawkes, John (1925–1998) novelist

John Hawkes, born in Stamford, Connecticut, spent his early years in Alaska. After one semester at Harvard University, he left to serve as an ambulance driver in WORLD WAR II, an experience that, like his period in Alaska, contributed to his evocation of bleak and barren environments. He is known as an experimental writer of Post-modern novels that evoke what critic Carol MacCurdy called “the rhythms and sensations of dreams.” His novels include The Cannibal (1949), Second Skin (1964), and what is called the triad—The Blood Oranges (1971), Death, Sleep and the Traveler (1974), and Travesty (1976). His sixteenth novel, An Irish Eye (1997), was published the year before his death. Hawkes taught writing at Harvard and at Brown University.

Source

Trachtenberg, Stanley, ed. Critical Essays on John Hawkes. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991.

Hayden, Robert (1913–1980) poet

Robert Hayden had a traumatic childhood in a Detroit ghetto. Beaten by bickering parents and ostracized because of his sensitive, bookish nature, the poet overcame these early obstacles, graduating from Wayne State University and working for the Federal Writers’ Project during the Depression. His work provided him with a background in history that informs much of his poetry. His first collection, Heart-Shape in the Dust, appeared in 1940 and was heavily influenced by Langston Hughes, Countee Cullen, and other Harlem Renaissance figures. The following year Hayden enrolled in the master’s program at the University of Michigan, where he studied with W. H. Auden. Hayden then taught at the University of Michigan and at Fisk.

Hayden’s mature poetry begins with the publication of The Lion and the Archer (1948) and continues with Figure of Time: Poems (1955), A Ballad of Remembrance (1962), and Selected Poems (1966). His Collected Poems appeared in 1985. Hayden has been praised for his technical virtuosity and for his handling of poetic form. His subject matter ranges from slavery and the slave trade to the VIETNAM WAR, as well as art and the aesthetic sensibility. Perhaps his most distinctive contribution to modern poetry is his historical consciousness, which seems to have been sparked by Stephen Vincent Benét’s assertion that an African American writer needed to write the definitive black epic. “The Ballad of Nat Turner,” perhaps his best-known work, represents his effort to come to terms with his African American heritage—in this case, through a sensitive re-creation of the experiences of the black man who led the most important slave revolt in U.S. history. In 1976 Hayden became the first black named poetry consultant to the Library of Congress.

Source

Williams, Pontheolla. Robert Hayden: A Critical Analysis of His Poetry. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Heat-Moon, William Least (1939– ) nonfiction writer

Educated at the University of Missouri, William Trogon adopted his Native American name and took a leave of absence from teaching at Stephens College to tour the country in a van. The result was the celebrated best-selling travel book BLUE HIGHWAYS (1983), which has been compared to Steinbeck’s Travels with Charley because of its picaresque and confessional tone. He has also published PrairieErth: A Deep Map (1991) and River-Horse: Across America By Boat (1999). Columbus in the Americas (2002) is an account of Christopher Columbus’s four voyages to the New World and his contact with natives drawn from the explorer’s log books.

Heinlein, Robert A. (1907–1988) novelist

“Yes, maybe it’s just one colossal big joke with no point to it.” Lazarus stood up and scratched his ribs. “But I can tell you this . . . here’s one monkey who’s going to keep on climbing, and looking around him to see what he can see, as long as the tree holds out.”

—Methuselah’s Children (1958)

Robert A. Heinlein is one of the most important science-fiction writers of the century. His works include Stranger in a Strange Land (1961), a novel that is considered his most enduring work. Its hero is a human being raised by Martians.

Heinlein was born in Missouri and educated at Annapolis and at the University of California, Los Angeles. He wrote his first story in 1939. His work dealt with many themes—especially different forms of totalitarianism—that pervaded post-WORLD WAR II science fiction. He is known for the boldness of his conceptions and the sometimes prophetic quality of his work. In 1991 the thirtieth anniversary edition of Stranger in a Strange Land was published, restoring sixty thousand words cut from the first edition.

Sources

Olander, Joseph D., and Martin Harry Greenberg, eds. Robert A. Heinlein. New York: Taplinger, 1978.

Stover, Leon. Robert A. Heinlein. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Heller, Joseph (1923–1999) novelist, short-story writer, playwright, essayist

There was only one catch and that was Catch-22, which specified that a concern for one’s own safety in the face of dangers that were real and immediate was the process of a rational mind. Orr was crazy and could be grounded. All he had to do was ask; and as soon as he did, he would no longer be crazy and would have to fly more missions. . . . If he flew them he was crazy and didn't have to; but if he didn't want to he was sane and had to. Yossarian was moved very deeply by the absolute simplicity of this clause of Catch-22 and let out a respectful whistle.

Joseph Heller, circa 1945. Heller joined the U.S. Army Air Corps in 1942 and was bombardier on sixty combat missions during his three years of service.

"That's some catch, that catch-22," he observed.

"It's the best there is," Doc Daneeka agreed.

—Catch-22 (1961)

Joseph Heller was born in Brooklyn, New York, to Isaac and Lena Heller, Russian Jews who had immigrated to the United States roughly a decade earlier. The Hellers' inability to express affection and communicate openly imbued their youngest child with a brooding, nervous temperament, which he leavened with a sharp-honed sarcasm that later manifested itself in the satirical edge of his best work.

His tendency toward introspection and his fixation with mortality was undoubtedly inspired by the major event of his childhood: when Heller was five, Isaac Heller died unexpectedly from a botched ulcer operation. The dependency and distance between fathers and sons also proved to be a recurring literary preoccupation.

Heller spent much of his adolescence on Coney Island, which serves as a nostalgic motif throughout his writings. Upon graduating from Abraham Lincoln High School, he joined the U.S. Army Air Corps, where from 1944 to 1945 he served as a bombardier with the 488th squadron of the 340th Bombardment Group. Stationed on the island of Corsica, he participated in some sixty combat missions for which he was awarded the Air Medal. His military service provided the inspiration for his first and most influential novel, CATCH-22 (1961).

After being discharged at the rank of lieutenant, Heller briefly enrolled at the University of Southern California before transferring to New York University at the urging of Story magazine editor Whit Burnett. By the time Heller earned his M.A. from Columbia University in 1948, he had sold short stories to both the Atlantic Monthly and Esquire. After a Fulbright scholarship at Oxford in 1949, Heller and his wife, Shirley Held (whom he married in 1945), briefly relocated to Pennsylvania, where Heller had accepted a lecturer's position at Pennsylvania State University. When teaching proved unsatisfactory, Heller turned to advertising, spending most of the 1950s as a copywriter and promotions manager at Time, Look, and McCall's. When Catch-22 was completed in 1961, it appeared to little initial fanfare in America but sold 35,000 copies in its first year. Its British reception was stronger. Heller quit the magazine industry to write full-time, dabbling in scriptwriting. He also indulged his interest in theater, writing the experimental antiwar play We Bombed in New Haven, which briefly ran on Broadway in late 1968. Meanwhile, thanks in a large part to growing opposition to the Vietnam War, Catch-22 became a cult favorite on college campuses. Heller's Kafkaesque treatment of the "logic" of military bureaucracy captured perfectly the sixties' absurdist, anti-authoritarian view of patriotism and combat. By the end of the decade, the book had sold upwards of eight million copies.

Heller was slow to produce a second novel. By the time Something Happened appeared in 1974, expectations were impossibly high, and the book's exploration of the white-collar corporate psyche was deemed a letdown, both in terms of ambition and execution. Inspired by its author's magazine career in the 1950s, the book was nevertheless a best-seller and has gained critical stature in the intervening years. Protagonist Bob Slocum's disconnection from family and meaningful work offers a trenchant update of Sloan Wilson's The Man in the Gray Flannel Suit (1955): because Slocum's rigorously internalized world of self-reflection never rises above self-absorption, he fails to establish meaningful human connections and is instead left adrift in a life of perception without growth. Heller returned to satire with his third novel, Good as Gold (1979), in which academician Bruce Gold goes to Washington, D.C. with the intention of becoming the nation's first Jewish secretary of state. Good as Gold excited controversy for its parodic depiction of Jewish stereotypes—but its real target is the relationship between private and public life and the individual's power to sway policy in a democratic nation. The last great 1970s political novel to assess the disenfranchisement Americans felt in the wake of Watergate, Gold questions the melting-pot theory of Jewish assimilation while asking whether an informed citizenry really has the power to alter human events when politicians can manipulate governmental bureaucracy to their own advantage.

Two years after Good as Gold, Heller was diagnosed with Guillain-Barré syndrome, a form of nervous-system paralysis that incapacitated him as he was attempting to complete his next work, God Knows (1984), a rewriting of the Biblical King David story. Heller's illness marked a grueling period for the author, which also saw the highly publicized end of his near-forty-year marriage. (He was remarried in 1987 to Valerie Humphries.) Heller responded with a burst of productivity. In addition to the best-selling God Knows, he published a nonfiction account of his recovery, No Laughing Matter (1986)—coauthored with Speed Vogel—and Picture This (1988). The novel moves back and forth between the seventeenth-century Dutch culture of painter Rembrandt Harmenszoon van Rijn and the ancient world of Athens between the Peloponnesian War and the suicide of condemned philosopher Socrates. Unfortunately, the narrative's disparate interests troubled reviewers and readers; as a result, Picture This remains Heller's most misunderstood and neglected fiction.

In 1994 Heller published a sequel to Catch-22 titled Closing Time, a fantasy about the meaning of memory and death. A notable motif is the Virgil-like descent into the underworld of John Yossarian, the hero of Catch-22, who meets two of Heller's strongest literary influences, Ernest Hemingway and William Saroyan. Catch-22 enthusiasts devoured Closing Time, which attempts to update the zeitgeist-feel of Catch-22 while recognizing that the zeitgeist of 1960s antiauthoritarianism had long passed.

At the time of his death from a heart attack on December 12, 1999, Heller had recently published a memoir of his boyhood Brooklyn, Now and Then: From Coney Island to Here (1998), and he was at work on a novel entitled Portrait of an Artist, as an Old Man, in which a Helleresque writer, Eugene Pota, struggles against mortality to produce something worthy of his literary reputation. Published posthumously in 2000, the novel is a poignant commentary on both age and the downside of producing a single work as famous and influential as Catch-22.

—Kirk Curnutt

Front cover for an advance copy of Heller's first novel, drawn from his military service during World War II

Principal Books by Heller

Catch-22: A Novel. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1961.

We Bombed in New Haven: A Play. New York: Knopf, 1968.

Catch-22: A Dramatization Based on the Novel Catch-22. New York: S. French, 1971.

Clevinger's Trial (from Catch-22): A Play in One Act. New York: S. French, 1973.

Something Happened. New York: Knopf, 1974.

Good as Gold. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979.

God Knows. New York: Knopf, 1984.

No Laughing Matter, by Heller and Speed Vogel. New York: Putnam, 1986.

Picture This. New York: Putnam, 1988.

Closing Time: A Novel. New York & London: Simon & Schuster, 1994.

Now and Then: From Coney Island to Here. New York & London: Simon & Schuster, 1998.

He wanted to write comedies for the radio, movies, and theater, and I wanted to do them with him, and to write short stories someday that might be good enough to be published in The New Yorker magazine Together we collaborated on skits for our Boy Scout troop, troop 148, and later, older, for dance night entertainments at our social club, when we charged ten cents or a quarter admission for people from other social clubs. One of our longer Boy Scout skits, "The Trials and Tribulations of Toby Tenderfoot," was so comical, and entertaining, I remember, that we were asked to put it on Page from Heller's manuscript for Closing Time, the 1994 sequel to Catch-22

Studying Joseph Heller

The bulk of Heller criticism is devoted to Catch-22, an unsurprising fact given the novel's ubiquity on college syllabi nearly a half-century after its publication. An excellent introduction that provides both an overview of the historical context of the book and a close reading of its sometimes confusing narrative strategies can be found in Stephen W. Pott's Catch-22: Antiheroic Antinovel (Boston: Twayne, 1989). A sampling of the best journal articles on its themes can be found in Joseph Heller's Catch-22 (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2001), edited by Harold Bloom. The volume includes analyses of the novel's "night journey" motif, the ethics of insubordination, and several on the unifying elements of its experimental form. Two earlier essay collections, Frederick T. Kiley and Walter McDonald's A Catch-22 Casebook (New York: Crowell, 1973) and James Nagel's Critical Essays on Catch-22 (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1974), are somewhat dated but nevertheless testify to the book's centrality to Watergate-era debates about political dissent and civic disobedience. Jon Woodson's A Study of Joseph Heller's Catch-22: Going Around Twice (New York: Peter Lang, 2001) offers a serviceable reading of the influence of High Modernism on Heller, allusions to the Gilgamesh epic, and the racial-religious subtext of Jewish mysticism.

Students should also read Catch-22 in the context of Heller's entire career, although that project is somewhat complicated by the fact that no single study to date discusses the posthumous Portrait of an Artist, as an Old Man (2000). The best introduction to his literary development can be found in Robert Merrill's Joseph Heller (Boston: Twayne, 1987). With sterling assessments of Something Happened (1974) and Good as Gold (1979), Merrill's study is hampered only by the fact that it covers nothing after God Knows (1984). However, Merrill does include a rare but important discussion of Heller's neglected theatrical efforts, including We Bombed in New Haven (produced 1967) and two little-known adaptations of his most famous novel: Catch-22: A Dramatization (produced 1971) and Clevinger's Trial (produced 1974). Both David Seed's The Fiction of Joseph Heller: Against the Grain (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988) and Stephen W. Pott's From Here to Absurdity: The Moral Battlefields of Joseph Heller (San Bernardino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1982, 1995) provide in-depth analyses of both literary technique and the ethics inherent in Heller's major themes, while Sanford Pinsker's Understanding Joseph Heller (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991) is particularly useful for recognizing the major motifs that unify those themes and Heller's black humor. The most comprehensive study to date is David M. Craig's Tilting at Mortality: Narrative Strategies in Joseph Heller's Fiction (Detroit, Mich.: Wayne State University Press, 1997), which includes excellent chapters on both Picture This (1988) and Closing Time (1994).

As with full-length studies, individual scholarly articles, whether in academic journals or essay collections, tend to focus on Catch-22 at the expense of Heller's subsequent works. Nevertheless, several individual essays on these underappreciated efforts stand out and are worth collecting: David Brauner's "Will the Real King David Please Stand Up? Unauthorized Versions of the King David Story in Three Post-War Jewish Novels," in Mark Knight and Thomas Woodman's Biblical Religion and the Novel, 1700–2000 (Aldershot, Hants, England and Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2006) examines God Knows in a socioreligious context, while Laura Elena Savu's "'This Book of Ours': The Crisis of Authorship in Joseph Heller's Portrait of an Artist, as an Old Man" (Intertexts [Spring 2003]: 71–89) reads Heller's posthumous farewell in the context of Postmodern theories of authorship. Andre Furlani's "'Brisk Socratic Dialogues': Elenctic Rhetoric in Joseph Heller's Something Happened" (Narrative, 3 [October 1995]: 252–270) demonstrates that Bob Slocum's seemingly detached, monotone narrative voice contains techniques borrowed from classical rhetoric, while Lois Tyson's "Joseph Heller's Something Happened: The Commodification of Consciousness and the Postmodern Flight from Inwardness" (CEA Critic, 54 [Winter 1992]: 37–51) places that narration firmly in the Postmodern tradition. Marshall Toman has published at least two illuminating readings of Good as Gold: "The Political Satire in Joseph Heller's Good as Gold" (Studies in Contemporary Satire, 17 [1990]: 6–14) and "Good as Gold and Heller's Family Ethic" (Studies in American Jewish Literature, 10 [Fall 1991]: 211–224).

Although Heller at present lacks a full-length biography, students interested in his familial background should read Heller's own memoir, Now and Then. Heller was also a generous interviewee, and the best of his literary musings have been conveniently collected by Adam J. Sorkin in Conversations with Joseph Heller (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1993). Of particular interest are such relatively obscure ephemera as Newsweek's "The Heller Cult" (October 1, 1962)—one of the earliest recognitions of Catch-22's burgeoning cult status—Heller's lengthy June 1975 Playboy interview (conducted by Sam Merrill) and a humorous March 11, 1979, conversation from the Washington Post Book World about Good as Gold with Heller's good friend and Coney Island compatriot Mel Brooks.

The primary bibliography is Matthew J. Bruccoli and Park Buckner's Joseph Heller: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 2002). Bruccoli and Buckner are also the compilers of Catch as Catch Can: The Collected Stories and Other Writings (New York: Simon & Schuster, 2003), which gathers the best of Heller's early short stories from 1945 to 1959, as well as five previously unpublished efforts. In addition to the out-of-print drama Clevinger's Trial (1973), the volume also includes a pair of obscure Catch-22 sequels, "Love, Dad" (1969) and "Yossarian Survives" (1987).

Students should consult the University of South Carolina's online introduction to its Joseph Heller Archive (<<http://www.sc.edu/library/spcoll/amlit/heller/heller.html>> viewed June 19, 2007), which holds some "150,000 pages notes, outlines, research, drafts, edited typescripts, proofs, correspondence, and reviews. The Archive documents the detailed crafting of six major books in extraordinary detail, showing the creative interaction between one of America's most distinguished contemporary novelists and the publishing process."

—Student Guide by Kirk Curnutt

Helprin, Mark (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer

"... when I was young I was sure of the good of the world, its beauty, and its ultimate justice. And even when I was broken the way one sometimes can be broken . . . I found upon arising that I was stronger than before, that the glories . . . that had been darkened in my fall, were shining ever brighter."

—A Soldier of the Great War (1991)

Mark Helprin is from Ossining, New York. He was educated at Harvard University (A.B., 1969; M.A., 1972) and, after serving in the British Merchant Navy and the Israeli armed forces, did postgraduate work at Princeton and Magdalen College, Oxford. His favorably received first book, A Dove from the East and Other Stories (1975), established him as a superior writer of short fiction. His second book, the novel Refiner's Fire: The Life and Adventures of Marshall Pearl, a Foundling (1976), further enhanced his reputation. Ellis Island and Other Stories (1981) demonstrates his stylish integration of realism and fantasy. His novel Winter's Tale (1983), about New York City and its efforts to combat crime and poverty, brought him further critical acclaim. A Soldier of the Great War (1991) is told in flashbacks by an Italian officer who fought on the Austria-Italy front in World War I. During a walk from Rome to a small mountain village, now an old man, he provides a young boy with reminiscences of astonishing events. Helprin was praised for both the authenticity of his historical novel and for the vividness of his descriptions and dialogue. He also has published Memoir From Antproof Case: A Novel (1995) and A City In Winter (1996). The Pacific and Other Stories (2004), his first story collection in a decade, includes sixteen stories. Freddy and Fredericka (2005) is a novel about a Prince of Wales unfit to accede to serve as king. Mark Helprin asserts that he "belongs to no literary school, movement, tendency, or trend."

Sources

Linville, James. "Interview with Mark Helprin," Paris Review, 35 (Spring 1993): 160-199.

Mark Helprin Official Website: <<http://www.markhelprin.com>> (viewed June 6, 2007).

Morgan, Keith. A Mark Helprin Bibliography: <www.lib.ncsu.edu/staff/kamorganhelprin-bib.html> (viewed June 6, 2007).

Henley, Beth (1952– ) playwright

Raised in Jackson, Mississippi, Beth Henley was introduced to the theater by her mother, who was active in amateur productions. Henley studied drama, receiving a B.F.A. at Southern Methodist University in 1974. There she wrote her most successful play, Crimes of the Heart (produced 1979), a Gothic but humorous depiction of three zany sisters in a small Southern town, and winner of the Pulitzer Prize. Henley also wrote the screenplay for the 1986 film adaptation. Her other plays include Am I Blue (produced 1973), The Miss Firecracker Contest (produced 1980), The Wake of Jamey Foster (produced 1982), The Debutante Ball (produced 1985), The Lucky Spot (produced 1986), and Abundance (produced 1989). Henley favors eccentric characters, many of them Southern or from Southern California, and her work has been praised for its intriguing blend of humor and melodrama. Her Collected Plays were published in two volumes in 1999.

Sources

Andreach, Robert J. Understanding Beth Henley. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2006.

Fesmire, Julie A., ed. Beth Henley: A Casebook. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Plunka, Gene A. The Plays of Beth Henley: A Critical Study. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2005.

Herbert, Frank (1920–1986) novelist, short-story writer

Who, me . . . a science-fiction writer? I've always considered myself to be a yellow journalist.

—Interview (1981)

The author of more than twenty-five novels, including the Dune Chronicles, Frank Herbert was born in Tacoma, Washington, in 1920. He served as a photographer during WORLD WAR II and began attending the University of Washington upon his return. He sold his first stories to pulp magazines while still an undergraduate. He left the University without taking a degree and worked as a journalist throughout the Pacific Northwest, publishing his first novel, The Dragon and the Sea, in 1956.

Dune (1965), the first volume in the series, won both the Nebula and Hugo Awards following its publication, and, though not an instant best-seller, has since been purported to be the best-selling science-fiction novel of all time. Set on Arrakis, a smoldering desert planet rich in a magical spice known as melange, Dune uses its science-fiction premise to explore ecological, political, and theological issues.

In 1972 Herbert worked as an ecological consultant in Vietnam and Pakistan, an experience that influenced both his writing and his future work as a lay analyst. Upon his return he began working full-time as a science-fiction writer. The subsequent novels in the Dune Chronicles follow the history of Arrakis and its complex social and political history through several centuries of palace intrigues and ecological shifts. Taken all together, the six novels (two volumes were published from Herbert's notes after his death) chart an imagined world rich in myth and meaning that is reminiscent of J. R. R. Tolkien's Middle Earth. Herbert has been credited with helping to inaugurate the trend in science fiction and fantasy novels toward self-contained invented worlds.

Sources

Herbert, Brian. Dreamer of Dune: A Biography of Frank Herbert. New York: Tor Books, 2003.

McNally, Willis E. The Dune Encyclopedia. New York: Putnam, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Herr, Michael (1940– ) journalist, novelist

Born in Syracuse, New York, Michael Herr was sent by Esquire magazine in 1967 to report on the war in Vietnam. Dispatches (1977), his book about the conflict, is regarded by many as the most important book about the war: Herr relates his personal story to the experiences of an entire generation of men who fought that unpopular war. Herr also wrote the voice-over narration for Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now and for Coppola's The Rainmaker, and he cowrote the screenplay for Full-Metal Jacket. Herr has also published a novel, Walter Winchell (1990), about the controversial columnist who in the 1930s and 1940s had the power to make and break reputations, and Kubrick (2000), a profile of Stanley Kubrick.

Herzog by Saul Bellow (New York: Viking, 1964) novel
In Saul BELLOW's sixth novel, Moses Herzog—a twice-divorced, well-respected academic in the midst of an emotional breakdown—cheerfully scribbles a series of humorous, probing letters to politicians, past lovers, and the great thinkers of Western civilization as he tries to come to terms both with the disaster of his romantic life and the plight of the modern age.

The novel begins in New York, where Herzog is visiting friends and putting his affairs in order before moving to his country home in rural Massachusetts. He travels to Chicago where he spies on his ex-wife, gets into a car accident, and is ecstatic about being briefly thrown in prison. Events are apparently incidental to Herzog. His ruminations on the past and his letters to Martin Heidegger, Friedrich Nietzsche, General Dwight D. Eisenhower, and others provide a platform for Bellow to theorize about the ideas that have shaped the contemporary spiritual malaise that both Herzog and Bellow seem to resist. Herzog earned Bellow his second NATIONAL BOOK AWARD.

Source

Bloom, Harold, ed. Saul Bellow's Herzog. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.

—Marshall Boswell

Higgins, George V. (1939–1999), novelist

George V. Higgins was a popular crime novelist whose books about the Boston Irish are admired for their terse, realistic dialogue. He was born in 1939 in Brockton, Massachusetts, and grew up in nearby Rockland. After receiving his B.A. from Boston College in 1961, he went to Stanford University for an M.A. in writing. He worked as a reporter in New England before attending Boston College Law School and then spent two years working in the Massachusetts Office of the Attorney General and served as Assistant U.S. Attorney for Massachusetts from 1970 to 1973. That year he also opened his own law firm. Higgins's first novel, The Friends of Eddie Coyle, was published in 1972 to strong praise from other writers. He published two dozen novels, including three about lawyer Jerry Kennedy. Higgins's fiction is defined by the absence of authorial intervention; the characters tell their stories in long monologues. He also published non-fiction works, including The Friends of Richard Nixon (1975); Style Versus Substance: Boston, Kevin White, and the Politics of Illusion (1984); The Progress of the Seasons: A Partisan's View of Baseball at Fen- way Park (1989); and On Writing (1990). At the time of his death he was teaching writing courses at Boston University.

Source

"George Higgins," Contemporary Autobiography Series, volume 5, edited by Adele Sarkissian. Detroit: Gale, 1987.

—Morris Colden

Highsmith, Patricia (1921–1995) novelist

Born in Fort Worth, Texas, Patricia Highsmith was educated at Julia Richmond High School in New York City and studied English, Latin, and Greek at Columbia University, graduating in 1942. In her teens she wrote stories about deranged characters. Her first published novel, Strangers on a Train (1950), the suspenseful story of a psychopathic killer, was published under a pseudonym. It sold more than one million copies and was adapted to the screen by Alfred Hitchcock. Her second novel, The Price of Salt (1952), the story of two women who fall in love, begun before her first published novel, sold almost as well as Strangers on a Train. In many of her novels Highsmith explored disturbed minds and unconventional sexual orientations in what critics called psychological thrillers.

For all her popularity, Highsmith avoided the public eye. She lived quietly in isolated surroundings near Locarno on the Swiss-Italian border. Her other noteworthy fiction includes The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955). Made into a movie in 1999, it is, in Highsmith's own words, about a "small-time American crook who moves to Europe and kills his way to happiness." Ripley, her favorite character, inspired a series: Ripley's Game (1974), The Boy Who Followed Ripley (1980), and Ripley Under Water (1991). She completed Small g: a Summer Idyll (1995), her final novel, just weeks before she died of leukemia. Her only nonfiction book is Plotting and Writing Suspense Fiction (1966).

Sources

Harrison, Russell. Patricia Highsmith. New York: Twayne, 1997.
Wilson, Andrew. Beautiful Shadow: A Life of Patricia Highsmith. New York: Bloomsbury, 2003.

Highwater, Jamake (1935–2001) journalist, novelist, critic

Part Blackfoot, part Cherokee, Jamake Highwater grew up in southern California. He attended North Hollywood High School, where he befriended Susan SONTAG. Highwater went on to study at the University of California, Berkeley, and the University of Chicago. He had a varied career as journalist, music and dance critic, novelist, and filmmaker. He collected traditional Native American tales in Anpao: An American Indian Odyssey (1977). His fiction for juveniles includes The Ceremony of Innocence (1985) and I Wear the Morning Star (1986). His criticism includes Rock and Other Four Letter Words: Music of the Electric Generation (1969) and Dance: Rituals of Experience (1978). Influenced by Joseph CAMPBELL, Highwater published The Language of Vision: Meditations on Myth and Metaphor in 1994. An openly gay writer, he produced The Mythology of Transgression: Homosexuality as Metaphor (1997). He also published Shadow Show: An Autobiographical Insinuation in 1986.

Hijuelos, Oscar (1952– ) novelist

He kept piles of records there, among them a number of the black and brittle 78s he had recorded with my father and their group, The Mambo Kings. These came crashing down, the bookcases's glass doors jerking open, the records shooting out and spinning like flying saucers. . . .

—The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love (1989)

Born in New York City to Cuban parents, Oscar Hijuelos was educated at New York's City College, where he studied writing with Susan SONTAG and Donald BARTHELME, earning his B.A. in 1975 and his M.A. in 1976. His second novel, The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love (1989), is the story of two brothers who move from Havana to New York in the 1950s in search of stardom. It won Hijuelos a Pulitzer Prize and was made into a successful motion picture. His other work includes Our House in the Last World (1983), The Fourteen Sisters of Emilio Montez O'Brien (1993), Mr. Ives' Christmas (1995), and Empress of the Splendid Season (1999). Hijuelos has been described as a poet of the Latino/immigrant experience, for his characters sometimes feel lost from their original homes' beauty and grace. His work is keenly balanced, in other words, between his characters' desires to assimilate and their pride in their heritage, which is part of their sense of independence. His sixth novel, A Simple Habana Melody: From When the World Was Good (2002), is based loosely on the life of Moises Simons, the Cuban rhumba composer who wrote songs for Desi Arnaz.

Source

Shirley, Paul. "Read Desi Arnaz in The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love," Melus, 29 (September 1995): 69–78.

Hillerman, Tony (1925– ) novelist

Born in Sacred Heart, Oklahoma, Tony Hillerman and his siblings were educated in a Catholic boarding school primarily for American Indian girls that also accepted non-Indian students from neighboring farms. After brief periods at college and in the U.S. Army, Hillerman returned to the Southwest and to his interest in Navajo life. He graduated from the University of Oklahoma with a degree in journalism in 1946 and earned an M.A. from the University of New Mexico in 1966. After various jobs in journalism he began writing mystery fiction in the 1960s, demonstrating an anthropologist's interest in Indian customs and ceremonies. His novels feature Joe Leaphorn and Jim Chee, tribal policemen who have degrees in anthropology.

Hillerman has won several awards for his writing, including the Edgar Allan Poe Award for his third novel, Dance Hall of the Dead (1973); Golden Spur Award from the Western Writers of America in 1987; and the Grand Master Award from the Mystery Writers of America in 1991. He has also been honored by the Navajo Tribe with a "Special Friend" award.

Hillerman's most important novels include The Blessing Way (1970), the first in his series on Joe Leaphorn; People of Darkness (1980); The Dark Wind (1982); and The Ghostway (1984). Later novels such as The Boy Who Made Dragonfly (a children's novel) and Finding Moon (1995) continue to exhibit his interest in Indian culture but do not include his policemen heroes. His nineteenth novel, The Shape Shifter, was published in 2006. Hillerman is an active anthologist of works about the West and crime fiction. His anthologies include the Oxford Book of American Detective Stories (1996), The Best American Mystery Stories of the Century (2000), and A New Omnibus of Crime (2006), all coedited with Rosemary Herbert. Hillerman's memoir Seldom Disappointed, was published in 2001.

Sources

Erismann, Fred. Tony Hillerman. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Western Writers Series, 1989.

Greenberg, Martin, ed. The Tony Hillerman Companion: A Comprehensive Guide to His Life and Work. New York: HarperCollins, 1994.

Linford, Laurence D. Tony Hillerman's Navajoland: Hideouts, Haunts, and Havens in the Joe Leaphorn and Jim Chee Novels. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 2001.

Hillman, Brenda (1951– ) poet

Born in Tucson, Arizona, Brenda Hillman received her B.A. from Pomona College in 1973 and her M.F.A. from the University of Iowa in 1975. Her work has been associated with both the most experimental poetry coming out of the San Francisco Bay area and a more traditional lyrical vein in American literature. Hillman is interested in both Gnostic convolutions and pop culture, and her poetry has garnered many awards. Her books include Bright Existence (1993), Loose Sugar (1997), and Pieces of Air in the Epic (2005). She teaches at St. Mary's College in California.

—Tod Marshall

Himes, Chester (1909–1984) novelist

If this plumbing for the truth reveals within the Negro personality, homicidal mania, lust for white women, a pathetic sense of inferiority, paradoxical anti-Semitism, arrogance, uncle-tomism, hate and fear and self-hate, this then is the effect of oppression on the human personality.

—“Dilemma of the Negro Novelist in the United States” (1948)

Chester Himes was born in Jefferson City, Mississippi. His family moved to Cleveland, Ohio, and broke up when he was in his teens. After graduating from high school, he used his job as a busboy to establish a lucrative living as a petty criminal. In 1926 he fell down an elevator shaft and injured his back. His disability pension enabled him to enroll at Ohio State University. Convicted of armed robbery in 1928, he was sentenced to twenty years in prison at age nineteen. In prison he began writing short stories about black street life, selling six stories before his parole in 1936. His most successful work drew on his own experience and included the novels If He Hollers, Let Him Go (1945), Lonely Crusade (1947), Cast the First Stone (1952), The Third Generation (1954), and The Primitive (1955). His works explored racism—in a California defense plant during WORLD WAR II, in unions, in the Communist Party, and in prisons—and examined the effects racism had on interpersonal relationships.

During the mid 1950s Himes went to France to find a more hospitable environment in which to write, and he turned to detective fiction to support himself. He attracted a wide readership with mystery novels he set in Harlem: For Love of Imabelle (1957), The Real Cool Killers (1959), The Crazy Kill (1959), The Big Gold Dream (1960), All Shot Up (1960), Cotton Comes to Harlem (1965), The Heat's On (1966), and Blind Man with a Pistol (1969). In his genre work as in his earlier fiction, Himes focused on the difficulties facing African American males vying for a place in society. Himes's Selected Writings appeared in 1973, and two volumes of autobiography, The Quality of Hurt and My Life of Absurdity, in 1972 and 1976.

Sources

Fabre, Michel, and Robert Skinner, eds. Conversations with Chester Himes. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.

Margolies, Edward, and Michel Fabre. The Several Lives of Chester Himes. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Sallis, James. Chester Himes: A Life. New York: Walker, 2001.

Hinton, S. E. (1948– ) novelist

Born in Tulsa, Oklahoma, Susan Eloise Hinton earned a B.S. at the University of Tulsa in 1970 and continues to live in the city. She writes mainly about and for teens. The Outsiders (1967), a story about gang violence narrated by a fourteen-year-old boy, was filmed in 1983. Her other novels about alienated teens have also been successful: That Was Then, This Is Now (1971) was filmed in 1985; Rumble Fish (1975) in 1983; and Tex (1979) in 1982. She has written two books for younger children, Big David, Little David (1995) and Puppy Sister (1995). Hawkes Harbor, Hinton's first novel for an adult audience, was published in 2004.

Source

Daly, Jay. Presenting S. E. Hinton. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Hirsch, Edward (1950– ) poet, critic

Edward Hirsch was born in Chicago, Illinois. Educated at Grinnell College, where he earned his B.A. degree in 1972, and at the University of Pennsylvania, where he earned his doctorate in 1979, Hirsch has taught at several colleges and universities. Utilizing lyrical, dramatic, and narrative elements in his work, his books of poetry include Wild Gratitude (1986), which won the 1987 NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD; The Night Parade (1989); On Love (1998); and Lay Back the Darkness (2003). His book about the art of poetry, How to Read a Poem and Fall in Love with Poetry (1999), reveals an accessible critical sensibility.

—Tod Marshall

Hispanic American Literature

Hispanic American literature incorporates the writing of Chicanos, or Mexican Americans; Puerto Rican Americans; Cuban Americans; and other Americans of Central or South American heritage. Marked in contemporary times by the 1947 publication of Mario Suárez's short stories in the Arizona Quarterly, Hispanic American literature can trace its roots to several hundred years earlier, when the then Spanish-controlled region that is now the western United States was inhabited by Spaniards, Creoles, and mestizos. Hispanic American literature has been written in English, Spanish, and caló (a hybrid that incorporates the vocabulary, grammar, and syntax of English and Spanish).

While predominant themes in Hispanic American literature mirror those of other ethnic groups, the “Chicano Renaissance,” beginning in the mid 1960s, saw the advent of themes specific to Latino culture. Hispanic American history; themes of migration, social protest, exploitation, and alienation; and folklore, cultural traditions, and family life (including accounts of life in the barrio, a Hispanic district or neighborhood within a city) became significant expressions of the connection between Spanish-speaking Americans.

José Antonio Villareal, the first significant Chicano novelist, explores in Pocho (1959) the fate of a Chicano boy who is torn between the values of his parents and the Anglo culture he finds enticing. Similarly, Pedro Juan Soto's Puerto Rican American novel, Spiks (1956), tells the story of poor immigrants struggling against the oppression and alienation of New York City.

Cuban American fiction has developed differently, with much of its focus in the 1960s on political issues, particularly on criticism of Fidel Castro's Communist regime in Cuba. These works, such as André Rivera Collado's Enterrado Vivo (Buried Alive, 1960), were written in Spanish and idealized prerevolutionary Cuba. By the 1970s, however, Cuban American writers had joined the mainstream of Hispanic American literature, producing novels—such as Celedonio González's Los Primos (1971)—that centered on Cuban life in this country as well as on the experience of exile from Cuba.

Cuban American novelist Oscar HIJUELOS became a dynamic force in moving Hispanic American literature directly into the mainstream of American literature. His work transcends Hispanic American concerns with exile and alienation in favor of a vibrant celebration of both Hispanic American heritage and the New World that Latinos and Latinas have established in the United States. His novel The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love (1989) won the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for fiction and was adapted for film in 1992.

The work of Chicano novelist Rudolfo ANAYA, especially Bless Me Ultima (1972), reflects the growing sophistication of Hispanic American literature, and the interest of a new generation of writers in experimenting with different styles, such as magic realism, which blends the myths, folklore, and history of Hispanic American families and communities. Similarly, Sandra CISNEROS has used shifting points of view, montage techniques, and the other tools of literary Modernism to craft complex views of Chicanos and Puerto Ricans in novels such as The House on Mango Street (1983). Like Cisneros, the Puerto Rican novelist Nicholasa Mohr has shifted from stories of disaffection with American life to affirmations of the new emerging identity of Hispanics in Felita (1981) and Rituals of Survival: A Woman's Portfolio (1985).

Cherrie MORAGA, a poet and playwright, has introduced feminist themes and lesbian subject matter to the Hispanic American canon. Her work builds on the example of her teacher, María Irene Fornés, a pioneering playwright and director whose work since the early 1960s has championed women's issues, pre- and post-revolutionary Cuba, and a range of other themes that go beyond exclusively ethnic concerns.

The publication of Richard Rodríguez's autobiography, Hunger for Memory (1982), represented a new generation of Hispanic American writers who continued to explore the immigrant experience and the problems of assimilation. Rodríguez asks direct questions about the Hispanic American's place in American life. His controversial work is indicative of a genre of literature that is still very much in the process of formation and debate.

Other important Hispanic American novelists and short-story writers include Gary Soto, Aristeo Brito, Denise Chávez, Cristina García, Julia ALVAREZ, Virgil Suarez, and Gina Valdés. Soto and Valdés are also poets and are frequently represented in anthologies along with Ricardo Sánchez, Luis Omar Salinas, Luis J. Rodríguez, Demetria Martínez, and Gloria Vando. Representative works of the Hispanic American theater include Luis Miguél Valdez's Las Dos Caras del Patroneito (produced 1965) and Los Vendidos (produced 1967); Moraga's Giving Up the Ghost (produced 1986); and Delores Prida's Beautiful Señoritas (produced 1994). Important autobiographers include Cisneros, Floyd Salas, and Victor Villaseñor.

Sources

Christie, John D. Latino Fiction and the Modernist Imagination: Literature of the Borderlands. New York: Garland, 1998.

Gish, Robert Franklin. Beyond Bounds: Cross-Cultural Essays on Anglo, American Indian, and Chicano Literature. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1996.

Horno-Delgado, Anunciación, and others, eds. Breaking Boundaries: Latina Writings and Critical Readings. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1989.

Shirley, Carl, and Paula W. Shirley. Understanding Chicano Literature. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Hoagland, Edward (1932– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Edward Hoagland was born in New York. He attended Deerfield Academy and graduated from Harvard in 1954. His early novels are about city life, boxing, and the circus; they include Cat Man (1956), The Circle Home (1960), and The Peacock's Tail (1965). Hoagland is better known for his travel and nature writing, such as Notes from the Century Before (1969), The Courage of Turtles (1970), Walking the Dead Diamond River (1973), Red Wolves and Black Bears (1976), and A Journey to the Sudan (1979). Complementing his concern for the environment are ecological studies, The Tugman's Passage (1982) and Balancing Acts (1992). Seven Rivers West (1986), an historical novel set on the prairies and in the Rocky Mountains, combines Hoagland's interests in nature and the human character. City Tales (1986) is set in New York City. Tigers and Ice: Reflections on Nature and Life (1999) appeared in 1999. Two years later Hoagland published his autobiographical Compass Points: How I Lived (2001).

Hoffman, Alice (1952– ) novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter

Born in New York City, Alice Hoffman grew up in Long Island and was convinced at an early age that she wanted to be a writer. After receiving her B.A. from Adelphi University in 1973, she attended Stanford University, from which she received her M.A. in 1975. While at Stanford, she wrote her first novel, Property Of, which was published in 1977 by Farrar, Straus and Giroux. Her best-known novels are At Risk (1988), a contemporary drama about a family dealing with AIDS; Practical Magic (1995), a whimsical romance about two modern-day witches in New England; Here on Earth (1997), a mother-daughter tale; Local Girls (1999), an interlinked story-cycle; and The Ice Queen (2005), another novel tinged with magic. Her novels for young adults include Aquamarine (2001), The Foretelling (2005), and Incantation (2006). Her eighteenth novel for adults, Skylight Confessions, was published in 2007.

Sources

Brown-Davidson, Terri. "To Build Is to Dwell": The Beautiful, Strange Architectures of Alice Hoffman's Novels," Hollins Critic, 33 (1996): 1–15.

Alice Hoffman's Official Web Site: <<http://www.alicehoffman.com/>> (viewed May 29, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Hollander, John (1929– ) poet, critic

Born into a Jewish family in New York City, John Hollander was educated at Columbia University, where he received his A.B. in 1950 and his M.A. in 1952, and at Indiana University, where he earned his Ph.D. 1959. His teachers included Lionel Trilling. He began to publish his POETRY in 1954. After a series of academic appointments, he settled in 1986 in New Haven, where he is A. Bartlett Giametti Professor of English at Yale. Hollander credits W. H. Auden as the major influence on his first collection of poetry, A Cracking of Thorns (1958), published in the Yale Series of Younger Poets, edited that year by Auden. Hollander was quickly recognized as a poet of sophisticated techniques, evident in his elaborate rhyme schemes and unusual meter. His Selected Poems appeared in 1972 and 1993; Harp Lake: Poems in 1988, Tesserae: & Other Poems in 1993; Figurehead & Other Poems and War Poems in 1999; and Picture Window in 2003. He has also published literary criticism, including Visions and Resonance: Two Senses of Poetic Form (1975); Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (1981); Melodius Guide: Fictive Pattern in Poetic Language (1988); and The Poetry of Everyday Life (1998). With Lionel Trilling, Harold BLOOM, and others he edited The Oxford Anthology of English Literature (1973), and with Bloom, Poetics of Influence (1988). In 2003 he edited American Wits: An Anthology of Light Verse.

Sources

Honig, Edwin. The Poet's Other Voice. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

Lewin, Jennifer. Never Again Would Birds' Song Be the Same: Essays on Early Modern and Modern Poetry in Honor of John Hollander. New Haven: Beinecke Library, Yale University, 2002.

Holmes, John (1926–1988) poet, autobiographer

John Holmes was born in Massachusetts and served in the navy during WORLD WAR II. He began to publish POETRY, collected much later in The Bowling Green Poems (1977). He is better known for Go (1952), his novel about the BEATS as they congregated in New York City. Characters are based on Neal Cassady, Allen Ginsberg, and Jack Kerouac. Another novel, The Horn (1958), focuses on a black jazz saxophonist in decline. Holmes wrote several memoirs about the Beat scene, including Nothing More to Declare (1967), Gone in October (1985), and Representative Men (1988). Displaced Person (1987) is a record of his travels and Passionate Opinions (1988) is his commentary on cultural issues. His Selected Essays appeared in 1987.

Sources

Knight, Arthur and Kit Knight, eds. Interior Geographies: An Interview with John Clellon Holmes. Warren, Ohio: Literary Denim, 1981.

McNally, Dennis. Desolate Angel. New York: Random House, 1979.

Homes, A. M. (1961– ) novelist, short-story writer

Like Ann BEATTIE before her, A. M. Homes writes about the quiet desperation of middle-class life. She was born in Washington, D.C., and received her B.A. from Sarah Lawrence College in 1985. Her first novel, Jack, which she wrote while at the writing workshop at the University of Iowa (M.F.A., 1988), was published in 1989. A coming-of-age story about a teenager who learns that his father is homosexual, the novel is reputed to be one of the 100 most banned books in America. The Safety of Objects (1990), a collection of linked short stories about suburban families in disarray, became a critical favorite upon publication and was soon followed by The End of Alice (1996), a disturbing tale of pedophilia that alludes directly to both Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland and Vladimir NABOKOV's LOLITA (1955). Her other novels are Music for Torching (1999), another critical look at the spiritual desolation of suburban life, and This Book Will Change Your Life (2006), an uncharacteristic account of a contemporary man's spiritual redemption. The Mistress's Daughter (2007) is a memoir of the author's experience as an adopted child who meets her birth mother thirty years after her mother, the young mistress of an older married man with children, chose during pregnancy to put her child up for adoption.

—Marshall Boswell

Hongo, Garrett (1951– ) poet, memoirist

Garret Hongo was born in 1951 in Volcano, Hawaii, although his family relocated soon after his birth to Los Angeles. He received his B.A. from Pomona College in 1973 and his M.F.A. from the University of California at Irvine in 1980. He is the author of two books of poetry, Yellow Light (1982) and River of Heaven (1988), and a memoir, Volcano: A Memoir of Hawaii (1995). He teaches at the University of Oregon. His poetry combines narrative formulation and lyrical intensity.

Source

Maio, Samuel. Creating Another Self: Voice in Modern American Personal Poetry. Thomas Jefferson University Press: New York, 1995.

—Tod Marshall

hooks, bell (1952– ) public intellectual

Much of the awareness that I brought to feminist struggle about the danger of identifying with victimhood was knowledge that came from the oppositional life practices of black folks in the segregated South.

—Killing Rage: Ending Racism (1996)

Kentucky-born Gloria Watkins took the pseudonym bell hooks early on, combining the maiden names of her mother and her grandmother. She received her B.A. from Stanford in 1973; her M.A. from the University of Wisconsin in 1976; and her Ph.D. from the University of California, Santa Cruz in 1983. Her first book, Ain't I a Woman: Black Women and Feminism (1981), takes its title and its inspiration from nineteenth-century reformer Sojourner Truth, and it began hooks's extraordinarily prolific career as a social theorist and activist confronting what she calls the three isms in American life—sexism, racism, and classism. Self-consciously assuming the role of public intellectual, hooks has commented broadly on social topics in more than twenty-five volumes of nonfiction, including Bone Black: Memories of Girlhood (1996) and Wounds of Passion: A Writing Life (1997). She has also written children's books and poetry, including When Angels Speak of Love (2007). Since 1994 hooks has taught at City College of the City University of New York.

Source

Florence, Namulundah. Bell Hooks' Engaged Pedagogy: A Transgressive Education for Critical Consciousness. Westport, Conn.: Bergin & Garvey, 1998.

The Hours by Michael Cunningham (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1998) novel

The Hours is a tripartite novel in which author Michael CUNNINGHAM connects two seemingly unrelated narratives—one involving Clarissa Vaughan, a present-day book editor living in Greenwich Village, and one centering on Laura Brown, a dissatisfied housewife living in Los Angeles in 1949—via a third one, the life and work of Virginia Woolf. The novel opens in the final days before Woolf's suicide in 1941 and then shifts to Clarissa's arrival at the apartment of her friend Richard, a poet dying of AIDS who has just won a major literary prize, and for whom she wants to throw a celebratory party. It then shifts back to a similar day in Woolf's life in 1923, when she began to conceive of her novel Mrs. Dalloway while expecting a visit from her sister; the title character, named Clarissa, spends the entire novel preparing for a party.

The three narratives—Woolf's, Clarissa's, and Laura's—are intricately interwoven in ways that directly invoke Woolf's Modernist novel, which, like the events in Cunningham's novel, take place in a single day. Clarissa relives the events of Mrs. Dalloway, while Woolf brings the novel to life in her imagination, a novel which Laura reads while contemplating the emptiness of her own existence. After Richard jumps to his death, an elderly Laura Brown arrives at Clarissa's apartment for the now canceled party, where it is revealed that she is Richard's mother. The novel functions as a contemporary mediation on Woolf's exploration of day-to-day ennui, the puzzling connections between men and women, and the mystery of time. The novel won both the Pulitzer Prize and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD in 1999.

Source

Hughes, Mary Joe. "Michael Cunningham's The Hours and Post-modern Artistic Re-Presentation," Critique: Studies in Contemporary Fiction, 45, no. 4 (Summer 2004): 349–361.

—Marshall Boswell

Houston, James (1933– ) novelist

Born in San Francisco, James D. Houston taught creative writing at the University of California, Santa Cruz, from 1969 to 1993. He is best known for Continental Drift (1978), a novel about a journalist's life in Houston, which was made into a movie. A Native Son of the Golden West (1971) centers on a California playboy in Hawaii. Houston's earlier novels were also well received, including Between Battles (1968), set during a military exercise, and Gig (1969), the story of a jazz musician. In the Ring of Fire: A Pacific Basin Journey appeared in 1997 and The Last Paradise in 1998. Snow Mountain Passage, about the Donner Party, was published in 2001. Farewell to Manzanar: A True Story of Japanese American Experience during and after the World War II Internment (2002) by Houston and his wife, Jeanne Wakatsuki Houston, chronicles the experiences of the Wakatsuki family. Bird of Another Heaven was published in 2007.

Source

Raskin, Jonah. James D. Houston. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1991.

Howard, Maureen (1930– ) novelist, critic

Maureen Howard, who is respected for her literary and accomplished fiction, was born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, and received her B.A. from Smith College in 1952. Her first novel, Not a Word about Nightingales (1961), is the witty story of a college professor seduced by the charm of rural Italy. She has been nominated for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD three times, for Grace Abounding (1982), Expensive Habits (1986), and Natural History (1992). A respected editor, whose collections include Contemporary American Essays (1984), Cabbage and Bones: An Anthology of Irish-American Women's Fiction (coeditor, 1997), and the Library of America edition of Edith Wharton's Collected Stories (2 volumes, 2001), Howard has also published an autobiography, Facts of Life, which originally appeared in 1978 and was republished in 1999. Her novels, including A Lover's Almanac (1998) and The Silver Screen (2004), have caused some critics to place her in the company of such English writers as Iris Murdoch and A. S. Byatt.

—Marshall Boswell

Howard, Richard (1929– ) poet, critic, translator

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, Richard Howard was educated at Columbia University, where he received his M.A. in 1952, and at the Sorbonne. He is a poet who is best known for his translations, which include more than two hundred French works, notably those by modern writers including André Gide and Roland Barthes. His Untitled Subjects (1969), fifteen dramatic monologues, won the 1970 Pulitzer Prize. His other collections include Lining Up (1984), No Traveller (1989), Like Most Revelations: New Poems (1994), If I Dream I Have You, I Have You (1997), and Trappings: New Poems (1999). He published Alone with America: Essays on the Art of Poetry in the United States Since 1950 in 1969 (enlarged in 1980). Howard has taught at several colleges and universities, including the University of Houston and Columbia University. In 2003 he received the Lifetime Achievement Award, NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, and he is a MacArthur Fellow.

Howells Medal

Established in 1925, the William Dean Howells Medal is awarded every five years by the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and is selected by a separate committee drawn from the existing Academy membership. The Howells Medal was named in honor of a leading figure of American Realism, novelist William Dean Howells, who was elected the first president of the Academy in 1908, a position he held until his death in 1920. Although the award traditionally has been given in recognition of the most distinguished novel published during the previous five years, between the years 1940 and 1950 it recognized the entire body of work produced by the winners, which were Ellen Glasgow (1940), Booth Tark-ington (1945), and William Faulkner (1950), respectively. Other past winners include Eudora Welty, The Ponder Heart (1955), James Gould COZZENS, By Love Possessed (1960), John Cheever, The Wapshot Scandal (1965), William STYRON, The Confessions of Nat Turner (1970), Thomas Pynchon, Gravity's Rainbow (1973, declined); William Maxwell, So Long, See You Tomorrow (1980); E. L. Doctorow, Billy Bathgate (1990); John Updike, Rabbit at Rest (1995; see Rabbit Angstrom), Don DeLillo, Underworld (2000); and Shirley Hazzard, The Great Fire (2005). No award was given in 1985.

—Marshall Boswell

Howes, Barbara (1914–1996) poet, short-story writer

Poet Barbara Howes was born in New York City and grew up in Boston. She graduated from Bennington College in 1936 and moved to New York City, where she worked as an editor for Chimera magazine between 1943 and 1947. Her first book, The Undersea Farmer (1948), was praised as the work of an accomplished precisionist on par with such American masters as Wallace Stevens and Elizabeth Bishop. Howes's other collections are In the Cold Country (1954), Light and Dark (1959), Looking Up at Leaves (1966), The Blue Garden (1972), and Moving (1983). She also edited two major anthologies of South American writing, From the Green Antilles: Writings of the Caribbean (1966) and The Eye of the Heart: Short Stories From Latin America (1973). In 1978 her A Private Signal: Poems New and Selected (1977) was a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. A short-story writer as well, Howes collected her fiction in 1983 under the title The Road Commissioner and Other Stories. Her Collected Poems: 1945–1990 was published in 1995.

Howl by Allen Ginsberg (1956) poem

Written by Allen GINSBERG, Howl is one of the key works of the BEAT movement of the 1950s. The poem is dedicated to Carl Solomon, whom Ginsberg befriended when both of them were patients in a psychiatric hospital in 1949. Describing a generation of young people—"hipsters"—who took drugs and absorbed themselves in city culture, the poem begins:

I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness, starving hysterical naked, dragging themselves through the negro streets at dawn looking for an angry fix . . .

The youth of Ginsberg's Howl found no haven in universities and found the conventional middle-class culture of America stultifying and imprisoning. In the poem, Ginsberg invoked the poet William Blake, whose work and visions influenced the Beats as they drifted from the East Coast to the West in search of a culture that was not, as Ginsberg described, filled with lifeless poetry. Ultimately, the poem is a lament for young people who were trying to find an original way to express themselves. Although much of the imagery of Howl is grim and despairing about the state of American life, it is also filled with Ginsberg's characteristic humor and whimsy. Ginsberg makes allusions to an American patriotism and optimism and translates these qualities into the iconoclasm of the Beat consciousness.

Sources

Ehrlich, J. W., ed. Howl of the Censor. San Carlos, Calif.: Nourse, 1961.

Miles, Barry, ed. Howl: Original Draft Facsimile, Transcript & Variant Versions, Fully Annotated by Author, with Contemporaneous Correspondence, Account of First Public Reading, Legal Skirmishes, Precursor Texts & Bibliography. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.

Raskin, Jonah. American Scream: Allen Ginsberg's Howl and the Making of the Beat Generation. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2004.

Shinder, Jason, ed. The Poem That Changed America: "Howl" Fifty Years Later. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2006.

Hugo, Richard (1923–1982) poet

The poems of Richard Hugo are intimately connected to the Pacific Northwest area where he lived. Born to an unwed teenage mother who placed him in the care of her parents, he grew up in a working-class area south of Seattle, Washington. Having served as a bombardier in Italy during WORLD WAR II, he began studying poetry at the University of Washington under the tutelage of Theodore ROETHKE. In 1959 he helped found the journal Poetry Northwest, and published his first book, A Run of Jacks (1961), two years later. In 1964 he accepted a teaching position at the University of Montana. His most well known poems about Seattle and the area surrounding Missoula, Montana, include "The Milltown Union Bar," "Degrees of Gray in Philipsburg," "White Center" (the name of the Seattle suburb where Hugo grew up), "Kicking Horse Reservoir," and "Spurgin Road Field." His 1977 collection, 31 Letters and 13 Dreams, records his breakdown following a bout of alcoholism, while his late volume, The Right Madness on Skye (1980), draws upon his experiences on Skye Island, off the coast of Scotland. His collected poems, Making Certain It Goes On, appeared in 1984, two years after Hugo's death from leukemia. The Real West Marginal Way: A Poet's Autobiography (1986) was edited by his wife.

Source

Allen, Michael S. We Are Called Human: The Poetry of Richard Hugo. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1982.

—Marshall Boswell

Humor

The detonation of the first atomic bomb in Hiroshima at the climax of WORLD WAR II ushered in more than the nuclear age and the COLD WAR: it also changed the way U.S. writers thought about the function of humor. A whole new breed of writers used a bleak form of humor to address the very real possibility of total annihilation from nuclear war, a strategy that soon became known as "black humor."

The term was lifted from French surrealist André Breton's 1937 anthology L'Humour Noir, which featured selections from Jonathan Swift, Franz Kafka, Arthur Rimbaud, Edgar Allan Poe, Lewis Carroll, and Charles Baudelaire. Books such as Joseph HELLER's CATCH-22 (1955), John BARTH's The Floating Opera (1956), and Kurt VONNEGUT's SLAUGHTERHOUSE-FIVE (1969) all dealt with serious subjects such as war, nuclear proliferation, and even existentialist justifications for suicide, and yet they treated these matters as absurdities best addressed satirically. In 1965 author Bruce Jay Friedman published an anthology titled Black Humor, which included characteristic excerpts from the work of Barth, Heller, and Vonnegut, as well as Philip ROTH, Terry SOUTHERN, Edward ALBEE, and many others. Many of the original black humorists—Barth, Vonnegut, PYNCHON, Roth—later became associated with POSTMODERNISM, of which black humor was an early manifestation.

Mad magazine, a satire publication modeled after an underground comic book, made a deep impact on the direction of humor in the 1950s and beyond. Anarchic and proudly juvenile in its approach, Mad was also significant for the breadth of its satirical targets, from the nuclear family of 1950s bourgeois ideology to Beatniks, rock and rollers, and fatuous government officials. In the 1960s and 1970s Mad broadened its target base to include hippies, peaceniks, sexual adventurers, and politicians. Comedian Lenny Bruce, whose topical stand-up routine functioned also as a stinging form of social critique, emerged in the 1950s. When he was arrested in 1964 on charges of obscenity, a petition in support of his release was signed by prominent writers, including Allen GINSBERG, James BALDWIN, Norman MAILER, and William STYRON.

Ralph ELLISON's INVISIBLE MAN (1952) cast a grimly humorous eye on America's racist social order that proved to be immensely influential. Taking his cue from the blues, Ellison managed to disclose the absurdity of American racism without blunting the sting of his critique. Similarly, Langston Hughes, largely known as a poet, published a string of popular stories featuring his comic character, Jesse B. Semple, a Harlem resident who points up the ridiculousness of racist customs. The stories became known as "The Simple Stories" and were collected in such volumes as Simple Speaks His Mind (1950), Simple Takes a Wife (1953), and Simple Stakes a Claim (1957). In 1959, along with composer David Martin, Hughes successfully adapted the Simple Stories into a Broadway musical called Simply Heavenly. Hughes also edited The Book of Negro Humor (1966).

Similarly, Jewish writers Saul BELLOW and Philip ROTH produced memorable comic works, including Bellow's Henderson the Rain King (1959) and Roth's scabrous best-seller about guilt and masturbation, PORTNOY'S COMPLAINT (1969). Leo ROSTEN produced a number of comic works about the Jewish immigrant experience, including *H*Y*M*A*N*K*A*P*L*A*N* (1959) and *O K*A*P*L*A*N! MY K*A*P*L*A*N!* (1976). His book The Joys of Yiddish (1968) also became a best-seller.

In the 1970s, with the original black humorists now fully engaged in Postmodernism, American literary humor took a decisively political turn. Philip Roth savagely parodied the Richard Nixon administration in his Swifteen satire, Our Gang (1971), while Robert COOVER turned the impeached former president into the wide-eyed narrator of his parody of 1950s Cold War politics, THE PUBLIC BURNING (1977).

In the mid 1980s younger novelists who had come of age in the waning days of 1970s Postmodernism began to look for new ways to move beyond parody and self-reflexivity. Short-story writer Lorrie MOORE perfected a blend of lyrical poignancy and self-protective irony in such now classic short stories as "How to Be An Other Woman," "Like Life," and "You're Ugly, Too." The decade also witnessed the rise of new humorists such as Fran Lebowitz, a New Yorker whose collections Metropolitan Life (1978) and Social Studies (1981) combine the acerbic tone of Dorothy Parker with the contemporary urban neurosis of Woody Allen and P. J. O'Rourke. The autobiographical memoirist David Sedaris and radio personality Garrison KEILLOR, host of the popular National Public Radio program, Lake Wobegon Days, continue the American tradition of humor into the twenty-first century.

Sources

Hauck, Richard Boyd. A Cheerful Nihilism: Confidence and the "Absurd" in American Humorous Fiction. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1971.

Walker, Nancy. A Very Serious Thing: Women's Humor and American Culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1988.

Yates, Norris W. The American Humorist: Conscience of the Twentieth Century. Ames: University of Iowa Press, 1964.

—Marshall Boswell

Humphrey, William (1924–1997) novelist

William Humphrey's work is set in East Texas, where he grew up. He attended both the University of Texas and Southern Methodist University but never took a degree. Humphrey wrote in the regionalist tradition of J. Frank Dobie, although in novels like The Ordways (1964) he dwelled more frequently on the violence of backcountry people. His novels, which often involve family chronicles, include Proud Flesh (1973), Hostages to Fortune (1984), No Resting Place (1989), and September Song (1992). His stories are collected in The Last Husband (1953) and A Time and Place (1968). An avid fisherman, he published nonfiction works, including The Spawning Run (1970) and My Moby Dick (1978). He wrote about his childhood in Texas, particularly about his father's early death, in Farther Off from Heaven (1977).

Source

Almon, Bert. William Humphrey: Destroyer of Myths. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1998.

Hustvedt, Siri (1955– ) novelist, essayist

Born in Northfield, Maine, Siri Hustvedt received her B.A. from St. Olaf College in 1977 and her Ph.D. in English from Columbia University in 1986. Her first book, The Blindfold (1992), is a terse novel about a young woman's erotic and intellectual awakening in late-1980s New York. She followed this success with two more well-received novels, The Enchantment of Lily Dahl (1996), a coming-of-age novel set in the Midwest, and What I Loved (2003), a novel about the New York art set. Hustvedt has also published three works of criticism—Yonder: Essays (1998), Mysteries of the Rectangle: Essays on Painting (2005), and A Plea for Eros: Essays (2006).

—Marshall Boswell

Hwang, David Henry (1957– ) playwright

One of the most important figures in Asian American literature, David Henry HWANG is the son of Chinese immigrants. He received his B.A. at Stanford University in 1979 and attended the Yale School of Drama in 1980–1981. He won an Obie Award for his play F.O.B. (produced 1979), which stands for "fresh off the boat." The play explores the way Chinese immigrants survive when they are thrust into American culture without any preparation. Golden Child (produced 1996) is about the dispute among the three wives of a wealthy Chinese landowner over the future of his favored child. It won Hwang an Obie for best playwriting. Family Devotions (produced 1981) continues the immigrant story. The Dance and the Railroad (produced 1981) dramatizes an 1867 strike by Chinese immigrant railroad builders. M. Butterfly (produced 1988), his most successful play, won a Tony Award for distinguished achievement in theater. It is the story of the tragic love affair between a French diplomat and a beautiful Chinese opera star posing as a woman. Hwang's opera Ainadamar was produced at the Tanglewood Festival in 2003.

Source

Street, Douglas. David Henry Hwang. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1989.

Imlay, Gilbert (1754–1828) novelist, chronicler

The fatigue of traveling to this country is merely imaginary, and I am sure if you were to hear Miss Caroline T-----n's description of the mountains and the beautiful landscapes upon the Susquehanna, you would be quite enchanted with the idea of taking such a journey.

—Letter VII, “Mrs. W---- to Miss R----- Pittsburg, Sept.,” The Emigrants (1793)

Novelist, land agent, and essayist, Gilbert Imlay was born February 9, 1754, in Upper Freehold, Monmouth County, New Jersey. There is little information about Imlay's early life. As a young adult Imlay served in the Revolutionary War from January to July 1778 as part of Forman's Additional Continental Regiment, eventually reaching the rank of first lieutenant. After the war, Imlay was part of the westward movement into the Ohio River Valley, where as a discharged soldier he had land rights. He established himself in Kentucky in March 1784 and became involved in risky land speculation; nevertheless, in April 1784, he became the deputy surveyor of Jefferson County in Kentucky. In 1793, the year his novel The Emigrants was published, Imlay went to Paris to assume a diplomatic post, entering the world of revolutionary France along with Americans Thomas PAINE and Joel BARLOW, and British activists such as Mary Wollstonecraft (1759–1797), author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792). During this time in Paris, Imlay and Wollstonecraft became romantically involved. In 1793, as the French Revolution turned violent and the Reign of Terror began, Imlay left Paris and traveled south to Le Havre, in Normandy, where he successfully ran the British blockade. In January or February 1794, Wollstonecraft joined him and in May their daughter, Fanny, was born.

Imlay's A Topographical Description of the Western Territory of North America (1792) and The Emigrants (1793) appear as part of a literary tradition spurred by the national westward movement at the turn of the century. The nonfictional Topographical Description is written as a series of letters promoting the beauties of the American frontier. Amanda Gilroy and W. M. Verhoeven describe Imlay's realistic perspective as that of a “staunchly rationalistic, pragmatic, Enlightenment real estate developer.” In this regard, Imlay tended to minimize the hazards or difficulties of travel and settlement. The Emigrants, also written in the epistolary form, is a fictitious adventure story in which an English family of immigrants are similarly undaunted by the challenges of westward migration. They set off across the Allegheny Mountains with an optimistic approach that becomes evident in the absence of details surrounding travel itself. In Letter XI, Miss Caroline T-----N writes from Pittsburg, Ohio, to her sister describing the journey across the mountains as a relatively easy passage:

I had previously made up my mind upon walking over the mountain, which is about fifty miles across, from the opinion that there must be many interesting views on the way, as I should loose them in case I kept my seat in the waggon, which was not only uncomfortable from being crowded with our little furniture, but the roughness of the road made it very unpleasant to ride; besides, I could not bare to see the poor horses tugging up the almost perpendicular hills, a load that was almost too great for them, when I was so capable of walking. . . .

The novel also has a dramatic side, with a CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE and other dangers, and includes discussions about women's education and debates about marriage laws. Imlay's books caught the imagination of a European audience intrigued by idealistic notions of pioneers and the allure of new land.

Works

Imlay, Gilbert. A Topographical Description of the Western Territory of North America. London: Printed for J. Debrett, 1792; Early American Imprints, 25648.

Imlay. The Emigrants: 1793. Dublin: Printed for C. Brown, 1794.

Source

Gilroy, Amanda, and W. M. Verhoeven, eds. Introduction to The Emigrants by Gilbert Imlay. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Inglis, Charles (1734–1816) pamphleteer

Charles Inglis, an Anglican minister and LOYALIST, was born in Donegal, Ireland, in 1734. He came to America in 1757 to take up a teaching post in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and returned to England for ordination the following year. In 1759 he crossed the Atlantic Ocean once more to begin missionary work among the Mohawk Indians near Dover, Delaware. In 1765 he was appointed assistant to the rector of Trinity Church in New York City. While in New York, Inglis campaigned vigorously for the appointment of an American bishop, a proposal that met with hostility among the dissenting sects in the colonies. As tension increased between the colonies and Great Britain, Inglis made clear his support of the Crown, writing PAMPHLETS and publishing letters under the pseudonym "Papinian." He upheld Parliament's and the king's right to tax the colonies, and chastised local radicals for their resistance to Crown policies.

Inglis's most famous pamphlet, The True Interest of America Impartially Stated in Certain Strictures, appeared in 1776 and was a response to Thomas PAINE's revolutionary COMMON SENSE. Inglis's True Interest argued for reconciliation with Great Britain and listed the "evils which inevitably must attend our separating" from the mother country. Citing the advantages of peace; the restoration of agriculture, commerce, and industry; and the protection of American trade by "the greatest naval power in the world," Inglis warned that "the greatest confusion, and most violent convulsions would take place" and that "devastation and ruin" would be a rebellion's legacy. "Americans," he reminded his readers, "are properly Britons. They have the manners, habits, and ideas of Britons"—and Britons "never could bear . . . republicanism."

In 1777 Inglis became rector of Trinity Church, where despite the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, he continued to pray for the king from his pulpit. As a result of his Loyalism, his church was burned and his personal property confiscated. In 1783, when the British evacuated New York, Inglis joined other Loyalist refugees in Nova Scotia. Despite the harsh treatment he had received at the hands of the revolutionaries, he declared: "I do not leave behind me an individual, against whom I have the smallest degree of resentment or ill will." In 1787 he was consecrated as the first Anglican bishop of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, and Bermuda. Nine years later Inglis retired to a farm near Halifax, but he remained active, writing and participating in local politics, until his death on February 24, 1816.

Works

Inglis, Charles. The True Interest of America Impartially Stated, in Certain Strictures on a Pamphlet Intituled Common Sense. Philadelphia: Printed by James Humphreys, 1776; Early American Imprints, 14810.

Inglis. Letters of Papinian: In Which the Conduct, Present State and Prospects, of the American Congress, are Examined. New York: Printed by Hugh Gaine, 1779; Early American Imprints, 16311.

Inglis. A Charge Delivered to the Clergy of the Province of Quebec, at the Primary Visitation Holden in the City of Quebec, in the Month of August 1789. By the Right Reverend Charles, Bishop of Nova Scotia. Halifax, N.S.: Printed by Anthony Henry, 1790. Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1986.

Sources

Calhoon, Robert McCluer. The Loyalists in Revolutionary America, 1760–1781. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.

Cuthbertson, Brian. The First Bishop: A Biography of Charles Inglis. Halifax, N.S.: Waegwoltic, 1987.

Lydekker, John Wolfe. The Life and Letters of Charles Inglis, His Ministry in America and Consecration as First Colonial Bishop, from 1759 to 1787. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1936.

The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano by Olaudah Equiano (London: Printed by the author, 1789) autobiography

Olaudah EQUIANO's The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano relates his life as a series of remarkable events. Kidnapped along with his sister when he was eleven years old, Equiano survived the Middle Passage from Africa to America, arrived in Virginia, and was sold after one month to an officer in the Royal Navy, Michael Henry Pascal, who renamed him after a Swedish King, Gustavus Vassa. Equiano learned how to navigate and became a proficient trader as he sailed between London and America. Having saved enough money from trading to pay for his freedom, Equiano successfully convinced Robert King, then his master, to grant him his manumission. Equiano continued on trading voyages and even took part in an expedition to the North Pole. During this time Equiano was converted to Methodism and experienced a spiritual conversion. With all of these different elements, The Interesting Narrative has been identified as a SLAVE NARRATIVE, a travel narrative, and a SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Although recent scholarship from Vincent Carretta suggests that Equiano was born in South Carolina rather than in Africa, Equiano's book remains an important historical narrative that anticipated the abolitionist movement and provided a key document for antislavery societies in England and America.

Source

Carretta, Vincent. Equiano the African: Biography of a Self-Made Man. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005.

Iroquois Tribe or Confederacy

Belonging to the Iroquoian language group, the Iroquois located in the northeastern areas, excelled in agriculture, and, later, trade. The Haudenosaunee, as they called themselves, means "people of the longhouse," a reference to their fifty- to one-hundred-foot-long wood-frame houses, which could each accommodate approximately fifty people. Known as Iroquois by the French and as Five Nations by the English, the Haudenosaunee were composed of five tribes or nations: Cayugas ("People at the Landing"), Mohawks ("People of the Flint"), Oneidas ("People of the Stone"), Onondagas ("People of the Mountain"), and Senecas ("Great Hill People"). United by a common European enemy, these once warring tribes formed an alliance between 1350 and 1600 to maintain peaceful relations. In the early sixteenth century, under the leadership of Deganiawida, a Huron, and Hiawatha, a Mohawk, the Five Nation Iroquois established a Great League of Peace and Power, with each village maintaining autonomy.

The Iroquois lived in family groups or clans that were named for animals, such as Bear, Beaver, Turtle, and Wolf. Located south of Lake Ontario and in New York and Pennsylvania from the Adirondack Mountains to the Great Lakes, the Five Nation Iroquois numbered around twenty-two thousand people in the early seventeenth century. The smallpox and measles epidemics (1633–1635) reduced their numbers by half.

In 1715 the Tuscarora tribe, originally from the North Carolina region, became the Sixth Nation to join the Iroquois. Practicing communal work and hunting, and tracing lineage through the mother, the Iroquois were a matrilineal society and included women in their governance. Known for their astute negotiation, the Iroquois represented one of the strongest, most unified Indian nations in the northeast. Though the confederacy was largely neutral during the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR of 1754, the Mohawk made alliances with the English, and the Seneca with the French. During the Revolutionary War more divisions occurred. The Oneida joined the PATRIOTS and the Mohawks sided with the LOYALISTS. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's The Song of Hiawatha (1855) was inspired by the Mohawk tribe, as were several of James Fenimore Cooper's Leatherstocking Tales, particularly, The Last of the Mohicans (1826).

Sources

- Axtell, James. The European and the Indian: Essays in the Ethnohistory of Colonial North America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Brandão, José Antônio, ed. and trans., and Janet K. Ritch, trans. Nation Iroquoise: A Seventeenth-Century Ethnography of the Iroquois. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2003.
- Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.
- Richter, Daniel K. The Ordeal of the Longhouse: The People of the Iroquois League in the Era of European Colonization. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

The Illinois Monthly Magazine* (1830–1837)
periodical

Founded in Vandalia, Illinois, by James Hall, who edited and wrote most of the magazine's stories, poems, criticism, historical pieces, and literary gossip, The Illinois Monthly Magazine was the first periodical of its kind to be published west of Ohio. In 1832 Hall moved to Cincinnati, taking his magazine—which he rechristened The Western Monthly Magazine—with him. Hall made one more move, to Louisville, before he ceased publication in 1837.

Source

Randall, Randolph C. James Hall: Spokesman of the New West. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1964.

Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself* (Boston: Published for the Author, as Linda Brent, 1861) slave narrative

Harriet JACOBS, who identifies herself as Linda Brent in Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, wrote this SLAVE NARRATIVE in response to Harriet Beecher STOWE's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1852). Jacobs's intention, she said, was "... to add my testimony to that of abler pens to convince the people of the Free States what Slavery really is. Only by experience can any one realize how deep, and dark, and foul is that pit of abomination." Jacobs's book was edited by Lydia Maria CHILD, who verified its truth.

Child identified the book as a reaction to the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, stating her hope that whoever read it would prevent fugitives from slavery ever being "sent back to suffer in that loathsome den of corruption and cruelty."

In one of the most powerful sections of the narrative, Jacobs recalls hiding in a crawlspace in her grandmother's attic for seven years in order to escape the physical abuse and sexual harassment of her owner's father, Dr. Flint. Jacobs wrote the narrative secretly while working in New York for the family of Nathaniel Parker WILLIS, the brother of Sara Payson Willis PARTON (Fanny Fern). In Incidents, the Willises appear as the Bruce family. Jacobs's freedom was eventually purchased by Willis's second wife, Cornelia Grinnell Willis.

Source

Jacobs, Harriet A. Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, Written by Herself, edited by Jean Fagan Yellin. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2000.

—Vicki Martin

The Independent* (1848–1928) periodical

Founded in 1848 in New York City as a Congregationalist periodical, The Independent became increasingly secular over time. In 1863, when Henry Ward BEECHER was succeeded as editor by Theodore Tilton (1835–1907), the focus of the magazine shifted toward social reform, emphasizing such matters as women's suffrage. Contributions came in from such distinguished writers as John Greenleaf WHITTIER, Harriet Beecher STOWE, and James Russell LOWELL. After Tilton's tenure ended in 1870, subsequent editors turned The Independent into an interdenominational religious and literary magazine, and then into one devoted largely to politics. In 1916 HARPER'S WEEKLY was taken over by The Independent. The journal then carried a multitude of illustrations from the European war. In 1923 the magazine moved to Boston, and five years later it merged with The Outlook, another originally Christian periodical.

The Innocents Abroad by Samuel L. Clemens (Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1869) travel narrative

A reworking of letters published when Samuel L. CLEMENS was a newspaper correspondent on an 1867 excursion through Europe to the Holy Land, The Innocents Abroad, or the New Pilgrims' Progress was Clemens's second book, his first major success, and his best-seller during his lifetime. Peddled door-to-door, The Innocents Abroad sold more than one hundred thousand copies in two years. Twain's irreverent, earthy tone and satiric wit added an American charm to the descriptions of exotic locales that were the chief virtue of the then-popular travel narrative form. In an influential review, William Dean HOWELLS wrote, "There is an element of human nature in the book that rarely gets into literature." Although it is still considered one of Clemens's best works, part of the book's humor depends on conventions and attitudes no longer current, so contemporary readers are less likely to find the book as humorous as its first readers did.

—Brett Barney

Irving, Washington (1783–1859) short-story writer, humorist, nonfiction writer

I am always at a loss to know how much to believe of my own stories.

—Tales of a Traveler (1824)

Born in New York City at the end of the Revolutionary War and named for General George Washington, Washington Irving grew up as the youngest and favorite child in a large family. His father had come from Scotland, and owned a successful import business. Irving attended private schools and studied law, but he found the legal profession uninteresting and he was drawn to imaginative literature. In 1802 and 1803 he contributed to a newspaper edited by his brother Peter a series of fictional letters signed "Jonathan Oldstyle, Gent." In these, Irving satirized New York society. A few years later, he joined with James Kirke PAULDING and Irving's brother William to produce Salmagundi; or, The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq. & Others (1807–1808), a series of twenty humorous and satirical pamphlets. Their purpose, the authors declared, was "to instruct the young, reform the old, correct the town and castigate the age."

Irving's first book, History of New York (1809, rev. 1812), began as another collaborative project with Peter Irving. The brothers set out to parody a recently published traveler's guide to New York City, but the scope of the book's satire broadened considerably when Peter abandoned the project. In a characteristic move, Irving presented his book under the name of an adopted persona, the self-aggrandizing and pedantic historian Diedrich Knickerbocker. History of New York is often called the first great book of American humor, and its success helped solidify Irving's writing career.

Portrait of Irving at age thirty-seven by C. R. Leslie

In 1813 and 1814 Irving edited Analectic Magazine, where he first published two short pieces that were later included in THE SKETCH BOOK OF GEOFFREY CRAYON, GENT. (1819). During the concluding months of the War of 1812, Irving served an uneventful term in the New York militia, after which he sailed to England, where he attended to legal affairs of the family business. He spent the next seventeen years in England and continental Europe. While living in England, he completed and published The Sketch Book, which includes the classic tales "RIP VAN WINKLE" and "THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW." The collection appeared in two different forms in the U.S. and the U.K., a publishing strategy that allowed Irving to avoid losing sales profits to transatlantic piracy, a nearly ubiquitous practice in the days before international COPYRIGHT. The phenomenal success of The Sketch Book made Irving the first internationally recognized American author and prompted several subsequent books in a similar vein, including Bracebridge Hall (1822).

Illustration by F. O. C. Darley for "Ichabod Crane and the Headless Horse Man" from the 1848 edition of The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.

By the late 1820s Irving had taken up a diplomatic career in Spain and London, and he began producing historical and travel works, including History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus (1828) and A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada (1829). The publication of The Alhambra (1832)—a collection comprising descriptive essays and legends from Granada—marked a temporary return to short, comic writing. On his arrival back in the United States in 1832, Irving was received as a great American author. He embarked on an ambitious trip to the West, producing A Tour of the Prairies (1835) and Astoria (1836), an account of John Jacob Astor's fur-trading empire. Irving's Western Journals were not published until 1844.

In 1840 Irving published a biography of Oliver Goldsmith (1730–1774), one of his literary models. The last years of his life were devoted to his Life of Washington, published in five volumes between 1855 and 1859.

Principal Books by Irving

Salmagundi; or, the Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq. & Others, 20 parts, republished in 2 volumes, by Irving, William Irving, and James Kirke Paulding. New York: D. Longworth, 1807–1808; revised edition, New York: D. Longworth, 1814.

A History of New-York, from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty. Containing Among Many Surprising and Curious Matters, the Unutterable Ponderings of Walter the Doubter, the Disastrous Projects of William the Testy, and the Chivalric Achievements of Peter the Headstrong, the Three Dutch

- Governors of New Amsterdam; Being the Only Authentic History of the Times that Ever Hath Been, or Ever Will Be Published*, 2 volumes, as Diedrich Knickerbocker. New York & Philadelphia: Inskeep & Bradford / Boston: M'Ilhenny / Baltimore: Coale & Thomas / Charleston S. C.: Morford, Willington, 1809; revised edition, 2 volumes, 1812.
- The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.*, 7 parts, as Geoffrey Crayon. New York: Printed by C. S. Van Winkle, 1819–1820.
- Bracebridge Hall; or, The Humourists. A Medley*, 2 volumes, as Crayon. New York: Printed by C. S. Van Winkle, 1822.
- Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle, Gent.*, as The Author of The Sketch Book. New York: Clayton, 1824.
- Tales of a Traveller*, 2 volumes, as Crayon, abridged edition, Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1824; unabridged edition, New York: Printed by C. S. Van Winkle, 1825.
- A History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus*, 3 volumes. New York: G & C. Carvill, 1828; revised, 2 volumes, 1831.
- A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada*, 2 volumes, as Fray Antonio Agapida. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Carey, 1829.
- Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus*. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1831.
- The Alhambra*, 2 volumes, as The Author of The Sketch Book. Philadelphia: Carey & Lea, 1832; revised as The Alhambra: A Series of Sketches of the Moors and Spaniards by the Author of "The Sketch Book." Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1836; revised as volume 15 of The Works of Washington Irving. New York: Putnam, 1851.
- A Tour on the Prairies*, number 1 of Miscellanies, as The Author of The Sketch Book. London: John Murray, 1835; republished as number 1 of The Crayon Miscellany. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1835.
- Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey*, number 2 of Miscellanies, as The Author of The Sketch Book. London: John Murray, 1835; republished as number 2 of The Crayon Miscellany. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1835.
- Legends of the Conquest of Spain*, number 3 of Miscellanies, as The Author of The Sketch Book. London: John Murray, 1835; republished as number 3 of The Crayon Miscellany. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1835.
- Astoria; or, Anecdotes of an Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains*, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1836; revised as volume 8 of The Works of Washington Irving. New York: Putnam, 1849.
- The Rocky Mountains; or, Scenes, Incidents, and Adventures in the Far West; Digested from the Journal of Captain B. L. E. Bonneville, of the Army of the United States, and Illustrated from Various Other Sources*, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837.
- The Life of Oliver Goldsmith, with Selections from His Writings*, 2 volumes. New York: Harper, 1840; biography revised and enlarged as Oliver Goldsmith: A Biography, volume 11 of The Works of Washington Irving. New York: Putnam, 1849.

- Biography and Poetical Remains of the Late Margaret Miller Davidson*. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1841.
- Mahomet and His Successors*, volumes 12 and 13 of The Works of Washington Irving. New York: Putnam, 1849–1850.
- Wolfert's Roost and Other Papers*, volume 16 of The Works of Washington Irving. New York: Putnam, 1855.
- Life of George Washington*, 5 volumes. New York: Putnam, 1855–1859.
- Spanish Papers and Other Miscellanies, Hitherto Unpublished or Uncollected*, edited by Pierre M. Irving, 2 volumes. New York: Putnam / Hurd & Houghton, 1866.
- Journals and Notebooks*, 5 volumes, edited by Nathalia Wright, Walter A. Reichart, Lillian Schlissel, Wayne R. Kime, Andrew B. Myers, and Sue Fields Ross. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press / Boston: Twayne, 1969–1986.

Letters

- Washington Irving: Letters*, 4 volumes, edited by Ralph M. Aderman, Herbert L. Kleinfeld, and Jenifer S. Banks. Boston: Twayne, 1978–1982.

Studying Washington Irving

Universally acknowledged as one of the key figures in the development of American literature, Washington Irving helped create the short-story form; he was also the first U.S. author to win international acclaim and to support himself through writing. So great were his accomplishments as an innovator, in fact, that it has been difficult, as Edgar Allan Poe remarked, to distinguish “between what is due to the pioneer solely, and what to the author.” Although Irving was an international celebrity during his lifetime, the public today remembers him almost exclusively for two stories, “THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW” and “RIP VAN WINKLE.” While the popularity of these stories continues unabated, rivaling anything written by his contemporaries, the great majority of Irving’s work—essays, biography, history, and satire—has fallen into obscurity.

Students are therefore advised to begin with Irving’s two famous stories and the book in which they first appeared, THE SKETCH BOOK OF GEOFFREY CRAYON, GENT. Published in 1819–1820, this miscellany of essays and short fiction is usually regarded as Irving’s masterpiece and contains a sampling of Irving’s most characteristic concerns, modes, and methods. At times sentimental, at other times gently satirical, Irving moves easily among the conventions of travel narrative, biography, Addisonian essay, and Gothic fiction. The Alhambra and Tales of a Traveller are recommended as further examples of Irving’s mastery of the miscellaneous sketch. William L. Hedges’s Washington Irving: An American Study, 1802–1832 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1965) is the best assessment of the period that produced Irving’s most famous works.

Irving’s publications prior to The Sketch Book are dominated by burlesque satire, best exemplified in A History of

SABONY &amp; Co.,

680 BROADWAY.

J. Jefferson, as Rip Van Winkle.

Actor Joseph Jefferson as Rip Van Winkle, 1879. The story was adapted to the stage shortly after publication and was a popular dramatic entertainment throughout the nineteenth century.

New York. Martin Roth's Comedy and America: The Lost World of Washington Irving (Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1976) should be consulted for its discussion of Irving's humorous works. For the subtle ironic comedy characteristic of Irving's mature career, students are directed to Irving's A Tour on the Prairies and to William Bedford's discussion of it in "How the West Won" (American Literature, 50 [November 1978]: 335–347).

Much of Irving's writing deals with the American West; for those interested in this aspect of Irving's work, A Tour of the Prairies is a good place to begin. These travel sketches draw heavily upon the author's monthlong "foray beyond the outposts of human habitation, into the wilderness of the Far West." In both Astoria and The Adventures of Captain Bonneville Irving recounts, more obliquely, the experiences of other Western adventurers. Of the many good analyses of Irving's Western writings and their relation to ideologies such as imperialism and expansionism, Peter Anteley's Tales of Adventurous Enterprise: Washington Irving and the Poetics of Western Expansion (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990) is especially recommended. Richard H. Cracroft's Washington Irving, The Western Works (Boise: Boise State University, 1974) offers a more basic introduction.

For a sense of the overall arc of Irving's career one must sample the biographies and histories of his later years. A History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus and A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada are recommended starting points. The essays in The Old World and New World Romanticism of Washington Irving, edited by Stanley Brodwin (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1986), constitute an introduction to the common critical view that Irving's development as a writer was largely shaped by ROMANTICISM. Jeffrey Rubin-Dorsky's Adrift in the Old World: The Psychological Pilgrimage of Washington Irving (Chicago & London: University of Chicago Press, 1988) offers an alternative perspective on the author's career, arguing that Irving's biography mirrored the life of his nation.

The thirty-volume Complete Works of Washington Irving, edited by Richard Dilworth Rust and others (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press / Boston: Twayne, 1969–1989) is an essential source for accurate primary texts of Irving's published works as well as for the Journals and Notebooks (vols. 1–5), for the Letters (vols. 23–26), and for the Bibliography of primary works (vol. 30). Secondary bibliographies include Haskell Springer's Washington Irving: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1976) and James W. Tuttleton's "Washington Irving," in Fifteen American Authors before 1900: Bibliographical Essays on Research and Criticism, edited by Earl N. Harbert and Robert A. Rees (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984), pp. 330–356. The latter is especially recommended. For more-recent years, these bibliographies should be supplemented with the annual volumes of American Literary Scholarship, edited by David J. Nordloh and others.

The best full-length biography of Irving remains The Life of Washington Irving by Stanley T. Williams (New York: Oxford University Press, 1935), though it is marred by Williams's condescending attitude toward his subject. For an overview of Irving scholarship over time, see Critical Essays on Washington Irving, edited by Ralph M. Aderman (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990), and especially Washington Irving: The Critical Reaction, edited by James Tuttleton (New York: AMS Press, 1993).

—Student Guide by Brett Barney

Israel Potter by Herman Melville (New York: Putnam, 1855) novel

Originally published serially in PUTNAM'S MONTHLY between 1854 and 1855, Herman Melville's Israel Potter: His Fifty Years of Exile received good reviews and earned the author a fair—though not exorbitant—amount of money. Based on an authentic account, the novel tells the story of Potter, a man of humble background, whose adventures, spanning over forty years, take him from America to Europe and back again. Working as a sailor and soldier, he comes in contact with heroes of the American Revolution and national symbols such as Benjamin Franklin, John Paul Jones, and Ethan Allen. He eventually returns to his home in the Berkshires, a common man with an uncommon story.

Source

Melville, Herman. Israel Potter: His Fifty Years of Exile, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, G. Thomas Tanselle, and others. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1982.

—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

I Remember Mama by John Van Druten (produced 1944) play

John VAN DRUTEN adapted Kathryn Forbes's semi-autobiographical Mama's Bank Account (1943) into this hit two-act drama produced by Richard Rodgers and Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II. A warm depiction of a close-knit Norwegian clan in 1910 San Francisco, I Remember Mama opened on October 19, 1944, at the Music Box Theatre for a 714-performance run. Van Druten centers the action of the play on the relationship of Mama and her eldest daughter, Katrin, who aspires to become a writer. While dealing with ailing children, money problems, and intrusive relatives, the uncomplaining Mama still manages to seek advice for her daughter from a famous woman writer visiting the city, using her best Norwegian recipes as a bribe. The long run of I Remember Mama in its original production is perhaps explained by the desire of audiences to escape from news of WORLD WAR II, which was beginning to draw to a close. The play spawned a 1948 movie and a long-running 1950s television series and became a staple of stock and community theaters.

Source

Van Druten, John. I Remember Mama. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1945.

—James Fisher

"The Idea of Order at Key West" by

Wallace Stevens (1934) poem

Wallace STEVENS's "The Idea of Order at Key West"—which originally appeared in Alcestis and was collected in his second book, Ideas of Order (1935)—presents a dramatic situation similar to the one in William Wordsworth's "The Solitary Reaper": a passerby happens upon a woman singing in a foreign tongue. He never learns the actual content of the song, but this is precisely the point: the songs are not important for their literal content but for their emotional impact upon the hearer. In Stevens's poem the circumstance of the woman singing next to the sea prompts a meditation upon the relationship of the imagination and reality that brings the passerby into a more meaningful relationship with his environment. The woman's song leads him to experience the world more intensely, and he sees the need for the imagination to order, to intensify, and to endow reality with feeling and meaning. Stevens suggests in the concluding stanza of the poem that it is the passionate imagination, the "Blessed rage for order," that provides meaning in the formless sea of reality.

Source

Stevens, Wallace. The Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens New York: Knopf, 1954.

—Allan Chavkin

I'll Take My Stand (New York & London: Harper, 1930) essay collection

The essays of this collection, subtitled "The South and the Agrarian Tradition by Twelve Southerners," object to the trends of modern life and affirm the rural, agrarian traditions of the South. Many of the writers could be termed modernists (see MODERNISM), as they were interested in literary innovation, yet their social and political views were conservative and in some cases reactionary. Allen TATE,

John Gould FLETCHER, Robert Penn WARREN, and Donald DAVIDSON were poets with considerable reputations. Stark YOUNG became a theater critic for THE NEW REPUBLIC and an historical novelist. Many had been members of an avant-garde group called THE FUGITIVES. However, in I'll Take My Stand they stood by an anticapitalist position reminiscent of the proslavery apologists of the nineteenth century who excoriated the wage slavery of the North and advocated the gentility of Southern life. The authors were generally intellectual aristocrats who had little sympathy for modern, mass democracy. Indeed, some of them despised it and took a position similar to those of Plato and Thomas Carlyle, both of whom believed in government by a privileged class. Of all the AGRARIANS, only Robert Penn Warren later repudiated forthrightly many of the views he expressed in I'll Take My Stand. Others, like Tate, modified their views but never really accommodated themselves to Northern values. The Agrarians saw themselves in a states' rights tradition that stemmed from Thomas Jefferson, a tradition that upheld the sovereignty of individual states and distrusted the powers of a central government.

Sources

Duncan, Christopher M. Fugitive Theory: Political Theory, The Southern Agrarians, and America. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2000.

Havard, William C., and Walter Sullivan. A Band of Prophets: The Vanderbilt Agrarians after Fifty Years. Baton Rouge: Louisiana University Press, 1982.

Imagism

Grounded in the philosophy of English poet and aesthetician T. E. Hulme, who advocated adherence to the "hard dry image," imagism was born as a reaction to Romanticism. Hulme's philosophy initially attracted a group of poets living in London, including the American Ezra POUND, who coined the description "School of Imagism" and soon became the unofficial leader of the group. In a 1913 article for POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE, "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste," he formulated what he called the three principles of imagism:

1. Direct treatment of the "thing," whether subjective or objective.
2. To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation.
3. As regarding rhythm: to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in the sequence of a metronome.

Pound's second and third principles were intended to wean poetry away from using words that sounded "poetic" yet were in fact abstractions—words that really did not contribute to the poem's power but instead filled out a mechanically conceived poetic line. Pound believed that thinking in terms of musical phrases encouraged variety and natural rhythm in poems that he and others of his generation found lacking in the work of their immediate predecessors. Pound defined an image as "that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." His two-line poem "In a Station of the Metro" (1914)—which juxtaposes the "apparition" of faces in a subway crowd to "petals" on a "black bough"—is usually cited as the quintessential imagist poem.

Between 1915 and 1917, the imagist movement was led by the American poet Amy LOWELL, who edited three poetry anthologies, all titled Some Imagist Poets, between 1915 and 1917. The works these books collected adhered to Hulme's belief that poetry should employ the language of everyday speech while at the same time recalling the purity of the classics. The imagist poets were also represented in the United States in Poetry, a LITTLE MAGAZINE published in Chicago by Harriet MONROE. Monroe published the work of such American imagists as Pound, H.D. (see Hilda DOOLITTLE), William Carlos WILLIAMS, John Gould Fletcher, and Lowell, as well as that of the English poets F. S. Flint, Richard Aldington, and D. H. Lawrence. Although it disappeared from the literary scene by the end of the decade, Imagism made a profound impact on a younger generation of poets. The influence of the imagists' insistence on sparseness and their concentration on an image can be seen in the poetry of T. S. ELIOT, Wallace STEVENS, and Marianne MOORE.

Sources

Gage, John T. In the Arresting Eye: The Rhetoric of Imagism. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Harmer, J. B. Victory in Limbo: Imagism 1908–1917. London: Secker & Warburg, 1975.

Hughes, Glenn. Imagism & the Imagists: A Study in Modern Poetry. New York: Biblo & Tannen, 1972.

Pratt, William, and Robert Richardson, eds. Homage to Imagism. New York: AMS Press, 1992.

In Our Time by Ernest Hemingway (New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925) short-story collection

In Our Time was Ernest HEMINGWAY's first collection of short stories and first American book. It includes fourteen stories and the vignettes from in our time, previously published in Paris by Three Mountains Press in 1924. Each vignette functions as an interchapter of In Our Time. The collection includes "Big Two-Hearted River" as well as six other Nick Adams stories.

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on Ernest Hemingway. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2002.

—John C. Unrue

Iowa Writers' Workshop

Before WORLD WAR II, writers were not generally part of college English departments; courses in creative writing were rare; and contemporary American literature was not routinely taught. The University of Iowa in Iowa City had been conducting creative-writing classes since Verse-Making was first offered in 1897. In 1922 the school became the first important American university to offer a degree program in creative writing when Carl Seashore, the dean of the graduate college, announced that creative work would be accepted as theses for advanced degrees. In 1936 the university established The Writers' Workshop, in which selected students were tutored in seminars by resident and visiting writers. Robert FROST, Stephen Vincent BENÉT, and Robert Penn WARREN were among the early guest lecturers in this distinguished creative-writing program.

I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings by Maya Angelou (New York: Random House, 1970) autobiography

Detailing her painful, poignant childhood in Stamps, Arkansas, amid the racial segregation of the 1930s and 1940s, Maya ANGELOU's now-classic autobiography is both a formidable account of twentieth-century African American experience and a late-sixties feminist manifesto.

The book covers Angelou's life up to her sixteenth year. Abandoned by her divorced parents when she is three, she and her brother are sent to live in Stamps with their strong-willed grandmother, whom they refer to as "Momma." While briefly living with her mother Vivian in St. Louis, Maya is raped by her mother's live-in boyfriend, who is subsequently murdered following a court appearance. Convinced that she is responsible for the murder, the traumatized eight-year-old stops speaking entirely. She recovers her voice after she begins reading poetry aloud. The title of her book—I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings—is taken from the last line of one of these poems, Paul Laurence Dunbar's "Sympathy," which was published in 1899. Eventually, Maya moves to Los Angeles to live with her mother, then relocates as a teenage bride in San Francisco, where she becomes a streetcar conductor at fifteen and a successful teenage mother to her son.

Written in poetic, lush prose and grounded in the oral tradition that she knew as a child in the segregated South, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings is both a personal tale of triumph and a complex social history. Along with the work of Alice WALKER and Toni MORRISON, Angelou's autobiographical books, of which this is the first, helped to forge a new, female-centered, African American literary sensibility.

Source

Bloom, Harold, ed. Maya Angelou's I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Ignatow, David (1914–1997) poet

Born in Brooklyn, David Ignatow drew on the struggle of his immigrant parents during the Great Depression in his poetry, which is filled with the idioms of Brooklyn and of city speech. His collections include Poems (1948), The Gentle Weight Lifter (1955), Say Pardon (1961), Figures of the Human (1964), Earth Hard (1968), Rescue the Dead (1968), Poems 1934–1969 (1970), and New and Collected Poems: 1970–1985 (1986). In Notebooks (1973) he writes about his personal life and poetic aspirations. The One in the Many: A Poet's Memoirs appeared in 1988. His Living Is What I Wanted: Last Poems was published in 1999.

Source

Terris, Virginia R. Meaningful Differences: The Poetry and Prose of David Ignatow. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1994.

In Cold Blood by Truman Capote (New York: Random House, 1965) nonfiction novel

Published under the full title In Cold Blood: A True Account of a Multiple Murder and Its Consequences, Capote's mid-1960s best-seller was, according to its author, the first nonfiction novel—a claim that has since been debated by critics. Though it was written six years before Tom Wolfe coined the term NEW JOURNALISM, In Cold Blood is recognized as an early example of that form for its blend of detailed reportage and novelistic storytelling.

In Cold Blood chronicles the murder of a wealthy farmer, Herbert Clutter, and his family in Holcomb, Kansas. The murderers, Richard Hickock and Perry Smith, were ex-convicts out on parole. After a protracted trial, both Hickock and Smith were convicted and hanged. Capote's book addresses the murder itself, the impact of the murder on the town of Holcomb, the trial, and its consequences.

Capote first read about the murders in 1959 in the pages of The New York Times. Convinced that the murders would make an interesting article for The New Yorker, he traveled to Holcomb. Capote spent the next six years researching the murders as well as developing a deep and troubling relationship with Hickock and Smith. The final piece, a work of novelistic length and complexity, appeared in installments in The New Yorker in 1965 and in book form the following year.

Source

Malin, Irving, ed. Truman Capote's In Cold Blood: A Critical Handbook. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1968.

—Marshall Boswell

Infinite Jest by David Foster Wallace (Boston: Little, Brown, 1996) novel

David Foster Wallace's second novel, Infinite Jest, is a comic epic about the intersection of popular culture and drug addiction. The 1,079-page novel (including 100 pages of endnotes) is set in the near future and centers on an experimental motion picture called Infinite Jest. The movie, which is the brainchild of a renegade filmmaker named James O. Incandenza, is rumored to be so lethally entertaining that anyone who watches it will lose all desire to do anything except watch it again and again.

Densely written, wide-ranging in its knowledge of film technology, pharmacology, tennis, and mathematics, and packed with slapstick as well as with moving portraits of drug addicts and other marginalized figures, the novel recalls, both in its style and its scope, the work of Postmodern writers Thomas Pynchon and William Gaddis. It is, however, very much a work of Wallace's own Generation X—particularly in its preoccupations with drugs and entertainment.

Source

Burn, Stephen. David Foster Wallace's Infinite Jest: A Reader's Companion. New York: Continuum, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Inge, William (1913–1973) playwright

Madge: Whenever I hear that train coming to town, I always get a little feeling of excitement — in here.

Millie: Whenever I hear it, I tell myself I'm going to get on it some day and go to New York.

Flo: That train just goes as far as Tulsa.

Millie: In Tulsa I could catch another train.

—Picnic (1953)

William Inge was born and grew up in Independence, Kansas. He was drawn to the idea of acting, but he did not pursue a career in theater until his late thirties. By then he had become an alcoholic and was subject to fits of depression that eventually led to his suicide. Many of his plays—Come Back, Little Sheba (produced 1950), Picnic (produced 1953), Bus Stop (produced 1955), The Dark at the Top of the Stairs (produced 1957), and his screenplay Splendor in the Grass (1961)—are set in small Midwestern towns. His characters ache from their loss of ambition or youth, sexual frustration, alcoholic tendencies, and loneliness. Inge's portraits of family life seem to be based on his own experience, but he spoke to the anxieties of many middle-class Americans. His characters yearn to feel special—Cherie in Bus Stop, for example, dreams of stardom in Hollywood—yet they are often disappointed in themselves and in the world that engulfs them. Although Inge's characters can seem self-pitying, they redeem themselves through self-knowledge or through the struggle to understand and to reconcile why their hopes are thwarted.

Several of Inge's plays were made into movies, although the playwright apparently resented the changes Hollywood made in his scripts. Inge was more a popular than a critical success. New York reviewers, in particular, tended to dismiss dramas they found sentimental or contrived. Inge published Eleven Short Plays in 1962. In his later years he turned to fiction, producing two novels, Good Luck, Miss Wyckoff (1970) and My Son Is a Splendid Driver (1971), both of which are autobiographical and have a thematic resemblance to his plays.

Sources

McClure, Arthur F. Memories of Splendor: The Midwestern World of William Inge. Topeka: Kansas State Historical Society, 1989.

Shuman, R. Baird. William Inge. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Invisible Man by Ralph Ellison (New York: Random House, 1952) novel

Ralph ELLISON's groundbreaking debut novel is a bildungsroman that charts with humor and irony the education of an ambitious but psychologically confused young African American who finds that he is "invisible" to white Americans who only see him as an abstract embodiment of blackness.

The novel's first-person narrator, who is never named, explains the impetus behind his story: "It took me a long time and much painful boomeranging of my expectations to achieve a realization everyone else appears to have been born with: That I am nobody but myself. But first I had to discover that I am an invisible man!"

Having decided, after all of his adventures, to withdraw into an underground basement, where he siphons electricity from the Monopolated Light and Power Company, the narrator reviews the events that have inspired his retreat. Beginning in the 1930s as an idealistic college student at an Alabama college, the narrator journeys north to Harlem, where he is recruited to be a spokesman for a leftist political organization called the Brotherhood. When a white police officer senselessly murders one of his African American colleagues, the Harlem streets explode into violence. Caught up in the struggle, the narrator finally comes to terms with his own identity.

With its allusions to both African American folklore as well as to such literary works as Herman Melville's Moby-Dick and Fyodor Dostoevsky's Notes from Underground Ellison's novel discloses the invisible racial structures that govern American life, while simultaneously, in Ellison's words, "revealing the human universals hidden within." Since its publication in 1952, Invisible Man has remained unchallenged as the premier account of the male African American experience in our national literature.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1999.

Callahan, John F., ed. Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man: A Casebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

O'Meally, Robert, ed. New Essays on Invisible Man. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

Sundquist, Eric J., ed. Cultural Contexts for Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man. Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's Press, 1995.

—Marshall Boswell

The Iowa Review (1970– ) periodical

Since its origins in 1970, The Iowa Review has been a literary journal dedicated to an eclectic mix of traditional and experimental writing. Located on the campus of the University of Iowa's M.F.A. program, the journal is one of the most important publications of contemporary literature. Edited by David Hamilton since 1977, The Iowa Review also dedicates many of its pages to translations.

—Tod Marshall

Iowa Writers' Workshop

The Writers' Workshop at the University of Iowa is not only one of the country's first graduate programs in creative writing but also, more than eighty years after its inception, one of the most prestigious and influential. The university first began offering a two-year master's degree in creative writing in 1922, and established The Writers' Workshop in 1936. Students attend workshops run by visiting writers as well as by resident faculty members, while the course of study culminates in the submission of a creative thesis—a novel, a book of poetry, or a story collection. After an auspicious beginning, during which such eminent writers as Robert Frost and Robert Penn Warren served as visiting writers, the Writers' Workshop emerged from WORLD WAR II as the model program of its kind. Since the war, writers associated with the program—both as faculty members and as alumni—have won more than thirteen Pulitzer Prizes. These authors include John BERRYMAN, John CHEEVER, Michael CUNNINGHAM, Rita DOVE, Louise Glück, Jorie Graham, Donald JUSTICE, Tracy Kidder, Carolyn KIZER, Philip LEVINE, Robert LOWELL, James Alan McPherson, Marilynne Robinson, Philip ROTH, Jane SMILEY, W. D. SNODGRASS, Wallace Stegner, Mark STRAND, James TATE, Mona VAN DUYN, Robert Penn Warren, and Charles WRIGHT.

—Marshall Boswell

Ironweed by William Kennedy (New York: Viking, 1983) novel

The most famous of William KENNEDY's cycle of novels about the Irish Catholic, working-class people of his hometown of Albany, New York, Ironweed is the dark but redemptive tale of Francis Phelan, a homeless man with a hair-trigger temper and a string of murders in his past, including that of his own son Gerald, whom Francis accidentally dropped while changing a diaper. The novel begins in 1938 with Francis's return to Albany after a twenty-five-year absence following Gerald's death. Having abandoned his family in "craven flight," Francis has been wandering aimlessly for the past decade with a woman named Helen, a fellow alcoholic who is facing her own death. Now back in Albany, Francis asks forgiveness from his wife, Annie, and, finding brief work in a cemetery, tries to make peace with the dead.

Winner of the Pulitzer Prize, Ironweed is the central piece of Kennedy's so-called Albany novels, a series that also includes Legs (1975), Billy Phelan's Greatest Game (1978), Quinn's Book (1988), Very Old Bones (1992), The Flaming Corsage (1996), and Roscoe (2002).

Sources

Giamo, Benedict. The Homeless of Ironweed: Blossoms on the Crag. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1996.

Michener, Christian. From Then into Now: William Kennedy's Albany Novels. Scranton, Pa.: University of Scranton Press, 1998.

—Marshall Boswell

Irving, John (1942– ) novelist, short-story writer

I've always been a fan of the nineteenth century novel, of the novel that is plotted, character-driven, and where the passage of time is almost as central to the novel as a major minor character, the passage of time and its effect on the characters in the story.

—Interview (2005)

One of the most popular and successful literary novelists of the last thirty years, John Irving writes novels conspicuous for their Dickensian zest, populist moral engagement, and macabre surrealism. In Irving's novels, hands and penises get bitten off; eyes get gouged; and NFL linebackers become transgender militant feminists. Amid all this grotesque disfigurement, however, Irving sustains an artistic vision that is redemptive, comic, and activist in its political and moral ambitions.

Born John Wallace Blunt Jr. in Exeter, New Hampshire, Irving was originally named after his biological father, a WORLD WAR II fighter pilot who divorced Irving's mother prior to his son's birth. In 1948 his mother married Colin Irving and changed her son's name to John Winslow Irving. A mediocre student handicapped with dyslexia, Irving grew up as a "faculty brat" on the campus of Phillips Exeter, excelling only in English literature and wrestling. After a short stint at the University of Pittsburgh, which he attended on a wrestling scholarship until he failed to make the team in 1962, he spent a year studying German in Vienna. In 1965 he graduated, cum laude, from the University of New Hampshire. Two years later he completed his M.F.A. at the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP and began a decade of college teaching and writing that produced three well-received but commercially unsuccessful novels.

His fortunes changed dramatically with the success in 1978 of The World According to Garp. He consolidated his triumph with a trio of extremely successful novels, The Hotel New Hampshire (1981), The Cider House Rules (1985), and A PRAYER FOR OWEN MEANY (1989), each of which, like The World According to Garp before it, was adapted as a movie. Irving won an Academy Award in 1999 for his screenplay of The Cider House Rules. He followed this success with the novels Son of the Circus (1994), A Widow for One Year (1998), The Fourth Hand (2001), and Until I Find You (2005).

Sources

Davis, Todd F., and Kenneth Womack, eds. The Critical Response to John Irving. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

Reilly, Edward C. Understanding John Irving. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

—Marshall Boswell

Isherwood, Christopher (1904–1986)

autobiographer, novelist

Born in England and educated at Cambridge, Christopher Isherwood came to the United States at the beginning of WORLD WAR II. He settled in Los Angeles and became an inspiration for later generations of American writers, especially the BEATS, who admired his frankness about his homosexuality and emulated his interest in Eastern religions. In 1953 Isherwood published How to Know God: The Yoga Aphorisms of Patanjali, one of several books that inspired the counter-culture of the 1960s. Isherwood made his reputation with a collection of stories, Goodbye to Berlin (1939), which was adapted into two plays and then made into the movie Cabaret (1972). Through all of its transformations Isherwood's Goodbye to Berlin retains its focus on Sally Bowles, whose last name Isherwood took from his friend Paul BOWLES. Isherwood's fiction about Berlin portrays the rise of Nazism and the corruption and decadence of Germany that contributed to the rise of Hitler.

Isherwood and the poet W. H. Auden wrote two plays, The Dog Beneath the Skin (1935) and The Ascent of F6 (1936). Isherwood wrote about his own life and his collaborations with Auden in Lions and Shadows (1938). Isherwood's novel, Praeter Violet (1945), based on his experiences as screenwriter, is still one of the best novels to portray what movie-making is like in Hollywood. His Diaries (1997) describe life in southern California.

Sources

Berg, James J., and Chris Freeman, eds. The Isherwood Century: Essays on the Life and Work of Christopher Isherwood. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2000.

Izzo, David Garrett. Christopher Isherwood: An Encyclopedia. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006.

Parker, Peter. Isherwood: A Life Revealed. New York: Random House, 2004.

Jamestown

Founded May 14, 1607, Jamestown was the first permanent English settlement in North America, following two unsuccessful attempts on Roanoke Island. Under the leadership of Captain John SMITH and the sponsorship of the newly formed VIRGINIA COMPANY of London, 144 British immigrants departed England in December 1606. In three ships they sailed for Virginia via the West Indies; forty potential colonists died on the voyage. The ships entered the Chesapeake Bay on April 26, 1607, and 105 colonists established themselves sixty miles inland on a peninsula that extended into a river they named the James River in honor of James I. In the first two years they suffered greatly from disease and hunger, so that by January 1608, only thirty-eight colonists remained alive. Aided by the Powhatan and the ALGONKIN, who provided food supplies, the Jamestown colonists survived their first few years. Between 1607 and 1622, some ten thousand new colonists arrived, yet, only 20 percent survived. The main cause of death was malaria, attributed to the swamp surrounding the colony.

As John Smith and later William BYRD II explained, another problem was an absence of work ethic, as many colonists were of the genteel class and unaccustomed to manual labor. Beginning in 1614, however, tobacco cultivation, under John Rolfe's (1585–1622) guidance, allowed the colony to become solvent. Jamestown served as the capital of Virginia from 1607 until 1699, when Jamestown was burned and the capital was moved to the Middle Plantation (named Williamsburg in 1699).

Jamestown figures prominently in the works of Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588); John SMITH's A True Relation . . . Virginia (1608), A DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND (1616), THE GENERAL HISTORIE OF VIRGINIA, NEW-ENGLAND, AND THE SUMMER

ISLES (1624); Edward Maria WINGFIELD's A Discourse of Virginia (1608); and Robert BEVERLEY's History and Present State of Virginia (1705).

Works

- Smith, John. True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Noate as Hath Hapned in Virginia since the First Planting of That Collony. . . London: Printed for John Tappe, 1608.
- Smith. A Description of New England; or, The Observations and Discoveries of Captain John Smith. . . London: Printed by Humfrey Lownes for Robert Clerke, 1616.

Sources

- Applebaum, Robert, and John Wood Sweet, eds. Envisioning an English Empire: Jamestown and the Making of the North Atlantic World. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2005.
- Bridenbaugh, Carl. Jamestown, 1544–1699. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Price, David. Love and Hate in Jamestown: John Smith, Pocahontas, and the Heart of a New Nation. New York: Knopf, 2003.
- Rountree, Helen C. Pocahontas, Powhatan, Opechancanough: Three Indian Lives Changed by Jamestown. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2005.
- Schmidt, Susan. Landfall along the Chesapeake: In the Wake of Captain John Smith. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.
- Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York: Viking, 2001.

Jay, John (1745–1829) essayist, statesman

John Jay, one of the Revolutionary era's most prominent political writers, was born on December 12, 1745, to Peter Jay, son of a French Huguenot émigré, and Mary Van Cortlandt Jay. Jay attended Calvinist minister Peter Stoupe's school in New Rochelle, New York, and graduated from King's College (now Columbia University) in 1764. After studying law in attorney Benjamin Kissam's (d. 1782) firm, Jay was admitted to the bar in October 1768.

On April 28, 1774 Jay married Sarah Van Brugh Livingston, daughter of William Livingston (1723–1790), a powerful political figure in New York. Six months later, as a delegate to the First Continental Congress, Jay was called upon to draft Congress's address To the People of Great Britain (1774), hailed by Thomas Jefferson as "a production certainly of the finest pen in America." Jay appealed to the British people to end Parliamentary restrictions on colonial society, cleverly alternating tones of conciliation with uncompromising assertions of principle as he presented Congress's case to his readers. "Permit us to be as free as yourselves," he suggested, "and we shall ever esteem a union with you to be our greatest glory and our greatest happiness." Yet, a cautionary note followed immediately: "We will never submit to be hewers of wood or drawers of water for any ministry or nation in the world."

In June 1775 Jay wrote the first draft of Congress's OLIVE BRANCH PETITION, which acknowledged the right of Parliament to regulate colonial commerce and disavowed independence from Britain as an American goal. The sentiments expressed by Jay were heartfelt; as late as July 1776 he still hoped for a settlement short of independence. When Jefferson's DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE was issued on July 4, 1776, however, Jay drafted the New York's Provincial Congress's endorsement of the historic document.

After the Continental Army's loss of Fort Lee and its retreat into New Jersey in late 1776, Jay wrote An Address of the Convention of the Representatives of the State of New York. This eloquent PAMPHLET was intended to lift the spirits of the revolutionaries. In it he spoke directly to the soldiers of George Washington's struggling army: "We believe, and are persuaded, that you will do duty like men, and cheerfully refer your cause to the great and righteous Judge. If success crown your efforts, all the blessings of Freedom will be your reward. If you fail in the contest, you will be happy with God and Liberty in Heaven."

In May 1777 Jay became the first chief justice of the New York Supreme Court. In December 1778 he left that post to serve as president of the Continental Congress. In September 1779 his draft of A Circular Letter from the Congress of the United States of America to their Constituents was adopted by the Congress. In it Jay defended the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION as the best assurance of the principles of the Declaration of Independence. Two weeks after signing the circular letter, Jay was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Spain. He had little diplomatic success, as the government in Madrid was still reluctant to recognize American independence and wanted assurances that the United States would not seek free navigation of the Mississippi River. Jay served in Madrid until May 1782, when he was sent to Paris as a member of the American peace commission. Along with John ADAMS and Benjamin FRANKLIN, he brought the AMERICAN REVOLUTION to a formal end through the Treaty of Paris in 1783.

When Jay returned to the United States in July 1784 after five years abroad, he was immediately asked to serve as secretary of foreign affairs for the Confederation government. When the battle for acceptance of a new CONSTITUTION began in New York, Jay joined Alexander HAMILTON and James MADISON in writing the series of pro ratification essays that became known as THE FEDERALIST (also known as The Federalist Papers). Although he was suffering from an acute attack of arthritis, Jay managed to contribute five of these essays, in which he stressed the lessons of history that proved the vulnerability to invasion by foreign powers when a government was weak and inefficient. In 1788 Jay renewed his defense of the Constitution with An Address to the People of the State of New York. Attacking the state of political and economic disarray the country was in, Jay urged New Yorkers to waste no time in accepting the Constitution. George Washington, James Madison, and Noah WEBSTER all viewed the address with great enthusiasm.

After the Constitution was ratified, Jay served as the first chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. In 1794, when a second war with England seemed imminent, Jay was asked to negotiate a peace treaty with Great Britain. For his efforts he was brutally attacked in the press and on the floor of Congress, where he was accused of accepting terms that humiliated the new nation. Although the Jay Treaty was ratified by Congress, John Jay's reputation had been damaged.

Jay left the federal bench in 1795 and was immediately elected governor of New York. Serving from 1795 to 1801, he took special satisfaction in signing the act that abolished slavery in his state. In his last years Jay devoted considerable energy and time to organizations promoting the religious values he had always espoused. Jay died at his home near Bedford, New York, on May 17, 1829.

Works

- Jay, John. The Correspondence and Public Papers of John Jay, 4 volumes. New York: Putnam, 1890–1893; edited by Henry P. Johnston. New York: Burt Franklin, 1970.
- Jay, John. The Diary of John Jay during the Peace Negotiations of 1782. New Haven: Bibliographical Press, 1934.
- Jay, John, and Sarah Livingston Jay. Selected Letters of John Jay and Sarah Livingston Jay: Correspondence by or to the First Chief Justice of the United States and His Wife, compiled and edited by Landa M. Freeman, Louise V. North, and Janet M. Wedge. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004.

Sources

- Brecher, Frank W. Securing American Independence: John Jay and the French Alliance. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003.

- Jay, William. Life of John Jay, 2 volumes. New York: Harper, 1833; Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries Press, 1972.
- Morris, Richard Brandon. Witnesses at the Creation: Hamilton, Madison, Jay, and the Constitution. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1985.
- Pellew, George. John Jay. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1898; Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1997.
- Stahr, Walter. John Jay: Founding Father. New York: Hambledon & London, 2005.

Jefferson, Thomas (1743–1826) statesman, political theorist

I like a little rebellion now and then. It is like a storm in the Atmosphere.

—Jefferson to Abigail Adams, February 22, 1787

Thomas Jefferson is arguably one of the most influential figures in early American literature. His reputation rests firmly upon his political writings, especially the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. Through these writings Jefferson has gained international influence as a political theorist.

Jefferson was born in 1743 to Peter and Jane Randolph Jefferson of Albemarle County, Virginia. He received a thorough grounding in Greek and Roman classics during his early education and acquired an appreciation for natural philosophy during his student days at the College of William and Mary. The influence of these fields can be seen clearly in the notes he compiled from 1764 until 1772, which were eventually published in 1928 as The Literary Bible of Thomas Jefferson. After college Jefferson decided on a career in the law. He was admitted to the bar in 1767. His political career began the following year with his election to the Virginia Assembly. He married Martha Wayles Skelton on New Year's Day 1772; the couple had six children, with only two living to adulthood.

Jefferson's first major contribution to political literature came in 1774 in the wake of the Boston Tea Party and the closing of Boston's port. In A Summary View of the Rights of British America Jefferson declared that natural rights superseded any rights established by civil law. This document, which boldly challenged the authority of Parliament over the colonies, was a precursor to the Declaration of Independence.

In 1776, a year after his election to the Continental Congress, Jefferson was appointed to the five-man committee assigned to draw up a declaration of independence from Britain. Jefferson wrote the first draft of this document alone. Using simple, clear prose, he proclaimed the right of the people to overthrow a government that had repeatedly infringed upon their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In true ENLIGHTENMENT tradition, Jefferson described government as a contract between the people and their leaders, to be honored only as long as the government respected the rights and protected the liberties of the people. Detailing Britain's abuses over the years, Jefferson's declaration built the case that justified the colonial rebellion.

Portrait of Thomas Jefferson by Charles William Peale, 1793, that hangs in Independence Hall, Philadelphia

In 1779, at the age of thirty-six, Jefferson was elected governor of Virginia. During his term of office he wrote an "Act of Establishing Religious Freedom." Passed into law in 1786, this historic legislation established the principle of separation of church and state. It was one of Jefferson's most prized achievements. Based on the conviction that individual conscience is superior to the requirements of organized religion, the law states that "no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever. . . ."

Jefferson's wife, Martha, died in September 1782, and he never remarried. In a letter to the Marquis de Chastellux, on November 26, 1782, Jefferson, speaking of his wife's death, wrote, "A single event wiped away all my plans and left me a blank which I had not the spirits to fill up." As a single parent, Jefferson was actively involved in his three daughters' education and upbringing. On November 28, 1783, Jefferson sent this schedule and advice to his eleven-year-old daughter, Martha:

from 8. to 10 o'clock practise music.
 from 10. to 1. dance one day draw another from 1. to 2. draw on the day you dance, and write a letter the next day from 3. to 4. read French.
 from 4. to 5. exercise yourself in music.
 from 5. till bedtime read English, write &c.

He also advises her to "[t]ake care that you never spell a word wrong. Always before you write a word consider how it is spelt, and if you do not remember it, turn to a dictionary. It produces great praise to a lady to spell well."

In 1784 Jefferson submitted a draft of his Report of Government for the Western Territories to Congress. This landmark document proposed that all new states enter the union on a footing equal to the original thirteen; that any person with a hereditary title be required to forfeit that title before acquiring citizenship; that all new states must remain in the union "forever"; and, finally, that after 1800 slavery be prohibited in any new state. The Ordinance of 1784 that Congress passed removed the last two items, but the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 outlawed slavery in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Without this legislation, inspired by Jefferson, slavery might have gained a foothold in the Northwest.

Also in 1784, Jefferson succeeded Benjamin FRANKLIN as American minister to France, spending four years in Paris, engulfed by political turmoil. He forged close friendships with French politicians and philosophers, such as Marie-Jean-Antoine-Nicolas de Caritat, Marquis de Condorcet, François, Duc de La Rochefoucauld, and Marie-Joseph-Paul-Yves-Roch-Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de Lafayette, and appears to have fallen in love with a beautiful Englishwoman, Maria Cosway. While living among the intellectual elite of prerevolutionary Paris, Jefferson was introduced to higher biblical criticism. Ever the man of reason, scorning medieval superstition and dogma, Jefferson wrote to his nephew Peter Carr that "those facts in the Bible which contradict the laws of nature must be examined with more care. . . . Your own reason is the only oracle given you by heaven, and you are answerable, not for the rightness, but uprightness of the decision." A few years later Jefferson translated the first twenty chapters of Count Constantin François de Volney's (1757–1820) Les Ruines, ou méditations sur les révolutions des empires (1791, Ruins; or Meditations on the Revolution of Empires). This celebrated attack on institutionalized religion inspired Jefferson to conclude that to believe in nothing was preferable to being swayed by what was not true.

In 1784 Jefferson published his only original full-length book, Notes on the State of Virginia. This work includes a detailed description of the natural scenery of his home state. It also served as a refutation to the assertions by French naturalist Georges Louis Leclerc, Comte de Buffon (1707–1788) that everything common to Europe and America was larger in Europe. Jefferson defended freedom of religion with great eloquence in Notes on the State of Virginia, but the work also includes his arguments supporting white racial superiority. Notes provides extensive ethnographic information about Native Americans, including several extensive charts listing specific tribes.

Upon his return to the United States in 1789, Jefferson was appointed secretary of state by President George WASHINGTON. Following his four years of service for Washington, Jefferson served as second vice president of the United States from 1797 to 1801 under John ADAMS. In 1800 he was elected to the first of two terms as president. During his presidency Jefferson tried to adhere to his belief in a small and limited federal government by reducing the army, navy, diplomatic service, and to some degree the civil service, but he often found he had to tailor his principles to expediency. The most notable example of this need was his approval of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, an expenditure of $15 million he felt was fully justified.

After leaving the presidency in 1809, Jefferson settled down at his home, Monticello, to pursue his wide-ranging interests in the fields of botany, paleontology, music, linguistics, architecture, religion, and ethics. The field of education absorbed Jefferson most. Convinced that the foundation of a democratic republic was a well-educated citizenry, in 1817 he founded the University of Virginia. Until his death he considered the creation of this secular university one of his crowning achievements. "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free, in a state of civilization," he warned, "it expects what never was and never will be."

Jefferson continued to advocate a demystified religion that preached from a positivist perspective. He railed against the gloomy assessments of human nature he believed were characteristic of CALVINISM. As an adherent of Unitarianism, Jefferson wrote the pamphlet The Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth, an attempt to remove all reference to miracles and magic from the New Testament, and to stress the ethical teachings of Jesus instead.

Although postwar political disagreements had divided many of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION's leaders, an elderly Jefferson sought to reestablish contact with his political rivals. He and Adams began a lively correspondence after the two men retired from office. They died on the same day, July 4, 1826, as celebrations of American independence were held in both Virginia and Massachusetts. Unaware that Jefferson was already dead, Adams's last words were "Thomas Jefferson survives."

Works

Jefferson, Thomas. Papers of Thomas Jefferson, 31 volumes. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1953–2004.

Thomas Jefferson. Writings, edited by Merrill Peterson. New York: Library of America, 1984.

Thomas Jefferson. Public and Private Papers, edited by Peterson. New York: Library of America, 1990.

Sources

- Appleby, Joyce O. Thomas Jefferson. New York: Times Books, 2003.
- Burstein, Andrew. Jefferson's Secrets: Death and Desire at Monticello. New York: Basic Books, 2005.
- Kennedy, Roger G. Mr. Jefferson's Lost Cause: Land, Farmers, Slavery, and the Louisiana Purchase. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- Malone, Dumas. The Sage of Monticello. Boston: Little, Brown, 1981.
- Randall, Henry S. The Life of Thomas Jefferson, 3 volumes. New York: Derby & Jackson, 1958.

Recommended Writings

- A Summary View of the Rights of British America* (1774)
- Letters* (1760–1826)
- Public Papers* (1775–1825)
- Notes on the State of Virginia* . . . (1781–1782)
- The Autobiography of Thomas Jefferson* . . . (1821)

Studying Thomas Jefferson

Thomas Jefferson, statesman, president, naturalist, inventor, architect, farmer, book collector, and founder, published one book in his lifetime and wrote approximately eighteen thousand letters. The Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress lists over twenty-seven thousand documents in the Thomas Jefferson Papers, and general sources for Jefferson include thousands of titles. Given the wealth of primary and secondary sources for Jefferson, the following are selected suggestions for students of literature and history. To find primary sources on Thomas Jefferson, students should consult the finding aids available from the University of Virginia, Princeton University, and the Library of Congress. Recent and ongoing volumes of Jefferson's papers include: The Papers of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Julian P. Boyd and others (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1950–2004); The Papers of Thomas Jefferson: Retirement Series, edited by J. Jefferson Looney (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2004– ). For convenient one-volume editions, see Thomas Jefferson. Writings, edited by Merrill Peterson (New York: The Library of America, 1984); Thomas Jefferson. Public and Private Papers, edited by Peterson (New York: The Library of America, 1990); and The Political Writings of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Peterson (Charlottesville: Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, 1993).

From the hundreds of biographies written on Jefferson, the definitive, authoritative biography is Dumas Malone's Thomas Jefferson and His Times, 6 volumes (Boston: Little, Brown, 1948–1981). Other works include Peterson's Thomas Jefferson and the New Nation: A Biography (New York: Oxford University Press, 1970); Fawn Brodie's Thomas Jefferson:

An Intimate History (New York: Norton, 1974); and Noble E. Cunningham's In Pursuit of Reason: The Life of Thomas Jefferson (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987). For more-recent biographies, see Andrew Burstein's The Inner Jefferson: Portrait of a Grieving Optimist (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1996); Joseph J. Ellis's American Sphinx: The Character of Thomas Jefferson (New York: Knopf, 1997); and Richard B. Bernstein's Thomas Jefferson (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003).

For students interested in reading Jefferson's letters and other personal writings, see The Adams-Jefferson Letters; The Complete Correspondence between Thomas Jefferson and Abigail and John Adams, edited by Lester Jesse Cappon (Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1959); The Family Letters of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Edwin Morris Betts and James Adam Bear (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1966); Jefferson's Literary Commonplace Book, edited by Douglas L. Wilson (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1989); Thomas Jefferson's Garden Book, 1766–1824, With Relevant Extracts From His Other Writings, edited by Edwin Morris Betts (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, 1999); Jefferson in Love: Love Letters between Thomas Jefferson & Maria Cowsay, edited by John P. Kaminski (Madison, Wis.: Madison House, 1999); and Letters from the Head and Heart: Writings of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Andrew Burstein (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Foundation, 2002).

For a study of Jefferson and the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE, see Garry Wills's Inventing America: Jefferson's Declaration of Independence (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978); Jay Fliegelman's Declaring Independence: Jefferson, Natural Language, and the Culture of Performance (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1993); and Julian Boyd's The Declaration of Independence: The Evolution of a Text (Revised edition, edited by Gerard W. Gawalt. Charlottesville, Va.: International Center for Jefferson Studies at Monticello in Association with the Library of Congress, 1999).

For studies of Jefferson and Native Americans, see W. Sheehan Bernard's Seeds of Extinction: Jeffersonian Philanthropy and the American Indian (Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1973); and Anthony F. C. Wallace's Jefferson and the Indians: The Tragic Fate of the First Americans (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999). For a study of Jefferson and the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION, see Stephen E. Ambrose's Undaunted Courage: Meriwether Lewis, Thomas Jefferson, and the Opening of the American West (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996); James E. Lewis Jr.'s The Louisiana Purchase: Jefferson's Noble Bargain? (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Foundation, 2003); and James P. Ronda's Jefferson's West: A Journey with Lewis and Clark (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Foundation, 2000).

A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America in General Congress assembled.

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, & to assume among the powers of the earth the separate & equal station, to which the laws of nature & of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal: that ~~they are endowed by their Creator~~ with inherent & inalienable rights: that these are life, liberty, & the pursuit of happiness: that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed: that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it; & to institute new government, laying it's foundation on such principles, & organising it's powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes: and accordingly all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. but when a long train of abuses & usurpations, begun at a dishinguished period, & pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, & to provide new guards for their future security.
such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the ne-

For students interested in learning more about Jefferson, slavery, and Monticello, see John Chester Miller's The Wolf by the Ears: Thomas Jefferson and Slavery (New York: Free Press, 1977); Annette Gordon-Reed's Thomas Jefferson and Sally Hemings: An American Controversy (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1997); Sally Hemings and Thomas Jefferson: History, Memory, and Civic Culture, edited by Jan Lewis and Peter S. Onuf (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1999); Lucia Stanton's Free Some Day: The African-American Families of Monticello (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Foundation, 2000); and Stanton's Slavery at Monticello (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Foundation, 2000).

For collected essays, see Jeffersonian Legacies, edited by Peter Onuf (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993). Jefferson portraits are the study of Noble E. Cunningham's The Image of Thomas Jefferson in the Public Eye: Portraits for the People, 1800–1809 (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1981) and Alfred L. Bush's The Life Portraits of Thomas Jefferson (Charlottesville, Va.: Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, 1987). For Jefferson and education, see Harold Hellenbrand's The Unfinished Revolution: Education and Politics in the Thought of Thomas Jefferson (Newark: University of Delaware Press; London: Associated University Presses, 1990). For a printed bibliography, see Peterson's Thomas Jefferson: A Reference Biography (New York: Scribners, 1986) and Frank Shuffleton's Thomas Jefferson, 1811–1990: An Annotated Bibliography, 1992; and the electronic resource, Thomas Jefferson: Comprehensive, Annotated Bibliographies of Writings about Him, 1826–1997, edited by Shuffleton at the Thomas Jefferson Digital Archive (<<http://etext.lib.virginia.edu/jefferson/bibliog/>> viewed April 27, 2007).

For general on-line sources see the Library of Congress: The Thomas Jefferson Papers (<memory.loc.gov/ammem/mthhtml/mthhome.html> viewed April 27, 2007) and the Thomas Jefferson Online Resources at the University of Virginia (<<http://etext.lib.virginia.edu/jefferson/>> viewed April 27, 2007). Also see Monticello: The Home of Thomas Jefferson of the Thomas Jefferson Foundation (<<http://www.monticello.org/>> viewed April 27, 2007); and The Papers of Thomas Jefferson at Princeton University (<<http://www.princeton.edu/~tjpapers/>> viewed April 27, 2007).

Jemison, Mary (1743–1833) autobiographer

"My dear little Mary, I fear that the time has arrived when we must be parted forever. Your life, my child, I think will be spared; but we shall probably be tomahawked here in this lonesome place by the Indians. O! how can I part with you my darling? What will become of my sweet little Mary?"

—A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison (1824)

Mary Jemison was born on shipboard to Thomas and Jane Erwin Jemison as they emigrated from Ireland to Pennsylvania. The Jemison family settled in south-central Pennsylvania and, for the next fourteen years, established a homestead and farm. Their lives, however, took a dramatic turn on April 5, 1758, when a trading party of six Shawnee and four Frenchman attacked their home. Mary Jemison's two older brothers escaped, but her parents, sister, and two other brothers were all captured and later killed. Mary Jemison, who was about fifteen, was taken by canoe down the Ohio River to Fort Duquesne where "two pleasant looking squaws of the Seneca tribe" claimed her and brought her to their village in western New York, near Genesee. Once with the Seneca, Jemison was adopted as a substitute for a lost brother. She explains: "It is a custom of the Indians, when one of their number is slain or taken prisoner in battle, to give to the nearest relative to the dead or absent, a prisoner, if they have chanced to take one, and if not, to give him the scalp of an enemy." She was then given a new name, Dehgewanus, meaning "Two Falling Voices" or "The Sound of Two Voices Falling." As Kathryn Zabelle Derounian-Stodola points out, Jemison also used her English name when needed and "gave her children British names." Jemison thus adapted to living within different cultures and, eventually, it seems, preferred life with the Seneca.

In A NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF MRS. MARY JEMISON (1824), Jemison recalls several times when she might have returned to white culture; however, by the time these opportunities presented themselves, she had grown accustomed to life among the Indians. Jemison married twice, first to Shen-injee, a DELAWARE. When he died four years later she married Hiokatoo, a Seneca leader thirty years her senior. They were married for fifty years. Marriage and children brought Jemison fully into the Seneca world; she had eight children, thirty-nine grandchildren, and fourteen great-grandchildren.

In 1823, when Mary Jemison was in her eighties, James Everett Seaver, a retired doctor, interviewed her for three days. The interview took place in Seaver's home in Genesee, New York, near Jemison's farm. Seaver wrote a narrative based on this interview, in the style of the SENTIMENTAL NOVEL, with a decidedly emotional and moral tone. A year later, A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison was published by a local press in Canandaigua, New York. Soon, it was reprinted in New York and London, and it sold over one hundred thousand copies in its first year, making it a best-seller. In many of these editions Jemison is identified on the title page as "The White Woman of the Genesee." The compelling events of the narrative drew readers in; even though Seaver cast Jemison's life in conventional terms, the events themselves seemed to defy categorization. Jemison's narrative bridges cultural gaps by demystifying the dangers of captivity and by familiarizing the native world for the Anglo-American. Mary Jemison died in 1833, at the age of ninety.

Work

Seaver, James Everett. A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison. Canandaigua, N.Y.: J. D. Bemis, 1824; Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992.

Sources

Namias, June. White Captives: Gender and Ethnicity on the American Frontier. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.

Scheckel, Susan. The Insistence of the Indian: Race and Nationalism in Nineteenth-Century American Culture. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Jeremiad

Jeremiads were ministerial accounts of the misfortunes that befell and were going to befall the Puritans of seventeenth- and early-eighteenth-century NEW ENGLAND. Jeremiads interpreted these misfortunes as punishment for social and moral evils, although they also held out hope for a happier future if proper reforms were instituted. A response to the waning of devotion seen in the second generation of Puritans, the jeremiads were a call to revitalize the original intentions and passions of the founders. The earliest jeremiads focused on the failure of youth, but by the 1690s they took the form of CAPTIVITY NARRATIVES in which the captive reviews his or her life before being taken by Indians and searches for the sins that brought on this disaster. To a great extent the jeremiads provide a history of New England's religious evolution—or devolution. They trace the changes from austerity to material prosperity, from a theocracy to a secular society, from a Puritan to a Yankee culture.

The jeremiad begins with doctrine, a biblical text showing that the people must suffer the consequences of their sins. The following example is from Results of the General Court Synod (1679):

That God hath a Controversy with his New-England People is undeniable, the Lord having written his displeasure in dismal Characters against us. Though personal Afflictions doe oftentimes come only or chiefly for Probation, yet as to publick judgements it is not wont to be so; especially when by a continued Series of Providence, the Lord doth appear and plead against his People. 2 Sam. 21. 11. As with us it hath been from year to year. Would the Lord have whetted his glittering Sword, and his hand have taken hold on judgement? Would he have sent such a mortal Contagion like a Beesom of Destruction in the midst of us? . . . In which respect, a deep and most serious enquiry into the Causes of his Controversy ought to be attended. Nevertheless, it is sadly evident that there are visible, manifest Evils, which without doubt the Lord is provoked by.

In its second section there is an explication (reasons for the hardships and reminders of the national covenant). Finally, there are suggestions for reformation or more calls to hardship if the people do not heed the warnings and repent. The ministers' frustration with their society can be gleaned from the following passage from Urian Oakes in 1673:

We had as good preach to the Heavens and Earth, and direct our discourse to the Walls and Seats and Pillars of the meeting house, and say, Hear, O ye Walls, give ear O ye Seats and Pillars, as to many men in these Churches, that are deaf to all that is cried in their ears by the Lords Messengers, and are indeed like Rocks in the Sea, not to be stirred and moved by the beating and dashing of these waters of the Sanctuary, or by the strongest gust of rational and affectionate discourse that can blow upon them.

Some of the masters of the jeremiad form were Samuel DANFORTH, Cotton MATHER, and Samuel SEWALL, who drew a vision of New England's future from the Book of Revelation so as to frighten their listeners.

Sources

Bercovitch, Sacvan. The American Jeremiad. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.

Foster, Stephen. The Long Argument: English Puritanism and the Shaping of New England Culture, 1570–1700. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.

Gordis, Lisa M. Opening Scripture: Bible Reading and Interpretive Authority in Puritan New England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.

Knight, Janice. Orthodoxies in Massachusetts: Rereading American Puritanism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1994.

The Jesuit Relations by Paul LeJeune and others (1732–1772; Cleveland: Burrows, 1896) history

The Jesuit Relations (first collected in 1896) chronicles more than forty years of sustained interaction between Native Americans and Europeans. They were written by a group of missionaries of the Society of Jesus, a religious order founded in Paris by St. Ignatius of Loyola in 1534. Popularly known as the Jesuits, this order gained a reputation for producing learned members and effective teachers. By the early seventeenth century many Jesuits had committed themselves to a program of missionary activity among the Indians in the French colonies, an area known as NEW FRANCE. One of their standard tasks was to relate their successes and failures to their order through a written report, or relation. The Jesuit Relations, contributed by almost 320 Jesuit missionaries, is a complete set of these reports, covering the years 1632 to 1672.

The Jesuit Relations has appeared in several reprints since 1858. The most notable edition is Reuben Gold Thwaites's seventy-three-volume The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents, which includes both the original French or Latin text and English translation on the facing page. The "allied documents" are the papers Thwaites considers to have supplemental value; these papers span the years 1611 through 1791.

Each relation includes the experiences of several priests, but the finished product was largely the work of one of a series of the Jesuit superiors stationed in Quebec (Paul LeJeune, Barthélemy Vimont, Jerome Lalemant, Paul Rageneau, François le Mercier, or Claude Dablon). The superior gathered the anecdotes, organized them into a single narrative, and submitted the materials annually to the order's superior general in Rome. Realizing the potential of the Relations for both raising funds and increasing Jesuit membership, the superior general had them published and widely distributed. They appear to have been successful in encouraging missionary enterprises in Canada, including efforts by two groups of religious women, the Ursulines, who set up schools, and the Hospitalières, who established hospitals.

The Jesuits had the opportunity to view Indian life firsthand, especially among the Hurons, because they pioneered the "flying mission." Fearing that the availability of alcohol in the French colonial settlements would undermine their efforts to convert the Indians, the Jesuits encouraged the native population to turn their backs on the settlements and reembrace a nomadic life. For the most part, the Jesuits followed their potential converts on their seasonal quests for food, camped where the Indians camped, hunted, fished, and canoed with them, and preached whenever the opportunity arose. The Jesuits also studied the Indians' languages and wrote prayers and sermons that drew on the metaphors and imagery of the Indian culture. For example, Jean de Brébeuf's Christmas carol, written in Huron, reads in part:

*Within the lodge of broken bark
The tender Babe was found,
A ragged robe of rabbit skin
Enwrapp'd His beauty round;
But as the hunters brave drew nigh,
The angel song rang loud and high—
Jesus your King is born, Jesus is born,
In excelsis gloria*

Another priest, Paul LeJeune, found the Montagnais language to be "very rich and very poor, full of abundance and full of scarcity." He explained to his readers of The Relations that, though the language included no formal equivalents for words such as piety and virtue, a superabundance of proper nouns in the Montagnais language lacked French equivalents.

The "flying mission" distinguished French clerics' relations with the Indians from those of all other Europeans.

It reversed the old missionary assumption that indigenous people could embrace Christianity only if they "transformed" themselves into Europeans. The Jesuits argued instead that one did not have to be French or act French to accept the word of God. Their liberality did not, however, mean that the Jesuits were neutral in their cultural observations or that they were relativists in religious matters. Most of The Relations reflects a consistent conviction that Indian culture is inferior to European.

Like many missionaries who recorded their experiences, the Jesuits were prone to exaggerate. The sincere acceptance of Christianity among all those they baptized is suspect. What does appear true, however, is that many Jesuits eventually became members of tribes they traveled with and were "adopted" into Indian families and given tribal names and identities. Rich in detail and anecdote, The Jesuit Relations is arguably the most complete collection of texts representing a sustained encounter between Native Americans and Europeans.

Source

Greer, Allan. The Jesuit Relations: Natives and Missionaries in Seventeenth-Century North America. Boston: Bedford, 2000.

Johnson, Edward (1598–1672) historian

Edward Johnson, author of the first comprehensive history of early colonial experience, was born near Canterbury, England, to William Johnson, a parish clerk, and Susan Porridge Johnson. He was trained either as a carpenter or in some other craft related to carpentry. He also had experience as a small landowner, a trader, and a member of the military. Johnson married Susan Munnter around 1618. The couple had eight children, all of whom appear to have been born in England.

Johnson made his first visit to NEW ENGLAND in 1630 as a member of John Winthrop's expedition and returned to England the following year. In 1636 he left England with his wife and family, establishing himself in Massachusetts as a trader, first in Boston and later in Charlestown. In 1640 he helped establish the town of Woburn. Johnson's participation in the settlement of this new town altered his status. He became a town leader, an officer in the militia, and a member of the Massachusetts General Court.

A History of New-England (1654, published in later editions as Wonder-Working Providence of Sions [Zion's] Saviour in New England) was published in London and covers the period from 1628 to 1652. As a trader and a leading member of the town and colonial government, Johnson had an important stake in the success of the colony. Not surprisingly, Johnson accepts the colony as God's commission, and he defends it against all enemies, real or imagined. His attitude is revealed in his treatment of religious leader Anne HUTCHINSON, whose preaching contradicted much of the colony's religious doctrines and who, Johnson argues, was “much backed with the Sorcery of a second” (presumably the devil).

Johnson’s writing suffered from a lack of refinement when compared to the work of other Puritan authors, such as John WINTHROP and Cotton MATHER, but his observations include details and insights that were often overlooked by his better-educated colleagues. He provides, for example, more compassionate accounts of the Indian experience during the period of settlement than do most of the Puritan histories. Accordingly, his History of New-England became an important source of information on town settlement and town government for other writers, including John JOSSELYN and Cotton Mather.

Although it was presented in the form of a narrative subdivided into three books, A History of New-England also included poems that stressed the major themes underlying the Puritan experiment as understood by Johnson. These themes included the essential unity of government and church:

*Lord stay thy hand, and stop my earthly mind,
Thy Word, not world, shall be our sole delight,
Not Meadow ground, but Christs rich pearl wee’l find,
Thy Saints imbrace, and not large lands down plight.
Murmure no more will we at yearly pay,
To help uphold our Government each way.*

Johnson’s responsibilities as a civic leader provided an excellent opportunity to examine both the inner workings of the colony and the outskirts of the settlement. These observations resulted in one and possibly two histories of Massachusetts during the early period of settlement. Johnson may have been the author of Good News from New-England, published anonymously in London in 1648. Although Good News from New-England demonstrates commonalties in style and content with Johnson’s History of New-England, the authorship of the former has not been definitively established.

Johnson died on April 23, 1672, in Woburn, Massachusetts, the town he had helped establish a generation earlier. He is remembered as a noted but frequently criticized historian of the early settlement experience in Massachusetts.

Work

Johnson, Edward. A History of New-England. London: Printed for N. Brooke, 1854; Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars’ Facsimiles and Reprints, 1974.

Sources

Arch, Stephen Carl. “The Edifying History of Edward Johnson’s Wonder-Working Providence,” Early American Literature, 28 (1993): 42–59.

Bercovitch, Sacvan. “The Historiography of Johnson’s Wonder-working Providence,” Essex Institute Collections, 104 (April 1968): 138–161.

Gallagher, Edward J. “An Overview of Edward Johnson’s Wonder-Working Providence,” Early American Literature, 5 (Winter 1971): 30–49.

Johnson, Samuel (1696–1772) clergyman, philosopher, educator

Samuel Johnson is best known as the producer of the first philosophical textbook in America. He was an idealist philosopher and a leader in the fight for an Anglican episcopate or bishop in America. Born in Guilford, Connecticut, son of Samuel and Mary Sage Johnson, Samuel entered the Collegiate School (later Yale College) at fourteen and graduated four years later in 1714. He was immediately made a tutor at the school and quickly sought to modernize the curriculum to reflect his recently acquired interest in Baconian science and its empirical approach to scientific study. In 1719 he was forced out by the trustees of the college, who objected to his changes to the traditional curriculum.

In 1720 Johnson was ordained as pastor of the church in West Haven, Connecticut. He was already having doubts about CONGREGATIONALISM, however, and in 1722 he went to England to seek holy orders in the ANGLICAN CHURCH. In 1723 he was ordained deacon and priest and appointed as missionary to Stratford, Connecticut, by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1723 he opened the first Anglican church in Connecticut to use the Book of Common Prayer. In 1725 he married Charity Floyd.

Over the next few years Johnson opened a rectory school to which New Yorkers sent their children. He also founded parishes in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New York. As there was no seminary, he himself instructed men preparing for holy orders in the Anglican Church. From 1732 to 1737 he published many essays in defense of Anglicanism, including A Letter from a Minister of the Church of England to His Dissenting Parishioners . . . (1733).

Johnson also worked to popularize the idealistic philosophy of Bishop George Berkeley (1685–1753), who attacked skepticism and defended faith. Under Berkeley’s influence Johnson produced An Introduction to Philosophy in 1731. This was later expanded into Ethices Elementa; Or The First Principles of Moral Philosophy (1746). Ethices Elementa was reprinted by Benjamin FRANKLIN in 1752, and this edition became the textbook used at the College of Philadelphia and at King’s College (now Columbia University), where Johnson served as president from 1754 to 1763.

From the time of his ordination, Johnson called for an American episcopate to aid in the expansion of the Anglican faith in America. In 1767 Johnson had one of his students, Thomas Bradbury Chandler, publish Appeal to the Public, Concerning the Reasonableness, Usefulness, and Necessity of an American Episcopate. A PAMPHLET and newspaper battle ensued for several years, but Britain thought it was unwise to create the colonial episcopate in the tension-filled atmosphere of the 1770s.

Johnson presided over King's College from 1754 to 1763, combining classical studies with science, history, new philosophies, law, government, and vocational studies, such as agriculture and merchandising. He used his position to impose the Anglican faith in this nondenominational college, and as a result he was forced out by the trustees in 1763. In 1761 Johnson, then a widower, married Sarah Beach, and the couple moved to Stratford. Johnson remained active, founding a new church at Milford, writing his autobiography, and publishing volumes on England and Hebrew grammar. He died in Stratford on January 6, 1772.

Work

Johnson, Samuel. Samuel Johnson, President of King's College: His Career and Writings, 4 volumes, edited by Herbert Schneider and Carol Schneider. New York: Columbia University Press, 1929.

Sources

Ellis, Joseph J. The New England Mind in Transition: Samuel Johnson of Connecticut, 1696–1773. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1973.

Potkay, Adam. The Passion for Happiness: Samuel Johnson and David Hume. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2000.

Josselyn, John (?–1675) adventurer, scientist

John Josselyn was born in Essex County, England. His writings suggest a formal education in science and possibly in medicine. Little else is known about his personal life. Josselyn made two separate voyages to NEW ENGLAND during the seventeenth century. The first voyage involved a short stay in 1637 or 1638, the second a more extended stay that lasted from 1663 to 1671.

The exact reasons for Josselyn's voyages remain unclear. On both occasions he visited with his brother Henry in Scarborough, Maine. Henry served as an agent for the Gorges, an aristocratic family with title claims in New England, and Josselyn's voyages may have been connected to that endeavor. The settlement experience and the natural surroundings made a lasting impression on Josselyn, inspiring two books. The first, New-Englands Rarities Discovered, which was published in London in 1672, offered detailed descriptions and illustrations of the natural wonders of New England, including the "Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Serpents," and weather conditions. The lasting value of New-Englands Rarities rested on Josselyn's careful examination of plant life, which included commentary on the medicinal characteristics of many of these plants. Josselyn appears to have gathered much of this information from the native people living in the region.

Josselyn punctuated his descriptive narrative with POETRY that reflected his own amazement at the wonders of the New World. In one of these verses Josselyn extols the beauty of an Indian woman, using her natural attractions to question

"Whether White or Black be best." Josselyn challenges the reader to "Call your Senses to the quest." Touch her skin, he suggests, "And your touch shall quickly tell / The Black in softness doth excel." Josselyn concludes by favoring the natural sensuality of the naked Indian woman.

*Those flatterers themselves must say
That darkness was before the Day;
And such perfection here appears
It neither Wind nor Sun-shine fears.*

Josselyn's second book, An Account of Two Voyages to New-England, published in London in 1674, offered additional information on settlement in New England, including an extensive list of provisions required for the lengthy sea voyage and for the initial year of settlement. This practical advice is interspersed with Josselyn's negative commentary on life among the Puritans. Whether Josselyn was a Puritan himself is unclear—his connection to the aristocracy suggests otherwise. He did, however, develop a deep antagonism toward the Puritan leaders of Massachusetts during his second voyage.

Josselyn's two volumes represent an important scientific and social record of the early colonial period in New England. Frequent references to and republication of the information included in these two volumes can be found in the work of other scientists and naturalists.

Works

Josselyn, John. New-Englands Rarities Discovered. London: Printed for G. Widdowes, 1672; Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1972.

Josselyn. An Account of Two Voyages to New-England. London: Printed for Giles Widdows, 1673; republished as John Josselyn, Colonial Traveler: A Critical Edition of Two Voyages to New-England, edited by Paul J. Lindholdt. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1988.

Source

Gura, Philip F. "Thoreau and John Josselyn," New England Quarterly, 48 (December 1975): 503–518.

Junto Club (1727–1767?)

The Junto, a literary and philosophical club, was established by Benjamin FRANKLIN in 1727. A preeminent example of a "leather-apron club," as David S. Shields explains, it comprised "young artisans with the aim of improving public life." Derived from the Spanish for "joined," a junto or junta refers to a small group, often meeting in secret to reach a common goal. Other founding members included Joseph Brientnal, scrivener and poet; Thomas Godfrey (1704–1749), a mathematician; Nicholas Scull (1687–1762), a surveyor; William Parsons (1701–1757), a shoemaker, scrivener, tavern keeper, dyer, and sheriff; William Maugridge, a joiner and mechanic; Hugh Meredith (circa 1696–circa 1749), a merchant; Stephen Potts (d. 1758), a bookseller and tavern keeper; George Webb (born circa 1709), a printer; Robert Grace (1709–1766); and William Coleman (1704–1769), a merchant's clerk. For forty years, members met to discuss and debate social and literary issues. In Franklin's AUTOBIOGRAPHY, he describes the Junto's beginnings:

I had form'd most of my ingenious Acquaintance into a Club, for mutual Improvement, which we call'd the Junto. We met on Friday Evenings. The Rules I drew up requir'd that every Member in his Turn should produce one or more Queries on any Point of Morals, Politics or Natural Philosophy, to be discuss'd by the Company, and once in three Months produce and read an Essay of his own Writing on any Subject he pleased. Our Debates were to be under the Direction of a President, and to be conducted in the sincere Spirit of Enquiry after Truth, without Fondness for Dispute, or desire of Victory; and to prevent Warmth all Expressions of Positiveness in Opinion, or of direct Contradiction, were after some time made contraband and prohibited under small pecuniary Penalties.

In 1731, Franklin and the Junto Club created the Library Company of Philadelphia, a subscription library with fifty subscribers who each pledged forty schillings initially and ten schillings annually for fifty years. As Franklin explains, "This was the Mother of all N. American Subscription libraries now so numerous." Other notable projects and plans included street cleaning and building a hospital, an insurance company, and a militia. In 1743, the Junto laid the foundations for the American Philosophical Society, where men could gather to discuss scientific, philosophical, social, and literary ideas and discoveries.

Sources

- Lemay, J. A. Leo. The Life of Benjamin Franklin, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2006.
- Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Jackson, Helen Hunt (1830–1885) novelist, poet, essayist

Born in Amherst, Massachusetts, and educated at boarding schools, Helen Hunt Jackson began writing for publication after the death of her husband in 1863, placing hundreds of pieces of poetry, essays, and short stories in periodicals and newspapers, using several pseudonyms. Her earliest works, Verses (1870) and Sonnets and Lyrics (1886), were well received critically, and her travelogue Bits of Travel (1872) won her a popular audience. Her stories published under the pseudonym Saxe Holm were particularly well received and were collected in two volumes of Saxe Holm's Stories (1874 and 1879). The most notable of these is "Esther Wynn's Love Letters" (1874), thought to be based loosely on her friend Emily DICKINSON, who probably also provided the model for Jackson's novel Mercy Philbrick's Choice (1876).

After Jackson married for a second time in 1875, she made her home in Colorado Springs, Colorado, where she became sympathetic to the plight of the local Native Americans. Her attendance at an 1879 lecture given by Ponca tribal leader Standing Bear, during which he protested the removal of the Poncas from their tribal lands, converted Hunt to the cause of Indian-policy reform. Her commitment resulted in the tract A CENTURY OF DISHONOR (1881), which excoriated the government for its abuse of Native Americans, and in her appointment to a special federal commission investigating the predicament of the Mission Indians. In 1884 Jackson produced a popular romance, RAMONA, which she hoped would perform the same service for Indians that UNCLE

TOM'S CABIN had for African American slaves. Although her ambitions for the book were not fully realized, legislation was approved in 1891 that helped the few surviving Mission Indians in California.

Sources

Mathes, Valerie Sherer. Helen Hunt Jackson and Her Indian Reform Legacy. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990.

Phillips, Kate. Helen Hunt Jackson: A Literary Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.

Ramirez, Karen E. Reading Helen Hunt Jackson's Ramona. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 2006.

Whitaker, Rosemary. Helen Hunt Jackson. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1987.

Jacobs, Harriet (1813–1897) memoirist

Born into slavery in Edenton, North Carolina, Harriet Jacobs was taught to read by her owner, Margaret Hornblow. After Hornblow's death in 1825, Jacobs became the property of Hornblow's three-year-old niece, Mary Norcom, whose father, James Norcom, repeatedly tried to force Jacobs into sexual slavery. To put him off, Jacobs began a consensual relationship with a white attorney, Samuel Treadwell Sawyer, with whom she had a son and a daughter. Norcom retaliated by sending Jacobs to work under brutal conditions at his son's plantation. When Norcom threatened to sell her children, Jacobs escaped. After hiding in her grandmother's attic for almost seven years, Jacobs fled to the North in 1842, sending for her children. In 1852 the abolitionist Cornelia Grinnell Willis (1825–1904) raised funds to purchase Jacobs's freedom.

At the suggestion of the feminist abolitionist Amy Post (1802–1889), Jacobs began to write her memoir in 1853. Jacobs resisted Harriet Beecher STOWE's suggestion that her story be integrated into UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1851) as fiction, and with the editorial help of the abolitionist writer Lydia Maria CHILD, Jacobs published her autobiography, one of the earliest SLAVE NARRATIVES to be written by a woman, in 1861. The book, titled INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A SLAVE GIRL, WRITTEN BY HERSELF, was originally published under the pseudonym Linda Brent.

Sources

Andrews, William L. To Tell a Free Story: The First Century of Afro-American Autobiography, 1760–1865. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Johnson, Yvonne. The Voices of African American Women: The Use of Narrative and Authorial Voice in the Works of Harriet Jacobs, Zora Neale Hurston, and Alice Walker. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Yellin, Jean Fagan. Harriet Jacobs: A Life. New York: Basic Civitas, 2004.

James, Alice (1848–1892) diarist

Born in New York City, Alice James was the fifth child and only daughter of Mary Robertson Walsh and Henry JAMES Sr. The sister of novelist Henry JAMES and philosopher William JAMES, she was denied the education granted her siblings and discouraged from pursuing a profession. As her brother Henry once remarked, “in our family group girls seem scarcely to have had a chance.”

From about the age of nineteen onward, Alice James suffered from repeated mental breakdowns and depression. In 1889 she started a diary that spoke in plain and vivid terms about her interior life and about the world around her—a task she undertook with the apparent intention that it be published. She was also an avid correspondent, and her letters are among the most memorable written during her time. In 1873 Alice James met another single woman, Katherine Loring, with whom she formed an intense bond of the sort referred to at the time as a Boston marriage. James succumbed to breast cancer in early middle age.

Sources

The Diary of Alice James, edited by Leon Edel. New York: Penguin, 1964.

Lewis, R. W. B. The Jameses: A Family Narrative. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1991.

Strouse, Jean. Alice James: A Biography. London: Cape, 1980.

Yeazell, Ruth Bernard, ed. The Death and Letters of Alice James: Selected Correspondence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981.

Henry James, 1906

James, Henry (1843–1916) short-story writer, novelist, critic

We work in the dark—we do what we can—we give what we have. Our doubt is our passion, and our passion is our task. The rest is the madness of art.

—“The Middle Years” (1893)

Henry James Jr. was one of four children fathered by Henry JAMES Sr., a prominent writer on religion and philosophy. Born in New York City, Henry Jr. grew up abroad. He was greatly influenced by his father's cosmopolitan outlook and exposed at an early age to his father's intellectual friends. He also had the example of his older brother William JAMES, who became a distinguished philosopher and psychologist. Educated by tutors, Henry spent his time in Newport, Rhode Island, and in Europe. In 1862 he entered Harvard Law School, but he soon concluded that writing was his métier and that America was unlikely to foster his talent. To James, Americans seemed too intent on commerce and lacked the sophisticated social structures and manners that he found so attractive in European culture.

James began his literary career by writing articles, stories, and reviews. "A Passionate Pilgrim" (1871), his first story to be characterized by an international theme, examines the confrontation between American and European culture. By 1875 James had settled permanently in Europe and published Transatlantic Sketches (1875). Roderick Hudson (1876) was his first novel to employ the international theme, telling the story of an American sculptor who cannot adjust to Rome. Similarly, THE AMERICAN (1877) describes the struggle of a man as he attempts to negotiate the intricacies of French life and to fathom standards of conduct different from his American values. The Europeans (1878) reverses James's angle by importing Europeans into a New England setting.

Of the novels and stories of this early period, DAISY MILLER (1878) is the most representative of James's idea of the nobility possible in innocence and of the value in not being spoiled by too much culture. It is the story of a young, naive American woman who pays with her life for her ignorance of the European milieu, but whose life is also an affecting rebuke of European corruption. An International Episode (1879) presents Americans in England as well as Englishmen in America for a simultaneous exploration of aristocratic and democratic values. James returned twice more to American settings for his stories, in Washington Square and THE BOSTONIANS. Both novels, however, show that he had become increasingly distanced from the American scene, to which he later returned only in his nonfiction. THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY (1882) marks the major phase of James's creativity. A portrayal of a young woman who mistakes European sophistication for moral sensitivity, the book is James's first prolonged exploration of the American mind in Europe.

James's novel The Princess Casamassima (1886) was a departure for him because it dealt so directly with politics. Although his treatment of radicals in London is more a study than a full-blown dramatic account, he anticipated the political novels of Joseph Conrad (1857–1924) in portraying the futility and absurdity of fanatics who believe they can change their world with narrow but fervent ideas. More typical of James's work is THE ASPERN PAPERS (1888), a novella that deals with a biographer's efforts to obtain the papers of a notable poet, Jeffrey Aspern, and the reluctance of the poet's beloved to yield them. Set in Venice, the story provides an example of the way in which James—often thought of as one of the world's great psychological novelists—characterized conflicting points of view.

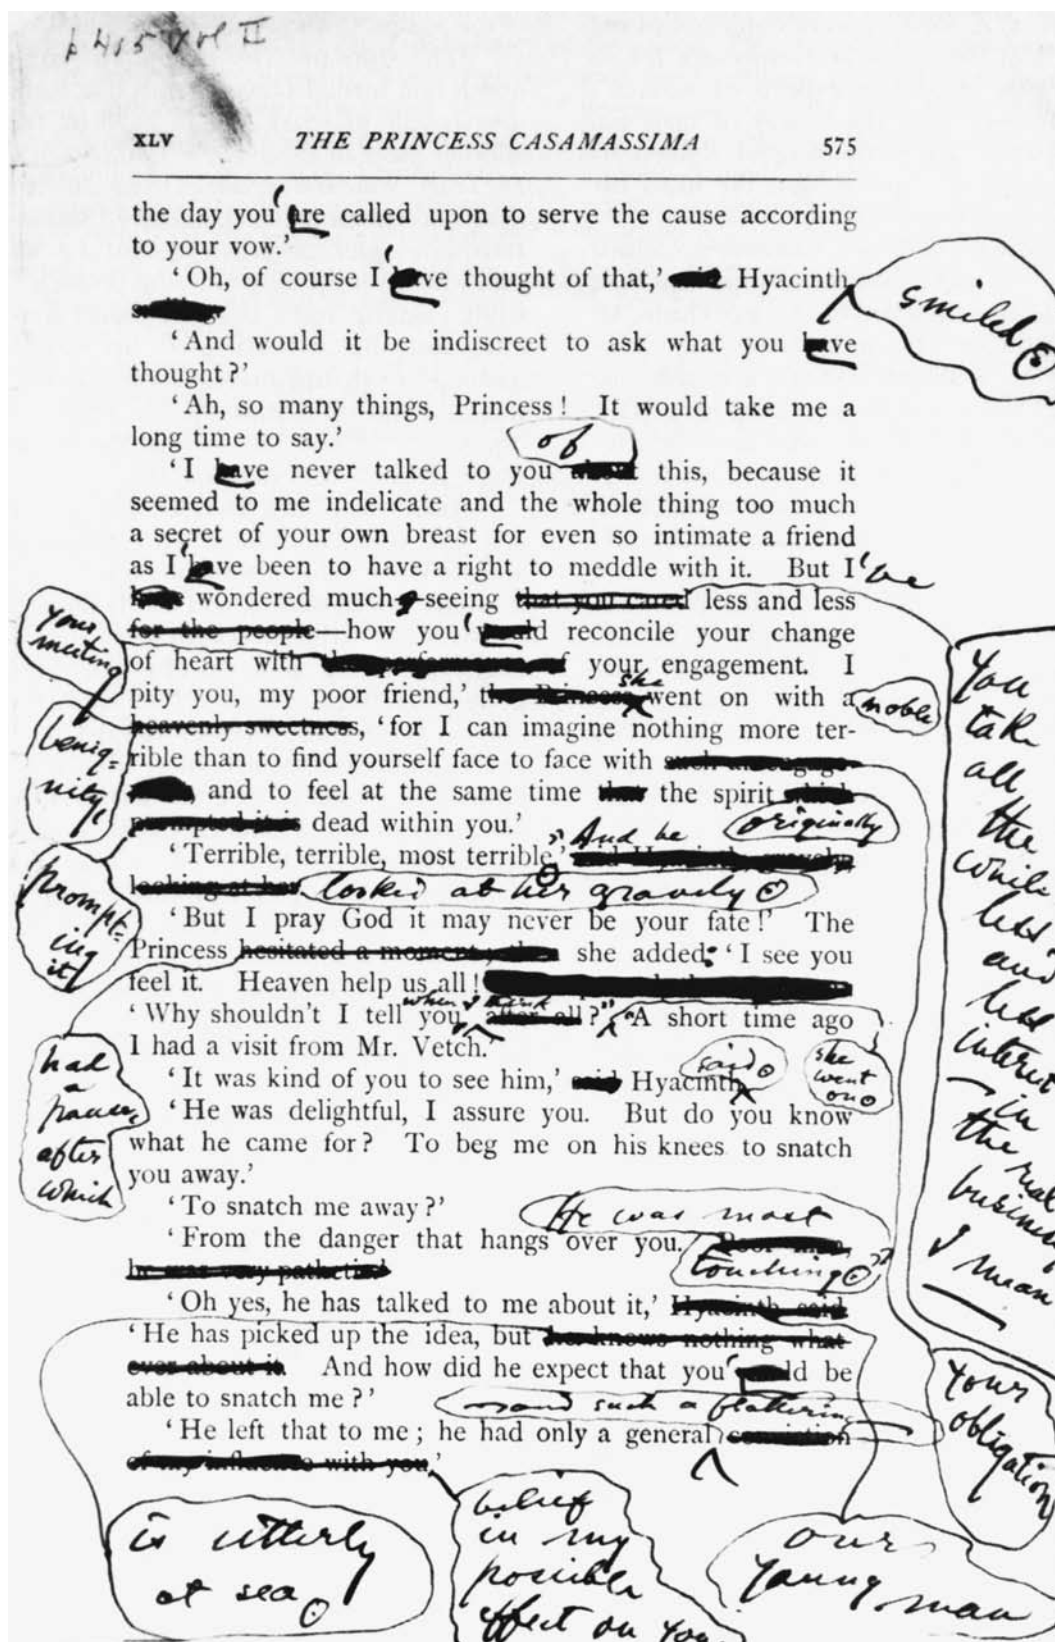

James continued writing into the 1900s, publishing A London Life (1889), The Real Thing and Other Tales (1893), The Private Life (1893), The Wheel of Time (1893), What Maisie Knew (1897), The Wings of the Dove (1902), The Ambassadors (1903), and The Golden Bowl (1904). His work represented acute statements on the subject of human relationships and cultural settings, and it brought to American fiction a degree of sophistication not seen before. In theme and technique—his studies of European and American societies and his experimentation with point of view and exploration of states of mind—James brought American literature into the world arena. He influenced poets as well as novelists. The early work of Ezra Pound and T. S. Eliot show James's influence, particularly in dramatic monologues like Eliot's Portrait of a Lady.

James also made an incalculable contribution to the criticism of American fiction and to the American writer's sense of himself as pursuing a disciplined craft. James advanced the art of the novel not only through the brilliant prefaces to his novels, collected as The Art of the Novel: Critical Prefaces (1934), but also in works of literary criticism. James is also an important figure in the history of American travel writing. His works in this genre include Portraits of Places (1883), A Little Tour in France (1885), English Hours (1905), The American Scene (1907), and Italian Hours (1909). James wrote several volumes of autobiography: A Small Boy and Others (1913), Notes of a Son and Brother (1914), and The Middle Years (1917).

Front cover for the 1905 collection of English travel sketches

James's revisions of a page of his 1886 novel for publication as volumes seven and eight of the New York Edition, published by Charles Scribner's Sons 1907–1917.

Principal Books by James

A Passionate Pilgrim, and Other Tales. Boston: Osgood, 1875.
Transatlantic Sketches. Boston: Osgood, 1875.
Roderick Hudson. Boston: Osgood, 1876; revised edition, Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882.
The American. Boston: Osgood, 1877.
French Poets and Novelists. London: Macmillan, 1878.
Watch and Ward. Boston: Houghton, Osgood, 1878.
Daisy Miller: A Study. New York: Harper, 1878.
The Europeans. Boston: Houghton, Osgood, 1879.
An International Episode. New York: Harper, 1879.
The Madonna of the Future and Other Tales, 2 volumes. London: Macmillan, 1879.
Hawthorne. New York: Harper, 1880.
Confidence. Boston: Houghton, Osgood, 1880.
A Bundle of Letters. Boston: Loring, 1880.
The Diary of a Man of Fifty and A Bundle of Letters. New York: Harper, 1880.
Washington Square. New York: Harper, 1881.
Washington Square, The Pension Beaurepas, A Bundle of Letters, 2 volumes. London: Macmillan, 1881.
The Portrait of a Lady. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882.
The Siege of London, The Pension Beaurepas, and The Point of View. Boston: Osgood, 1883.
Daisy Miller: A Comedy in Three Acts. Boston: Osgood, 1883.
Portraits of Places. Boston: Osgood, 1884.
Tales of Three Cities. Boston: Osgood, 1884.
A Little Tour in France. Boston: Osgood, 1885; revised edition, Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1900.
The Author of Beltraffio, Pandora, Georgina's Reasons, The Path of Duty, Four Meetings. Boston: Osgood, 1885.
The Art of Fiction. Boston: Cupples, Upham, 1885.
Stories Revived, 3 volumes. London: Macmillan, 1885.
The Bostonians: A Novel. 3 volumes, London: Macmillan, 1886; 1 volume, London & New York: Macmillan, 1886.
The Princess Casamassima: A Novel. New York: Macmillan, 1886.
Partial Portraits. New York: Macmillan, 1888.
The Reverberator. New York: Macmillan, 1888.
The Aspern Papers, Louisa Pallant, The Modern Warning. New York: Macmillan, 1888.
A London Life, The Patagonia, The Liar, Mrs. Temperly. New York: Macmillan, 1889.
The Tragic Muse, 2 volumes, Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1890.
The American: A Comedy in Four Acts. London: Heinemann, 1891.
The Lesson of the Master, The Marriages, The Pupil, Brooksmith, The Solution, Sir Edmund Orme. New York: Macmillan, 1892.
The Real Thing and Other Tales. New York: Macmillan, 1893.
Picture and Text. New York: Harper, 1893.
The Private Life, The Wheel of Time, Lord Beaupré, The Visits, Collaboration, Owen Wingrave. London: Osgood, McIlvaine, 1893.

John Singer Sargent's portrait of James, 1913, three years before his death

Essays in London and Elsewhere. New York: Harper, 1893.
The Private Life, Lord Beaupré, The Visits. New York: Harper, 1893.
The Wheel of Time, Collaboration, Owen Wingrave. New York: Harper, 1893.
Theatricals, Two Comedies: Tenants, Disengaged. New York: Harper, 1894.
Theatricals, Second Series: The Album, The Reprobate. New York: Harper, 1895.
Terminations: The Death of the Lion, The Coxon Fund, The Middle Years, The Altar of the Dead. New York: Harper, 1895.
Embarrassments: The Figure in the Carpet, Glasses, The Next Time, The Way It Came. New York & London: Macmillan, 1896.
The Other House. New York & London: Macmillan, 1896.
The Spoils of Poynton. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1897.
What Maisie Knew. Chicago & New York: Stone, 1897.
In the Cage. Chicago & New York: Stone, 1898.
The Two Magics: The Turn of the Screw, Covering End. New York & London: Macmillan, 1898.
The Awkward Age. New York & London: Harper, 1899.
The Soft Side. New York: Macmillan, 1900.
The Sacred Fount. New York: Scribners, 1901.

- The Wings of the Dove*, 2 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1902.
The Better Sort. New York: Scribners, 1903.
The Ambassadors. New York & London: Harper, 1903.
William Wetmore Story and His Friends, 2 volumes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1903.
The Golden Bowl. New York: Scribners, 1904.
The Question of Our Speech, The Lesson of Balzac: Two Lectures. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1905.
English Hours. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1905.
The American Scene. New York & London: Harper, 1907.
Views and Reviews. Boston: Ball, 1908.
Italian Hours. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1909.
The Finer Grain. New York: Scribners, 1910.
The Outcry. New York: Scribners, 1911.
A Small Boy and Others. New York: Scribners, 1913.
Notes of a Son and Brother. New York: Scribners, 1914.
Notes on Novelists with Some Other Notes. New York: Scribners, 1914.
The Middle Years, edited by Percy Lubbock. New York: Scribners, 1917.
The Complete Plays of Henry James, edited by Leon Edel. Philadelphia & New York: Lippincott, 1949.
Henry James: Literary Criticism, edited by Edel and Mark Wilson, 2 volumes. New York: Library of America, 1984.
The Complete Notebooks of Henry James, edited by Edel and Lyall H. Powers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Letters

- Henry James: Letters*, edited by Edel, 4 volumes. Cambridge & London: Harvard University Press, 1974–1984.

Studying Henry James

Widely considered one of the most important writers of American fiction, Henry James produced novels, stories, travel writing, and essays on the art of fiction. Although he wrote fiction and nonfiction of very high quality from at least the mid 1870s, James was not widely recognized as a major writer until near the end of his life. In 1905 Joseph Conrad published an appreciation in which he asserted “the magnitude of Mr. Henry James’s work,” but James’s central place in the American literary canon was not secured until the 1940s. His development of the modern psychological novel, together with his critical prefaces, exercised a profound influence on the writing and criticism of twentieth-century fiction.

For a good firsthand survey of James’s oeuvre—from its beginnings in Romanticism-inflected REALISM through naturalism to its culmination in psychological realism—students are advised to read a selection of his short novels or “nouvelles” (as he called them): DAISY MILLER (1878), THE ASPERN PAPERS (1888), “The Turn of the Screw” (1898), and The Beast in the Jungle (1903). Students interested specifically in James’s novels should begin with THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY (1881) and The Ambassadors (1903).

James’s fictional works are complemented by reading his critical writings, especially those collected in The Art of the Novel, edited by R. P. Blackmur (New York: Scribner, 1934). Tony Tanner’s Henry James: The Writer and his Work (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985) and D. W. Jefferson’s Henry James (New York: Grove Press, 1961) both provide excellent surveys of James’s career. Roger Gard’s Henry James: The Critical Heritage (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968) collects reviews, letters, and essays on James’s work by his contemporaries.

James’s early fiction is marked by a dependence on realist techniques. Lyall Powers’s Henry James and the Naturalist Movement (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1971) and Philip Grover’s Henry James and the French Novel: A Study in Inspiration (New York: Barnes & Noble, 1973) both demonstrate James’s indebtedness to French sources. Cornelia Kelley’s The Early Development of Henry James (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, revised 1965) outlines the writer’s development from Romanticist to realist, showing how his early work emerges from his engagement with contemporary European as well as American fiction.

James’s mature works of psychological realism are analyzed by F. O. Matthiessen in Henry James: The Major Phase (New York: Oxford University Press, 1963). More-advanced students will find the same subject treated by Donna Przybylowicz in Desire and Repression: The Dialectic of Self and Other in the Late Works of Henry James (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1986) and Sharon Cameron in Thinking in Henry James (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989), the latter of which argues that James’s prefaces radically oversimplify what is represented in the novels—a claim that other recent critics have advanced. Critical attention has also lately turned to the subjects of race and gender in the novels. Sara Blair’s Henry James and the Writing of Race and Nation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) and The Other Henry James by John Carlos Rowe (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1998) are important studies of these subjects. Students seeking an introduction to James criticism will be well served by the essays collected in Henry James, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 1987).

James was once quoted as saying “Nothing is my last word about anything,” and this statement is borne out by his habit of revision. The Complete Notebooks of Henry James, edited by Leon Edel and Lyall H. Powers (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987) show how James’s stories developed through the process of writing. James also made considerable revisions to his previously published works (most notably, Roderick Hudson, The American, The Portrait of a Lady, Daisy Miller, The Aspern Papers, and The Lesson of the Master), changes which have prompted some critics to argue that the earlier versions were better aesthetically. Avoiding this dispute, Philip Horne offers a penetrating look at James’s method of revision in Henry James and Revision: The New York Edition (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990).

Paris, November 3<sup>d</sup> 1889.

The Wilkie Collins Memorial Fund.

---

To the Manager,

LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK (Pall Mall Branch).

SIR,

Be so good as to enter my name as a
Subscriber to THE WILKIE COLLINS MEMORIAL FUND to the amount of £ 5 s. 5 d. 0

Yours, etc.,

not returned see index

Name Henry James

Address *34 St. Mark's Place
Kensington. W.*

James's subscription to the Wilkie Collins memorial, which resulted in a library housed briefly at the People's Palace in London, East End. The subscription is the equivalent of over $1,000 in 2007 U.S. dollars.

The best full-length biography remains Edel's five-volume Henry James (London: R. Hart-Davis, 1953–1972), later abridged in one volume as Henry James: A Life (New York: Harper & Row, 1985). For a critical biography and overview of James's canon, students should begin with F. W. Dupee's Henry James: His Life and Writings, second edition (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1956).

Though incomplete, the twenty-six-volume The Novels and Tales of Henry James: New York Edition (New York: Scribners, 1907–1909, 1918) is valuable insofar as it suggests to some extent which works James most desired to see preserved (among other works of fiction, it does not include The Bostonians, Washington Square or The Europeans). The Library of America has recently published a nearly complete multivolume collection of James's fiction, travel writing, and literary criticism. Edel's and Dan H. Laurence's Bibliography of Henry James, third edition (Oxford [Oxfordshire]: Clarendon Press, 1982) is the standard Henry James bibliography.

—Student Guide by C. Love

James, Henry, Sr. (1811–1882) essayist

Father of Henry JAMES, William JAMES, and Alice JAMES, Henry James Sr. was born into a Calvinist family in Albany, New York, but rebelled against the strictures of orthodoxy. An accident in childhood cost him a leg and inspired a turn toward intellectual pursuits. In 1835, after two years at the Princeton Theological Seminary, he withdrew, finding religious orthodoxy incompatible with his beliefs. Two years later, during a trip to England, he encountered the works of Robert Sandeman (1718–1771), a Scottish anti-Calvinist whose ideas James adopted. (James also edited one of Sandeman's books in 1838.) In 1839 James was introduced to the philosophy of Swedish theologian Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), whose mystical approach to Christianity had a profound effect on him, as it had on other nineteenth-century idealists.

An intimate friend of Albert Brisbane (1809–1890) and George RIPLEY, James came to embrace many of the doctrines of FOURIERISM. Most of his writings, however, were devoted to religious philosophy and an exploration of the Swedenborgian concept of “divine-natural humanity,” or “the immanence of God in the unity of mankind.” Among James's most important works are Christianity, the Logic of Creation (1857); Substance and Shadow; or Morality and Religion in Their Relation to Life (1863); The Secret of Swedenborg (1869); and Society, the Redeemed Form of Man (1879).

Sources

Bell, F. A., ed. Henry James: Fiction as History. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble, 1984.

Habegger, Alfred. The Father: A Life of Henry James, Sr. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1994.

Margolis, Anne Throne. Henry James and the Problem of Audience: An International Act. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Press, 1985.

James, William (1842–1910) philosopher, psychologist

As the brain changes are continuous, so do all these consciousnesses melt into each other like dissolving views. Properly they are but one protracted consciousness, one unbroken stream.

—Principles of Psychology (1890)

William James was born in New York City, but he spent much of his life abroad. His father, Henry JAMES Sr., was a writer on religious, social, and literary topics, and his brother was the novelist Henry JAMES. Although interested in art, especially painting, William studied medicine at Harvard and obtained an M.D. in 1869. In poor health and apparently suffering from doubts about his abilities, James became interested in psychology as a discipline that had the potential to liberate the mind.

James began teaching at Harvard in 1872, drawing on the thought of both Charles Darwin and the philosopher Herbert Spencer. His shift from medicine to philosophy and psychology led him to establish the first laboratory for psychological studies. Principles of Psychology, his first important published work, appeared in 1890. This landmark work relied on James's understanding of physiology, which he had taught at Harvard, to explore the nexus between emotions and the human body. James traveled widely in Europe, meeting with philosophers and psychologists and participating in the Society for Psychical Research. The result of this experience is evident in The Will to Believe (1897), in which James showed considerable sympathy for the way science and faith might be combined to offer a better understanding of the human personality. Although he never abandoned his belief in empiricism, he vigorously investigated the claims of spiritualists and the practices of Christian Scientists. This desire to reconcile the ideas of science and religion culminated in his masterpiece, VARIETIES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, which explored the psychological and practical bases of religious experience without denigrating the idea of faith itself.

James's great contribution to American philosophy is the concept of PRAGMATISM, a term first used by the philosopher C. S. Peirce and developed by James in Pragmatism (1907). This book advanced the argument that ideas have significance only insofar as they have an impact on the world of experience. Pragmatism has often been cited as the only original contribution to philosophy made by an American. The concept has been discussed as an example of the American devotion to practicality: that is, no idea is important if it is not useful. James also wrote essays, most notably “The Moral Equivalent of War” (1910), which reflects his liberalism, his dedicated search to find alternatives to the inhumanity of war, and his belief that the mind could be disciplined to avoid violence.

Sources

- Gale, Richard M. The Divided Self of William James. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Garrison, Jim, Ron Podeschi, and Eric Bredo, eds. William James and Education. New York: Teachers College Press, 2002.
- Menand, Louis. The Metaphysical Club. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2001.
- Putnam, Ruth Anna, ed. The Cambridge Companion to William James. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Simon, Linda. Genuine Reality: A Life of William James. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1998.
- William James*. <<http://www.des.emory.edu/mfp/james.html>> (viewed November 8, 2006).

Jewett, Sarah Orne (1849–1909) short-story writer, novelist

In the life of each of us, I said to myself, there is a place remote and islanded, and given to endless regret or secret happiness.

—The Country of the Pointed Firs (1896)

Sarah Orne Jewett was born in South Berwick, Maine, where she spent much of her life and which she wrote about extensively, calling her birthplace Deephaven in her fiction. She came from a distinguished New England family and was especially close in childhood to her father, a physician. Jewett's first novel, The Country Doctor (1884), is a fictionalized account of their relationship. Dr. Jewett introduced his daughter to literature and fostered her keen perception of her native region. Jewett began writing children's stories in 1868, and that same year her first sketch was accepted for publication by THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. In 1873 the magazine published "The Shore House," the first of a series of LOCAL-COLOR sketches later collected as Deephaven (1877). Jewett developed a writing formula that seduced readers from the outset, and she enjoyed critical and popular success throughout her career. She found an influential mentor early in William Dean HOWELLS, who edited The Atlantic Monthly.

The novels and stories Jewett published between 1885 and 1896 made her one of the most important writers of the local-color movement. Through use of such narrative techniques as the implied narrator, who observes and comments on events without entering into them directly, she was able to imbue her stories with a gentle irony that she combined with keen observations about both the local landscape and the people who lived there. Her most characteristic tone is one of nostalgia, specifically for the time when New England was home to thriving shipbuilders, fleets of ships, and prosperous merchants. What makes her work so effective, however, is its contrast of this past with the present, which offers up a landscape peopled largely with aging widows and spinsters left behind by industrialization, urbanization, and the movement westward. Jewett's most accomplished work, The Country of the Pointed Firs (1896), is a series of loosely connected stories describing the interplay between a decaying Maine seaport and its summer tourists.

Jewett's patrician background provided an entrée to Boston literary circles, where she met Annie Adams Fields, wife of the publisher James T. FIELDS. After Jewett's husband's death in 1881, Annie Fields became her closest companion, and the two women wintered together in Boston and summered in Manchester, Massachusetts. Together they developed a literary salon and traveled to Europe, where they were entertained by a wide array of literary celebrities. When she was home in South Berwick, Jewett continued to live with her sister and her widowed mother.

Even after her most productive period had passed, Jewett continued to turn out fiction of high caliber, such as "The Queen's Twin." In 1902, however, her career was cut short by a carriage accident that injured her spine. Jewett's mastery of local-color writing provides a link between the New England regionalist stories of her literary forebear, Harriet Beecher STOWE, and the romanticized realism of Willa Cather (1873–1947), who found in Jewett's work a "perfection that endures."

Sources

- Kilcup, Karen L., and Thomas S. Edwards, eds. Jewett and Her Contemporaries: Reshaping the Canon. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1999.
- Sherman, Sarah Way. Sarah Orne Jewett, An American Persephone. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1989.
- Silverthorne, Elizabeth. Sarah Orne Jewett: A Writer's Life. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1993.

Judson, E. Z. C. (circa 1821–1886) novelist, short-story writer, editor

Best known by one of his pen names, Ned Buntline, Edward Zane Carroll Judson was born in Delaware County, New York. Shortly after moving to Philadelphia in his early teens, Judson quarreled with his father and went to sea. At age seventeen, after rescuing several people from drowning, Judson was made acting midshipman by President Martin Van Buren. He published his first story anonymously in THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE in 1838 and in the mid 1840s began using the name Ned Buntline. After unsuccessful attempts to establish his own magazine and a series of life-threatening run-ins with the law, Judson settled in New York City and began churning out the adventure novels for which he became famous. He also briefly managed to publish his magazine, Ned Buntline's Own, as a forum for anti-immigrant and anti-Catholic politics. As one of the leaders of the Astor Place Riot in 1849, during which over twenty people were killed, Judson served a yearlong prison term. Judson spent the rest of the prewar years lecturing, editing newspapers, publishing novels occasionally, courting legal trouble, and marrying women—sometimes before divorcing others. After a two-year enlistment in the Union army during the CIVIL WAR, Judson produced dozens of DIME NOVELS while also lecturing on nativism and temperance—even though he was a hard drinker. After meeting William F. Cody in Nebraska in 1869, Judson wrote a series of novels and a play that were largely responsible for creating the legendary persona Buffalo Bill. By the time of his death Judson had written perhaps hundreds of adventure novels and an equal number of shorter pieces.

Sources

Johannsen, Albert. "Edward Zane Carroll Judson," in his The House of Beadle and Adams and Its Dime and Nickel Novels: The Story of a Vanished Literature. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1950, pp. 56–62, 167–176.

Pond, Fred E. The Life and Adventures of "Ned Buntline." New York: Cadmus Book Shop, 1919.

—Brett Barney

Jackson, Charles (1903–1968) novelist, short-story writer

Charles Jackson, who battled alcoholism and writer's block, is best known for his novel The Lost Weekend (1944), a case study of five days in the life of an alcoholic. It became a successful movie directed by Billy Wilder and starring Ray Milland. Jackson's other work includes the novels The Fall of Valor (1946), which deals with a married man's latent homosexuality; The Outer Edges (1948), about the impact of a newspaper article on its readers; and A Second-Hand Life (1967), about a nymphomaniac. His short stories are collected in The Sunnier Side: Twelve Arcadian Tales (1950) and Earthly Creatures (1953).

Source

Crowley, John W. The White Logic: Alcoholism and Gender in American Modernist Fiction. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994, pp. 135–157.

—Tilly Newell

The Jazz Age

This term for the 1920s was provided by F. Scott FITZGERALD who titled his 1922 short-story collection TALES OF THE JAZZ AGE. The label designated an era of ebullience, confidence, prosperity, and celebration. The Jazz Age ended with the stock-market crash in 1929. Fitzgerald published his retrospective assessment "Echoes of the Jazz Age" in 1931.

Source

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. "Echos of the Jazz Age," in The Crack-Up, edited by Edmund Wilson. New York: New Directions, 1945.

—Morris Colden

Jeffers, Robinson (1887–1962) poet, dramatist

*And boys, be in nothing so moderate as in love of man, a clever servant, insufferable master.
There is the trap that catches noblest spirits, that caught—they say—
God, when he walked on earth.*

—"Shine, Perishing Republic" (1925)

While Robinson Jeffers was born in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, he is associated with the rugged California coastline where he lived for more than forty years and that provided the chief inspiration for his poetry. One of America's most powerful and original poetic voices, Jeffers in his works celebrated the natural world and influenced ecologically minded poets such as Mary Oliver and Gary Snyder. For many of his contemporaries, however, Jeffers's reputation over the course of his career went from admired author to reviled crank.

Raised in a strict Presbyterian family, Jeffers had an extraordinary education. His father, a clergyman and professor of theology, taught him Latin and Greek and sent him to boarding schools in Switzerland and Germany. He entered college early and graduated in 1905 from Occidental College in California, where he edited and wrote poetry for the college literary magazine. In the next five years he studied literature and medicine at the University of Zurich and the University of Southern California, receiving an M.A. from the latter in 1910. He then did graduate work in forestry at the University of Washington. His studies of the physical world laid the foundation for his poetic practice. As an adult, Jeffers retained a gloomy opinion of human nature while rejecting traditional Christianity for his form of pantheism.

Robinson Jeffers, circa 1939, on Hawk Tower, an addition to his home

Jeffers's first collections, Flagons and Apples (1912) and Californians (1916), were undistinguished and received no notice from reviewers. In the latter half of the decade he apprenticed himself as a stonemason to help in the construction of his home, which he called Tor House, a primitive granite cottage on a wind-swept promontory along the Monterey coast. Jeffers lived in Tor House, completed in 1919, with his wife and twin sons. On his own he built a separate addition, Hawk Tower, which he worked on from 1920 to 1924. Living in a wild place on the edge of the continent influenced Jeffers profoundly, and he wrote all of his major work at his home. His wife explained that "at the age of thirty-one there came to him a kind of awakening such as adolescents and religious converts are said to experience."

In Tamar and Other Poems (1924), his first major work, Jeffers departed from traditional forms and time-worn ideas and won a national audience. In the long narrative title poem he adapts the fertility cycle myth of Ishtar and Tammuz to tell a story of a contemporary California family that is destroyed by incest. Written in Jeffers's characteristic long accentual lines, Tamar suggests that humanity is not the center of the universe and is headed for annihilation. Extending the ideas of Friedrich Nietzsche and Oswald Spengler, Jeffers declares that the universe is a creative god-force of energy and matter, working in violent cycles from birth to death. Humans, self-aware and self-regarding, are the god-force's mistake to rectify. The individual can join the god-force by "unfocusing" from human concerns. This "unfocusing" is the main component of Jeffers's philosophy.

The critical response to Jeffers's subsequent poetry collections was uneven. Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems (1925) garnered glowing predictions, but The Women at Point Sur (1927) was poorly received as critics found the narrative of its mad preacher baffling and too dismissive of traditional morality. Responses were more positive to Cawdor and Other Poems (1929)—which includes the poem "Hurt Hawks," with the line, "I'd sooner, except the penalties, kill a man than a hawk"—and Dear Judas and Other Poems (1929), Thurso's Landing and Other Poems (1932), and Give Your Heart to the Hawks and Other Poems (1933). Critics became less receptive to his philosophy and work in collections such as Solstice and Other Poems (1935), Such Counsels You Gave Me (1937), and Be Angry at the Sun (1941). Jeffers retained a readership among young people caught between two world wars looking for meaning. In his foreword to The Selected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers (1938), a collection that went through eleven printings, Jeffers promised "not to say anything because it was popular . . . unless I myself believed it; and not to believe easily."

In the years before WORLD WAR II, Jeffers preached isolationism, which nearly destroyed his reputation. When The Double Axe & Other Poems was published in 1948, Random House included a "Publishers' Note" in which the firm went "on record with its disagreement over some of the political views pronounced by the poet in this volume." The making and unmaking of Jeffers's contemporary reputation is as much philosophical as political and is linked to the development of his credo of "Inhumanism." In his preface to The Double Axe & Other Poems, Jeffers describes his attitude as "a shifting of emphasis and significance from man to not-man; the rejection of human solipsism and recognition of the transhuman magnificence." Although he claimed that his approach was "neither misanthropic nor pessimist," he acknowledged that "two or three people have said so and may again." Jeffers was less prolific as a poet in the years after the war, though he did have success as a dramatist with his free adaptation of Euripides' Medea, which ran for the 1947–1948 Broadway season, and The Tower Beyond Tragedy (produced 1950). The last original collection of poetry he published during his lifetime was Hungerfield and Other Poems (1954).

—Audra Himes

Principal Books by Jeffers

- Flagons and Apples*. Los Angeles: Grafton, 1912.
Californians. New York: Macmillan, 1916.
Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.
The Women at Point Sur. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927
Cawdor and Other Poems. New York: Liveright, 1928.
Dear Judas and Other Poems. New York: Liveright, 1929.
Descent to the Dead. New York: Random House, 1931.
Thurso's Landing and Other Poems. New York: Liveright, 1932.
Give Your Heart to the Hawks and Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1933.
Solstice and Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1935.
Such Counsels You Gave to Me & Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1937.
The Selected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers. New York: Random House, 1938.
Be Angry at the Sun. New York: Random House, 1941.
Medea: Freely Adapted from the Medea of Euripides. New York: Random House, 1946.
The Double Axe & Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1948
Hungerfield and Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1954.
The Beginning & the End and Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1963.
Robinson Jeffers: Selected Poems. New York: Random House, 1965.
The Selected Letters of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Ann Ridgeway. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1968.
The Collected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Tim Hunt. 5 volumes. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1988, 1989, 1991, 2000, 2001.
The Selected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Tim Hunt. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2001.
The Wild God of the World: An Anthology of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Albert Gelpi. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2003.

Studying Robinson Jeffers

Robinson Jeffers's reputation rests on the merit of both his short lyric poems and his lengthy narratives and verse dramas. The lyrics, however, are the proper starting place for the study of Jeffers, as they succinctly capture the nature of his worldview, which he called "Inhumanism." The lyric poem "The Answer" offers the most concise, fundamental, poetic expression of this worldview: "Integrity is wholeness, the greatest beauty is / Organic wholeness, the wholeness of life and things, the divine beauty of the universe. Love that, not man / Apart from that." Jeffers aimed to mimic the integrity he observed in his natural surroundings in his life and in his art.

Jeffers set down and adhered to three poetic edicts throughout his career. A poem, he felt, must be rhythmic, unaffected, and must deal with what he called "permanent things." Consequently—in contrast to much of the poetry of his modernist contemporaries—his lyrics are never obscure, and students should focus on his careful and distinct handling of meter, diction, and tone, as well as natural imagery, mythical allusions and figurative language. The lyrics "To the Stone Cutters," "Boats in a Fog," "Science," "Hurt Hawks," "The Beauty of Things," "The Excesses of God," "Cassandra," "The Old Stonemason," "The Deer Lay Down Their Bones," and "Birds and Fishes," all included in Robinson Jeffers: Selected Poems (1965), will acquaint readers with the persistent themes and style that pervade his work beginning with Californians (1916), his second book. Selected Poems also includes ROAN STALLION, an appropriate initiation into the study of Jeffers's narratives.

Title page for Jeffers's first book, a collection of love lyrics

Students seeking a larger overview will find The Wild God of the World: An Anthology of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Albert Gelpi (Stanford: Stanford University Press, 2003), most helpful. This collection complements essential lyric poems and Roan Stallion with an additional verse narrative, Cawdor, as well as key prose pieces and Jeffers's 1934 letter to Sister Mary James Power, which contains a revealing summary of his religious outlook.

The publication of The Collected Poetry of Robinson Jeffers, edited by Tim Hunt (1988–2001), greatly facilitated the study of Jeffers's writing. The five-volume collection includes not only Jeffers's published poetry but also his essays, a large selection of unpublished writings, and a detailed commentary on the individual pieces, based on careful analysis of Jeffers's original manuscripts.

Also in opposition to the modernist aesthetic, Jeffers's life and art were tightly knit, and James Karman's Robinson Jeffers: Poet of California (Brownsville, Ore.: Story Line Press, 1996) is a concise, edifying critical biography, illustrating the immeasurable impact that the poet's wife, Una, and the California coast had on him. The Selected Letters of Robinson Jeffers, 1897–1962, edited by Ann Ridgeway (1968), which includes not only early love letters to Una but also abundant correspondence with friends and admirers, such as the poet George STERLING, is an indispensable resource.

Several in-depth studies concerning various aspects of Jeffers's work are available to students. Jeffers's philosophical influences are the major focus of Radcliffe Squires's The Loyalties of Robinson Jeffers (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956) and Arthur Coffin's Robinson Jeffers, Poet of Inhumanism (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1971). William Nolte's Rock and Hawk: Robinson Jeffers and the Romantic Agony (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1979) treats Jeffers as a Romantic. In addition, William Everson's The Excesses of God: Robinson Jeffers as a Religious Figure (Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press, 1988) offers a provocative analysis of the mysticism in Jeffers's poetry. Robert Brophy's Robinson Jeffers: Myth, Ritual, and Symbol in His Narrative Poems (Hamden, Conn.: Shoestring Press, 1976) is the most authoritative study of the major narratives. Robinson Jeffers and a Galaxy of Writers, edited by William B. Thesing (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995), collects essays that explore Jeffers's affinities with other authors. The most current scholarship regarding Jeffers is available on the Robinson Jeffers Association website (<<http://www.jeffers.org>>), which also includes the most comprehensive and up-to-date bibliography available.

—John Cusatis

Jewish American Literature

Twentieth-century Jewish American literature begins with Abraham CAHAN's classic novel, The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), which raises the question of assimilation and success: Can Jews still be Jews and fit comfortably into American life? While all immigrant groups have faced the question of assimilation, for Jews, given their history of persecution in so many countries, the idea of finding acceptance in America is both exhilarating and frightening. In America, Jews have the opportunity, should they so wish, to assimilate. Thus, in Cahan's novel, David Levinsky comes to America from Russia. A devout student of the Talmud, he decides to compete in secular society. He works in the garment industry and educates himself. With success he achieves the American dream, but at the end of the novel he questions what remains of his Jewishness and of his spiritual life.

Cahan's novel remains a part of the American canon because the author captured the mood of the early twentieth century in moving prose. David Levinsky epitomizes the melting-pot metaphor that dominated the literature of the American experience, and he took his place among other classic American heroes striving for success in the world of business.

By the 1930s, the Jewish American novel and the country had changed considerably. The GREAT DEPRESSION challenged American optimism. With millions of people out of work, the promise of American capitalism seemed to vanish. Michael GOLD, editor of New Masses, the American Communist Party's powerful literary journal, expressed a radical view of the American economy and its institutions in Jews without Money (1930). Powerful, though sometimes sentimental, portrayals of Jews in tenements on the Lower East Side of New York City replaced the melting-pot plot of accomplishment and prosperity. Gold applied a Marxist analysis to society, indicting an America that had betrayed the working class. Most Jews were poor and would remain so, his work implied, until fundamental changes were made in society.

In the theater, Clifford ODETS explored Jewish family life in terms of this new radicalized view of America. In Awake and Sing! (produced 1935), for example, a middle-class Jewish Bronx family's fate is linked to its tenuous place in a Depression-era economy. In Waiting for Lefty (produced 1935), Odets captured the militancy of striking workers who refuse to accept the status quo. Odets was part of the GROUP THEATRE, an organization composed primarily of Jewish writers, directors, and actors who attempted to meld left-wing politics with art. Unlike Cahan's work, however, the work of Gold's and Odets's generation tended to subordinate questions of Jewishness to political questions about working-class life and the exploitation of the poor by the rich capitalist class. The writings that came to be called PROLETARIAN LITERATURE featured working-class heroes. Daniel FUCHS's Williamsburg trilogy follows the lives of poor Jewish immigrants in Brooklyn. There are no political messages in Fuchs.

Almost in a special category is Henry ROTH's novel Call It Sleep (1934). Roth combined much of the NATURALISM of the 1930s writers who dealt with social and ethnic issues with the modernist attitude of James Joyce. His novel is told from the point of view of a Jewish boy who grows up in America to watch the painful confrontation of his parents with American life. Unlike Gold, however, Roth does not blame society or focus exclusively on material conditions. His searing psychological portraits suggest a view of society predicated on his awareness that the world is, in good part, what his characters choose to make of it. They are driven by inner demons as much as by outer forces. Certainly environment shapes character in Roth's novel, but it is also character that interprets environment. Roth's novel, poorly received and then forgotten, was rediscovered in the late 1950s when a new generation of Jewish writers was searching for a model of how to express both their Jewishness and their connection to American life.

Even as writers such as Gold, Odets, Fuchs, and Roth concentrated on urban Jews and their plight in an exploitatively political and economic system, others, such as the critic Lionel TRILLING, rose out of a Jewish background to take their places in important institutions of American society. In the late 1930s and 1940s, Trilling embraced the Anglo-Saxon and European traditions in literature, writing a morally engaged and rather traditional literary criticism that conveyed a much more ambiguous view of the world that rejected the militancy of proletarian writers. Notable literary figures of the Thirties and Forties included Irwin Shaw, Budd Schulberg, Ben Hecht, Delmore Schwartz, and Nathanael West.

Source

Chametsky, Jules, ed. Jewish American Literature: A Norton Anthology. New York: Norton, 2001.

Walden, Daniel, ed. Twentieth-Century American-Jewish Fiction Writers, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 28. Detroit: Brucoli Clark, Layman/Gale Research Company, 1984.

John Brown's Body by Stephen Vincent Benét

(Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1928) poem

Stephen Vincent BENÉT's John Brown's Body won the PULITZER PRIZE for poetry in 1929 and was a best-seller that has been in print ever since. This book-length poem of the American Civil War was perhaps the first truly American verse epic and certainly the first of the twentieth century. Divided into eight books that each feature at least one major military event, John Brown's Body gave detailed portraits of historical figures such as Brown, Abraham Lincoln, and Robert E. Lee, along with fictional characters including slaves, farmers, soldiers, and their families. Critics admired how Benét was sympathetic to both sides of the conflict, which was an unusual approach at a time when many books about the war showed a clear bias against the South.

Source

Izzo, David Garrett and Lincoln Konkle, eds. Stephen Vincent Benet: Essays on his Life and Work. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003.

—David G. Izzo

Johnny Got His Gun by Dalton Trumbo (Philadelphia & New York: Lippincott, 1939) novel

TRUMBO's Johnny Got His Gun is set in WORLD WAR I and shows the horror of modern warfare. After Joe Bonham, the protagonist, volunteers to serve his country, an exploding shell destroys his arms, legs, and face as well as his senses, except for the sense of touch. Blind, mute, and deaf, he struggles to understand what has happened to him as he remembers events of his life in flashbacks. At one point he imagines that he could become an "educational exhibit": "People wouldn't learn much about anatomy from him but they would learn all there was to know about war. That would be a great thing to concentrate war in one stump of a body and to show it to people so they could see the difference between a war that's in newspaper headlines and liberty loan drives and a war that is fought out lonesomely in the mud somewhere a war between a man and a high explosive shell." At the climax of this story Joe finds a way to communicate with a nurse through Morse code.

—Michael MacBride

Johnson, Georgia Douglas (1877?–1966) poet, playwright

Georgia Douglas Johnson studied music at Oberlin College, taught school, and became a principal, a wife, and a mother long before she published her first poems in THE CRISIS in 1916 and began to collect the poems that made her the most celebrated and prolific female poet of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. A lyric poet whose work was often compared to the work of Sara TEASDALE, Johnson published four volumes of poetry—The Heart of a Woman (1918), Bronze (1922), An Autumn Love Cycle (1928), and Share My World (1962)—but some critics argue that her genius lies in the plays she began writing in 1926. She received awards for two plays—Blue Blood (produced 1927), in which two mothers discuss class and color before the planned wedding of their children, and Plumes (produced 1928), a folk tragedy about the mistrust of modern medicine within the black community—and left records indicating that she had written at least two dozen plays.

Source

Gates, Henry Louis. Selected Works of Georgia Douglas Johnson: African American Writer, 1910–1940. New York: G.K. Hall, 1997.

—KaaVonia Hinton

Johnson, James Weldon (1871–1938) novelist, poet, anthologist

The son of a self-educated father who worked as a waiter and the first black woman public school teacher in Florida, James Weldon Johnson was brought up in a middle-class environment in which learning was valued. A year after graduating from Atlanta University in 1894, he founded the Daily American, a newspaper for the African American community in his native Jacksonville. Although the newspaper lasted only eight months, Johnson's industry recommended him to older leaders such as Booker T. WASHINGTON and W. E. B. DU BOIS. Johnson then established a successful law practice in Jacksonville and became principal of the Stanton School. Moving to New York, he collaborated with his brother, composer John Rosamond Johnson, on songs, the most notable of which was "Lift Every Voice and Sing" (1900). Just as he had studied law with a white lawyer, Johnson took up the systematic study of literature with a renowned white critic, Brander Matthews, at Columbia University. Johnson's breakthrough as a writer came with THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN EX-COLORED MAN (1912), one of the seminal texts in African-American literature. From 1920 to 1930, Johnson served as executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a demanding post that nevertheless did not wholly consume his energies. An important figure of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, Johnson published the anthologies The Book of American Negro Poetry (1922), The Book of American Negro Spirituals (1925), and The Second Book of American Negro Spirituals (1926). This work fed his own creativity, and he produced the moving and beautifully constructed God's Trombones: Seven Negro Sermons in Verse (1927), which has often been staged. From 1930 until his death in an automobile accident in 1938, Johnson taught at Fisk University as a professor of literature and creative writing. During this period he published Black Manhattan (1930), a survey of the cultural scene; his autobiography, Along This Way (1933); Negro Americans: What Now? (1934), in which he argued vigorously for integration and cooperation among the races; and Saint Peter Relates an Incident: Selected Poems (1935).

Sources

Fleming, Robert E. James Weldon Johnson. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Oliver, Lawrence J., ed. Critical Essays on James Weldon Johnson. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.

Johnson, Josephine (1910–1910) novelist, short-story writer, autobiographer

Josephine Johnson's first novel, Now In November (1934), the story of life on a Midwestern farm, won a PULITZER PRIZE. Her REGIONALISM is also reflected in her story collection Winter Orchard (1935) and the novel Jordanstown (1937), about a Midwestern newspaperman during the GREAT DEPRESSION. Her other books include a collection of poetry, Years End (1939); The Inland Island (1969), a nonfiction work based on her observations of nature during the course of a year on her Ohio farm that was compared to Henry David Thoreau's Walden; and Seven Houses: A Memoir of Time and Places (1973).

Source

Kocks, Dorothee E. Dream a Little: Land and Social Justice in Modern America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

The Josephine Perry Stories (1930–1931) short stories

F. Scott FITZGERALD published five stories in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST about Josephine Perry, a Chicago teenager, inspired by Ginevra King, with whom he was in love at Princeton. The stories trace flirtations on which she expends her emotions. He collected "First Blood," "A Nice Quiet Place," and "A Woman with a Past" in TAPS AT REVEILLE (1935). But he omitted the best Josephine story, "Emotional Bankruptcy."

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Basil and Josephine Stories, edited by Jackson R. Bryer and John Kuel. New York: Scribners, 1973.

—Morris Colden

Josephson, Matthew (1899–1978) editor, critic, historian, biographer

Matthew Josephson began his career in Paris editing Secession (1922–1924), which featured expatriate writers of the LOST GENERATION. He established his reputation as a critic with two books, Zola and His Time (1928) and Portrait of the Artist as American (1930), which argued that Americans such as Henry James and James McNeil Whistler had to go abroad to develop their talents. The Robber Barons (1934) was an influential history of American industrialists. Josephson later wrote biographies, including Stendahl (1946) and Edison (1959). Josephson published two memoirs that are guides to the early literary history of the twentieth century: Life Among the Surrealists (1962) and Infidel in the Temple: A Memoir of the Nineteen-Thirties (1967).

Source

Shi, David E. Matthew Josephson, Bourgeois Bohemian. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981.

The Jungle by Upton Sinclair (New York: Doubleday, Page, 1906) novel

UPTON SINCLAIR's muckraking masterpiece, The Jungle, exposes the reality of the Chicago meatpacking industry at the turn of the century. Researched when Sinclair went undercover as a worker in a meatpacking plant in the Chicago stockyards, the novel relates the story of Jurgis Rudkus, a Lithuanian immigrant who is at first hopeful about his move to America but is destroyed by the corruption and horrid working conditions of the meatpacking plants. Jurgis and his wife, Ona, struggle to support themselves and their family, but the forces of poverty and oppression are strong. Jurgis's only hope comes when he becomes a Socialist at the end of the novel. The Jungle had such a strong impact on Americans that national legislation, the Pure Food and Drug Act and the Meat Inspection Act, came about within months of its publication.

Source

Mookerjee, Rabindra Nath. Art for Social Justice: The Major Novels of Upton Sinclair. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1988.

—Crystal McCage

The Just and the Unjust by James Gould Cozzens

(New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1942) novel

James Gould COZZENS's The Just and the Unjust is set in an unspecified Northeastern state—probably Pennsylvania—and covers three days in the 1939 trial of two men for murdering a drug dealer. The central figure is Assistant District Attorney Abner Coates, a dull man with a strong sense of duty and responsibility. The trial turns on the felony-murder rule, which holds all the participants in a crime that results in murder guilty of murder—not just the killer. Although Coates has a solid case, the jury refuses to find the two nonkillers guilty of first-degree murder because the actual murderer is dead.

—Morris Colden

Jackson, Shirley (1916–1965) novelist, short-story writer

Born in San Francisco and educated at Rochester University in New York, Shirley Jackson earned a B.A. from Syracuse University in 1940. Jackson published her first novel, The Road through the Wall, in 1948. She followed that with a collection of stories, The Lottery (1949), which includes the frequently anthologized title story, often cited as an example of American Gothic. Jackson bridged the gap between serious literature and popular fiction in suspenseful novels often about extraordinary occurrences, including The Haunting of Hill House (1959), Hangsaman (1951), The Sundial (1958), and We Have Always Lived in the Castle (1962). Jackson also wrote the children's books The Witchcraft of Salem Village (1956) and Nine Magic Wishes (1963) and a play, The Bad Children (1959). Like The Lottery, much of Jackson's other work presents disturbed characters and occult experiences within the context of vividly realized domestic, everyday settings. Jackson's fiction and nonfiction is often humorous. She described her life at home with her children in Life among the Savages (1953) and Raising Demons (1957). After her death her husband edited two collections: The Magic of Shirley Jackson (1966) and Come Along with Me (1968), which includes her last, unfinished novel.

Sources

Friedman, Lenemaja. Shirley Jackson. Boston: Twayne, 1975.
Hall, Joan Wylie. Shirley Jackson: A Study of Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1993.
Oppenheimer, Judy. Private Demons: The Life of Shirley Jackson. New York: Putnam, 1988.

Jarrell, Randall (1914–1965) poet, critic

A native of Nashville, Tennessee, Randall Jarrell was educated at Vanderbilt University, where he studied under John Crowe Ransom. When Ransom moved to Kenyon College, Jarrell followed and taught there for two years. He served in the air force in WORLD WAR II, an experience that influenced his poetry, including the much anthologized "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner," which appeared in Little Friend, Little Friend (1945). This first collection was followed by Losses in 1948. Jarrell was particularly attentive to prosody and has often been compared to Robert Frost for his ability to link traditional forms of poetry to colloquial speech. Like Frost, Jarrell excelled in the dramatic monologue, featured in his The Woman at the Washington Zoo (1960). His later poems, like those of his contemporaries Robert LOWELL and John BERRYMAN, became more confessional, as in "The Lost World" and "Thinking of the Lost World," collected in The Lost World (1965).

Jarrell's standing as a literary critic is as high, if not higher, than his ranking as a poet. His reputation as a critic is based on two volumes: Poetry and the Age (1953) and A Sad Heart at the Supermarket (1962), which established sound readings of modern poets, especially Robert Frost. He published one novel, Pictures from an Institution (1954), a satire of the academic world. Like Lowell and Berryman, his friends and competitors, Jarrell led an intense, troubled life devoted to poetry and its promulgation. It is still an open question whether his death (the result of being struck by a car) was an accident or a suicide. No Other Book (1999) collects the best of Jarrell's nonfiction. Mary Von Schrader Jarrell, Jarrell's wife, published Remembering Randall: A Memoir of Poet, Critic, and Teacher Randall Jarrell in 1999.

Sources

- Bryant Jr., J. A. Understanding Randall Jarrell. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1986.
- Burt, Stephen. Randall Jarrell and His Age. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.
- Travisano, Thomas. Midcentury Quartet: Bishop, Lowell, Jarrell, Berryman, and the Making of a Postmodern Aesthetic. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1999.

J.B. by Archibald MacLeish (1958) play

Archibald MacLeish's verse drama J.B., which had a 364-performance run at the ANTA Theatre in New York, won the Pulitzer Prize for Drama in 1959. Inspired by MacLeish's desire to articulate his frustrations at a "world in which men and women and children suffer and die by millions in holocausts which seemingly take no account of humanity," the play recasts the Biblical story of Job for the twentieth century, ultimately concluding that man's only armor in an unjust world is love.

Source

- MacLeish, Archibald. J.B. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1958.
—Paul Kareem Tayyar

Jin, Ha (1956– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet

Born Xuefei Jin in 1956, award-winning novelist and short-story writer Ha Jin grew up in the Liaoning province of China and witnessed firsthand Mao Tse-tung's Cultural Revolution. He enlisted in the Chinese army at the age of fourteen, working at a telegraph office, and attended Heilongjiang University, receiving a B.A. in 1981, and Shangdong University, where he received an M.A. in 1983.

In 1985 he moved to the United States to attend Brandeis University and, following the Tiananmen Square massacre in summer 1989, elected to stay in order to pursue his writing career; he earned his Ph.D. from Brandeis in 1992. His first short-story collection, Ocean of Words (1996), won the PEN/Hemingway Award for first fiction, and his second, Under the Red Flag (1997), won the Flannery O'Connor Award. His novel Waiting (1999), which won both the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD for fiction, is the story of a thoughtful Chinese doctor caught between the Chinese tradition of his parents and the Maoist ideology of the time of the novel. Critics compared the lean, bleak lyricism of the novel to the work of Anton Chekhov. Jin followed his 1999 success with The Crazy (2002) and War Trash (2004), which won the PEN/Faulkner Award.

Source

- Nelson, Liza. "Ha Jin: An Interview with Liza Nelson," Five Points: A Journal of Literature and Art, 5 (Fall 2000): 52–67.

—Marshall Boswell

Joe Turner's Come and Gone by August Wilson

(produced 1986) play

Set in 1911 in an African American boardinghouse in Pittsburgh, Joe Turner's Come and Gone is August WILSON's award-winning tale about displacement and the need for community. First performed at the Yale Repertory Theater in 1986, the play moved to Broadway in 1988 and went on to win Best Play of the Year from the New York Drama Critics' Circle.

Almost all of the main characters are African Americans who have left the Jim Crow South in search of freedom in the industrial North. But the city they have chosen "flexes its muscles" and leaves them isolated, confused, and searching "for ways to reconnect, to reassemble, to give clear and luminous meaning to the song which is both a wail and a whelp of joy." The play's hero, Herald Loomis, is a thirty-two-year-old man who, after being falsely imprisoned, has just finished a seven-year term on Joe Turner's chain gang, followed by another four years searching for his wife. When he arrives at the boardinghouse, he is described as a "man driven not by the hellhounds that seemingly bay at his heels, but by his search for a world that speaks to something about himself."

Wilson has called Joe Turner's Come and Gone his favorite play. Arranged into two concise acts, the play addresses historicized issues usually associated with novels, including the trauma of slavery and the atavistic presence of African myth.

Sources

- Bogumil, Mary L. Understanding August Wilson. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.
- Wilson, August. Joe Turner's Come and Gone. New York: New American Library, 1988.

—Marshall Boswell

Johnson, Denis (1949– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet

I really enjoy writing novels. . . . You can just build a boat and take off. I can't understand why anybody would criticize anything that ends up being a novel because you've arrived to the other shore, you've made it alive. Maybe you started off for Africa and ended up in Spain, but so what?

—Interview (2003?)

Denis Johnson was born in Munich, West Germany, and grew up in Tokyo and in Manila before moving, as a teenager, to Alexandria, Virginia. He published his first book of poetry, The Man among the Seals, in 1969 while still an undergraduate at the University of Iowa, from which he earned his M.F.A. in poetry in 1971. Johnson's verse and prose are notable for their bleak outlook and dreamlike surrealism. His most important works of fiction are Angels (1983), a road novel in the tradition of Jack KEROUAC; Fiskadoro (1985), a postapocalyptic nightmare that employs science-fiction techniques; Resuscitation of a Hanged Man (1991), a surreal updating of the Catholic-existentialist novel as perfected by Walker PERCY; and the acclaimed short-story cycle Jesus' Son (1992), which includes eleven linked stories narrated by a nameless heroin addict. In 2006 the book was voted one of the twenty-five most important works of fiction of the last twenty-five years (1980–2005) by the New York Times Book Review. Already Dead: A California Gothic (1997) is about a “relentless failure” who hopes to solve his problems by planting marijuana on the land he inherited and smuggling cocaine. The Name of the World (2000), a PEN/FAULKNER AWARD finalist, is about a man who must face life in the aftermath of an automobile accident in which his wife and child were killed. The Throne of the Third Heaven of the Nations Millennium General Assembly, a collection of poetry, was published in 1995. Johnson's first published drama, Shoppers: Two Plays (produced 2002), comprises two works that, in the publisher's words, “present a dramatized field guide to some of the more dysfunctional and dysphoric inhabitants of the American West.” Tree of Smoke (2007) is set during the VIETNAM WAR.

—Marshall Boswell

Johnson, Diane (1934– ) novelist, biographer, critic

Born in Illinois, Diane Johnson has spent her professional life in California, where she has taught at the University of California, Los Angeles and Davis campuses. Beginning in the mid 1990s she has divided her time between homes in Paris and San Francisco, an arrangement reflected in her novels since then. Her fiction focuses on many different subjects, including Mormonism, Los Angeles, small California towns, Paris, the victimization of women, and Iran on the eve of revolution. Her tone also ranges from the comic to the farcical to the terrifying to the apocalyptic. Fair Game (1965) is her first novel, followed by Loving Hands at Home (1968), Burning (1971), The Shadow Knows (1974), Lying Low (1978), and Persian Nights (1987). She has published two biographies: Lesser Lives (1972), a biography of the wife of novelist George Meredith; and Dashiell Hammett: A Life (1983). Johnson is best known for her three social comedies that deal with romantic relationships and cultural differences among Americans living in Paris and the native-born French: Le Divorce (1997), Le Mariage (2000), and L'Affaire (2003). A frequent contributor to the NEW YORK REVIEW OF BOOKS, she collected her essays in Terrorists and Novelists (1982). She also wrote the script for The Shining (1980), a movie adaptation of the Stephen King novel.

Jones, Gayl (1949– ) novelist, playwright

Born in Lexington, Kentucky, Gayl Jones has used the state as a setting for much of her work. She began writing stories in grade school and wrote poetry at Connecticut College, where she won two awards for her work and received a B.A. in 1971. With M.A. (1973) and D.A. (1975) degrees from Brown University, she wrote her first two novels, Corregidora (1975) and Eva's Man (1976), which were edited by Toni MORRISON at Random House. She has also written plays, including Chile Woman (produced 1974). She left a teaching career at the University of Michigan in 1983, retreating from the literary scene but continuing to write about African American culture, especially its oral traditions. Her work combines anthropological and literary sensibilities. Her plays have attracted notice for their ritualistic qualities and their reliance on the African American tradition of call and response used in sermons when the congregation answers or echoes the preacher's words. Corregidora remains her signature work because of its comprehensive exploration of the African American family and the relationship between men and women. She published White Rat, a short-story collection, in 1977. Two novels, The Healing (1998) and Mosquito (1999), followed collections of her poetry: Song for Anninho (1981), The Hermit Woman (1983), and Xarque and Other Poems (1985). Jones's poetry is especially attuned to the rhythms of jazz and the blues. In Liberating Voices: Oral Tradition in African American Literature (1991), she discusses the work of Morrison, Paul Laurence Dunbar, Langston Hughes, Shirley Anne Williams, Zora Neale Hurston, Jean Toomer, Ann PETRY, and Ralph ELLISON. Jones has been both praised and blamed for her frank and brutal criticisms of African American men, especially in her novels that examine their abuse of African American women.

Source

Coser, Stelamaris. Bridging the Americas: The Literature of Paule Marshall, Toni Morrison, and Gayl Jones. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995.

Jones, James (1921–1977) novelist

The only one of my contemporaries who I felt had more talent than myself was James Jones. And he has also been the one writer of any time for whom I felt any love.

—Dust jacket blurb by Norman Mailer

An Illinois native, James Jones enlisted in the army in 1939 after graduating from high school. He was sent to Hawaii and saw action on Guadalcanal Island, which provided material for his best-selling and critically acclaimed novel, FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (1951). His novel is regarded as one of the best novels of WORLD WAR II, although it ends with the attack on Pearl Harbor. Jones followed this success with Some Came Running (1957) and The Pistol (1959), which was well received. After considerable reflection, Jones produced a sequel to From Here to Eternity, The Thin Red Line (1962), which is a meticulous study of men in combat during the war. Jones spent much of his later writing career in Paris. He completed the last volume of his combat trilogy, Whistle, in 1978.

Sources

Garrett, George P. James Jones. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984.

Giles, James R. James Jones. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Jong, Erica (1942– ) poet, novelist, autobiographer

There were 117 psychoanalysts on the Pan Am flight to Vienna and I'd been treated by at least six of them. And married a seventh.

—Fear of Flying (1973)

Erica Jong was raised in Manhattan and is a graduate of Barnard College. In 1965 she earned a master's degree at Columbia University. Jong has written a sizeable and well-regarded body of poetry—including Fruits and Vegetables (1971) and Ordinary Miracles (1983)—but she earned fame with her sensational and controversial novel Fear of Flying (1973), in which her frankness about sex rivaled the work of such male authors as Henry Miller. Her humor was bold, and the explicitness of the language amused and outraged readers. Jong's other fiction has been overshadowed by her early success, although Fanny, Being the True History of Fanny Hackabout Jones (1980) has been acclaimed for demonstrating Jong's ambition to impose a feminine perspective on Henry Fielding's Tom Jones.

Jong is at her best when demonstrating her gift for the comic. Her other novels include How to Save Your Own Life (1977), Any Woman's Blues (1990), and Sappho's Leap (2003). She has published two memoirs, Fear of Fifty: A Memoir (1994) and Seducing the Demon: Writing for My Life (2006).

Sources

Erica Jong website: <<http://www.ericajong.com/>> (viewed January 30, 2007).

Templin, Charlotte. Feminism and the Politics of Literary Reputation: The Example of Erica Jong. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1995.

Jordan, June (1936–2002) poet, novelist, biographer

Born in Harlem and raised in the Bedford-Stuyvesant section of Brooklyn, June Jordan attended the Northfield School for Girls in Massachusetts. While at Barnard College she met and married a white student, Michael Meyer, and accompanied him to the University of Chicago, where she studied anthropology. Jordan came of age as a writer in the 1960s and 1970s, contributing to periodicals such as Essence, EVER-GREEN REVIEW, the Nation, Partisan Review, the Village Voice, Black World, and the NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW. Jordan established her reputation with her first book, Who Look at Me (1969), a probing look at interracial relations in a white-dominated society.

Jordan began writing novels and biographies for children, including His Own Where (1971) and Fannie Lou Hamer (1972). She published poetry, essays, lectures, and articles and wrote plays, including In the Spirit of Sojourner Truth (produced 1979) and For the Arrow That Flies by Day (produced 1981). An educator, a feminist, and a political writer, Jordan believed in instilling pride in African American children, in fostering freedom of sexual orientation, and in the efficacy of activism. Her work has been compared to Toni MORRISON, Toni Cade BAMBARA, Nikki GIOVANNI, and Amiri BARAKA. Her roots, however, were in the black militancy of the 1960s—as exemplified by Eldridge CLEAVER and Malcolm X. Her Affirmative Act: Political Essays was published in 1998.

The Joy Luck Club by Amy Tan (New York: Putnam, 1989) novel

Amy TAN's first novel is a cycle of interrelated stories in which four Chinese women and their American-born daughters exchange stories while playing mah-jongg, eating dim sum, and investing in stocks. The title, The Joy Luck Club, refers to the name the mothers gave to the club upon its inauguration in 1949.

The novel's framing narrator, Jing-Mei "June" Woo, has been asked to take the place of her mother, Suyuan Woo, at the mah-jongg table after the mother's death two months prior. As the novel proceeds, the stories shift in focus between tales of the daughters' drive to assimilate to their new homeland and tales of the mothers' desire to sustain traditional Chinese customs. In "Queen Mother of the Western Skies," the mothers offer tales of reconciliation, a strategy that is reinforced by June's position as both one of the daughters and her mother's stand-in at the mah-jongg table. The novel ends with June traveling to China to meet the twin daughters from her mother's first marriage. June learns that her proper name, Jing-mei, combines the Chinese words for "pure essence" and "younger sister," thus emphasizing her connection to her two sisters and her embodiment of a dual, Chinese/American heritage.

Sources

Adams, Bella. Amy Tan. Manchester, U.K.: Manchester University Press, 2005.

Huntley, E. D. Amy Tan: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

—Marshall Boswell

Jubilee by Margaret Walker (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1966) novel

Winner of the 1965 Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship Award, Margaret WALKER's Jubilee is an historical novel about the life of an irrepressible mulatto slave named Vvry as she transitions from plantation life to the qualified freedom of the Reconstruction Era. Walker, already a well-respected poet, built the novel from extensive research and from stories of slave life told to her by her grandmother, whose own mother was the direct source for the character of Vvry.

The novel opens with Vvry's conception by a sexually abused slave named Hetta and her white owner, John Morris Dutton. As Vvry grows older, her resemblance to John, as well as to his legitimate daughter, Lillian, becomes impossible to ignore, igniting the ire of his wife, Salina. Vvry later meets and falls in love with a powerful free black man named Randall Ware but is thwarted when she tries to escape the plantation with her children to be with him. The Civil War breaks out, but before he can join the fight, John dies of gangrene contracted from a fall from a horse. Vvry stays on the plantation with Salina until the end of the war, when she strikes out on her own with a hardworking former slave named Innis Brown. Jubilee is a landmark work of historical fiction as it provides an alternative view of the Southern Civil War experience.

Source

Walker, Margaret. How I Wrote Jubilee. Chicago: Third World Press, 1972.

—Marshall Boswell

Just, Ward (1935– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Ward Just has carved out a distinctive place in American literary circles for his novels set in the politically charged atmosphere of Washington, D.C. Time and again his work explores the contradictions between the public and private lives of the American political elite. The product of a newspaper-publishing dynasty, he was born just outside of Chicago in 1935. In 1965, after a decade of working as a political correspondent, he traveled to Saigon to cover the VIETNAM WAR. That experience served as the basis for his first book, To What End: Report from Vietnam (1968). Two years later he published his first novel, A Soldier of the Revolution (1970), which was followed by his first major critical and commercial success, the short-story collection The Congressman Who Loved Flaubert and Other Washington Stories (1973). His other novels include A Family Trust (1978), In the City of Fear (1983), The American Ambassador (1987), Jack Gance (1989), Echo House (1997), An Unfinished Season (2004), and Forgetfulness (2006). The best of his stories can be found in Twenty-One Selected Stories (1990).

Source

Nelson, Michael. "Ward Just's Washington," Virginia Quarterly Review: A National Journal of Literature and Discussion, 74 (Spring 1998): 205–220.

—Marshall Boswell

Justice, Donald (1925–2004) poet

Born in Florida, Donald Justice earned his M.A. at the University of North Carolina and his Ph.D. at the University of Iowa. Justice was admired for his poetic craftsmanship. Commenting on Justice's Selected Poems (1979), which won a Pulitzer Prize, Dana Gioia commented that the collection "reads almost like an anthology of the possibilities of contemporary poetry. . . . There are sestinas, villanelles and ballads rubbing shoulders with aleatory poems [composed using chance methods], surreal odes, and . . . free verse. . . . A new technique is often developed, mastered, and exhausted in one unprecedented and unrepeatable poem." Less prolific than many of his contemporaries, Justice approached each of his collections with a carefully wrought approach to new material. His works include The Summer Anniversaries (1960), Tremayne (1984), and The Sunset Maker (1987). His essays appear in Platonic Scripts (1984), A Donald Justice Reader: Selected Poetry and Prose (1991), and Oblivion: On Writers & Writing (1998).

Source

Gioia, Dana, and William Logan, eds. Certain Solitudes: On the Poetry of Donald Justice. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1997.

K

Key, Francis Scott (1779–1843) poet, pamphleteer, translator

Francis Scott Key is best known for the poem he composed during the WAR OF 1812 that became the national anthem of the United States. He was born in Frederick, Maryland, August 9, 1779, the son of Ann Phoebe Charlton and Philip Ross Key. He attended St. John's College in Annapolis and later read law with a noted Maryland attorney. After passing the bar, Key opened legal offices with his brother-in-law Roger Taney, who later became chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. Following Key's marriage in 1802 to Mary Taylor Lloyd, descendant of two noted Maryland families, he moved his growing family—which eventually included eleven children—to Washington, D.C., where he joined the law practice of his uncle, Philip Barton Key.

In 1814, in the midst of the War of 1812, Key tried to secure the release of a prisoner, Maryland doctor William Beanes, who was being held on a British man-of-war in the Chesapeake Bay. Key was aboard the British prison ship when the enemy began its assault on Fort McHenry. Trapped, Key watched the battle from the deck, alternately fascinated and horrified by the bombardment.

Upon his release Key immediately wrote a poem that expressed the emotion he felt as the attack was waged and the Americans successfully resisted it. When Key showed this poem, “The Defence of Fort M’Henry,” to a local judge, his colleague insisted on arranging for its publication in the Baltimore American. Soon after, the poem was set to the tune of the popular English drinking song, “To Anacreon in Heaven.” Later, it became known by one of the poem's own synonyms for the American flag: “The Star-Spangled Banner.” The nation's armed forces considered “The Star-Spangled Banner” the national anthem for most of the nineteenth century. It first became official, however, by executive order of President Woodrow Wilson in 1916, an order endorsed by act of Congress in 1931.

Although the poem records a moment of triumph, Key intended it as a prayer of thanksgiving rather than an expression of exuberant patriotism. Key was far from confident, as the battle raged, that the Americans could hold the fort. The poem asks, Does the flag still wave? It is God's intercession, according to Key, that saves the flag, and ensures the American victory over tyrannical forces: “Blest with victory and peace, may the heaven-rescued land / Praise the power that hath made and preserved us as a nation. . . .” A common element in Key's poems is the intertwining of religion and patriotism. “The Defence of Fort M’Henry” ends:

*Then conquer we must, for our cause is just,
And this be our motto: “In God is our trust.”
And the star-spangled banner forever shall wave
O’er the land of the free and the home of the brave!*

This same connection is found in “Song,” “Hymn for the Fourth of July, 1832,” and “Sunday School Celebration July Fourth 1833.” Key's belief that God favored America over all nations appears in his speeches as well as in his poems. In an address to the Washington Society, he asserted that Americans “should acknowledge and praise the Power that defended them.” An active member of the American Colonization Society and an advocate for restrictions on the slave trade, Key linked humane treatment of African Americans with the continuing strength of the nation. In an address to Congress in 1842 he evoked the imagery of the “Star-Spangled Banner,” declaring "When that standard flings forth its folds over the destitute and abandoned . . . then does it achieve a higher triumph than its proudest battles have ever won."

Key produced a slim volume of poems, many of which are patriotic while others focus on natural or classical themes. Although a few are satirical, his "Lord, With Glowing Heart I'd Praise Thee," which provided the lyrics for a popular Protestant hymn, is far more typical. Key's literary work did not distract him from his legal and political career. In 1833 he accepted a presidential appointment to negotiate settlements between the U.S. government and the Creek Indians of Alabama. From 1833 to 1841 he served as the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia. He remained active in several political societies until his death from pleurisy January 11, 1843.

Works

Key, Francis Scott. "Defence of Fort M'Henry," The Club, 1 (October 6, 1814).

Key. Poems of the Late Francis S. Key, Esq.: Author of "The Star Spangled Banner": with an Introductory Letter by Chief Justice Taney. New York: R. Carter, 1857.

Sources

Bates, Helen Dixon. Francis Scott Key. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1936.

Meyer, Sam. Paradoxes of Fame: The Francis Scott Key Story. Annapolis: Eastwind, 1995.

Molotsky, Irvin. The Flag, the Poet, and the Song: The Story of the Star-Spangled Banner. New York: Dutton, 2001.

King Philip's War (1675–1676)

Metacomet, the Wampanoag sachem, called "King Philip" by the British, led a thirteen-month war against English settlements. Territorial conflicts between the New England tribes and the British led to war when three Wampanoag accused of the January 29, 1675, murder of John Sassamon were executed on June 8, 1675. Sassamon was a Christian and former assistant to Metacomet, who had warned the English colonists of impending Indian attacks. The Wampanoag were joined in battle by the NARRAGANSETT, Nipmuck, and, briefly, the Mohawk. By spring 1676, food shortages and disease caused the tribes to retreat west. In the end more than three thousand Native Americans and one thousand colonists had died, and nearly half of the ninety English towns were attacked and thirteen destroyed. King Philip's War (also called Metacomet's War) thus marked a turning point in Native-Anglo relations and precipitated the elimination of Native populations in the New England region. King Philip's War is mentioned in several early American writings, including Increase MATHER's Brief History of the War with the Indians in New England, in 1676 (1676); William Hubbard's Narrative of the Troubles with the Indians (1677); Mary White ROWLANDSON'S NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAU-

RATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON; and Daniel GOOKIN'S Historical Collections of the Indians in New England (1792).

Sources

Drake, James D. King Philip's War: Civil War in New England, 1675–1676. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2000.

Lepore, Jill. The Name of War: King Philip's War and the Origins of American Identity. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Knight, Sarah Kemble (1666–1727) travel writer, diarist

Wee advanced on towards Seabrook. The Rodes all along this way are very bad, Incumbred wth Rocks and mountainous passages, wch were very disagreeable to my tired carcass; but we went on with a moderate pace wch made the Journy more pleasant.

—The Journal of Madame Knight (1825)

Sarah Kemble Knight was born in Boston on April 19, 1666, one of perhaps a half-dozen children of Elizabeth Trevice and Thomas Kemble, a merchant. In 1689 she married Richard Knight, a shipmaster and London agent for an American company, with whom she had one daughter, Elizabeth, who was born in Boston on May 8, 1689. With Richard Knight frequently away at sea, Sarah Knight successfully managed both domestic and business affairs. After her husband died around 1706, she never remarried. Knight then settled into a house on Moon Street which she had inherited from her father. Her household included her widowed mother, her daughter, and several lodgers. She supplemented the income she received from her boarding house by running a school and as a copier of legal documents.

Knight's literary reputation rests on the entertaining forty-page travel diary she kept when, at the age of thirty-eight, she began an adventurous trip from Boston to New York and New Haven. This journal represents her only written work and is thought to be one of the most authentic records of eighteenth-century colonial life in America. On October 2, 1704, Knight embarked on the six-month journey, when she was called to New Haven to settle her cousin Caleb Trowbridge's estate on behalf of his widow, a journey which she measured as "about two-hundred miles." Knight was the first known woman to make such a journey unaccompanied. As she traveled on horseback, hiring guides and finding accommodations in inns and private homes along the way, she vividly described the difficulties and surprises of the journey in her diary, from dinner with the governor of Connecticut to an evening in the drafty hut of a poor farm family. The journal is more than a record of the primitive transportation networks of colonial society, however. It is also filled with humorous portraits of early Americans, from pompous judges to country bumpkins, and with accounts of eighteenth-century social life, including raucous late-night arguments in taverns and the unpolished manners of backwoods farmers. Knight returned to home to her mother and daughter in Boston on March 3, 1705.

In 1825, Theodore Dwight published Knight's travel narrative in The Journals of Madam Knight, and Rev. Mr. Buckingham, from the Original Manuscripts, Written in 1704 and 1710 as part of larger plan to highlight "American" literature that was distinctive in style and content from British and European literatures. Given the unique circumstance of a woman traveling for business and without a male relative as chaperon, readers assumed it was a work of fiction—or, if it were genuine, the diary of a man. The journal was the product of a woman of wit and intelligence, well read and well versed in the literary trends of her day. Critics note that the poetic entries reflect the author's familiarity with Dryden and the prose sections suggest a solid knowledge of Elizabethan romances. For most of the journal's popular audience, however, the appeal lies in its humorous portraits of Americans and its often harrowing accounts of travel in the colonies.

When her daughter Elizabeth married in 1713 and moved to New London, Connecticut, Knight followed her. Knight supported herself in her new home by a variety of enterprises, running a shop, a tavern, and an inn in nearby Norwich. She also began to speculate in land and had a number of tenants from whom she collected rents. She had amassed a considerable estate by the time of her death on September 25, 1727.

Work

Knight, Sarah Kemble. The Journals of Madam Knight, and Rev. Mr. Buckingham, from the Original Manuscripts, Written in 1704 and 1710, edited by Theodore Dwight. New York: Wilder & Campbell, 1825. Reprinted as The Journal of Madame Knight, in Colonial American Travel Narratives, edited by Wendy Martin. New York: Penguin, 1994, 51–75; Early American Imprints, second series, 21135.

Keckley, Elizabeth (circa 1818–1907)

memoirist

Elizabeth Keckley was born into slavery in Hillsborough, Virginia. She was an extraordinary seamstress, and in 1855 she was able to take advantage of her master's promise that, after his death, she could buy her and her son's freedom by borrowing money from customers for whom she had sewed. She moved to Washington, D.C., in 1860 and established a reputation as the most accomplished dressmaker in the city, serving the wives of government officials, including Varina Davis, wife of Jefferson Davis; Adele Douglass, wife of Stephen Douglass; and, most significantly, First Lady Mary Todd Lincoln, with whom she forged a close friendship. Keckley was an active supporter of freed blacks; she founded and served as president of the First Black Contraband Relief Organization in 1862. In 1868 Keckley published a memoir, Behind the Scenes, or Thirty Years a Slave and Four Years in the White House, which described her life and revealed personal information about Mrs. Lincoln, such as the severe debt she faced following the president's assassination. Mrs. Lincoln was offended by these revelations and by the inclusion of some of her letters. Mary Lincoln's son, Robert, pressured Keckley's publisher into withdrawing the book.

In 1892 Keckley accepted a position teaching sewing at Wilberforce University in Ohio and represented the university at the Chicago World's Fair in 1893. She returned to Washington in 1898 and lived until her death at the National Home for Destitute Colored Women and Children, which she had helped found in 1863.

Sources

Braxton, Joanne M. Black Women Writing Autobiography: A Tradition within a Tradition. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.

Foster, Francis Smith. Written by Herself: Literary Production by African American Women, 1746–1892. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

Kemble, Frances Anne (1809–1893) diarist

Born into a stage family in London, England, Fanny Kemble made her acting debut at the age of thirteen. In 1832, while on a two-year acting tour of the United States with her father, she began keeping a journal, which she later published as Journal by Frances Anne Butler (1835). Rather than return to England with her father, in 1834 Kemble married Pierce Butler, a wealthy man from a prominent Southern family, and settled in Philadelphia. After inheriting two large slaveholding Georgia plantations, Butler and his wife visited them during the winter of 1838–1839. Kemble, an outspoken abolitionist, was appalled by the treatment of the slaves there, particularly by the practice of forcing slave women back into the fields three weeks after they had given birth. She recorded her observations in a journal that she prepared for publication over the objections of the Butler family. Although she acceded to her husband's demand that she not publish the journal to support the abolitionist cause (see ABOLITIONISM), her outspoken opposition to slavery caused the family to ban her from the plantation, further damaging an already rocky marriage. After a lengthy proceeding Kemble and her husband were divorced in 1849, and in 1863, hoping to influence British public opinion against the Confederacy, she published her Journal of a Residence on a Georgia Plantation, 1838–1839.

Kemble supported herself in the United States and Britain primarily through public readings, although she continued to write plays, poetry, criticism, an autobiography, and a novel, Far Away and Long Ago (1889), set near her home in the Berkshire Mountains. She is said to have supplied some of the inspiration for Nathaniel Hawthorne's character Zenobia in THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE (1852) and for Henrietta Buckmaster's 1948 historical novel, Fire in the Heart.

Sources

Clinton, Catherine. Fanny Kemble's Civil Wars. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.

Furnas, J. C. Fanny Kemble: Leading Lady of the Nineteenth-Century Stage: A Biography. New York: Dial Press, 1982.

Jenkins, Rebecca. Fanny Kemble: A Reluctant Celebrity. London & New York: Simon & Schuster, 2005.

Ransome, Eleanor, ed. The Terrific Kemble: A Victorian Self-Portrait from the Writings of Fanny Kemble. London: Hamilton, 1978.

Kennedy, John Pendleton (1795–1870) novelist

Born in Baltimore, John Pendleton Kennedy was a lawyer by profession and a writer by avocation. Disliking the practice of law, he entered politics, serving in the United States Congress as a representative and as Speaker of the House. He also worked in the administrative branch as President Millard Fillmore's secretary of the navy. In the latter position he was instrumental in Commodore Matthew Perry's 1853 expedition to Japan and in Elisha Kent Kane's second Arctic expedition (1853–1855).

Literature, however, was Kennedy's abiding interest. His first important work, a series of sketches titled Swallow Barn, or A Sojourn in the Old Dominion (1832), is the first significant fictional treatment of Virginia plantation life. Kennedy published this work and others under the pen name Mark Littleton. His political writing was often satirical, as in Quodlibet (1840), which concerns Jacksonian democracy. Many critics consider his best work to be Rob of the Bowl: A Legend of St. Inigoe's (1838), an historical novel set in 1681 in St. Mary's City, the first capital of Maryland. Kennedy's last important literary endeavor was an 1849 two-volume biography of William Wirt, one of Andrew Jackson's political opponents.

Sources

Bohner, Charles H. John Pendleton Kennedy, Gentleman from Baltimore. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1961.

Ridgely, J. V. John Pendleton Kennedy. New York: Twayne, 1966.

King, Clarence (1842–1901) science writer

Born in Newport, Rhode Island, and educated at Yale, King rode horseback across the country to work in the mines of the Comstock Lode in Nevada and in California. From 1866 to 1877 he worked as federal geological surveyor of an area stretching from eastern Colorado to California. This work resulted in a seven-volume report (1870–1880) that was praised for its detail and exactitude. During this period King also wrote his most popular work, a series of sketches collected as Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada (1872). In 1871 King met Henry Adams in Colorado; their friendship is said to have influenced Adams's subsequent emphasis on scientific thinking and his novel Democracy (1880). From 1878 to 1881 King headed the U.S. Geological Survey, after which he continued to turn out both scientific works and scientifically accurate popular works.

Sources

Wilkins, Thurman. Clarence King: A Biography. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1988.

Wilson, Robert. The Explorer King: Adventure, Science, and the Great Diamond Hoax—Clarence King in the Old West. New York: Scribner, 2006.

King, Grace Elizabeth (circa 1852–1930) short-story writer

The past is our only real possession in life. It is the one piece of property of which time cannot deprive us; it is our own in a way that nothing else in life is. . . . In a word, we are our past; we do not cling to it, it clings to us.
—Memories of a Southern Woman of Letters (1932)

New Orleans native Grace Elizabeth King used her realistic short fiction to record impressions of her hometown's Creole culture as it existed during the CIVIL WAR and Reconstruction. A Southerner with Confederate sympathies, King resented fellow New Orleanean George Washington Cable's privileging of "colored people over white," "quadroons over Creoles." As a counter, she wrote her first story, "Monsieur Motte" (1886), later published with a series of related pieces as Monsieur Motte (1888). After returning from an extended European tour, during which she associated with French realists, King produced Balcony Stories (1893), the short-story collection considered to be her masterpiece. King also published several competent histories and novels, but her specialty was realistic short fiction with a distinctive French Creole flavor.

Sources

Bush, Robert. Grace King: A Southern Destiny. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.

Vaughan, Bess. "A Bio-Bibliography of Grace Elizabeth King," Louisiana Historical Quarterly, 17 (Oct. 1934): 752–770.

—Brett Barney

Kirkland, Caroline M. (1801–1864) short-story writer, essayist, editor

The granddaughter of the poet Joseph Stansbury, Caroline Matilda Stansbury was born in New York City, where she received a classical education. In 1828 she married William Kirkland, an educator with whom she established a girls' school in Geneva, New York. In 1835 the couple moved to Detroit, where Caroline Kirkland taught at a girls' seminary that her husband headed. The Kirklands moved again two years later, establishing the frontier town of Pinckney, Michigan. Caroline Kirkland found her new surroundings culturally bare but sociologically interesting, and she offered up her observations in satirical letters sent to her friends back east. These letters later formed the backbone for the series of humorous sketches about frontier life that she published in 1839 under the title A NEW HOME—WHO'LL FOLLOW? using the pen name Mrs. Mary Clavers. Her later works about frontier life included a series of essays published as Forest Life (1842) and a story collection called Western Clearings (1845).

In 1843 the Kirklands returned to New York, where William's death in 1846 left Caroline the sole supporter of their five children. She went to work as a literary professional, editing the Union Magazine in 1847 and then producing a steady stream of essays about diverse issues, such as prison reform and women writers.

Sources

Kolodny, Annette. The Land before Her: Fantasy and Experience of the American Frontiers, 1630–1860. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.

Osborne, William S. Caroline M. Kirkland. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Knickerbocker Group

In honor of Washington IRVING's Knickerbocker History of New York (1809), this name has been bestowed on a loosely organized association of writers who lived and worked in New York City in the first half of the nineteenth century. Among the group's "members" were Irving, James Fenimore COOPER, William Cullen BRYANT, Lydia Maria CHILD, and Fitz-Greene HALLECK. These writers, who published in THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE, helped to increase the importance of New York as a literary center and to influence the development of a national literature. Critics often described their sophistication as superficial, as in Edgar Allan POE's essay "The Literati of New York City" (1846).

The Knickerbocker Magazine (1833–1865)

periodical

The publishing firm Peabody and Company launched the Knickerbocker Magazine in 1833 as a monthly literary magazine to promote developing American literature.

Named in tribute to famous New Yorker Washington IRVING and his fictional Diedrich Knickerbocker, the magazine reflected New York's significant role in the growth of American fiction and poetry. The magazine also featured writers from New England and reflected an interest in the American West.

Though the Knickerbocker floundered during its first year, under the control of new owners, Lewis Gaylord Clark and Clement M. Edson, the magazine began to flourish in 1834. Clark took over as editor, a position he held for more than twenty-five years. During his editorship and largely because of his monthly "Editor's Table," the magazine became famous for its humor. The column, which occupied nearly half of every issue, incorporated a variety of material: news from correspondents; book reviews and notices; items from newspapers; jokes; and comments on drama, art, and music. Like the rest of the magazine, the "Editor's Table" was strongly committed to the promotion of American literature and arts. The Knickerbocker published the fiction and poetry of some of New York's most famous writers, including Irving, James Fenimore COOPER, and William Cullen BRYANT. Other members of the KNICKERBOCKER GROUP appeared in its pages as well, including James Kirke PAULDING and Fitz-Greene HALLECK. From New England, the magazine published Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, and John Greenleaf WHITTIER. In retrospect, one of the magazine's most important contributions was the May 1839 publication of Jeremiah N. Reynolds's "Mocha Dick," from which Herman MELVILLE later drew for his MOBY-DICK. Though the Knickerbocker privileged American authors and literature, major British writers also appeared in its pages, among them Edward Bulwer-Lytton, William Wordsworth, and Robert Southey.

The Knickerbocker reached its greatest success by the late 1840s. Following Clark's retirement from the editorship in 1861, several attempts were made to revitalize it. With Charles Godfrey LELAND as editor, the magazine became solidly devoted to Republican politics. During this time, William Dean HOWELLS appeared in the magazine. Despite some success, Leland resigned as editor halfway through the CIVIL WAR, in 1863. In an about-face, John Holmes Agnew transformed the Knickerbocker into a copperhead magazine—a Northern publication that supported the South in the war. In the aftermath of this change and at the end of the war, the magazine changed names from the American Monthly Knickerbocker to the American Monthly. The last issue of the magazine appeared in the fall of 1865 under the title Fæderal American Monthly.

Source

Chielens, Edward E., ed. American Literary Magazines: The Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries. New York: Greenwood Press, 1986.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Kahn, Gus (1886–1941) lyricist

Born in Germany, Gustav Gerson Kahn came to America with his family when he was five years old. He grew up in Chicago and quickly found such success in writing songs and sketches for vaudeville that he dropped out of school. His big break came when Tin Pan Alley composer Egbert Van Alstyne invited him to collaborate on such songs as “Memories” (1915) and “Pretty Baby” (with Van Alstyne and Tony Jackson, 1916). During these same years, Kahn collaborated with composer Grace LeBoy, whom he married in 1915. While Kahn frequently traveled to New York to collaborate, he maintained his home in Chicago.

Kahn hit his stride in the 1920s when his catchy, colloquial lyrics captured the carefree spirit of the Jazz Age. In 1921 he collaborated on two songs that became standards: “Toot, Toot, Tootsie! (Goodbye),” written with Ernie Erdman, Ted Fiorito, and Robert A. King, and “Ain’t We Got Fun?” with Raymond Egan. He could also write romantic ballads, such as “I’ll See You in My Dreams” and “It Had to Be You,” both with Isham Jones in 1924. Jones’s melody for “It Had to Be You” was built, in typical Tin Pan Alley fashion, on simple musical phrases repeated at higher and lower intervals. Yet, Kahn’s lyric gives that musical formula a wry twist as it celebrates a beloved who is cross, bossy, yet endearing—“With all of your faults, I love you still.” Kahn’s most frequent collaborator during the 1920s was Walter Donaldson, with whom he wrote “My Buddy” (1922), “Carolina in the Morning” (1922), and “Yes, Sir, That’s My Baby” (1925). While Kahn and Donaldson had many individual hit songs, they collaborated on only one Broadway musical, Whoopee (produced 1928), which included the standards “Makin’ Whoopee” and “Love Me or Leave Me” (1927).

After the advent of talking pictures, Kahn reluctantly moved his family to Hollywood. There he wrote many movie musicals, such as Flying Down to Rio (1933), the first movie to pair Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, and One Night of Love (1934), the first movie to win an Academy Award for its musical score. Kahn died of a heart attack in 1941 and was memorialized in the only biopic to be made about a lyricist—I’ll See You in My Dreams (1951). Gus Kahn’s lyrics have proven remarkably durable. Kahn would have attributed that success to his ability to “express colloquially something that every young person has tried to say—and somehow can’t.”

Source

Furia, Philip. The Poets of Tin Pan Alley: A History of America’s Great Lyricists. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990, pp. 75–83.

—Philip Furia

Kalmar, Bert (1884–1947) lyricist

Like so many songwriters of his generation, Bert Kalmar grew up in poverty on New York’s Lower East Side. At the age of ten he had mastered the arts of juggling and prestidigitation well enough to run away from home and join a tent show as a magician. From there he went on to burlesque and vaudeville, where he wrote and performed comic skits and parodies of popular songs. Teamed with Jessie Brown, whom he married, Kalmar was a popular singing and dancing comedian until a knee injury ended his performing career and forced him to concentrate on songwriting. In the 1920s he met composer Harry Ruby, and together they collaborated on such hits as “Who’s Sorry Now?” (1923), “I Wanna Be Loved By You" (1928), and "Nevertheless (I'm in Love with You)" (1931).

After writing songs for Broadway shows and revues, including the Marx Brothers vehicle Animal Crackers (1930), Kalmar and Ruby migrated to Hollywood and spent the rest of their careers writing for movie musicals. They continued to write for the Marx Brothers, supplying both songs and script for Horse Feathers (1932) and Duck Soup (1933); yet, while they could create witty patter songs, they had their greatest success with songs of utter simplicity. Their biggest hit, "Three Little Words" (1930), is almost a parody of banal Tin Pan Alley songs that say nothing more than "I love you." When Hollywood paid tribute to Kalmar and Ruby with a biopic about their collaboration, the title of the movie was Three Little Words (1950).

Source

Furia, Philip. The Poets of Tin Pan Alley: A History of America's Great Lyricists. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990, pp. 236–237.

—Philip Furia

Kaufman, George S. (1889–1961) playwright, librettist, director

Satire is what closes on Saturday night.

—Kaufman aphorism

A complete man of the theater who devoted his life to writing and directing, George Simon Kaufman worked on an astonishing array of comedies, dramas, and musicals for some forty years. Born and raised in Pittsburgh, where in high school he worked on class plays, he worked as a salesman and a journalist before becoming the drama editor of The New York Times, a position he held until 1930, long after he had established his theatrical career.

Kaufman, who almost always worked with collaborators, wrote his first successful play, Dulcy (produced 1921), with Marc CONNELLY. He and Connelly wrote eight more plays together, often treating the foibles of marriage in comic fashion. Sometimes the wives were the target of humor and sometimes the husbands, as in To the Ladies! (produced 1922), in which a wife saves her husband's reputation. Two plays, Merton of the Movies (produced 1922) and the expressionistic Beggar on Horseback (produced 1924), exploit fascination with movie stars and making it rich in business. Between 1924 and 1948 Kaufman collaborated with Edna FERBER on six plays, including the major critical and commercial hits The Royal Family (produced 1927), Dinner at Eight (produced 1932), and Stage Door (produced 1936). All of these works merged comic and dramatic elements to explore richly drawn characters and social concerns. Before the end of the 1920s Kaufman also worked with Morrie Ryskind on the Marx Brothers plays The Cocoa- nuts (produced 1925) and Animal Crackers (produced 1928) and Ring LARDNER on June Moon (produced 1929). Kaufman's most notable early success as a director was Ben HECHT and Charles MACARTHUR's THE FRONT PAGE (produced 1928).

In the 1930s Kaufman and Ryskind wrote librettos for three musicals in collaboration with the songwriting team of George and Ira GERSHWIN: Strike Up the Band (produced 1930); OF THEE I SING (produced 1931), the first musical to win a PULITZER PRIZE; and Let 'Em Eat Cake (produced 1933). His work as a director included the musicals Flying Colors (produced 1932) and Face the Music (produced 1933), and John Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men (produced 1937). He also commenced an important collaboration with playwright and director Moss HART. They scored a popular success with their first effort, Once in a Lifetime (produced 1930), a satire about Hollywood. Their other plays include YOU CAN'T TAKE IT WITH YOU (produced 1936), a Pulitzer Prize-winning comedy about an eccentric family and THE MAN WHO CAME TO DINNER (produced 1939), based on the writer and radio personality Alexander WOOLLCOTT. Kaufman and Hart are linked in theatrical annals, although after the early 1940s they worked apart. Their collaborations are marked by wit, depth of character, and a perfect balance of cynicism and sentimentality.

In the 1940s and 1950s Kaufman had fewer notable successes. He directed My Sister Eileen (produced 1940), Guys and Dolls (produced 1950), and Romanoff and Juliet (produced 1957), and he continued to work with various collaborators, including John P. MARQUAND on The Late George Apley (produced 1944), Howard Teichmann on The Solid Gold Cadillac (produced 1953), and Leueen McGrath and Abe Burrows on Cole PORTER's musical Silk Stockings (produced 1955). Throughout his long career, this comic genius of the American stage and screen made many uncredited contributions to plays and movies that were in need of revision, additional scenes, and dialogue. The finest of Kaufman's works were nurtured in an American theater that no longer exists, but his plays, particularly those written with Hart and Ferber, continue to be frequently performed.

Source

Goldstein, Malcolm. George S. Kaufman: His Life, His Theatre. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

—James Fisher

Kelley, Edith Summers (1884–1956) novelist

During her lifetime Kelley published one novel, Weeds (1923), which documents the rigors of rural life in Kentucky, especially the plight of farm women. After nearly fifty years of neglect it was republished in the Lost American Fiction Series in 1972 and achieved recognition as a minor classic of naturalistic fiction. Kelley's second novel, The Devil's Hand, set in rural Southern California, was posthumously published in 1974.

—Morris Colden

Kelly, George E. (1887–1974) playwright

George Edward Kelly began his theatrical life as an actor and vaudevillian who wrote and acted in his own sketches. He shifted permanently to playwriting with The Torch-Bearers (produced 1922), a satire of amateur theatricals that became an enduringly popular community theater play.

The success of Kelly's The Torch-Bearers led to three more satiric comedies. The first, The Show-Off (produced 1924), offered an amusing collision between a feckless braggart and his disapproving mother-in-law. Darker in tone, the PULITZER PRIZE-winning CRAIG'S WIFE (produced 1925) focused on the acquisitiveness and social climbing of a middle-class woman who ultimately loses her husband over her selfishness. Daisy Mayme (produced 1926) presented the triumph of a vulgar, good-natured woman over her husband's disapproving sisters. These plays were among the most popular of the era. Both audiences and critics responded to Kelly's solid dramatic craftsmanship, keen observation of human foibles, and exploration of middle-class values and the psychological dilemmas of small-town, quintessentially American characters. Kelly's later plays generally failed to win critical approval or commercial success, perhaps because he moved away from the satiric humor found in his most popular work.

Source

Hirsch, Foster. George Kelly. Boston, Mass.: Twayne, 1975.

—James Fisher

Kenyon Review (1939– ) periodical

Founded at Kenyon College in 1939 by the poet and critic John Crowe RANSOM, this quarterly established its reputation by publishing the poetry and essays of distinguished writers such as Marianne MOORE and R. P. BLACKMUR as well as articles on music, painting, and aesthetics.

"The Killers" by Ernest Hemingway (1927) short story

Originally published in Scribner's Magazine and collected in Men Without Women (1927), "The Killers" illustrates Ernest HEMINGWAY's effective use of understatement and omission, conveying the subsurface essence of fear and stoic resignation identified with the author's best work. While Nick Adams sits in a Summit, Illinois, diner talking to George, the owner, gangsters Al and Max enter bullying and announcing their intention to kill boxer Ole Andreson, who is expected there for dinner. When Andreson fails to arrive, the gangsters leave, and Nick goes to a rooming house to warn him. Andreson thanks Nick but is determined not to resist whatever comes to him. "I got in wrong," he says. Nick finds Anderson's "waiting" while "knowing he's going to get it . . . too damned awful" to think about, and George advises, "you better not think about it."

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on Ernest Hemingway. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Reynolds, Michael. Hemingway: The American Homecoming. Cambridge, Mass.: Blackwell, 1992.

—John C. Unrue

Kilmer, Joyce (1886–1918) poet

Alfred Joyce Kilmer began his professional life as a high-school Latin teacher and then adopted the literary life, working as a poet, essayist, book reviewer, and editor. He attracted little attention until his "Trees" was published in 1913 in POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE. The poem, which begins "I think that I shall never see / A poem as lovely as a tree," was a popular success but has been ridiculed by critics for its strained metaphorical descriptions. Kilmer published two volumes of poetry before enlisting in the army during WORLD WAR I. He was killed at the second Battle of the Marne and was transformed into a symbol of poetic idealism struck down by war.

Kingsley, Sidney (1906–1995) playwright

One of the most versatile dramatists to emerge during the GREAT DEPRESSION, Sidney Kingsley was born in Philadelphia and educated at Cornell, where he wrote one-act plays for the campus dramatic society. He began his professional career as an actor but within a few years turned to playwriting. His first major play, Men in White (produced 1933), a three-act drama exploring the conflict between an idealistic medical intern and his wealthy fiancée, was produced by THE GROUP THEATRE, achieving commercial success and winning a PULITZER PRIZE in drama.

Kingsley's second drama, DEAD END (produced 1935), a naturalistic depiction of the lives of both rich and poor during the Depression, proved to be his most enduring achievement and is an emblem of the era. Among his subsequent plays were two costly failures Kingsley also produced and directed: Ten Million Ghosts (produced 1936), a pacifist drama pitting an idealistic poet against a munitions salesman, and The World We Make (1939), an adaptation of a Millen Brand novel that focused on the attempts of a mentally ill man to pursue a normal existence. Kingsley's fortunes recovered with The Patriots (produced 1943), a drama set during the formative years of the United States that presented the political differences of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton. Praised as a celebration of the rise of Jeffersonian democratic principles, the play won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award. Kingsley's interest in lives caught up in the unstoppable flow of cultural change is again apparent in Detective Story (produced 1949), a slice-of-life portrait of a night in a police station. Merging melodrama and naturalism, this dissection of the human toll resulting from a policeman's overzealous pursuit of justice is enriched by realistic characterizations of the various people passing through the station.

Kingsley won another New York Drama Critics Circle Award for Darkness at Noon (produced 1951), an anti-Communist melodrama adapted from Arthur Koestler's novel about the execution of a Soviet party loyalist for "political divergences." The protagonist recalls his involvement in Stalin's purges and, as he is led away to execution, apologizes to those murdered in the name of Communism and repudiates his belief in Marxist principles. The play was produced by the Playwrights' Company at the height of anti-Communist fervor in the United States. Kingsley's only other play that debuted in the 1950s was Lunatics and Lovers (produced 1954), a farcical comedy about a Broadway hotshot. His final play, Night Life (produced 1962), which he produced and directed, was a naturalistic drama that presented an assortment of people in a café reflecting on their problems.

Source

Demastes, William, ed. "Sidney Kingsley." American Playwrights, 1880–1945: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994, pp. 251–261.

—James Fisher

Klondike Gold Rush (1896)

When George Washington Carmack struck a large vein of gold in the Klondike region of the Yukon Territory in northwestern Canada, the find caused a stampede of gold miners to rush to the area. The gold rush reached its apex in 1898 and continued for several years. During this period the settlement of Dawson became a boomtown peopled with a broad spectrum of humanity that provided material for writers, among them the poet Robert Service and the journalist Joaquin Miller. Perhaps the best literary use of the hardships associated with traveling along the Yukon River and mining the frozen ground was made by Jack LONDON in such works as THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903) and WHITE FANG (1912).

Sources

Berton, Pierre. The Golden Trail: The Story of the Klondike Rush. Toronto: Macmillan of Canada, 1974.

Wharton, David. The Alaska Gold Rush. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1972.

Alfred A. Knopf (1915– ) publishing house

Founded in 1915 by Alfred A. Knopf (1892–1984) and his wife Blanche Wolf Knopf (1894–1966), the imprint had a distinguished literary list that included Willa CATHER, Langston HUGHES, and H. L. MENCKEN—whose journal THE AMERICAN MERCURY was published by the house from 1924 to 1934. Blanche Knopf was primarily responsible for the crime and detective fiction; her authors included Dashiell HAMMETT and Raymond CHANDLER. The firm published important foreign authors in translation, including Albert Camus, André Gide, Thomas Mann, and Sigrid Undset. The Knopf list also was strong in the fields of history, music, photography, and food and wine. The distinguished designers Frederick W. Goudy, Elmer Adler, and William A. Dwiggins made Knopf volumes recognizable for their design and typography. The Knopfs sold their firm to Random House in 1960.

Sources

Knopf, Alfred A. Publishing Then and Now, 1912–1964. New York: New York Public Library, 1964.

Oliphant, Dave, ed. The Company They Kept: Alfred A. and Blanche W. Knopf, Publishers: An Exhibition Catalog. Austin: Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, University of Texas at Austin, 1995.

Kober, Arthur (1900–1975) humorist, short-story writer, playwright, screenwriter

Arthur Kober was born in what was then the Austro-Hungarian Empire, but he was brought to New York City as a child and lived there, except for periods of work in Hollywood, for the rest of his life. He was married to the playwright Lillian HELLMAN from 1925 to 1932. His biggest success on Broadway was "Having Wonderful Time" (produced 1937), a comedy about New York office workers vacationing in the Catskills for which he also wrote the screenplay. The play drew on the vernacular sketches of city life that he had published for years in THE NEW YORKER. Many of Kober's stories were about the inveterate husband-hunter Bella Gross and her first-generation Jewish family in the Bronx, who appeared in such collections as Thunder Over the Bronx (1935), My Dear Bella (1941), and Bella, Bella, Kissed a Fella (1951). Kober's tales of the Hollywood agent Benny Greenspan are collected in That Man is Here Again (1946). The motion-picture projects Kober worked on included The Little Foxes (1941), Wintertime (1943), In the Meantime, Darling (1944), Don Juan Quiligran (1945), and My Own True Love (1949).

Koehler, Ted (1894–1973) lyricist

Born in Washington, D.C., but raised in New York City, Ted Louis Koehler dropped out of school at fourteen to work in his father's photoengraving shop. He was given piano lessons and soon was spending his nights playing in bars and clubs in Newark. In 1918 Koehler began writing songs as well as comic sketches for vaudeville. In 1929 composer Harry Warren introduced Koehler to the young composer Harold Arlen, who had a melody that needed a lyric, and Koehler proved himself a master of slangy, vernacular idioms when he wrote "Get Happy" (1930).

Koehler and Arlen went on to write songs such as “Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea” (1931), “I’ve Got the World on a String” (1932), and “I Gotta Right to Sing the Blues” (1932) for several revues, some staged at Harlem’s Cotton Club. Their biggest hit was “Stormy Weather” (1933). Koehler’s lyric is a wrenching lament woven out of such simple colloquial phrases as “Can’t go on, everything I have is gone.” After the partnership broke up in 1934, Koehler worked with various composers but never achieved the same success as with Arlen, whose music, steeped in blues and jazz, resonated beautifully with Koehler’s earthy lyrics.

Source

Jablonski, Edward. Harold Arlen: Happy with the Blues. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, 1961.

—Philip Furia

Krutch, Joseph Wood (1893–1970) literary critic, social commentator

Joseph Wood Krutch studied at the University of Tennessee and received a Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1923, where he taught for many years while also serving as a drama critic for The Nation. His most influential work of social criticism is The Modern Temper: A Study and a Confession (1929), a pessimistic assessment of contemporary culture in which he suggests that science has deprived the modern intellectual of confidence. His work complemented the sense of decadence apparent in works by such writers as T. S. ELIOT and Ezra POUND. Krutch’s literary works include Edgar Allan Poe: A Study in Genius (1926), Five Masters: A Study in the Mutations of the Novel (1930), Samuel Johnson (1944), Henry David Thoreau (1948), and “Modernism” in Modern Drama: A Definition and an Estimate (1953). After Krutch moved to Arizona in the 1950s, he became an interpreter and defender of the desert in such works as The Desert Year (1952), The Voice of the Desert: A Naturalist’s Interpretation (1955), and Forgotten Peninsula: A Naturalist in Baja California (1961). In The Measure of Man: On Freedom, Human Values, Survival and the Modern Temper (1954), which won the National Book Award for nonfiction, Krutch reassesses the skepticism and disbelief of The Modern Temper. His autobiography is More Lives Than One (1962).

Source

Margolis, John. Joseph Wood Krutch: A Writer’s Life. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980.

Kazin, Alfred (1915–1998) literary critic

Alfred Kazin grew up in Brooklyn, New York, and wrote about his Jewish American background in the autobiographical A Walker in the City (1951), considered one of the key texts of Jewish American literature in the 1950s. Kazin first earned renown for his literary criticism On Native Grounds (1942). Influenced by proletarian literature, his book discounted some acclaimed writers—including William Faulkner—judgments that Kazin later revised.

Although not an academic critic, Kazin taught at several colleges, including the State University of New York at Stony Brook and the City University of New York. Considered one of the New York Intellectuals, Kazin brought an urban sense to his writing about world literature. Unlike the New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM), he was concerned not with literature alone but with its social and psychological contexts.

Sources

Teres, Harvey M. Renewing the Left: Politics, Imagination, and the New York Intellectuals. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Wald, Alan M. The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930's to the 1980's. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987.

Keillor, Garrison (1942– ) novelist, essayist, short-story writer, radio personality

Be well, do good work, and keep in touch.

—Sign-off from radio show The Writer's Almanac

Born Gary Edward Keillor to a strict religious family in rural Anoka, Minnesota, Garrison Keillor adopted the name Garrison at age thirteen to craft a more literary persona. In 1966 he received his B.A. in English from the University of Minnesota, where he edited and wrote for the student publication Ivory Tower. Three years later Keillor began working at Minnesota Public Radio, and in 1974 he hosted the first broadcast of A Prairie Home Companion, the radio program for which he is best known. Since then he has divided his talents between radio and print media, publishing extensively in both.

A Prairie Home Companion, for which Keillor has won a Peabody Award and has been inducted into the Radio Hall of Fame, is a vaudeville-style variety show that includes live music, advertisements for imaginary products (such as Powdermilk Biscuits, which “give shy persons the strength to get up and do what needs to be done”), and skits about folks such as Guy Noir, Private Eye, and lonesome cowboys Dusty and Lefty. But it is the “News from Lake Wobegon,” Keillor’s fictional hometown, that anchors the show and has provided fodder for at least seven of his books, both novels—Lake Wobegon Days (1985), Wobegon Boy (1997), Lake Wobegon Summer 1956 (2001), and Pontoon (2007)—and short-story collections, including Happy to Be Here (1982) and Leaving Home (1987).

Keillor’s literary career spans genres from the novel to children’s writing to political essays, but most of his writing is comedic at the core. He has written or edited twenty books, including two anthologies of Good Poems (2002) and Good Poems for Hard Times (2005), culled from his weekday radio program, The Writer’s Almanac. Keillor’s writing for The New Yorker is both humorous and political, though he tends to mix the two; his essay collection, Homegrown Democrat (2004), delivers a serious political message.

Sources

Fedo, Michael. The Man from Lake Wobegon. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987.

Lee, Judith Yaross. Garrison Keillor: A Voice of America. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991.

Songer, Marcia. Garrison Keillor: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

—Amy Teekell

Kelley, William Melvin (1937– ) novelist, short-story writer

William Melvin Kelley grew up in New York City and was educated at Harvard, where he studied with Archibald MacLeish and John Hawkes. Kelley is best known for his first novel, A Different Drummer (1962), about a black sharecropper who destroys his farm and moves North. In this parable every black in this mythical Southern state follows his example, making it the first all-white state in the Union. In Dancers on the Shore (1964) Kelley explores what it means to be an African American writer. His other novels include A Drop of Patience (1965), dem (1967), and Dunfords Travels Every Wheres (1970).

Source

Ro, Sigmund. Rage and Celebration: Essays on Contemporary Afro-American Writing. Atlantic Highlands, N.J.: Humanities Press, 1984.

Kennedy, William (1928– ) novelist

I write this book not as a booster of Albany, which I am, nor as an apologist for the city, which I sometimes am, but rather a person whose imagination has become fused with a single place, and in that place finds all the elements that a man needs for the life of the soul. . . .

—O Albany! (1983)

Born and raised in Albany, New York, William Kennedy graduated from Siena College in 1949 and was a newspaperman until 1961. IRONWEED (1983), his fourth novel, earned him the Pulitzer Prize and was made into a movie. Part of Kennedy's Albany cycle, which also includes Legs (1975), Billy Phelan's Greatest Game (1978), Quinn's Book (1988), Very Old Bones (1992), The Flaming Corsage (1996), and Roscoe (2002), Ironweed exemplifies the author's attention to historical setting, local color, city corruption, immigrant life, and the assorted characters who inhabit an Irish Catholic, proletarian world. Ironweed is set in 1938 and centers on Francis Phelan, a homeless man who has lost his family and apparently his purpose in life. Yet, the story, while hardly a triumph for Francis, nevertheless affirms the quest for belief and redemption.

Kennedy wrote screenplays for The Cotton Club and for Ironweed. He also has written about his native region in O Albany! Improbable City of Political Wizards, Fearless Ethnics, Spectacular Aristocrats, Splendid Nobodies and Underrated Scoundrels (1983), and Albany and the Capitol (1986). Riding the Yellow Trolley Car: Selected Nonfiction was published in 1993. His books for children include Charlie Malarkey and the Belly Button Machine (1986) and Charlie Malarkey and the Singing Moose (1994).

Sources

Gillespie, Michael Patrick. Reading William Kennedy. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 2002.

Michener, Christian. From Then into Now: William Kennedy's Albany Novels. Scranton, Pa.: University of Scranton Press, 1998.

Seshachari, Neila C., ed. Conversations with William Kennedy. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Van Dover, J. K. Understanding William Kennedy. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Kerouac, Jack (1922–1969) novelist, poet, essayist

The only people for me are the mad ones, the ones who are mad to live, mad to talk, mad to be saved, desirous of everything at the same time, the ones who never yawn or say a commonplace thing, but burn, burn, burn like fabulous yellow roman candles exploding like spiders across the stars. . . .

—On the Road (1957)

The son of French-Canadian parents, Jack Kerouac was born in Lowell, Massachusetts, and attended Lowell High School. Recruited for Columbia University's football team, he studied under the critic and poet Mark Van Doren, made friends with the poet Allen Ginsberg, and then dropped out to travel as a merchant seaman. He began writing novels in this period and published The Town and the City in 1950. More travels and odd jobs formed much of the experience reflected in his novel ON THE ROAD (1957), one of the key texts of the BEAT era and a harbinger of the 1960s counterculture.

On the Road concerns Sal Paradise, a traveler to the West who doubles back to the Midwest and East on a kind of pilgrimage of America. He has an alter ego, Dean Moriarty (based on Kerouac's friend Neal Cassady), whose reckless energy and aesthetic sense come to symbolize the questing individual, the embodiment of the American spirit. Kerouac also exemplifies Walt Whitman's sensual side, and—while not as highly regarded as On the Road—Kerouac's later novels continue the saga of characters who seek out the solidarity of deep emotional involvement with others. Kerouac's characters search for the best in America, desiring to celebrate rather than criticize the national experience.

Dust jacket for Kerouac's first book, 1950

Kerouac published three books of poetry, heavily influenced in style and subject matter by the poet Gary SNYDER, a close friend of Kerouac's and a devotee of Eastern religions. Kerouac's other novels include The Dharma Bums (1958), The Subterraneans (1958), Excerpts From Visions of Cody (1960), and Big Sur (1962). He also wrote non-fiction, including Lonesome Traveler (1960) and Satori in Paris (1966).

Principal Books by Kerouac

The Town and the City. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1950.

On the Road. New York: Viking, 1957.

The Subterraneans. New York: Grove, 1958.

The Dharma Bums. New York: Viking, 1958.

Doctor Sax: Faust Part Three. New York: Grove, 1959.

Maggie Cassidy. New York: Avon, 1959.

Mexico City Blues. New York: Grove, 1959.

Excerpts From Visions of Cody. New York: New Directions, 1960.

The Scripture of the Golden Eternity. New York: Totem Press/Corinth Books, 1960.

Tristessa. New York: Avon, 1960.

Lonesome Traveler. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1960.

Book of Dreams. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1961.

Pull My Daisy. New York: Grove, 1961.

Big Sur. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1962.

Visions of Gerard. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1963.

Desolation Angels. New York: Coward-McCann, 1965.

Satori in Paris. New York: Grove, 1966.

Vanity of Duluoz: An Adventurous Education 1935–46. New York: Coward-McCann, 1968.

Scattered Poems. San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1971.

Pic. New York: Grove, 1971.

Visions of Cody. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972.

Trip Trap: Haiku along the Road from San Francisco to New York, 1959, by Kerouac, Albert Saijo, and Lew Welch. Bolinas, Calif.: Grey Fox Press, 1973.

Heaven & Other Poems. Bolinas, Calif.: Grey Fox, 1977.

Typescript scroll for the first draft of On the Road, 1957

San Francisco Blues. N.p.: Beat Books, 1983.

Studying Jack Kerouac

The most prolific of all the BEAT writers, Jack Kerouac wrote (or cowrote) eighteen novels, seven books of poetry, two collections of short stories, and many other writings on religion, including several works of Buddhist philosophy and an apparent gospel of Gnosticism titled The Scripture of the Golden Eternity (1960). His best-known work of literature is On the Road (1957), the original Beat masterpiece about Kerouac's cross-country travels with Neal Cassady. Kerouac authored several other major works that are worthy of mention: The Dharma Bums (1958), a West Coast novel chronicling his emergent belief in Buddhism and his friendship with the poet Gary SNYDER; Mexico City Blues (1959), a book of poems written while living with William S. Burroughs in Mexico and demonstrating Kerouac's lyrical debt to American jazz; and Big Sur (1962), a later, tragic novel about his disillusionment with the beatnik culture and descent into alcoholic neurosis.

Kerouac's mature fiction can be viewed as a single, autobiographical narrative, one the author himself referred to as "The Legend of Duluoz." For this reason students should be prepared to treat his novels as romans à clef: many of the characters therein correspond to Kerouac's real-life Beat contemporaries, historical figures such as William Burroughs, Neal Cassady, Allen GINSBERG, and others. Also, Kerouac's prose style can seem effusive at times. Most of his novels are experiments in a writing style Kerouac called "spontaneous prose" and defined in an introduction to The Subterraneans (1958) as "UNINTERRUPTED AND UNREVISED FULL CONFESSIONS ABOUT WHAT ACTUALLY HAPPENED IN REAL LIFE." Kerouac's style was a combination of stream-of-consciousness writing with on-the-run living, and as such his novels tend to blur the line between life and literature.

Dust jacket for the iconic novel of the Beat Generation

For a general guide to the Beat movement, see the The Beats, edited by Matt Theado (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 237, [2001], republished in paperback by Carroll & Graf [2002]). Ann Charters's scholarly work on Kerouac and the Beats is also a good place for students to begin study. The Portable Jack Kerouac (New York: Viking, 1995), which she edited, serves as a particularly helpful starting place, as it presents and explains selections from almost all of Kerouac's novels in terms of the greater Duluoz Legend. Working directly with the author to compile A Bibliography of Works by Jack Kerouac (New York: Phoenix Bookshop, 1975), Charters has continued to be an outspoken voice in Kerouac studies, editing two collections of his correspondence, Jack Kerouac: Selected Letters, 1940–1956 (New York: Viking, 1995) and Jack Kerouac: Selected Letters, 1957–1969 (New York: Viking, 1999); a biography, Jack Kerouac (1987); and other works on Beat literature and culture in general.

Students may want to engage in a study of other early biographies; among those frequently cited are Gerald Nicosia's Memory Babe: A Critical Biography of Jack Kerouac (New York: Grove, 1983) and Dennis McNally's Desolate Angel: Jack Kerouac, the Beat Generation, and America (New York: Random House, 1979). Biographical studies also include one by Kerouac's last editor, Ellis Amburn, titled Subterranean Kerouac: The Hidden Life of Jack Kerouac (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998), which casts the author as a tragic figure by focusing on the personal lifestyle that led to his demise, and one by Paul Maher Jr., an exhaustive effort titled Jack Kerouac: The Definitive Biography (Lanham, Md.: Taylor Trade, 2004). Finally, students interested in a pictorial history of Kerouac's life will benefit from David Sandison's Jack Kerouac: An Illustrated Biography (Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 1999).

Dust jacket for Kerouac's autobiographical 1962 novel detailing a bout of alcohol-related sickness he suffered the previous year on the California coast

Jack Kerouac's Nine Lives (Boulder, Colo.: Elbow/Cityful Press, 2001), three essays by James T. Jones on Kerouac's life and literature, offers a good introduction to Kerouac criticism. The title essay is a comprehensive examination of the nine biographical studies that have been published thus far on the writer. Jones has contributed two other significant works on Kerouac, a study of his poetics: A Map of Mexico City Blues: Jack Kerouac as Poet (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992); and a Freudian account of Kerouac's project titled Jack Kerouac's Duluoz Legend: The Mythic Form of an Autobiographical Fiction (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1999). Matt Theado's Understanding Jack Kerouac (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000) considers the author's works in order of their composition, rather than according to the chronology of the Duluoz Legend. This approach allows Theado to trace Kerouac's artistic development as well as the origins and trajectories of the novels' major themes. Several book-length critical studies take a religious or mythological approach to the examination of Kerouac's fiction, including Ben Giamo's Kerouac, the Word and the Way: Prose Artist as Spiritual Quester (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000) and Nancy M. Grace's Jack Kerouac and the Literary Imagination (New York: Palgrave, 2007). Regina Weinreich's study The Spontaneous Poetics of Jack Kerouac: A Study of the Fiction (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987) focuses more on the formal qualities of Kerouac's spontaneous prose style, while Michael Hrebeniak's Action Writing: Jack Kerouac's Wild Form (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2006) examines the revolutionary nature of this style by emphasizing its sociopolitical and historical context.

Students interested in manuscript research should turn to the Berg Collection in the New York Public Library, which houses the largest collection of Kerouac manuscripts, typescripts, notebooks, and letters.

—Student Guide by Matt Boehm

Kesey, Ken (1935–2001) novelist

*When people ask what my best work is, it's the bus. . .
I thought you should be living your art, rather than stepping back and describing it.*

—Interview (2000?)

Ken Kesey was born in La Junta, Colorado, and attended public schools in Springfield, Oregon. He graduated from the University of Oregon in 1957 with a B.A. in speech and communications and the next year entered the prestigious writing program at Stanford University headed by Wallace Stegner and including Larry McMURTRY and

Ken Kesey

Robert STONE, Wendell BERRY, and Tillie OLSEN among the students. In 1959 Kesey entered a government-sponsored program experimenting with drugs, including LSD. It was out of these experiences that he wrote ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST (1962), narrated by a schizophrenic American Indian in a psychiatric ward modeled on a VA hospital where Kesey worked in 1961. The main character is a rebel named Randle Patrick McMurphy, whose refusal to conform results in his being committed. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest became one of the signature works of the 1960s.

Kesey believed his second novel, Sometimes a Great Notion (1964), was his "best work, and I'll never write anything that good again." Experimental in structure and narrative technique, the novel is regarded as less accessible than One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, but more ambitious and more accomplished. It is the story of the Stampers, an Oregon logging family who refuse to join with their neighbors in a strike against the logging companies. There is strife within the family as well, pitting the values of the strong, single-minded Hank Stamper and his father against those of Hank's sensitive, intellectual half brother Lee. Thirty years later Kesey published two more novels, Sailor Song (1992) and Last Go Round (1994). They did not excite the interest accorded to his earlier work. His essays are collected in Demon Box (1986), and he wrote two children's books, Little Tricker and the Squirrel Meets Big Double the Bear (1990) and The Sea Lion: A Story of the Sea Cliff People (1991). Kesey became a countercultural hero during the 1960s and 1970s. His band of Merry Pranksters staged raucous psychedelic parties, which he called "Acid Tests" on the West Coast and in 1964 took a celebrated cross-country tour in a converted school bus named "Further."

Principal Books by Kesey

One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. New York: Viking, 1962.

Sometimes a Great Notion. New York: Viking, 1964.

The Day After Superman Died. Northridge, Calif.: Lord John Press, 1980.

Demon Box. New York: Viking, 1986.

Little Tricker the Squirrel Meets Big Double the Bear. New York: Viking, 1990.

The Sea Lion: A Story of the Sea Cliff People. New York: Viking, 1991.

Sailor Song. New York: Viking, 1992.

Last Go Round, by Kesey and Ken Babbs. New York: Viking Press, 1994.

*Kesey's Jail Journal: Cut the M***** Loose*. New York: Viking, 2003.

Other

The Last Whole Earth Catalog: Access to Tools. Menlo Park, Calif.: Portola Institute, 1971.

The Last Supplement to the Whole Earth Catalog, edited by Kesey and Paul Krassner. Menlo Park, Calif.: Portola Institute, 1971.

Kesey's Garage Sale, by Kesey, Neal Cassady, Allen Ginsberg, and others. New York: Viking, 1973.

Best of "The Realist": The Sixties' Most Outrageously Irreverent Magazine, edited by Paul Krassner, with an introduction by Kesey. Philadelphia: Running Press, 1984.

Caverns, by Kesey and others, as O. U. Levon. New York: Viking, 1989.

Studying Ken Kesey

Ken Kesey is a significant cultural figure, as well as a highly regarded novelist. He is paid considerable attention in both roles. Students first approaching his work should begin with One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest (1962)—the book, not the movie. Though both are excellent, they are strikingly different works. The best edition of that novel is the first, though the edition with text and criticism edited by John Clark Pratt (New York: Viking, 1973) includes interesting and useful supplementary study resources. Kesey's second novel, Sometimes a Great Notion (1964), is more highly regarded by most critics; though a more difficult read, it is Kesey's most ambitious novel, and it rewards the effort it requires. His later novels Sailor Song (1992) and The Last Go Round (1994) are interesting but less highly regarded than his first two novels. Kesey was a talented essayist. Demon Box (1986) includes his best short works, including stories and poetry. The essay "The Day after Superman Died" is especially recommended.

Dust jacket for Kesey's first novel, 1962, narrated by a schizophrenic half-breed Indian in a mental ward

The most useful information regarding Kesey's writing comes in Kesey, edited by Michael Stelow and the staff of the Northwest Review (Eugene, Ore.: Northwest Review Books/University of Oregon Press, 2001). Originally published as a special issue of the Northwest Review (16, nos. 1 & 2 [1977]), Stelow's book draws on the Kesey papers at the University of Oregon, where Kesey went to school and later taught creative writing. Another entertaining and useful source is Tom Wolfe's The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1968), which treats both Kesey and the cultural revolution he led. Kesey's Merry Pranksters have published often and in diverse places about their associations with him. Paul Perry's On the Bus: The Complete Guide to the Legendary Trip of Ken Kesey and The Merry Pranksters and the Birth of the Counterculture (New York: Thunder's Mouth, 1990) is a good introduction to those sources. Ken Kesey's Garage Sale (New York: Viking, 1973) includes short pieces by Kesey and the Pranksters, and Kesey's The Further Inquiry (New York: Viking, 1990) is an autobiographical meditation on the legendary Merry Prankster bus trips. Students should also look at Spit in the Ocean, a periodical edited by Kesey and his friends. There were six issues published from 1974 to 1981, which included the serialized novel Seven Prayers by Grandma Whittier, as well as interviews, essays, and other material. The original issues of Spit in the Ocean are very difficult to locate, but they are being republished by the Kesey family and are available at their website, www.key-z.com, along with other Kesey Association items. A seventh memorial issue of Spit in the Ocean, edited by Ed McLanahan, was published by Penguin Books in 2003.

Dust jacket for Kesey's second novel, 1966, his most ambitious, set during a loggers' strike in Oregon

Students interested in critical material should start with Stephen Tanner's Ken Kesey (New York: Twayne, 1983) and Ken Kesey's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002). For more-recent critical articles, check the Modern Language Association International Bibliography. A very useful primary and secondary bibliography compiled by Martin Blank can be found at <http://www.litkicks.com/Biblio/KeseyBiblio.html>.

—Student Guide by Richard Layman

Killens, John (1916–1987) novelist

Born in Georgia, John Killens attended Howard University and Columbia University Law School before his education was interrupted by army service in WORLD WAR II. His first novel, Youngblood (1954), examines the Jim Crow South during the early part of the twentieth century. Killens followed with his second novel, And Then We Heard the Thunder (1962), an exploration of racism in the army.

A founder of the Harlem Writers Guild, Killens played a pivotal role in encouraging other African American writers. His other novels include 'Sippi (1967), an account of struggling African Americans set in the 1960s, and Cotillion (1971), a satirical novel about conflicts within the African American community. He also wrote Great Gittin' Up Morning (1972), a biography of Denmark Vesey, the slave insurrectionist.

Kincaid, Jamaica (1949– ) short-story writer, novelist, essayist

Born Elaine Potter Richardson in St. John's, Antigua, Jamaica Kincaid left home in 1965 and worked in New York City as an au pair. This experience became the basis of her acclaimed novel, Lucy (1990).

In New York Kincaid studied photography at the New School for Social Research, attended classes at Franconia College in New Hampshire, and worked as a secretary. In 1973 she found a job at Ingenue Magazine and began to think of a writing career. Her first book, At the Bottom of the River (1983), a collection of short stories, is heavily autobiographical, like much of her later work. Her first novel, Annie John (1985), is an account of her adolescence and her troubled relationship with her mother.

Kincaid has continued to write about her own life, especially in the frank Autobiography of My Mother (1996) and My Brother (1997). Mr. Potter (2002) is narrated by a writer who tells the story of her father, an Antiguan who works as a chauffeur. Kincaid's interest in gardening is revealed in My Garden (Book) (1999). She has also edited My Favorite Plant: Writers and Gardeners on the Plants They Love (1999).

Sources

- Edwards, Justin D. Understanding Jamaica Kincaid. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2007.
- Ferguson, Moira. Jamaica Kincaid: Where The Land Meets the Body. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1994.
- Lang-Peralta, Linda, ed. Jamaica Kincaid and Caribbean Double Crossings. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2006.
- Paravisini-Gebert, Lizabeth. Jamaica Kincaid: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

King, Stephen (1947– ) novelist, short-story writer

I myself have never written a story about snakes because they don't scare me. I write about rats because they scare the hell out of me.

—Interview (1987)

Stephen King was born in Maine, where he has lived most of his life. His father deserted the family when King was two, and King was brought up by his conservative Methodist mother. King read comic books and began to write stories for sale by the age of twelve. After earning a B.S. degree at the University of Maine, he worked as a teacher at a private school in Hampden, Maine. By the early 1970s his stories began to appear in men's magazines. In 1974 he published the novel Carrie, which became a best-seller and, in 1976, a motion picture starring Sissy Spacek. Carrie reveals King's great strengths as a writer: not only does he dramatize the full horror of sixteen-year-old Carrie's telekinetic powers, but also he fuses her own terror to the agony she experiences as a maturing, sexually attractive young woman.

In novels such as The Stand (1978, expanded 1990) and The Tommyknockers (1987) he combines a shrewd observation of society with science-fiction themes about the fate of the world and of the future. Three of his novels, The Shining (1977), Misery (1987), and The Dark Half (1989), investigate the plight of writers and how the imagination interacts with reality. King has also explored the vampire myth in Salem's Lot (1975) and werewolves in Cycle of the Werewolf (1983). Pet Sematary (1983) is a reworking of the Frankenstein story. In The Eyes of the Dragon (1984) he explores the terrain of the fairy tale. The novel Dolores Claiborne (1993) demonstrated that King could create strong and sympathetic female characters. Indeed, the appearance of his short stories in The New Yorker in recent years suggests that King has transcended the genre-fiction classification that for many years influenced critics who dismissed his work as merely commercial. Although King's work has been uneven, the power of his stories is undeniable. Like several of his novels and short stories, Dolores Claiborne was adapted as a well-received motion picture.

The supernatural is often a terrifying presence in his stories and novels. His Dark Tower series is a medieval fantasy comprising eight novels (as of 2004) about the "gunslinger" Roland. Lisey's Story (2006) is a supernatural suspense novel about a woman who examines her dead husband's papers and learns about his past and a secret world. Cell (2006) is a horror novel about technological warfare and terrorism.

King's short fiction has been collected in Night Shift (1978), Different Seasons (1982), Skeleton Crew (1985), Four Past Midnight (1990), Nightmares and Dreamscapes (1993), Hearts in Atlantis (1999), and Everything's Eventual: 14 Dark Tales (2002). His published screenplays include Creepshow (1982) and Sleep Walkers (1992). He also wrote the teleplays for The Stand (1994) and Storm of the Century (1999). In 2000 he published On Writing: A Memoir of the Craft.

King has also written novels under the pseudonyms Richard Bachman and Eleanor Druse.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Stephen King. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.
- Magistrale, Tony, ed. The Dark Descent: Essays Defining Stephen King's Horrorscape. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Wiater, Stanley, Christopher Golden, and Hank Wagner. The Stephen King Universe: A Guide to the Worlds of the King of Horror. Los Angeles: Renaissance Books, 2002.

Kingsolver, Barbara (1955– ) novelist, poet, short-story writer

Barbara Kingsolver is from eastern Kentucky, where her father, a physician, had a practice treating the rural poor, and which had an impact on her own sympathetic portrayals of working-class characters. She earned a B.A. from DePauw University in 1977 and an M.S. from the University of Arizona in 1981.

Kingsolver won both critical and popular acclaim with The Bean Trees (1988), the story of an independent woman, Taylor Greer, who establishes a thriving life in Arizona with her adopted child, Turtle, a young Cherokee girl. Pigs in Heaven (1993), the sequel to The Bean Trees, is the story of the cross-country journey made by Taylor and Turtle, and of Taylor's fierce fight to keep Turtle when the legality of her adoption is challenged. Kingsolver has also published Animal Dreams (1990), about an independent woman in a small Arizona town, and Homeland and Other Stories (1989). Another America (1991) collects her poetry about poor women attempting to overcome sexual and political abuse, and confronting war and death.

The Poisonwood Bible (1999), a departure in both setting and subject matter, deals with a missionary family in the Belgian Congo and explores that colony's struggle for independence. In Prodigal Summer (2000), three closely integrated stories, Kingsolver returns to her Kentucky roots.

Kingsolver has also published nonfiction: Holding the Line: Women in the Great Arizona Mine Strike of 1983 (1989); High Tide in Tucson: Essays from Now or Never (1995); Small Wonder (2002), a collection of essays including responses to the 9/11 attacks on the World Trade Center; and Last Stand: America's Virgin Lands (2002). Animal, Vegetable, Miracle: A Year of Food Life (2007) is an ecological narrative co-written with her husband Stephen Hopp and their daughter Camille.

Sources

Barbara Kingsolver Website: < <http://www.kingsolver.com/home/index.asp> > (viewed June 18, 2007).

DeMarr, Mary Jean. Barbara Kingsolver: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Snodgrass, Mary Ellen. Barbara Kingsolver: A Literary Companion. Jefferson, N. C.: McFarland, 2004.

Kingston, Maxine Hong (1940– ) novelist, autobiographer

Maxine Hong Kingston was born and grew up in Stockton, California, working in her parents' laundry. She graduated with a degree in English from the University of California at Berkeley in 1962 and became a high-school teacher. Her first book, The Woman Warrior: Memoirs of a Girlhood among Ghosts (1976), won the nonfiction NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD and inspired a generation of Asian American writers to explore both the traditions of their parents' generation and the process of assimilation in America. The book delved into Kingston's life as a Chinese American girl, but combined her story with the legends of Cantonese peasants and stories of her female relatives. In 1980 she published a sequel, China Men, which won the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD. This narrative, which combines memoir and story, concentrated on her father and her other male relatives. Her first novel, Tripmaster Monkey (1990), the story of a young Chinese American playwright, won the PEN West Award for fiction. The Fifth Book of Peace (2003), about a woman writing a book, draws on the Chinese legend of the Three Books of Peace, which holds that humans living in peace are destroyed by fire. To Be the Poet (2002) is a collection of lectures and poems.

Sources

Madsen, Deborah. Maxine Hong Kingston. Detroit: Manly/Gale, 2000.

Simmons, Diane. Maxine Hong Kingston. New York: Twayne, 1999.

Skandera-Trombley, Laura E., ed. Critical Essays on Maxine Hong Kingston. New York: G. K. Hall, 1998.

Skenazy, Paul, and Tera Martin, eds. Conversations with Maxine Hong Kingston. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Kinnell, Galway (1927– ) poet

Born in Providence, Rhode Island, Galway Kinnell received his A.B. in 1948 from Princeton and his M.A. from the University of Rochester in 1949. Kinnell has made a career of teaching and publishing poetry, and he is the winner of several prestigious fellowships and awards, including two Guggenheims. Many of his poems, such as "Saint Francis and the Sow" and "Blackberry Eating," which exhibits his deft and humorous use of alliteration, are frequently anthologized. His collections include What a Kingdom It Was (1960), Body Rags (1968), and First Poems 1946–1954 (1970). His Selected Poems (1983) won the Pulitzer Prize.

Source

Tuten, Nancy Lewis. Critical Essays on Galway Kinnell. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Kizer, Carolyn (1925– ) poet, translator

Carolyn Kizer was born in Spokane, Washington, and in 1945 received her B.A. from Sarah Lawrence College in New York. She attended graduate school at Columbia University and at the University of Washington, where she studied with Theodore Roethke. She founded the journal Poetry Northwest, which she edited from its inception in 1959 until 1965. Her translations of Chinese and Pakistani poetry have appeared in The Ungrateful Garden (1961), Knock Upon Silence (1965), and Midnight Was My Cry (1971). Kizer's own career as a poet began with her fourth and fifth books, the Pulitzer Prize-winning Yin: New Poems (1984), and Mermaids in the Basement: Poems for Women (1984). Her other poetry collections include The Nearness of You: Poems for Men (1986) and Carrying Over (1988), which includes an impressive range of translations from languages as diverse as Yiddish and Chinese. Proses: On Poems & Poets appeared in 1993. Her collected poems, Cool Calm, and Collected, was published in 2000, and she is co-editor of Library of America's American Poetry: The Twentieth Century (2000).

Source

Finch, Annie, Johanna Keller, and Candace McClellan, eds. Carolyn Kizer: Perspectives on Her Life & Work. Fort Lee, N.J.: Ca-vanKerry Press, 2001.

Knowles, John (1926–2001) novelist

Looking back now across fifteen years, I could see with great clarity the fear I had lived in, which must mean that in the interval I had succeeded in a very important undertaking: I must have made my escape from it.
—A Separate Peace (1959)

Born in West Virginia and educated at Yale University, where he earned his B.A. in 1949, John Knowles was an editor at Holiday magazine when his first novel, A SEPARATE PEACE (1959), was published. Set during WORLD WAR II in a New England boys' school modeled on Phillips Exeter, which Knowles attended, it was one of the most widely read—and taught—novels of its time, reportedly selling more than nine million copies. Though it is a popular choice among high-school English teachers, it is inaccurate to classify the novel as a young-adult book. Knowles wrote eight other novels, including the sequel to A Separate Peace, Peace Breaks Out (1981), but none attracted the critical or popular acclaim of his first.

Source

Bryant, Hallman Bell. "A Separate Peace": The War Within. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Koch, Kenneth (1925–2002) poet

*A serious moment for the water is when it boils. . . .
Occasionally there is someone around who understands the importance of this moment for the water—maybe a saint, maybe a poet. . . .*

"The Boiling Water"

Born in Cincinnati, Kenneth Koch earned his B.A. at Harvard in 1948, and received his M.A. in 1953 and his Ph.D. in 1959 from Columbia University. He taught English and later comparative literature at Columbia beginning in 1959. Though known primarily for his poetry, Koch wrote multiple volumes of fiction, nonfiction (mostly about teaching poetry), and plays, as well. Koch is associated with the New York School of Poets, which also includes John ASHBERRY and Frank O'HARA. He wrote in a variety of styles: surrealism in Poems (1953), octava rima (eight-syllable lines) in Ko (1959), and the comic epic in The Duplications (1977). The Burning Mystery of Anna in 1951 (1979) exemplifies his experiments using prose and poetry together. Koch has also been acclaimed for his books about teaching children to write poetry, especially Wishes, Lies and Dreams: Teaching Children to Write Poetry (1970). Koch's collections of his own poetry include Ko, or A Season on Earth (1959); Selected Poems 1950–1982 (1985); and The Art of Poetry: Poems, Parodies, Interviews, Essays, and Other Work (1996).

Sources

Auslander, Philip. The New York School Poets as Playwrights: O'Hara, Ashbery, Koch, Schuyler, and the Visual Arts. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.

Koch, Kenneth. The Art of Poetry: Poems, Parodies, Interviews, Essays, and Other Work. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Komunyakaa, Yusef (1947– ) poet

Yusef Komunyakaa was born in 1947 in Bogalusa, Louisiana. He received his M.A. degree from Colorado State University in 1975 and his M.F.A. degree from the University of California, Irvine, in 1979. His experiences in Vietnam and as an African American growing up in the South combined with a sensibility shaped by jazz and the blues have produced poetry that has been highly acclaimed, winning him, among other honors, the Pulitzer Prize and the Kingsley Tufts Award for Neon Vernacular (1993), and the Ruth Lilly Prize in 2001. His poetry collections include I Apologize for the Eyes in My Head (1986), Dien Cai Dau (1988), Magic City (1992), Talking Dirty to the Gods (2000), Pleasure Dome (2001), and Taboo (2004); he has also written a verse play, Gilgamesh (2006). He teaches at Princeton University.

Source

Komunyakaa, Yusef. Blue Notes, edited by Radiclan Clytus. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000.

—Tod Marshall

Kopit, Arthur (1937– ) playwright

A New York native, Arthur Kopit earned his B.A. in 1969 from Harvard, where seven of his early plays were performed. Kopit, whose plays border on the absurd even as they probe domestic settings and family life, is best known for Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mama's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad (1960). His later plays include Indians (1968), Wings (1978), and High Society (1998). Kopit taught playwriting at Wesleyan University, Yale University, and City University of New York.

Source

Auerbach, Doris. Sam Shepard, Arthur Kopit, and the Off Broadway Theater. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Korean War

Communist North Korean troops invaded South Korea on June 25, 1950, in an effort to overthrow the government and reunite a country that had been divided at the end of WORLD WAR II when the Japanese occupying forces had been forced out. The United States launched a "police action" to repel the invasion, which then seemed part of the Soviet Union's COLD WAR strategy to put the entire country under the Communist rule of the North. (Much later it was learned that the North Koreans had acted independently of Soviet influence.)

U.S. forces did push back the Koreans, but General Douglas MacArthur's aggressive actions provoked a Chinese attack, and President Truman relieved MacArthur of command. On July 27, 1953, a truce was signed, although the two Koreas remained officially at war, and tensions between them have continued.

Novels written about the conflict include James A. Michener's The Bridges at Toko-Ri (1953), Duane Thorin's Ride to Panmunjom (1956), A. M. Harris's Tall Man (1958), Ernest Frankel's Band of Brothers (1958), and Quentin Reynolds's Known But to God (1960). In The Martyred (1964) Richard Kim provides an account of Seoul, the capital of South Korea, during the North Korean occupation. Richard Hooker's *M*A*S*H* (1968) is a black comedy set in a U.S. army mobile surgical hospital during the war. It was made into a movie in 1970 and adapted into a successful television series in 1972–1983.

Sources

Goldstein, Donald M., and Harry J. Maihafer. The Korean War. Washington, D.C.: Brassey's, 2000.

Varhola, Michael J. Fire and Ice: The Korean War, 1950–1953. Mason City, Iowa: Savas, 2000.

Kosinski, Jerzy (1933–1991) novelist, sociologist

Born in Lodz, Poland, Jerzy Kosinski spent a harrowing childhood in rural Poland during WORLD WAR II. He described his ordeal in a novel, The Painted Bird (1965). He was later attacked for exaggerating and perhaps inventing much of his suffering as a Jewish child during the Holocaust. But certainly Kosinski felt the tensions of anti-Semitism in Poland and saw the dangers of collectivist society, which he wrote about in The Future Is Ours, Comrade (1960) and No Third Path (1962), two sociological studies that he published under the name of Joseph Novak.

With two master's degrees, in history and political science, from the University of Lodz, Kosinski arrived in New York City in 1957. He studied English intensely and became fluent. Kosinski's second novel, Steps (1968), won the National Book Award, and like his first novel it blends the real and surreal, historical events, autobiography, and phantasmagoric scenes that reflected a powerful imagination. The Painted Bird is the story of a boy's education about life, his struggle to survive among cruel Polish peasants, and his ability to absorb even the most brutal behavior and conditions. Steps is more elusive, with a succession of fifty individual scenes and with characters repeating themselves but with no central narrative explicitly tying the episodes together. What binds Kosinski's two early novels together, however, is an exploration of human deceit, manipulation, and revenge.

Of Kosinski's later novels, Being There (1971) is the most successful. Its portrayal of Chance, a man without personality who takes on the features of whatever setting or events he is exposed to, is a carefully crafted comment on a contemporary world dominated by television. Chance simply acts as he has seen people do on television, and he is remarkably successful. Kosinski's later novels include Cockpit (1975), Blind Date (1977), Passion Play (1979), and Pinball (1982).

Beset with attacks on the veracity of his experience in Poland and on the authorship of his fiction (he was accused of employing others to write his books), along with failing health and an inability to concentrate on his writing, Kosinski committed suicide. His Passing By: Selected Essays, 1962–1991 was published in 1992.

Sources

Lavers, Norman. Jerzy Kosinski. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Sloan, James Park. Jerzy Kosinski: A Biography. New York: Dutton, 1996.

Tepa Lupack, Barbara, ed. Critical Essay on Jerzy Kosinski. New York: G. K. Hall, 1998.

Kramer, Larry (1935– ) novelist, playwright, journalist

Larry Kramer grew up in Bridgeport, Connecticut, earned a B.A. degree from Yale in 1957, served in the army, and in 1958 began work at the William Morris Agency. He later worked for Columbia Pictures. His first writing credit was a screenplay for the 1969 adaptation of D. H. Lawrence's novel Women in Love. But Kramer built his reputation as an outspoken writer about gay life and as an advocate for gay rights. His novel Faggots (1978) is a satiric attack on gay life in New York City and its environs as well as an exposé of the drug culture and the promiscuous and sadomasochistic practices of his characters. The novel was attacked by both mainstream and gay critics, but it also sold well. By 1987 Kramer became one of the strongest advocates for the prompt treatment of AIDS and the search for a cure. His play The Normal Heart (produced 1985), one of the first important responses to the AIDS epidemic, explored many responses to AIDS, including the possibility of abstinence from sex. Like Faggots, The Normal Heart proved controversial. A second play, The Destiny of Me (produced 1992), continues the themes of The Normal Heart. Kramer's nonfiction includes Reports from the Holocaust: The Making of an AIDS Activist (1989). Brilliant Windows: Poems was published in 1998.

Source

Mass, Lawrence, ed. We Must Love One Another or Die: The Life and Legacies of Larry Kramer. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Kumin, Maxine (1925– ) novelist, poet

Born in Philadelphia, Maxine Kumin won the Pulitzer Prize for Up Country: Poems of New England in 1972. Her first novel, Through Dooms of Love (1965), draws on her experience at Radcliffe College, where she earned an A.B. in 1946 and an M.A. in 1948. Other novels include Passions of Uxport (1968) and The Designated Heir (1974). A nature poet, Kumin integrates descriptions of family life, nature, and the cycle of existence as well as issues of Jewish identity and farm life. She has also published children's books, and essay collections including To Make a Prairie (1979) and In Deep (1987). Her later works include The Long Marriage (2001) and Jack and Other New Poems (2005).

Source

Grosholz, Emily, ed. Telling the Barn Swallow: Poets on the Poetry of Maxine Kumin. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1997.

Kunitz, Stanley (1905–2006) poet

Stanley Kunitz was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, and educated at Harvard, where he earned a B.A. in 1926 and an A.M. in 1927. He has been influential as both a translator and anthologist. He won the Pulitzer Prize for Selected Poems (1958) in 1959. One of his signature poems, "Father and Son," collected in Passport to the War (1944), is about a son's search for his father. He has been praised for his translation of Anna Akhmatova's poetry in Poems of Akhmatova (1973). In The Testing Tree (1971) Kunitz experimented with unrhymed verse of differing line lengths and explored the theme of imagination and its relationship to memory. His poetry collection Passing Through (1995) won a National Book Award. His The Collected Poems was published in 2000, the year he was named POET LAUREATE of the United States.

Sources

Braham, Jeanne. The Light Within The Light: Portraits of Donald Hall, Richard Wilbur, Maxine Kumin, and Stanley Kunitz. Boston: Godine, 2007.

Orr, Gregory. Stanley Kunitz: An Introduction to the Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.

Kushner, Tony (1956– ) playwright

Tony Kushner was born in New York City and reared in Lake Charles, Louisiana. Encouraged by his parents, he studied drama at both Columbia University (B.A., 1978) and New York University (M.F.A., 1984). He began writing and producing epics that deal with broad historical canvases in his first original play for an adult audience, A Bright Room Called Day (produced 1985), which shifts between Germany in the 1930s and America in the 1980s.

Kushner's two-part play, ANGELS IN AMERICA (Millennium Approaches, produced 1990; Perestroika, produced 1992) took him from regional theater to the New York stage. Subtitled A Gay Fantasia on National Themes, the play won a Pulitzer Prize, a Tony, and the New York Drama Critics Award in 1993. It explored the advent of AIDS in the gay community and its impact on American culture. The play's humor and its blend of realism and expressionism made Kushner the worthy heir of European and American models such as Bertolt Brecht and Eugene O'Neill.

Tony Kushner in Conversation, a series of interviews, appeared in 1998. Kushner has published Thinking about the Longstanding Problems of Virtue and Happiness: Essays, A Play, Two Poems, and a Prayer (1995); Death & Taxes: Hydriotaphia & Other Plays (2000); and Homebody/Kabul (2002), which won an Obie. With Alisa Solomon, he edited a collection of essays, Wrestling with Zion: Progressive Jewish-American Responses to the Jewish-Palestinian Conflict (2004), and in 2006, he wrote the screenplay for Steven Spielberg's Munich, about the Jewish response to the murders of Jewish athletes at the Munich Olympics in 1972.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Tony Kushner. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.

Fisher, James. The Theater of Tony Kushner. Oxford, U.K.: Routledge, 2002.

Fisher, ed. Tony Kushner: New Essays on the Art and Politics of the Plays. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006.

Vorlicky, Robert, ed. Tony Kushner in Conversation. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1997.

Lawson, Deodat (circa 1640s–1715) writer, poet

Deodat Lawson, poet and author of an eyewitness account of the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS, was born in England, probably in the late 1640s. The son of the Reverend Thomas Lawson, a well-educated Puritan minister, Deodat never knew his mother, as she died a few weeks after his birth. She had, however, dedicated him to the ministry with a name that meant “given to God.”

The precise date that Lawson immigrated to NEW ENGLAND is unknown. In the late 1650s, while he was still a boy, his father, Thomas Lawson, was removed from the pulpit at Denton. This removal forced Deodat to give up his formal schooling and to enter into “secular affairs.” Sometime between 1676 and 1677 Thomas Lawson immigrated to New England, where he found a position as an unordained minister at a church in Edgartown, Massachusetts. He also married, and in 1682 his wife, Jane, gave birth to a son.

Deodat Lawson’s A Brief and True Narrative (1692) is an eyewitness account of one of the best-known episodes in New England history. The day-to-day account of the events surrounding the Salem witch trials includes details of the examination of the accused by the local magistrates and a description of a sermon Lawson was preaching in the village church, which was disrupted by the shouts and cries of the witchcraft victims. He vouched for the accuracy of his narrative by assuring his readers that it included only “what I either saw my self, or did receive Information from persons of undoubted Reputation and Credit.”

The sermon that was interrupted by the suffering of the “afflicted” was published in 1693. Christ’s Fidelity the Only Shield against Satan’s Malignity surveys what the Bible says about Satan and warns the people of Salem that their only relief from satanic conspiracies is faith in God. When Lawson republished this sermon in 1704, he appended a systematic account of the witchcraft phenomena that had occurred in Salem Village. In this appendix Lawson described the trial of the Reverend George Burroughs, who was condemned to death in August 1692 for, among other things, killing Lawson’s wife and baby daughter through witchcraft.

Lawson’s motives for publishing Christ’s Fidelity in the midst of the witchcraft crisis have been debated. Some critics argue that he hoped to stir up and to sustain the witch-hunts. Others, however, feel Lawson intended to caution the colonists against further rash behavior in response to wild accusations. That Lawson was motivated by a desire for revenge for the death of his wife and child is unlikely, since the sermon preceded the accusations against George Burroughs.

Lawson turned his hand to poetry in 1693. His Threnodia, or A Mournful Remembrance of . . . Anthony Collamore . . . December 16, 1693 (1694) is a lament on the drowning of a man Lawson depicts as a model of virtue and piety. The eulogy is introduced by a vivid account of Collamore’s fateful ocean voyage, the sudden storm that led to the ship’s sinking, and the deaths of six men on board. In a powerful segment, Lawson tries to imagine what caused the ship’s destruction:

*Or whether Loaden over deep with Wood
The Swelling Waves did fill her by degrees
If then their Frozen Pump would do no good
They soon became a Prey unto the Seas
Which Violently over them did go
And bore them down, into the deeps below*

Although he was still unordained, Lawson served from 1683 to 1688 as a minister in Salem Village. His life there was marred by tragedy and disappointment; his wife and baby daughter died, and the local church refused to ordain him. Lawson escaped an active role in the Salem witch-hunts when he removed to Boston in 1688, but he returned as an observer in the spring of 1692, at the peak of the trials. After leaving Salem Village, Lawson's situation slowly improved: he remarried and started a second family and was finally ordained in 1694. In 1696 he returned to England to settle his father's estate and remained there until his death in 1715.

Works

Lawson, Deodat. A Brief and True Narrative of Some Remarkable Passages Relating to Sundry Persons Afflicted by Witchcraft at Salem Village, Which Happened from the Nineteenth of March to the Fifth of April, 1692. Boston: Printed for Benjamin Harrison, 1692; Early American Imprints, 613.

Lawson. Christ's Fidelity the Only Shield against Satan's Malignity, Asserted in a Sermon Deliver'd at Salem-Village the 24th of March, 1692. Boston: Printed by B. Harris, 1693; Early American Imprints, 643.

Sources

Hall, David. D., ed. Witch-hunting in Seventeenth-Century New England: A Documentary History, 1638–1692. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991.

Hansen, Chadwick. Witchcraft at Salem. New York: Braziller, 1969.

Norton, Mary Beth. In the Devil's Snare: The Salem Witchcraft Crisis of 1692. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Lewis and Clark Expedition (1803–1806)

This expedition was convened by Congress to explore the lands west of the Mississippi River that were, in the process, obtained from the Louisiana Purchase of 1803. Thomas JEFFERSON had long been interested in exploring these lands and helped organize several preliminary expeditions. In 1793, then secretary of state, Jefferson on behalf of the American Philosophical Society sent French botanist André Michaux in search of a western water route to the Pacific. Upon assuming the presidency in 1801, Jefferson had more authority to pursue such explorations, and commissioned his private secretary and army captain Meriwether LEWIS to oversee the expedition. Jefferson gave Lewis explicit instructions to discover a water route to the Pacific Ocean that would facilitate the fur trade and, in the process, to establish peaceable relations with the native populations that would further trading opportunities. In addition, Lewis was charged with gathering scientific and botanical specimens and charting the natural geography.

Lewis chose Lieutenant William CLARK to serve as co-commander. With $2,500 of government funding, Lewis, Clark, and twenty-five soldiers set up a winter camp in St. Louis, Missouri to gather supplies and prepare for the journey ahead. Departing May 14, 1804, the expedition headed up the Missouri River into the Dakota Territory, setting up a winter camp near the Mandan and Hidatsa tribes. After wintering at Fort Mandan, the expedition headed west along with guidance from Toussaint Charbonneau, a French fur trapper; SAGAWA, his Shoshone wife; and Jean Baptiste, their infant son. They crossed the Rocky Mountains and followed the Columbia River to the Pacific Ocean. Clark mistakenly thought he was viewing the Pacific when he was actually seeing an estuary; nevertheless, their accomplishment led to this celebratory journal entry on November 7, 1805:

Great joy in camp we are in View of the Ocean, [NB: in the morning when fog cleared off just below last village just on leaving the village of Warkiacum], this great Pacific Ocean which we been So long anxious to See. and the roaring or noise made by the waves breaking on the rocky Shores (as I Suppose) may be heard distinctly.

After wintering on the Pacific coast, the expedition departed Fort Clatsop on March 23, 1806, and concluded the eight-thousand-mile journey in St. Louis on September 23, 1806. The expedition marked America's claim on the Western frontier. Each soldier received 360 acres of land, and Lewis and Clark each received 1,600 acres of land.

Sources

Clark, William, and Meriwether Lewis. The Definitive Journals of Lewis and Clark Expedition, 13 volumes, edited by Gary E. Moulton and others. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1983–2002.

The Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition. University of Nebraska-Lincoln Libraries-Electronic Text Center. <<http://lewisandclarkjournals.unl.edu>> (viewed August 16, 2006).

Lewis, Meriwether (1774–1809) explorer, diarist

Ocean in view. O! the joy!

—The Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition
(November 7, 1805)

Meriwether Lewis was born August 18, 1774, to William Lewis and Lucy Meriwether Lewis, seven miles west of Charlottesville, Virginia, in Albemarle County on the family's estate, Locust Hill. As a child he developed wilderness skills by hunting and exploring the Virginia lands. In 1779 his father, William Lewis, died of pneumonia after being swept off his horse while crossing a river. In 1780 Lucy Meriwether Marks and her new husband Captain John Marks moved near the Broad River in Georgia, as part of the Goosepond Community established by General George Matthews. In Georgia, Lewis continued to develop his outdoor survival skills. When Lewis was around thirteen, he returned to Locust Hill for a formal education and began to learn the everyday operations of running the two-thousand-acre tobacco, corn, and wheat plantation, which included twenty-four slaves. When his stepfather died in 1792, the Lewis-Marks family returned to Virginia in 1788, and the eighteen-year-old Lewis became even more involved in managing Locust Hill.

In 1794 Lewis volunteered to fight against the Whiskey Rebellion in western Pennsylvania, and on May 1, 1795, he joined the regular army. In 1800 Lewis was sent to Detroit as the regimental paymaster, and on December 30, 1800, was promoted to Captain. In 1801 Thomas JEFFERSON recruited Lewis as his private secretary. During this time Jefferson began plans for an expedition to survey the territory west of the Mississippi in hopes of finding a water passage to the Pacific coast. Lewis spent two years in preparation for the journey studying medicine, botany, geography, animals, and navigation at the University of Pennsylvania from the leading physicians and scientists of the day: Dr. Benjamin RUSH, Dr. Benjamin Smith Barton, Dr. Caspar Wistar, and David RITTENHOUSE. Jefferson appointed Lewis to head up the expedition, and Lewis chose Lieutenant William CLARK to serve as co-commander. With $2,500 in government funding, the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION (1803–1806), made up of twenty-five soldiers, departed on May 14, 1804. The “Corps of Discovery” departed St. Louis and headed up the Missouri River into the Dakota Territory. Throughout the journey Lewis kept an extensive journal, as did Clark.

Lewis’s eloquent prose and specific information about plants, natives, and geography allow a modern reader to visualize the three-year journey. When the expedition concluded the eight thousand-mile journey in St. Louis on September 23, 1806, Lewis began working on a transcript of the journey, traveling to Washington D.C., to report their findings. When Jefferson appointed Lewis as governor of the Louisiana Territory, Lewis returned to St. Louis to assume his duties. In 1809, after three years of contentious dealings with other government officials, Lewis departed St. Louis for Washington, D.C., to clear his name, but he never arrived. On October 11, 1809, Lewis was found dead of gunshot wounds in a cabin at Grinder’s Stand about seventy-two miles outside of Nashville, Tennessee. Speculation surrounds his death as to whether it was murder or suicide.

Work

Clark, William, and Meriwether Lewis. The Definitive Journals of Lewis and Clark Expedition, 13 volumes, edited by Gary E. Moulton and others. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1983–2002.

Sources

Ambrose, Stephen E. Undaunted Courage: Meriwether Lewis, Thomas Jefferson, and the Opening of the American West. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Dillon, Richard H. Meriwether Lewis: A Biography. New York: Coward-McCann, 1965.

Lewis, Richard (circa 1699–1733) poet

Richard Lewis, an early American poet, was probably born in 1699 in Wales. It is believed that he came to Maryland in 1718 and married Elizabeth Batee the following year. The first verifiable information about Lewis comes in 1725, when he reported from Maryland to the Royal Society on a mysterious explosion he witnessed at Patapsco near Baltimore. Lewis’s major literary work, “A Journey from Patapsco in Maryland to Annapolis, April 4, 1730,” hailed as one of the finest nature poems in colonial literature, is set in this Maryland countryside.

Lewis served as the Latin master of the Annapolis School but devoted much of his time to writing POETRY. He attained remarkable practical success, becoming the “court poet” to his patron, Benedict Leonard Calvert (1679–1745), governor of Maryland, and securing publication for his poetry through a friendship with the official printer of the colony, William Parks (d. 1750). Throughout his career Lewis enjoyed the support of the Maryland elite.

Lewis rewarded his patrons with verses composed in their honor and with eulogies composed upon their deaths. When Charles Calvert, Lord Baltimore (1605–1675), visited Maryland in 1732, Lewis wrote Carmen Seculare, a celebration of the colony’s progress to civility and the benefits of its combination of political leadership and natural resources. Lewis also showed a talent for translation. In 1728 he introduced Maryland society to Edward Holdsworth’s mock-heroic Latin poem Muscipula, which Lewis published as The Mouse-Trap, or the Battle of the Cambrians and Mice.

Lewis’s “A Journey from Patapsco” opens with a description of the lush Maryland countryside on a bright April morning. A hummingbird appears: “Smallest of birds, what Beauties shine in Thee! / A living Rainbow on thy Breast I see.” Lewis uses the hummingbird to illustrate his point that the human mind has limits and nature has beauties that the poet or artist cannot capture. Thus, the small bird “mocks the Poet’s and the Painter’s Skill / who may forever Strive with fruitless Pains / to catch and fix those beauteous changeable Stains.”

The second section of “A Journey from Patapsco” depicts a storm, another natural phenomenon that strains the poet’s ability to capture nature in words. In the third section nightfall prompts the poet to contemplate death and the immortality attained by patriots, poets, priests, and philosophers. The final section is introspective, as the poet remembers his youth, prays for a full life before he dies, and finds peace through his faith in God.

Lewis was an outspoken critic of the Europeans’ abuse of nature. In Food for Criticks (1731) he criticized the “throng at Harvard,” who do not respect the land as the Indians before them did. Yet, in Upon Prince Madoc’s Expedition to the Coun- try now called America, in the 12th Century (1733, 1734), Lewis portrayed a heroic Welshman, Prince Madoc, who dreamed of a great empire rising in the New World.

Richard Lewis enjoyed an excellent literary reputation in England as well as in the colonies. His poems appeared in London magazines and papers. He died in 1733, his position as the foremost poet of American nature unchallenged until the career of Philip FRENCH.

Works

Lewis, Richard, trans. The Mouse-Trap, or the Battle of the Cambrians and Mice. Annapolis: Printed for Edward Holdsworth by W. Parks, 1728; Early American Imprints, 3038.

Lewis. Carmen Seculare, for the Year M, DCC, XXXII. Annapolis: Printed by William Parks, 1732.

Lewis. "A Journey from Patapsco in Maryland to Annapolis," Pennsylvania Gazette, 20 May 1731; reprinted in American Poetry, edited by Percy H. Boynton. New York: Scribners, 1918; Miami: Granger, 1978.

Source

Lemay, J. A. Leo. Men of Letters in Colonial Maryland. Knoxville: University of Tennessee.

Library of Congress (1800– )

Established by act of Congress, the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., serves as the reference and research center for all branches of the United States government. Initially housed at the Capitol, the original collection of the library was destroyed by fire by the British in 1814 during the WAR OF 1812. A year later, in 1815, the library replenished its stacks by purchasing Thomas JEFFERSON's collection of 6,457 volumes. Since 1870 the Library of Congress has served as the copyright depository for the nation. It moved to its first permanent setting in 1897 in the newly named Thomas Jefferson Building. Since then it has received two more additions: the John Adams Building (1939) and the James Madison Memorial Building (1980). Many of the founders' papers are housed there, including those of Jefferson, George WASHINGTON, Alexander HAMILTON, and James MADISON, along with the collection of Peter Force (1790–1868), archivist and historian. The Library of Congress is now the largest and most comprehensive research institution in the world.

Sources

Conaway, James. America's Library: The Story of the Library of Congress, 1800–2000. New Haven: Yale University Press in association with the Library of Congress, 2000.

Encyclopedia of the Library of Congress: For Congress, the Nation & the World, edited by John Y. Cole & Jane Aiken. Washington, D.C.: Bernan Press & Library of Congress, 2004.

Ostrowski, Carl. Books, Maps, and Politics: A Cultural History of the Library of Congress, 1783–1861. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2004.

Livingston, Anne Shippen (1763–1841) diarist

Anne Shippen, known as Nancy to her family, was born in Philadelphia on February 24, 1763, to Alice Lee Shippen and William Shippen III, a physician. The Shippens were one of Philadelphia's prominent families. Sharon M. Harris, moreover, notes that their house was "the center of social and political activities during the years when Philadelphia was the new nation's capital, and Nancy received the attention of numerous distinguished young men." Although she had formed a romantic attachment to Louis Otto, a French attaché, her father insisted on a marriage to the prosperous Colonel Henry Beekman Livingston of New York. A jealous and violent husband who had already fathered several illegitimate children, he accused his wife of adultery and kept her prisoner in their home. When Anne learned of his plans to bring his illegitimate family to live with them, she returned to her parents' home. During the separation, she began to keep a diary.

Livingston published her diary under her maiden name. The journal described vividly the tragic impact of women's subordination to males and male values in American society. Women should not, she wrote, "suffer and obey" their husbands; instead, women should demand an equal relationship with them. She never reconciled with her husband, and, as a result, lived a long life of isolation.

Work

Livingston, Anne Home Shippen. Nancy Shippen, Her Journal Book; the International Romance of a Young Lady of Fashion of Colonial Philadelphia with Letters to Her and about Her. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1935; New York: B. Blom, 1968.

Sources

Armes, Ethel. Nancy Shippen, Her Journal Book. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1935.

Kierner, Cynthia A. Traders and Gentlefolk: The Livingstons of New York, 1675–1790. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1992.

Livingston, William (1723–1790) journalist, poet

William Livingston is best known in the literary world for his poem Philosophic Solitude: Or, The Choice of a Rural Life, initially published as a book in 1747 in New York. A model of American-Augustan verse, including 670 lines in rhymed couplets, the poem was included in the first anthology of American poetry, American Poems, Selected and Original (1793), edited by Elihu Hubbard Smith (1771–1798). Primarily influenced by English poets Alexander Pope (1688–1744), John Dryden (1631–1700), and John Milton (1608–1674), Livingston offers poetic reflections on such subjects as nature, meditation, and companionship. As the subtitle suggests, he praises an agrarian existence: "Mine be the pleasure of a rural life," he declares in the third couplet, continuing, "From noise remote, and ignorant of strife."

For Livingston, nature represented an escape from the congestion, disorder, pretensions, and corruption of the city, sentiments that the nineteenth-century transcendentalists later endorsed. But nature alone could not fully nourish Livingston; friends and books, including the works of Marcus Cato (95 B.C.– A.D. 46), John Locke (1632–1704), and Isaac Newton (1642–1727), were essential as well. Above all, in his romantic existence, Livingston needed a spouse. "By love directed, I would choose a wife," he wrote, "to improve my bliss, and the load of my life."

Although Philosophic Solitude was enormously popular, going through five printings during the author's lifetime, Livingston never abandoned prose writing, law, or politics to focus exclusively on verse. His other major publications, in fact, included a two-volume collection, written with William Smith Jr. (1728–1793), on the laws of colonial New York. His reputation as a poet remains positive, for, although critics have noted several lapses into banal imagery in Philosophic Solitude, they have high regard for such imagery as "The trees weep amber."

William Livingston was born in Albany to Philip and Catharine Van Brugh Livingston. He was a member of one of the most eminent families of the seventeenth century and enjoyed the advantages of his social standing. During his childhood he learned the language and customs of the Mohawk as he and an English missionary traveled with the tribe. After graduating from Yale in 1741 at the top of his class, Livingston was indentured to a lawyer in New York. He married Susanna French in 1745, and eventually their family grew to include thirteen children. He was admitted to the bar in 1748.

Livingston began to distinguish himself as a political activist and journalist in 1752, when he and fellow lawyers William Smith Jr. and John Morin Scott (1730–1784) established a weekly newspaper, The Independent Reflector. Despite claims of political neutrality, The Reflector revealed a decidedly liberal slant, promoting the cause of "truth and liberty" and opposing "superstition, bigotry, priestcraft, tyranny, servitude, public mismanagement, and dishonesty in office." As a Presbyterian with sympathies toward DEISM, Livingston's particular concern was freedom of religion. He vehemently opposed the idea of establishing the ANGLICAN CHURCH in New York and in the mid 1750s wrote a series of essays on the subject called "The Watch Tower." As a trustee of Kings College (later Columbia University), he fought against Anglican control of that institution.

Livingston's career in politics began in 1758 when he was elected to the New York Assembly. After he moved to Elizabethtown, New Jersey, in 1772, he became a member of both the Continental Congress and the Committee of Correspondence. In 1776 he assumed the post of brigadier general and commanded the New Jersey militia. After independence he was elected the first governor of New Jersey. He won reelection to this position each year for the rest of his life.

Livingston continued to write while in the State House. In 1778 he wrote "Ode of General Washington," a celebration in blank verse of George WASHINGTON's virtues. Essays, patriotic and satirical in tone, appeared frequently in The New-Jersey Gazette. His literary achievements secured him membership in the American Philosophical Society in 1781. His devotion to public service earned him a place at the Constitutional Convention in 1787. He died July 25, 1790, valued as an essayist, poet, and public servant.

Works

Livingston, William. Philosophic Solitude; or, The Choice of a Rural Life: A Poem. Boston, 1747; Early American Imprints, 5986.

The Independent Reflector; or, Weekly Essays on Sundry Important Subjects; More Particularly Adapted to the Province of New York. New York, 1753; reprint, Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1963; Early American Imprints, 6866.

Livingston, William. The Papers of William Livingston. 5 volumes. Trenton: New Jersey Historical Commission, 1979–1988.

Sources

Dillon, Dorothy R. The New York Triumvirate: A Study of the Legal and Political Careers of William Livingston, John Morin Scott, William Smith, Jr. New York: Columbia University Press, 1949.

Klein, Milton Martin. The American Whig: William Livingston of New York, revised edition, New York: Garland, 1993.

Logan, Chief John (circa 1725–1780) Mingo chief, orator

For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbour a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? — Not one.
—Chief Logan's Speech to the Council (1774)

John (or James) Logan, a Cayuga by birth known as Tahgahjute, was chief of the Mingo Indians born in Pennsylvania around 1725. He took his name from James LOGAN, who worked closely with the Mingos while serving as William Penn's secretary in Pennsylvania. Initially, Chief Logan promoted a peaceful relationship between the white settlers and the Mingo, but after his family was murdered in 1774, he led a series of attacks against them, thus instigating Lord Dunmore's War. The British retaliated by destroying seven Mingo villages, and Dunmore, the governor of Virginia, ordered a fort built and one thousand troops assembled. Shawnee chief Cornstalk answered these acts by sending one thousand of his tribe to confront Dunmore at the Battle of Point Pleasant. The British successfully forced the Shawnee to retreat, and a council was set to negotiate a peace. Chief Logan did not attend but sent a speech addressed to the council honoring and mourning his people. Logan's speech won the admiration of Thomas JEFFERSON, who included a transcript in his Notes on the State of Virginia, preceded by the following introduction: "I may challenge the whole orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, and of any more eminent orator, if Europe has furnished more eminent, to produce a single passage, superior to the speech of Logan, a Mingo chief, to Lord Dunmore, when governor of this state." Jefferson then described the brutal murder of Chief Logan's family, led by Colonel Cresap, "a man infamous for the many murders he had committed on those much-injured people." Cresap's party ambushed an unarmed group of women and children, and as Jefferson explains: "This happened to be the family of Logan, who had long been distinguished as a friend of the whites. This unworthy return provoked his vengeance."

Jefferson extends his understanding regarding Logan's decision not to attend the peace council, "But, lest the sincerity of a treaty should be distrusted, from which so distinguished a chief absented himself, he sent by a messenger the following speech to be delivered to Lord Dunmore." Logan's speech is quoted in full in Jefferson's text:

I appeal to any white man to say, if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry, and he gave him not meat; if ever he came cold and naked, and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war, Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites, that my countrymen pointed as they passed, and said, "Logan is the friend of white men." I had even thought to have lived with you, but for the injuries of one man. Col. Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood, and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan, not sparing even my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it: I have killed many: I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbour a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? — Not one.

Chief Logan died in 1780.

Sources

Jefferson, Thomas. Notes on the State of Virginia. London: J. Stockdale, 1787. In Thomas Jefferson: Writings, edited by Merrill D. Peterson. New York: Library of America, 1984.

Mayer, Brantz. Tah-gah-jute; or, Logan and Cresap, an Historical Essay. Albany: J. Munsell, 1867.

Logan, James (1674–1751) statesman, botanist, translator

Happiness in this life depends not in any proportion so much on outward Circumstances as on the inward Disposition of the Mind and the composition of the Animal Spirits . . . it is not the want of knowledge that makes mankind unhappy but the want of power to apply it.

—Logan to Susanna Wright (December 2, 1723)

Naturalist, book collector, translator, and scholar, James Logan was born October 20, 1674 in Lurgan, Ireland. His father, Patrick Logan, was an Anglican clergyman before converting to Quakerism. James was educated in Edinburgh and Bristol and in 1699 immigrated to Pennsylvania to serve as William Penn's secretary. He became involved in many areas of colonial politics, serving as a member of the provincial council (1703); as mayor of Philadelphia (1723); and as chief justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court (1731–1739). In 1714 Logan married Sarah Read, and in the 1720s, the Logans began building their home near Germantown. Logan had established a successful fur-trading relationship with the local native tribe, the Lenni Lanape. In 1737 Logan and Thomas Penn engineered the "Walking Purchase," a land deal that Alan Taylor identifies as "perhaps the most notorious land swindle in colonial history," whereby the Lenni Lanape lost "nearly twelve hundred square miles, including most of their homeland" when scouts employed by Logan and Penn encircled the natives' lands.

Logan had an extensive library at Stenton that included over 2,600 volumes by the time of his death. Chiefly containing Latin and Greek texts, it was one of the best collections of books in colonial America and included works by Homer, Horace, Virgil, Plato, Aristotle, Aeschylus, and Sophocles, along with major scientific works by Isaac Newton. Logan's library is now part of the Library Company of Philadelphia. Logan was also an active member of the Royal Society, and published his findings on mathematics, such as comments on Pythagoras (1737) and Euclid (1740) and two treatises on optics (1739, 1741). Logan's botanical findings on the sexual generation of plants garnered attention from the Swedish naturalist Carolus Linnaeus. James Logan died October 31, 1751.

Sources

Tolles, Frederick Barnes. James Logan and the Culture of Provincial America. Boston: Little, Brown, 1957.

Wolf, Edwin. The Library of James Logan of Philadelphia, 1674–1751. Philadelphia: Library Company of Philadelphia, 1974.

Logan, Martha Daniell (1704–1779) correspondent, naturalist

Martha Daniell Logan's reputation rests on her horticultural publication, the "Gardners Kalendar," which first appeared in John Tobler's (1696–1765) South-Carolina Almanack in 1752 and later, in expanded form, in a second almanac, The Palladium of Knowledge (1796). She was one of a few female authors on the subject in a time when horticulture was dominated by men such as John BARTRAM in Pennsylvania and John Abercrombie (1726–1806) and Philip Miller (1691–1771) in England.

Martha Daniell was born in St. Thomas Parish, South Carolina, on December 29, 1704, to Robert Daniell, deputy governor of the colony, and Martha Wainwright Daniell. Robert Daniell died in 1718, and his widow married planter George Logan Sr. in May 1719. On July 30, 1719, at the age of fourteen, Martha married her stepbrother, George Logan Jr. Between 1720 and 1738 Martha Daniell Logan bore eight children; yet, she managed to sustain an entrepreneurial life for herself, perhaps out of necessity. She also held power of attorney over the property of her husband, who sometimes had to travel out of South Carolina. She ran a school in her home, advertising that she would board students and teach them to read, write, and do plain embroidery. When she moved to Charles Town, South Carolina, she expanded the offerings of her new school by hiring a schoolmaster who could teach arithmetic. She also turned her horticultural interests into a moneymaking enterprise, advertising the sale of seed, flower roots, and fruit stones. Her expertise was acknowledged by Bartram, with whom she exchanged letters and plants. She died at the age of seventy-four.

Work

Logan, Martha Daniell. "Gardners Kalendar," in The South-Carolina Almanack for the Year of Our Lord 1752. Charleston, S.C.: John Tobler, 1751; Early American Imprints, 29940.

Sources

Leighton, Ann. American Gardens in the Eighteenth Century: "For Use or for Delight." Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1976, pp. 128–129, 211–215.

Parrish, Susan Scott. American Curiosity: Cultures of Natural History in the Colonial British Atlantic World. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

Rudolph, Emanuel D. "Women Who Studied Plants in the Pre-Twentieth Century United States and Canada," Taxon, 39, no. 2 (1990): 151–205.

Loyalist

Supporters of the British during the Revolutionary War who steadfastly believed Parliament should rule over the American colonists were called Loyalists; they were also referred to as "Tories," or defenders of the monarchy and the Church of England. Some other colonists, who were critical of the use of violence to achieve social and political reform—for example, QUAKERS and Methodists—also sympathized with the Loyalists. Some slaves sided with the British upon promises of liberation once victory had been achieved. Loyalist Royal Governors included John Wentworth (1737–1820) of New Hampshire, William Franklin (1731–1813) of New Jersey, William Bull II (1710–1791) of South Carolina, and Thomas HUTCHINSON (1711–1780) of Massachusetts. Loyalist merchants and lawyers included Isaac Low (1735–1791) and William Smith Jr. (1728–1793) of New York and Daniel Delany (1721–1797) of Maryland. More colonists remained loyal to the British Crown in the Chesapeake areas, including Native Americans and slaves, than in the NEW ENGLAND colonies. When Charlestown fell to British forces in 1780, Loyalists in the South increased. Approximately nineteen thousand colonists served in forty-two Loyalist provincial corps. Although the Treaty of Paris (1783) admonished retaliation against the Loyalists, public sentiment was inflamed, and although few Loyalists were executed, their properties were confiscated, and many were exiled with the penalty of death should they return. Loyalists had the right to petition for their losses, and according to Robert McCluer Calhoon, out of the 3,225 claims filed, 2,291 petitioners were granted compensation, with 55 percent asking for £1,000 or less. Most Loyalists, however, voluntarily left their lands and property to the PATRIOTS and migrated to several different locations. Of the estimated sixty to eighty thousand Loyalists who departed America at the end of the war, Calhoon notes that seven thousand went to England and thirty to forty thousand to Nova Scotia and Quebec. More than one thousand black refugees settled in Sierra Leone, and still others relocated to the West Indies.

Loyalist songs and BALLADS reinforced traditional values and encouraged allegiance to the Crown while they also undermined American military power and promoted the advantages of British leadership as a colonial power. Songs and ballads were often put to the music of traditional, familiar tunes, such as "The Rebels" (1778), sung to the tune of "Black Joak," which begins,

*Ye brave honest subjects who dare to be loyal
And have stood the brunt of every trial,
Of hunting shirts and rifle guns;
Come listen awhile and I'll tell you a song;
I'll show you those Yankees are all in the wrong,
Who, with blustering look and most awkward gait,
'Gainst their lawful sovereign dare for to prate,
With their hunting shirts and rifle guns.*

Depicting the American as an ill-dressed, awkward figure, the song portrays the Patriot's cause as illegal and headed for failure. Another popular Loyalist song was "Tradesmen's Song for His Majesty's Birthday" (1777), sung to the tune "When Britain first at Heaven's Command," which begins "Again, my social Friends, we meet / To celebrate our annual display / This great, this glorious Natal Day: / 'Tis George's Natal Day we sing, / Our firm, our steady Friend and King." Thus, in the spirit of fraternity and loyalty, the song honors King George III and rallies support for the British cause.

Other popular Loyalist songs and ballads include "When Good Queen Elizabeth Governed the Realm," "Song for a Fishing Party near Burlington, on the Delaware, in 1776," "Burrowing Yankees," "A Refugee Song," and "An Appeal." Other essays, speeches, plays, and poems that express Loyalist perspectives include William Franklin's (1730–1813)

"Speech Before the New Jersey Assembly, January 13, 1775," Hannah GRIFFITTS's "On Reading a Few Paragraphs in 'The Crisis,' April 1777," Jacob Bailey's (1731–1808) The Factious Demagogue, a Portrait, and Joseph Stansbury's (1740–1809) "To Cordelia."

Sources

Calhoon, Robert McCluer. The Loyalists in Revolutionary America, 1760–1781. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1965.

Smith, Paul H. Loyalists and Redcoats: A Study in British Revolutionary Policy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1964.

The Ladies' Repository (1841–1876) periodical

The success of GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK and other women's magazines of the 1830s provided the inspiration for the Methodist church in Cincinnati, Ohio, to establish The Ladies' Repository. Samuel Collins, the magazine's founder, saw the potential of women's magazines to instruct women in moral uplift and encourage them to read for education rather than for entertainment. As a result, Collins and the Repository's first editor, the Reverend L. L. Hamline, imagined a much less secular publication than Godey's, but also one modeled on the successful Godey's formula.

The Ladies' Repository was published monthly in Cincinnati by the Agents of the Methodist Book Concern and it became the primary women's magazine in the West. From 1841 to 1848 the magazine was published with the subtitle and Gatherings of the West, which bespoke its Ohio origins and provinciality. Many of its contributors came from the American West, and pieces of regional interest regularly appeared in the magazine. The Repository included instructive essays, articles on various topics, poetry, and book reviews. It featured illustrations (principally engravings) and from 1851 to 1855 sheet music was printed in each issue. The editors, however, maintained a strong stance against fiction, and none appeared in its pages until the latter half of the 1850s.

Prior to the CIVIL WAR, the magazine achieved a circulation of forty thousand, and while this number dwindled during the conflict, by the end of the war the magazine regained its peak circulation. The recovery was short-lived, however, and the magazine failed during the 1870s, despite the addition of serialized fiction in 1873 and a makeover that turned

The Ladies' Repository into a family magazine. In January 1877, the magazine was replaced by the National Repository, an ill-fated publication that ended in less than five years.

Throughout its history, The Ladies' Repository was run by leaders of the Methodist church, who sought to instruct women in the ways of domestic piety and a feminine morality. Particularly during the antebellum years, the magazine advanced a notion of republican motherhood and helped normalize a domestic feminine, two prevalent ideologies of the nineteenth century. Though founded and published by men, women contributed significantly to the periodical. Prominent women writers featured in the magazine include Alice and Phoebe CARY and Lydia STGOURNEY.

Source

Stearns, Bertha Monica. "Early Western Magazines for Ladies," Western Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 18 (December 1931): 319–330.

—Elizabeth Lorang

"The Lady, or the Tiger?" by Frank Stockton (1882)

short story

Published in The Century in November 1882, "The Lady, or the Tiger?" is Frank STOCKTON's most popular children's story. Subverting the conventions of the fairy tale, Stockton's protagonist is a young man captured for his romance with the princess of a "semi-barbaric" king. As punishment the young man must choose between two doors—one conceals a fierce lion, the other a beautiful maiden. The princess gives a secret signal as to which door to open, and the author poses a question to the reader: What awaited her lover? Avoiding the didactic tone popular in other nineteenth-century children's literature, Stockton employs satire to expose society's violence, corruption, and greed.

Sources

Stockton, Frank. The Lady, or The Tiger? and Other Stories. New York: Scribners, 1884.

Zipes, Jack, ed. Fairy Tales of Frank Stockton. New York: Penguin, 1990.

—Jayanti Tamm

The Lamplighter by Maria S. Cummins (Boston: J. P. Jewett, 1854) novel

Published in 1854, The Lamplighter became an instant and much beloved best-seller. The novel is a female bildungsroman, meaning that the story centers on the development of a young woman. The main character, an orphaned and unruly eight-year-old girl named Gerty, is abandoned in the slums of Boston and rescued by a kindly lamplighter. He and a network of other generous neighbors and friends work together to guide Gerty to a poised and respectable womanhood. The novel was likely inspired by Susan Warner's similar tale, THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD (1850) and influenced by Charles Dickens's novels, which provide a sympathetic portrayal of the poor and working classes.

The widespread success of The Lamplighter prompted Nathaniel Hawthorne's notorious diatribe against the nineteenth-century American infatuation with women writers, or, as he termed them, the "d—d mob of scribbling women." Though now appreciated largely for its historical rather than its literary value, The Lamplighter offers readers a fine example of the "domestic" or "sentimental" fiction so popular in its day.

Source

Cummins, Maria S. The Lamplighter, edited by Nina Baym. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.

—Sabrina Ehmke Sergeant

Lanier, Sidney (1842–1881) poet, critic

Born in Macon, Georgia, Sidney Lanier was a Confederate volunteer during the CIVIL WAR. Captured by Union forces, he was imprisoned at Point Lookout, Maryland, for four months in 1864. The experience broke his health, and he emerged infected with the tuberculosis that eventually took his life.

After the war Lanier pursued interests in music and literature, playing the flute for the Peabody Symphony Orchestra in Baltimore and publishing a Civil War novel, Tiger-Lilies (1867). Lanier met the journalist and novelist Bayard TAY-LOR, through whom he gained an outlet for his poetry in LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE, which published "Corn" in 1875. Lanier continued to produce important poems for the remainder of his life: The Symphony (1875), The Song of the Chattahoochee (1877), The Marshes of Glynn (1878), and The Revenge of Hamish (1878). In such works Lanier developed his poetic theory, deliberately manipulating elements of prosody to mimic the poem's content.

In 1879 Lanier was appointed to a lectureship in English at Johns Hopkins University, and during his time there he produced three important works of literary criticism. The Science of English Verse (1880) explicated his poetic methods. In 1883 a much different work of criticism was published posthumously: The English Novel, which bears the subtitle From Aeschylus to George Eliot: The Development of Personality. A third work, Shakespeare and His Forerunners, is a collection of public lectures that was not published until 1902. Lanier's complete Poems (1884) were also published posthumously.

Sources

DeBellis, Jack. Sidney Lanier. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Gabin, Jane S. A Living Minstrelsy: The Poetry and Music of Sidney Lanier. Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1985.

Parks, Edd W. Sidney Lanier: The Man, the Poet, the Critic. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1968.

Larcom, Lucy (1824–1893) poet, editor

Born in Beverly, Massachusetts, Lucy Larcom began writing poetry when she was seven. Her father died when she was young, and she spent ten years working in the Lowell, Massachusetts, textile mills. In 1846 she left for the Illinois prairie, where she taught school and attended Monticello Seminary in Godfrey, Illinois, before returning to Massachusetts in 1854 to teach at Wheaton Seminary (now Wheaton College) in Norton. Larcom then became the editor of a children's magazine, Our Young Folks (1865–1873), and published her own poetry. She also edited several poetry anthologies, including three that were co-edited with John Greenleaf WHITTIER, with whom she had a relationship. She also edited a book of criticism, Landscape of American Poetry (1879), and wrote an autobiography, A New England Girlhood (1889).

Sources

Marchalonis, Shirley. The Worlds of Lucy Larcom, 1824–1893. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989.

Selden, Bernice. The Mill Girls: Lucy Larcom, Harriet Hanson Robinson, Sarah G. Bagley. New York: Atheneum, 1983.

The Last of the Mohicans

See LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

Lazarus, Emma (1849–1887) poet

*Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free. . . .*
—“The New Colossus” (1883)

Born in New York City and educated at home, Emma Lazarus is best remembered for her sonnet “The New Colossus” (1883), which is inscribed on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty. Her best work, however, is considered to be the poetic drama The Dance to Death, published in the volume Songs of a Semite (1882). This work—indeed the entire collection—was inspired by the Russian pogroms of 1882, in which thousands of her fellow Jews were persecuted.

Whereas Lazarus’s early work—collections such as Admetus and Other Poems (1872) and a novel, Alide: An Episode in Goethe’s Life (1874)—has been called sentimental by modern critics, by the time Lazarus published By the Waters of Babylon in Century Magazine in 1887, her poetry had begun to echo the work of Walt WHITMAN. Lazarus also published a translation of ballads and poems by the German writer Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) in 1881.

Sources

Moore, H. S. Liberty’s Poet: Emma Lazarus. Austin, Tex.: Turn-Key, 2005.
Schor, Esther H. Emma Lazarus. New York: Nextbook, 2006.
Vogel, Dan. Emma Lazarus. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
Young, Bette Roth. Emma Lazarus in Her World: Life and Letters. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1995.

Leather-Stocking Tales by James Fenimore Cooper (1823–1841) series of novels

James Fenimore COOPER focused this series of works on his idealized frontiersman, Nathaniel (“Natty”) Bumppo, whose nickname “Leatherstocking” stems from his preference for deerskin leggings. Bumppo would carry other nicknames as well—“Deerslayer,” “Hawkeye,” “Pathfinder,” “Longue Carabine,” and finally, simply “the trapper”—in the five novels that make up the series: The Pioneers (1823), The Last of the Mohicans (1826), The Prairie (1827), The Pathfinder (1840), and The Deerslayer (1841). The novels follow, although not in chronological order, the progress of Leatherstocking’s career from youth to old age, and his personality remains remarkably consistent throughout. Reverent of nature and discomfited by civilization, he is the perfect counterpart for his Indian companion, Chingachgook. Together with his dog Hector and his rifle Killdeer, Leatherstocking follows the American frontier as it advances westward. When he is last seen, in The Prairie, he is more than eighty years old, surrounded by Pawnee on the Midwestern prairie. With this area threatened by settlement, Bumppo turns his eyes westward and gives voice to his dying word: “Here!”

In creating Bumppo, Cooper probably drew upon his memories of a leatherstocking hunter named Shipman whom he had known as a boy and also upon tales of the legendary frontiersman Daniel Boone. Bumppo is born on the East Coast, where he is raised by the rapidly disappearing Delaware nation. His mettle is first tested during the French and Indian War (1754–1763), during which he is forced to shed human blood and distance himself from romantic entanglements. He does, in fact, eventually fall in love, but his suit ends in disappointment, and he returns to his beloved woods. Finally, after he loses even his boon companion Chingachgook, he heads west, walking all the way to the Pacific. Back on the prairie, Bumppo finally expires. Cooper’s series encourages readers to see his hero’s death in emblematic terms: Something wild yet gentle, solitary and yet humane disappears with the death of the frontiersman and the wilderness he has represented.

Source

Rans, Geoffrey. Cooper’s Leather-Stocking Novels: A Secular Reading. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.

The Leavenworth Case by Anna Katharine Green
(New York: Putnam, 1878) novel

Anna Katharine Green’s debut novel is not just the first legal thriller but is also considered by some to be the first bona fide mystery novel. The plot of The Leavenworth Case: A Lawyer’s Story is rife with Victorian melodrama, and it introduces a host of mystery-genre conventions: the body in the library, the locked room, a group of equally dubious suspects, and, most importantly, one of the first recurring detective heroes: nine years before the creation of Sherlock Holmes, Ebenezer Gryce is applying to crime investigation such scientific methods as the use of ballistics and medical evidence. Green pioneered the use of floor maps and “handwritten” letters, which were printed in the book along with the text. A best-seller for decades, The Leavenworth Case was made into a movie in 1936 and has been used in universities to demonstrate the problems with circumstantial evidence.

Source

Maida, Patricia D. Mother of Detective Fiction: The Life and Works of Anna Katharine Green. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1989.

—Mark Graham

Leaves of Grass by Walt Whitman (1855) poetry collection

Published in 1855, the first edition of Walt WHITMAN’s Leaves of Grass appeared anonymously (but included an engraving of Whitman) and contained twelve untitled poems, including the one later called "SONG OF MYSELF." In a preface that was subsequently left out of the volume Whitman declared that the poet must be a complete lover of nature and the embodiment of the common man. This focus on the ordinary seemed new to a nation accustomed to formal verse drafted by the so-called Schoolroom poets such as John Greenleaf WHITTIER, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, and William Cullen BRYANT. Leaves of Grass was a collection of poems at once small and unassuming and ambitious and all-embracing. "The United States themselves," the preface announced, "are essentially the greatest poem," and the poet incarnated the life of the country.

Few of the eight hundred copies in the first printing sold, and the following year Whitman published a revised and expanded version of Leaves of Grass, substituting for the "Preface" an open letter to Ralph Waldo EMERSON. This second edition included "Sun-Down Poem," which later became "Crossing Brooklyn Ferry." In 1860 Whitman published a third edition that included many new poems and that was arranged in a symbolic order, opening with "Starting from Paumanok" and closing with "So Long!" It also contained two groups of poems celebrating human sexuality, an especially controversial subject in the nineteenth century.

As Whitman scholar Joel Myerson has noted, Leaves of Grass was essentially a poem revised throughout Whitman's lifetime, each edition representing a new phase in the poet's life and the nation's history. Six editions (that is, resettings of type) of Leaves of Grass plus many printings were published during Whitman's lifetime. (There is some confusion on this point due to the complicated printing history of the book and the misidentification of augmented printings as editions.) His CIVIL WAR poems separately published in DRUM-TAPS (1865) and Sequel to Drum-Taps (1865–1866) and including Whitman's elegies on the death of Abraham Lincoln, "WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOORYARD BLOOM'D" and "O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!" were eventually integrated into Leaves of Grass. The final revisions of poems in the earlier editions were established in the 1881 edition, and new poems added later were simply appended at the end. While the poet was mortally ill, he prepared the so-called "Death-Bed Edition," in fact a set of the sheets of the 1881 edition with his final addition of poems appended at the end. It was published just before his death.

Sources

- Crawley, Thomas E. The Structure of Leaves of Grass. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1970.
- Myerson, Joel. Walt Whitman: A Descriptive Bibliography. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1993.
- Myerson. Walt Whitman: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 224. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Group, 2000.

Nathanson, Tenney. Whitman's Presence: Body, Voice, and Writing in Leaves of Grass. New York: New York University Press, 1992.

Warren, James P. Walt Whitman's Language Experiment. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1990.

"The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" by Washington Irving (1820) short story

First published in the sixth of the seven installments that constitute the first American edition of Washington IRVING's SKETCH BOOK (1819–1820), "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" has become one of the most famous stories in all of literature. As in Irving's other famous tale from The Sketch Book, "RIP VAN WINKLE," the setting is the rural Hudson River valley of the previous century. Ichabod Crane—a schoolteacher who enjoys (but is also frightened by) ghost stories—arrives in the village of Sleepy Hollow, the home of a famed local specter, "the Headless Horseman." In the story's climactic encounter between the comically awkward and high-strung Crane and the sinister (but probably counterfeit) horseman, readers experience a similar mixture of tension and humorous enjoyment. Even at the story's end it remains uncertain whether the proper response should be laughter or horror.

Based on German folklore, the tale relies heavily on the Gothic strain of European ROMANTICISM. Critics have been drawn to the many contrasting pairs of values, noting, for example, the dichotomies that are established between reality and fantasy and between intellectualism and practicality.

Sources

- Daigrepoint, Lloyd M. "Ichabod Crane: Inglorious Man of Letters," Early American Literature, 19 (1984): 68–81.
- Irving, Washington. The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent, 7 parts, as Geoffrey Crayon. New York: C. S. Van Winkle, 1819–1820.
- Seelye, John. "Root and Branch: Washington Irving and American Humor," Nineteenth-Century Fiction, 38 (1984): 415–425.
- Von Frank, Albert J. "The Man That Corrupted Sleepy Hollow," Studies in American Fiction, 15 (1987): 129–143.

—Brett Barney

Leland, Charles G. (1824–1903) poet, editor

Charles Godfrey Leland was born in Philadelphia and educated at the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University) before going abroad to study in Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris. While working as editor of GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE in 1857, he wrote and published a German-American dialect poem, "Hans Breitmann's Party." The poem was so popular that Leland published several volumes of humorous verse employing the Breitmann character.

Leland's editing career continued at VANITY FAIR from 1860 to 1861 and then for a year at THE KNICKERBOCKER

MAGAZINE. During 1862 and 1863 Leland was a founding editor of The Continental Monthly in Boston to promote the Union cause during the CIVIL WAR. After the war he resumed his travels and the study of languages and folklore. He wrote more than fifty books devoted to such diverse topics as Gypsies and their language, Indian legends, and Roman history.

Source

Parkhill, Thomas. Weaving Ourselves into the Land: Charles Godfrey Leland, "Indians," and the Study of Native American Religions. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.

Leslie, Frank (1821–1880) publisher, engraver

Frank Leslie was born Henry Carter in Ipswich, England. At seventeen he moved to London, ostensibly to work at his uncle's dry-goods store. Once in London, however, Carter pursued his dream of becoming a professional wood engraver, submitting engravings to publishers and printers under the name Frank Leslie. After several years he was hired by the London Illustrated Times and came to run its engraving department. During his six years at the newspaper Carter dreamed of starting his own illustrated weekly. He realized, however, that there was no market for another publication like the Illustrated Times in London. In 1848 he left for New York.

In New York, Carter went by the name Frank Leslie; he made it a legal change several years later. As Frank Leslie he found work with P. T. BARNUM in 1849, designing concert programs for the U.S. tour of the internationally famous singer Jenny Lind, whom Barnum was promoting. In late 1852 Leslie joined another Barnum venture, the short-lived New York Illustrated News. Financed by Barnum and the sons of publisher Moses Beach, the Illustrated News survived for eleven months. During its short run the newspaper met with enough success to nurture Leslie's dream of establishing his own illustrated paper. In pursuit of his goal Leslie first established Frank Leslie's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion and Fancy Needlework in 1854. He had observed the success of women's magazines, and launching one of his own seemed a solid business venture. Later that year he purchased the New York Journal of Romance. Then, in December 1855, he published the first issue of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. The success of Leslie's publications, particularly the Illustrated Newspaper, was largely due to his innovations in the engraving process and his pioneering use of illustration. Prior to the CIVIL WAR, many publishers shunned illustrations as both unwanted by dignified readers and expensive to produce. Pictorial reporting became an important feature of Civil War news, however, and Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper carried the best and most timely of these illustrations. Following the war, Leslie was well poised to take advantage of the booming market that had developed for illustrated periodicals. The Illustrated Newspaper eventually achieved a circulation of two hundred thousand, despite competition first from HARPER'S WEEKLY and then from a host of other publications.

In the years leading up to the Civil War, Leslie launched three other periodicals. In 1857 he debuted both Frank Leslie's New Family Magazine and the Illustrirte Zeitung, a German-language illustrated paper. (Leslie also later published a Spanish-language edition of his Illustrated Newspaper.) In 1859 Budget of Fun appeared. In the midst of the war, in 1863, came Frank Leslie's Ten Cent Monthly. The 1870s were the peak decade for Frank Leslie's publishing house. New magazines of this decade included Frank Leslie's Lady's Journal (1871), Frank Leslie's Boys of America (1873), FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY (1876), and Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine (1877). But Leslie did not just publish periodicals. Interested in the mass market, he also produced cheap reprints of popular books, heavily illustrated volumes, and a series known as the Home Library of Standard Works by the Most Celebrated Authors, which he started in 1877. Part of Leslie's success in this decade was certainly due to his second wife, Miriam, whom he married in 1873 and who possessed a business savvy equal to his own. When Frank died in 1880, she legally changed her name to Frank Leslie and continued to run the company for more than two decades, giving up the last of her publications, the Popular Monthly, in 1905.

Source

Brown, Joshua. Beyond the Lines: Pictorial Reporting, Everyday Life, and the Crisis of Gilded Age America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.

—Elizabeth Lorang

The Liberator (1831–1865) newspaper

One of the earliest and certainly the most famous of the many abolitionist newspapers, The Liberator was founded by William Lloyd GARRISON in Boston with the express purpose of advocating "the immediate enfranchisement of our slave population." In the inaugural editorial Garrison forewarned moderation and proclaimed his resolution to "be as harsh as truth," reasoning that one might as well "[t]ell a man whose house is on fire to give a moderate alarm." With Isaac Knapp as an initial financial partner and with financial support from a group of other staunch abolitionists (see ABOLITIONISM), Garrison edited the weekly for thirty-five years, never missing an issue. Its pages were devoted primarily to his message of immediate manumission, an idea that even most abolitionists in the early years of the movement considered radical. The paper also promoted as subordinate desiderata several other reforms, including temperance, pacifism, women's rights, and perfectionism.

Believing that the U.S. Constitution was inherently proslavery, Garrison refused to use the The Liberator to endorse political parties or programs; instead, the newspaper appealed to individual morality. It was only after President Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation and in the midst of the CIVIL WAR that The Liberator made its first political endorsement, recommending Lincoln's reelection.

Never economically profitable, The Liberator's influence far exceeded its relatively small subscriber base, which fluctuated between several hundred and several thousand. Through the practice of newspaper "exchanges," whereby newspapers around the country reprinted material from its pages, The Liberator became familiar to millions. Garrison decided to cease publication of the paper after the war, the outcome of which he construed as "a complete triumph as well as the utter termination of the antislavery struggle, as such." The final issue of The Liberator appeared on December 29, 1865. In a tribute printed in The Nation, O. B. Frothingham characterized the newspaper as "perhaps the most remarkable instance on record of a single-hearted devotion to a cause."

Sources

Fanuzzi, Robert. "'The Organ of an Individual': William Lloyd Garrison and the Liberator," Prospects: An Annual of American Cultural Studies, 23 (1998): 107–127.

Rohrbach, Augusta. "Truth Stronger and Stranger Than Fiction': Reexamining William Lloyd Garrison's Liberator," American Literature, 73 (2001): 728–755.

—Brett Barney

The Liberty Bell (1839–1857) gift book

The most prominent of a handful of abolitionist GIFT BOOKS, The Liberty Bell was issued annually (with hiatuses) in conjunction with Boston's abolitionist "fair," a Christmas-season event used to raise money for antislavery causes. The dominant force behind the fair and The Liberty Bell was Maria Weston CHAPMAN, who assumed most of the annual's editorial duties, with assistance from her sisters, Anne Warren Weston and Caroline Weston. Each also contributed frequently. Other well-known contributors included Caroline M. KIRKLAND, William Lloyd GARRISON, Wendell Phillips, Lydia Maria CHILD, Richard HILDRETH, Theodore PARKER, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Maria White LOWELL, and James Russell LOWELL. Among The Liberty Bell's unusually large group of foreign contributors were Harriet Martineau, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, George Thompson, and Alexis de Tocqueville.

Source

Thompson, Ralph. "The Liberty Bell and Other Anti-Slavery Gift Books," New England Quarterly, 7 (1934): 154–168.

—Brett Barney

Life on the Mississippi by Samuel L. Clemens (1873) memoir

The core of this hard-to-classify book was formed when, in 1875, THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY published a seven-part series of Samuel L. CLEMENS's reminiscences of childhood and young adulthood on the Mississippi River. In the eight years that Clemens took to transform the Old Times on the Mississippi sketches into Life on the Mississippi, he more than doubled the work's size. In bringing the book up to a respectable length, he incorporated statistics, extensive quotations, and a long reporter-style account of a recent trip on the river. At the same time he was also writing and revising his masterpiece, ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN.

Despite its obvious flaws (for example, inconsistency of tone, rambling structure, frequent tediousness), the appeal and importance of Life on the Mississippi are undeniable. For one thing, it is an illuminating companion piece to Huckleberry Finn, complementing that novel's treatment of the river, the region, and the history of both with its own nonfictional treatment. Life on the Mississippi has also always drawn admirers with its own inherent charms. It provides fine examples of Clemens's consummate use of LOCAL-COLOR techniques, and it includes some of Clemens's most engaging storytelling, as well as some of his most provocative utterances on realism, Romanticism, and Southern culture.

—Brett Barney

Lippard, George (1822–1854) novelist, journalist, essayist, political activist

These people who talk about art, art, art in literature are terrible twaddlers. Grace of style, elegance of language are invaluable aids to literature, but they are not the ultimates of literature. The great object of literature is the social, mental, and spiritual elevation of Man.

—Quaker City (June 2, 1849)

A best-selling author of his day, Philadelphian George Lippard was both pulp writer and political firebrand. Born into a stolid Pennsylvania German family, Lippard spent his early life skipping school, fishing in the Wissahickon Creek, and reading voraciously. This idyllic existence was soon shattered by the loss of his childhood home and the deaths of his parents, an infant brother, two sisters and a grandfather. In youth the gloomy and idealistic Lippard studied to be a Methodist minister but chafed at the rigid hierarchies and hypocrisy he saw at school. After another failed school attempt—this time studying law—Lippard became homeless, living in vacant buildings or in the apartments of artist friends. During this time he began writing, getting his first job as a reporter for the Philadelphia paper SPIRIT OF THE TIMES in 1841. Lippard soon distinguished himself as a short-story writer and a perceptive critic of American letters, singling out the underappreciated Edgar Allan Poe for abundant praise. The two men became friends, and it was Lippard who supported Poe critically and financially during his final days. Poe, for his part, called Lippard a “genius” but chided him for his “exuberant” literary style.

The “Lippard style” quickly gained the author notoriety with the 1844 publication of The Quaker City: or, The Monks of Monk Hall, A Romance of Philadelphia Life, Mystery and Crime. The biggest best-seller in America before the publication of UNCLE TOM’S CABIN, this novel of urban corruption and murder, filled with what many considered pornographic perversion, sold over sixty thousand copies in a single year. A sort of American Gothic, Lippard’s novel both outraged and titillated a nation of readers.

More than just a piece of sensationalism, The Quaker City was also a furious jeremiad against many forms of hypocrisy and injustice that characterized antebellum America. The extraordinary popularity of his novel made Lippard a celebrity. In demand as an essayist and lecturer, Lippard in 1846 wrote a series of “legends” about the Revolutionary War, including his account of the ringing of the Liberty Bell on July 4, 1776—a fictional story that has since entered into national mythology.

Lippard suffered the death of his wife, Rose Newman, only four years after marrying her by moonlight along the Wissahickon. Both of their children died in childhood. In the final years of his life Lippard published several more novels, founded one of the first labor unions, The Brotherhood of the Union, and wrote numerous editorials in support of the rights of women, laborers, African Americans, and Native Americans. He died from tuberculosis at age thirty-one, at the peak of his popularity and creative power.

Source

Reynolds, David S. George Lippard. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

—Mark Graham

Lippincott’s Magazine (1868–1916) periodical

This monthly was founded in Philadelphia by the publisher J. B. Lippincott & Co. in 1868 as competition for the preeminent periodical of the day, THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY published works by distinguished American writers but cast a wider net than The Atlantic, printing works by Southerners such as Sidney LANIER and William Gilmore SIMMS. It distinguished itself as the first publisher of Oscar Wilde’s only novel, The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891), which appeared in Lippincott’s in 1890. The magazine was also the first American publisher of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle’s Sherlock Holmes stories. Lippincott’s remained in circulation until 1914 when the magazine was sold and moved to New York. There it was published as McBride’s Magazine until 1916 when it merged with Scribner’s Magazine.

Little Women: or, Meg, Jo, Beth and Amy by

Louisa May Alcott (2 parts, Boston: Roberts, 1868–1869) novel

Louisa May ALCOTT’s Little Women: or, Meg, Jo, Beth, and Amy, based on her own youthful experiences, has been a classic of juvenile literature since its initial two-part publication. The novel grew out of the publisher Thomas Niles’s suggestion that Alcott write an account of her own childhood. In the novel the March family is an idealized version of the Alcott family and its four female children: Anna (Meg), Louisa (Jo), Elizabeth (Beth), and May (Amy). Set during the CIVIL WAR, the novel virtually ignores the absent March patriarch, concentrating instead on the almost wholly female world inhabited by Marmee and her girls. Each girl has a markedly different disposition: Meg is lady-like; Jo, Alcott’s alter ego, is an unconventional, tomboyish sort who aspires to be a writer; Beth is fragile and musical; and Amy is an artistic prima donna. The drama in the girls’ lives—just as in Jane Austen’s Pride and Prejudice (1813)—revolves around their attempts to increase the family’s income and, for all but Beth (who dies from the aftereffects of scarlet fever), to find a mate.

The immensely popular Little Women spawned a number of sequels: Good Wives (1869), Little Men (1871), and Jo’s Boys (1886).

Sources

Alberghene, Janice M., and Beverly Lyon Clark, eds. Little Women and the Feminist Imagination: Criticism, Controversy, Personal Essays. New York: Garland, 1999.

Colins, Carolyn Strom, and Christina Wyss Eriksson. The Little Women Treasury. New York: Viking, 1996.

Keyser, Elizabeth Lennox. Little Women: A Family Romance. New York: Twayne, 1999.

Local Color

A subset of REALISM, local color designates a particular kind of writing that flourished from 1865 to 1895, in which the primary focus of interest lies in the particular characteristics of a region and people at a particular time. It tends to be far more realistic than romantic literature and to reject sentimentalism. The term is frequently used interchangeably with regionalism, as both movements are types of realism and both emphasize places and characters unique to a geographical area. However, regionalism is a more general term without the historical (and sometimes dismissive) connotations associated with local color.

Although some poetry may be considered local color, the most common vehicle for local-color writing is the sketch or short story, with, generally speaking, the following characteristics: 1) characters are stereotypical or picturesque, staunch traditionalists, who speak the regional dialect and whose actions and personalities are indicative of the region (in local-color literature by women, the characters are frequently spinsters, widows, or young girls, sometimes in financial straits); 2) the setting—typically rural, often inaccessible, and isolated from encroaching urbanization—plays an essential role in the story and may even be a character itself (stories usually orbit around the village or a similarly circumscribed locale and focus on the traditional practices of the community); 3) plotlines are sparse, especially in local-color stories by women writers; 4) often there is a framing device in which a narrator recounts a yarn or story about another region; 5) the narrator sometimes acts as the audience for the story; and/or 6) there is a narrator who is an educated, nonnative observer whose comments are meant to enlighten the urban audience.

Hamlin Garland

The local-color movement developed as a reflection of a public consciousness of regional variation in America that began in the early years of the Republic and that developed rapidly in the wake of the CIVIL WAR. As the country expanded westward, particularly after completion of the transcontinental railroad in 1869, Americans gained a new sense of the vastness of the land and of the country's regional disparities. Writers began to appreciate—and to emphasize—the customs, dialects, costumes, and landscapes of their immediate locations. While such emphases had been used earlier by writers of Down East humor and frontier TALL TALES, local-color writers were distinguished by their combination of closely observed particulars with exotic scenes or customs in a formula that was at once realistic and romantic.

By common consent, Bret HARTE's "The Luck of Roaring Camp" (1868), a story about the spiritual transformation of a frontier gold-mining settlement under the spell of an orphaned child, is the first true piece of local-color literature. Perhaps because the movement began with a short story, its most noted achievements are also in that form and include stories by such writers as Hamlin GARLAND, Joel Chandler HARRIS, Sarah Orne JEWETT, and Harriet Beecher STOWE. In the twentieth century local color gave way to regionalism, which placed less emphasis on externals and more on the philosophical and sociological variations that distinguish different areas of the country.

—Revised by Mary Rose Kasraie

Principal Books: Local Color

- Cable, George Washington. Old Creole Days. New York: Scribner's, 1879.
- Chesnutt, Charles W. The Conjure Woman. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1899.
- Cooke, Rose Terry. Happy Dodd; or, "She Hath Done What She Could." Boston: H. Hoyt, 1878.
- Craddock, Charles Egbert (Mary N. Murfree). In the Tennessee Mountains. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1885.
- Eggleston, Edward. The Hoosier School-Master: A Novel. New York: Orange Judd, 1871.
- Freeman, Mary E. Wilkins. A New England Nun, and Other Stories. New York: Harper, 1891.
- Garland, Hamlin. Main-Travelled Roads: Six Mississippi Valley Stories. Boston: Arena, 1891.
- Harris, Joel Chandler. Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings: The Folk-Lore of the Old Plantation. New York: Appleton, 1881.
- Harte, Bret. The Luck of Roaring Camp, and Other Sketches. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1870.
- Howe, E. W. The Story of a Country Town. Atchison, Kans.: Howe, 1883.
- Jewett, Sarah Orne. The Country of the Pointed Firs. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1896.
- Page, Thomas Nelson. In Ole Virginia; or, Marse Chan, and Other Stories. New York: Scribner's, 1887.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Poganuc People: Their Loves and Lives. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert, 1878.
- Twain, Mark. The Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County, and Other Sketches. New York: C. H. Webb, 1867.

Bret Harte

Studying Local Color

Local-color writing is considered to have originated with Bret Harte's short stories set in the California mining camps, many collected in The Luck of Roaring Camp, and Other Sketches (1870). When Harte's work was picked up by THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, the genre gained immense popularity. Mark Twain (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), too, is a noted Western local colorist; his ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN and short stories such as "THE CELEBRATED JUMPING FROG OF CALAVERAS COUNTY" (1867) were exceedingly popular. The American South is also well represented, by, for example, Thomas Nelson Page's tales of Virginia plantation life, In Ole Virginia, Marse Chan, and Other Stories (1887); George Washington CABLE's OLD CREOLE DAYS (1879); Joel Chandler HARRIS's "Uncle Remus" tales (see UNCLE REMUS, HIS SONGS AND HIS SAYINGS); Charles W. Chesnutt's The Conjure Woman (1899); the Georgia poetry of Sidney LANIER; and In the Tennessee Mountains (1885) by Mary N. MURFREE (writing as Charles Egbert Craddock). The Midwest is represented by, among others, the stories of Edward EGGLESTON in The Hoosier School-Master (1871); Hamlin GARLAND's MAIN-TRAVELLED ROADS (1891); and E. W. Howe's The Story of a Country Town (1883). New England local-color literature is represented by some of the stories of Harriet Beecher STOWE, including Poganuc People: Their Loves and Lives (1878); the stories of Rose Terry COOKE, including Happy Dodd; or, She Hath Done What She Could (1878); Sarah Orne JEWETT's best-known work, The Country of the Pointed Firs (1896); Mary E. Wilkins FREEMAN's A NEW ENGLAND NUN AND OTHER STORIES (1891); and by the works of Rowland Robinson, Philander Deming, Alice Brown, and Celia THAXTER.

Collections of local-color literature include American Local-Color Stories, edited by Harry R. Warfel and G. Harrison Orians (New York: American Book Company, 1941), which anthologizes a wide selection of short stories dating from 1829 to 1907, gives an historical overview of the genre, and provides a conventional description of its characteristics. Elizabeth Ammons and Valerie Rohy's American Local Color Writing, 1880–1920 (New York: Penguin, 1998) also provides a good introduction to the genre and a representative sampling of short stories. The Southern tradition is represented by The Local Colorists: American Short Stories, 1857–1900, edited by Claude M. Simpson (New York: Harper, 1960) and Southern Local Color: Stories of Region, Race, and Gender, edited by Barbara C. Ewell and Pamela Glenn Menke (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2002).

Sarah Orne Jewett

A term common among nineteenth-century authors and critics themselves, local color has been defined and evaluated in varying ways by subsequent commentators. In “Realism and Regionalism,” Eric J. Sundquist emphasizes the historical context of the term in industrializing America when he writes that “local color records in part the rustic border world rendered exotic by industrialism but now made visible and nostalgically charged by the nation’s drive toward cohesion and standardization” (Columbia Literary History of the United States, edited by Emory Elliott [New York: Columbia University Press, 1988, p. 509]). Because vernacular cultures are themselves the focus in local-color writing, this literature presents a reassuring counterpart to the increasing industrialization and urbanization of the American landscape. In fact, Amy Kaplan in “Nation, Regionalism and Empire” (Columbia History of the American Novel, edited by Elliott and Cathy N. Davidson [New York: Columbia University Press, 1991]) and Richard Brodhead in “Cultures of Letters” (Columbia Literary History of the United States), argue that local-color writing contributed to reunification and the growth of national identity after the Civil War.

Other critics who have contributed to scholarship on local-color writing include Josephine Donovan, whose New England Local Color Literature: A Women’s Tradition (New York: Ungar, 1983) provides a good overview of the New England literature from a feminist perspective; Donna M. Campbell, whose Resisting Regionalism: Gender and Naturalism in American Fiction, 1885–1915 (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1997) reimagines the genre of regionalism as part of a clash between the masculine forces of naturalism and the feminine forces of local-color literature; and Judith Fetterly and Marjorie Pryse, whose Writing Out of Place: Regionalism, Women, and American Literary Culture (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003) argues that regionalism and local color present counterpoints to the post–Civil War definition of nation and literature. Other critical collections include Robert D. Rhode’s Setting in the American Short Story of Local Color: 1865–1900 (The Hague: Mouton, 1975); Jewett and Her Contemporaries: Reshaping the Canon, edited by Karen L. Kilcup and Thomas S. Edwards (Gainesville: University of Florida, 1999); Kate McCullough’s Regions of Identity: The Construction of America in Women’s Fiction, 1885–1914 (Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press, 1999); Stephanie Foote’s Regional Fictions: Culture and Identity in Nineteenth-Century American Literature (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001); and Tom Lutz’s Cosmopolitan Vistas: American Regionalism and Literary Value (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004). Several websites and many other books and articles are devoted to features of local-color writing.

—Mary Rose Kasraie

Locke, David Ross (1833–1888) journalist, editor

Born in Vestal, New York, David Ross Locke became a printer’s apprentice for the Cortland Democrat when he was ten years old. He became an itinerant printer a few years later, ending up in Ohio, where at the age of nineteen he founded the Plymouth Advertiser with a friend. Shortly thereafter he took a job as editor of the Findlay, Ohio Jeffersonian, which printed the first letter of Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby—Locke’s alter ego—on March 21, 1861. The Nasby sketches provided Locke an outlet for his rage over what he saw as the provincial attitudes toward African Americans among Northerners who failed to support ABOLITIONISM. Locke posed as a Copperhead—a Northern supporter of the Confederacy—and in a style made popular by the humorist Artemus Ward (Charles Farrar BROWNE), employed tortured grammar and twisted logic to make pointed comments on society.

When Locke became the editor of the Toledo Blade in 1865, he published the Nasby letters there, a practice he kept up even after he became the newspaper’s owner. Nasby proved to be immensely popular; President Abraham Lincoln read some of Nasby’s commentary to his cabinet officers before presenting them with the Emancipation Proclamation. (President Ulysses S. Grant’s Treasury secretary, George S. Boutwell, attributed the North’s victory in the CIVIL WAR to “the Army and Navy, the Republican Party, and the Letters of Petroleum V. Nasby.”) Locke also published a novel, The Demagogue (1891), and other political works.

Sources

Austin, James C. Petroleum V. Nasby (David Ross Locke). New York: Twayne, 1965.

Harrison, John M. The Man Who Made Nasby: David Ross Locke. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth (1807–1882) poet

*Not in the clamor of the crowded street,
Not in the shouts and plaudits of the throng,
But in ourselves, are triumph and defeat.*

—The Poets and Poetry of Europe (1845)

Born in Portland, Maine, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow descended from a colonial family. He attended private school and in 1825 graduated from Bowdoin College, where he was a classmate of Nathaniel HAWTHORNE’s. Longfellow taught modern languages at Bowdoin, and then from 1826 to 1829 he traveled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany. In 1829 he resumed his professorship at Bowdoin while writing essays and sketches for magazines. He was invited to become a professor at Harvard, where he began work in 1836.

Although Longfellow published his first book of poetry in 1820, his important work emerged with Voices of the Night (1839), which includes “Hymn to the Night,” and “A Psalm of Life.” Ballads and Other Poems (1842) includes “THE VIL-LAGE BLACKSMITH,” “THE WRECK OF THE HESPERUS,” “The Skeleton in Armor,” and “Excelsior,” a good example of the rousing verse that made Longfellow such a popular poet. Like other writers in Cambridge and Concord, Longfellow was staunchly abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM); he published Poems on Slavery in 1842.

By the 1840s Longfellow had become one of the most important literary figures in the United States. In 1843 he married Frances Appleton, the daughter of a cotton-mill manufacturer. The Belfry of Bruges and Other Poems (1845) includes classics such as “The Arsenal at Springfield,” “The Bridge,” “That Arrow and the Song,” and “The Belfry of Bruges.” Longfellow then began writing narrative poems such as EVANGELINE (1847), which evokes the pastoral life of the Acadians; and The Golden Legend (1851), set in medieval Germany. In this novelistic poem he was able to blend elements of ROMANTICISM with a genteel, domestic sensibility, characteristics that are employed more fully in Seaside and Fireside (1849). THE SONG OF HIAWATHA (1855) combined all of Longfellow’s strengths in retelling an American legend in a singsong, fairy-tale style that appealed to readers of all ages. Longfellow’s success as a poet was unprecedented. When he drew on another American legend in The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858), the work sold more than fifteen thousand copies on its first day in Boston and London bookshops.

By 1854 Longfellow had resigned his professorship, and although his happiness was shattered when his wife died in a fire in 1861, he published Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863) two years later. The book included one of his most famous poems, “PAUL REVERE’S RIDE.” By the 1860s he had turned to the study of Dante Alighieri (1265–1321). Between 1865 and 1867 Longfellow translated the Italian poet’s works and wrote a sequence of “Divina Commedia” sonnets—inspired by Dante’s Divine Comedy. These poems are considered some of Longfellow’s best work. Three of his later collections are The Masque of Pandora (1875), Ultima Thule (1880), and In the Harbor (1882).

Despite his popularity in his own lifetime, by the mid twentieth century Longfellow was being studied mostly as an example of a national poet and a conservator of the American myth; yet some of Longfellow’s poems are great precisely because of their simplicity and their accurate depiction of American manners and folkways. A mark of his transatlantic success is that he is the only American poet to be given a place in the Poets’ Corner of Westminster Abbey, the final resting place of Great Britain’s most significant literary figures.

Sources

- Calhoun, Charles C. Longfellow: A Rediscovered Life. Boston: Beacon, 2004.
- Gale, Robert L. A Henry Wadsworth Longfellow Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003.
- Irmscher, Christoph. Longfellow Redux. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2006.

Longstreet, Augustus Baldwin (1790–1870)

short-story writer

A native of Augusta, Georgia, Augustus Baldwin Longstreet attended Yale University and the country’s first law school in Litchfield, Connecticut. Longstreet worked in Georgia as a lawyer, a clergyman, and a journalist before becoming president of Emory College from 1839 to 1848. He went on to become the president of Centenary College in 1849, president of the University of Mississippi from 1849 to 1856, and president of the University of South Carolina from 1857 to 1865.

The work that made Longstreet’s name was GEORGIA SCENES (1835), a series of humorous but realistic sketches about life in the Old South. The book, a classic regionalist work, is an example of SOUTHWESTERN HUMOR that influenced the style of successors like George Washington HARRIS and Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS).

Devoted to his native state, Longstreet was an ardent supporter of the doctrine of nullification during the CIVIL WAR, which held that states need not enforce federal laws. His semiautobiographical novel about his Georgia boyhood, Master William Mitten (1864), proved unpopular, and subsequent stories written in the style of Georgia Scenes were not as successful as his original work.

Sources

- Justus, James H. Fetching the Old Southwest: Humorous Writing from Longstreet to Twain. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2004.
- King, Kimball. Augustus Baldwin Longstreet. Boston: Twayne, 1984.
- Romine, Scott. The Narrative Forms of Southern Community. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999.

Looking Backward by Edward Bellamy (Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1888) novel

In Looking Backward: 2000–1887, social reformer Edward BELLAMY used science fiction to criticize America’s so-called Gilded Age (see THE GILDED AGE). Julian West, the novel’s protagonist, falls into a hypnotic trance in the year 1887 only to be awakened a century later to a strange, new world where socialism and state engineering have ended war and poverty—along with money and social class. Taking the reader on a tour of America in the year 2000, Bellamy describes a number of technological marvels that were invented much later, including credit cards and radio.

The optimism of Looking Backward made it an immediate best-seller. It also spawned a political society, The Bellamy Nationalists, whose members tried to make the author's fictional future a reality in the present. In 1897 Bellamy wrote a sequel, Equality, which focused on women's rights and education.

Source

Lipow, Arthur. Authoritarian Socialism in America: Edward Bellamy and the Nationalist Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.

—Mark Graham

Lowell, James Russell (1819–1891) poet, critic

A wise skepticism is the first attribute of a good critic.
—“Shakespeare Once More,” in
Among My Books (1870)

A descendant of a distinguished colonial family, James Russell Lowell was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, and graduated from Harvard as the class poet in 1838. He earned an M.A. in 1841 and studied law but soon turned to poetry. He married Maria White in 1843 (see Maria White LOWELL), and abandoning his early conservatism, he published Poems (1844), which demonstrated an active engagement with liberalism and ABOLITIONISM. He also wrote for and edited the NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD from 1848 to 1852 and contributed to the Pennsylvania Freeman.

Lowell's most important poetic work in his early career was A FABLE FOR CRITICS (1848), which commented satirically on many of his literary contemporaries. More than any other work, this book combined Lowell's talents as critic and creator. Although he adopted a light tone, his perceptions were incisive and penetrated to the core of his subjects' styles. His BIGLOW PAPERS (1848)—published under the name Hosea Biglow—were written in a comic style and in a Yankee dialect, but they were also serious attacks on the doctrine of manifest destiny and the war in Mexico.

The middle period of Lowell's career coincided with the death of his wife in 1853. He became a professor at Harvard and published little until his 1864 literary essays, Fireside Travels (1864). In the following years he published a series of books on literary criticism: Among My Books (1870), My Study Windows (1871), Among My Books, second series (1876), Latest Literary Essays and Addresses (1892), and The Old English Dramatists (1892).

Lowell's The Cathedral (1870) was his most significant poetic work after the 1840s. As the first editor of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY—from 1857 to 1861—and as the editor of the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, he became a kind of cultural arbiter who also exercised considerable political influence as an essayist. His second series of The Biglow Papers (1876), explored Northern attitudes toward the CIVIL WAR and solidified support for the Union cause. Like Washington IRVING, Lowell became one of the few American writers to exert political and diplomatic influence and to take government office. He was minister to Spain from 1877 to 1880 and minister to England from 1880 to 1885. His Political Essays appeared in 1888.

Sources

Beatty, Richmond Croom. James Russell Lowell. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1942.

Duberman, Martin. James Russell Lowell. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1966.

McGlinchey, Claire. James Russell Lowell. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Lowell, Maria White (1821–1853) poet

Maria White was born in Watertown, Massachusetts, on July 8, 1821, the daughter of Anna Maria Howard and Abijah White, a prosperous merchant. White was educated at home by a governess, and then at the Ursuline Convent School in Charlestown, Massachusetts. During her childhood she developed a profound love of poetry, taking great pleasure in committing favorite poems to memory and reciting them, and also in composing her own original verse.

In 1839 White began to participate in a salon led by women's rights advocate and transcendentalist Margaret FULLER; the salon provided a forum to discuss contemporary moral and religious issues. White also began to attend gatherings held by the Band, an informal social organization comprising Harvard University students and their female relatives. White's brother introduced her to her future husband, poet James Russell LOWELL. The couple became engaged in 1840 and married in 1844. James credited his wife not only with serving as the muse for his poetry but also with improving his literary style and encouraging him to support progressive social movements such as ABOLITIONISM.

Although she did not publish her work extensively, Lowell was nonetheless a well-respected and moderately popular poet during her lifetime. Her poetry, often reform-oriented in nature, was praised for its ability to both move the hearts and awaken the consciences of its readers. Deeply committed to the TEMPERANCE and antislavery causes, she frequently integrated antialcohol and proabolitionist messages into her poetry. Her poems “The Slave-Mother” and “Africa” decry the institution of slavery primarily because of the terrible impact that it had on enslaved women.

During the 1840s and 1850s Lowell published her poetry in the collection The Female Poets of America in the collection The Female Poets of the United States; in the periodicals the Broadway Journal and PUTNAM'S MONTHLY; and in the gift book THE LIBERTY BELL. One of her most popular poems, "Rouen, Place de la Pucelle," praised the bravery, and imagined the last moments, of the martyr Joan of Arc. In the last years of her life Lowell struggled with illness, depression, and the loss of three of her four children, who died while still in infancy between 1847 and 1852. Her poem "The Morning-Glory" commemorates one of her daughters, likening her to a flower that had bloomed and faded too soon. The only comfort Lowell could find in the wake of her daughter's death, she wrote, was her faith that the child had found lasting peace and happiness in heaven. Having long been in ill health, Lowell died of tuberculosis in 1853, at the age of thirty-two. James Russell Lowell collected and privately published a posthumous edition of his wife's poetry, The Poems of Maria Lowell, in 1855.

Sources

Greenslet, Ferris. The Lowells and Their Seven Worlds. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1946.

Lowell, Maria. The Poems of Maria Lowell, with Unpublished Letters and a Biography, edited by Hope Jillson Vernon. Providence, R.I.: Brown University, 1936.

Walker, Cheryl. American Women Poets of the Nineteenth Century. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1993.

—Holly Kent

The Lowell Offering (1840–1845) periodical

The Lowell Offering was a periodical showcasing the writings of young women employed in the textile mills of Lowell, Massachusetts. Mill girls provided the cheap, reliable labor mill owners needed to build Lowell into the largest manufacturing center in America. Often coming to the mills from agrarian families around New England, operatives worked long hours to provide supplemental income for their families. To entice such young women into the labor force, mill owners promised to look after them by providing for their spiritual and intellectual well-being. All female workers lived in boardinghouses run by older women (often widows), and church attendance was mandatory.

Mill owners also promised educational opportunities for their workers, and many girls came to Lowell for the famed circulating libraries. For 6.25 cents a week, mill girls had access to a multitude of books and periodicals not available in their rural homes. Even though working hours stretched from 5:00 A.M. to 7:00 P.M., operatives found time to read and write. Provided with a unique opportunity for education and community, many mill girls formed "improvement circles" or clubs in which they practiced writing essays, stories, and poems, imitating the pieces they read in popular periodicals such as GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, The Lady's Pearl, and The Ladies' Companion.

Reverend Abel C. Thomas established an improvement circle in his parish and compiled the articles of his group in a sixteen-page pamphlet called The Lowell Offering. The first four pamphlets, released between October 1840 and March 1841, were so popular that the publication became a monthly magazine of thirty-two pages under William Schouler, the proprietor of the Lowell Courier. From 1842 until the final issue in December 1845, the magazine was edited by two operatives, Harriet FARLEY and Harriot Curtis. At the time, these women were among only five female editors in the entire United States.

Mill girls wrote stories about love, essays on moral and religious topics, descriptions of American scenes, biographical sketches, literary reviews, and comments on contemporary writers. The variety and skill of these pieces proved that laborers were no less cultured or intelligent than other women, despite their work outside the home. The Offering produced popular nineteenth-century writers such as Lucy LARCOM and Harriet Robinson, and it received praise from critics in America and abroad.

Despite its popularity, The Offering came under fire from labor reformers because it did not advocate workers rights. Sarah G. Bagley, who headed the Lowell Female Labor Reform League Association, led a campaign against Farley's neutral stance toward labor reform. In her own publication, the Voice of Industry, Bagley accused Farley of turning a blind eye to problems within the mills and claimed that The Offering painted a rosy picture of the harsh working conditions for women. Between 1845 and 1846 at least one-fifth of the workforce in Lowell supported the unionizing efforts of Bagley, and her criticism of The Offering led to its termination in 1845.

Sources

Ranta, Judith A. The Life and Writings of Betsey Chamberlain: Native American Mill Worker. Boston, Mass.: Northeastern University Press, 2003.

Robinson, Harriet H. Loom & Spindle; or, Life among the Early Mill Girls. Kailua, Hawaii: Press Pacifica, 1976.

—Sarah Elizabeth Klotz

Lyceum Movement

This system of adult education in science and the arts was initiated by an 1826 article in the Journal of Education in which the educator and reformer Josiah Holbrook (1788–1854) sketched out his plan for an informal lecture series that would educate and entertain the American populace. Holbrook founded the first "American Lyceum" in Millbury, Massachusetts in 1826, and within two years his American Lyceum group had spawned nearly one hundred other lyceums. Lyceums initially concentrated on natural history but gradually widened their curriculum to include topics such as travel, art appreciation, temperance, phre-nology, and spirituality. Among the most popular and well-paid speakers on the lyceum circuit were Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Henry David THOREAU, Oliver Wendell HOLMES, Lucy STONE, and Elizabeth Cady STANTON. By the time of the 1839 American Lyceum Union national convention, the movement included more than three thousand lyceums across the country. Their presence sparked interest in teacher training as well as in the founding of new museums and libraries.

The CIVIL WAR interrupted the movement's momentum, and in 1870 Bayard TAYLOR, himself once a popular lyceum speaker, remarked that what had once been an educational experience had degenerated into a "nonintellectual diversion." The lyceum movement influenced the subsequent emergence of CHAUTAUQUA.

Sources

- Bode, Carl. The American Lyceum: Town Meeting of the Mind. New York: Oxford University Press, 1956.
- Tapia, John E. Circuit Chautauqua: From Rural Education to Popular Entertainment in Early Twentieth Century America. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1996.

La Farge, Oliver (1901–1963) novelist, short-story writer

Born in New York City, Oliver La Farge graduated from Harvard with a degree in anthropology and archaeology and a fascination with Native American culture. He won a PULITZER PRIZE for his novel Laughing Boy (1929), about a Navajo silversmith who marries and then must come to terms with his wife's murder through a "Blessing Ceremony." His other books include All the Young Men (1935), a collection of short stories about both Indians and whites; The Enemy Gods (1937), a novel about a Navajo youth who resists the influence of white culture; As Long as the Grass Shall Grow (1940), a history of the American Indian; Raw Material (1945), a memoir of his intellectual development; and A Pictorial History of the American Indian (1956).

Sources

Gillis, Everett A. Oliver La Farge. Austin, Tex.: Steck-Vaughn, 1967.

Hecht, Robert A. Oliver La Farge and the American Indian: A Biography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1991.

Lardner, Ring (1885–1933) journalist, short-story writer, songwriter

*Are you lost daddy I arsked tenderly.
Shut up he explained.*

—The Young Immigrunts (1920)

Ring Lardner was a leading figure in what might be called the Golden Age of American humor during the first third of the twentieth century. He was particularly respected for his masterful rendering of vernacular speech and writing. Trained as a sports journalist, he drew on his experience covering baseball games for his first series of related short stories published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. Lardner's Bushier stories, the first of which were collected in YOU KNOW ME AL (1916), were a popular success, bolstering his reputation as a journalist, establishing his abilities as a writer of short fiction, and displaying his talent at reproducing colloquial language. Throughout most of his career he wrote a regular humorous newspaper column and published humorously satirical stories, often with dark nuances. When he moved from Chicago to New York in 1919, he was regarded as an estimable literary figure. His columns were nationally syndicated. Beginning in 1924 his books were published by CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, the leading literary publisher of the day. He was a fringe member of the ALGONQUIN ROUND TABLE, the group of wits who lunched together near the offices of THE NEW YORKER magazine, where many of them, including Lardner, were published, and he successfully indulged his interest in the musical theater. When Lardner died in 1933 at the age of forty-eight of illness complicated by acute alcoholism, he was eulogized as a tragic figure, notably by his friend F. Scott FITZGERALD, who used him as the model for the character Abe North in TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934).

Ringgold Wilmer Lardner was born in 1885 in Niles, Michigan, into a well-to-do family. His mother's love of music and his father's interest in sports were instilled in him early. In 1901, the year Lardner graduated from high school, his family fell on hard times, so he went to work in a series of local jobs. In 1905 he became a reporter for the South Bend

Ring Lardner, circa 1913

Times, and two years later he took a job as a sports reporter for the Chicago Inter-Ocean, where he impressed senior Chicago sports reporter Hugh Fullerton, who recommended Lardner as his replacement when he retired from the Chicago Examiner in 1908. Over the next five years, Lardner was featured sports reporter for the Chicago Tribune, the Boston American, The Sporting News, and the Chicago Examiner again, before he took over the popular daily humor column “In the Wake News” in the Chicago Tribune, which he wrote from 1913 to 1919.

In 1914 the first of Lardner’s epistolary Busher stories about the egotistical, barely literate baseball player Jack Keefe, was published in The Saturday Evening Post, which had a circulation of more than two-million copies. Lardner was a regular contributor to the Post and other slick magazines until his death, and his popular stories were collected in book form. You Know Me Al was the first of his ten collections of stories; a like number of his books, including poems, plays, and humorous nonfiction were published over the next seventeen years.

Lardner’s enduring reputation rests on his short stories, particularly on those about unsophisticated and uneducated characters with social pretensions. His second collection, Gullible’s Travels, Etc. (1917), also published first in The Saturday Evening Post, are first-person descriptions of a married couple who decide they are ready to move up in society, attend an opera, and, in the title story, after making some money in the stock market, travel to Palm Beach to mix with the “high polloi.” Narrated by Joe Gullible, the five related stories use a character type critics call the “wise boob”—a self-deluded narrator commenting on the foibles of others while revealing his own weaknesses. Lardner successfully used that device again in The Big Town (1921), a collection of five closely linked stories about the Finches, narrated by Jack Finch, describing a trip he, his wife, and his sister-in-law take to New York City, using the women’s inherited money to find the sister-in-law a husband.

In 1919 Lardner left the Chicago Tribune and moved to Long Island, New York. He began writing a nationally syndicated column for the Bell Syndicate, and he expanded his material beyond sports. In 1924, upon the recommendation of F. Scott Fitzgerald, Maxwell PERKINS, the heralded editor at Charles Scribner’s Sons, recruited Lardner. His first Scribners collection was HOW TO WRITE SHORT STORIES [WITH SAMPLES] (1924), ten stories published in magazines between 1914 and 1922 (eight of which are about sports, mostly baseball), with short nonsense headnotes unrelated to the stories that follow them. “CHAMPION,” a 1916 story about a despicable boxer lionized in the press because he was the champion, is an example of Lardner’s ambivalent attitude toward the sports world. While he enjoyed professional athletics, he saw the faults of participants who failed to live up to the ideals of the game. The book was Lardner’s most successful to that time.

His next story collection, THE LOVE NEST AND OTHER STORIES, collected nine stories published in 1925 and 1926, including only one sports story. The rest tend to be about flawed romantic relationships. “HAIRCUT,” (1925) perhaps his most anthologized story, is told in the first person by a barber, who recounts the shooting of a mean-spirited practical joker by a feeble-minded man avenging an insult to a woman who is his friend. “Who Dealt,” the only other story in the collection told in the first person, a characteristic of Lardner’s early work, is a monologue by a newly wed woman that takes place during a bridge game among her husband and his married friends, during which the drinking narrator reveals her husband’s pining disappointment over the lost love of the other woman at the table.

Alcohol abuse, marital dysfunction, and social pretension were common subjects for Lardner during the 1920s and early 1930s. His last major collection, Round Up (1929), included the stories in How to Write Short Stories, The Love Nest, and sixteen stories not previously included in a Lardner collection. Those stories included satires on theatrical producers and songwriters (“Liberty Hall” and “Nora”); stories about fickle and hurt-

A Busher's Letters

YOU KNOW ME AL

RING W. LARDNER

A baseball story—the baseball story of the generation—batted out by a writer who hits straight to the heart of the baseball fan.

Ring Lardner's years as Sporting Writer for the Chicago Tribune have given him all the "inside dope" on the National game. The accurate humor in the character of his "busher" will win many a reader, from the boxes to the bleachers.

GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY Publishers New York

Dust jacket for Lardner's collection of six epistolary short stories in which pitcher Jack Keefe reveals his boorish character

ful flappers ("Some Like Them Cold"); marriages in which the wife takes refuge in a bottle ("The Love Nest"); or in which a husband fed up with his wife's craving for antiques makes his own of their furniture with shears, a blowtorch, and an axe ("Ex Parte"). Drinking is a common affliction for Lardner's characters, as it was for him personally.

After Lardner moved to New York, he became increasingly active in the musical theater, an interest of his since childhood. His most successful effort was June Moon, written with George S. KAUFMAN and with music by Lardner, which ran for 273 performances on Broadway in 1929 and 1930.

Lardner died in 1933. All four of his sons had literary careers: James, a newspaper man, was killed in the SPANISH CIVIL WAR; David, a New Yorker writer, was killed during WORLD WAR II; John Lardner was a highly regarded sports journalist; and Ring Lardner Jr. was an Academy Award-winning screenwriter.

—Richard Layman

Principal Books by Lardner

- Bib Ballads*. Chicago, New York & Toronto: Volland, 1915.
You Know Me Al. New York: Doran, 1916.
Gullible's Travels, Etc.. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1917.
My Four Weeks in France. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1918.
Treat 'Em Rough. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1918.
The Real Dope. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1919.
Own Your Own Home. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1919.
Regular Fellows I Have Met. Chicago: Wilmot, 1919.
The Young Immigrants. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1920.
Symptoms of Being 35. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1921.
The Big Town. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1921.
Say It with Oil, published with Say It with Bricks, by Nina Wilcox Putnam. New York: Doran, 1923.
How to Write Short Stories. New York & London: Scribners, 1924.
What of It? New York: Scribners, 1925.
The Love Nest and Other Stories. New York: Scribners, 1926.

Dust jacket for the 1924 collection Lardner planned with the assistance of F. Scott Fitzgerald, who suggested the title

Dust jacket for Lardner's 1927 mock autobiography, collected from his syndicated newspaper column

The Story of a Wonder Man: Being the Autobiography of Ring Lardner. New York: Scribners, 1927.

Round Up: The Stories of Ring Lardner. New York: Scribners, 1929.

June Moon, by Lardner and George S. Kaufman. New York: Scribners, 1930.

Lose With a Smile. New York: Scribners, 1933.

First and Last, edited by Gilbert Seldes. New York & London: Scribners, 1934.

Shut Up, He Explained, edited by Babette Rosmond and Henry Morgan. New York: Scribners, 1962.

Some Champions: Sketches and Fiction from a Humorist's Career, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli and Richard Layman. New York: Scribners, 1976.

Ring Lardner's You Know Me Al: The Comic Strip Adventures of Jack Keefe. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Bruccoli Clark, 1979.

The Portable Ring Lardner, edited by Gilbert Seldes. New York: Viking, 1946.

Ring Around the Bases, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. New York: Scribners, 1992.

Studying Ring Lardner

Though he was known during his lifetime primarily as a journalist, Ring Lardner's enduring significance is as a short-story writer, as a humorist, and as a dependable recorder of American vernacular language. He wrote steadily for over a quarter of a century, beginning in 1905, producing a daily column during most of that time. There are four important collections: YOU KNOW ME AL (1916), Gullible's Travels (1917), The Big Town (1921), and the thirty-five stories in Round Up (1929)—which include those in HOW TO WRITE SHORT STORIES (1924) and THE LOVE NEST AND OTHER STORIES (1926); the student familiar with these works will find ample material of interest. Ring Around the Bases, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli (New York: Scribners: 1995; republished Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003) provides all of Lardner's Busher stories, written throughout his career, offering an opportunity to examine stories not otherwise readily available. Some Champions, edited by Bruccoli and Richard Layman (New York: Scribners, 1976) is a good collection of previously uncollected pieces.

There are three biographies of Lardner. The first was Donald Elder's Ring Lardner (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1956). Elder grew up in Lardner's hometown, Niles, Michigan, and he was a friend of the family. His biography is superseded by Ring Lardner Jr.'s My Family Remembered (New York: Harper & Row, 1976). The book is about the entire Lardner family, but the first two parts of the three-part biography concentrate on the author's father. Jonathan Yardley's Ring (New York: Random House, 1977) was published the following year. It is well researched and factually accurate, but lacks the intimacy of Ring Lardner Jr.'s book.

Ring Lardner: A Descriptive Bibliography by Bruccoli and Layman (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1976) is the best bibliographic work available. Lardner's letters to Maxwell Perkins, Ring Around Max (De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1975) were edited by Clifford Caruthers, who also edited the flawed Letters from Ring (Flint, Mich.: Walden, 1979). The recommended collection is Caruthers's revised and corrected edition published as Letters of Ring Lardner (Washington, D.C.: Orchises, 1995).

When Lardner died, F. Scott FITZGERALD published "Ring" a eulogy (first appearing in THE NEW REPUBLIC and collected in THE CRACK-UP) that has influenced the study of Lardner ever since. Fitzgerald wrote of Lardner's fiction: "How ever deeply he might cut into it, his cake had the diameter of Frank Chance's diamond." (Frank Chance was player/manager of the Chicago Cubs from 1905 to 1912.) It has been left to several generations of critics to dispute him on the basis of the stories of the 1920s and 1930s, but no extended argument has been offered. There are a handful of overviews of Lardner's work: Elizabeth Evans's

Ring Lardner (New York: Ungar, 1979), Otto Friedrich's Ring Lardner (Minnesota: University of Minnesota Press, 1965), and Patrick Walton's Ring Lardner (New York: Twayne, 1963) that might be useful starting points.

Critical study of Lardner begins with context—both his place in the tradition of the American fiction and in the tradition of American humor writing. Maxwell Geismar's Writers in Crisis: the American Novel 1925–1940 (1941; reprinted, New York: Hill & Wang, 1961) is a good place to start on the former; Norris Yates's The American Humorist: Conscience of the Twentieth Century (Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1964) is a good place to start on the latter.

—Richard Layman

Larsen, Nella (1891–1964) novelist

This, then, was where she belonged. This was her proper setting. She felt consoled at last for the spiritual wounds of the past.

—Quicksand (1928)

Born to a Danish mother and a West Indian father, Larsen studied at Fisk University and later obtained a nursing degree. In 1919 she married physicist Elmer Imes and became a member of the black elite in New York City, socializing with other HARLEM RENAISSANCE notables. Her literary reputation rests on two novels she published in the 1920s.

Quicksand (1928) is a semi-autobiographical text about the travels—physical and psychological—of a biracial woman trying to find the place “where she belonged.” Helga Crane leaves her job at a New Negro school in the South, seeking a fulfilling identity. When she does not find what she seeks in Chicago, New York, or Denmark, Helga experiences a moment of spiritual enlightenment or weakness and ends up married to a southern preacher in backwoods Alabama, trapped in a cycle of childbirth. Larsen's second novel, Passing (1929), focuses on an upper-middle-class African American woman, Irene Redfield, and her increasingly disturbing encounters with a childhood friend, Clare Kendry, who is passing for white and pursuing relationships in Harlem behind her bigoted husband's back.

In 1930 Larsen became the first African American woman to earn a Guggenheim Fellowship, but that year she was also accused of plagiarizing a 1922 story from Century magazine for her story “Sanctuary,” which appeared in Forum in 1930. The charge, though unsubstantiated, along with her 1933 divorce led Larsen to withdraw from society and to stop writing. From 1934 until her death thirty years later, she worked as a nurse, lived as a recluse, and never published again. Although her literary standing faded during her lifetime, Larsen has recently been reinstated among her Harlem Renaissance peers such as Jessie Redmon Fauset and Zora Neale Hurston, and her work is the subject of renewed critical interest.

Sources

Davis, Thadious M. Nella Larsen, Novelist of the Harlem Renaissance: A Woman's Life Unveiled. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

Larsen, Nella. Quicksand and Passing, edited by Deborah McDowell. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1986.

Rabin, Jessica. Surviving the Crossing: (Im)migration, Ethnicity and Gender in Willa Cather, Gertrude Stein, and Nella Larsen. New York: Routledge, 2004.

—Jessica G. Rabin

The Last Adam by James Gould Cozzens (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1933) novel

The main character in this novel is George Bull, a small-town doctor in Connecticut during the 1930s. He is barely competent and is not greatly concerned about his patients. Yet, he is the doctor who diagnoses the typhoid fever epidemic in his town—for which he may be partly to blame because of his lax inspection of the water supply.

The main subject of the novel is the social structure of New Winton, as James Gould COZZENS examines the stratification of the characters in terms of their intelligence and class position.

—Morris Colden

“The Last of the Belles” by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1929) short story

F. Scott FITZGERALD wrote important stories set in the South drawing upon his experiences during WORLD WAR I and his marriage to a Southerner. The narrator of “The Last of the Belles” is Andy, a Yankee who tries to understand Ailie Calhoun, a popular girl he meets while stationed in Georgia: “It was a time of growth and war, and there was never so much love around.” Six years later when Andy returns to Georgia to visit Ailie, he realizes that he will never be able to recover Ailie or his youth. The South and its women are lost to him. The story was first published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST and collected in TAPS AT REVEILLE (1935).

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

The Last Tycoon/The Love of the Last Tycoon by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1941) novel

At the time of his death in December 1940, F. Scott FITZGERALD had written seventeen of the thirty episodes in the plan for his Hollywood novel with the working title The Love of the Last Tycoon: A Western. Edmund Wilson assembled the 1941 text from Fitzgerald's manuscripts, but did not attempt to complete the novel; Wilson retitled it and made revisions for the sake of readability, thereby presenting the impression of a novel that was more finished than Fitzgerald's work-in-progress. The critical edition of The Love of the Last Tycoon that preserves the work as Fitzgerald left it was published in 1993.

Fitzgerald had been working in Hollywood as a screenwriter since 1937, and the hero of the novel, Monroe Stahr, was based on the deceased "boy genius," MGM producer Irving Thalberg, for whom Fitzgerald had worked earlier. The novel is mostly—but not entirely—narrated by Cecilia Brady, who loves Stahr. The young daughter of Stahr's enemy Pat Brady, she is a Hollywood insider and provides documentation for the movie-industry material. Unlike almost all Hollywood novels, Fitzgerald's book does not attack the motion-picture industry. Monroe Stahr is a brilliant, heroic figure committed to producing good movies who works himself to death. The novel includes Stahr's defeated love affair with Kathleen Moore, but the focus is on the making of movies. Even in its unfinished condition The Love of the Last Tycoon is one of three or four major Hollywood novels—one of which, Budd Schulberg's The Disenchanted, is about Fitzgerald.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. "The Last of the Novelists": F. Scott Fitzgerald and The Last Tycoon. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1977.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. The Love of the Last Tycoon, edited by Brucoli. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

Laughlin, James (1914–1997) publisher, editor, poet

James Laughlin is best known for founding NEW DIRECTIONS, which has published modernist (see MODERNISM) and avant-garde writers of distinction as well as important literature in translation since 1936. The first New Directions book he edited and published was the anthology New Directions in Prose and Poetry, which included the work of such authors as Ezra POUND, Gertrude STEIN, E. E. CUMMINGS, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Henry MILLER. Laughlin's correspondence with the writers he published over the course of his career is extensive. William Carlos Williams and James Laughlin: Selected Letters (1989) was the first of a series of similarly titled volumes that collect his correspondence with Kenneth Rexroth (1991), Delmore Schwartz (1993), Ezra Pound (1994), Henry Miller (1996), and Thomas Merton (1997). The author himself of many books, including collections of short stories and essays, Laughlin was also a respected poet. His collections include Wild Anemone and Other Poems (1957), In Another Country: Poems 1935–1975 (1978), The Owl of Minerva: Poems (1987), and The Country Road: Poems (1995).

Sources

Carruth, Hayden. Beside the Shadblow Tree: A Memoir of James Laughlin. Port Townsend, Wash.: Copper Canyon Press, 1999.

Dana, Robert, ed. Against the Grain: Interviews with Maverick American Publishers. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1986.

Lawson, John Howard (1894–1977) dramatist, screenwriter

John Howard Lawson grew up in New York City and graduated from Williams College. His early expressionist plays (see EXPRESSIONISM) include Roger Bloomer (produced 1923) and Processional (produced 1925). His later work reflects his interest in PROLETARIAN LITERATURE and radical politics. Marching Song (produced 1937), for example, is the dramatization of a sit-down strike. Lawson was one of the Hollywood Ten, a group of screenwriters who refused to testify about their political affiliations and were jailed during the Cold War period. Lawson spent a year in prison and had to write scripts under pseudonyms. He also published Theory and Technique of Playwriting and Screenwriting (1949), Film in the Battle of Ideas (1953), and Film: The Creative Process (1964).

Sources

Carr, Gary. The Left Side of Paradise: The Screenwriting of John Howard Lawson. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1984.

Dick, Bernard F. Radical Innocence: A Critical Study of the Hollywood Ten. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1989.

Lazarus Laughed by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1928) play

Inspired by the biblical story of Lazarus, this Eugene O'NEILL drama is the only major play he completed in the 1920s not to be produced on Broadway. Lazarus Laughed premiered at the Pasadena Playhouse in California on April 9, 1928, and ran for twenty-eight performances. The action of the play begins shortly after Lazarus is revived by Jesus. Reveling in life, the raised man becomes a laughing prophet who denies the power of death, even when he is burned alive by the Roman emperor Caligula. The play continues O'Neill's experimentation with masks, a symbolic device he first employed in The Great God Brown (produced 1926). With the exception of Lazarus, the only man who lives without the fear of death, the entire cast, including Lazarus's family and a chorus of forty-nine Greeks, legionnaires, and Roman senators, wears masks. O'Neill later commented on the play that he advocated masks "wherever a sense of impersonal, collective mob psychology is wanted."

—James Fisher

Lerner, Alan Jay (1918–1986) lyricist

Born into a wealthy family, Alan Jay Lerner was indulged by his parents and developed a lifelong habit of lavish spending. Educated at Choate and Harvard, Lerner wrote music and lyrics for school shows and, after graduation in 1940, married the first of what turned out to be seven wives. Lerner was mentored by lyricist Lorenz HART. He was sought out by the Viennese composer Frederick Loewe.

They established a collaboration that would last for eighteen years and produce some of the greatest songs—and shows—of the Broadway stage. Their first major success was Brigadoon (1947), for which Lerner wrote a whimsical libretto about two American travelers who stumble upon a mystical Scottish village that comes to life once every hundred years. Their songs included “Almost Like Being in Love.” Despite their success, Lerner and Loewe’s collaboration was filled with tension; Lerner was a workaholic who always insisted upon moving on to newer projects, while Loewe loved to relax among ladies at the gambling tables of Europe.

Lerner left New York to work in Hollywood, where he wrote the screenplay for a Fred Astaire musical, Royal Wedding (1951), and collaborated on songs with composer Burton Lane. One of their comic songs sported the longest title in the annals of popular song: “How Could You Believe Me When I Said I Loved You When You Know I’ve Been a Liar All My Life?” The movie also featured the poignant torch song, “Too Late Now.” While in Hollywood, Lerner also wrote the screenplay for An American in Paris (1951), which showcased the songs of George and Ira GERSHWIN.

Returning to Broadway and reuniting with Loewe, Lerner wrote the western musical Paint Your Wagon (1951) which produced the hit song “They Call the Wind Maria.” Lerner and Loewe then began work on adapting George Bernard Shaw’s Pygmalion into a musical, a project that Richard Rodgers and Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II as well as other songwriters had turned down. He and Loewe created a score that is arguably the greatest in American musical theater, featuring songs such as “I’ve Grown Accustomed to Her Face,” “I Could Have Danced All Night,” and “On the Street Where You Live.” Each song was completely integral to the story and characters but many went on to become independently popular, thanks, in part, to the popularity of “Original Broadway Cast” albums that enabled listeners who had never seen a Broadway show to become familiar with its score.

Lerner and Loewe wrote a great score for the movie Gigi in 1958 and then had their last Broadway hit show with Camelot in 1960. From then on Lerner collaborated with other composers on shows that never approached the success of My Fair Lady. The closest he came was in 1965 with Burton Lane on On a Clear Day You Can See Forever. In the songs he wrote with Loewe, Lerner proved himself an unparalleled lyricist, one who could combine Lorenz Hart’s brilliant rhymes and wordplay with Oscar Hammerstein’s skill in weaving lyrics fully into the characters and dramatic situations of a libretto.

Sources

Citron, Stephen. The Wordsmiths: Oscar Hammerstein 2nd & Alan Jay Lerner. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
Lees, Gene. Inventing Champagne: The Worlds of Lerner and Loewe. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1990.

—Philip Furia

Le Sueur, Meridel (1900–1996) journalist, novelist, short-story writer

Meridel Le Sueur’s father was a radical lawyer, and she absorbed his politics, moving to New York and becoming a member of the Communist Party. She wrote for the Daily Worker and The New Masses. Her collection of stories and reportage Salute to Spring (1940) emphasized the hardships of women during the GREAT DEPRESSION and show her sympathetic connections to PROLETARIAN LITERATURE. Like many radicals she was investigated and blacklisted during the Cold War period. She wrote fiction sporadically and made her living as a journalist. Beginning in the late 1970s Le Sueur was rediscovered as a writer. Her recovered works include The Girl (1978), a novel that was rejected in 1939, and collections such as Song for My Time: Stories of the Period of Repression (1977), Ripening: Selected Work, 1927–1980 (1982), and I Hear Men Talking and Other Stories (1984).

Sources

Boehnlein, James M. The Sociocognitive Rhetoric of Meridel Le Sueur: Feminist Discourse and Reportage of the Thirties. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1994.
Coiner, Constance. Better Red: The Writing and Resistance of Tillie Olsen and Meridel Le Sueur. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

—Tilly Newell

Let Us Now Praise Famous Men by James Agee (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1941) nonfiction

JAMES AGEE’s powerful account of three Alabama sharecropping families during the GREAT DEPRESSION, with photographs by Walker Evans, was begun in 1936 as a series of articles for Fortune magazine, but the articles were not printed because they were not conventional reporting. The book presented a compelling and compassionate portrait of rural poverty through Agee’s poetic writing and Evans’s carefully composed photographs. This profoundly sympathetic account of the poor is reminiscent of other works of PROLETARIAN LITERATURE, especially John STEINBECK’s novel THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939).

Sources

Böger, Astrid. Documenting Lives: James Agee’s and Walker Evans’s Let Us Now Praise Famous Men. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.

Maharidge, Dale, and Michael Williamson. And Their Children After Them: The Legacy of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men: James Agee, Walker Evans, and The Rise and Fall of Cotton in the South. New York: Pantheon Books, 1989.

Lewis, Janet (1899–1998) poet, novelist

Janet Lewis graduated from the University of Chicago and married the poet and critic Yvor WINTERS. Her first book was the poetry collection The Indians in the Woods (1922), which was followed by collections such as The Wheel in Midsummer (1927) and The Earth-Bound, 1924–1944 (1946). She wrote novels about a variety of subjects and settings, including an eighteenth-century Michigan family with an Irish and Indian heritage in The Invasion (1932); seventeenth-century Denmark in The Trial of Søren Qvist (1947); and the France of Louis XIV in The Ghost of Monsieur Scarron (1959).

Source

Crow, Charles L. Janet Lewis. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1980.

Lewis, Sinclair (1885–1951) novelist

Harry Sinclair Lewis was born in Sauk Centre, Minnesota, a town of some 1,500 people set in a rolling wheat-farm-land. His father, Dr. E. J. Lewis, was a country physician, and Harry accompanied him on his calls at farms. A lonely, bookish boy, he found his peers scornful of his wild imagination, yet he yearned to belong. His two brothers had different temperaments. Fred, much older, became a miller, and Claude, his father's favorite, became a respected surgeon.

In 1903 Lewis passed the Yale entrance exam. Gangling, pimpled, and gauche, he was a social failure but found a niche contributing to literary magazines. After college he moved to Iowa to take the first of four newspaper jobs; he was fired from all of them. He finally settled in New York where his Yale connections secured him an editorial job with a publishing firm.

In 1914 he married Grace Hegger, a stylish fashion-magazine editor. That same year, he published his first novel, Our Mr. Wrenn, a seriocomic tale in the style of H. G. Wells in which a junkie to England—which Lewis had visited in college—transforms a mousy clerk into a manly fellow. The newlyweds lived in Port Washington, Long Island, while Lewis commuted to New York. While riding the train, he wrote a second novel, The Trail of the Hawk (1915), a “romance of realism” set in the pioneering days of aviation.

In 1915 he became a full-time writer, with a ready story market at the high-paying SATURDAY EVENING POST. He also managed to write in 1916 a third novel that at last presaged his future achievements, The Job (1917). It dealt realistically with the lives of the growing ranks of women office workers. Henceforth, Lewis's most successful novels blended satire and realism.

Sinclair Lewis, circa 1920

In 1918 the Lewises moved for a time to St. Paul, where he researched the novel he deeply wanted to write. He already had the title—“Main Street.” Inspired by boyhood memories of the stifling dullness and narrow horizons of small-town life, Lewis sweated to create a work that, unlike his commercial magazine work, told the truth about small towns as he knew them. Published in 1920, MAIN STREET provoked debate and controversy among readers in cities and towns across America. The novel drew attention to the gap between the old, socially conservative rural America and the new, liberal urban America, which drew small-townners fleeing the same “dullness made God” that his heroine Carol Kennicott experienced in Gopher Prairie.

Lewis followed Main Street in 1922 with another literary sensation, the satirical, ultimately sad BABBITT, which questioned materialistic values, the dominance of business, and the ethos of salesmanship and success. These themes reverberated through Lewis's next novels—ARROWSMITH (1925), ELMER GANTRY (1927), The Man Who Knew Coolidge (1928), and Dodsworth (1929). Throughout the 1920s, drawing on extensive research into worlds he wrote about, Lewis delivered one critically praised best-seller after another, growing in fame and wealth. Arrowsmith was awarded the PULITZER PRIZE, which Lewis declined. He and Grace continued to wander, spending much of their time in rented homes and hotel suites in Europe. All this roving took its toll on their marriage, as did Lewis's dependence on alcohol, and they separated in 1926.

After the stormy reception the following year of his novel about a corrupt evangelist, Elmer Gantry, he departed for Europe, where he met the foreign correspondent Dorothy Thompson. They married in 1929. Lewis's next book, Dodsworth, was about the travels in Europe of a retired American auto magnate (married to a snobbish wife based on Grace), who is seeking truth and his American identity in Europe. In 1930 Lewis became the first American writer to be awarded the Nobel Prize in literature, an honor he accepted.

Meanwhile, the irreverence and hedonism of the Jazz Age gave way to a literature of social comment and radical ideas. Lewis, an independent liberal, was sympathetic to the cause of labor, but he disliked left-wing propaganda novels. Fearful that he could not live up to his Nobel Prize and unsure of his audience, he went nearly five years without a novel. In 1933 he restored himself to public favor with a novel about a feminist, Ann Vickers (based on Dorothy and emancipated women he had known in his Greenwich Village days).

After writing two inferior novels Lewis found a subject that suited him in the newspaper headlines in 1935. Ironically titled It Can't Happen Here (1935), this overtly political novel was an attack on American fascists such as Senator Huey Long. Lewis's understanding of fascism derived partly from his wife's reporting trips to Adolf Hitler's Germany.

In 1942, his career in the doldrums, he returned to his home state seeking to reconnect with his roots. From 1944 through 1947, he lived in Duluth, which he transformed into the fictional city of Grand Republic in his 1945 novel about marriage American style, Cass Timberlane. He followed that best-seller with another Grand Republic novel, Kingsblood Royal (1947), a story of a man who discovers that a distant ancestor was a full-blooded African American. Although propagandistic, it effectively exposed America's hypocrisy on racial equality.

Then came The Godseeker, (1949), a weak effort, and World So Wide (1951). Depressed by rejection and failing powers, he resumed drinking after seven years abstinence. He spent his last years in Italy and died in Rome in 1951 of a heart attack.

At his best Lewis graphically depicted Americans in a satirical mirror that magnified the national faults—conformity, herd thinking, commercialism, religious hypocrisy, phony patriotism, and boosterism. He once said, "It's my mission in life to be the despised critic, the eternal faultfinder. I must

Dust jacket for the best-selling 1920 novel that established Lewis's reputation as an important novelist carp and scold until everyone despises me. That's what I was put here for." At heart a patriot, he paid Americans the highest compliment he knew: scolding them for not living up to the best in themselves.

—Richard Lingeman

Principal Books by Lewis

Hike and the Aeroplane, as Tom Graham. New York: Stokes, 1912.

Our Mr. Wrenn: The Romantic Adventures of a Gentle Man. New York & London: Harper, 1914.

The Trail of the Hawk: A Comedy of the Seriousness of Life. New York & London: Harper, 1915.

The Job: An American Novel. New York & London: Harper, 1917.

The Innocents: A Story for Lovers. New York & London: Harper, 1917.

Free Air. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1919.

Dust jacket for Lewis's satirical 1922 novel on American business culture, personified by realtor George F. Babbitt

- Main Street: The Story of Carol Kennicott.* New York: Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1920.
- Babbitt.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1922.
- Arrowsmith.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1925.
- Mantrap.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1926.
- Elmer Gantry.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1927.
- The Man Who Knew Coolidge; Being the Soul of Lowell Schmaltz.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1928.
- Dodsworth.* New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1929.
- Ann Vickers.* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1933.
- Work of Art.* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1934.
- Jayhawker: A Play in Three Acts,* by Lewis and Lloyd Lewis. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1935.
- It Can't Happen Here.* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1935.
- Selected Short Stories.* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1935.
- It Can't Happen Here,* by Lewis and John C. Moffitt. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1938.
- The Prodigal Parents.* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1938.

- Bethel Merriday.* New York: Doubleday, Doran, 1940.
- Gideon Planish.* New York: Random House, 1943.
- Cass Timberlane: A Novel of Husbands and Wives.* New York: Random House, 1945.
- Kingsblood Royal.* New York: Random House, 1947.
- The God-Seeker.* New York: Random House, 1949.
- World So Wide.* New York: Random House, 1951.
- From Main Street to Stockholm: Letters of Sinclair Lewis, 1919–1930,* edited by Harrison Smith. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.
- The Man from Main Street; A Sinclair Lewis Reader: Selected Essays and Other Writings,* edited by Harry E. Maule and Melville H. Cane. New York: Random House, 1953.
- I'm a Stranger Here Myself, and Other Stories,* edited by Mark Schorer. New York: Dell, 1962.
- Storm in the West,* by Lewis and Dore Schary. New York: Stein & Day, 1963.

Studying Sinclair Lewis

Sinclair Lewis wrote and published 22 novels and 125 short stories as well as essays, plays, and journalistic articles in a prolific career spanning four decades. This productive career divides into two phases at 1930, when Lewis became the first American to be awarded the Nobel Prize in literature. The first period includes most of Lewis's major novels wherein he uses satire and realism to explore issues facing the United States between the world wars. His subjects include small-town life in MAIN STREET (1920), business in BABBITT (1922), the medical profession in ARROWSMITH (1925), religious revivalism in ELMER GANTRY (1927), and the American abroad in Dodsworth (1929). The most notable book from Lewis's second phase is his speculative work on American fascism, It Can't Happen Here (1935). Despite the varieties of work he composed, Lewis's enduring reputation is of a novelist who spoke to the particular concerns of his times.

The student who reads the scholarship and criticism on Lewis will encounter a variety of assessments of his works and career. The most apparent divide in Lewis scholarship is the way in which so-called New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM) discounted Lewis's works because of their supposed inferiority to the works of celebrated contemporaries. While many critics, before and after New Criticism, find Lewis an important and relevant voice in American literature, some—most notably, biographer Mark Schorer—restrict their accounts to his limitations. The most useful critical appraisals include three volumes of collected essays, Sinclair Lewis at 100: Papers Presented at a Centennial Conference, edited by Michael E. Connaughton (St. Cloud, Minn.: St. Cloud State University 1985); Critical Essays on Sinclair Lewis, edited by Martin Bucco (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1986); and Sinclair Lewis, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea, 1987). Important book-length studies include D. J. Dooley's The Art of Sinclair Lewis (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1967), Bucco's Main Street: The Revolt of Carol Kennicott (New York: Twayne, 1993), and James M. Hutchisson's Rise of Sinclair Lewis, 1920–1930 (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996), which focuses on Lewis's creative process and on his major novels. The Sinclair Lewis Society Newsletter, which includes scholarly articles and notes on Lewis's works among other items of interest, is published twice a year, and the society also manages a website (<<http://www.english.ilstu.edu/separry/sinclairlewis/>>).

Dust jacket for Lewis's novel on a corrupt evangelist that prompted real-life evangelist Billy Sunday to call on God to strike Lewis dead

Schorer's Sinclair Lewis: An American Life (New York: McGraw Hill, 1961) is the most complete biography, but it should be supplemented with Richard Lingeman's Sinclair Lewis: Rebel from Main Street (New York: Random House, 2002). Other helpful biographies are Carl Van Doren's Sinclair Lewis: A Biographical Sketch (New York: Doubleday, 1933) and Vincent Sheean's Dorothy and Red (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1963).

The standard secondary bibliography is Robert E. Flemming's Sinclair Lewis: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980), which Flemming has twice updated, first with "A Sinclair Lewis Checklist" in Sinclair Lewis at 100: Papers Presented at a Centennial Conference and second with "Recent Research in Sinclair Lewis," in Modern Fiction Studies, 31 (Autumn, 1985). Students should complement the use of Flemming's work with the Modern Language Association's annual bibliographies, available on-line at major libraries. The best primary bibliography is Stephen R. Pastore's Sinclair Lewis: A Descriptive Bibliography (New Haven: Yale Books, 1997). Among the libraries holding Lewis's papers, Yale University's Beineke Library has the largest collection, but important, smaller collections reside at Syracuse University's library and the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center housed at the University of Texas.

—Casey Boyle

The Liberator

See THE MASSES.

Liebling, A. J. (1904–1963) journalist, sportswriter

He hit the hedonist with a left hook to the body and then switched it to the head. The Swede was in the same place when the punch landed as when it started. He went down like a double portion of Swedish pancakes with lingonberries and sour cream.

—Coverage of the third heavyweight title fight between Ingemar Johansson and Floyd Patterson, 1961

Expelled from Dartmouth College for failing to attend chapel, Abbott Joseph Liebling graduated from the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism and began a successful career writing for newspapers in the 1920s. In 1935 he joined the staff of THE NEW YORKER, where after WORLD WAR II he followed Robert BENCHLEY as the author of the "Wayward Press" column and monitored the integrity of his profession with biting humor. Most of Liebling's books are collections of sketches and articles he wrote for the magazine. He wrote of his native New York in Back Where I Came From (1938) and The Telephone Booth Indian (1942) and recounted his adventures as a war correspondent in The Road Back to Paris (1944). One of his best books is The Sweet Science: A Ringside View of Boxing (1956). He also wrote a biography of the Louisiana governor Earl Long, The Earl Of Louisiana (1961).

Source

Sokolov, Raymond. Wayward Reporter: The Life of A. J. Liebling. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

Light in August by William Faulkner (New York: Random House, 1932) novel

Light in August is William FAULKNER's seventh novel, but it is his first to deal explicitly with the subject of race. This sprawling novel focuses largely on Joe Christmas, an orphan who appears to be white but who may have had a black father—thus making him black by custom and by law in the early-twentieth-century South. The middle chapters tell of Christmas's youth, in an orphanage then in a strict Presbyterian household under a domineering adoptive father, against whom he violently rebels and leaves home. He ends up in YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, Mississippi, where he works briefly at a sawmill before establishing a moonshine business and has an affair with Joanna Burden, an aging woman whose brother and grandfather had been killed years earlier for trying to secure civil rights for freed slaves after the Civil War. Other major characters include pregnant Lena Grove, who comes searching for her baby's father; the Rev. Gail Hightower, an aging, disgraced former minister; and Byron Bunch, a pious sawmill worker who falls in love with Lena.

When Burden is found murdered, suspicions initially fall upon Lucas Burch, the father of Lena's baby, who partnered with Christmas after fleeing the responsibility of fatherhood, but he dispels those suspicions by revealing that Christmas is black. Christmas is caught and jailed, but he escapes and seeks sanctuary in Hightower's house, where he is killed and castrated by a National Guardsman. The novel is notable for its powerful indictment of racial politics and identity in the Jim Crow South and its criticism of religious orthodoxy and fundamentalism devoid of human judgment and mercy.

Sources

Berland, Alwyn. Light in August: A Study in Black and White. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Modern Critical Interpretations of William Faulkner's Light in August. New York: Chelsea, 1988.

Millgate, Michael, ed. New Essays on Light in August. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Ruppersburg, Hugh M. Reading Faulkner: Light in August. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.

—John B. Padgett

Lindbergh, Anne Morrow (1906–2001)
autobiographer, poet, novelist

The wife of aviator Charles Lindbergh, Anne Morrow Lindbergh wrote about their flights together in North to the Orient (1935) and Listen! The Wind (1938). Gift from the Sea (1955) marked her as a sensitive writer about marriage and women's issues. The Unicorn (1956) is a collection of her poetry. Her novel, Dearly Beloved (1962), is a family saga. Lindbergh's literary reputation rests on a series of volumes made up of her diaries and letters: Bring Me a Unicorn (1972); Hour of Gold, Hour of Lead (1973); Locked Rooms and Open Doors (1974); The Flower and the Nettle (1976); and War Within and Without (1980). These memoirs, covering the years from 1929 through 1944, explore her marriage, the role of a wife married to a famous man, and the nature of a modern woman's life.

Sources

Herrman, Dorothy. Anne Morrow Lindbergh: A Gift for Life. New York: Ticknor & Fields, 1992.

Lindbergh, Reeve. No More Words: A Journal of My Mother. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2001.

Lindsay and Crouse (1934–1962) playwrights, producers

The collaborative career of Howard Lindsay (1889–1968) and Russel Crouse (1893–1966) began when they wrote the libretto for Cole PORTER's musical Anything Goes (produced 1934), a long-running success. Through their long career, the pair earned respect for their solid theatrical craftsmanship and their unerring instinct for what mainstream Broadway audiences sought in entertainment.

Born in Waterford, New York, Lindsay graduated from Harvard University and attended the American Academy of Dramatic Arts, after which he worked as an actor. He performed in vaudeville and was a member of Margaret Anglin's troupe from 1913 until he entered military service in WORLD WAR I. Anglin acted in the first play Lindsay produced, Billeted (produced 1917). He turned to stage direction with George S. KAUFMAN and Marc CONNELLY's Dulcy (produced 1921), which led to subsequent work as a director during the 1920s. Lindsay also acted in some of the plays he directed, but after 1930 he collaborated almost exclusively with Crouse and only acted on occasion.

Crouse, who began his working life as a journalist in his native Ohio, turned to acting in the 1920s and worked in public relations for the THEATRE GUILD. Before beginning his collaboration with Lindsay, he co-authored two modestly successful musicals: The Gang's All Here (produced 1931), with Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II and Morrie Ryskind, and Hold Your Horses (produced 1934), with Corey Ford.

Lindsay and Crouse followed Anything Goes with librettos for Red, Hot and Blue! (produced 1936) and Hooray for What! (produced 1937). They scored their greatest success with the nostalgic comedy Life with Father (produced 1939), based on Clarence Day's autobiographical work, which became the longest-running Broadway play of its time (3,224 performances). Depicting a genially tyrannical father ruling a prosperous New York household during the Gilded Age, Life with Father provided Broadway audiences with a pleasing distraction as WORLD WAR II loomed and became a reality. Crouse and Lindsay also produced several plays, including Joseph Kesselring's hit, ARSENIC AND OLD LACE (produced 1941), which they were rumored to have rewritten. In 1945 the two men received a PULITZER PRIZE for the comedy-drama State of the Union. The pair wrote librettos for several musicals, including Call Me Madam (produced 1950), Happy Hunting (produced 1956), The Sound of Music (produced 1959), and Mr. President (produced 1962). Among their nonmusical efforts, Life with Mother (produced 1948), a sequel to Life with Father, had a successful run, as did The Great Sebastians (produced 1956) and the romantic comedy Tall Story (produced 1959).

Source

Skinner, Cornelia Otis. Life with Lindsay & Crouse. Boston, Mass.: Houghton Mifflin, 1976.

—James Fisher

Lindsay, Vachel (1879–1931) poet, essayist, artist

Vachel Lindsay was born in Springfield, Illinois, to a physician and a teacher who instilled in him a strong sense of civic activism that informed his career. Often politically motivated, his work is consistently addressed to a working-class audience. Lindsay attended Hiram College in Ohio, the Art Institute of Chicago, and the New York School of Art, where Robert Henri encouraged him to pursue his talent for poetry.

In 1906 Lindsay set out on the first of three “tramps,” walking trips on which he refused to carry money. He walked from Jacksonville, Florida, to Grass Springs, Kentucky. In 1908 he hiked from New York City to Hiram. Inspired by these experiences, he settled in Springfield and self-published a series of five pamphlets he called War Bulletins (1909) and The Village Magazine (1910), a collection of politically charged essays, fiction, poetry, and drawings. On his third tramp, from Springfield to Wagon Mound, New Mexico, Lindsay distributed a self-published volume, Rhymes to be Traded for Bread (1912).

During his third tramp, in an attempt to reach a working-class audience, Lindsay invented a poetic style he called “Higher Vaudeville,” which entailed composing poems that he could chant and that invited audience participation. Lindsay became famous for his recitations of such poems as “GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH ENTERS INTO HEAVEN” and “THE CONGO,” which were the title poems in his first major books of poetry, General William Booth Enters into Heaven and Other Poems (1913) and The Congo and Other Poems (1914), which were published by Mitchell Kennerley. Lindsay became so well known for his performances that in February 1915 he recited his poetry to President Woodrow Wilson and his cabinet. Lindsay turned to prose in Adventures While Preaching the Gospel of Beauty (1914), an account of his third tramp; The Art of the Moving Picture (1915); and A Handy Guide for Beggars (1916), an account of his first tramp. His third collection of poetry, The Chinese Nightingale and Other Poems (1917), included the last of his Higher Vaudeville poems. In 1920 he made a reciting tour of the United States that was well attended; that same year he also made a short speaking tour of England. Lindsay made regular reciting tours of the United States for the rest of his life.

In The Golden Whales of California and Other Rhymes in the American Language (1920) Lindsay turned to what he thought of as “quieter” verse. The Daniel Jazz and Other Poems (1920), a volume of selected verse, was published in concert with his tour of England. The Golden Book of Springfield (1920) is a novelistic account of Springfield in the year 2018. Inspired by the writings of such diverse figures as John Ruskin, William Morris, and Ebenezer Howard, the novel gives voice to Lindsay’s progressive politics. Though it was ignored by critics and the public alike, Lindsay maintained that this was his most important work.

Lindsay provided some illustrations for all of his books, but his drawing began to figure more prominently in Going-to-the-Sun (1923), a collection of poems and drawings inspired by a hiking trip through the Rockies. This trend continued with Going-to-the-Stars (1926) and The Candle in the Cabin: A Weaving Together of Script and Singing (1926). His last book of prose, The Litany of Washington Street (1929) is a collection of essays on patriotic themes. His last book of verse is Every Soul Is a Circus (1929). In 1931 Vachel Lindsay committed suicide.

Lindsay’s Higher Vaudeville overshadowed his other work. Though he was popular with the general public and praised by critics during his life, his reputation waned so quickly after his death that by midcentury he was no longer the subject of academic consideration. However, his poetry continued to be anthologized and still reached a popular audience. Recent scholarship has begun to reassess Lindsay’s career. Of particular interest is the distinction he made in his career between oral and written poetry and his desire to use poetry toward political ends.

Sources

Chenetier, Marc. Selected Letters of Vachel Lindsay. New York: Burt Franklin, 1979.

Massa, Ann. Vachel Lindsay, Fieldworker for the American Dream. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970.

Ruggles, Eleanor. The West-Going Heart: A Life of Vachel Lindsay. New York: Norton, 1959.

—Brian McAllister

Literary Criticism

American literature as a subject of serious criticism was beginning to be established at the same time as a new generation of American critics was achieving recognition and developing distinctive ways of interpreting literature. Before WORLD WAR II, American literature—other than a few nineteenth-century classics—was generally neglected in academia. AMERICAN LITERATURE, the first academic journal of literary criticism devoted to the subject, was not founded until 1929.

The most influential critic of the 1920s was the journalist H. L. MENCKEN, whose irreverent literary essays appeared in magazines such as THE SMART SET and THE AMERICAN MERCURY and were collected in Prejudices (six volumes, 1919–1927). Mencken ridiculed the nation's lack of culture, especially in the South, and denounced notions that America had come of age as a literary society. Mencken hailed Theodore DREISER and Sinclair LEWIS, whom Mencken believed were addressing the reality of American life from both literary and journalistic points of view. Writers like Dreiser, in Mencken's view, were finally destroying the genteel tradition.

The first full-scale scholarly history of American literature is Vernon L. PARRINGTON's Main Currents in American Thought (three volumes, 1927–1930). Parrington's sociologically oriented study was succeeded by Van Wyck Brooks's The Flowering of New England 1815–1865 (1936), a more elegant and literary work for the general reader that attempted to define the Puritan roots of America's literary culture—the first volume of his five-volume literary history, Makers and Finders: A History of the Writer in America, 1800–1915 (1936–1952).

The New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM) who emerged in the late 1920s and early 1930s brought an increasing sophistication to the study of literature, particularly in American colleges and universities. John Crowe RANSOM, Robert Penn WARREN, and Allen TATE, all poets, as well as critic Cleanth Brooks, developed a focus on the integrity of the work of art—insisting that literature was autonomous and not simply a comment on life—that was lacking in the earlier histories of American literature. In practice, this erudite New Criticism also meant that American authors such as Herman Melville and Walt Whitman, as well as contemporary writers such as Ernest HEMINGWAY and William FAULKNER, were appraised in terms of the structure, the imagery, and the symbolism of their work and not simply in terms of the content, or the themes, of their writing.

At the same time Lionel TRILLING and other New York writers outside of the New Criticism circle brought to bear a sense of history, society, and politics on the work of literature. Trilling borrowed from Freud in order to explore the psychological aspects of literary creation. His The Liberal Imagination (1950), brought a searching moral vision and a command of psychological theory to the study of literature.

Other independent critics—most notably Edmund WILSON—borrowed from many different schools of criticism to provide searching studies of European and American literature. In Axel's Castle (1931) Wilson provided some of the first important interpretations of twentieth-century symbolist giants such as James Joyce and T. S. ELIOT. In The Wound and the Bow (1941) he studied the lives of European and American authors for the sources of their creativity. Unlike the New Critics, Wilson did not restrict himself to interpreting just the work itself but rather the entire context in which it was created. This biographical-historical criticism was also informed by a sensitivity to contemporary Marxist criticism and theories of history.

Sources

Fraiberg, Louis. Psychoanalysis & American Literary Criticism. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1960.

Glicksberg, Charles Irving. American Literary Criticism, 1900–1950. New York: Hendricks House, 1952.

Leitch, Vincent B. American Literary Criticism From the Thirties to the Eighties. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Literary Digest (1890–1938) periodical

Published weekly, the Literary Digest printed excerpts from newspapers and magazines, assembling vivid quotations and cartoons. Its best years were from 1905 to 1933, when its articles emphasized current events and profiled living persons. During the 1920s the magazine reached a peak of two million subscribers and became a favorite resource in the classroom. The Literary Digest merged with the Review of Reviews in 1937 before becoming absorbed by Time in 1938.

The Little Foxes by Lillian Hellman (produced 1939) play

The Little Foxes was Lillian HELLMAN's third play and one of her most successful. The three-act well-made drama examines a devouring, plutocratic Southern family. The play premiered on February 15, 1939, and ran for 691 performances. Although Hellman sets the play in "a small town in the South" in 1900, her anticapitalist theme reflects the economic crisis of the GREAT DEPRESSION.

Hellman described The Little Foxes in her memoirs as her most difficult play to write and her most autobiographical. For source material she drew on her Southern mother's mercantile family. Dashiell HAMMETT served as Hellman's editor, working with her through nine drafts of the play. Hellman took her title—suggested by her friend Dorothy PARKER—from the Song of Solomon: "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes" (2:15). It establishes the play's theme of ruinous consumption.

Hellman centers her plot on money. She employs the traditional melodramatic devices of stolen bonds, bribery, blackmail, and villains bartering for a young woman's virtue. Regina, the play's protagonist, plots with, and ultimately against, her equally corrupt brothers Ben and Oscar Hubbard for control of a planned cotton mill. Her terminally ill husband, Horace, attempts to prevent Regina's scheme to control the mill: "Why should I give you the money? To pound the bones of this town to make dividends for you to spend?" Regina defeats her husband in the play's climax by allowing him to suffer a fatal heart attack while she sits motionless.

Other characters resist the Hubbards' greed but with limited effect. Birdie, Oscar's wife, longs for the moral clarity of her aristocratic past through an alcoholic haze. Although Addie, the African American housekeeper, cannot successfully thwart the Hubbards in a segregated South, she serves as the play's moral center. She righteously condemns the Hubbards in the play's thesis speech: "Well, there are people who eat the earth and eat all the people on it like in the Bible with the locusts. And other people who stand around and watch them eat it. (Softly) Sometimes I think it ain't right to stand around and watch them do it."

Regina's daughter, Alexandra, previously innocent to her family's evil nature, finally realizes her mother's villainy at the play's denouement and pledges to fight against it. According to Hellman's moral code, the sin of omission—refusing to act against evil—is as bad as the evil act itself. The play ends with a resolved and powerful Alexandra threatening her vulnerable mother with: "Are you afraid, Mama?"

Southern actress Tallulah Bankhead created the role of Regina on Broadway and starred in a national tour. Hellman, her former-husband Arthur KOBER, and married screenwriters Dorothy Parker and Alan Campbell wrote the screenplay for the 1941 movie version starring Bette Davis. In 1949 composer Marc Blitzstein transformed the play into the opera Regina. The Little Foxes has received three Broadway revivals and remains a favorite among academic and community theaters.

—Park Bucker

Little Magazines

This term applies to literary magazines that publish experimental works of literature or material not found in mainstream, popular periodicals. Little magazines have small subscription lists—sometimes of subscribers no more than a few hundred as compared with large-circulation magazines with hundreds of thousands. The little magazine may be produced by an individual or a group of writers; it may be attached to an institution of higher learning or private organization devoted to promoting the arts. In the twentieth century, the heyday of the little magazine was the 1920s, with the flourishing of such magazines as The Criterion, transition, and THE DIAL. Although some of these magazines were published in Europe, they included a good deal of American literature by modernist writers.

Among the other important little magazines were The Egoist, Blast, THE LITTLE REVIEW, The Double Dealer, The Fugitive, and Contact. These were journals that emphasized literature and created literary movements. Other little magazines, such as THE MASSES, The Liberator, The New Masses, and PARTISAN REVIEW, had a more political orientation. Some little magazines, such as KENYON REVIEW,

The Hudson Review, and The Paris Review have survived to become part of academic life, publishing interviews and articles aimed at a sophisticated literary audience.

Source

Anderson, Eliot, and Mary Kinzie, eds. The Little Magazine in America: A Modern Documentary History. Yonkers, N.Y.: Pushcart, 1978.

The Little Review (1914–1929) periodical

One of the most important LITTLE MAGAZINES of its time, The Little Review was founded in Chicago by Margaret ANDERSON as a "magazine that believes in Life for Art's sake, in the individual rather than an Incomplete people." Anderson was assisted by Jane Heap and Ezra POUND, who became its foreign editor in 1917.

The Little Review is best remembered for its serialization of James Joyce's Ulysses. Twenty-three installments of the novel were published from 1918 through 1920; on four occasions the United States Post Office destroyed issues, and the magazine was fined $100 for publishing obscenity in 1920. The Little Review and its editors moved to Paris in 1922.

Little Theater Movement

The term little theater is applied to regional and local theaters and is often associated with amateur productions. Such little theaters were established in towns and cities throughout the United States in the nineteenth century. In the twentieth century, the little theater movement in America was associated with an attack on the mainstream, commercial theater and its fare of melodramas, light comedies, and musicals. The free-theater movement that started in Europe inspired Americans to create regional theaters to combat what was seen as the commercialism of Broadway shows and their derivative road companies. Little theater advocates wanted to produce noncommercial drama by Europeans such as Henrik Ibsen and George Bernard Shaw as well as new works by American playwrights such as Eugene O'NEILL, Paul GREEN, and Sidney KINGSLEY.

The little theater movement grew quickly, from some fifty such theaters in 1918 to an estimated two thousand theaters by 1924. Two of the most significant early theatrical companies were the Washington Square Players in New York City and the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS in Massachusetts and New York, both of which started in 1915. The Chicago Little Theatre was begun in a small space on the fourth floor of an office building in 1912 by Maurice Brown, who is said to have coined the term "little theater." The Neighborhood Playhouse was established in New York in 1915 by Alice and Irene Lewisohn. Sam Hume, who founded the Arts and Crafts Theatre in Detroit in 1915, also helped the following year to launch THEATRE ARTS MAGAZINE, which became the voice of the movement. In 1918 the Carolina Playmakers were established at the University of North Carolina by Frederick Henry Koch. While early visionaries often imagined a theater that was socially progressive, the movement as it evolved largely lost political purpose.

Sources

- Gard, Robert E. Community Theatre: Idea and Achievement. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1959.
- Gard. Grassroots Theater: A Search for Regional Arts in America. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1955.
- Mackay, Constance D'Arcy. The Little Theatre in the United States. New York: Holt, 1917.
- Shervey, Beth Conway, and Peter Palmer. The Little Theatre on the Square: Four Decades of a Small-Town Equity Theatre. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

Liveright, Horace (1886–1933) publisher

Horace Liveright was the innovative owner of the publishing firm BONI AND LIVERIGHT, which published the early work of William FAULKNER and Ernest HEMINGWAY as well as important work by such authors as Theodore DREISER, T. S. ELIOT, and Eugene O'NEILL. Liveright enjoyed publishing provocative authors but paid little attention to the finances of his firm. His lasting contribution to publishing was his development of the MODERN LIBRARY series, which was purchased by Bennett Cerf and Donald Klopfer as the foundation for their new firm RANDOM HOUSE. Several generations of Americans grew up reading this reasonably priced series of great books.

Source

- Dardis, Tom. Firebrand: The Life of Horace Liveright. New York: Random House, 1995.

Locke, Alain (1886–1954) editor, writer

An important figure in the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, Alain Locke was best known for the seminal anthology he edited, The New Negro: An Interpretation (1925), in which he argued that a new innovative and creative spirit had emerged in the Negro community. Raised in Philadelphia in a prosperous African American family, Locke majored in philosophy at Harvard and studied as a Rhodes scholar at Oxford University and the University of Berlin. He returned to the United States in 1911 and began teaching at Howard University. He earned a doctorate at Harvard in 1917. Locke became the leading intellectual of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, following The New Negro with Four Negro Poets (1927), which featured the work of Claude McKay, Jean Toomer, Countee Cullen, and Langston Hughes. Plays of Negro Life (1927), which he edited with Montgomery Gregory, furthered Locke's contention that African Americans were in a position to claim their cultural heritage and to make a significant impact on American civilization. His books Negro Art: Past and Present (1936) and The Negro and His Music (1936) showed the impressive range of African American artists.

Locke's work provided an alternative to the idea of the melting pot. He demonstrated that African Americans had a distinctive contribution that enriched American life, but that such a contribution could not be completely absorbed by the mainstream. Locke's work established the groundwork for later writers who explored a black aesthetic.

Sources

- Harris, Leonard, ed. The Philosophy of Alain Locke: Harlem Renaissance and Beyond. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Linneman, Russell J., ed. Alain Locke: Reflections on a Modern Renaissance Man. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

Loesser, Frank (1910–1969) lyricist

Born into a family of German-Jewish immigrants that prized classical music and other aspects of European high culture, Frank Loesser reveled in the popular songs his parents considered lower-class entertainment. Loesser was a poor student who was expelled from Townsend Harris, New York's high school for gifted students. Even so, he was admitted to the City College of New York when he was fifteen but dropped out in 1926.

For the next ten years Frank Loesser wrote songs for Tin Pan Alley publishing firms, vaudeville, and Broadway, working with various collaborators but with little success. Only when he and his wife, Lynn Garland, moved to Hollywood did Loesser's career begin to thrive. He was put under contract by Universal Pictures, Paramount, and other studios and finally had his first major hits with Hoagy Carmichael in 1938: "Small Fry," "Heart and Soul," and "Two Sleepy People." He also found success with composer Burton Lane on songs such as "The Lady's in Love with You" (1939).

During WORLD WAR II, Loesser began writing his own music as well as lyrics and had his first solo hit with "Praise the Lord and Pass the Ammunition" (1942), supposedly inspired by a chaplain's exhortation during combat. Loesser, who had enlisted in the army, wrote other patriotic wartime songs and had other hits, such as "I Don't Want to Walk without You" (1942) with Jule Styne and "Jingle Jangle Jingle" (1942) with Joseph J. Lilley, but he continued to write his own words and music for such wistful romantic ballads as "Spring Will Be a Little Late This Year" (1944). He had his biggest success with "Baby, It's Cold Outside" (1949), which won an Academy Award.

Despite his success in Hollywood, Loesser resented the limited artistic control he had over how his songs were presented in movies. He longed to return to New York, particularly after Richard Rodgers and Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II had redefined the Broadway musical as an integrated musical drama with Oklahoma! Although Loesser wrote only a few successful Broadway musicals, they included some of his most enduring songs. Where's Charley? (1948) ran for 792 performances and produced the show-stopping "Once in Love with Amy." Guys and Dolls (1950) turned the world of Damon Runyon into song with such fully integrated songs as "Luck Be a Lady," "If I Were a Bell," and "I've Never Been in Love Before." Loesser pushed the idea of an integrated musical even further in Most Happy Fella (1956), writing not only music and lyrics but the libretto as well. With arias, choral passages, even recitatives, Most Happy Fella comes as close to opera as the Broadway musical had gotten, yet still produced such independent hit songs as "Standing on the Corner." Loesser's last Broadway musical, How to Succeed in Business without Really Trying (1961), ran for 1,417 performances and won the PULITZER PRIZE for drama, only the fourth time a musical had received that prestigious award.

Source

Loesser, Susan. A Most Remarkable Fella: Frank Loesser and the Guys and Dolls in His Life. New York: Donald I. Fine, 1993.
—Philip Furia

London, Jack (1876–1916) novelist, short-story writer

Jack London was born in San Francisco as the illegitimate son of Flora Wellman, a spiritualist, and William Henry Chaney, a traveling astrologer. When his mother married John London, a farmer, the future writer took his stepfather's name. Life was a grim struggle for the impoverished family, providing experiences London later used in autobiographical novels such as MARTIN EDEN (1909). London spent his early life around the docks and waterfront of the Bay Area and learned to identify with the downtrodden and the outcasts of society.

The bright, energetic London had an intermittent education, which ceased with grammar school at the age of fourteen (except for a few months at the University of California, Berkeley, in 1897). At sixteen, like his fictional heroes, he showed independence and pluck, pitching in with his pals to buy an oyster boat and becoming known as an "oyster pirate." At sixteen he became a sailor employed on a sealing boat that took him to Japan. At eighteen he turned hobo and toured America and Canada.

By 1895 London had embarked on a fierce program of self-education. The works of Charles Darwin, Karl Marx, and Friedrich Nietzsche imbued London with a vision of society as a struggle in which the fittest survived. London's own works show that even the strong can be crushed, given the political structure of society, and that the true nature of a human being might not be revealed except in the struggle against nature.

At twenty-one, London followed the gold rush to the Klondike; two years later he sold his first story, "To the Man on the Trail." His first book, the collection The Son of the Wolf: Tales of the Far North (1900), was the first of some fifteen books, including four novels, in which he wrote of the frozen North. London was soon producing a flood of stories and novels about the individual's quest not only for survival but also for triumph over both the elements of nature and the structures of society. The key to London's success was his ability to make his adventure stories embody his philosophical and political ideas rather than have those ideas explicitly drive the stories. Readers could easily imbibe London's message while apparently reading only a gripping story. For London, plot itself, the structure of the story, made his political point.

London is permanently associated with his classic novel THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903). Never out of print, it has been translated into more than fifty languages. The book made London's career as a best-selling author and secured his place in American literary NATURALISM. The story is about a dog, Buck, half St. Bernard and half Scottish sheepdog, who is stolen from a comfortable California home to be used as a sled dog in the Klondike.

London continued to work as a journalist as his career as a novelist and short-story writer developed. In 1902 he posed as a sailor and investigated the lives of East End slum dwellers in London, producing an exposé the next year, The People of the Abyss (1903). He wrote about the Russo-Japanese War for the Hearst newspapers and about Mexico for Colliers magazine. His War of the Classes (1904) is a collection of lectures and essays.

One of London's most successful works is the short adventure novel THE SEA-WOLF (1904), in which a wealthy literary critic, Humphrey Van Weyden, has to contend with the ruthless Wolf Larsen, captain of the Ghost, a sealing schooner. In his conflict with the Viking-like Larsen, Van Weyden builds himself up physically and mentally, returning to society a stronger and more self-aware man.

By 1905 the twenty-nine-year-old London was the most famous and most widely read author in America. He subsequently wrote increasingly for money to maintain his lavish existence of luxury homes and yachts, although he did not forsake his withering view of a harsh world. WHITE FANG (1906), which London conceived as the "complete antithesis" to The Call of the Wild, deals with the domestication of a wolf. The Iron Heel (1907), the story of a fascist dictatorship destroyed by socialist revolution, demonstrates that London retained his commitment to social criticism. In Martin Eden, the hero as writer explicitly confronts the complacency of bourgeois society, finding himself at a middle-class dinner table arguing for his interpretation of existence with the pillars of society: the judges and politicians who hold power and look upon the powerless as unworthy.

Increasingly, London became the prisoner of the commercial civilization he deplored. In The Cruise of the Snark (1911), he gives an account of his effort to cruise the world in his schooner. The Valley of the Moon (1913) drew on the author's nostalgia for an agrarian life and his dislike of dehumanizing cities. It unrealistically proposed a return to the land. London's personal deterioration—abetted by drug use and alcoholism—is evident in his autobiographical pro-temperance novel, John Barleycorn (1913). He died at age forty-one, leaving a large body of work—some 600 nonfiction pieces and short stories and more than 50 books, fiction and nonfiction—that still attracts readers worldwide.

Sources

- Auerbach, Jonathan. Male Call: Becoming Jack London. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1996.
- Cassuto, Leonard, and Jeanne Campbell Reesman, eds. Rereading Jack London. Stanford, Cal.: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Kershaw, Alex. Jack London: A Life. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.
- Watson, Charles N. The Novels of Jack London: A Reappraisal. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982.

Look Homeward, Angel by Thomas Wolfe (New York: Scribners, 1929) novel

Look Homeward, Angel was Thomas WOLFE's first novel, and its publication elevated him to among the first rank of his literary generation. A highly autobiographical work, this bildungsroman traces the youth of Eugene Gant and the discovery of his artistic gifts. The novel's principal settings indicate Wolfe's autobiographical intent: ALTAMONT, in Old Catawba, was patterned after his hometown of Asheville, North Carolina; and Dixieland, the boardinghouse which Eugene's mother, Eliza, owns, was modeled after Wolfe's mother's boardinghouse in which he grew up. Since Wolfe drew so deeply on the townspeople and local history of Asheville for inspiration, the novel was received there with general outrage and condemnation.

The critical reception of the novel was generally favorable, with most critics agreeing that Wolfe possessed an original and distinctive voice. Nevertheless, some critics complained of the often excessive detail which Wolfe devoted to his descriptions of otherwise mundane places, people, and events. Still others dismissed much of his autobiographical material as too emotionally overwrought. But much of what troubled critics about the novel is what endeared it to readers. A solid popular readership helped to improve its literary reputation throughout the 1930s. By the early 1960s, the novel sold on average 30,000 to 40,000 copies annually. Since its initial publication, it has never gone out of print.

Though the novel's first section deals primarily with Eugene's life from his birth in 1900 to age twelve, the narrative begins much earlier. The reader is given a brief history of the Gant and Pentland families; an explanation of how W.O., Eugene's father, found his way south to Old Catawba from his native Pennsylvania; and how he came to marry Eliza. This section primarily charts Eugene's growing consciousness of the world around him and his place in it.

The second section of the novel expands its focus to include episodic depictions of Altamont's townspeople and the Gant family. Principally, this section is about Eugene's enrollment in the Altamont Fitting School and the discovery of "the mother of his spirit," his teacher Margaret Leonard. In her classroom, Eugene's artistic sensibilities are awakened through his introduction to the majesty of language and the great works of world literature. The section ends with the decision by W.O. to send fifteen-year-old Eugene to the State University.

The third and final section of the novel oscillates between Eugene's college experiences at Pulpit Hill—based on Chapel Hill—and familial drama back in Altamont. Eugene encounters the magic of college life, learns about the ecstasy and heartbreak which come with falling in love, and witnesses the death of his beloved brother, Ben. By novel's end, Eugene has graduated from Pulpit Hill, decides upon further study at Harvard, and bids farewell to Altamont and to the sanctuary of youth.

In 2000 the University of South Carolina Press published the complete original text of Wolfe's manuscript, titled O Lost. This version restored nearly 66,000 words omitted in the editing process at the advice of MAXWELL PERKINS, Wolfe's editor at the House of Scribner, for reasons of propriety, economy, or structure. Perkins's cuts sought to focus the narrative progress on Eugene alone, excising, in the process, much of the humor, social satire, and experimentation that characterized Wolfe's original artistic vision for his first novel.

Sources

- Wolfe. O Lost: A Story of the Buried Life. Eds. Arlyn and Matthew J. Bruccoli. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

—S. Zebulon Baker

Loos, Anita (1893–1981) humorist, screenwriter, dramatist

Anita Loos is best known for her novel "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes": The Illuminating Diary of a Professional Lady (1925), the satirical story of two beautiful, naive women in search of wealthy husbands. Popular in its time, the novel was made into a hit movie directed by Howard Hawks and starring Jane Russell and Marilyn Monroe in 1953. The sequel, "But Gentlemen Marry Brunettes" (1928), was not as successful. In addition to novels, Loos was also a prolific screenwriter and dramatist. Beginning with The New York Hat, an unsolicited "photoplay" for which she was paid $25 in 1912, Loos wrote more than 100 scenarios in the silent era, and continued to thrive as a screenwriter from the 1930s into the 1940s. After leaving Hollywood, Loos continued to write novels and plays. Her later work included three autobiographies: A Girl Like I (1966), Kiss Hollywood Good-By (1974), and Cast of Thousands (1977).

Source

Carey, Gary. Anita Loos: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1988.

The Lost Generation

This term described the men and women who had been psychologically damaged by WORLD WAR I. It gained currency from the epigraph to Ernest HEMINGWAY'S THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926): "You are all a lost generation." Hemingway attributed this statement to Gertrude STEIN. He subsequently claimed that he used the phrase ironically and denied that there was a lost generation.

Source

Dolan, Mark. Modern Lives: A Cultural Re-reading of the "Lost Generation". West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1996.

—Morris Colden

Lovecraft, H. P. (1890–1937) short-story writer, novelist Howard Phillips Lovecraft published only one book in his lifetime, The Shadow over Innsmouth (1936). Largely because of his writing in Weird Tales, a PULP magazine, he acquired a devoted following of readers who relished his gift for writing in the fantasy and horror genre. Steeped in eighteenth-century history, the reclusive Lovecraft wrote stories that extended Edgar Allan Poe's use of the grotesque. Lovecraft has also inspired many science-fiction writers attracted to his ambivalent attitude toward modern science.

Lovecraft's writing at his death was left scattered in magazines or unpublished. Many volumes have since been published, including The Outsider and Others (1939), Beyond the Wall of Sleep (1943), The Lurker at the Threshold (1945), Dreams and Fancies (1962), Dagon and Other Macabre Tales (1965), and The Dark Brotherhood (1966).

Sources

Burleson, Donald R. H. P. Lovecraft: A Critical Study. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1983.

Joshi, S. T. A Dreamer and a Visionary: H. P. Lovecraft in His Time. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 2001.

Joshi, H. P. Lovecraft and Lovecraft Criticism: An Annotated Bibliography. Kent: Kent State University Press, 1981.

The Love Nest and Other Stories by Ring Lardner
(New York: Scribners, 1926) story collection

This collection of nine stories, Ring LARDNER's third collection published by CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, comprises stories written between 1922 and 1924. Only two of the stories are about sports, perhaps a reaction to reviewers' comments that his previous works had been too narrowly focused on that subject. These grimly humorous, satirical stories deal with alcohol abuse, dysfunctional romantic relationships, blind egotism, and cruelty. Included is perhaps Lardner's best-known story, "HAIRCUT."

—Richard Layman

"The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock"

by T. S. Eliot (1915) poem

Originally published in POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE, T. S. ELIOT's first major poem, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," is an interior monologue—a modernist variation (see MODERNISM) of the dramatic monologue. In announcing a "love song" by a character with a bizarre and unromantic name, the title suggests that the poem will be ironic. And by associating the "singer" with one of the damned souls in Dante's Inferno, the epigraph underscores the anti-Romantic implications of the title and suggests that Mr. Prufrock's song is projected from within a locked prison. The theme is the divided self as it struggles to cope in a modern world without friends and without God. Prufrock, whose surname Eliot had seen on a furniture store in St. Louis, divides himself into active and passive selves. The "I" tries to convince the "you" to attend a party where women serve tea and discuss art, but like Hamlet, to whom he compares himself, Prufrock is so engaged with "ifs" and "buts" that he is unable to act. As indicated by the gap between his rhetoric (visions, revisions, questions, inadequacy of words) and his images (cat, fog, food, mermaids), Prufrock is also split between intellect and feeling. As a character, he epitomizes major themes of existentialism (loneliness, anxiety, awareness of time passing and of overwhelming questions). The existential themes, ironic tone, psychological form, everyday images, and allusions to world literature combine to make "Prufrock" a landmark of literary modernism. Eliot included the poem in his first collection, Prufrock and Other Observations (1917).

Source

Southam, B. C. A Guide to the Selected Poems of T. S. Eliot. Sixth edition. San Diego: Harcourt Brace, 1994.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Lowell, Amy (1874–1925) poet, critic

Amy Lowell was born in Brookline, Massachusetts, into one of the most prominent families in New England. She wrote poetry in her childhood but did not recommit to her passion until 1902. Lowell published her first poem, "A Fixed Idea," in 1910 in Atlantic Monthly and published her first book, A Dome of Many-Colored Glass, in 1912. That same year she met Ada Dwyer Russell, a professional actress who became her lover and companion. In summer 1913, Lowell traveled to England to meet the poet Ezra POUND after being inspired by his "A Few Don'ts by an Imagiste" in POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE. Pound inroduced her to the Imagist movement (see IMAGISM), a movement Lowell later began to head. A flamboyant personality, known for smoking cigars and keeping a large pack of dogs, Lowell became a notable spokesman and promoter of modern poetry. On her second visit to England, Lowell was delayed from returning home because of the onset of WORLD WAR I, during which she produced Men, Women, and Ghosts, a collection that included her much anthologized poem “Patterns.” In 1925 Lowell died of a paralytic stroke. The last collection published in her lifetime, What’s O’clock (1925), which included “Lilacs” and “Meeting House Hill,” was posthumously awarded the PULITZER PRIZE for poetry. Other notable collections of her poetry are Sword Blades and Poppy Seed (1914), Can Grande’s Castle (1918), East Wind (1926), and Ballads for Sale (1927). She also published a well-received two-volume biography, John Keats (1925).

Source

Benvenuto, Richard. Amy Lowell. Boston: G.K. Hall, 1985.

—Elizabeth Spies

Lower East Side

A part of New York near the East River and the Bowery, the Lower East Side at the turn of the twentieth century teemed with immigrants (primarily Jews), crowded tenements, pushcarts, and all the elements of ghetto life. It has been the subject of JEWISH-AMERICAN and PROLETARIAN LITERATURE and has featured prominently in the work of Michael GOLD and Henry ROTH.

Luce, Clare Boothe (1903–1987) playwright

Born Ann Clare Boothe, Luce worked at VOGUE and VANITY FAIR in jobs that contributed to her exquisite sense of style—a combination of a sharp wit and acute observation of social manners. She was married twice, the second time in 1935 to Henry R. Luce, founder of Time magazine. Her play THE WOMEN (produced 1936) was outspoken about the ambitions of women and the rivalries among them. Her other plays include Kiss the Boys Good-Bye (produced 1938) and Margin for Error (produced 1939). Her marriage to Luce enhanced her public visibility and power, and she had a second career as a conservative politician. She was elected to Congress twice (1943–1947) and served as ambassador to Italy (1953–1956).

Sources

Fearnow, Mark. Clare Boothe Luce: A Research and Production Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995.

Morris, Sylvia Jukes. Rage for Fame: The Ascent of Clare Boothe Luce. New York: Random House, 1997.

Luhan, Mabel Dodge (1879–1962) patron of the arts, memoirist

Mabel Dodge Luhan’s four-volume autobiography—Intimate Memories: Background (1933), European Experiences (1935), Movers and Shakers (1936), and Edge of Taos Desert: An Escape to Reality (1937)—is an important document in the history of American literature in the first third of the twentieth century as it provides portraits of the American writers she befriended during her full life. Luhan was born Mabel Ganson in an affluent family in Buffalo, New York. While she was married to her second husband, Edwin Dodge, she was at the center of cultural activity in Italy (1902–1912), where she met André Gide and Gertrude STEIN, and New York City (1912–1918), where her many friends included Lincoln STEFFENS, Max EASTMAN, John REED, and Carl VAN VECHTEN. After divorcing Dodge she moved to New Mexico with her third husband, Maurice Sterne, a Russian émigré painter. In 1923 she married her final husband, Antonio Luhan, a Tiwa native. Among the writers Luhan associated with in New Mexico were Willa CATHER, Robinson JEFFERS, Edna FERBER, Thornton WILDER, Thomas WOLFE, Jean TOOMER, and, most notably, D. H. Lawrence.

Sources

Frazer, Winifred, L. Mabel Dodge Luhan. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Hahn, Emily. Mabel: A Biography of Mabel Dodge Luhan. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1977.

“Luke Havergal” by Edwin Arlington Robinson

(1896) poem

“Luke Havergal” appeared in Edwin Arlington ROBINSON’s earliest poetry collection, The Torrent and the Night Before (1896). President Theodore Roosevelt, an ardent admirer of Robinson’s work, spoke for many readers when he remarked, “I am not sure that I understand ‘Luke Havergal,’ but I am entirely sure that I like it.” Like many of Robinson’s poems, “Luke Havergal” deals with loneliness and loss; yet, as an experiment in Symbolist poetry it stands apart. Its depiction of a spectral visitor appearing before a bereaved lover is reminiscent of Edgar Allan Poe’s “The Raven” (1845). One reading of the poem is that Luke has gone mad and that the voice prompting him to “Go to the western gate” is encouraging him to join his lover by committing suicide.

Source

Anderson, Wallace L. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Critical Introduction. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.

—John Cusatis

Lytle, Andrew (1902–1995) novelist

A Tennessee native, Lytle was educated at Vanderbilt University in Nashville and remained in the South except for brief periods at Harvard and in New York City. He was one of the group of AGRARIANS who wrote I'LL TAKE MY STAND (1930), a rejection of modern urban life. After writing a biography, Bedford Forrest and His Critter Company (1931), Lytle turned to writing novels, beginning with The Long Night (1936), a novel set in the era of the Civil War about a boy who swears to revenge himself on the mob that murdered his father. His most acclaimed novel is his last, The Velvet Horn (1957), a complex story of family violence and redemption set in the hill country of middle Tennessee in the late nineteenth century. Lytle served as editor of the SEWANEE REVIEW for two years in the 1940s and from 1961 to 1973.

Source

Bradford, M. E., ed. The Form Discovered: Essays on the Achievement of Andrew Lytle. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1973.

L'Amour, Louis (1910–1988) novelist, short-story writer
 Born in North Dakota, Louis L'Amour dropped out of the tenth grade, leaving home at the age of fifteen. He spent much of his life in Los Angeles writing popular novels about the American West. He published at least two hundred novels and fourteen books of stories and co-wrote five screenplays. He was rivaled only by Zane Grey as the most popular writer of Westerns of his time. A memoir, Education of a Wandering Man (1989), was published shortly after his death.

Source

Gale, Robert L. Louis L'Amour. New York: Twayne, 1992.

L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E P=O=E=T=R=Y

L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E P=O=E=T=R=Y began as a movement in the early 1970s. Influenced by Gertrude Stein, Louis Zukofsky, the experiments of the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS, and French literary theory, the writers associated with this movement attempted to place complete emphasis on the language of the poem with little or no concern for the referential quality of words, thus changing the way that readers interacted with the poems. Loosely affiliated with a leftist political position and driven by a desire to separate poetry from subject matter, the writers connected with the movement are diverse, including such figures as Charles BERNSTEIN, Lyn Hejinian, Ron Silliman, Susan HOWE, and Bob Perelman.

—Tod Marshall

Lamb, Wally (1950– ) novelist, short-story writer

Dysfunctional families, emotionally distraught characters, and challenging mental illness drive the poignant narratives of teacher-writer Wally Lamb. He was born in 1950 in Norwich, Connecticut, where he has continued to live and work. He earned his B.A. from the University of Connecticut in 1972 and his M.A. in 1977. After many years teaching at the Norwich Free Academy and completing his M.F.A. in 1984 from Vermont College, Lamb taught creative writing at the University of Connecticut. Although he began writing in 1981, he did not become an established professional writer until the publication of She's Come Undone (1992), the tragic but hopeful chronicle of quirky Dolores Price, a young woman who endures the break-up of her parents' marriage, the institutionalization of her mother, and eventually her own mental collapse. This Much I Know Is True (1998) focuses on twin brothers who contend with schizophrenia, depression, and death. Lamb has also published short stories, and in 1990 he received a Pushcart Prize for "Astronauts." In 1998 he earned the U.S.A. Reader's Choice Award.

—Marshall Boswell

Leavitt, David (1961– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Pittsburgh, David Leavitt published his first story collection, Family Dancing (1984), the year after he received his B.A. from Yale University. The book was a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD for fiction. The same year, his story

"Counting Months," published in Harper's magazine, won an O. Henry Award. His first novel, The Lost Language of Cranes (1986), was well received. It explored the sexual coming out of a young gay man and his father's own struggle with his sexuality. Equal Affections (1989), his second novel, drew on Leavitt's family experience in its depiction of a gay lawyer and his family. He wrote another story collection, A Place I've Never Been (1990), which he followed with a third novel, While England Sleeps (1993); the novel became controversial when poet Stephen Spender accused Leavitt of drawing too closely on Spender's memoir World Within World (1951), and Leavitt had to withdraw and rewrite the book for publication in 1995. He also edited The Penguin Book of Gay Short Stories (1994).

His Arkansas: Three Novellas was published in 1997; two novels followed: The Page Turner (1998) and Martin Bauman, or A Sure Thing (2000), the story of a gay writer. Leavitt has published two travel books, Italian Pleasures (1996) and In Maremma: Life and a House in Southern Tuscany (2001). He wrote The Man Who Knew Too Much: Alan Turing and the Invention of the Computer (2006), a biography of the Cambridge mathematician who broke the enigma code.

Source

Guscio, Lelia. We Trust Ourselves and Money, Period: Relationships, Death, and Homosexuality in David Leavitt's Fiction. New York: Peter Lang, 1995.

Lee, Chang-rae (1965– ) novelist, essayist

I think "struggle" is too dramatic a word for my own life. It's not struggle, it's more a perennial consideration.

—Interview (2004)

During the last decade Chang-rae Lee has joined Maxine Hong KINGSTON and Amy TAN as a leading contemporary Asian American writer, a designation that has left the author somewhat uneasy. Born in Seoul in 1965, Lee moved to the United States with his family in 1968. His father ran a psychiatric practice in Westchester County, New York, which was successful enough to allow him to send his son to both Phillips Exeter Academy and Yale University, from which Lee received his B.A. in 1987. Lee worked on Wall Street for a brief period before pursuing an M.F.A. in creative writing at the University of Oregon, graduating in 1993.

Two years later Native Speaker (1995), the novel that was his master's thesis, was published, winning the PEN/Hemingway Award, the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD, and the ALA Book of the Year Award. The story of a Korean spy who has begun to question both his profession as well as his cultural and ethnic identity, the novel won the approval of both academics and identity theorists. A Gesture Life (1999), his equally acclaimed novel, concerns a quiet and unassuming Korean man trying to find his place in upstate New York while also dealing with his murderous past as a member of the Japanese Imperial Army. This novel, too, was a critical success, winning the New Atlantic Independent Booksellers Association (NAIBA) Book Award, the Myers Outstanding Book Award, the Anisfield-Wolf Award, and the Asian American Literary Award for fiction.

Lee cast as the hero of his third novel, Aloft (2004), a middle-aged, Italian travel guide who must contend with his super-ambitious children and their complex resentment over the suicide death of their mother, a Korean American suffering from depression.

Sources

Chen, Tina. "Impersonation and Other Disappearing Acts in Native Speaker," Modern Fiction Studies, 48 (Fall 2002): 637–667.

Parikh, Crystal. "Ethnic America Undercover: The Intellectual and Minority Discourse," Contemporary Literature, 43 (Summer 2002): 249–284.

—Marshall Boswell

Lee, Harper (1926– ) novelist

But there is one way in this country in which all men are created equal—there is one human institution that makes a pauper the equal of a Rockefeller, the stupid man the equal of an Einstein, and the ignorant man the equal of any college president. That institution, gentlemen, is a court.

—To Kill a Mockingbird (1960)

Born in Monroeville, Alabama, Harper Lee is the youngest child of Amasa Coleman Lee, a lawyer, and Frances Finch Lee. Lee studied law at the University of Alabama for four years and left before taking a degree, moving to New York, and pursuing a career as a writer. As a child she befriended Truman CAPOTE, who became a model for the character Dill in her only novel, To Kill a Mockingbird (1960), which won the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1961 and was made into a major motion picture in 1962. The book describes the experiences of a young white girl whose father defends a black man falsely accused of raping a white woman in a small Southern town. To Kill a Mockingbird has sold over thirty million copies. Though Lee was rumored to have been working on a second novel during the 1960s, it was not submitted to a publisher. With the exception of a couple of magazine articles, she has not been published since 1961.

Source

Shields, Charles, J. Mockingbird: A Portrait of Harper Lee. New York: Holt, 2006

Le Guin, Ursula K. (1929– ) novelist, essayist

Nothing I do is exactly deliberate. But I do work very hard and consciously at my craft. At the sound, the flow, the exactness, the connections, the implications of my words.

—Interview (2001)

Ursula K. Le Guin was born in Berkeley, California, and credits her anthropologist father for instilling in her a love of stories and of myth. Educated at Radcliffe (B.A., 1951) and Columbia (M.A., 1952), Le Guin married historian Charles Le Guin in 1953 and had three children. She began writing stories in the mid 1960s, and her first novel, Rocannon's World, was published in 1968. Over the next four decades she published at the rate of more than one book a year. The Left Hand of Darkness (1976) is considered her masterpiece in the science-fiction genre; it won both the Nebula and Hugo Awards, the first of her many awards in the fields of science-fiction and children's literature. The Word for World Is Forest (1976) combines her interest in fantasy, ecology, and anthropology. She has produced multiple series of books about alternative worlds, including the Hainish universe, first described in Rocannon's World, and the allegorical trilogy for children collected as Earthsea (1977). The Dispossessed: An Ambiguous Utopia (1974) explores political issues, especially anarchism. Buffalo Gals, Won't You Come Out Tonight (1994) is a highly praised book of short stories about animals. Unlocking the Air and Other Stories was published in 1997. Le Guin has also published a series of "Catwings" novels for children. Sixty Odd: New Poems was published in 1999.

Le Guin's later novels include The Eye of the Heron (1999) and The Telling (2000). She continued her Hainish cycle with Gifts (2004), A Wizard of Undersea (2004), and Voices (2006). The Language of the Night (1979) is a collection of her writing on feminism. She discusses her way of writing and other women writers in Dancing at the Edge of the World (1989).

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Ursula Le Guin. New York: Chelsea House, 2000.

Cummins, Elizabeth. Understanding Ursula K. Le Guin. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

Reid, Suzanne Elizabeth. Presenting Ursula K. Le Guin. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Leithauser, Brad (1953– ) poet, novelist, essayist

Brad Leithauser was born in Detroit, educated at Harvard (B.A. 1975; J.D. 1980), and was a resident of Japan for several years. His first book of poetry, Hundreds of Fireflies (1982), showed an impressive handling of verse and vocabulary that reminded critics of James MERRILL, one of Leithauser's influences. Leithauser's later collections of poetry include Between Leaps: Poems 1972–1985 (1987) and The Odd Thing She Did (1998), praised for its strong narrative drive. Leithauser also drew on his Japanese sojourn in his first novel, Equal Distance (1985). He has published four other novels, Hence (1989); Seaward (1993), the story of Terry Seaward, a Washington, D.C., lawyer; A Few Corrections (2001), the story of the late Wes Sulton, a Rotarian in Restoration, Michigan; and Friends of Freeland (1993), the story of a fictitious country between Iceland and Greenland. Penchants and Places: Essays and Criticism was published in 1995.

—Marshall Boswell

L'Engle, Madeleine (1918–2007) novelist, poet, playwright, essayist

What a child doesn't realize until he is grown is that in responding to fantasy, fairy tale, and myth he is responding to what Erich Fromm calls the one universal language, the one and only language in the world that cuts across all barriers of time, place, race, and culture.

—John Newbery Medal Acceptance Speech: "The Expanding Universe" (1963)

Born Madeleine L'Engle Camp in 1918, the author of the children's classic A Wrinkle in Time (1962) grew up in New York City. Her mother was a professional pianist, and her father was a journalist and critic. From 1929 to 1933 her family lived in eastern France before settling in Florida. After graduating from Smith College in 1941 L'Engle moved back to New York and began acting and writing. Her first novel, an autobiographical work for adults titled The Small Rain, appeared in 1945. In 1961, after subsequent novels failed to find publishers, she began shopping around her young adult novel, A Wrinkle in Time; L'Engle received nearly two dozen rejection letters before finding success with Farrar, Straus. The novel appeared a year later and won the Newbery Medal. An innovative mix of adventure, science fiction, and fantasy, A Wrinkle in Time can be read as Christian allegory, similar to C. S. Lewis's Chronicles of Narnia. L'Engle has published three more novels in her "Time Quartet": A Wind in the Door (1973), A Swiftly Tilting Planet (1978), and Many Waters (1986).

In addition to the Time Quartet, L'Engle has published two additional novel series for young adults, known as The O'Keefe Family Novels (1965–1989) and The Austin Family Novels (1960–1994). A Christian mystic, L'Engle is the author of several children's books that retell famous biblical stories, and, as well, she has written more-mature works of Christian reflection. Her publications number in the sixties, including ten novels for adults; several poetry collections, including The Ordering of Love: The New and Collected Poems of Madeleine L'Engle (2005); and a four-part autobiography known as The Crosswicks Journals (1972–1988). Madeleine L'Engle Herself (2001) is a compilation of her statements about writing.

Sources

Chase, Carole. Suncatcher: A Study of Madeleine L'Engle and Her Writing. Philadelphia: Innisfree, 1995.

Madeline L'Engle: <<http://www.madeleinelengle.com>> (viewed February 8, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Lethem, Jonathan (1964– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

With each new novel Jonathan Lethem has tried a fresh juxtaposition of competing literary genres; his body of work embraces science fiction, the Western, the crime novel, and the bildungsroman. Lethem grew up in Brooklyn, New York. His father was a painter, while his mother, who died when Lethem was twelve, was an activist. He received his B.A. degree from Bennington College in 1984. His first book, Gun, with Occasional Music (1994), was described by critics as Dashiell Hammett crossed with Philip K. Dick, while his follow-up novel, Amnesia Moon (1995), was a postapocalyptic road novel. Motherless Brooklyn (1999), which won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD for fiction, is a hard-boiled crime novel narrated by a detective suffering from Tourette's syndrome. Lethem's most ambitious work to date is the rich, episodic, and autobiographical Fortress of Solitude (2003), in which a music critic looks back at his fractured childhood friendship with the charismatic son of a drug-addicted former soul singer. The novel was instrumental in earning Lethem a MacArthur Fellowship. You Don't Love Me Yet (2007) tells the story of the relationship between a woman who works a telephone complaint line and a caller on whom she comes to depend.

Source

Auster, Paul. "Jonathan Lethem Talks to Paul Auster," in The Believer Book of Writers Talking to Writers, edited by Vandela Vida. San Francisco: McSweeney's, 2005, pp. 25–42.

—Marshall Boswell

Levertov, Denise (1923–1997) poet, essayist

One of the obligations of the writer, and perhaps especially of the poet, is to say or sing all that he or she can, to deal with as much of the world as becomes possible to him or her in language.

—"Statement for a Television Program" (1972)

Born in England, the daughter of a Russian Jewish father and Welsh mother, Levertov served as a nurse in WORLD WAR II, married an American, and settled in the United States in 1948. She became a U.S. citizen in 1955 and regarded herself as an American poet. Educated at home, Levertov was influenced by William Carlos Williams and H.D., and she became associated with Charles OLSON, Robert DUNCAN, and the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS. A prolific poet, Levertov has been praised for capturing the rhythms of colloquial speech as well as for her political awareness. The VIETNAM WAR figures largely in her work. Her poetry has also explored the possibility of nuclear holocaust and America's involvement in countries such as El Salvador.

Levertov's work is collected in Collected Earlier Poems 1940–1960 (1979), Poems 1960–1967 (1983), Poems 1968–1972 (1987), and Poems 1972–1982 (2001). She published two books about poetry: The Poet in the World (1973) and Light Up the Cave (1981), and a memoir, Tesserae: Memories & Suppositions (1995).

Sources

Brooker, Jewel Spears, ed. Conversations with Denise Levertov. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Gelpi, Albert, ed. Denise Levertov: Selected Criticism. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.

Marten, Harry. Understanding Denise Levertov. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

Wagner-Martin, Linda, ed. Critical Essays on Denise Levertov. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

Levin, Ira (1929– ) novelist, playwright

Ira Levin was born in New York City and received his A.B. in 1950 from New York University. He served in the army and then wrote his first horror novel, A Kiss Before Dying (1953). His most popular work is Rosemary's Baby (1967), about a woman impregnated by the devil. The novel was adapted as a successful motion picture directed by Roman Polanski. Levin's other horror/fantasy novels include The Perfect Day (1970), about a nightmarish computerized world; The Stepford Wives (1972), the story of robot women; and The Boys from Brazil (1976), the story of Josef Mengele, a Nazi doctor who attempts to create clones of Adolf Hitler.

Levin has also produced several popular plays, including No Time for Sergeants (1955) and Deathtrap (1978). His later work includes Sliver: A Novel (1991) and Son of Rosemary: The Sequel to Rosemary's Baby (1997).

Source

Fowler, Douglas. Ira Levin. Mercer Island, Wash.: Starmont, 1988.

Levine, Philip (1928– ) poet

Philip Levine was born, raised, and educated in Detroit, Michigan, the setting for many of his finest poems. As a young man he worked in automobile factories and at other menial jobs. His work celebrates his fellow workers and tries to express the poetry of their experience. He received his B.A. (1950) and M.A. (1954) from Wayne State University and an M.F.A. from the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP in 1957, after which he taught at several universities, including Tufts, Columbia, New York University, and Princeton. Levine's most important book is They Feed They Lion (1972), a collection that, in the words of the title poem, explores the "acids of rage" that provoked the Detroit race riot of 1967.

Levine also writes about his own experience in Detroit and of his family in books such as 1933 (1974), which is the year his father, a Russian Jewish immigrant, died. "Letters to the Dead" recalls his father but also the past of "all the dead fathers." Levine has been called the poet of the midcentury city.

Levine is a memory poet, constantly returning to the scene of his life and work in Detroit. He left the city in 1953, and his writing about it did not begin to see publication in book form until 1963 in On the Edge. His other important books include Ashes: Poems New and Old (1979), Selected Poems (1984), and New Selected Poems (1991). His poetry collection What Work Is (1991) won the National Book Award. Breath: Poems (2004) is a volume of autobiographical poetry about blue-collar life in an industrial setting. In 1994 Levine published The Bread of Time: Toward an Autobiography. So Ask: Essays, Conversations and Interviews was published in 2002.

Source

Buckley, Christopher, ed. On the Poetry of Philip Levine: Stranger to Nothing. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991.

Library of America: Literary Classics of the United States

The Library of America is a nonprofit publisher of classic works of American literature. Since its inception in 1979, with a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, as well as funds provided by the Ford Foundation, the Library of America has published over 150 volumes, all in uniform black jackets, with a red-white-and-blue strip along the bottom of the spine and a ribbon bookmark sewn into the binding. The first volume in the series, published in 1982, contained complete and unabridged editions of Herman MELVILLE's first three novels, Typee, Omoo, and Mardi. The series has since expanded to include complete sets of such American masters as Washington Irving, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Mark Twain, Henry James, Jack London, Stephen Crane, F. Scott Fitzgerald, William Faulkner, Willa Cather, Sinclair Lewis, John Steinbeck, James BALDWIN, Eugene O'Neill, Zora Neale Hurston, the English-language novels of Vladimir NABOKOV, and hundreds more. The series also includes the writings of Benjamin Franklin and Abraham Lincoln, as well as special anthologies such as American Sea Writing and Baseball. Most recently, Philip ROTH has been added to the roster. He is only the third living writer to be so honored, the previous two being Saul BELLOW and Eudora Welty.

Source

The Library of America <<http://www.loa.org>> (viewed May 17, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Life Studies by Robert Lowell (New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1959) poetry collection

Having been encouraged by a psychiatrist to write about his familial history as a way to explore his tendencies toward neuroses, Robert LOWELL plumbed the depths of his personal and domestic past and wrote about it in Life Studies. From the opening poem of the book, "Skunk Hour," where the speaker echoes Milton's Satan in the line "I myself am Hell," to the portraits of familial dysfunction in "My Last Afternoon with Uncle Devereux Wilson," the poems of the book bring to scrutiny and exploration material that had been largely ignored in poetic works but which had been fertile material for American fiction for decades.

Published in 1959, Life Studies announced Lowell's departure from New Criticism, particularly through his break with former mentors Allen Tate, John Crowe Ransom, and Robert Penn Warren; as well, the work marks Lowell's turn from the prescriptions of T. S. Eliot toward the influence of William Carlos Williams.

Along with W. D. SNODGRASS's Heart's Needle, Allen GINSBERG's HOWL, and the soon-to-be-written work of Sylvia PLATH and Anne SEXTON, Lowell's collection of poems explored autobiographical materials in a stark and revealing way that opened new terrain for American poetry and came to be known by M. L. Rosenthal's term, CONFES-SIONAL POETRY. Already the recipient of the Pulitzer Prize, Lowell was awarded the 1960 NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Life Studies.

—Tod Marshall

Source

Witek, Terry. Robert Lowell and Life Studies: Revising the Self. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1993.

Lightman, Alan (1948– ) novelist, scientist

Alan Lightman, born in 1948 in Memphis, Tennessee, began his writing career as a physicist, producing award-winning, reader-friendly scientific books about space exploration, cosmology, astrophysics, and the history of science. Lightman received his A.B. degree from Princeton University in 1970. After earning his Ph.D. from the California Institute of Technology in 1974, Lightman took professorships at Harvard and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) and served as a staff astrophysicist for the Smithsonian As-trophysical Observatory. In 1993, with the publication of Einstein's Dreams, Lightman began a parallel career as a novelist. While maintaining his scholarly work at MIT, Lightman found ways to incorporate his science into his fiction. His character's dreams of time and space are grounded in quantum physics, all the while sounding fantastical and literary. Lightman's subsequent fiction has likewise engaged the lay reader in scientific ideas, bridging the gap between science and art, technology and identity. Good Benito (1995) is a novel about the disconnect between the professional and personal lives of a young physicist. The Diagnosis (2000) traces the disintegration of a man suffering from information overload whose resulting illness defies diagnosis. Reunion (2003) is the story of a divorced college professor who relives a youthful romance, with idealized and truthful remembered accounts juxtaposed. Ghost (2007) is his fifth novel. Throughout his career Lightman has alternated works of fiction and scientific nonfiction for general audiences. His essays about science are collected in Dance for Two: Selected Essays (1996) and A Sense of the Mysterious: Science and the Human Spirit (2005), among other books.

Source

Atherton, Cassandra. "Life Is Dangerous: An Interview with Alan Lightman," Writing on the Edge, 16 (Fall 2005): 92–101.

—Marshall Boswell

Literary Criticism

American literary criticism after WORLD WAR II was still dominated by the techniques espoused by the so-called New Critics, who first emerged in the early 1930s but who rose to their highest prominence between 1940 and 1960. New Criticism was developed and espoused by John Crowe Ransom, Robert Penn Warren, Allen Tate, and Cleanth Brooks, all prominent poets. They insisted that a work of literature was a self-contained unit that should be analyzed in isolation, with the critic focusing primarily on formal elements, including imagery, tone, metaphor, symbol, point of view, and so on. The New Critics maintained that, through a "close reading," literary texts could be comprehended in isolation from their original historical contexts, and that even the author of the work held no claims of authority over how the work should be interpreted.

This technique became indispensable to college professors confronting the enormous influx of first-generation college students who flooded the academy as a result of the GI Bill. Students who had had little prior exposure to literature could nevertheless be taught the techniques of the New Critics. As such, the process of close reading dominated the criticism of the 1940s and 1950s. Consequently, those authors whose work was particularly receptive to close scrutiny—the seventeenth-century "metaphysical poets" and such Modernist writers as T. S. Eliot and James Joyce, for example—rose in prominence.

Even amid the ascendancy of New Criticism during the postwar period, however, numerous influential critics agitated for a more open and "real-world" approach to interpreting literary texts. Alfred KAZIN's On Native Grounds (1942), a survey of American literature produced between 1880 and 1940, combined close, formal analysis with deft attention paid to political and historical context. Lionel Trilling's The Liberal Imagination (1950) studied a series of major American writers within the rubric of the work's formal design, guided by an interpretation of the authors' moral, political, and psychological influences.

By the late 1960s the dominance of the New Critics had decidedly waned, partly out of fatigue but also due to a counterreaction spearheaded by a new generation of critics who were suspicious of the self-contained literary texts. Operating under the influence of French theorist Jacques Derrida, who rejected the search for metaphysical certainties in favor of attention to the unstable free "play" of language itself, these younger critics tended to view literary texts as unstable networks of implicit, competing, and interlocking discourses that had to be teased out and disclosed. The technique of unraveling these discourses became known as deconstruction.

Major universities quickly began to recruit emerging critics associated with deconstruction, and by the mid seventies, Yale had established itself as the undisputed epicenter of American literary criticism, with four of the leading American deconstructionist critics on its faculty: Harold BLOOM, Paul de Man, Geoffrey Hartman, and J. Hillis Miller. These critics, along with Derrida, became known informally as the Yale School.

In The Political Unconscious (1981), Marxist critic Fredric Jameson combined deconstructionist practices with Marxist techniques to produce a new brand of politically oriented criticism that inspired a major shift in the direction of American literary criticism. The rise of women's studies and African American studies programs also helped center the emphasis on the political interpretation of literary texts, highlighting not only the historical context of the work's production but also the race, sex, and nationality of the author.

Sources

Lentricchia, Frank. After the New Criticism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.

Ransom, John Crowe. The New Criticism. New York: New Directions, 1941.

Spikes, Michael. Understanding Contemporary American Literary Theory, revised edition. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

"The Literature of Exhaustion" by John Barth (1967) essay

"The Literature of Exhaustion" is the title of a seminal essay by American novelist John BARTH, first published in Atlantic magazine in 1967 and now included in his essay collection, The Friday Book (1984). In the essay Barth argues that, for novelists of his generation—namely, those who were born in the 1930s and who artistically came of age in the aftermath of Modernism—the primary problem was “how to succeed not even [James] Joyce and [Franz] Kafka, but those who succeeded Joyce and Kafka and are now in the evenings of their own careers.” Barth goes on to argue that the Modernists who preceded him had, through their restless overturning of nineteenth-century literary conventions, effectively “exhausted” literature: there was, from his standpoint, essentially nothing new left to do. His solution to this dilemma was to write “a remarkable and original work of literature, the implicit theme of which is the difficulty, perhaps the unnecessary, of writing original works of literature.” In other words, Barth argues that novelists writing in the aftermath of Modernism should write novels which overtly “imitate the form of the Novel” and call attention to their own artifice in such a way that the novelist “transcends what had appeared to be his refutation.” Barth’s diagnosis would later be understood to represent an early and formative description of what has since become known as literary POSTMODERNISM.

Source

Barth, John. The Friday Book: Essays and Other Nonfiction. New York: Putnam, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Living Theater

Founded in 1947 by struggling New York artist Julian Beck (1925–1985) and his actress wife, Judith Malina, the Living Theater is a radical theater collective that regards the dramatic stage as a medium for social change. Rejecting the ethos of commercial Broadway, the Living Theater stages edgy, avant-garde, and deliberately noncommercial plays, often using unconventional staging and multimedia production techniques to break down the so-called fourth wall separating the actors from the audience. “If one can experiment in theater,” Beck once explained, “one can experiment in life.”

Beck, a bisexual Abstract Expressionist (see ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM) and self-proclaimed anarchist, first conceived of the troupe after reading The Theatre and Its Double (1938) by French anarchist Antonin Artaud. In this work Artaud first proposed his concept of the theater of cruelty, in which violent spectacle would shock audience members from their complacency.

Over the last half-century, the Living Theater has produced plays by Kenneth Brown, Gertrude Stein, William Carlos Williams, Paul GOODMAN, Kenneth REXROTH, Jean Cocteau, Bertolt Brecht, and Luigi Pirandello. The Living Theater was also crucial in helping launch the Off-Broadway phenomenon.

Throughout the last sixty years, the troupe has operated variously as a touring ensemble, a theater collective, and an established theater. Currently, the Living Theater is located on New York’s Lower East Side. Performances are free to the public, with the proviso that theatergoers “Pay What [They] Can.”

Source

Beck, Julian. The Life of the Theater. New York: City Lights Books, 1974.

—Marshall Boswell

Logan, John (1923–1987) poet

John Logan was born in Red Oak, Iowa, and died in San Francisco, California. Educated at Yale University, he received his B.A. in 1949, his M.A. in 1951, and his Ph.D. in 1954. While teaching English at Notre Dame University in the early 1950s, Logan began writing poetry; published his first book in 1955, A Cycle for Mother Cabrini; and eventually went on to publish a total of fourteen books of verse. His poetry is generally considered religious, dealing with such themes as the tension between the flesh and the spirit. Despite having a small readership, Logan was well respected among his fellow poets, such as James DICKEY. His two best-known books are The Bridge of Change (1979) and Only the Dreamer Can Change the Dream (1981), for which he received the Lenore Marshall Poetry Prize in 1982.

Sources

Isbell, Harold. “John Hogan’s ‘Confessions’: A Poet Ever Restless,” Commonweal, May 19, 1995: 14–20.

Waters, Michael. Dissolve to Island: On the Poetry of John Logan. Houston, Tex.: Ford-Brown, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Lolita by Vladimir Nabokov (New York: Putnam, 1958) novel

Half a century after it was published, Lolita remains one of the most significant and controversial novels of the twentieth century. Told in a rapturous, lyrical style, the novel chronicles a middle-aged European man’s erotic obsession for a twelve-year-old American girl. The book’s creator, Vladimir NABOKOV, was a Russian-born aristocrat who had written nine novels in the Russian language before turning to English in the 1940s. With a complex structure and an innovative use of METAFICTION, it can be regarded as bridging the gap between Modernism and POSTMODERNISM.

Nabokov apparently began writing Lolita in 1939 or 1940 and while teaching literature at Cornell University in the late 1940s took up the subject again, writing the bulk of the novel on 8x11 index cards while on summer butterfly-hunting trips throughout the United States. He completed the book in 1954. In response to advice from friends not to seek a U.S. publisher for so controversial a novel, Nabokov turned to Olympia Press in Paris, primarily a publisher of erotica and pornography, which published the book to little initial fanfare in 1955. Within two years, influential literary figures such as Graham Greene had generated enough interest in the book to persuade the American publishing firm Putnam to bring out an American edition, which appeared in 1958. The book became an instant publishing sensation.

The novel's narrator, Humbert Humbert, relates his story from prison, where he is serving a life term for murder. He insists from first to last that his interest in the prepubescent Lolita lies primarily in the way she embodies all the properties of a "nymphet," a word Nabokov made up and which has since entered the English language. Lolita remains in the reader's mind as both heartbreakingly tragic and comic.

From the opening page to the final paragraph, the novel is replete with puns, allusions to other literary works, complicated word games, shifting levels of reality, and manic invention. Nearly every page of the novel is worthy of analysis, as is evidenced by the appearance in 1970 of Alfred Appel Jr.'s Annotated Lolita, which appends a list of endnotes that is as long as the novel it annotates.

Critics have traditionally focused on the book's fusion of high aestheticism and apparent lack of moral engagement. The book has also attracted the notice, and occasionally the ire, of feminist and Marxist critics, as well as Post-Structuralists.

Sources

- Appel, Alfred, Jr., ed. The Annotated Lolita: Revised and Updated. New York: Vintage, 1991.
 Bloom, Harold, ed. Lolita. New York: Chelsea House, 1993.
 Olsen, Lance. Lolita: A Janus Text. New York: Twayne, 1995.

—Marshall Boswell

Lonesome Dove by Larry McMurtry (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1985) novel

Larry McMurtry's Western romance, Lonesome Dove, is the story of an epic cattle drive from Texas to Montana. The novel's heroes, ex-Texas Rangers Augustus "Gus" McCrae and W. F. Call, seem to represent McMurtry's attempt both to address and question the numerous myths about the American West. Laconic and even noble in their way, the two appear to be terrified of genuine feeling. They undertake the drive for no apparent reason—at the behest of a friend of theirs who is on the lam for murdering the mayor of Fort Smith, Arkansas, they steal the horses and cattle. Their comrades also represent Western clichés, including the dimwitted but hardworking Pea Eye Parker; the scoundrel Jake Spoon; the wide-eyed, innocent Newt Dobbs; and the big-hearted prostitute Lorena Wood. Although the novel traffics in the standard motifs of the Western genre—gunfights, saloons, Indian ambushes, campfire banter, and hangings—it treats these episodes with stark realism, while its depiction of the frontier on the cusp of modern development is unsentimental. The novel became a best-seller in 1985 and won the Pulitzer Prize in 1986.

Source

- Busby, Mark. Larry McMurtry and the West: An Ambivalent Relationship. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1995.

—Marshall Boswell

Long Day's Journey into Night by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1956) play

Long Day's Journey into Night is the fullest realization of Eugene O'Neill's autobiographical impulse, although much of the play is fiction and the recurrent themes are characteristic of the final phase of his work as a dramatist. Written between 1939 and 1941, this four-act play was neither published nor produced until three years after O'Neill's death in 1953. With this grim, realistic family tragedy, O'Neill examines the complexities and contradictions within the psyches of his central characters, the "four haunted Tyrones." A stark, unrelenting exorcism of his own family's dynamics, but woven with compassion by a playwright at the peak of his abilities, Long Day's Journey into Night is considered a dramatic masterpiece.

Set in the summer of 1912, the play focuses on celebrated romantic actor James Tyrone, his wife Mary, and their adult sons, Jamie and Edmund, all of whom are summering at the family's modest Connecticut cottage. Mary is convalescing from a battle with morphine addiction that began some twenty years before when she gave birth to Edmund. The men hope Mary is finally free of drugs, the source of a long family nightmare that has deeply affected all of them. However, Mary's precarious "recovery" is threatened by the illness of Edmund, who has been unable to shake what she stubbornly refers to as a "summer cold." Nervously awaiting the results of medical tests, the men are ruefully convinced that Edmund has tuberculosis, and they endeavor to keep the truth from Mary for as long as possible.

Jamie, an alcoholic wastrel, seems to be the protector of his younger brother, concerning himself with Edmund's alcohol intake and urging him toward literary success. At a climactic moment O'Neill allows Jamie, in a drunken state, to express his twisted love. Jamie warns Edmund: "Mama and Papa are right. I've been a rotten bad influence. And worst of it is, I did it on purpose. . . . Did it on purpose to make a bum of you. Or part of me did. A big part." The paradoxes of sibling love and the uneasy relations within the family unit are often evident in O'Neill's depiction of stage siblings, beginning with his first full-length drama, the Pulitzer Prize-winning Beyond the Horizon (produced 1920).

O'Neill's agonized depictions of his mother and brother are matched by his conflicted vision of his father, whose destructive miserliness derives from a desperately poverty-stricken childhood that has imprinted relentless fears on the old man. O'Neill's self-portrait in Long Day's Journey into Night highlights the deep-seated feelings of isolation from his family—and from the world in general—that tormented him throughout his life. At one point this is explained by Edmund, who says, "It was a great mistake, my being born a man, I would have been much more successful as a sea gull or a fish. As it is, I will always be a stranger who never feels at home, who does not want and is not really wanted, who can never belong, who must always be a little in love with death!"

The original 1956 Broadway production of Long Day's Journey into Night won a fourth Pulitzer Prize for O'Neill and initiated a critical reassessment of his work. After years of neglect, O'Neill's reputation was restored by this production and by subsequent revivals of his plays.

Sources

- Alexander, Doris. Eugene O'Neill's Last Plays: Separating Art from Autobiography. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Eugene O'Neill's Long Day's Journey into Night. New York: Chelsea House, 2000.
- Manheim, Michael, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Eugene O'Neill. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Murphy, Brenda. O'Neill. Long Day's Journey into Night. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- O'Neill, Eugene. Long Day's Journey into Night. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1956.

—James Fisher

The Long Goodbye by Raymond Chandler (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1954) novel

The Long Goodbye, Raymond Chandler's sixth Philip Marlowe novel, is his longest and most ambitious work. The story chronicles Marlowe's relationship with Terry Lennox, an alcoholic whom Marlowe befriends and helps escape to Mexico after Lennox is accused of murdering his wealthy wife. Lennox apparently commits suicide, and a second apparent suicide soon follows—that of Roger Wade, an alcoholic novelist. Marlowe is required to make sense of the deaths.

The Long Goodbye allows Chandler to elaborate on the themes only hinted at in his previous works. Both Lennox and Wade are partial self-portraits, and through them Chandler explores the effects of trying to apply traditional gentlemanly values to 1950s American society, while the character of Wade allows him to examine the influence of alcoholism on a writer. The novel also marks Chandler's fullest study of the corrupting effect of money. The novel portrays crime and corruption not as the result of flawed political systems or the misdeeds of powerful men but rather as being embedded in the fabric of American society.

Above all, The Long Goodbye is an exploration of friendship and values. Marlowe's relationship with Lennox is based on their shared codes of conduct and manners, but Lennox betrays their friendship by faking his own suicide and helping cover up the murder of his wife. By rejecting Lennox at the end of the story, Marlowe adheres to his personal code of conduct, necessary in the corrupt modern world. Chandler summed up the theme of the novel as follows: "any man who tried to be honest looks in the end either sentimental or plain foolish." He pushed the detective genre beyond its traditional limits and created a powerful study of corruption and values in American society.

Source

- Moss, Robert F. Raymond Chandler: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 253. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/The Gale Group, 2002.

—Robert F. Moss

Lorde, Audre (1934–1992) poet, autobiographer

Audre Lorde (also called Gamba Adisa) was born in Harlem to Grenadan parents. She received her B.A. from Hunter College and a master's in library science from Columbia University. She worked as a librarian at the City University of New York while publishing her first poems in journals. First Cities (1968), her first book of poetry, led to various awards and fellowships, including the National Book Award in 1974. Lorde's works celebrate her love of women, protests racism and sexism, and explores the way language shapes social and individual behavior. Her work often draws upon African myths. She is a cofounder of a publishing house, The Kitchen Table, Women of Color Press.

Lorde's collections of poetry include Cables to Rage (1970), New York Head Shop and Museum (1974), The Black Unicorn (1978), Chosen Poems (1982), and Our Dead Behind Us: Poems (1986). She also wrote several autobiographical books: The Cancer Journals (1980), Zami, a New Spelling of My Name (1982), and A Burst of Light (1988). The Audre Lorde Compendium: Essays, Speeches and Journals was published in 1996.

Sources

- Perreault, Jeanne. Writing Selves: Contemporary Feminist Autobiography. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995.
- Tate, Claudia. Black Women Writers at Work. New York: Continuum, 1983.

Lost in the Funhouse by John Barth (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968; enlarged, New York: Bantam, 1969) story collection

Led by its much-anthologized title story, John BARTH's first story collection exemplifies the challenges and frustrating limitations of METAFICTION—fiction that calls attention to its own fictionality.

Consisting of fourteen interlocking stories, the collection demonstrates what Barth calls the LITERATURE OF EXHAUSTION. In a 1967 essay of the same title, Barth argues that all the available forms of literary expression have been "exhausted" from overuse. He then suggests that contemporary writers can continue to write "remarkable and original work" if they take as their "implicit theme . . . the difficulty, perhaps the unnecessary, of writing original works of literature." The stories in Lost in the Funhouse do that. Some pieces, such as "Title" and "Autobiography," are principally about themselves, while three linked stories featuring a young Baltimore native named Ambrose conflate adolescent and artistic self-consciousness. In the dense and complicated second half of the book, Barth moves away from contemporary settings to the world of myths, thereby returning narrative art to its beginnings in the hopes of replenishing the tradition.

—Marshall Boswell

Lowell, Robert (1917–1977) poet

Descended from a literary family that included his grandfather James Russell Lowell and a cousin, Amy Lowell, Robert Lowell formed the ambition to be a great poet while he was an undergraduate at Harvard. He left New England and spent a summer in Tennessee with the poet Allen Tate and his wife, Caroline Gordon, who became his mentors. They recommended that Lowell transfer to Kenyon College in Ohio, where the poet and critic John Crowe RANSOM taught. Lowell became one of Ransom's protégés, earning his A. B. in 1940, and also a kind of ambassador between North and South, between the New York Intellectuals and the Southern Agrarians.

Lowell's first book of poetry, Land of Unlikeness (1944), was a traditional and rather formal production that revealed his skill with meter and highly symbolic language. His second book, Lord Weary's Castle (1946), revealed the influence of Tate and of Lowell's conversion to Catholicism. That volume won the Pulitzer Prize; Lowell was hailed as the finest poet of his generation, and was named poetry consultant to the Library of Congress. He sustained his reputation with the difficult Modernist verse of his third volume, The Mills of the Kavanaughs (1951).

During the late 1940s and 1950s Lowell struggled to find a new style for his poetry. He believed he had exhausted the resources of the Modernist sensibility, which depended on sophisticated allusions to the classics of world literature, the tradition that T. S. Eliot described in his essay "Tradition and the Individual Talent." A contentious marriage to Jean STAFFORD complicated Lowell's feelings, which verged toward madness. During his second marriage, to Elizabeth HARDWICK, he was hospitalized nearly every year for outbreaks of manic behavior followed by deep depressions.

Out of his suffering, however, Lowell developed a new style, more personal and less polished. His CONFESSIOAL POETRY made a dramatic impact with the publication of LIFE STUDIES (1959), a volume that constituted a kind of spiritual autobiography in verse. At the same time Lowell became involved in protests against the VIETNAM WAR. His poems in History (1973) and For Lizzie and Harriet (1973) reflected the seemingly opposing perspectives of his public and private selves. "Lizzie" was Lowell's wife, Hardwick, whose letters Lowell quoted virtually verbatim in his verse, causing a storm of controversy over the appropriateness of exposing such intimacies in print. Harriet was his and Hardwick's only child.

Despite fierce criticism of the morality of Lowell's confessional poetry, his stature as a poet steadily increased with the publication of Selected Poems (1976) and other volumes. His last book, Day by Day (1977), published just before he died of a heart attack, seemed to many critics his best work in the confessional mode.

Sources

Axelrod, Steven Gould, ed. The Critical Response to Robert Lowell. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Robert Lowell. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Doreski, William. Robert Lowell's Shifting Colors: The Poetics of the Public and the Personal. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1999.

Hamilton, Ian. Robert Lowell: A Biography. New York: Random House, 1982.

Mariani, Paul. Lost Puritan: A Life of Robert Lowell. New York: Norton, 1994.

Lurie, Alison (1926– ) novelist

Alison Lurie was born in Chicago. From an early age her parents encouraged her to be a writer. She graduated from Radcliffe College with a B.A. degree in 1947 and published her first novel, Love and Friendship, in 1962. Lurie's most important and best-known novel is The War Between the Tates (1974), which dramatizes both marital and intergenerational conflict during the VIETNAM WAR era. Foreign Affairs (1984) won a Pulitzer Prize for its study of the sexual life of the middle-aged in a story about two professors on sabbatical. The Truth About Lorin Jones (1988) depicts a feminist biographer's disillusionment with her subject. Lurie's other novels include The Nowhere City (1965); Imaginary Friends (1967); Real People (1969); and Only Children (1979), which is narrated from the children's point of view. Truth or Consequences (2005) is an academic comedy about adultery set on a fictional campus like Cornell, where Lurie teaches.

The Language of Clothes (1981) is a treatment of female and male fashion that reflects the precise observation of dress that is found in Lurie's novels. She has also published children's books: The Heavenly Zoo (1979) and Clever Gretchen and Other Forgotten Folktales (1980). Don't Tell the Grown-ups: Subversive Children's Literature appeared in 1990.

Sources

Costa, Richard Hauer. Alison Lurie. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Newman, Judi. Alison Lurie: A Critical Study. Amsterdam & Atlanta: Rodopi, 2000.

Madison, James (1751–1836) statesman, essayist

Knowledge will forever govern ignorance: And a people who mean to be their own Governors, must arm themselves with the power which knowledge gives.

—Madison to William Taylor Barry, August 4, 1822

James Madison, fourth president of the United States, is known as the architect of the CONSTITUTION as well as the primary author of the Bill of Rights. He was instrumental in securing ratification of the Constitution in New York, contributing several of the major essays that together comprise THE FEDERALIST.

Born in 1751 in Port Conway, Virginia, Madison was introduced to the ideas of the Scottish ENLIGHTENMENT at the early age of eleven at a school directed by a Scottish clergyman. In 1769 Madison headed north to the College of New Jersey (later known as Princeton University). There he met two future political allies, classmates Philip FRENEAU and Hugh Henry BRACKENRIDGE. Madison enjoyed a reputation as a serious and diligent student, with excellent skills in written and oral persuasion. His politics were decidedly liberal, and he was a founding member of the American Whig Society.

After graduation in 1771, Madison returned to his home in Montpelier, Virginia, where he spent much of his time tutoring his younger siblings and, always a bit of a hypochondriac, brooding about an early death. The AMERICAN REVOLUTION afforded him his first opportunity to escape the doldrums and apply his philosophical interests to practical politics. He was appointed to the local Committee of Safety in 1774 and was named a delegate to the Virginia Convention, which first declared independence in 1776.

In that same year Madison met fellow planter and statesman Thomas JEFFERSON, with whom he subsequently enjoyed a fifty-year friendship. Strikingly different in appearance and personality, the two men seemed to complement each other. Jefferson was cosmopolitan, at ease in his travels abroad; Madison never ventured outside his American borders. Jefferson was a brilliant theoretician; Madison was a practical problem solver.

Madison was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress in 1780 and served as a Virginia representative in Congress for the next eight years. He continued to be active in shaping Virginia's political life, however, and mounted a successful campaign against Patrick HENRY's proposal for state-supported churches. Madison's Memorial and Remonstrance, Presented to the General Assembly, of the State of Virginia, at Their Session in 1785, in Consequence of a Bill Brought into that Assembly for the Establishment of Religion by Law killed Henry's initiative, as Madison proudly told Jefferson in a letter of 1786, "I flatter myself I have in this Country extinguished forever the ambitious hope of making laws for the human mind."

Madison was deeply committed to the creation of a strong national government. He believed the government of the existing constitution, the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION, was too weak to establish the new nation on a firm financial footing. Thus, he was an enthusiastic participant at the Constitutional Convention in 1787, and he persuaded his fellow Virginian George WASHINGTON to attend the convention. In Philadelphia, Madison took careful notes on the long debates over the shape of the new government, including a detailed account of his own Virginia Plan for structuring that government. When opposition to the Virginia Plan emerged,

Engraving by W. A. Wilmer from a portrait of James Madison by Gilbert Stuart, circa 1805

Madison reluctantly agreed to “the Great Compromise” over representation that allowed the stalemate to be broken and agreement on the basic structure of the government to be forged.

When the battle over ratification of the new constitution began in New York, Madison came to the assistance of nationalists Alexander HAMILTON and John JAY, leaders of the forces for its approval. Together the three men wrote the essays known as The Federalist Papers, which appeared in New York newspapers from October 1787 to August 1788. Madison contributed twenty-six of the eighty-five essays, each of which responded to the criticisms voiced against the proposed Constitution. His most significant essay, number 10, argued that the design of the new government would prevent any of the many factions within a large republic from overwhelming another. In essays 37 through 58 Madison articulated the clear divisions of powers established between each branch of government. With victory assured in New York, Madison headed back to join the ratification battle in his home state. Patrick Henry led the opposition, claiming the new government was a threat to the democratic self-government promised in the Revolution. The nationalists won the day, however, in part because of a promise by Madison and his supporters that they would add a bill of rights to the Constitution. This promise was kept, and during the first session of Congress, Madison wrote the first ten amendments to the Constitution, known popularly as the Bill of Rights. As might be expected, he fought vigorously against any attempts to dilute the First Amendment, which prohibited the establishment of a state religion.

When George Washington left the presidency, Madison also returned to Virginia. He had married QUAKER widow Dolly Payne Todd in 1793, and by 1796 he was eager to complete the remodeling of his Montpelier home. He returned to the national political scene, however, in 1798, when he and Jefferson wrote The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions in response to President John ADAMS’s Alien and Sedition Acts. These acts, Madison believed, infringed on the freedoms of speech and press guaranteed in the Constitution. In the Virginia Resolution he wrote that the states had a right to declare oppressive federal laws null and void. A later generation of southern politicians used the same states-rights argument used in The Virginia and Kentucky Resolutions to justify the dismemberment of the union Madison had worked so hard to create.

Madison served as Jefferson’s secretary of state during his friend’s presidency. Foreign affairs, particularly the conflict between France and England, played a critical role in shaping American politics during Jefferson’s administration, and when Madison entered the White House in 1808, the problems intensified. In 1812 President Madison led an ill-prepared nation into a second war with Great Britain, which ended without a clear victory for either side. When his term was over in 1816, Madison retired once again to Montpelier and to the local politics of Virginia. He joined Jefferson in creating the University of Virginia and served in the Virginia Constitutional Convention in 1829. In 1834, alarmed by South Carolina’s use of his Virginia Resolution as a rationale for secession, Madison wrote two short paragraphs, “Advice to My Country,” to be read after his death. This brief statement was intended as a warning against the destruction of the federal union. He died at Montpelier in 1836.

Works

The Federalist: A Collection of Essays, Written in Favour of the New Constitution, as Agreed upon by the Federal Convention, September 17, 1787. . . . 2 volumes. New York: J. & M. Lean, 1788. Early American Imprints, 21127, 35581.

Madison, James. Letters and Other Writings of James Madison, 4 volumes. Edited by Philip R. Fendall. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1865; Chicago: Newberry Library, 1979.

Madison. The Papers of James Madison, Presidential Series, 4 volumes. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1984.

Madison. The Papers of James Madison, Congressional Series, volumes 1–17. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1962–1977; volumes 11–17. Charlottesville: University Press of Page from Madison's notes on "Ancient and Modern Confederacies," spring 1787, made in preparation for the Federal Constitutional Convention. The passage above describes the Achaean Confederacy, an association of cities in ancient Greece. The second to last sentence in the passage reads "The members enjoyed a perfect equality, each of them sending the number of deputies to the Senate."

Virginia, 1977–1991. Secretary of State Series, volumes 1–7. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1986–2005. Presidential Series, volumes 1–5. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1984–2004.

James Madison: Writings, edited by Jack N. Rakove. New York: Library of America, 1999.

Sources

Kernell, Samuel. James Madison: The Theory and Practice of Republican Government. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2003.

Labunski, Richard E. James Madison and the Struggle for the Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Wills, Gary. James Madison. New York: Times Books, 2002.

Recommended Writings

"Memorial and Remonstrance against Religious Assessments" (1785)

The Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787, reported by James Madison (1787)

Constitution of the United States (1787)

The Federalist Papers (1787–1788)

First Inaugural Address (1809)

Second Inaugural Address (1813)

Studying James Madison

James Madison, founder, statesman, and fourth president of the United States, wrote influential essays in The Federalist Papers and maintained a voluminous correspondence. His public papers, documenting his two-term presidency, have been collected by major repositories such as the Library of Congress; James Madison University; and the University of Virginia, which houses the ongoing, authoritative collection, the twenty-seven volumes of Madison's papers that have been published since 1962. These collected works, edited by William T. Hutchinson and others, are an important resource for primary sources. Also see The Writings of James Madison, edited by Gaillard Hunt (9 volumes, New York: Putnam, 1900–1910). For a more recent one-volume edition, see James Madison: Writings, edited by Jack N. Rakove (New York: Library of America, 1999).

The definitive biography is Irving Brant's James Madison (6 volumes, Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1941–1961). Other Madison biographies that students might consult include Ralph L. Ketcham's James Madison: A Biography (New York: Macmillan, 1971) and Gary Wills's James Madison (New York: Times Books, 2002). For biographies that focus on his role as a founder and a president, see William Lee Miller's The Business of May Next: James Madison and the Founding (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1992) and Robert Allen Rutland's James Madison: The Founding Father (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1997). For students interested in reading Madison's letters and other personal writings, see The Republic of Letters: The Correspondence between Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, 1776–1826, edited by James Morton Smith (3 volumes, New York: Norton, 1995). Regarding Madison and the War of 1812, see Charles Geoffrey Muller's The Darkest Day: The Washington-Baltimore Campaign During the War of 1812 (Revised edition, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003) and Walter R. Borneman's 1812: The War That Forged a Nation (New York: HarperCollins, 2004).

For electronic sources on James Madison, see: The James Madison Papers, 1723–1836, from the Manuscript Division at the Library of Congress, with some twelve thousand items in seventy-two thousand digital images (<http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/collections/madison\_papers/index.html> viewed April 27, 2007). Also see The James Madison Papers at the University of Virginia (<<http://www.virginia.edu/pjm/>> viewed April 27, 2007); The Federalist Papers (<<http://www.yale.edu/lawweb/avalon/federal/fed.htm>> viewed April 27, 2007); and The James Madison Center at James Madison University: (<<http://www.jmu.edu/madison/center/>> viewed April 30, 2007).

Magnalia Christi Americana* by Cotton Mather

(London: Thomas Parkhurst, 1702) history

Magnalia Christi Americana; or, The Ecclesiastical History of New-England from Its First Planting, in the Year 1620, unto the Year of Our Lord, 1698 chronicles the Puritans' experience in NEW ENGLAND from the founding of Plymouth Colony to the years following the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS in 1692. The Latin title Magnalia Christi Americana generally translates to "A History of the Wonderful Works of Christ in America."

Magnalia Christi Americana is divided into seven books, as Mather outlines in the "General Introduction." Book 1 covers the founding of the colony: "I Relate the Considerable Matters, that produced and attended the First Settlement of COLONIES, which have been Renowned for the Degree of REFORMATION." Books 2 and 3 cover the biographies of magistrates and ministers: "I first introduce the Actors, that have in a more exemplary manner served those Colonies; and give Remarkable Occurrences, in the exemplary LIVES of many Magistrates, and of more Ministers, who so Lived as to leave unto Posterity Examples worthy of Everlasting Remembrance." Book 4 covers founding of HARVARD COLLEGE and notable students: "I add hereunto, the Notables of the only Protestant University that ever shone in that hemisphere of the New World; with particular instances of Criolians, in our Biography, provoking the whole World with vertuous Objects of Emulation." Book 5 covers the church organizations and procedures: "I introduce then, the Actions of a more Eminent Importance, that have signalized those Colonies; Whether the Establishments, directed by their Synods; with a Rich Variety of Synodical and Ecclesiastical Determinations." Book 6 covers notable events and people: "And into the midst of these Actions, I interpose an entire Book, wherein there is, with all possible Veracity, a Collection made of Memorable Occurrences, and amazing Judgments and Mercies befalling many particular Persons among the People of New-England." Book 7 includes more hardships of the colony: "the Disturbances, with which they have been from all sorts of Temptations and Enemies Tempestuated; and the Methods by which they have still weathered out each Horrible Tempest." Mather's Magnalia Christi Americana presents the New England Puritans as a divinely guided people.

Sources

Felker, Christopher D. Reinventing Cotton Mather in the American Renaissance: Magnalia Christi Americana in Hawthorne, Stowe, and Stoddard. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1971.

Silverman, Kenneth. The Life and Times of Cotton Mather. New York: Harper & Row, 1984.

Mann, Herman (1771–1833) writer

Author, BOOKSELLER, and newspaper editor, Herman Mann was born on November 10, 1771, in Walpole, Massachusetts. He married in 1792 and fathered eleven children. A school-teacher in the early years of his marriage, Mann moved his family to Dedham, Massachusetts, in 1797 and started a newspaper that he called The Minerva (1797–1804). Except for a brief stay in Providence, Rhode Island, Mann remained in Dedham, earning his living after 1813 as a bookbinder and bookseller until his death on September 25, 1833.

Mann is remembered for his ghostwritten autobiography of Deborah SAMPSON, a woman who disguised herself as a man, enlisted in the Revolutionary army, and served honorably until the discovery of her gender forced her to be discharged. Although Mann posed as the editor, Sampson's autobiography, The Female Review; or, Memoirs of an American Young Lady (1797) was essentially his work.

The Female Review was designed to appeal to female readers and thus opened with an advocacy of women's education. Mann reviewed the litany of British injustices that led to the AMERICAN REVOLUTION before launching into his tale of gender deception, bravery, and adventure. Mann veered between praise and condemnation of his heroine. She was, he wrote, duplicitous, but she was also heroic. By her actions, she had breached "feminine delicacy," and, perhaps most shockingly, she had engaged in romantic and sexual relations with both men and women. Mann tried to cushion the effect of his narrative by attaching morals to his tales.

Works

Mann, Herman. The Female Review: or, Memoirs of an American Young Lady. Dedham, Mass.: Printed by Nathaniel & Benjamin Heaton for the author, 1797; New York: Arno, 1972.

Mann. The Columbian Primer, or, An Easy, Systematic Introduction to the English Language. Boston: Printed by Thomas Fleet, 1801; Early American Imprints, second series, 332.

Sources

Brown, Herbert Ross. The Sentimental Novel in America, 1789–1860. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1940.

Evans, Elizabeth. Weathering the Storm; Women of the American Revolution. New York: Scribner, 1975.

Young, Alfred F. Masquerade: The Life and Times of Deborah Sampson, Continental Soldier. New York: Knopf, 2004.

Marrant, John (1755–1791) minister, teacher

The next morning, having quitted my customary lodging, and returned thanks to the Lord for my preservation through the night, reading and travelling on, I passed between two bears . . . I went and returned God thanks for my escape, who had tamed the wild beasts of the forest, and made them friendly to me.

—A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black (1785)

John Marrant was born in New York in 1755, into a free black family. He moved with his mother to Florida, then Georgia, and in 1766, to Charleston, South Carolina, where he lived with his sister. In Charleston, Marrant learned carpentry and studied the violin and the French horn, a decision brought on after walking past a school one day. He later explained: "I heard music and dancing, which took my fancy very much, and I felt a strong inclination to learn the music. I went home, and informed my sister, that I had rather learn to play upon music than go to a trade." Despite his mother's initial attempts to persuade him otherwise, Marrant pursued his musical interest and eventually taught music.

When fourteen-year-old Marrant attended the Reverend George WHITEFIELD's sermons in Charleston on a dare to play his French horn during the sermon, Marrant was instead deeply affected by Whitefield's preaching and was inspired to become a preacher. Marrant converted to Methodism and left his family to become an itinerant preacher in South Carolina. For two years Marrant delivered sermons to the Chickasaw, Creek, Cherokee, and Choctaw.

John Marrant's experiences are chronicled in A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black . . . (1785). He describes his captivity by the Cherokee—resulting from a reunion with a family friend, a Cherokee hunter—as an opportunity to convert the Indians. When Marrant returned to Charleston after a two-year absence, his family, assuming that he had died, did not recognize him dressed in animal skins and a sash, carrying a tomahawk. Marrant remained in Charleston briefly, helping to build a church school, before joining the British Navy to fight against the colonists, along with other blacks who were offered freedom once the British won the war. Marrant served in the Royal Navy from 1775 to 1782, leaving upon falling ill. He then traveled to London, where he gained the support of the countess of Huntington, a wealthy Methodist dedicated to the abolition of slavery and to missionary work. Ordained by the countess on May 15, 1785, in her chapel in Bath, England, Marrant then worked in Nova Scotia with local tribes, the Micmacs and with refugee black LOYALISTS. Over the next two years Marrant contributed to the community by teaching school, preaching, building a chapel, and ordaining two African ministers. When the funding he had thought was forthcoming from the countess of Huntington did not materialize, Marrant left Nova Scotia for Boston, where he worked in the first black Masonic lodge, established by Prince Hall. Marrant preached antislavery sermons in Hall's church and also taught school. Marrant returned to London in 1790, where, according to Carla Mulford, "he published his account of his North American experiences in his Journal (1790)." John Marrant died in April 1791.

Marrant's narrative of his life story and spiritual conversion was told to the Methodist English minister William Aldridge. As with other "told to" narratives, Aldridge edited the work but identified the narrative as Marrant's: "Taken down from his own relation, Arranged Corrected, and Published by the Rev. Mr. Aldridge." Readers in Marrant's time were familiar with such editing of PERSONAL NARRATIVES, such as the captivity or SLAVE NARRATIVE, and thought that if the text was altered, it was sanctioned, much as Aldridge explains in the Preface: "I have always preserved Mr. Marrant's ideas, tho'

I could not his language; no more alterations, however, have been made, than were thought necessary.” Marrant’s Narrative can be identified with both the CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE and the SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY. His life story, however, is unusual for a captivity narrative because it focuses less on incidents of isolation or feelings of desolation and more on offering his experience as an opportunity to demonstrate his newfound evangelical faith by converting his captors to Christianity.

Work

Marrant, John. A Narrative of the Lord’s Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant, a Black. . . London: Gilbert & Plummer, 1785.

Source

Carretta, Vincent and Philip Gould, eds. Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Early Black Atlantic. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001, 116–129.

Mason, George (1725–1792) statesman

George Mason is remembered primarily for his objection to the final form of the CONSTITUTION of the United States. He rejected what he considered its perversion of democracy inherent in strong state governments as well as the excessive powers of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the new national government. Although not known for any particular work, his writings, collected as The Papers of George Mason, comprise letters, speeches, articles, drafts of legislation, and other items that bear witness to his democratic sensibilities. Moreover, his work shows the influence of the ENLIGHTENMENT on his thinking and, more generally, on the thinking of the ruling class in late-colonial and early-republican America. Mason was a fervent believer in John Locke’s view of government as a contract between the people and the rulers, and of government as the servant of the people. In addition, he associated personal liberty with economic liberty and thus resisted any government interference in commerce unless it emanated from a democratically elected and responsible body.

George Mason was born in Fairfax County, Virginia, to George Mason and Ann Thomson Mason. Mason’s father died when Mason was only ten years old. His mother managed the Mason estate on her own and saw to it that Mason received an appropriate education. At age twenty-five Mason married Anne Eilbeck, and they had nine children, three of whom died in infancy. When Anne Mason died in 1773, they had been married for twenty-three years. In 1780, Mason married Sarah Brent.

Mason served as vestryman for Truro Parish and justice of the peace for Fairfax County for most of his adult life. In 1752 he became treasurer of the Ohio Company, a land company trying to gain titles to large tracts of land in the West in order to sell them to prospective settlers. In 1758 he had his first taste of state political office when he was elected to Virginia’s House of Burgesses, in which he served only four years before the turmoil of the Revolution propelled him to the front lines of Virginian and American politics.

Mason was a staunch defender during the pre-Revolutionary years of the exclusive right of the local legislatures to tax the colonists. In June 1766 he wrote:

There is a Passion natural to the Mind of man, especially a free man, which renders him Impatient of Restraint. . . . Such another Experiment as the Stamp-Act would produce a general Revolt in America. . . .

In 1769 Mason prepared the draft resolution of a non-importation association intended to force British merchants to join the colonists in demanding repeal of the taxes. George WASHINGTON introduced this draft into the House of Burgesses and secured its adoption. Mason also collaborated with Washington to draft the Fairfax County Resolves, Virginia’s response to the Coercive Acts passed in 1774 to punish Boston for destroying English tea. The Resolves called for a continental congress that would devise “a general and uniform Plan for the Defence and Preservation of our common Rights. . .,” the most radical response to the Coercive Acts at the time.

In June 1776 Mason was called upon to draft the Declaration of Rights of Virginia and the first constitution of the independent commonwealth of Virginia, both adopted by the Virginia Convention in June. The Declaration of Rights called for the right to jury trials, religious toleration, freedom of the press, protection against general warrants, limits on bail, and protection against cruel and unusual punishments—the last point showing that Mason was also a student of Cesare Beccaria, leading advocate of criminal-justice reform during the Enlightenment.

During the latter part of the Revolution, Mason’s views on the relationship between the state and national governments, and, indeed, between the individual and the governments, were becoming apparent. He feared the trends of the Continental Congress, which demanded that the states levy more taxes to support the army and retire the public debt. He was, thus, a strict defender of the limited national government that had been devised in the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION.

Mason agreed to support a constitutional convention in 1787 because of his increasing conviction that the Confederation was too weak to ensure the opening of settlement in the West. His hope was that the nation could establish a stronger central government that still protected the individual. As a Virginia delegate to the Philadelphia convention, however, he became disillusioned. In his view, the proposed constitution created an executive branch that was too free from legislative control and that weakened state governments. Following the convention, he wrote and circulated a memorandum, "Objections to This Constitution of Government." In it, he criticized the lack of a Declaration of Rights and condemned the decision to let the slave trade continue for twenty years.

Mason's objection to slavery was already apparent in July 1773, when as part of his study of the Virginia Charters as an employee of the Ohio Company, he wrote "that slow Poison, [slavery] . . . is daily contaminating the Minds & Morals of our People. Every Gentlemen here is born a petty Tyrant." Because Mason believed the Constitution would "produce a monarchy, or a corrupt, tyrannical aristocracy," or most likely "vibrate some years between the two, and then terminate in the one or the other," he became one of the leading opponents of ratification in Virginia. Although he lost this battle, he did live to see the adoption of a Bill of Rights. Despite this victory, however, he continued to have grave doubts about the new government and, in 1790, refused a seat in the Senate. George Mason died October 7, 1792, at his plantation, Gunston Hall.

Work

Mason, George. The Papers of George Mason, edited by Robert A. Rutland. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1970.

Source

Broadwater, Jeff. George Mason, Forgotten Founder. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

Massachusetts Bay Colony

Established in 1630 with a royal CHARTER, the Massachusetts Bay Company was granted lands extending three miles from the Charles River to three miles north of the Merrimack River. John WINTHROP, a lawyer and Puritan leader, organized the effort. John Endecott (1589–1665) was governor under the New England Company; when the new charter for the Massachusetts Bay Colony was established in 1630, Winthrop was appointed governor by the court.

Members of the Massachusetts Bay Company departed on the ARBELLA and three other ships on April 8, 1630, from Yarmouth, Isle of Wight, and arrived at Salem, Massachusetts, on June 13, 1630. Colonists were inspired by financial prospects and by the possibility of religious refuge. Deteriorating economic, political, and religious conditions in England contributed to the migration. Winthrop, who served as governor until his death in 1649, aspired along with other Puritans to make the community a "City upon a Hill," with absolute obedience from its members. Those who did not comply, such as Roger WILLIAMS, Anne HUTCHINSON, and Thomas HOOKER, departed voluntarily or were banished.

The founding of the Massachusetts Bay Colony signaled the beginning of the "Great Migration" of the 1630s, a period when some fourteen thousand English Puritans made the eight- to twelve-week voyage across the Atlantic to NEW ENGLAND. Whereas the initial migrations had involved mostly single young men, the Massachusetts Bay Colony was largely comprised of families, which contributed to a more stable and faster-growing population. In general, the new arrivals were more prosperous than previous immigrants, who had arrived as indentured servants to the Chesapeake area, attracted by economic prospects unavailable to them at home in England.

In 1684 James II appointed Edmund Andros (1637–1714) as governor of the newly constructed New England Dominion, an administration that banned meetings and dismissed the assembly. England's attempt to maintain political control of the colonies by imposing the New England Dominion stirred rebellious petitioning for Andros's removal, but not until James II was dethroned and William and Mary crowned did the colony regain its legislative freedom to elect its own representatives and restore the Massachusetts assembly.

Notable authors and works associated with the Massachusetts Bay Colony include the poets Anne BRADSTREET, Michael WIGGLESWORTH (specifically his The Day of Doom [1662]), and Edward TAYLOR; John WINTHROP's "Model of Christian Charity" (1630) and "Journal" (1630–1649); Francis Higginson's (1587–1630) "Journal" (1629) and New England's Plantation (1630); Samuel SEWALL's Diary (1674–1729) and The Selling of Joseph (1700); Cotton MATHER's MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA, his Bonifacius: An Essay . . . to Do Good (1710), and his WONDERS OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD; THE BAY PSALM BOOK; and THE NEW ENGLAND PRIMER.

Works

Winthrop, John. A Journal of the Transactions and Occurrences in the Settlement of Massachusetts and the Other New England Colonies. Hartford: Printed by Elisha Babcock, 1790; revised as The History of New England from 1630 to 1649, edited by James Savage. Boston: Little, Brown, 1853.

Bradford, William. History of Plymouth Plantation . . ., edited by Charles Deane, Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, fourth series, no. 2, 1856; republished as Of Plymouth Plantation, 1620–1647, edited by Samuel Eliot Morison, New York: Knopf, 1952.

Sources

Breen, T. H. Puritans and Adventurers: Change and Persistence in Early America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.

Bremer, Francis J., and L. A. Botelho, eds. The World of John Winthrop: Essays on England and New England, 1588–1649. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 2005.

Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York: Viking, 2001.

Massachusetts Historical Society (1791– )

America's first repository of historical documents, including books and manuscripts, was the Massachusetts Historical Society (MHS), established by the Reverend Jeremy BELKNAP, a Boston minister, on January 24, 1791, when he gathered a group of like-minded friends for the purpose of collecting and preserving primary sources of American history. Through contributions of family papers, books, and artifacts, the Massachusetts Historical Society began assembling a valuable collection. In 1792 the Society published the Collections, which included edited transcriptions of historical documents and rare early publications and manuscripts from the Society's own collections.

The MHS is the main repository for collections of the personal papers of individuals and families who lived in Massachusetts, notably the John and Abigail ADAMS family and Mercy Otis WARREN. It also holds PAUL REVERE's own account of his famous ride and manuscript copies of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE by both THOMAS JEFFERSON and John Adams. In 1859 the Society began publishing Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, which was replaced in 1997 with The Massachusetts Historical Review.

Sources

Cushing, John D. Catalogue of Books in the Massachusetts Historical Library: An Annotated Edition of the 1796 Library Catalogue of the Massachusetts Historical Society. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1997.

The Massachusetts Historical Society <<http://www.masshist.org>> (viewed August 16, 2006).

Tucker, Louis Leonard. The Massachusetts Historical Society: A Bicentennial History, 1791–1991. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society. Distributed by Northeastern University Press, 1995.

Mather, Cotton (1663–1728) minister, theologian, historian

I write the wonders of the Christian religion, flying from the deprivations of Europe to the American strand. . . .

—Magnalia Christi Americana (1702)

Cotton Mather was born in Boston on February 12, 1663, the son of Increase MATHER and Maria Cotton Mather, the daughter of John COTTON. As the eldest son in a leading Puritan family, Mather was prepared from childhood to play a leading role in the Congregational Church. He attended Boston Latin School and entered HARVARD COLLEGE at the age of twelve, one of the youngest students ever admitted to the program. He graduated from Harvard in 1678 and returned to complete his master's degree in 1681.

Although it is unclear at what point in his youth he developed a stuttering problem, it delayed his career in the ministry, a vocation that demanded excellence at elocution.

Cotton Mather, 1728; mezzotint by Peter Pelham

Mather spent two years studying medicine, and in 1685 was finally ordained. He joined his father at the Second Church in Boston, a position he held for the rest of his life. Ordination was soon followed by his marriage in 1686 to Abigail Phillips. Abigail died in 1702; his second wife, Elizabeth, died in 1713; and his third wife, Lydia outlived him. Mather had fifteen children, a large family even by the standards of the time; he outlived all but two of these children.

Largely unsuccessful as a clergyman, Cotton Mather suffered from comparison with his better-known father and was apparently unsuited for his public role. He was, however, a prolific writer, leaving a record of more than four hundred publications. His early efforts included an essay, The Declaration of the Gentlemen, Merchants, and Inhabitants of Boston (1689), which supported the rebellion against Sir Edmund Andros (1637–1714), the royal governor. Cotton Mather was left in charge of the church during his father's mission to England to negotiate with the royal government. When Increase Mather returned from the mission in England with a new charter and a new governor, Sir William Phips (1651–1695), Cotton Mather threw his support behind both the charter ("Political Fables," written in 1693) and Phips (Pietas in Patriam, a testimonial to the governor, was published in 1697).

Mather was, in turn, rewarded with an appointment as one of the judges in the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS, where he played a leading role in the prosecutions and their aftermath. Focusing on both the spiritual and the scientific aspects of the case, he placed limitations on the use of spectral or ghostly evidence. Mather's standards of justice were significantly higher than those of the other judges, but his views were largely ignored. Mather supported the convictions of some of the alleged witches and failed to protest the convictions of those people he believed to be innocent. Mather wrote the following about his ability to recount the trials:

This is the Story of Goodwins Children, a Story all made up of Wonders! I have related nothing but what I judge to be true. I was my self an Eye-witness to a large part of what I tell; and I hope my neighbours have long thought, That I have otherwise learned Christ, than to ly unto the World. Yea, there is, I believe, scarce any one particular, in this Narrative, which more than one credible Witness will not be ready to make Oath unto.

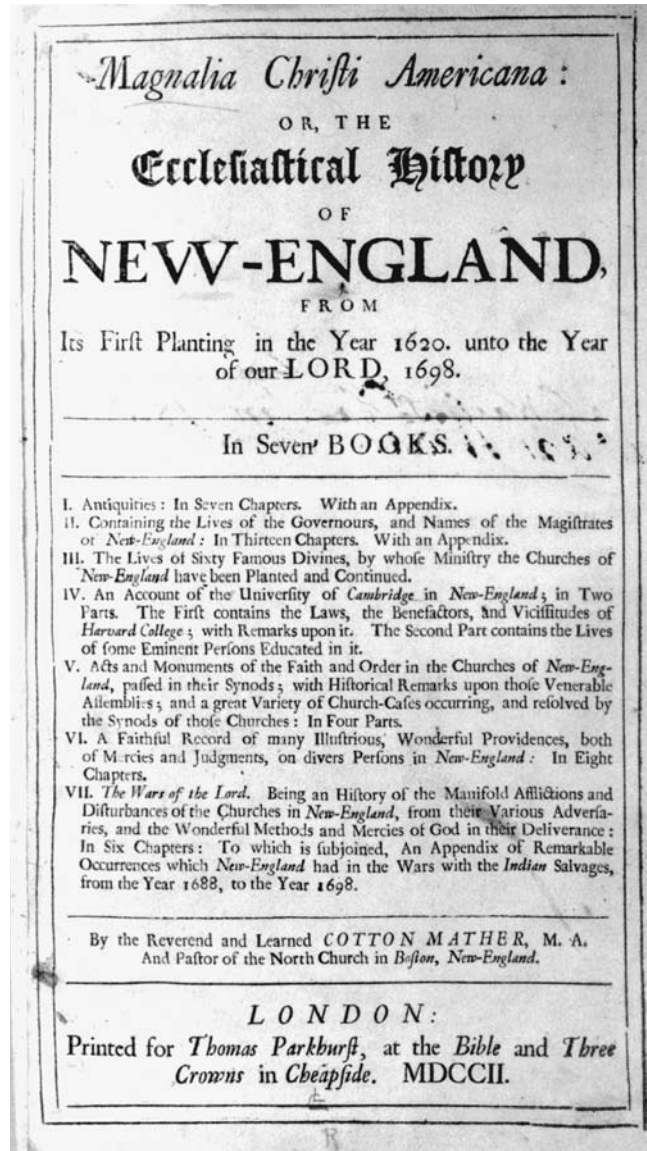

He recorded his observations in detail in Memorable Providences, Relating to Witchcrafts and Possessions (1689), and in his WONDERS OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD.

The body of Mather's writing is distinguished by its variety. He published many works on theology, biblical studies, and church history. In 1702 his ecclesiastical history of New England, MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA, was published in London. Covering the period from initial settlement until 1698, it made an immediate and lasting impact on historical perceptions of Puritan New England as the fulfillment of a heavenly mission. Mather also attempted poetry and psalms, with less success. He continued to remain interested in science, leading the campaign for smallpox inoculation and publishing a treatise in 1722 on common illnesses and their possible cures (The Angel of Bethesda, Visiting the Invalids of a Miserable World). One of Mather's most important literary contributions, his diaries, was unpublished during his own lifetime. A habitual diarist, Mather left an important historical record full of introspection and personal insights. He remained an important writer into the last years of his life. He died on February 13, 1728.

Works

Mather, Cotton. The Wonders of the Invisible World. Boston: Printed by Benjamin Harris, 1693; reprinted as On Witchcraft, Being the Wonders of the Invisible World, First Published at Boston in Octr. 1692 and Now Reprinted with Additional Matter and Old Wood-Cuts for the Library of the Fantastic & Curious. Mount Vernon: Peter Pauper Press, 1950; New York: Dorset, 1991.

Mather. Magnalia Christi Americana: Or, The Ecclesiastical History of New-England. London: Printed for T. Parkhurst, 1702.

Title page for Mather's history of New England Puritanism written between 1693 and 1697

Edited by Kenneth B. Murdock with the assistance of Elizabeth W. Miller. Cambridge: Belknap Press, 1977.

Mather. The Diary of Cotton Mather, D.D., F.R.S. for the Year 1712. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1964.

Mather. Selected Letters of Cotton Mather. Compiled by Kenneth Silverman. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971.

Sources

Levin, David. Cotton Mather: The Young Life of the Lord's Remembrancer, 1663–1703. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1978.

Silverman, Kenneth. The Life and Times of Cotton Mather. New York: Columbia University Press, 1985.

Recommended Writings

The Wonders of the Invisible World (1693)

Magnalia Christi Americana (1702)

The Negro Christianized an Essay to Excite and Assist the Good Work, the Instruction of Negro-Servants in Christianity (1706)

Bonifacius: An Essay Upon the Good That Is to Be Devised and Designed by Those Who Desire to Answer the Great End of Life and to Do Good While They Live: A Book Offered . . . with Humble Proposals of Unexceptionable Methods to Do Good in the World (1710)

The Christian Philosopher: A Collection of the Best Discoveries in Nature, with Religious Improvements (1720)

The Diary of Cotton Mather, 1681–1724 (1911)

Studying Cotton Mather

Cotton Mather, clergyman, church leader, and historian, wrote between four and five hundred sermons, kept a detailed diary for forty-three years, and wrote a defense for the proceedings of the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS. In keeping with the Puritan tradition of hagiography, that is, biographies that honor leaders, particularly those of religious stature, Mather wrote on William BRADFORD, John WINTHROP, and John ELIOT. Mather also wrote about his devotional life in a series of works intending to provide “directions for a candidate of the ministry,” Manductio ad Ministerium . . . (Boston: Printed for Thomas Hancock, 1726). The scope of Mather’s career is indicated by the many primary and secondary sources available for study.

For personal writings, students should consult the Selected Letters of Cotton Mather, compiled by Kenneth Silverman (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971). The authoritative biography is David Levin’s Cotton Mather: The Young Life of the Lord’s Remembrancer, 1663–1703 (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1978). More-recent biographies include Constance J. Post’s Signs of the Times in Cotton Mather’s Paterna: A Study of Puritan Autobiography (New York: AMS Press, 2000). For sources on Cotton Mather’s family and life, students should consult Robert Middlekauff’s The Mathers: Three Generations of Puritan Intellectuals, 1596–1728 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1971); Sacvan Bercovitch’s “Cotton Mather,” in Major Writers of Early American Literature, edited by Everett Emerson (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1972); Babette May Levy’s Cotton Mather (Boston: Twayne, 1979); and Kenneth Silverman’s The Life and Times of Cotton Mather (New York: Harper & Row, 1984). For a study of Cotton Mather and his interests in science and inoculation, see I. Bernard Cohen’s Cotton Mather and American Science and Medicine: With Studies and Documents Concerning the Introduction of Inoculation or Variolation (New York: Arno, 1980).

For general historical background on Puritan and NEW ENGLAND culture see Bercovitch’s The Puritan Origins of the American Self (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975); Linda Munk’s The Devil’s Mousetrap: Redemption and Colonial American Literature (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997); and Emory Elliott’s The Cambridge Introduction to Early American Literature (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002). For a study of Mather’s contemporaries, see Mitchell Breitweiser’s Cotton Mather and Benjamin Franklin: The Price of Representative Personality (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984). Students interested in studying Cotton Mather and the Salem witchcraft trials, see Peter Charles Hoffer’s The Devil’s Disciples: Makers of the Salem Witchcraft Trials (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996); Hoffer’s The Salem Witchcraft Trials: A Legal History (Lawrence, Kans.: University Press of Kansas, 1997); John Demos’s Entertaining Satan: Witchcraft and the Culture of Early New England (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982); and Mary Beth Norton’s In the Devil’s Snare: The Salem Witchcraft Crisis of 1692 (New York: Knopf, 2002).

A standard print bibliography of Cotton Mather’s works is Thomas James Holmes’s Cotton Mather, A Bibliography of His Works (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1940). The Cotton Mather Papers are located at the Massachusetts Historical Society, and the collection is divided into diaries (1681–1724); sermon notes (1676–1720); miscellaneous numbered documents (1636–1717); correspondence (1690–1724); sermons, essays, and other works (1680–1724), and his unpublished six-volume manuscript, “Biblia Americana.” An Authoritative Edition of Cotton Mather’s “Biblia Americana” (c. 1690–1728), is being edited by Reiner Smolinski, and will appear in ten volumes in the Collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society, Boston. The website for this project provides helpful resources (<<http://www.bibliaamericana.gsu.edu/index.htm>> viewed April 30, 2007).

Mather, Increase (1639–1723) minister

Increase Mather published more than one hundred sermons and political, historical, and scientific essays. His political tracts addressed the local issues and the interests of Massachusetts within the British Empire. His historical and scientific works carried a constant subtext: the authenticity of Puritan theology and the legitimacy of Puritan leadership. His sermons celebrate or commemorate the fullest range of community life, including days of collective humiliation, Sabbath observance, executions, funerals, and ordination ceremonies. Mather also demonstrated an aptitude for storytelling, notably in his Autobiography (written circa 1685–1715 and first published in 1962) and in his An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences (1684). The autobiography was intended for the children of his family rather than for publication; in it he recounted how his faith had sustained him through every trial and episode of doubt. An Essay narrates scientific accounts of natural and apparently supernatural events and then explains how each event illuminates a theological truth.

Increase Mather was born on June 21, 1639, in Dorchester, Massachusetts. His father, the Reverend Richard Mather, and his mother, Katherine Hoult Mather, provided a strict religious upbringing for their family. At the age of twelve Mather entered HARVARD COLLEGE, graduating in 1656. He preached his first sermon from his father's pulpit at the age of eighteen. In 1657 he sailed to England and took his master's degree at Trinity College, Dublin. Returning to Massachusetts, he became a minister in his father's church and served as a delegate to the critical synod that produced the Half-Way Covenant, an historic compromise regarding Puritan church membership. He married his step-sister, Maria Cotton, in 1662, and fathered ten children. In May 1664 Increase Mather was ordained at the Old North Church of Boston (Second Church), where he served for the following fifty years of his life.

Mather's reputation grew steadily. In the 1670s he became a fellow of Harvard College and, by 1686, its president. He was active in the civic, political, and intellectual life of Boston, organizing the Philosophical Society of Boston in 1683, representing his province before the king in 1688, and publishing a significant historical work, A Brief History of the War with the Indians in New England, in 1676. In addition, Mather was an acknowledged master of the pulpit, preaching effectively throughout his career. A staunch defender of Puritan orthodoxy, he called on his congregants to return to the ideals of the founders in sermons such as The Day of Trouble is Near (1674).

Mather came under attack in 1692 for the role he and his son, the Reverend Cotton MATHER, played in the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS. Although he had lent his public support to the trials, privately Mather recommended a policy of moderation to the new governor of Massachusetts. In 1693 Mather published Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits in which he expressed doubts and raised questions about the use of spectral evidence—the sighting of the alleged witch's ghost or spectre. Despite his implicit rejection of the use of such evidence at the Salem trials, Mather suffered the loss of his reputation. He was also criticized for his strict orthodoxy in an era when secularism and cosmopolitan style were becoming the hallmarks of Boston. Increase Mather died on August 23, 1723.

Work

Mather, Increase. An Essay For the Recording of Illustrious Providences, Wherein an Account is Given of Many Remarkable and Very Memorable Events, Which Have Happened in This Last Age; Especially in New-England. Boston: Printed by Samuel Green for Joseph Browning, 1684; Early American Imprints, 372, 373.

Sources

Hall, David D. The Faithful Shepherd: A History of the New England Ministry in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2006.

Hall, Michael G. The Last American Puritan: The Life of Increase Mather, 1639–1723. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1988.

Middlekauff, Robert. The Mathers; Three Generations of Puritan Intellectuals, 1596–1728. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Mather, Richard (1596–1669) minister

Richard Mather was best known for his work as a minister in NEW ENGLAND, specifically in Dorchester, Massachusetts. There he preached several times each week, providing a Sunday sermon that typically lasted three to four hours. His style was simple and practical, as evidenced in his The Summe of Certain Sermons Upon Genes: 15.6 (1652), his only published collection of sermons. Collaborating with John ELIOT, Thomas MAYHEW, and others, in 1640 Mather compiled The Whole Book of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre, better known as THE BAY PSALM BOOK.

Mather was born in 1596 in Lowton, Lancashire, England, into the yeoman (or small landowning) family of Thomas and Margrett Mather. At age fifteen he started to teach, but in 1614 he had a momentous religious experience. Mather became convinced that he was one of the elect—a person chosen by God to be saved. He began to prepare for the ministry while still teaching Greek and Latin as master of the Toxteth School.

Mather entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1618. Only a few months later he returned to Toxteth to answer a call to become minister of the community. Mather was ordained in the Church of England and spent several years at Toxteth, where in 1624 he married Katherine Hoult and began his family. Problems arose, however, as church leaders tired of his nonconformist ways. In 1633 his intransigence finally caused his removal from the pulpit of the ANGLICAN CHURCH. Ostracized and worried about persecution, Mather thought it best to emigrate. He arrived in Boston on August 17, 1635, five years after the colony of Massachusetts Bay had been founded.

Massachusetts Bay afforded Mather and others the opportunity to build a society on biblical principles. However, New England church officials dealt Mather a crushing blow when they claimed he showed no evidence of being one of the elect. When Mather later modified his views on ordination, he was admitted to the church. His problems were not at an end, however. In 1636 he encountered difficulties in establishing a church in Dorchester, for church leaders and the magistrates of the colony refused to allow his congregation to organize with him as their minister. They ruled that the parishioners had not demonstrated ample proof of being saved. After months of instruction from Mather, the congregation persuaded religious and civic leaders to reverse their decision. The episode forced Mather to learn more about New England CONGREGATIONALISM and doubtless contributed to his stance on the separation of secular and religious leadership.

Mather was well versed in the religious ways of New England and was selected by other ministers to respond to criticisms of the system. When an English minister questioned the New England style of organizing churches, Mather answered this critic in An Apologie of the Churches in New-England for Church Covenant (1643). His explanation of covenant in this response has become the standard definition of the process. He wrote, "A solemne and publick promise before the Lord, whereby a company of Christians, called by the power and mercy of God to fellowship with Christ, and by his providence to live together . . . in the unitie of faith and brotherly love . . . bind themselves to the Lord and to one another." Mather's second work, Church-Government and Church Covenant Discussed; in an Answer of the Elders of the Severall Churches in New England to Two and Thirty Questions (1643), provided an overview of church doctrine.

Throughout the rest of the 1640s, Mather wrote a series of responses and rebuttals to critics of the New England church. In A Platform of Church Discipline . . . (1649), of which he was the main author, Mather responded to those who lobbied for a Presbyterian Church structure. In Modell of Church Government (1648), he composed a meticulous and vigorously argued work on church tenets and practices. In both works Mather contended that a greater separation between religious and civil authorities must exist. Mather's wife, Katherine, died in 1655; he then married Sarah Cotton, widow of John COTTON, in 1656.

All through his life, Mather espoused a liberal view on baptism, urging the church to baptize the children of baptized parents. In A Farewell Exhortation to the Church and People of Dorchester (1657), he observed a decline around him in religious attitudes and exhorted his readers to redirect themselves to God. Mather continued to preach in Dorchester until his death at age seventy-three on April 22, 1669. An earnest and thoughtful champion of New England Congregationalism, Mather has been overshadowed by his contemporaries John Cotton and Thomas HOOKER; by his sixth son, Increase MATHER; and by his grandson, Cotton MATHER.

Works

Mather, Richard. The Whole Book of Psalmes Faithfully Translated into English Metre, by Mather, John Eliot, Thomas Mayhew, and Others. Cambridge: Printed by Stephen Daye, 1640; Chicago, 1956; reprinted as The Bay Psalm Book. London: Nottingham Court, 1984; Early American Imprints, 4, 20, 33.

Mather. The Summe of Certain Sermons upon Genes: 15.6. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Samuel Green, 1652; Early American Imprints, 35.

Sources

Burg, Barry Richard. Richard Mather. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Hall, David D. The Faithful Shepherd: A History of the New England Ministry in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2006.

Mayflower

This chartered ship carried the PILGRIMS to America, departing Holland on July 22, 1620, accompanied by a consort, the Speedwell, which the Pilgrims had purchased in Holland. Both ships left Southampton, England, on August 15, 1620; the leaking Speedwell, after returning to England twice for repairs, proved unseaworthy. Finally, on September 16, 1620, the Pilgrims departed Plymouth, England, on the Mayflower for the New World. Guided by Captain Christopher Jones, this three-masted, double-decked merchant ship weighed 180 tons, and despite a damaged beam, arrived in Provincetown, Cape Cod, Massachusetts, on November 21, 1620. Once the colonists had built shelter and no longer needed the Mayflower for housing, the ship set sail on April 5, 1621, and arrived in London in May 1621. Mourt's Relation is an anonymous account of the voyage, published in 1622. It may have been written by George Morton, William BRADFORD, or Edward Winslow (1595–1655). Bradford and Winslow also kept journals of the Mayflower voyage.

Source

Philbrick, Nathaniel. Mayflower: A Story of Courage, Community, and War. New York: Viking, 2006.

Mayhew, Thomas, Jr. (1621–1657) missionary

Thomas Mayhew Jr. was born in England in 1621 and immigrated to Massachusetts with his father, Thomas Sr., when he was about ten years old. By 1641 the two Mayhews had acquired land patents for Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, and the Elizabeth Islands. As the owner of the islands, Thomas Sr. became their first governor.

By 1643 Thomas Jr. had settled on the Vineyard as pastor of the Edgartown church. Later that year a local Wampanoag requested Christian instruction from Mayhew, marking the start of a lengthy process that eventually led to the conversion of the three thousand native inhabitants of the island. Mayhew's career as a missionary was cut short by his death in 1657, when he was lost at sea on a voyage to England to secure the family inheritance of his wife, Jane Paine Mayhew, by whom he had three sons.

Mayhew was the first Congregational clergyman to minister to NEW ENGLAND's Native Americans. He worked hard to achieve his remarkable missionary success. Having immigrated to Massachusetts at an early age, Mayhew felt a genuine pity for the impoverished local WAMPANOAG, and he spent several years studying their language and customs. He bore most of the costs of his mission out of his own pocket, but when his finances failed, Mayhew wrote four letters designed to win support for his project. These letters are his literary legacy. In the first, The Glorious Progress of the Gospel, amongst the Indians in New England (1647), Mayhew explained that the local Indians accepted Christianity because of their “notable reason, judgement, and capacitie.” He thus confidently asserted “in no long time they conceived no ill opinion of the Christian religion.” In the second, The Light Appearing More and More towards the Perfect Day (1650), the author provides a history of the island’s mission and an explanation for why some Indians resist Christianity—that is, a misguided desire for wealth.

The third letter, Strength out of Weakness (1651), addressed to Henry Whitfield, was eventually published by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG) as The Banner of Grace and Love Displayed in the Farther Conversion of the Indians in New England. Like the previous letters, this one was intended as a fund-raising device, but it is nevertheless rich in ethnographic details, including descriptions of powwows.

The final letter, Tears of Repentance (1652), written primarily by John ELIOT, was addressed to the SPG itself. Mayhew disclosed that he had opened a school for thirty Wampanoag pupils. This school, Mayhew argues, is proof that the Indians’ faith was sincere and intense. With the exception of the third letter, none of these appeals for assistance—currently held by the Massachusetts Historical Society—has been published.

Work

Mayhew, Thomas, Jr. The Glorious Progress of the Gospel, amongst the Indians in New England: Manifested by Three Letters under the Hand of That Famous Instrument of the Lord, Mr. John Eliot, and Another from Mr. Thomas Mayhew, Jun., Both Preachers as Well to the English as Indians in New England. London: Printed for Hannah Allen, 1649.

Sources

Bross, Kristina. Dry Bones and Indian Sermons: Praying Indians in Colonial America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Silverman, David J. Faith and Boundaries: Colonists, Christianity, and Community Among the Wampanoag Indians of Martha’s Vineyard, 1600–1871. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Mercer, John (1704–1768) historian, poet

John Mercer was born in Dublin, Ireland, on February 6, 1704. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he immigrated to Virginia in 1726 and established a legal practice. He built Marlborough, one of the most elaborate and elegant houses in colonial America, with a private library of at least 1,500 books.

Mercer is known for his abridgment of Virginia laws in a work familiar to every legal historian. The value of An Exact Abridgment of the Public Acts of the Assembly of Virginia (1737) was immediately recognized by every sitting justice in the colony. Modeled after Edmund Wingate’s 1655 Abridgment of English Statutes, Mercer’s volumes listed the acts alphabetically, providing the year, the number of chapters, and the pages of the laws in order to make this reference compendium more useful. He included laws, punishments, and the fines set for public and private acts. These acts, which include acts to prevent hog stealing and fines for denying the existence of God, provide the modern reader with a glimpse into colonial Virginia life. Mercer took care to indicate which laws had expired and which had been repealed or annulled. Additional material appeared in 1739 and 1759, when the work was reprinted as A Continuation of the Abridgment and An Exact Abridgment.

Mercer was also the probable author of a series of satiric poems attacking the policies of Virginia governor Robert Dinwiddie (1693–1770) and General Edward Braddock (1695–1755), who suffered a humiliating frontier defeat at the hands of the French at the outset of the French and Indian War. The Dinwiddianae Poems and Prose (1754–1757) employed an engaging mixture of puns, mock heroics, and invective.

Mercer’s fortunes rose and fell. By 1748 he was a successful lawyer and a presiding judge of the Stafford County court. Like many elite Virginians, he was a land speculator, and he also served as general counsel to the ambitious Ohio Company of Virginia, in which he had invested. When speculating resulted in serious financial losses, Mercer attempted to recoup his fortune by establishing a brewery at his Marlborough estate. He died in debt October 14, 1768.

Works

Mercer, John. An Exact Abridgment of All the Public Acts of Assembly, of Virginia, in Force and Use. Williamsburg, Va.: Printed by W. Parks, 1737; Early American Imprints, 4204.

Mercer. A Continuation of the Abridgment of All the Public Acts of Assembly, of Virginia, in Force and Use. Williamsburg, Va.: Printed by W. Parks, 1739; Early American Imprints, 4441.

Source

Watkins, C. Malcolm. The Cultural History of Marlborough, Virginia. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1968.

Merrymount

In 1625 Captain Wollaston and Thomas MORTON established a settlement in Massachusetts named Mount Wollaston, near the trading post at Passonagessit. Morton renamed it Ma-re-Mount, for its view of the ocean (mare, Latin name for sea), and Morton called it “mount-by-the-sea.” Located approximately eight miles from the Puritan settlement of PLYMOUTH COLONY in Massachusetts (now Quincy), Morton’s business and recreational activities, such as trading guns and whiskey with the Native Americans in exchange for furs, placed him in direct opposition to the Puritan mission. William BRADFORD reflects the Puritan attitude toward Merrymount and Morton, whom he calls the “Lord of Misrule” in his HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION. Bradford writes: “They also set a maypole, drinking and dancing about it many days together, inviting the Indian women for their consorts, dancing and frisking together like so many fairies, or furies rather; and worse practices.” Morton, in turn, wrote satirically of the Puritans’ small-mindedness in his New English Canaan (1637), calling them “Moles” for their shortsighted attitudes and referring to Captain Myles Standish (1584–1656) as “Theire grande leader, Captaine Shrimp.” Morton’s trading practices eventually brought him into conflict with British authorities.

When John Endecott (1589–1665) arrived with “a patent under the broad seal for the government of the Massachusetts,” as Bradford explains, “they or others now changed the name of their place again and called it Mount Dagon.” Morton’s version of the renaming of the settlement differs: “The setting up of this Maypole was a lamentable spectacle to the precise Seperatists, that now lived at new Plimmouth. They termed it an Idoll; yea they called it the Calfe of Horeb, and stood at defiance with the place, naming it Mount Dagon; threatening to make it a woefull mount and not a merry mount.” This antagonistic situation ended abruptly when Morton was arrested in 1628 and sent back to England on charges of selling guns to the Native Americans. When Morton returned a year later, the settlement at Merrymount had largely dissolved.

Literary and historical texts associated with Merrymount include John WINTHROP’s Journal; William Bradford’s History of Plymouth Plantation; and Thomas Morton’s New English Canaan (1637).

Works

Bradford, William. History of Plymouth Plantation. . . , edited by Charles Deane, Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, fourth series, no. 2, 1856; republished as Of Plymouth Plantation, 1620–1647, edited by Samuel Eliot Morison. New York: Knopf, 1952.

Morton, Thomas. New English Canaan. N.p., 1637; New York: Burt Franklin, 1967.

Sources

Dempsey, Jack. Thomas Morton of “Merrymount”: The Life and Renaissance of an Early American Poet. Stoneham, Mass.: Digital Scanning, 2000.

Dunn, Richard S. “John Winthrop Writes His Journal,” William and Mary Quarterly, 41 (1984): 185–212.

Zuckerman, Michael. “Pilgrims in the Wilderness: Community, Modernity, and the Maypole at Merry Mount,” New England Quarterly, 50 (1977): 255–277.

Monis, Judah (1683–1764) grammarian

In 1735 Judah Monis published Grammar of the Hebrew Tongue, the first book published in Hebrew in America. He also published three tracts in 1722 that together constitute a vigorous defense of CONGREGATIONALISM in NEW ENGLAND from a Jewish perspective. The book was intended, in part, to encourage other Jews to convert to Christianity and was thus dedicated “to the Jewish nation.” The tracts rely on the writings of the Talmud, of Moses Maimonides (1135–1204), and of cabalistic writers in the service of Puritan theology.

The first of these tracts, The Truth, lays out nine traditional Jewish denials of Christ as the Messiah, which Monis refutes. In the second tract, The Whole Truth, Monis sets forth eight reasons why he thinks Jews are reluctant to convert, among them “stubbornness.” Finally, in Nothing But the Truth, Monis broadens his criticism to include Catholics and the growing tolerance for religious heterogeneity in New England. The central theme is the Jewish resistance of conversion. Monis insists that the Trinity confirms rather than denies the Jewish credo, “the Lord our God is one Lord,” and therefore conversion should be desirable.

Monis was born in Venice or Algiers in 1683. He probably studied in rabbinical schools in Europe before coming to America in the early eighteenth century. Monis first settled in New York City, where he became a merchant, but sometime before 1720 he moved to Cambridge, Massachusetts. On June 29, 1720, he submitted a proposal for a Hebrew grammar to HARVARD COLLEGE officials. Harvard was so impressed by Monis that they granted him an honorary Master of Arts, the first academic degree ever conferred on a Jew in the colonies.

In 1722 Harvard appointed Monis its first instructor of Hebrew. Before he could accept the appointment, however, he was required to convert to Christianity. His public baptism took place on March 27, 1722 in College Hall. His sponsors were the president of Harvard College and the leading Massachusetts divine, Increase MATHER. Following his conversion, Monis was accepted as a full member of local society. He married a Christian woman, Abigail Marrett, in 1723 or 1724; purchased land near the college; and kept a small shop to supplement his income as a teacher. He retired from his Harvard post following the death of his wife in 1760, and he died soon after in 1764.

Works

Monis, Judah. The Whole Truth: Being a Short Essay, Wherein the Author Discovers what may be the True Reason Why the Jewish Nation Are Not as Yet Converted to Christianity, Besides What Others Have Said before Him. Boston: Printed for Daniel Henchman, 1722; Early American Imprints, 2324.

Monis. Dickdook Leshon Gnebreet. A Grammar of the Hebrew Tongue, Being an Essay to Bring the Hebrew Grammar into English. Boston: Printed by Jonas Green, 1735; Early American Imprints, 3931.

Sources

Friedman, Lee Max. Judah Monis, First Instructor in Hebrew at Harvard University. Baltimore, 1914.

Goldman, Shalom. God's Sacred Tongue: Hebrew and the American Imagination. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.

Moore, Milcah Martha Hill (1740–1829) commonplacer

Milcah Martha Hill, a Philadelphia QUAKER, was born on the island of Madeira to Dr. Richard Hill and Deborah Moore Hill. According to scholars Catherine La Courreye Blecki and Karin A. Wulf, Milcah was known as “Patty” or “Patsy” to her family. She grew up in the Delaware Valley, with her principal home in Burlington, New Jersey. In 1767 Milcah Martha Hill married Dr. Charles Moore, a cousin. Although marriage between cousins was not unusual in this time period, it was not permissible in Quakerism, which the Moores practiced, and the new couple was subsequently disowned and barred from the Society of Friends. In 1801 Charles Moore died, which allowed Moore, as a widow, to reenter the Society of Friends. For the remainder of her life Moore lived with her sister, Margaret Morris, in Burlington, New Jersey, where she continued to write moral and instructive poetry and compile COMMONPLACE BOOKS of quoted prose and poems, the first of which was published in 1787. Milcah Martha Hill Moore died at her sister's home in 1829.

In the eighteenth century both men and women kept collections of writings from notable works of prose or verse for memorization, inspiration, or education. Known as commonplace books, these compilations were often passed along to family members or given away as gifts. Milcah Martha Hill Moore's commonplace books are of particular interest to early American scholars because they included so many works by American women whose writings had been previously unknown. In 1997 Blecki and Wulf transcribed a handwritten commonplace book by Moore and brought it into print for the first time, publishing it as Milcah Martha Moore's Book. In addition to writings by Benjamin FRANKLIN, Patrick HENRY, loyalist Jonathan Odell (1736–1818), and Quakers Timothy Matlack (1736–1829) and Samuel Fothergill (1715–1772), Moore collected the letters and poetry of her friends, including Susanna WRIGHT and Hannah GRIFFITTS. Moore also preserved the travel journal of her cousin Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON's trip to England in 1764.

The writings in Moore's commonplace books address personal, religious, and political topics. For example, Hannah Griffiths's “The Female Patriots. Address'd to the Daughters of Liberty in America, 1768” (1787), urges women to boycott items that were being heavily taxed by the British, such as paper, tea, and other imported goods. As David S. Shields points out, the poem encourages the women to hold strong against criticism, especially from men who disapproved of women's involvement in political matters. In the poem's final lines Griffiths writes, “We can throw back the satire, by bidding them blush.” The other writings in Moore's Book range from celebratory poems such as those honoring birthdays to contemplative writings in memory of loved ones.

Works

Moore, Milcah Martha Hill. Miscellanies, Moral and Instructive. Philadelphia: Joseph James, 1787; Early American Imprints, 29099, 30809.

Moore. Milcah Martha Moore's Book: A Commonplace Book from Revolutionary America, edited by Catherine La Courreye Blecki and Karin A. Wulf. University Park, Pa.: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

Source

Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Morris, Gouverneur (1752–1816) lawyer, statesman

A writer of the CONSTITUTION, a revolutionary, and a lawyer, Gouverneur Morris, the fourth son of Sarah Gouverneur and Lewis Morris II, and the grandson of Lewis MORRIS, was born on January 31, 1752 at the elegant manor house of Morrisania. His father's position as lord of the manor ensured his son's place as a member of the most elite circles of New York society. Gouverneur was schooled by Huguenots in New Rochelle and then went on to King's College (later Columbia University), graduating at the age of sixteen.

Morris studied law with noted New York City attorney William Smith (1728–1793) and passed the bar in 1771. He gave little sign that he would become a supporter of the revolutionary movement, as his extreme social conservatism led him to condemn the mob. Yet, in 1775 he entered New York's provincial congress, and the following year he helped draft the state's first constitution. From 1778 to 1779 he held a seat in the Continental Congress but lost it when he refused to support his state's claim to Vermont. Angered by the voters' rejection, he moved to Philadelphia and accepted an appointment from the Confederation as assistant superintendent of finance. When the Constitutional Convention met to revise the national government, Morris attended as a delegate from Pennsylvania. He was a strong supporter of a new constitution that would strengthen the central government. At the convention Morris was chosen as chairman of the Committee on Style. In this role he single-handedly prepared the final draft of the U.S. CONSTITUTION.

Gouverneur Morris's political writings were often eloquent. In 1779 Congress published his Observations on the American Revolution, in which he described America as a new nation with a destiny to become a "Temple . . . to Freedom" for the world. Seven years later, Morris wrote Notes on the United States of America (1806), an optimistic survey of economic opportunity in America. In Notes he advised ambitious young men against entering the ministry, law, medicine, or fine arts. Instead, he argued, they should cultivate sober, industrious temperaments and livelihoods. He also predicted that the value of land in the South would never increase as long as slavery continued to be legal there.

Morris was thrown from his carriage in May 1780 and had to have his leg amputated. His disability did not curtail his activities, however. In the 1790s, outfitted with a wooden leg, Morris became a frequent transatlantic traveler, going abroad on business and diplomatic missions. In 1792 President George WASHINGTON appointed him U.S. minister to France, a position he held throughout the years of the Reign of Terror. When France demanded the recall of the American minister in retaliation for Washington's expulsion of the French minister, Citizen Edmund Genet (1763–1834), who recruited Americans to fight for France, Morris chose to remain in Europe for four more years.

Morris returned to the United States in the fall of 1798, but he had little success as a candidate for office in his home state of New York. His well-known social conservatism and his pronounced FEDERALIST politics did not appeal to New York voters at the turn of the century. In 1802 he retired to his estate, Morrisania. In 1809, at the age of fifty-seven, he married Anne Carey Randolph of Virginia on Christmas Day. Almost four years later, Morris's only child, Gouverneur Morris Jr., was born. Morris died in 1816, at the age of sixty-four.

Works

Morris, Gouverneur. Notes on the United States of America. Philadelphia: United States Gazette, 1806; Early American Imprints, second series, 10908.

Morris. The Diary and Letters of Gouverneur Morris, 2 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1888; New York: Da Capo, 1970.

Sources

Adams, William Howard. Gouverneur Morris: An Independent Life. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003.

Brookhiser, Richard. Gentleman Revolutionary: Gouverneur Morris, The Rake Who Wrote The Constitution. New York: Free Press, 2003.

Kirschke, James J. Gouverneur Morris: Author, Statesman, and Man of the World. New York: Thomas Dunne Books, 2005.

Morris, Lewis (1671–1746) politician, poet

Entirely self-educated, Lewis Morris was a learned man. He taught himself to read Hebrew, Latin, German, and Arabic, and his vast private library attested to his wide-ranging interests in law, history, philosophy, science, politics, and religion. His political writings as well as his speeches showed touches of eloquence but were often verbose. His poetry, written for his own satisfaction, was not published. Eighteen of his poems survive, and, not surprisingly, these have political themes. Most are satires, revealing Lewis's contempt for the masses of colonial society who allowed themselves to be duped by greedy and immoral politicians. "The Mock Monarchy, or the Kingdom of Apes: A Poem by a Gentleman of New Jersey in America" (circa 1725) is typical of these antidemocratic and cynical musings on demagogues and their followers.

Morris was the son of an English military officer who became a prosperous landowner in New York and New Jersey. Lewis inherited a large estate but had little memory of his parents as both died in his infancy. He was raised by an uncle, whose rigid disciplining caused Lewis to run away from home during his youth. He fled to Jamaica and did not return to the mainland until 1691, when, at twenty years of age, he settled in New Jersey. Although Morris had no formal education, he was ambitious. Before he was twenty-one, he had been appointed a judge and a member of the governor's council. He was the first lord of the manor of his family estate, Morrisania.

Morris's politics caused him trouble in the late 1690s. He aligned himself with the party opposing the proprietor in New Jersey, and he championed independence for New Jersey from the jurisdiction of New York. His anti-establishment views led to his discharge from the Council in 1698. In 1702 he went to London to urge that the Crown intervene in the dispute; when the Crown took action, Morris's political fortunes revived, and he was appointed to the royal governor's council in New York. Nevertheless, Morris was often in disfavor in the years that followed, for he tended to be open in his criticism of the successive royal governors. In 1715, for example, Morris was appointed chief justice of New York and New Jersey by William Hunter, but by 1732 his role as leader of the opposition to Governor William Cosby led to his removal from the bench.

When New Jersey at last gained its independence from New York in 1736, Lewis Morris was appointed the colony's first governor. In contradiction to his own earlier stated views, he soon was accused of using power arbitrarily. Morris died on May 21, 1746, at the age of seventy-seven.

Work

Morris, Lewis. The Papers of Lewis Morris, 3 volumes, edited by Eugene R. Sheridan. Newark: New Jersey Historical Society, 1991.

Sources

- Kupperman, Karen Ordahl. Providence Island, 1630–1641: The Other Puritan Colony. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- McConville, Brendan. These Daring Disturbers of the Public Peace: The Struggle for Property and Power in Early New Jersey. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1999.
- Sheridan, Eugene R. Lewis Morris, 1671–1746: A Study in Early American Politics. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1981.

Morse, Jedidiah (1761–1826) geographer, clergyman

Jedidiah Morse is best known as America's first geographer and as a strong defender of orthodoxy within the Congregational Church. He was born August 23, 1761, in Woodstock, Connecticut, the son of Jedidiah Morse and Sarah Child Morse. While a divinity student at Yale College, Morse taught in a school for young girls. In 1784 he wrote Geography Made Easy for his students, the first geography book published in America. In 1785 he became pastor of a church in Norwich, Connecticut, and in 1786 he was appointed a tutor at Yale. From 1787 to 1789 he worked on American Geography while preaching in Georgia and New York. In 1789 he married Elizabeth Ann Breese and in that same year became minister of the first Congregational Church of Charlestown, Massachusetts, a position he held until 1819.

American Geography sold well despite the criticism it received for the poor quality of its maps and its reliance on faulty sources. Morse began to revise the book immediately, and in 1793 a new edition, The American Universal Geography, appeared in two volumes. Volume one focused on America and volume two on the world. This new, expanded version was reprinted through the next decade. Morse began a major revision in 1810 that was not completed until 1819.

In 1794 Morse published The Life of Gen. Washington, Commander in Chief of the American Army during the Late War, and Present President of the United States. He followed with two books in 1795, The History of America and his Elements of Geography, written for children. His geographical dictionary, The American Gazetteer, appeared in 1797. Responding in 1805 to criticism from his parishioners that his geographical work took too much of his time, Morse founded the Panoplist, a journal intended to spread the Congregational faith. Three years later he founded Andover Theological Seminary, and in 1814 he created the New England Tract Society. In 1816 he helped establish the American Bible Society. He also founded the American Board for Foreign Missions, the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and the Charlestown Association for the Reformation of Morals.

In 1819 Morse resigned his ministerial post and moved to New Haven. A year later he accepted an appointment as an agent of the Department of Indian Affairs, with instructions to study the condition of the Native Americans throughout western New York and the Great Lakes region. He compiled a narrative of his journey, A Report to the Secretary of War of the United States, on Indian Affairs (1822). Two years later he published The Annals of the American Revolution, a culmination of his secondary interest in history. Morse died in New Haven on June 9, 1826.

Works

- Morse, Jedidiah. Geography Made Easy. Being a Short, But Comprehensive System of That Very Useful and Agreeable Science. New Haven: Printed by Meigs, Bowen and Dana, 1784; Early American Imprints, 18615.
- Morse. The American Geography; or, A View of the Present Situation of the United States of America. Elizabeth Town: Printed by Shepard Kollock for the author, 1789; Early American Imprints, 21978.
- Morse. The History of America, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Thomas Dobson, 1790; Early American Imprints, 22682.
- Morse. The Life of Gen. Washington, Commander In Chief of The American Army during the Late War, and Present President of the United States. Also, of the Brave General Montgomery. Philadelphia: Jones, Hoff & Derrick, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27221.
- Morse. Annals of the American Revolution. Hartford, Conn., 1824; Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat, 1968.

Sources

- Brown, Ralph H. "The American Geographies of Jedidiah Morse," Annals of the Association of the American Geographers, 31 (1941): 144–217.
- Moss, Richard J. The Life of Jedidiah Morse: A Station of Peculiar Exposure. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.
- Phillips, Joseph W. Jedidiah Morse and New England Congregationalism. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1983.

Morton, Nathaniel (1613–1685) historian

Historian Nathaniel Morton was born in the PILGRIM community of Leyden, Netherlands, the eldest son of George and Juliana Carpenter Morton. In 1623 his family made the Atlantic crossing to PLYMOUTH, the colony established by William BRADFORD. The following year George Morton died, and his eleven-year-old son was taken in by his uncle, Governor Bradford. Morton was deeply influenced by his uncle, and the two men formed a close and lasting bond. Morton married twice. His first wife, Lydia Cooper, died in 1673, after thirty-eight years of marriage; the following year, Morton married Ann Pritchard Templar.

Morton's literary legacy is his history, New-Englands Memoriall (1669). This book drew heavily from William Bradford's personal papers. As curator of Bradford's papers, Morton had access to the governor's own manuscript of the work that was later published as HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION, a historical account that was not discovered by others until 1885. Until that time, therefore, no one knew of the literary and scholarly debt Morton owed his mentor.

The two histories differ greatly in tone, for Bradford's is a dramatic, moving account of his colony, unrestrained by any attempt at objectivity. Morton, however, strives for objectivity and does not interject his own personality into his account of the settlement of NEW ENGLAND. While Bradford recounts the original colonists' suffering vividly, Morton focuses more on the moral lessons to be learned from such experiences. Morton's history is informational and instructive; Bradford's reads like a personal odyssey, an effort to understand the momentous events of his lifetime. Morton did not rely on personal recollection; instead, he drew from the official records of the Plymouth colony and from reproduced documents that he considered especially important in the text. Finally, Morton's history takes into account significant New England events outside Plymouth, covering major crises such as the trial and exile of Roger WILLIAMS in Massachusetts Bay.

Because a revised version of Morton's history was destroyed in a fire in 1676, he had considerable difficulty completing the work. In 1680 he published a new version of the original account, rich with information that might otherwise have been lost to historians and students of literature, including the names of officials other than the governor, the name of the ship that accompanied the MAYFLOWER but had to turn back (the Speedwell), and much of the poetry of early New England in the form of elegies written for prominent figures. Notable among these elegies is Josiah Winslow's (1629–1680) tribute to William Bradford and Peter Bulkley's tribute to the founder of Connecticut, Thomas HOOKER.

In 1647 Morton became secretary and record keeper for Plymouth Colony; he held the latter position until his death. In this administrative role he helped draft many of the laws of the colony. When the English-Indian conflict known as KING PHILIP'S WAR broke out in 1672, Morton was named secretary of the Council for War. He died June 29, 1685.

Work

Morton, Nathaniel. New-Englands Memoriall: or, A Brief Relation of the Most Memorable and Remarkable Passages of the Providence of God, Manifested to the Planters of New England, in America: With Special References to the First Colony thereof, called New Plimouth. Cambridge: Printed by S.G. & M.J. for John Usher of Boston, 1669; Early American Imprints, 144.

Sources

Holder, Christopher. The Faith and Testimony of the Martyrs and Suffering Servants of Jesus Christ Persecuted in New England: Vindicated against the Lyes and Slanders Cast on Them by Nathaniel Morton in His Book Intituled New England Memo- rial. London, 1670; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1984.

Peterson, Mark A. "The Plymouth Church and the Evolution of Puritan Religious Culture," New England Quarterly, 66 (1993): 570–593.

Morton, Sarah Wentworth Apthorp

(1759–1816) poet

The daughter of Sarah and James Apthorp, Sarah Wentworth Apthorp was born into wealth and received an excellent education. She read broadly and even studied architecture. In 1781 she married Perez Morton, a prominent political figure in Massachusetts, and the couple had six children. In 1788, Sarah Morton learned of a two-year affair that Perez had carried on with her sister, Frances Apthorp. The affair and its discovery led to Frances's suicide. Despite this personal crisis, Morton's marriage survived.

Morton was well known for her support of reform causes, including the repeal of a Massachusetts ban on theatrical performances and the abolition of slavery. She was equally well known for her poetry, which appeared in the Massachusetts Magazine. Although Morton's political poetry is highly patriotic, commemorating Revolutionary battles and their heroes or warning of the dangers to American virtue posed by increasing luxury and social sophistication, much of her work was sentimental, exploring women's experiences and feelings. This poetry and her generous support of and praise for other women poets led Massachusetts poet Robert Treat Paine (1731–1814) to call Morton "the American Sappho."

Morton's civic poetry is well represented by Song for the Public Celebration of the National Peace. In it she writes:

*Then let the pledge of Freedom pass,
While every patriot bosom glows
And o'er the elevated glass
The amber of the vintage flows,
Hail Columbia! Columbia blest and free,
The star of Empire falls with thee.*

Among Morton's most interesting poems is Ouabi; or, The Virtue of Nature: An Indian Tale in Four Cantos (1790), which dramatizes a love triangle reminiscent of her own marital tragedy. Ouabi is an Illinois chieftain who has captured a European male named Celario and adopted him into the tribe as his own brother. Celario falls in love with Ouabi's wife, Azakia, and when Ouabi discovers the relationship, he dissolves his marriage. Having sacrificed his wife to his rival, Ouabi dies.

Like many women poets of her day, Morton published under pseudonyms, often signing her work "Philenia." In fact, the only work that carries her own name is My Mind and Its Thoughts, in Sketches, Fragments, and Essays (1823), which is, as she describes it, a collection of personal reflections in the form of short essays, poems, and aphorisms. Sarah Morton died on May 14, 1816, in Quincy, Massachusetts.

Works

Morton, Sarah Wentworth. Ouabi, or, The Virtues of Nature: An Indian Tale in Four Cantos. Boston: I. Thomas & E. T. Andrews, 1790; Early American Imprints, 22684.

Morton. The Virtues of Society: A Tale Founded on Fact. Boston: Printed by Manning & Loring for the author, 1799; Early American Imprints, 35844.

Morton. My Mind and Its Thoughts, in Sketches, Fragments, and Essays. Boston: Wells & Lily, 1823; Delmar, N.Y.: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1975.

Sources

Carr, Helen. Inventing the American Primitive: Politics, Gender, and the Representation of Native American Literary Traditions, 1789–1936. New York: New York University Press, 1996.

Pendleton, Emily, and Milton Ellis. Philenia; The Life and Works of Sarah Wentworth Morton, 1759–1846. Orono, Maine: Printed at the University Press, 1931.

Morton, Thomas (circa 1579–circa 1647) trader, writer

Trader and adventurer Thomas Morton was born about 1579, perhaps in the West Country of England. He became a lawyer and, in 1621, married Alice Miller. Morton first visited NEW ENGLAND in 1622 and returned again in 1625 with a Captain Wollaston, who founded a settlement at Mount Wollaston (now Quincy, Massachusetts). Morton established a fur-trading post here, and after Wollaston moved to Virginia, he took charge of the settlement, which was renamed MERRYMOUNT. His flourishing business was disrupted when, perhaps on a whim, he invited Native Americans to dance around a maypole he had erected. The local PILGRIM community was appalled, and Morton quickly became persona non grata in PLYMOUTH.

In 1628 Morton's relationship with the colony was further strained when he was accused of selling guns to the Indians. Arrested, tried, and convicted for gun running, he was forced to return to England that August. At home he was exonerated, but when he returned to Merry Mount in 1629, the settlement had largely dissolved. Massachusetts governor (1589–1665) John Endecott, who had taken down the maypole while Morton was away, took him into custody in 1630, and once again Morton was sent back to England. In his absence, his belongings were taken and his house burned.

Morton's single literary work, New English Canaan, was, in part, a response to his treatment at the hands of the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay colonists. Although Book One focuses on the Indians—whom he describes favorably as “most full of humanity” and ready for conversion to Christianity—and Book Two describes the natural abundance of New England that made the region a virtual Canaan or Arcadia, the heart of the book is the third section, which humorously yet harshly criticizes the Plymouth SEPARATISTS.

Morton eventually returned to America in 1643, but his relationship with local colonists did not improve. In 1644 he was arrested in Boston and convicted of slander. Local officials cited material from his book as well as a recent incident as evidence of his guilt. John WINTHROP, who described Morton as “old and crazy,” criticized the New English Canaan as “an infamous and scurrilous booke against many godly and cheefe men of the cuntry; full of lyes and slanders, and fraught with profane calumnies against their names and persons, and the ways of God.” Morton was jailed during the winter of 1644–1645. Upon his release, he moved to Agameticus (now York), Maine, where he died in about 1647.

Works

Bradford, William. History of Plymouth Plantation, edited by Charles Deane. Boston: Little, Brown, 1856; edited by Samuel Eliot Morison. New York: Knopf, 1952.

Morton, Thomas. New English Canaan. Amsterdam: Jacob Frederick Stam, 1637; New York: Burt Franklin, 1967.

Source

Connors, Donald F. Thomas Morton. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Murray, Judith Sargent (1751–1820) essayist, correspondent

Yes, ye lordly, ye haughty sex, our souls are by nature equal to yours; the same breath of God animates, enlivens, and invigorates us. . .

—On the Equality of the Sexes (1792)

Judith Sargent Murray, one of the best-known eighteenth-century female essayists and letter writers, was born on May 1, 1751, the oldest of eight children of the wealthy merchant Winthrop Sargent and his wife, Judith Sanders of Gloucester, Massachusetts. Murray is remembered as a pioneer in the movement for women's education and as an articulate advocate of equal opportunity for women. She was exceptionally well educated for a young woman of her day; her father insisted that she be tutored in the classics along with her brother Winthrop as he was being prepared to enter HARVARD. Judith began to write POETRY as a teenager. She married merchant mariner John Stevens in October of 1769. During her marriage to Stevens, Murray became involved in the liberal religious currents of the day. She and Stevens converted from CONGREGATIONALISM to Universalism, and after Stevens's death in 1786, the thirty-eight-year-old widow married John Murray, a Universalist minister.

Portrait of Judith Sargent Stevens, circa 1770–1772

Before she was twenty-one, Murray had found her voice as an advocate of gender equality, challenging the proscriptions of her day in verses such as this one written in 1770:

*Yet I cannot their sentiments imbibe,
Who this distinction to the sex ascribe,
As if a woman's form must needs enroll,
A weak, a servile, an inferior soul;
And that guise of man must still proclaim,
Greatness of mind, and him, to be the same. . . .*

Her best-known commentary, "ON THE EQUALITY OF THE SEXES," is an account of the contributions of women to history and to literature written in 1779 but first published in The Massachusetts Magazine in 1790, two years before the publication in England of Mary Wollstonecraft's feminist tract Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792). "On the Equality of the Sexes" traces women's participation in public events throughout the world at a time when the new American nation was debating the boundaries of a woman's domain.

In keeping with the literary conventions of her day, Murray published under pseudonyms, choosing "Constantia," "Honoria," and, following her marriage to John Murray, "Judith Stevens," for her own essays, commentaries, poems, and plays. The Massachusetts Magazine provided a place for Murray to voice her opinions beginning in 1790, notably in her two essay series, "The Gleaner" and "Repository," both written between 1792 and 1794. The fictional author, or gleaner, of "The Gleaner" essays was Mr. Vigilius, a prosperous philanthropist and man of reason who felt compelled to write about moral, political, educational, religious, and domestic issues. Speaking through Vigilius, whose focus is on his daughter and her upbringing, Murray expressed her liberal views on each of these topics. The essays, when republished together in 1798, seemed more a novel of sensibility than a series of social commentaries.

Murray was a staunch advocate of women's education in the early Republic. Such an education, she insisted, must have as its goal the development of a "reverence of self," providing women with the confidence to resist the notion that female fulfillment could come only through marriage and motherhood. Murray never doubted women's intellectual and creative capacities, which, she declared, had been suppressed by the refusal of society to provide formal training and incentive for intellectual growth to daughters as well as to sons. She took pride in being part of a female literary and intellectual tradition, writing in "Observations on Female Abilities, Part III":

*'Tis joy to tread the splendid paths of fame
Where countless myriads mental homage claim
Time honor'd annals careful to explore
And mark the heights which intellect can soar. . . .*

Murray had two children, but only her daughter, Julia Maria, survived. In 1798, under financial pressure because of an ailing husband and a young daughter, Murray decided to republish The Gleaner essays as a collection. More than 750 subscribers provided the funds for this three-volume work, which Murray, a FEDERALIST, dedicated to President John ADAMS. The Gleaner was Murray's last major literary effort. In 1809 her husband suffered a stroke that left him paralyzed, and she devoted her time to his care. Financial problems continued to plague the family until 1812, when her daughter Julia Maria married the son of a wealthy planter from the Mississippi territory. Following John Murray's death in 1815, Judith Murray went to live with her daughter in Natchez, Mississippi. She published The Life of John Murray, Written by Himself with Continuation by Mrs. Judith Sargent Murray (1816), a tribute to her husband's anti-Calvinist theology. In 1820, at age sixty-nine, Murray died in Natchez and was buried in her son-in-law's family cemetery overlooking the Mississippi River.

Works

Murray, Judith Sargent, The Gleaner: A Miscellaneous Production, 3 volumes. Boston: I. Thomas & E. T. Andrews, 1798; Schenectady, N.Y.: Union College Press, 1992.

Murray. Judith Sargent Murray: Her First 100 Letters, edited by Marianne Dunlop. Gloucester, Mass.: Sargent House Museum, 1995.

Murray. Selected Writings of Judith Sargent Murray, edited by Sharon M. Harris. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.

Murray. The Letters I Left Behind. Judith Sargent Murray Papers, letter book 10, edited by Bonnie Hurd Smith. Salem, Mass.: Judith Sargent Murray Society, 2005.

Sources

Schloesser, Pauline E. The Fair Sex: White Women and Racial Patriarchy in the Early American Republic. New York: New York University Press, 2002.

Skemp, Sheila L. Judith Sargent Murray: A Brief Biography with Documents. Boston: Bedford Books, 1998.

Recommended Writings

Some Deductions from the System Promulgated in the Page of Divine Revelation, Ranged in the Order and Form of a Catechism, Intended As an Assistant to the Christian Parent or Teacher (1782)

"Desultory Thoughts upon the Utility of Encouraging a Degree of Self-Complacency, Especially in Female Bosoms" (1784)

"On the Equality of the Sexes" (1790)

"On the Domestic Education of Children" (1790)

"Apology for an Epilogue" (1790)

"The Consolation" (1790)

"The Gleaner" (1794)

The Medium; or Virtue Triumphant (produced 1795)

The Traveller Returned (produced 1796)

The Gleaner (1798)

"Observations on Female Abilities"

Story of Margaretta

"An Hypothesis" (1803)

Studying Judith Sargent Murray

Judith Sargent Murray was a prolific writer who focused her attention on women's issues and advocated educational and social reform. Murray was a playwright, poet, novelist, and letter writer as well as an essayist. As a Universalist, she was also involved with social change in spiritual matters. Using pseudonyms, such as Mr. Vigilius and Constantia, Murray wrote a series of essays that focused attention on women's rights and education, later collected as The Gleaner. An early biography is Vena Bernadette Field's Constantia; A Study of the Life and Works of Judith Sargent Murray, 1751–1820 (Orono, Maine: Printed at the University Press, 1931). More-recent studies include Sheila L. Skemp's Judith Sargent Murray: A Brief Biography with Documents (Boston: Bedford Books, 1998). Murray's collected writings appear in Selected Writings of Judith Sargent Murray, edited by Sharon M. Harris (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995); American Women Writers to 1800, edited by Harris (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996); From Gloucester

Title page for the first of three volumes collecting Murray's "Gleaner" essays, written under the pseudonym "Constantia," her male persona

ter to Philadelphia in 1790: Observations, Anecdotes, and Thoughts from the Letters of Judith Sargent Murray, edited by Bonnie Hurd Smith (Cambridge: Judith Sargent Murray Society, 1998); and The Letters I Left Behind: The Judith Sargent Murray Papers, Letter Book 10, edited by Smith (Salem: Judith Sargent Murray Society, 2005). Murray's poetry appears with commentary in Women Poets in Revolutionary America 1650–1775: An Anthology, edited by Pattie Cowell (Troy: Whitston Publishing, 1981).

General studies that address historical context include Linda K. Kerber's Women of the Republic (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988); Donna R. Bontatibus's The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation: A Call for Socio-Political Reform (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999); Susan Branson, These Fiery

Frenchified Dames: Women and Political Culture in Early National Philadelphia (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001); and Pauline E. Schloesser's The Fair Sex: White Women and Racial Patriarchy in the Early American Republic (New York: New York University Press, 2002).

For archival work and research, students should consult the Judith Sargent Murray Papers, compiled by John Murray and James Rely (1765; Jackson: Mississippi Department of Archives and History, 1989). The collection includes essays, poetry, plays, and letters, including twenty of Murray's letter books, from 1765 to 1818. Another source of primary materials is the Winthrop Sargent Papers at the Massachusetts Historical Society. An electronic site with helpful primary sources and links is the Judith Sargent Murray Society (<<http://www.hurdsmith.com/judith/>> viewed April 30, 2007).

Main-Travelled Roads by Hamlin Garland (Boston: Arena, 1891) short-story collection

The short stories that make up Hamlin Garland's Main-Travelled Roads explore farm life on the American prairie during the second half of the nineteenth century. For the most part, Garland portrays this life as harsh and unyielding, with characters at the mercy of natural forces that are at best ambivalent toward them, a theme that marks this collection as a work of "naturalism." Garland particularly emphasizes the plight of women under these conditions: In stories such as "Among Corn Rows" and "Up the Coolly," farmwives and daughters are shown to have few options other than hard labor and a virtually captive existence. Beyond the hardships of nature, farming families in these stories also face unfair government and financial systems, never given a fair price for their goods and constantly under the threat of foreclosure. Yet, Garland does occasionally let the light shine upon the prairie, offering moments of beauty, transcendence, and even humor.

Source

Nagel, James, ed. Critical Essays on Hamlin Garland. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.

—King Adkins

Malaeska by Ann S. Stephens (New York: Beadle, 1860) novel

Although Ann S. STEPHENS's Malaeska: The Indian Wife of the White Hunter first appeared as a three-part serial in the April, May, and June 1839 issues of Ladies Companion, the novel gained its lasting place in American letters when Beadle and Company chose the melodrama as the first of their DIME

NOVELS. Beadle advertised the novel as "American in all its features, pure in its tone, elevating in its features." Although in later years the dime novel would serialize violence, its beginnings in Malaeska feature a border ROMANCE with a sentimental heroine. Malaeska chronicles the title character's brief marriage to a white trapper and her subsequent abandonment and betrayal by both white and native cultures. In raising the specter of interracial marriage, a reality of border life suppressed by James Fenimore COOPER in Last of the Mohicans (1826; see LEATHER-STOCKING TALES), Stephens was following in the path cut by Lydia Maria CHILD in HOBOMOK (1824) and Catharine Maria SEDGWICK in her HOPE LESLIE (1827). In Malaeska, however, Stephens sidesteps the issue and focuses on the "heart broken victim of an unnatural marriage." An earlier serialization by Stephens, Mary Derwent (1838), describes the interracial marriage between a Shawnee Indian and a white woman, and chronicles her rise as tribal leader.

Source

Brown, Bill, ed. Reading the West: An Anthology of Dime Westerns. Boston: Bedford / St. Martin's Press, 1997.

—Deborah Evans

"The Man without a Country" by Edward Everett Hale (1863) short story

Edward Everett HALE's signature work was inspired by an Ohio gubernatorial candidate's wartime declaration that, should force be used to prevent secession, he did not wish to be associated with the United States. Hale's response was this piece of historical fiction, whereby he hoped to "quicken the patriotism" of the citizenry. The story is based upon a simple premise: at his court-martial, traitor Philip Nolan exclaims, “I wish I may never hear of the United States again.” His wish is granted, and he endures his sentence for decades at sea. On his deathbed Nolan rejoices to finally hear an account of the country’s progress.

When it appeared in December 1863 in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY unsigned, many readers accepted the historically accurate story as truth.

Source

Hale, Edward Everett. The Man without a Country. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865.

—Brett Barney

The Marble Faun by Nathaniel Hawthorne

(2 volumes, Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1860) novel

First published in London as Transformation, The Marble Faun; or The Romance of Monte Beni is Nathaniel Hawthorne’s last completed ROMANCE. It sold very well in England and America and was also published in German translation. The story focuses on a group of four young artists living in Rome: an American sculptor, Kenyon; his compatriot, Hilda, who copies classic paintings; Donatello, an Italian who is said to resemble the marble faun of Praxiteles exhibited at the Capitol; and the mysterious Miriam, whose background is the cause for much speculation—and who is eventually responsible for several tragic occurrences.

The characters’ experiences can be read as symbolic confrontations between the Old and the New Worlds, between experience and innocence, or between imitation and authenticity. The work also deals with the self-conscious, often alienated experience of the modern American tourist in Rome (a role that Hawthorne had assumed in 1858). Searching for “real” art but unable to connect with an alien culture, the tourist’s gaze remains on the surface level, removed from authentic aesthetic experience.

Source

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. The Marble Faun; or, The Romance of Monte Beni. The Centenary Edition of the Works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, volume 4, edited by William Charvat, Roy Harvey Pearce, Claude M. Simpson, and Fredson Bowers. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1962–1988.

—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

Mardi by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1849) novel

Herman MELVILLE’s third novel, Mardi: and a Voyage Thither, is, according to the preface, a “romance of Polynesian adventure.” Like its predecessors, TYPEE and OMOO, the book is based on Melville’s own experiences as a sailor, although, unlike those novels, it portrays a fictional world that bears little resemblance to the real South Pacific.

Taji, the first-person narrator, travels with his Swedish companion, Jarl, from island to island, experiencing different ways of life. This voyage becomes an allegorical fantasy that comments upon and satirizes contemporary religious and political realities. The island of Franko, with its bloody revolution to overthrow a “poodle-haired” king, clearly represents France; Dominora’s rule over other islands suggests England’s imperial activities; and the regional division of Vivenza between the North and the slaveholding South has obvious connections to the United States.

Though a commercial and critical disappointment, Mardi—with its expansive setting, philosophical musings, and prominent use of symbols—foreshadowed the style and form of Melville’s acknowledged masterpiece, MOBY-DICK (1851).

—Joshua Matthews

“Mary Had a Little Lamb” by Sarah Josepha Hale

(1830) children’s poem

The nursery rhyme “Mary Had a Little Lamb” was written by Sarah Josepha HALE, long-time editor of GODEY’S LADY’S BOOK, and it appeared first in her book, Poems for Our Children, which Hale wrote “to furnish you with a few pretty songs and poems which would teach you truths.” The poem was later published in The Juvenile Miscellany, a periodical for children that was then edited by Lydia Maria CHILD (and later edited by Hale). Of the poem’s three eight-line stanzas, the first is the most famous; in 1877 Thomas Edison recited it in the first successful audio recording. However, the moral message of the poem—if you are always kind to “each gentle animal” it will “follow at your call”—appears in the last stanza.

Source

Finley, Ruth E. The Lady of Godey’s: Sarah Josepha Hale. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1931.

—Vicki Martin

“The Masque of the Red Death” by Edgar Allan

Poe (1848) short story

In this story by Edgar Allan POE, a mysterious plague—the Red Death—scours the land. Prospero, along with his fellow nobles, takes flight to a fortified abbey. There, in luxurious refuge and indifferent to the suffering of those outside, the court awaits the passing of the plague, even going so far as to hold a masquerade ball for entertainment. One party-goer, however, wears a funeral shroud and a mask that depicts a victim of the Red Death. Prospero is deeply insulted, and the nobles corner the stranger, who reveals himself to be Red Death personified. Prospero and his guests quickly fall to the disease, and the Red Death ridicules their delusion that the walls of a castle could protect them.

Poe was paid twelve dollars when the story was originally published. It was collected in Works (1850) under the title

"The Masque of the Red Death. A Fantasy." The source of Poe's inspiration for this story of disease may have been the Black Death of the Middle Ages, the tuberculosis that afflicted both his wife and his mother, or a cholera outbreak that he witnessed in Baltimore. "The Mask of the Red Death" first appeared in the May 1842 edition of GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE.

Sources

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Selected Writings of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Gary Richard Thompson. New York: Norton, 2004.
—E. N. S.

The Massachusetts Quarterly Review

(1847–1850) periodical

This Boston literary, philosophical, and humanitarian review founded by Theodore PARKER was regarded as the most significant Transcendentalist periodical after THE DIAL. Though Ralph Waldo EMERSON wrote the "Editor's Address" in the first issue and was listed as co-editor, he had no editorial role in the journal. Despite contributions from such important writers as James Russell LOWELL and Julia Ward HOWE, the review was not financially sustainable and folded after three years.

"Massachusetts to Virginia" by John Greenleaf

Whittier (1843) poem

Considered one of the best of John Greenleaf WHITTIER's abolitionist poems, "Massachusetts to Virginia," which first appeared in THE LIBERATOR on January 27, 1843, was occasioned by events surrounding the October 1842 capture of alleged fugitive slave George Latimer in Boston. The immediate impetus for Whittier's poem was a newspaper account of a Norfolk, Virginia, meeting condemning efforts in Massachusetts to rescind the state's obligations to assist in the return of escaped slaves.

Rhymed heptameter couplets create a driving rhythm for Whittier's message of determined resistance. Recalling the two states' collaboration during the Revolutionary War, the poet articulates a firm abolitionist position for Massachusetts, where the Revolutionary ideal of freedom lives on and dictates against participation in the evils of slavery.

Source

Whittier, John Greenleaf. Lays of My Home and Other Poems. Boston: W. D. Ticknor, 1843.

—Brett Barney

Matthews, Brander (1852–1929) essayist, critic

A native of New Orleans, Brander Matthews was educated at Columbia College and Columbia Law School. Instead of practicing law, however, he turned to writing, becoming a prominent member of New York and London literary circles and helping to found such organizations as the Authors' Club and The Players. In addition to producing a two-volume work on the French theater in 1880–1881, he co-edited (with H. D. Brunner) the five-volume Actors and Actresses of Great Britain and the United States (1886). In the 1880s Matthews also produced a volume of short stories and several plays.

After lecturing at Columbia University during the 1891–1892 academic year, Matthews became a professor of English there. Almost eight years later he became the first professor of dramatic literature in the United States, a position he held from 1900 to 1924. He kept up a steady stream of essays, compilations, and analyses on plays and playwrights, such as The Principles of Playmaking (1919) and Shakspeare as a Playwright (1913), which influenced both playwrights and a more general audience. His 1896 history of the development of American literature, An Introduction to the Study of American Literature, created a new field of literary scholarship.

Matthews lectured widely, both at home and abroad, and also managed to produce a series of fictional works about New York. A founding member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, he has been called "perhaps the last of the gentlemanly school of critics and essayists."

Source

Oliver, Lawrence J. Brander Matthews, Theodore Roosevelt, and the Politics of American Literature, 1880–1920. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

"The May-Pole of Merry Mount" by Nathaniel

Hawthorne (1836) short story

Two different settlements are depicted in Nathaniel HAWTHORNE's short story "The May-Pole of Merry Mount": one a group of diverse revelers, the other a group of pious Puritans. Celebrating the marriage of two youths, the revelers erect a maypole and ultimately clash with Puritan leaders led by John Endicott. The story, which originally appeared in the GIFT BOOK The Token and Atlantic Souvenir (1836), contrasts religious standards of piety with decadence and describes the cultural effects of the Puritans' triumph over the indulgent nature of the latter. Hawthorne based his story on events in colonial New England's history, borrowing from the story of Englishman Thomas Morton, whose settlement (founded in 1625) opposed the cultural and religious standards of the Plymouth colony Puritans.

Source

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Twice-Told Tales. The Centenary Edition of the Works of Nathaniel Hawthorne, volume 9. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1962.

—Joshua Matthews

McGuffey, William Holmes (1800–1873) publisher
Born near Claysville, Pennsylvania, William McGuffey taught in rural schools before he graduated from Washington and Jefferson College in 1826. He went on to become a professor of languages and philosophy at Miami University of Ohio from 1826 to 1836 and president of Cincinnati College from 1839 to 1843. He taught at Woodward College in Cincinnati from 1843 to 1845 and at the University of Virginia from 1845 to 1873. Remembered chiefly for his Eclectic Readers, which combined moral lessons with literary extracts, McGuffey is said to have taught America to read. He compiled six readers (published between 1836 and 1857) while teaching at Miami University. The readers sold over one hundred million copies, with new editions appearing well into the twentieth century.

Sources

Sullivan, Dolores P. William Holmes McGuffey: Schoolmaster to the Nation. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1994.

Westerhoff, John H. McGuffey and His Readers. Nashville: Abingdon, 1978.

Melville, Herman (1819–1891) novelist, short-story writer, poet

Meditation and water are wedded forever.

—Moby-Dick (1851)

The third child and second son of Allan Melvill and his wife, Maria, Herman Melville was born in New York City on August 1, 1819. (His mother added the second e to the family name after his father's death.) Allan Melvill, the son of an old Boston family, was a fairly prosperous importer of luxury items, and the Melvills lived well. In 1830, however, Allan's business collapsed, and the family moved to Albany, New York, to seek sanctuary among Maria's relatives. Allan made another attempt at business in Albany, but he died bankrupt in 1832.

After working as a bank clerk and as a farmhand, Herman Melville enrolled in the Albany Classical School in order to prepare for a business career. There he discovered his gift for writing and resolved to become a teacher, but he found teaching in a country school unappealing. In 1838 he enrolled in the Lansingburgh Academy, located only a few blocks from the Melvilles' new home in Lansingburgh, New York. That November he was certified as a surveyor and engineer.

Failing to find employment, Melville wrote short pieces for the local newspapers until June 1839, when he commenced his seagoing adventures by signing on as a cabin boy on the St. Lawrence, a merchant ship bound for Liverpool, England. Upon his return to Lansingburgh in September 1839, Melville found his mother and sisters in financial straits. Desperate for extra income, he once again took a teaching job, only to lose it a few months later when his school declared bankruptcy. Unable to find a job in the East or West, Melville determined to go back to sea. In January 1841, he shipped from New York aboard the whaler Acushnet.

Herman Melville

Melville had signed up for the customary four-year tour, but he grew restless under the harsh conditions at sea, and in June 1842 he and a shipmate jumped ship. The two escaped into the jungle of the Polynesian Marquesas, where they were taken up by members of the Taipi tribe. Melville lived among the Marquesan natives for four weeks, an experience he later wrote about. He boarded another whaler, the Charles & Henry, and landed in Maui, Hawaii, on May 2, 1843. He traveled to Honolulu, where he worked as a bookkeeper. He angered the American colonial authorities there by publicly supporting a British takeover of the islands. Melville left Hawaii on August 17, joining the crew of the U.S.S. United States as an ordinary seaman but retaining the option of quitting the navy when the ship returned to port. When the United States docked in Boston fourteen months later, Melville was discharged, full of dark memories that later made their way into his novel WHITE-JACKET (1850).

Melville then returned to Lansingburgh, where his tales of the South Pacific made him a minor celebrity. After friends and family encouraged him to write about his experiences, he transformed his time among the “cannibals” of the Marquesas into TYPEE and his Tahitian idyll into its sequel, OMOO. With the help of his brother Gansevoort, Melville published Typee in 1846, and Omoa appeared the following year. Around this same time Melville began courting Elizabeth Shaw, a family friend who lived in Boston. They married in August 1847 and lived with Melville’s family, first in Lansingburgh, and then in New York City. In 1849 Melville published two books—MARDI, an allegorical romance, and REDBURN—both inspired by his experiences at sea. The popularity of the latter earned Melville a large enough advance on his next book, White-Jacket, to permit him to travel to Europe, where he presented his latest novel to his English publishers.

Also in 1850 Melville published “Hawthorne and His Mosses,” a review of Mosses from an Old Manse (1846), a collection of tales and sketches by his new friend Nathaniel Hawthorne. Although Melville’s friendship with Hawthorne was ultimately a tortured one, their conversations

The Bark Lydia, a whaling vessel originally registered in New Bedford, Massachusetts, built in 1840 the year Melville arrived there and the year before he signed on to a whaler.

Front cover for an early American edition of Melville's first book about literature over the next two years were seminal for Melville and influential in the development of his masterpiece, MOBY-DICK. Like Mardi, Moby-Dick failed to find an audience, so Melville, attempting still to live by his wits, wrote PIERRE (1852), which also failed.

Out of financial desperation he turned to writing shorter pieces that could be serialized in magazines and republished later in bound volumes. This period saw the publication of Melville’s historical romance ISRAEL POTTER (1855); short stories and sketches such as “BARTLEBY, THE SCRIVENER,” “The Bell-Tower,” “BENITO CERENO,” “The Encantadas,” and “The Lightning-Rod Man,” later collected in THE PIAZZA TALES (1856); and other pieces that were not republished during his lifetime. The critical and popular failure of his satirical novel THE CONFIDENCE-MAN (1857) essentially ended Melville’s career as a professional writer.

In 1865 Melville worked on a series of poems about the CIVIL WAR that appeared in 1866 as BATTLE-PIECES AND ASPECTS OF THE WAR. That same year he secured a job as a customs inspector, a position he held for the next nineteen years. By this point Melville was devoting his writing talents almost exclusively to poetry: he published his epic CLAREL in 1876, John Marr in 1888, and Timoleon in 1891. Melville seemed reconciled to his obscurity, and at his death many readers of his early works were surprised to learn he had been alive for the past decade.

Illustration by Rockwell Kent from the 1930 Lakeside Press edition of Moby-Dick

When Melville died on September 28, 1891, he left behind an unpublished collection of love poems, Weeds and Wildings, that was dedicated to his wife. He also left behind one other important unpublished work, Billy Budd, a novella he had been working on since 1888. The incomplete manuscript stayed in the tin breadbox where his wife put it for safekeeping until 1924, when Melville's granddaughters, Eleanor Metcalf and Frances Osborne, saw to its publication. The appearance of this ambiguous and richly allusive tale of good and evil sparked a revival of interest in Melville that elevated him to the highest level of the American literary pantheon.

Principal Books by Melville

Typee: A Peep at Polynesian Life. During a Four Months' Residence in a Valley of the Marquesas with Notices of the French Occupation of Tahiti and the Provisional Cession of the Sandwich Islands to Lord Paulet. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846; revised as Typee: A Peep at Polynesian Life. During a Four Months' Residence in a Valley of the Marquesas. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

Omoo: A Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas. New York: Harper, 1847.

Mardi: and a Voyage Thither, 2 volumes. New York: Harper, 1849.

Redburn: His First Voyage. Being the Sailor-Boy Confessions and Reminiscences of the Son-of-a-Gentleman, in the Merchant Service, 2 volumes. New York: Harper, 1849.

White-Jacket; or, The World in a Man-of-War. New York: Harper, 1850.

Moby-Dick; or, The Whale. New York: Harper, 1851.

Pierre; or, The Ambiguities. New York: Harper, 1852.

Israel Potter: His Fifty Years of Exile. New York: Putnam, 1855.

The Piazza Tales. New York: Dix & Edwards, 1856.

The Confidence-Man: His Masquerade. New York: Dix & Edwards, 1857.

Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War. New York: Harper, 1866.

Clarel: A Poem and Pilgrimage in the Holy Land, 2 volumes. New York: Putnam, 1876.

John Marr and Other Sailors, with Some Sea-Pieces. New York: De Vinne Press, 1888.

Timoleon and Other Ventures in Minor Verse. New York: Caxton Press, 1891.

Billy Budd, Sailor (An Inside Narrative), edited by Harrison Hayford and Merton M. Sealts, Jr. Chicago & London: University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Letters

Correspondence, edited by Lynn Horth, volume 14 of The Writings of Herman Melville, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, and G. Thomas Tanselle, 14 volumes to date. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press / Chicago: Newberry Library, 1993.

Studying Herman Melville

Though Melville died in relative obscurity, the 1920s witnessed a renewal of interest in his work, especially MOBY-DICK. By the mid twentieth century he had become one of the central figures in nineteenth-century American fiction. Students new to Melville are encouraged to start with his masterful short fiction, such as "BARTLEBY, THE SCRIVENER," "BENITO CERENO," "The Paradise of Bachelors and the Tartarus of Maids," and Billy Budd, as these offer accessible introductions both to Melville's prose style and to his thematic preoccupations. These (and most of Melville's other works) are best accessed through the rigorously prepared Northwestern-Newberry editions (reissued in paperback in 1996).

Moby-Dick, of course, is Melville's most famous work and is regarded as his magnum opus; the Longman Critical Edition (2007) is recommended for its representation of the compositional and editorial history of the novel.

The definitive Melville biography is Hershel Parker's two-volume Herman Melville: A Biography (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1996–2002), which students can supplement with Andrew Delbanco's Melville: His Life and Work (New York: Knopf, 2005) or Laurie Robertson-Lorant's Melville: A Biography (New York: Clarkson Potter, 1996). Jay Leyda's seminal Melville Log: A Documentary Life of Herman Melville (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1951; expanded 1969) is an essential source for biographical details of all kinds. The supporting materials in the Northwestern-Newberry edition volumes also contain much valuable information. Wilson Heflin's Herman Melville's Whaling Years (Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 2004) and Stanton Garner's The Civil War World of Herman Melville (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1993) contain detailed portraits of Melville's life during crucial periods. Brian Higgins's Herman Melville: An Annotated Bibliography: 1846–1930 (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979) and Herman Melville: A Reference Guide: 1931–1960 (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987) include thorough bibliographic information for the dates covered. Students are directed to the annual volumes of American Literary Scholarship for listings of Melville scholarship in more-recent years.

Several collections of essays will introduce readers to the breadth of Melville criticism. Especially recommended is A Companion to Melville Studies, edited by John Bryant (New York: Greenwood Press, 1986). Other excellent critical anthologies include Melville's Evermoving Dawn: The Centennial Essays, edited by Bryant and Robert Milder (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1997); The Cambridge Companion to Herman Melville, edited by Robert S. Levine (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); A Historical Guide to Herman Melville, edited by Giles Gunn (New York: Oxford University Press, 2005); and A Companion to Herman Melville, edited by Wyn Kelley (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2006). Good collections on specific works are "Moby-Dick" as Doubloon, edited by Hershel Parker and Harrison Hayford (New York: Norton, 1970); Ungraspable Phantom: Essays on Moby-Dick, edited by Bryant, Mary K. Bercaw Edwards, and Timothy Marr (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2006); Critical Essays on Herman Melville's "Benito Cereno," edited by Robert Burkholder (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1992); and New Essays on "Billy Budd," edited by Donald Yannella (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002). The scholarly periodical Leviathan: A Journal of Melville Studies provides recent critical studies of Melville's works. Herman Melville, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2006), is a good general collection of critical articles.

—Student Guide by Amanda Gaily

Menken, Adah Isaacs (1835–1868) poet

Most famous as an actor and provocateur, Adah Isaacs Menken also produced a modest body of poetry in her meteoric life. Partly because she actively fictionalized her own life story, historically accurate details are difficult to sift from alluringly false ones that circulate about her. The best evidence indicates that Menken was probably born in Memphis, Tennessee, to a Protestant family and named Ada McCord. In 1854 she published a few sentimental poems in the Liberty Gazette, a small-town Texas newspaper. In 1856 she married Alexander Isaac Menken, a Jewish musician, and began to appear in theater performances shortly thereafter. She published poetry in the Cincinnati Israelite and in the New York Jewish Messenger and developed a reputation for her charismatic performances in sensational dramas, many times appearing in male roles. Her celebrity was fueled by a scandalous personal life; she married boxer John Heenan before divorcing Menken, and around 1860 she became part of the bohemian circle at Pfaff's tavern, where she became acquainted with Walt Whitman. Around the same time she published poems frequently in the New York Sunday Mercury. Her most famous stage role was the male title role in Mazeppa, in which she performed on horseback, costumed so as to appear naked. The notoriety of the Mazeppa role took Menken to California, France, and England, where she met and charmed Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Algernon Charles Swinburne, and Charles Dickens. Menken died in Paris while finishing work on her only collection of poetry, Infelicia (1868), which appeared posthumously. Since her death some have speculated that Menken had African American ancestry.

Sources

Drollard, Peter. "A Bibliography of the Poems and Essays of Adah Isaacs Menken," Bulletin of Biography, 58 (December 2001): 255–258.

Mankowitz, Wolf. Mazeppa: The Lives, Loves, and Legends of Adah Isaacs Menken. London: Blond & Briggs, 1982.

Sentilles, Renée M. Performing Menken: Adah Isaacs Menken and the Birth of American Celebrity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

—Brett Barney

Miller, Joaquin (1837–1913) poet

Joaquin Miller is said to have taken his pen name from the subject of his earliest literary work, a defense of the Mexican bandit Joaquin Murieta. But even his given name of Cincinnatus Hiner (or Heine) is uncertain, as much of his early life remains unclear, or at least exaggerated—Ambrose Bierce called him "the greatest liar this country has ever produced." Miller was born in Liberty, Indiana, and moved at an early age with his family—ostensibly by covered wagon—to the Willamette Valley of Oregon. As a young adult he is said to have lived among the Digger and Modoc Indian Nations of northern California and to have worked as, variously, a horse thief; a Pony Express rider; an Indian fighter; a lawyer; and editor of the Democratic Register of Eugene, Oregon.

Although Miller began publishing poetry in 1868, he did not find an audience until he traveled to London in 1870–1871, where he was feted as a frontier bard for the verse privately printed as Pacific Poems (1871) and Songs of the Sierras (1871). He was called the "Singer of the Sierras." Returning to America, Miller continued to produce poetry, although he was unable to maintain his earlier fame. One of his several novels, First Families in the Sierras (1875), dealt with the Mormons and became a popular play, The Danites of the Sierras (1877). He also published an exaggerated autobiography, Life among the Modocs (1873), as well as the autobiographical Memorie and Rime (1884).

Sources

Frost, O. W. Joaquin Miller. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Lawson, Benjamin S. Joaquin Miller. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1980.

—Joshua Matthews

"The Minister's Black Veil" by Nathaniel Hawthorne (1836) short story

This story by Nathaniel Hawthorne, first published in the GIFT BOOK The Token and Atlantic Souvenir, is set in Puritan New England and describes reactions when Mr. Hooper, minister of the town of Milford, covers his face with a piece of black crepe. "The Minister's Black Veil" is known as one of Hawthorne's most ambiguous stories, leaving the reader uncertain both about the purpose of the veil and the acts that have prompted Parson Hooper's decision to wear it. Whatever its cause or intent, however, the minister's wearing of the veil creates in the story a preoccupation with sin and reflects a concern about its debilitating effects on those who practiced Puritanism.

—Earl Yarrington

The Minister's Wooing by Harriet Beecher Stowe (New York: Derby & Jackson, 1859) novel

An historical novel and comedy of manners set in post-Revolution New England, Harriet Beecher Stowe's The Minister's Wooing was serialized in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. The major plot matter is Mary Scudder's eventual marriage, but the work wrestles with the Calvinist doctrine of election, the resultant terror when a loved one dies before receiving a sign, and faith in a loving God. When young James Marvyn (Mary's suitor from childhood) is feared drowned at sea, theologian Dr. Samuel Hopkins (Mary's next suitor) offers stern wisdom. The Lord "will at last bring infinite good out of evil, whether our small portion of existence be included or not." James's mother, distraught that her son may not be one of the elect, is consoled by her servant Candace: "Why, Jesus didn't die for nothing;—all dat love a'n't gwine to be wasted." Throughout, Stowe emphasizes the importance of women's domestic work: sewing, washing, and cooking. Men, freed from such cares, turn to hard theological doctrine. Hopkins offends the community when he preaches against the slave trade. Long considered one of the important works in the LOCAL COLOR tradition, The Minister's Wooing highlights female support networks (Candace and Miss Prissy, the seamstress) and promises romantic and spiritual rewards for self-sacrifice.

—Wesley Raabe

Minstrel Show

The minstrel show was a popular form of entertainment from the 1820s through the early decades of the twentieth century. It relied heavily upon African American music, particularly slaves' plantation songs, which were often parodied and adapted to white tastes. Music by white composers, most notably Stephen Foster, was also an integral part of the raucous shows, which were generally considered "low class" entertainment. Blue-collar men made up the bulk of the audiences, which included both blacks and whites; seating was customarily segregated.

Blackface performance—in which a white performer blackened his face with makeup to portray an African or to represent evil—dates back to the mid eighteenth century in America. In 1828 Thomas Dartmouth Rice, the "Father of American Minstrelsy," popularized a comic blackface character known as "Jim Crow." By the mid 1830s the use of blackface to caricature Afro-American features was standard practice in minstrel shows, a change that served the more general transformation of black characters in drama from downtrodden objects of sympathy to uneducated buffoons deserving of ridicule. An exaggerated shuffle and a caricatured Southern dialect completed the persona.

The first performance by an entire troupe of white performers in blackface was given by Daniel Decatur Emmett and his Virginia Minstrels in New York City in 1843. It featured the song "Dixie," composed by Emmett. The Christy Minstrels, an early minstrel company that promoted the music of Stephen Foster, first performed in New York City in 1846 and established the basic format for most minstrel shows that followed.

The typical minstrel show had three parts. In the first the entire company entered the stage. The "Interlocutor," or emcee, who usually wore whiteface and an elaborate and exaggerated outfit like that of a circus ringmaster or bandleader, acted as straight man for two "end men." These were usually referred to as "Bruder Bones" and "Bruder Tambo"; they dressed gaudily, played the banjo and tambourine, and wore blackface. The banter was interspersed with comic songs, ballads, and instrumental music. Popular songs included "Zip Coon," "O, Susanna," "Clare de Kitchen," "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny," and "Camp-town Races."

The second part of the show, known as the "olio" or medley, featured short specialty acts and "parade skits," in which comedic characters entered and exited the stage. The olio might also include a "plantation play" or a parody of a serious dramatic work done in caricatured black dialect. Hamlet, Othello, and Macbeth were frequently changed from tragedies to travesties, as was the Mikado or another Italian opera. Harriet Beecher STOWE'S UNCLE TOM'S CABIN was another frequent target. The setting for such parodies was often changed to a plantation or other local site, with characters given the names of actual slaves. Comic tunes were often inserted, and male actors usually played the roles of females. Another standard feature of the olio was the "stump" speech on a subject such as politics or social mores, delivered with exaggerated gestures and dialect.

The final part of the show consisted of a cakewalk or a "walk around," in which the audience clapped and sang along to lively tunes performed by the company.

Blackface minstrelsy helped to popularize several black stereotypes, including the city slicker and dandy, Zip Coon, and the good-natured but dim-witted slave, Jim Crow, whose name was later used to denote the post-CIVIL WAR system of segregation. Although minstrelsy promoted stereotypes of Asians, immigrants, Jews, and Native Americans, stereotyping of black culture formed the basis of the genre and was particularly harsh. Most Americans accepted the minstrel show's racism, which became more blatant after the CIVIL WAR. Abraham Lincoln, Walt WHITMAN, and Samuel L. CLEMENS were great fans of minstrelsy, which nevertheless had its critics. In 1848 Frederick DOUGLASS objected that "the filthy scum of white society have stolen from us a complexion denied them by nature, in which to make money, and pander to the corrupt taste of their white fellow citizens." Not all blacks agreed; some participated in shows and even formed their own companies. The black performers William Lane and Thomas Dilward appeared in white (blackface) minstrel shows prior to the Civil War, and the first all-black minstrel company, the Georgia Minstrels, was established by Charles Hicks in 1865. After the war African American participation in minstrel shows increased dramatically, with black minstrels reaching a height of popularity toward the end of the century.

Although they reflected and promoted racial bigotry, minstrel shows fostered the absorption of African American music into dominant white culture and provided a vent for some of the political, economic, and social pressures of the times. The minstrel show was incorporated into later forms such as vaudeville, movies, community theater, and charitable amateur events. It was not until the civil rights movement of the 1960s that minstrelsy's negative stereotyping led to its almost complete disappearance.

Sources

- Bean, Annemarie, James V. Hatch, and Brooks McNamara, eds. Inside the Minstrel Mask: Readings in Nineteenth-Century Blackface Minstrelsy. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1996.
- Cockrell, Dale. Demons of Disorder: Early Blackface Minstrels and Their World. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Nathan, Hans. Dan Emmett and the Rise of Early Negro Minstrelsy. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1962.
- Sweet, Frank W. A History of the Minstrel Show. Palm Coast, Fla.: Backintyme Press, 2000.

—Vicky L. Gailey

Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty

by John William De Forest (New York:

Harper, 1867) novel

The book that William Dean HOWELLS called "the best novel suggested by the civil war" was also one of the earliest. Begun in the winter of 1864–1865, during a two-month hiatus in John William DE FOREST's war service, Miss Ravenel's Conversion draws upon the Union captain's experiences in battle and his observations of Southern culture before and during the war. Part war narrative, part love story, and part temperance tract (see TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT), the novel follows Lillie Ravenel, the daughter of a doctor whose Union sympathies have forced them from their home in New Orleans. In the Northern town of New Boston, she meets Lieutenant Colonel Carter, who is on leave and recruiting Union troops, and lawyer Edward Colburne, who agrees to raise and lead a group of soldiers under Carter's command. Despite her father's misgivings, Lillie weds Colonel Carter, who turns out to be a drinker, a spendthrift, and an adulterer. In the end Carter dies in battle, and Lillie marries Colburne and settles in New Boston. Thus is her naive attraction to the superficial charms of New Orleans and men like Carter converted into an appreciation for the true nobility of the North and Captain Colburne.

De Forest sold Miss Ravenel's Confession to Harper's, who intended to print it serially in HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. It was decided, however, that the story's strong language and direct treatment of adultery made it unsuitable for families, and it appeared only as a monograph. It was not a big seller; nonetheless, De Forest's honest portrayal of the war, usually considered the most realistic in any American novel of the nineteenth century, made a strong and lasting impression on realists such as Howells. In his words, Miss Ravenel's Conversion displayed "an advanced realism, before realism was known by name."

—Brett Barney

Sources

- De Forest, John William. Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1998.
- Gargano, James W. Critical Essays on John William De Forest. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1981.

Mitchell, Donald Grant (1822–1908) essayist, novelist

... if you were only here—perhaps we would have a “Reverie” after the form of “Ik Marvel.”
 ... Dont you hope he will live as long as you and I do—and keep on having dreams and writing them to us. . . . We will be willing to die Susie—when such as he have gone, for there will be none left to interpret these lives of our's.

—Letter from Emily Dickinson to Susan Gilbert (circa 1851)

Born into a prominent minister's family in Norwich, Connecticut, Donald Grant Mitchell attended an elite boarding school before entering Yale. There he wrote for and edited the Yale Literary Magazine. Mitchell's father, a Congregational minister, had died while Mitchell was at boarding school, and his mother died in 1839, midway through his studies at Yale. After graduating Mitchell began farming the four hundred acres he had inherited, developing a fascination with agriculture that lasted for the rest of his life. Following a brief appointment as secretary in the consular office in Liverpool, England, Mitchell traveled in Europe, sending letters back to the United States for publication in Cultivator, an agriculture magazine. Mitchell placed a series of satirical letters written during a stay in Washington, D.C., in the New York Courier and Enquirer, signing them “Ik Marvel,” a pseudonym that he continued to use for the next decade. Under it, he published two volumes of European travel sketches; the first was well received, but the failure of the second caused Mitchell to abandon plans for a third. Instead, during 1850 he issued, at uneven intervals, a series of booklets titled The Lorgnette; or, Studies of the Town, apparently modeled on the Salmagundi Papers of his literary idol, Washington IRVING. Mitchell's greatest literary success came with the publication of Reveries of a Bachelor; or, A Book of the Heart (1851), a preliminary version of which had appeared in THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER. A sentiment-soaked vision of the stages of life, the book was immediately and enduringly popular. Its sequel, Dream Life: A Fable of the Seasons (1851), was also successful.

Made editor at HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Mitchell began the long-running column “The Editor's Easy Chair.” After his marriage to Mary Frances Pringle in 1853 and another European sojourn, Mitchell settled near New Haven, where he spent much of his later years farming and writing about farming. Although these nonfiction works were profitable, they did not match Mitchell's early success as Ik Marvel, and two volumes of fiction sold poorly. Between 1868 and 1870 he edited Hearth and Home, a periodical geared toward rural readers. In his last years he published a series of historical literary surveys of England and the United States. By the time of his death, Reveries of a Bachelor had sold over one million copies.

Sources

- Dunn, Waldo. The Life of Donald G. Mitchell. New York: Scribners, 1922.
- Kime, Wayne R. Donald G. Mitchell. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
- Spiro, Lisa. “Reading with Tender Rapture: Reveries of a Bachelor and the Rhetoric of Detached Intimacy,” Book History, 6 (2003): 57–93.

—Brett Barney

Mitchell, S. Weir (1829–1914) physician, novelist, poet

S. Weir Mitchell was born in Philadelphia and obtained a medical degree from Jefferson College before traveling to Paris to do graduate work in neurology. His writing career began with specialized papers on medical subjects such as toxicology, neurology, and clinical medicine, topics he also addressed in a variety of books that proved popular with lay readers.

During the CIVIL WAR Mitchell served as a surgeon with the Union army, an experience that inspired him to begin writing. His first story, “The Case of George Dedlow,” appeared in the July 1866 issue of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY and concerned the psychological effects of the war on an army surgeon forced to undergo the amputation of his arms and legs. Mitchell's first two novels, In War Time (1884) and Roland Blake (1886), also grew out of his war experience; the first focused on a New England physician's cowardice during the Civil War, and the second was a wartime romance. Mitchell's most significant historical novel, Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker (1896), concerns a Philadelphia Quaker's attempt to live up to his ideals during the Revolutionary War (1775–1783).

Later in his literary career Mitchell examined the psychology of women in novels such as Circumstance (1901), which concerns an adventuress; and Constance Trescot (1905), about a woman possessed by vengeance. He also wrote several volumes of verse, including The Hill of Stones (1882), The Masque and Other Poems (1887), and The Wager (1900).

Sources

- Earnest, Ernest P. S. Weir Mitchell, Novelist and Physician. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950.
- Rein, David. S. Weir Mitchell as a Psychiatric Novelist. New York: International Universities Press, 1952.
- Walter, Richard D. S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., Neurologist: A Medical Biography. Springfield, Ill.: Thomas, 1970.

Moby-Dick by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1851) novel

Herman MELVILLE's greatest work, Moby-Dick; or, The Whale, is a classic of American literature, combining a realistic account of a whale hunt with a symbolic exploration of human destiny and the nature of the universe. The story is told by Ishmael, the sole survivor of the Pequod, the whaler that the white whale Moby-Dick wrecks. The ship is commanded by Ahab, a monomaniacal captain who is bent on avenging himself against the whale for having taken his leg in a previous encounter. Ahab is a tyrant who binds his men together in the hunt by the force of his will. Magnificent in his effort to brave the elements and to do battle with the leviathan of the deep, he is also tragic in his refusal to observe the limitations that nature puts on human striving.

Ishmael is an observer-participant, mesmerized by Ahab but also aware of his captain's fanaticism. Like Ahab and many of the other crew members, Ishmael is aboard ship because he is an outcast: He is questing for the meaning of existence as well as for relief from the tedium he experiences on land. That Melville's aim was to write a novel about the plight of humanity itself is clear in the multicultural crew assembled for the whale hunt. Ishmael's roommate is Queequeg, a Polynesian prince, and the other sailors come from various nations, classes, and backgrounds. These include the scrupulous Starbuck, the chief mate, who opposes Ahab; and Stubb, the second mate, who takes life as it comes and throws himself into the hunt for the whale. Other crew members include Tashtego, an American Indian; Pip, an African American cabin boy; Daggoo, an African; and Fedallah, a mysterious Asian. The depiction of each crew member's interaction with nature and the reaction of each to the mission Ahab sets for him work together to demonstrate the wide range of human temperaments.

The Pequod meets many other whalers on its search for Moby-Dick, each ship revealing another side of human nature through the voices of its captain and crew members, while Ahab hears only the men who share his outrage at the whale. At length, Ahab confronts the whale and loses both his life and the Pequod.

Sources

- Bryant, John, Mary K. Bercaw Edwards, and Timothy Marr, eds. Ungraspable Phantom: Essays on Moby-Dick. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2006.
- Gilmore, Michael T., ed. Twentieth Century Interpretations of Moby-Dick: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1977.
- Hayes, Kevin J., ed. The Critical Response to Herman Melville's Moby Dick. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.
- Higgins, Brian, and Hershel Parker, eds. Critical Essays on Herman Melville's Moby-Dick. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Moulton, Louise Chandler (1835–1908) poet, children's writer, journalist, editor, critic

Born Ellen Louise Chandler in Pomfret, Connecticut, Louise Chandler Moulton was best known as a writer of poetry and prose. Her first collection of poems and sketches, This, That, and the Other (1854), was a great success. She married William U. Moulton, editor and publisher of the Boston newspaper True Flag, where some of her early poems had been originally published. Louise established a literary salon in Boston attended by such luminaries as Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Oliver Wendell HOLMES. She enjoyed great popularity, was well traveled, and was the Boston literary correspondent to the NEW YORK TRIBUNE. Late collections of her verse are The Garden of Dreams (1889) and At the Wind's Will (1899). Her poetry is marked by a lyrical elegance and subtlety of meaning. Moulton wielded great literary influence and was a gifted yet compassionate critic. At the end of her life she suffered from Bright's disease. She died in Boston.

Sources

- Moulton, Louise Chandler. My Third Book: A Collection of Tales. 1859. <<http://onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu>> (viewed August 8, 2007).
- Moulton. The Poems and Sonnets of Louise Chandler Moulton. 1909. <<http://onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu>> (viewed August 8, 2007).
- Whiting, Lilian. Louise Chandler Moulton, Poet and Friend. Boston: Little, Brown, 1910.
- Wright American Fiction: <<http://www.lettrs.indiana.edu/web/w/wright2>> (viewed August 8, 2007).

"MS Found in a Bottle" by Edgar Allan Poe (1833) short story

An "arabesque" (that is, supernatural, symbolic) tale by Edgar Allan POE, "MS Found in a Bottle" was awarded the Baltimore Saturday Visiter fiction prize and was published in that periodical in 1833. The story purports to be the "journal" of a man who, in a matter of days, changes his extremely skeptical cast of mind to embrace "a new sense" which is capable of grasping the unknown. The narrator places his journal in a bottle, which he throws overboard just before being swallowed by an immense whirlpool. The tale's concern with psychology as well as its use of symbolism make it an early version of a story Poe develops in his novel, THE NARRATIVE OF ARTHUR GORDON PYM OF NAN-TUCKET (1838).

Source

- Poe, Edgar Allan. Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1840.

—C. Love

Muir, John (1838–1914) essayist

Born in Scotland, John Muir came to the United States as a boy in 1849, when his father immigrated to a Wisconsin farm. As his autobiographical Story of My Boyhood and Youth (1913) later reported, it was on the family farm that Muir's interests in books and nature developed simultaneously. After studying chemistry, geology, and botany, Muir graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1863 and spent the next five years traveling through the Midwest and Canada. He also journeyed by foot from Indiana to Mexico, an adventure he later recounted in A Thousand Mile Walk to the Gulf (1916).

In 1868 Muir made California his home, first spending five years in the Yosemite Valley, then roving abroad to explore glaciers, forests, mountains, and seas as far afield as Alaska, Russia, India, and Australia. His passion, however, was conservation of the natural wonders of the Western states, and he became both a leader of the forest preservation movement and, with the aid of his friend President Theodore Roosevelt, one of the motivating forces behind the establishment of the U.S. National Park System. Muir Glacier in Alaska, which he discovered, and Muir Woods National Monument in California are named for him. Muir also wrote about America's natural wonders in works such as The Mountains of California (1894) and My First Summer in the Sierra (1911).

Sources

- Cohen, Michael P. The Pathless Way: John Muir and American Wilderness. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.
- Gifford, Terry. Reconnecting with John Muir: Essays in Post-Pastoral Practice. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2006.
- Miller, Sally M., and Daryl Morrison. John Muir: Family, Friends, and Adventures. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2005.
- Wilkins, Thurman. John Muir: Apostle of Nature. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1995.

"The Murders in the Rue Morgue" by Edgar Allan Poe (1841) short story

Published in GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE in April 1841, this tale by Edgar Allan Poe is considered to be the first detective story, predating Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's sleuth, Sherlock Holmes, by forty-six years. The story begins with the narrator's examination of the methodological thought processes necessary in a chess game. This discussion acts as an introduction to the vigilant observation and deductive logic utilized by the detective protagonist, C. Auguste Dupin. The story is set in Paris on the fictional street, Rue Morgue, where Madame L'Esplanade and her daughter, Camille, are gruesomely murdered. The crime, considered unsolvable by the local police, occurs in a locked room. After viewing the crime scene and finding a hair ribbon tied with a sailor's knot, Dupin places a message in the newspaper asking that any sailor who has lost an "Ourang-Outang of the Bornese species" contact him immediately. A sailor comes forward, and Dupin concludes that the murders were not committed by a human, but by a runaway orangutan. "Murders in the Rue Morgue" is the first of three short stories featuring Dupin. The second, "The Mystery of Marie Roget," was published in 1842, and the third, "THE PURLOINED LETTER," in 1844.

Sources

- Poe, Edgar Allan. Murders in the Rue Morgue: The Dupin Tales, edited by Matthew Pearl. New York: Random House, 2006.
- Poe. The Works of the Late Edgar Allan Poe: With Notices of His Life and Genius, 4 volumes, edited by Rufus Wilmot Griswold. New York: Redfield, 1850–1856.

—Carmel L. Morse

Murfree, Mary N. (1850–1922) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Murfreesboro, Tennessee, a town named for her great-grandfather, Mary N. Murfree spent most of her life in her native state writing stories and novels that reflected her surroundings. After an illness left her lame in early childhood, Murfree traveled little, although she attended boarding school in Philadelphia during the CIVIL WAR and, more significantly, spent summers with her family in the Cumberland Mountains in central Tennessee. The language of the mountaineers she met there later lent her fiction a regional flavor, making Murfree one of the voices in the LOCAL COLOR movement.

Murfree began writing in the 1870s, publishing her first stories under the pen name R. Emmet Dembry and later adopting the name of one of her characters, Charles Egbert Craddock. Murfree kept up a male facade until 1885, a year after the publication of her acclaimed story collection In the Tennessee Mountains, which presented one of the first realistic portraits of life among Southern mountaineers. In 1885 Murfree revealed her true identity to the editor of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, and the revelation created a stir nationwide.

Murfree published several other story collections as well as two novels about Tennessee mountaineers, The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains (1885) and The "Stranger People's" Country (1891). She also wrote historical fiction set in the colonial period and in the old Southwest during the Civil War. She continued to publish until 1914, with the income from her writing contributing substantially to the support of her family, which had fallen on hard times after the war.

Source

- Cary, Richard. Mary N. Murfree. New York: Twayne, 1967.

MacArthur, Charles (1895–1956) playwright

Born the son of a minister in Scranton, Pennsylvania, Charles MacArthur worked as a Chicago newspaperman in the 1920s. He had his first theatrical success collaborating with Edward Sheldon on Lulu Belle (produced 1926), a lurid drama about a black prostitute, which caused controversy when the leading role was played by a white actress in blackface makeup. Collaborating with Sidney HOWARD, MacArthur wrote Salvation (produced 1928), an unsuccessful drama inspired by the life of controversial evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson.

MacArthur's enduring theatrical fame came through collaborations with another Chicago journalist, Ben HECHT. With THE FRONT PAGE (produced 1928), their hugely successful comedy-melodrama about Chicago political corruption and yellow journalism during the JAZZ AGE, Hecht and MacArthur became a celebrated playwriting team, scoring subsequent successes with Twentieth Century (produced 1932), a comedy about a faded Hollywood director's attempt to lure his tempestuous leading lady back to the screen, and with their libretto for the musical Jumbo (produced 1935), with a score by Richard Rodgers and Lorenz HART.

Subsequent collaborations with Hecht, including Ladies and Gentlemen (produced 1939), a murder mystery written as a vehicle for MacArthur's wife Helen Hayes, and the melodramatic Swan Song (produced 1946), failed with critics and audiences. On his own, MacArthur also had a failure with Johnny on a Spot (produced 1942), a political satire, but he had a long and successful career as a Hollywood screenwriter on such movies as The Sin of Madelon Claudet (1931), which won an Academy Award for his wife; Gunga Din (1939); and Wuthering Heights (1939).

Source

Hecht, Ben. Charlie: The Improbable Life and Times of Charles MacArthur. New York: Harper, 1957.

—James Fisher

MacKaye, Percy (1875–1956) playwright

Educated at Harvard, Percy MacKaye is best known for his career as a verse dramatist and champion of community-based pageant dramas. In this respect, his work is regionalist and comparable to Paul GREEN's. Among his many verse pageants are The Canterbury Pilgrims (produced 1909), Sanctuary: A Bird Masque (produced 1913), Caliban by the Yellow Sands (produced 1916), and The Evergreen Tree: A Masque of Christmas Time (produced 1917). Similarly, he wrote folk plays based on his travels in Kentucky: This Fine-Pretty World (produced 1923) and Kentucky Mountain Fantasies: Three Short Plays for an Appalachian Theatre, which was published in 1928.

Sources

Ege, Arvia MacKaye. The Power of the Impossible: The Life Story of Percy and Marion MacKaye. Falmouth, Maine: Kennebec River Press, 1992.

Percy MacKaye: A Symposium on his Fiftieth Birthday, 1925. Hanover, N.H.: Dartmouth Press, 1928.

MacLeish, Archibald (1892–1982) poet, playwright

A poem is a means of comprehending humanity, a means of comprehending human life and to a very considerable extent, the only means we have—the only means in which you use the emotions as well as the intellect at the same time—to live understandingly, to live in a considered way the life we live.

—Reflections (1986)

Born to wealth, Archibald MacLeish during his long, full life was a poet, soldier, lawyer, diplomat, professor, editor, playwright, and critic. Upon graduating from Yale, MacLeish enlisted in the army and served in WORLD WAR I, where he experienced combat. After graduating from Harvard Law School, he worked for the prestigious law firm of Choate, Hall, and Stewart before quitting to pursue a career as a poet, leaving for Paris in 1923. A job as an editor for Fortune Magazine (1929–1938) provided MacLeish with the opportunities and funds for travel that allowed him to complete the research that fueled much of his best work. In addition, the many interviews and stories he filed for the magazine also gave him the political knowledge that he later applied to a series of government jobs with the Roosevelt administration: first, as the Librarian of Congress (1939–1944), which was followed by a post as assistant secretary of state (1944–1945). By the end of the 1940s he resigned from public office and became Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory at Harvard University (1949–1962). In the final decades of his life he continued to publish an impressive body of poetry, criticism, verse plays, and scripts for radio performances.

MacLeish's poetry is characterized by his use of classical myths and contemporary politics, where the interior life of a poem's narrator is balanced by a broader depiction of the world around him. Though poems such as "Ars Poetica" and "You, Andrew Marvell" have often led to his being grouped with modernist contemporaries such as Ezra POUND, MacLeish's work rarely becomes abstract and fragmented. Skilled in a variety of forms, he was equally capable of crafting a verse play, a classical sonnet, or a long poem. The publication of The Happy Marriage and Other Poems (1924) marked MacLeish's entrance into the group of expatriate writers that included his friends F. Scott FITZGERALD and Ernest HEMINGWAY and solidified his desire to continue a career as a poet.

MacLeish's travels inspired his writing, the most notable of these trips being the journey through Mexico that provided the research and inspiration for his PULITZER PRIZE-winning long poem, CONQUISTADOR (1932). He won a second Pulitzer Prize in poetry for Collected Poems, 1917–1952 (1952). MacLeish's despair at the human costs of war informed some of his finest later work, especially J.B. (1958), a modern retelling of The Book of Job, which won a Pulitzer Prize in drama.

The Presidential Medal of Freedom (1977), the National Medal for Literature (1978), and the Gold Medal for Poetry from the American Academy of Arts and Letters (1979) were among the honors bestowed upon MacLeish. As his contemporary and friend, the poet Robert Penn WARREN said: "MacLeish lived a long time in this land, and with honor." MacLeish's poetic reputation, however, has proven to be less certain. As scholar John Timberman Newcomb notes, MacLeish "was one of America's best-known and widely read poets" in the years from 1930 to 1945, but he now "hovers on the outer margins of the academic canons."

Sources

Donaldson, Scott, and R. H. Winnick. Archibald MacLeish: An American Life. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1992.

Drabeck, Bernard A., and Helen E. Ellis, eds. Archibald MacLeish: Reflections. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986.

Newcomb, John Timberman. "Archibald MacLeish and the Poetics of Public Speech: A Critique of High Modernism." Journal of the Midwest Modern Language Association, 23 (Spring 1990): 9–26.

—Paul Kareem Tayyar

Maggie: A Girl of the Streets by Stephen Crane, as Johnston Smith (New York: Privately printed, 1893); revised edition, as Stephen Crane (New York: Appleton, 1896) novella

Stephen CRANE's first major work, Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (A Story of New York), is a groundbreaking study in American literary NATURALISM. Its depiction of a hostile, amoral universe indifferent to the plight of its inhabitants foreshadows the direction of much literary writing in America in the twentieth century. In an urban slum controlled by violence, survival of the fittest, and social indifference, Maggie's romantic dreams of an ideal lover result in her being seduced and abandoned. Rejected by family, church, and society, she becomes a prostitute to survive but soon dies—probably by suicide—without hope. Given the subject matter, it is not surprising that Crane had trouble finding a publisher. After the novella was rejected by several publishers, he privately printed it in 1893 under the pseudonym "Johnston Smith."

Clearly missing from the novella is the sentimentalizing or moralizing prevalent in other fictional treatments of tenement life in America in the late nineteenth century. Crane was not interested in analyzing the causes of, and offering solutions for, urban poverty. Instead, he wanted to show the stark reality of slum life. In this environment there is no escape from violence. Whether one is at home, at work, or on the street, life is brutal and chaotic. Although the novella emphasizes a grim, Darwinian environment, Crane's irony throughout keeps the story from devolving into the pure Naturalism of Emile Zola or the cheap melodrama of countless stories of innocent girls seduced and ruined by villains. Repeatedly, characters such as Maggie's mother shield themselves from reality by hiding behind the hypocritical codes of bourgeois morality, as when she disowns her "fallen" daughter.

Crane unifies the episodic structure of the book through imagery and similar recurring scenes. Images of "howling urchins from Devil's Row," a home that is a "reg'lar livin' hell! Damndes' place!," and Maggie's eating "like a small pursued tigress" suggest that the setting of the novella is no better than hell or a jungle. Maggie's deterioration as a prostitute is symbolized in chapter 17 by the increasingly degraded kind of client she solicits and by her movement from the "more glittering avenues" of the elegant theater district of New York City to the "darker blocks" of the squalid slums. When Maggie was reissued in 1896 under Crane's own name, he deleted objectionable phrasing and passages at the request of the publisher to make the book less offensive.

Source

Crane, Stephen. Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (A Story of New York), an authoritative text, backgrounds, and sources, edited by Thomas A. Gullason. New York: Norton, 1979.

—Paul Sorrentino

Main Street by Sinclair Lewis (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1920) novel

Main Street became the most discussed book of 1920, as it was read as Sinclair LEWIS's attack on conservative, small-town values. The story is seen through the eyes of its idealistic, urbanized heroine, Carol Kennicott, married to country doctor Will Kennicott and transplanted to the provincial village of Gopher Prairie. Chronically dissatisfied, she naively sets out to remake the town according to her own conceptions of culture and beauty. She gives parties with Japanese costumes and pretentious stunts, directs a drama-club production, and half falls in love with a handsome young tailor, Eric Valborg. But her dissatisfaction persists. Finally, Carol, a feminist, leaves Will for Washington, D.C., where she can work at a job that, unlike keeping house, will enable her to exercise her brain. In the end, she returns to him, now a mature but disappointed young mother who recognizes she lacks the courage to rebel but has fought the good fight. The novel is notable for its photographic descriptions and caricatures of small-town types like Sam Clark, the hearty hardware man, and Vida Sherwin, the vinegary schoolmarm. Lewis satirizes the banality and provincialism of village society as well as decrying the town's exploitation of the immigrant farmers.

Sources

Douglas, George H. "Main Street After Fifty Years," Prairie Schooner, 44 (Winter 1970): 338–348.

Lingeman, Richard. Sinclair Lewis: Rebel from Main Street. New York: Random House, 2002.

—Richard Lingeman

The Making of Americans by Gertrude Stein (Paris: Contact Editions, 1925) prose

Although Gertrude STEIN had completed a manuscript of her thousand-page family saga by 1908, The Making of Americans was not published until 1925. The text's subtitle, "Being a History of a Family's Progress," leads the reader to expect a work that uses familiar techniques to detail an immigrant family's successful Americanization and achievement of the American dream. Instead, Stein's work is experimental, repetitive, and fundamentally nonnarrative. Because of its length and the interpretive difficulties it presents, The Making of Americans remains among Stein's less studied and read works, though excerpts of the first chapter are sometimes anthologized.

Source

Wagner-Martin, Linda. "Favored Strangers": Gertrude Stein and Her Family. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1995.

—Jessica G. Rabin

The Maltese Falcon by Dashiell Hammett (New York: Knopf, 1930) novel

When Dashiell HAMMETT sent his third novel, The Maltese Falcon, to his publisher, he announced "I'm fairly confident that it is by far the best thing I have done so far." It was his attempt, as he said in a previous letter, to raise detective fiction to the level of literature.

The Maltese Falcon is about a private detective drawn by the murder of his partner and his romantic attraction to a dangerous beautiful woman into the search for an icon of extraordinary value—a jewel-encrusted sixteenth-century statuette of a falcon. It is a novel about passion expressed both as greed and lust, about the difficulty of untangling lies, about self-preservation gained through strict adherence to a personal code of behavior, and about the responsibility one has to maintain order in the place where he lives.

The tightly constructed novel takes place in San Francisco over a six-day period. The main characters are limited to the detective Sam Spade and a trio of duplicitous villains—Brigid O'Shaughnessy, Caspar Gutman, and Joel Cairo. The significant action is limited to Spade's office and apartment, Brigid's apartment, and Gutman's hotel room. The narration, told from Spade's perspective, more or less objectively reports only what Spade is able to observe. The action is observed from his perspective, so information comes to the reader just as it comes to him.

Hammett's achievement in The Maltese Falcon has less to do with plot than with skillful characterization and dramatic confrontation. The novel proceeds in play-like fashion, scene by scene, and is advanced by conversation rather than the violent action associated with detective fiction of the period. The characters are meticulously drawn, but it is their speech that truly distinguishes them, each with his own vocabulary and vernacular rhythms. Hammett suggested that his publisher arrange for the novel be adapted for the stage, an indication of his approach to his material.

The characterizations lend power to the memorable dramatic scenes in the novel: when Brigid first appears in Spade's office with a made-up story that she needs his help finding her lost sister; when Cairo appears seeking to hire Spade to help him find a black bird lost in transport from Constantinople; when Spade confronts Brigid in her apartment about the lies she told when she first hired him; in the two scenes in Gutman's hotel room when the fat man slowly reveals the history of the Maltese falcon; and in the climactic scene in Spade's apartment when he, Brigid, Cairo, Gutman, and Gutman's bodyguard gather to negotiate and await delivery of the falcon and afterward when Spade explains to Brigid why he must turn her in to the police.

The Maltese Falcon was well received upon publication and has been constantly in print since its first publication. Its extraordinary influence on realistic detective fiction has been widely recognized. An important element in its enduring popularity has been the classic 1941 movie faithfully adapted from the novel by John Huston, which brought Hammett's characters to an audience much wider than the readers of the novel.

Sources

Richard Layman, Literary Masterpieces: The Maltese Falcon. Manly/Gale Group, 2000.

Layman, ed. The Maltese Falcon: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, Volume 280. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Group, 2003). Reprinted as Discovering the Maltese Falcon and Sam Spade. San Francisco: Vince Emery Productions, 2005

Layman, ed., The Maltese Falcon: Special Issue. Clues: A Journal of Detection, Spring 2005.

—Richard Layman

Maltz, Albert (1908–1985) playwright, screenwriter, novelist, short-story writer

Albert Maltz graduated from Columbia University and studied at the Yale School of Drama. A man of radical and pacifist convictions, he collaborated with Yale classmate George Sklar to write proletarian dramas (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE): Merry Go Round (produced 1932), which dealt with political corruption, and Peace on Earth (produced 1933), an antiwar drama. Alone, he wrote the one-act play Black Pit (produced 1935), the story of a coal-miners' strike. Maltz's first story collection, The Way Things Are (1938), included "Man on a Road," a frequently reprinted story about a hitchhiking miner who is dying from silicosis. His first novel, The Underground Stream (1940), focused on an effort to unionize autoworkers. In the 1940s he was a successful screenwriter, receiving screen credits for several movies, including This Gun for Hire (1941), Pride of the Marines (1945), and The House I Live In (1945). During these years he also published two more novels, The Cross and the Arrow (1944) and The Journey of Simon McKeever (1949), as well as The Citizen Writer: Essays in Defense of American Culture (1950). During the Cold War Maltz became suspect because of his Communist affiliations, and when, like other screenwriters, he declined to testify before Congress about his political activities, he was jailed, becoming one of the Hollywood Ten.

Source

Salzman, Jack. Albert Maltz. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Manhattan Transfer by John Dos Passos (New York: Harper, 1925) novel

JOHN DOS PASSOS's Manhattan Transfer is one of the earliest examples of a modernist novel (see MODERNISM) by an American. Employing many of the techniques he refined for the U.S.A. trilogy (1938), the novel covers a period from the consolidation of the five boroughs of New York City in 1898 until just after WORLD WAR I. Dos Passos paints an apocalyptic vision of the modern city using a large cast of characters whose often interconnected lives are traced in a series of vignettes set in a frame of biblical imagery and comparisons to the biblical city of Nineveh. Using snippets of material from popular culture, including song lyrics, advertising slogans, and newspaper headlines, along with passages that sometimes shift to stream-of-consciousness narrative, Dos Passos combines the modernist techniques of EXPRESSIONISM and impressionism to provide both multiple perspectives on the life of the city and a description of the dehumanizing effect the urban environment has on the lives of individuals.

Sources

Lewis, Sinclair. John Dos Passos's Manhattan Transfer. New York: Harper, 1926.

Morel, Jean-Pierre. Dos Passos: Manhattan Transfer. Paris: Universitaires de France, 1990.

—Richard Layman

The Man Who Came to Dinner by George S.

Kaufman and Moss Hart (produced 1939) play
George S. KAUFMAN and Moss HART teamed up to write this caustic lampoon of their celebrated friend, drama critic and raconteur Alexander WOOLLCOTT, which opened on October 19, 1939, for a nearly two-year, 739-performance run. The plot of this Broadway classic grew out of a weekend visit by Woolcott to Hart's home. On his departure, Woolcott left a rudely complaining note. A nonplussed Hart recounted the incident to Kaufman, wondering what it would be like to put up with such a guest for a longer visit—the nightmare that is imagined in The Man Who Came to Dinner.

The play begins when imperious radio celebrity Sheridan Whiteside visits Messalia, Ohio, to give a Christmastime lecture. When he visits a local family, the Stanleys, Whiteside slips on their front steps and is injured. Becoming an unwilling inmate in the Stanley home, the seemingly charming Whiteside turns into a terror. Watched over by his long-suffering secretary and a beleaguered nurse, Whiteside takes over the first floor of the Stanley home, holding court for an assortment of Broadway and Hollywood personalities from a wheelchair. The circumstance allows the playwrights to caricature other 1930s celebrities, including Gertrude Lawrence, Noel Coward, Harpo Marx, and Albert Einstein, and set their eccentricities against middle-American values. The acid-tongued Whiteside harasses one and all, particularly the hapless Stanleys, whose small-minded provinciality inspires his disdain. Equal parts high comedy, social satire, and farce, The Man Who Came to Dinner, like Kaufman and Hart's PULITZER PRIZE-winning 1936 comedy YOU CAN'T TAKE IT WITH YOU, again proved that a delightful play could rest merely on the pitting of a band of nonconformist eccentrics against exemplars of propriety and normalcy.

—James Fisher

Marquand, John P. (1893–1960) novelist, short-story writer

The Harvard-educated John P. Marquand began his literary career as the author of light romantic novels, including The Unspeakable Gentleman (1922), The Black Cargo (1925), Warning Hill (1930), and Ming Yellow (1935). He wrote entertaining stories for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, in which also appeared his serialized adventures of the Japanese detective Mr. Moto, who became the hero in a series of popular movies. Marquand sharpened and deepened his portrait of society in his satirical novel of manners, The Late George Apley (1937), which won a PULITZER PRIZE. This fictional memoir of a Boston Brahmin was succeeded by other novels that skewered the New England upper-class and upper-middle-class sensibility, including Wickford Point (1939), H. M. Pulham, Esquire (1941), and Point of No Return (1949).

Sources

Bell, Millicent. Marquand: An American Life. Boston: Little, Brown, 1979.

Wires, Richard. John P. Marquand and Mr. Moto: Spy Adventures and Detective Films. Muncie, Ind.: Ball State University Press, 1990.

Martin Eden by Jack London (New York: Macmillan, 1909) novel

Martin Eden (1909), Jack LONDON's eighth novel and his most autobiographical, traces the artistic development and accompanying socioeconomic ascent of the title character. Martin's love for an upper-middle-class woman, Ruth Morse, triggers his commitment to self-education and ultimately to realizing his potential as a writer in order to gain access into her world of culture and refinement. When he achieves his goal, however, he concludes that Ruth's world is one "where all life's values are unreal, and false, and vulgar." Exhausted, disillusioned, and alienated, he commits suicide. The pessimistic ending repelled readers and critics of the time, but the book is now hailed as a seminal chronicle of the growth of an artist, a precursor of such autobiographical novels as Jack Kerouac's On the Road (1957).

Source

Labor, Earle, and Jeanne Campbell Reesman. Jack London, revised edition. New York: Twayne, 1994.

—John Cusatis

The Masses (1911–1917) periodical

The Masses was founded by the Dutch immigrant Piet Vlag in New York City as the unofficial organ of the cooperative movement. Beginning in December 1912, the magazine was edited by Max EASTMAN, who in his first editorial promised to make it "a popular Socialist magazine—a magazine of pictures and lively writing." Contributors included Carl SANDBURG, Louis UNTERMEYER, Amy LOWELL, Jack LONDON, Sherwood ANDERSON, and John REED. Called in its time "the most dangerous magazine in America," The Masses died quickly once the New York postal authorities, empowered by the Espionage Act of 1917 and reacting against the magazine's staunch opposition to the involvement of the United States in WORLD WAR I, refused to allow it to be mailed.

Three months after the government's action, the editors began another weekly devoted to leftist social criticism. The Liberator, more radical than its predecessor, affiliated with the Communist Party in 1922. In 1926 The Masses was revived as the weekly New Masses, a title it retained until 1948. It then merged with yet another Marxist periodical to become the monthly magazine Masses & Mainstream.

Sources

O'Neill, William, ed. Echoes of Revolt: The Masses 1911–1917. Chicago: Quadrangle, 1966.

Zurier, Rebecca. Art for the Masses: A Radical Magazine and Its Graphics, 1911–1917. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1988.

Masters, Edgar Lee (1868–1950) poet, biographer

Born in Garnett, Kansas, Edgar Lee Masters lived most of his youth in Petersburg and Lewistown, Illinois, the small-town models for his literary village, Spoon River, the town he depicted in his most famous work, SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY (1915). After graduating from Lewistown High School and attending Knox College for a year, Masters began to work and study law in his father's law firm. Admitted to the Illinois Bar in 1891, he moved to Chicago to practice law and was a partner with Clarence Darrow from 1903 to 1911, when he formed his own firm to continue his career. In the years before the publication of Spoon River Anthology, he published fifteen books, including seven plays, none of which were produced, and four volumes of undistinguished verse.

The poems that Masters collected in Spoon River Anthology were in part inspired by his conversations with his mother in which they reminisced about people they had known back in Illinois. The collection presents a series of dramatic monologues, or "epitaphs," that create a vivid picture of small-town life through the reflections of Spoon River residents who have died. Masters's poignant, sometimes sardonic collection was later regarded as the work that began the CHICAGO RENAISSANCE as well as the "revolt from the village" school of writers. His work influenced such writers as Sherwood ANDERSON in Winesburg, Ohio (1919) and Thornton WILDER in Our Town (produced 1938).

After the success of Spoon River Anthology and the notoriety of a messy divorce, Masters turned to writing full-time after his law practice declined. He was prolific and wrote novels and plays as well as poetry and biographies, though he was always best known for his first success. His later poetry collections include Starved Rock (1919), The New Spoon River (1924), Poems of People (1936), and Illinois Poems (1941). His Lincoln: The Man (1931) was attacked as being biased against the president, but his Vachel Lindsay: A Poet in America (1935) became the standard biography of the poet. Masters published Across Spoon River: An Autobiography in 1936.

Sources

Flanagan, John T. Edgar Lee Masters: The Spoon River Poet and His Critics. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

Wrenn, John H., and Margaret M. Wrenn. Edgar Lee Masters. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

—Geraldine Cannon Becker

Matthiessen, F. O. (1902–1950) literary critic

With a B.A. from Yale and a Ph.D. from Harvard, Francis Otto Matthiessen was one of the most influential literary critics of his day. An active liberal and professor of literature at Harvard, he sought to promote the progressive tradition in American literature. His best-known book is American Renaissance (1941), which explored, as the subtitle says, "art and expression in the age of Emerson and Whitman." His other books include The Achievement of T. S. Eliot (1935, revised 1947), Henry James: The Major Phase (1944), Theodore Dreiser (1951), and The Responsibilities of the Critic: Essays and Reviews by F. O. Matthiessen (1952).

Sources

Gunn, Giles B. F. O. Matthiessen: The Critical Achievement. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1975.

Stern, Frederick C. F. O. Matthiessen, Christian Socialist as Critic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.

Maxwell, William (1908–2000) novelist, short-story writer

Educated at the University of Illinois and Harvard, William Maxwell in 1936 began a more than four-decade career as fiction editor at THE NEW YORKER, where he worked with writers such as John O'HARA, John Updike, J. D. Salinger, and Harold Brodkey. Most of his own fiction examined early-twentieth-century Midwestern life. His novels include They Came Like Swallows (1937), The Folded Leaf (1945), and The Chateau (1961).

Sources

Steinman, Michael. The Happiness of Getting It Down Right: Letters of Frank O'Connor and William Maxwell, 1945–1961. New York: Knopf, 1996.

Wilkinson, Alec. My Mentor: A Young Man's Friendship with William Maxwell. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2002.

"May Day" by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1920) novelette

First published in THE SMART SET and collected in TALES OF THE JAZZ AGE (1922), F. Scott FITZGERALD's first novelette, "May Day" focuses on Gordon Sterrett on May 1–2, 1919, as he unsuccessfully tries to borrow money from a wealthy former Yale classmate, attends a Yale dance in New York, and commits suicide after marrying a low-class woman while he is drunk. Structured on social-class contrasts, the story surveys the May Day events, particularly the anti-Socialist riots and the alcoholic activities of other characters. "May Day" was Fitzgerald's first important story to examine the influence of money on character.

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

McAlmon, Robert (1896–1956) publisher, poet, autobiographer

An expatriate publisher who ran the Paris-based Contact Editions press, Robert McAlmon knew many of the principal American figures, such as Ernest HEMINGWAY, who settled in Paris after WORLD WAR I. Among the important works brought out by Contact Editions were William Carlos WILLIAMS's Spring and All (1923) and Gertrude STEIN's

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS (1925). McAlmon published his free verse in The Portrait of a Generation (1926), North America, Continent of Conjecture (1929), and Not Alone Lost (1937). In Village:—as it happened through a fifteen year Period (1924) he presents a picture of small-town American life. His memoir of the post-World War I period, Being Geniuses Together, appeared in 1938, with additions by Kay BOYLE in 1968.

Sources

Knoll, Robert E. Robert McAlmon: Expatriate Publisher and Writer. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1957.

Knoll, ed. McAlmon and the Lost Generation. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1962.

Smoller, Sanford J. Adrift Among Geniuses: Robert McAlmon, Writer and Publisher of the Twenties. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1975.

McCoy, Horace (1897–1955) short-story writer, novelist, screenwriter

Everyone in the knowledgeable world [in Europe] talks about American writers, about a curious trinity: Hemingway, Faulkner, and McCoy.

—Vogue, January 15, 1947

Horace McCoy was born in Pegram, Tennessee, and was raised in Nashville. At sixteen he quit high school and traveled with his salesman father around the Deep South, settling with his family in Dallas in 1915. Serving as a bombardier and aerial photographer in France during WORLD WAR I, McCoy was twice wounded and received the Croix de Guerre. After the war, McCoy returned to Dallas and worked as a journalist. He became the sports editor of the Dallas Journal and began submitting short stories to magazines. McCoy published more than forty stories, seventeen of them in the PULP MAGAZINE BLACK MASK between 1927 and 1937. In his choice to write often about crime and his reliance on vernacular speech he became associated with the so-called HARD-BOILED school of fiction.

In 1931 McCoy left Dallas for Hollywood, seeking movie roles. Although he never received any significant acting roles, he soon settled into a productive career as a screenwriter. His first and most famous novel, They Shoot Horses, Don't They? (1935), is a first-person narrative of a man awaiting execution for the murder of his dance-marathon partner at her request. Although the novel received some strong notices and led to McCoy being identified as an existentialist writer in France, it sold fewer than three thousand copies. McCoy had difficulty finding an American publisher for his second novel, No Pockets in a Shroud (first published in England in 1937), which concerned crime and corruption in an American town. McCoy's next novel, a Hollywood exposé titled I Should Have Stayed Home (1938), was moderately successful, but he did not write another novel for ten years.

In the mid 1940s, after American publishers became aware of his European success, McCoy set to work on what he believed was his best novel. Although Kiss Tomorrow Good-Bye (1948) sold well and was made into a successful movie starring James Cagney, critics denounced it. McCoy continued to work on story treatments and screenplays, and his final novel, Scalpel (1952), proved to be his only best-seller.

While he lived, McCoy never enjoyed literary recognition in America, though he maintained an enthusiastic readership in Europe. When he died, his New York Times obituary noted that the French considered McCoy a "peer of Hemingway and Steinbeck." The success of Sydney Pollack's 1969 movie version of They Shoot Horses, Don't They? prompted American literary historians to take his work seriously. Although some critics consider Kiss Tomorrow Good-Bye his best work, McCoy's reputation rests on his first novel.

Sources

William F. Nolan. "Horace McCoy's Objective Lyricism," in Tough Guy Writers of the Thirties, edited by David Madden. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1979, pp. 137–162.

Nolan. "Lost Among the Black Mask Boys," Armchair Detective, 17 (Spring 1984): 136–143.

Winchell, Mark Royden. Horace McCoy. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1982.

—Christopher Metress

McCullers, Carson (1917–1967) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

The Georgia-born Carson Smith McCullers studied music in New York City and creative writing at Columbia University. She published her first story in 1936 and in 1940 produced an impressive first novel, The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter, a work that is often identified as part of the Southern Gothic tradition. Like her close friend Tennessee WILLIAMS, McCullers was attracted to characters who were outcasts from conventional society and usually set her work in the South.

In 1941 McCullers published Reflections in a Golden Eye, a novel about a homosexual army officer stationed in a Southern camp. Her most famous work is The Member of the Wedding (1946), which Williams helped her turn into a successful play (produced 1950). Both the novel and the play center on Frankie, a young girl growing up in the South with a sense of alienation.

Many of McCullers's novels and stories have a melodramatic quality that lend themselves to dramatization. In 1963 Edward Albee dramatized her novella The Ballad of the Sad Cafe (1951), which features a relationship between a hunchback and a tall, powerful woman. Important posthumous publications are The Mortgaged Heart (1971), a collection of essays; Collected Stories of Carson McCullers (1987); and Illumination and Night Glare: The Unfinished Autobiography of Carson McCullers (1999).

Sources

- Carr, Virginia Spencer. The Lonely Hunter: A Biography of Carson McCullers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.
- Carr. Understanding Carson McCullers. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990.
- Clark, Beverly Lyon, and Melvin J. Friedman, eds. Critical Essays on Carson McCullers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

McKay, Claude (1890–1948) poet, novelist

I have nothing to give but my singing. All my life I have been a troubadour wanderer, nourishing myself mainly on the poetry of existence.

—A Long Way from Home (1937)

Born in rural Jamaica, Claude McKay became one of the most versatile and forceful voices of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. His early influences include his brother, a teacher who introduced him to European literature and philosophy, and Walter Jekyll, a white British expatriate and folklorist who urged McKay to write about his land and people. In the poetry collections Songs of Jamaica (1912) and Constab Ballads (1912), McKay employs the voices of farmers, street constables, and other common people to express in their native dialect the joys and pains of human relationships and the love of the simple country life and the countryside of Jamaica.

McKay first encountered the intense racism of the segregated United States when he attended Tuskegee and Kansas State College. In 1914 he moved to New York City, where he published two of his best-known poems: “The Harlem Dancer” (1917) and “If We Must Die” (1919), a protest poem written about the race riots of that year. From 1919 to 1922 McKay worked for socialist publications, The Liberator in New York and Worker’s Dreadnought in London. The poems he collected in Harlem Shadows (1922) demonstrate his continuing affection for his homeland and common people, but in sonnets such as “America,” “The Lynching,” and “If We Must Die,” he voices outrage and defiance over American racism and violence.

After the publication of Harlem Shadows, McKay traveled to the Soviet Union to attend an international meeting of socialists. He remained abroad for twelve years, living in France, Spain, and Morocco, often in tight financial straits, and began publishing fiction. His first two novels are episodic, with the central character embodying simple, natural urges and a spontaneity that is favorably contrasted to the sterility of middle-class black characters who have assimilated into white culture. Home to Harlem (1928) follows Jake as he roams from bar to bar and woman to woman, encountering along the way Ray, an intellectual from Haiti generally seen as a spokesman for McKay. Ray reappears in Banjo: A Story Without a Plot (1929), set in the French port of Marseilles, to praise the intuitive creativity and spirit of the black characters. McKay also used Harlem and Marseilles as settings for the stories published in Gingertown (1932). His next novel, Banana Bottom (1933) continues to develop themes on the values of African identity as it follows Bitia Plant, a Jamaican woman raised in Europe by white missionaries, who reconnects with her racial roots after returning home. While McKay’s poems were generally well received and some were widely reprinted, his novels were published to mixed reviews, and only the first sold well. After he returned to the United States in 1934, McKay focused on racial nationalism rather than broader class conflicts. His autobiography A Long Way from Home (1937) offers anecdotes and opinions about his literary and political experiences.

Sources

- Cooper, Wayne F. Claude McKay: Rebel Sojourner in the Harlem Renaissance. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Maxwell, William, comp. “Claude McKay.” Modern American Poetry. University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. <http://www.english.uiuc.edu/maps/poets/m\_r/mckay/mckay.htm>.
- Tillery, Tyrone. Claude McKay: A Black Poet’s Struggle for Identity. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992.

—Michael Schroeder

McTeague: A Story of San Francisco by Frank

Norris (New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1899) novel

McTeague, Frank NORRIS’s most influential novel, is an important example of NATURALISM. The title character is a practicing dentist in a poor section of San Francisco, a thick-headed, strong man with a pathetic urge toward aesthetics (he plays the concertina). He marries Trina Sieppe, a patient whom his “animal” nature has led him to kiss while she is chloroformed. After Trina wins $5,000 in a lottery, her cousin Marcus Shouler, who had hoped to marry her and feels that he should have some of the money, exposes the unlicensed McTeague, who can then no longer practice his trade. Trina becomes possessive of her money; McTeague then deserts her but returns to murder her. He flees to Death Valley, pursued by Shouler. Although McTeague manages to kill his nemesis, before he dies Shouler handcuffs himself to McTeague, dooming him to a slow death in the unrelenting heat of the desert. Chance, circumstance, and nature control the actions of all these characters.

The dominant theme of the novel is the pervasive power of money. Distributed haphazardly, money comes to rule the passions not only of secondary characters but also of Trina and McTeague. Trina controls her husband by denying him money and hoarding it. While McTeague expresses his sexuality directly, Trina comes to substitute gold for love and sex. She uses her money to dictate the terms of their marriage. Eventually, she wounds McTeague's essential "animal" nature by refusing him when he is in deep need and by then selling his beloved concertina. Confronted with the option of keeping her money or using it to buy back the instrument, she chooses the former and pays with her life.

In the final episodes nature itself becomes the enemy against which the drama is played. Although McTeague manages to foil his pursuer, the harsh landscape—representative of the universe itself—has the final judgment. It defeats McTeague and Shouler and renders the gold over which they are fighting irrelevant. The simplicity of Norris's syntax and the flatness of his diction reinforce the elemental and inevitable feeling at the end of McTeague. In 1924 director Eric Von Stroheim adapted the novel as the movie Greed, one of the masterpieces of early cinema.

Source

Norris, Frank. McTeague: A Story of San Francisco: Authoritative Text, Contexts, Criticism, edited by Donald Pizer. New York: Norton, 1997.

—Roger Lathbury

Men and Brethren by James Gould Cozzens (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1936) novel

James Gould COZZENS's Men and Brethren examines parts of two days in the work of Ernest Cudlipp, the celibate vicar of St. Ambrose's Chapel in Manhattan, an Episcopal settlement house, or mission. He is motivated by his sense of duty to God's creatures whom he tries to love but does not particularly like: "A great obligation has been laid on me to do or be whatever good thing I have learned I ought to be, or know I can do."

—Morris Colden

Mencken, H. L. (1880–1956) journalist, critic

Henry Louis Mencken lived in Baltimore his entire life. He became a polymath through his own energies, after his formal education ended in 1896 with graduation as valedictorian from the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute, a high school. He worked on local newspapers as reporter, critic, columnist, and editor, while also writing for magazines. Before his career was halted by a stroke in 1948, he wrote books on a wide variety of subjects and edited two of the most influential magazines of his time. Controversial in his lifetime and still today, he was regarded as America's greatest man of letters, distinguishing himself as a journalist, essayist, philologist, satirist, political commentator, editor, and literary critic.

Mencken's primary journalistic association was with the Baltimore Sun newspaper, extending from 1906 until his stroke, and his newspaper columns were syndicated nationally. As a Jazz-Age Jonathan Swift, he took advantage of this platform to satirize war hysteria, presidents and the conventions that spawned them, book banning, the Ku Klux Klan, Prohibition, and the residual puritanism that he saw as the basis of America's ills. All his writing was directed to what he called the "civilized minority." Celebrated as the best newspaperman that America has ever produced, he remains famous for his columns on the Scopes Trial in Dayton, Tennessee (1925). The enduring popular conceptions of the issues and persons involved in the "monkey trial" are largely owed to Mencken's satiric coverage. He coined the terms "Bible Belt" and "the Sahara of the Bozart."

H. L. Mencken, 1913

With George Jean NATHAN he edited THE SMART SET from 1914 through 1923, after which they left to found THE AMERICAN MERCURY. This association lasted until 1925; Mencken then became sole editor until 1933. These were among the most significant magazines of the era, leading promoters of the new writing. Always a champion of free speech, Mencken famously challenged Boston puritanism by going to court over the city's banning of the April 1926 issue of The American Mercury because it published Herbert Asbury's "Hatrack," a chapter from his autobiography that discussed the poor treatment a small-town prostitute received from Christians. Mencken helped clear the way for the REALISM and NATURALISM now taken for granted, championing authors Theodore DREISER and Sinclair LEWIS (and publishing James Joyce for the first time in America). He also encouraged women writers and gave unprecedented space to African American authors.

Mencken's George Bernard Shaw: His Plays (1905) was the first book on Shaw; The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1908) was the first in English on Nietzsche. Mencken also co-translated two plays by Henrik Ibsen (1909) and was among the

Cover for the first issue of The Smart Set that was edited by Mencken and George Jean Nathan earliest in this country to praise Joseph Conrad. Partly because of his German heritage, Mencken opposed America's entry into WORLD WAR I and openly supported Germany, which he felt was being treated unfairly. When censorship prevented him from expressing these opinions and caused a hiatus in his work for the Sun, he worked on three of his best books. In Defense of Women (1918) is a wry look at the newly emancipated woman of his time. Mencken's groundbreaking essays on Conrad, Dreiser, James Gibbons Huneker, and puritanism collected in A Book of Prefaces (1917) began his long association with the firm of ALFRED A. KNOPF. Another Knopf production was the monumental The American Language (1919; fourth edition, 1936; two supplements, 1945, 1948). It remains the most readable survey of the subject and has led many to call Mencken the American Samuel Johnson.

In the six-volume Prejudices series (1919–1927), Mencken assembled some of his best essays of the decade. His political views found expression in Notes on Democracy (1926). A libertarian, Mencken became a severe critic of the New Deal policies of Franklin D. Roosevelt. He ventured into theology and morality with Treatise on the Gods (1930) and Treatise on Right and Wrong (1934). These theoretical works are counted among his least successful. Nostalgic reminiscences written for THE NEW YORKER were collected into Happy Days (1940), Newspaper Days (1941), and Heathen Days (1943).

As Mencken stipulated, three autobiographical works were kept sealed until after his death: The Diary of H. L. Mencken (1989), My Life as Author and Editor (1993), and Thirty-five Years of Newspaper Work (1994). They continued his project of “stirring up the animals,” causing a national debate over his alleged bigotry. No one has replaced H. L. Mencken; no American writer has had the authority that he exercised in the first three decades of the twentieth century, when his public role was defined by Edmund WILSON as “the civilized consciousness of modern America.”

—Richard J. Schrader

Principal Books by Mencken

- Ventures into Verse*. Baltimore: Marshall, Beck & Gordon, 1903.
- George Bernard Shaw: His Plays*. Boston & London: Luce, 1905.
- The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche*. Boston: Luce, 1908.
- Men versus the Man: A Correspondence between Robert Rives La Monte, Socialist, and H. L. Mencken, Individualist*. New York: Holt, 1910.
- What You Ought to Know About Your Baby*, by Mencken, ghostwritten for Leonard Keene Hirshberg. New York: Butterick, 1910.
- The Artist, A Drama Without Words*. Boston: Luce, 1912.
- Europe After 8:15*, by Mencken, George Jean Nathan, and Willard Huntington Wright. New York: John Lane, 1914.
- A Book of Burlesques*. New York: John Lane, 1916. Revised edition, New York: Knopf, 1920.
- A Little Book in C Major*. New York: John Lane, 1916.
- A Book of Prefaces*. New York: Knopf, 1917.
- Pistols for Two*, by Mencken and Nathan, as Owen Hatteras. New York: Knopf, 1917.
- Damn! A Book of Calumny*. New York: Philip Goodman, 1918. Republished as A Book of Calumny. New York: Knopf, 1918.
- In Defense of Women*. New York: Philip Goodman, 1918. Revised edition, New York: Knopf, 1922.
- The American Language: A Preliminary Inquiry into the Development of English in the United States*. New York: Knopf, 1919. Revised and enlarged editions, 1921, 1923. Corrected, enlarged, and rewritten edition, New York: Knopf, 1936. Supplement I. New York: Knopf, 1945. Supplement II. New York: Knopf, 1948.
- Prejudices: First Series*. New York: Knopf, 1919.
- The American Credo: A Contribution Toward the Interpretation of the National Mind*, by Mencken and Nathan. New York: Knopf, 1920.
- Heliogabalus: A Buffoonery in Three Acts*, by Mencken and Nathan. New York: Knopf, 1920.
- Prejudices: Second Series*. New York: Knopf, 1920.

Prejudices: Third Series. New York: Knopf, 1922.
Prejudices: Fourth Series. New York: Knopf, 1924.
Notes on Democracy. New York: Knopf, 1926.
Prejudices: Fifth Series. New York: Knopf, 1926.
Prejudices: Sixth Series. New York: Knopf, 1927.
James Branch Cabell. New York: McBride, 1927.
Treatise on the Gods. New York & London: Knopf, 1930. Revised edition, New York: Knopf, 1946.
Making a President: A Footnote to the Saga of Democracy. New York: Knopf, 1932.
Treatise on Right and Wrong. New York: Knopf, 1934.
The Sunpapers of Baltimore, 1837–1937, by Mencken, Gerald W. Johnson, Frank R. Kent, and Hamilton Owens. New York: Knopf, 1937.
Happy Days, 1880–1892. New York: Knopf, 1940.
Newspaper Days, 1899–1906. New York: Knopf, 1941.
Heathen Days, 1890–1936. New York: Knopf, 1943.
Christmas Story. New York: Knopf, 1946.
A Mencken Chrestomathy. New York: Knopf, 1949.
The Vintage Mencken, edited by Alistair Cooke. New York: Vintage, 1955.
A Carnival of Buncombe, edited by Malcolm Moos. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1956.
Minority Report: H. L. Mencken's Notebooks. New York: Knopf, 1956.
The Bathtub Hoax, and Other Blasts & Bravos from the Chicago Tribune, edited by Robert McHugh. New York: Knopf, 1958.
H. L. Mencken on Music, edited by Louis Cheslock. New York: Knopf, 1961.
H. L. Mencken: The American Scene, a Reader, edited by Huntington Cairns. New York: Knopf, 1965.
H. L. Mencken's Smart Set Criticism, edited by William H. Nolte. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1968.
The Young Mencken: The Best of His Work, edited by Carl Bode. New York: Dial, 1973.
A Gang of Pecksniffs, and Other Comments on Newspaper Publishers, Editors and Reporters, edited by Theo Lippman Jr. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1975.
Mencken's Last Campaign: H. L. Mencken on the 1948 Election, edited by Joseph C. Goulden. Washington, D.C.: New Republic Book Company, 1976.
The Editor, the Bluenose, and the Prostitute: H. L. Mencken's History of the "Hatrack" Censorship Case, edited by Bode. Boulder, Colo.: Roberts Rinehart, 1988.
The Diary of H. L. Mencken, edited by Charles A. Fecher. New York: Knopf, 1989.
The Gist of Mencken: Quotations from America's Critic, edited by Mayo DuBasky. Metuchen, N.J. & London: Scarecrow Press, 1990.
Tall Tales and Hoaxes of H. L. Mencken, edited by John W. Baer. Annapolis, Md.: Franklin Printing, 1990.
The Impossible H. L. Mencken: A Selection of His Best Newspaper Stories, edited by Marion Elizabeth Rodgers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1991.

Cover for the first issue of the literary magazine founded by Mencken and Nathan

My Life as Author and Editor, edited by Jonathan Yardley. New York: Knopf, 1993.
Thirty-five Years of Newspaper Work, edited by Fred Hobson, Vincent Fitzpatrick, and Bradford Jacobs. Baltimore & London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.
A Second Mencken Chrestomathy, selected and annotated by Mencken, edited by Terry Teachout. New York: Knopf, 1995.
Mencken on American Literature, edited by S. T. Joshi. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2002.
H. L. Mencken on Religion, edited by Joshi. Amherst, N.Y.: Prometheus, 2002.
Mencken's America, edited by Joshi. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2004.
a.k.a. H. L. Mencken: Selected Pseudonymous Writings, edited by S. L. Harrison. Miami, Fla.: Wolf Den Books, 2005.
A Religious Orgy in Tennessee: A Reporter's Account of the Scopes Monkey Trial, introduction by Art Winslow. Hoboken, N.J.: Melville House, 2006.

Studying H. L. Mencken

Betty Adler's H.L.M.: The Mencken Bibliography (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1961) provides a comprehensive list of works by and about Mencken. Adler and Vincent Fitzpatrick compiled supplements in 1971 and 1986, bringing the record down to 1981. Their work is regularly updated in the issues of Menckenia: A Quarterly Review. Some additional items were included in Allison Bulsterbaum's H. L. Mencken: A Research Guide (New York & London: Garland, 1988). For the publishing history of Mencken's books, see Richard J. Schrader's H. L. Mencken: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1998).

Earlier biographies have been superseded by Fred Hobson's Mencken: A Life (New York: Random House, 1994), Terry Teachout's The Skeptic: A Life of H. L. Mencken (New York: HarperCollins, 2002), and Marion E. Rodgers's Mencken: The American Iconoclast (Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 2005). Hobson had the advantage of writing after Mencken's posthumous memoirs had appeared and access to his letters was no longer restricted. Rodgers exhaustively canvassed nearly all remaining archives. Still of value because of their authors' personal acquaintance with Mencken are William Manchester's Disturber of the Peace (New York: Harper, 1950; second edition, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986) and Sara Mayfield's The Constant Circle (New York: Delacorte, 1968).

Mencken, who was estimated by his brother to have written some 100,000 letters, was in touch with hundreds of literary figures as editor, adviser, or friend. Ordinary people wrote to him as well, often contributing to The American Language. Apart from Letters of H. L. Mencken, edited by Guy J. Fargue (New York: Knopf, 1961), and The New Mencken Letters, edited by Carl Bode (New York: Dial, 1977), his epistles are gathered in two-way collections with Theodore Dreiser (1986), his early publisher Philip Goodman (1996), the novelist John Fante (1989), the poet George Sterling (2001), and the scientist P. E. Cleator (1982). Some of the women in his life are represented by letters to Gretchen Hood (1986), Marion Bloom (1996), and his wife Sara Haardt (1987). Adler's Man of Letters: A Census of the Correspondence of H. L. Mencken (Baltimore: Enoch Pratt Free Library, 1969) is an incomplete guide.

A useful introduction to Mencken's careers is H. L. Mencken: A Documentary Volume, edited by Schrader (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 222. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Group, 2000). Also recommended are the essays in On Mencken, edited by John Dorsey (New York: Knopf, 1980), and Critical Essays on H. L. Mencken, edited by Douglas C. Stenerson (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987). The best general study is Fitzpatrick's H. L. Mencken (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 2004), and another good overview is provided by William H. A. Williams's H. L. Mencken Revisited (New York: Twayne, 1998). For his magazine editorships, see Carl R. Dolmetsch's The Smart Set: A History and Anthology (New York: Dial, 1966), and M. K. Singleton's H. L. Mencken and the American Mercury Adventure (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1962). Some other reliable books that document his influence and importance are William H. Nolte's H. L. Mencken: Literary Critic (Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1966), Hobson's Serpent in Eden: H. L. Mencken and the South (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1974), Charles Scruggs's The Sage in Harlem: H. L. Mencken and the Black Writers of the 1920s (Baltimore & London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984), and Edward A. Martin's H. L. Mencken and the Debunkers (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1984).

—Richard J. Schrader

"Mending Wall" by Robert Frost (1914) poem

The opening poem in Robert Frost's second collection of poetry, North of Boston (1914), "Mending Wall" questions and explores the need for and importance of man-made boundaries. In the blank-verse narrative, the poem's speaker invites his neighbor to meet with him in the spring to repair gaps in a rock wall between their properties. As they replace the stones, the speaker's neighbor repeats a line of his father's—one of the most-quoted lines in American literature: "Good fences make good neighbors." When the speaker asks why this is the case, his neighbor only repeats what his father said, and the repeated line concludes the poem. In the speaker's superior attitude to his neighbor, whom he describes as an "old-stone savage" bearing the rocks like weapons, he himself may be seen as failing to understand the meaning of the boundaries humans sometimes require. At a Bread Loaf Writers' Conference in 1938 Frost described himself as "both a wall-builder and a wall-destroyer," aptly summing up the contradictory nature of the creative process itself.

Source

Frost, Robert. North of Boston. London: David Nutt, 1914; New York: Holt, 1915.

—Gary L. Kerley

Mercer, Johnny (1909–1976) lyricist

A Johnny Mercer song is all the wit you wished you had and all the love you ever lost.

—Frank Sinatra, Time, May 25, 1998

In an era when most songwriters were New Yorkers, the children of Jewish immigrants, John Herndon Mercer belonged to a Savannah family that could trace its ancestry back to the Revolutionary War. He grew up privileged and pampered but was intrigued by black culture and sat outside black churches to listen to the sermons and singing. As a teenager he shopped for "race" records by Bessie Smith and Ma Rainey in Savannah's black business district. He attended Woodberry Forest, a fashionable Virginia prep school, but in 1927 his father's real estate business collapsed and plans to send Mercer to college were shelved.

Pursuing his ambition of becoming an actor, Mercer moved to New York and struggled for years with bit parts until he placed the song "Out of Breath (And Scared to Death of You)" in The Garrick Gaieties (1930). The success of the song, coupled with Mercer's winning a national singing contest, helped to establish Mercer as a singer-songwriter, and he married Ginger Meehan, a chorus girl from Brooklyn. His first major hit, "Lazybones" (1933), written with composer Hoagy Carmichael, was memorable for such authentically regional lines as "How you 'spec to get your cornmeal made?" The song was a refreshing change from the confected "Dixie" songs by Tin Pan Alley songwriters. Mercer's Southern background, coupled with his early exposure to black music, gave his lyrics a distinctively vernacular character.

The success of "Lazybones" and his appearances on Paul Whiteman's radio program earned Mercer a movie contract as an actor with RKO, but he was soon dropped by the studio. While driving across Texas, back home to Savannah, Mercer created "I'm an Old Cowhand from the Rio Grande," a song that satirized Hollywood's image of the cowboy. When Bing Crosby's recording made the song a hit in 1936, Mercer found himself again back in Hollywood as a songwriter.

At Warner Bros. he was paired with Richard Whiting and wrote such witty songs as "Too Marvelous for Words" (1937) and "Hooray for Hollywood" (1938). After Whiting's death Mercer worked with Harry Warren and wrote "Jeepers Creepers" (1938), "You Must Have Been a Beautiful Baby" (1938), and other movie songs. Mercer maintained his career as a singer and performed on many radio programs. In 1939 he wrote lyrics for such songs as "Day In, Day Out," with composer Rube Bloom, and "And the Angels Sing," a klezmer melody adapted by Ziggy Elman. In 1942 Mercer, along with lyricist and Paramount executive Buddy DeSylva and record-store owner Glen Wallichs, established Capitol Records, the first major recording company on the West Coast. Mercer helped Capitol succeed by recording his own songs.

Mercer had a brief but passionate affair with Judy Garland that left him bitterly heartbroken but inspired him to write several songs that brought new emotional depth to his lyrics. With composer Harold Arlen, who shared Mercer's affinity with blues and jazz, he wrote "Blues in the Night" (1941), a song that opens with the vernacular wail of "My Momma done tole me"; brings out the poetry in such names as "Natchez," "Mobile," "Memphis," and "St. Joe"; and captures the mournful sound of a train whistle with "A whoooo-duh-whoeee." They also wrote "That Old Black Magic" (1942) and "One for My Baby (And One More for the Road)" (1943).

Mercer's remarkable success continued throughout the 1940s as he collaborated with such composers as Carmichael on "Skylark" (1941), Jerome Kern on "I'm Old Fashioned" (1942), Victor Schertzinger on "I Remember You" (1942), and David Raksin on "Laura" (1944). Still, Arlen remained his most perfectly matched collaborator, and the two wrote such songs as "My Shining Hour" (1943) and "Ac-cent-tchu-ate the Positive" (1944). For all their success in Hollywood, Mercer and Arlen longed to establish themselves on the Broadway stage. They wrote a superb score for St. Louis Woman (1946), which included such songs as "Come Rain or Come Shine"; but the book for the musical was weak, and the show closed after a disappointing run.

Mercer won his first of four Oscars for "On the Atchison, Topeka and the Santa Fe" (1946), written with Harry Warren, and his second for "In the Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening," with Carmichael, in 1951. During the 1950s Mercer continued to write for Broadway, but even when shows such as Top Banana (1951) and L'il Abner (1956) had successful runs, they did not produce enduring songs. Mercer wrote his best movie score, with Gene DePaul, for Seven Brides for Seven Brothers (1954). By the 1960s Hollywood studios were making so few original musicals that the best they could offer songwriters such as Mercer was the piecemeal work of a single theme song for a dramatic movie. Teamed with Henry Mancini, Mercer provided "Moon River" (1961) and "Days of Wine and Roses" (1962), both of which won an Academy Award.

Although Mercer feared that his failure to write lyrics for an enduring Broadway musical would erase his fame, he is regarded as one of the greatest of lyricists. While he could rhyme as elegantly as the most sophisticated New York writers, he wrote lyrics that capture the sound, the look, and the feel of the American landscape. He is especially admired for the emotional and regional range of his work and the fact that he collaborated successfully with so many different composers. To Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II, Mercer was "the most perfect American lyricist alive: American. Pure American." To Yip Harburg, Mercer was "one of our great folk poets."

Source

Furia, Philip. Skylark: The Life and Times of Johnny Mercer. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2003.

—Philip Furia

Miles, Josephine (1911–1985) poet, scholar

Educated at the University of California, Josephine Miles became a professor at Berkeley and began producing highly precise and witty poetry informed by her study of the history of poetry as a craft. Her collections include Lines at Intersection (1939), Poems on Several Occasions (1941), Local Measures (1946), Prefabrications (1955), Poems 1930–1960 (1960), Kinds of Affection (1962), Fields of Learning (1968), To All Appearances (1974), and Coming to Terms (1979). Her scholarly work includes The Vocabulary of Poetry (1946), The Continuity of English Poetic Language (1951), Eras & Modes in English Poetry (1957), Renaissance, Eighteenth Century and Modern Language in Poetry (1960), and Poetry and Change (1974).

Source

Larney, Marjorie, ed. Josephine Miles, Teaching Poet: An Oral Biography. Berkeley, Calif.: Acacia Books, 1993.

Millay, Edna St. Vincent (1892–1950) poet, playwright

Edna St. Vincent Millay first became known as the twenty-year-old author of “Renascence,” a 214-line poem in tetrameter couplets that was included in the anthology The Lyric Year (1912). The sensation caused by this mystical poem about the poet’s development and maturing apprehension of God enabled Millay to secure a scholarship to Vassar College. In 1917, the year of her graduation, she published her first book of poetry, Renascence and Other Poems, which included several sonnets, a form in which she would later excel. She then moved to Greenwich Village and acted with the PROVINCE-TOWN PLAYERS. In 1919 the players produced two of her plays that were later published, Aria da Capo (1920) and Two Slatterns and a King: A Moral Interlude (1921). In these works and other innovative verse dramas, Millay drew on Elizabethan and medieval models. Her second book of poems, A Few Figs from Thistles (1920), extolled the bohemian life with lines such as “My candle burns at both ends,” glorifying the idea of a short but intense existence. As Louis UNTERMEYER later noted, Millay’s approach fit the taste of the time: “Plain and rhetorical, traditional in form and unorthodox in spirit, it satisfied the reader’s dual desire for familiarity and surprise.” Her next book of poetry, The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems (1923), won a PULITZER PRIZE. As the first woman to win this award, Millay became a literary celebrity.

As a public figure, Millay participated in the protest over the SACCO-VANZETTI CASE, making it her subject in “Justice Denied in Massachusetts,” “Hangman’s Oak,” “The Anguish,” and “To Those Without Pity,” collected in The Buck in the Snow and Other Poems (1928). She distinguished herself in the sonnet form in Fatal Interview (1931) and Conversation at Midnight (1937). Her Collected Poems, edited by her younger sister Norma, was published in 1957.

Sources

Epstein, Daniel Mark. What My Lips Have Kissed: The Loves and Love Poems of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: Holt, 2001.
 Freedman, Diane P., ed. Millay at 100: A Critical Reappraisal. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1995.
 Milford, Nancy. Savage Beauty: The Life of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: Random House, 2001.
 Thesing, William B., ed. Critical Essays on Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York: G. K. Hall, 1993.

Miller, Henry (1891–1980) novelist, essayist

Henry Miller grew up in Brooklyn and lived in New York City for the first thirty-eight years of his life. He attended

City College, dropped out, worked at odd jobs, including five years as an employment manager for Western Union Telegraph Company, and tried to write. In 1930 he moved to Paris, where he lived for a decade before returning to the United States. His first novel, TROPIC OF CANCER (1934), a fictionalized autobiography of his first two years in the city, was published in 1934 by Obelisk Press, which became Miller’s main publisher for the works he wrote in Paris. In Black Spring (1936) and Tropic of Capricorn (1939), Miller writes of his Brooklyn experiences as well as his life in Paris. Because of Miller’s frank treatment of sex, his works were banned in the United States and Great Britain until the 1960s, but many readers admired the author for his energetic style and exploration of the sensuous side of life. His work was clearly inspired by D. H. Lawrence, and Miller was recognized by many European writers as a novelist of genius, especially after the publication of Tropic of Capricorn, generally regarded as his most ambitious work.

In 1961 Grove Press published Tropic of Cancer in the United States and successfully defended the novel in court. Miller employed first-person narrators in novels that were highly descriptive and apparently realistic, yet clearly the product of fantasy. While he amused readers with his sexual braggadocio and bawdy humor from the 1930s to the early 1960s, he came under heavy attack in the 1970s from feminists such as Kate Millet, who deemed Miller’s work demeaning to women. Miller has been defended not only by male writers such as Norman Mailer in The Prisoner of Sex (1981), but by female writers such as Erica Jong in her book The Devil at Large: Erica Jong on Henry Miller (1993).

Miller’s other major work of fiction is his trilogy, titled The Rosy Crucifixion, which includes Sexus (1949), Plexus (1953), and Nexus (1960). He also wrote a considerable body of nonfiction, including The Colossus of Maroussi: Or, The Spirit of Greece (1941), The Air-Conditioned Nightmare (1945), and Big Sur and the Oranges of Hieronymus Bosch (1957).

Sources

Dearborn, Mary. The Happiest Man Alive: A Biography of Henry Miller. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1991.
 Gottesman, Ronald, ed. Critical Essays on Henry Miller. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.
 Martin, Jay. Always Merry and Bright: The Life of Henry Miller. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra, 1978.

“Miniver Cheevy” by Edwin Arlington Robinson (1907) poem

“Miniver Cheevy,” a poem by Edwin Arlington ROBINSON, was first published in SCRIBNER’S MAGAZINE and collected in Robinson’s fourth volume of poetry, The Town Down the River (1910). Like many of Robinson’s poems, “Miniver Cheevy” is a character sketch of an emotionally tormented man, but Robinson's use of satire coupled with a playful meter lends the poem its comic effect. Critics believe Robinson intended the poem to be a mocking self-portrait. Cheevy, a romantic living in a world he finds unbearably mundane, daydreams "of Thebes and Camelot" and laments having been "born too late"—or born at all. Robinson often expressed his own discomfort at being an idealist in a society preoccupied with material gain, and, like Cheevy, he frequently sought escape through drinking.

Source

Anderson, Wallace L. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Critical Introduction. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.

—John Cusatis

Miss Lonelyhearts by Nathanael West (New York: Liveright, 1933) novel

Nathanael West's second novel, Miss Lonelyhearts (1933), a financial disaster upon publication, is now widely considered his masterpiece. The title character is a male newspaper columnist who writes placating responses to letters from pitifully forlorn readers. When he finally considers that the letters he has been exploiting are "stamped from the dough of suffering with a heart-shaped cookie knife," he undergoes an internal moral battle, symbolized by the irreverent cynicism of his editor, Shrike, and the complacent optimism of his fiancée, Betty. His own capacity for both mercy and cruelty mirrors the universe he struggles to comprehend, and his ultimate religious conversion leads ironically to his death. West's novel uses black humor to convey his vision of an alienated, spiritually crippled society seeking transcendence in illusions.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed., Nathanael West's Miss Lonelyhearts. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.

Long, Robert Emmet. Nathanael West. New York: Ungar, 1985.

—John Cusatis

Modernism

Modernism as a movement was shaped by discoveries in science and advancements in technology and various fields of thought that began to develop in the nineteenth century—including Sir James Frazer's writings on cultural anthropology and Sigmund Freud's work in psychology—that transformed the way human beings regarded themselves, their world, and their place in the world. William R. Everdale finds its origins "in an often profound rethinking of the whole mind set of the nineteenth century." Modern thought "gave up the stubborn old belief that things could be seen 'steadily and whole' from some privileged viewpoint at a particular moment" and embraced a "nonlogical, nonobjective, and essentially causeless mental universe." The catalytic event that created the modern world for many American writers was the catastrophe of WORLD WAR I, a conflict that revealed the bankruptcy of many nineteenth-century ideals.

In discussions of literature the term modernism is frequently used carelessly and imprecisely. The word modern is sometimes used as an adjective to broadly suggest when a writer was writing or a work was written. If one is told that a poem or a novel is modern but not given its date of composition or publication, then it is safe to assume only that it was written sometime after the Great War and sometime before right now.

More meaningfully, the term is used to describe an author in respect to his or her sensibility, though again the term is used broadly. Although many critics call Ernest HEMINGWAY a modernist, he is not a modernist in the same sense that Gertrude STEIN, Ezra POUND, Marianne MOORE, T. S. ELIOT, John DOS PASSOS, William FAULKNER, and Wallace STEVENS are modernists. Hemingway was a distinctive stylist and thoroughly modern in his sensibility, aware of the ideas that were shaping and changing the time in which he lived and writing works that respond to the complexities of his experience, but his innovative techniques are so subtle and controlled that his works cannot be considered experimental or "difficult."

But Stein, Pound, Eliot, Moore, Dos Passos, Faulkner, Stevens, and other modernists—sometimes called High Modernists—were far more experimental in their techniques than Hemingway and created works that often made extraordinary demands upon readers. The American expatriates Pound and Eliot were key figures in the movement, and Eliot's THE WASTE LAND (1922), a poem he wrote with Pound's advice, along with James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), are the great landmarks of literary modernism in English. The innovative works of modernists are marked by ambiguity and multiple interpretations of events, the use of myth as a structural device, and such techniques as STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS, fragmentation, flashbacks, and other manipulations of time. Prose writers and poets were affected by movements in painting such as Impressionism, Expressionism, and Cubism as well as the developments in the art of moviemaking and tried to create new stylistic techniques.

Notable works of High Modernism include Stein's Three Lives (1909), Tender Buttons (1914), and THE MAKING OF AMERICANS (1925); Eliot's "THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK" (1917) and FOUR QUARTETS (1943); Pound's Hugh Selwyn Mauberly (1920) and THE CANTOS, which he began publishing in 1917 and worked on until his death in 1973; Eugene O'NEILL's THE EMPEROR JONES (produced 1920), The Hairy Ape (produced 1922), STRANGE INTERLUDE (produced 1928), and MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA (produced 1931); Jean TOOMER's Cane (1923); Dos Passos's MANHATTAN TRANSFER (1925) and his U.S.A. trilogy (1938); Hart CRANE's THE BRIDGE (1931); Faulkner's THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929), AS I LAY DYING (1930), and ABSALOM, ABSALOM! (1936); and Djuna BARNES's Nightwood (1937).

Sources

Barbour, Scott, ed. American Modernism. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.

Everdell, William R. The First Moderns: Profiles in the Origins of Twentieth-Century Thought. Chicago & London: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Hegemen, Susan. Patterns for America: Modernism and the Concept of Culture. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Hoffman, Michael J., and Patrick D. Murphy, eds. Critical Essays on American Modernism. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

—George Parker Anderson

The Modern Library

The Modern Library was launched in 1917 by Albert Boni and Horace LIVERIGHT to publish well-bound literary classics for 60¢—later raised to 95¢. In 1925 the imprint was sold to Bennett Cerf and Donald Klopfer, who enlarged the line and added the Modern Library Giants in 1931. Before paperbacks, the Modern Library dominated the quality-reprint field. Cerf and Klopfer expanded the editorial scope of their company in 1927 and changed its name to RANDOM HOUSE.

—Morris Colden

Monroe, Harriet (1860–1936) editor, poet

The Chicago-born Harriet Monroe first gained fame as the author of the Columbian Ode (1893), a poem she wrote in praise of her native city that was recited by a chorus of five thousand at the opening of the Columbia Exposition. She earned her place in American letters in 1912 by founding POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE, which she edited until her death. Monroe encouraged young poets and published poetry that was experimental and innovative. In effect, she subsidized a new generation of American poets, making sure they had a platform for their work, which was sometimes difficult and unappealing to a general audience. At the same time, Monroe maintained her respect for traditional verse forms, so that she never made poetry merely an avant-garde venture. Not only did she publish great American poets such as T. S. ELIOT, Carl SANDBURG, Ezra POUND, and Robert FROST, she also inspired others to publish LITTLE MAGAZINES and to foster difficult but important writing in prose and verse. In 1917 she and Alice Corbin Henderson published the influential collection The New Poetry: An Anthology, which was revised and enlarged as The New Poetry: An Anthology of Twentieth Century Verse in English (1923) and enlarged again in 1932. The author herself of several collections, Monroe gathered Chosen Poems: A Selection from My Books of Verse in 1935; her autobiography, A Poet's Life: Seventy Years in a Changing World was published posthumously in 1938.

Source

Cahill, Daniel J. Harriet Monroe. New York: Twayne, 1973.

The Monster by Stephen Crane (1898) novella

First published in Harper's Magazine and collected in The Monster and Other Stories (1899), The Monster is one of Stephen CRANE's lesser-known masterpieces. This story, in which Doctor Trescott and his family harbor a Negro servant horribly disfigured and driven mad by the injuries he sustained in rescuing Trescott's son from a fire, raises unsettling questions about ethics, prejudice, and social behavior in small-town America.

Sources

Gullason, Thomas. "The Symbolic Unity of 'The Monster,'" Modern Language Notes, 75 (1960): 663–668.

Hafley, James. "'The Monster' and the Art of Stephen Crane," Accent, 19 (1959): 159–165.

—Paul Sorrentino

Moody, William Vaughn (1869–1910) poet, playwright

William Vaughn Moody graduated from Harvard and beginning in 1895 taught English at the University of Chicago. Upon the publication of Moody's collection Poems (1901), which included dramatic dialogues as well as lyrics, Edwin Arlington ROBINSON wrote to tell him that he had the potential to "give American literature a new meaning in the new century."

Moody wrote a trilogy of philosophical verse dramas, none of which were produced—The Masque of Judgment (1900), The Fire-Bringer (1904), and "The Death of Eve," which was left uncompleted at his death but published in The Poems and Plays of William Vaughn Moody (1912)—in which he traced man's relationship to God from rebellion to an intended reconciliation in the final work. His most popular play was the realistic drama The Great Divide (produced 1906), in which a refined Eastern girl falls in love with a rough Westerner. Although he achieved widespread recognition in his lifetime for his poems and his verse dramas, Moody is regarded as a transitional figure.

Source

Brown, Maurice F. Estranging Dawn: The Life and Works of William Vaughn Moody. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1973.

Moore, Marianne (1887–1972) poet, editor, essayist

Literature is a phase of life: if one is afraid of it, the situation is irremediable; if one approaches it familiarly, what one says of it is worthless.

—"Two Poems," The Dial, April 1920

Marianne Moore created a place for herself among the established canonical writers of High MODERNISM. The Missouri-born Moore graduated from Bryn Mawr College, where she published poems in the college literary magazines. Her poems appeared in THE DIAL, and her second book of poetry, Observations (1924), won The Dial prize. She served as editor of The Dial from 1925 to 1929, when the magazine ceased publication. Moore's Selected Poems (1935) established her reputation as an important American poet. As her reputation grew, she became known as an eccentric member of the American literati. During the 1950s she adopted a tricorne hat and added to her celebrity through interviews. Her singularity as a person became as recognizable as her individualistic poetry. Her Collected Poems (1951) won the PULITZER PRIZE, the Bollingen Prize, and the National Book Award. The Complete Poems of Marianne Moore appeared in 1981, The Complete Prose of Marianne Moore in 1986. She published one work of nonfiction: Predilections (1955), essays on her favorite writers.

Moore's verse relies on a connection between the imagined and the perceived. She often focuses on an object as the keystone of a tightly constructed poem that leads her reader to an ethical or "useful" statement. The objects ranged, over the course of her poetic life, from animals to political figures to office furniture. Her philosophy holds that people suffer through a loss of purpose or a lack of understanding of significance. Alertness and observation can arm the human against the indifference. Self-discipline—mental, emotional and physical—is the most important armament. It leads to the highest virtues in Moore's ethics: honesty, modesty, and courage. One of her most famous lines is indicative of her philosophy and practice: "The deepest feeling always shows itself in silence; / not in silence, but restraint."

Moore's diction and syntax, even the length of her lines, are governed by the principle of self-restraint, even when she works with seemingly whimsical subject matter. Her early poems, for example, often feature unusual animals such as the ostrich, the anteater, and the jellyfish that enable the poet—and her reader—to achieve a fresh perception and allow the verse itself to create the meaning. Her acclaimed poem, "The Fish" (1918) opens with the lines, "wade / through black jade. / Of the crow-blue mussel-shells . . ." The syllable count of the lines in the first five-line stanza establishes the pattern the poet follows in the following seven stanzas, as Moore's words evoke the constant change of the sea through life and death.

Moore's disciplined, stylized, and idiosyncratic verse often makes her work difficult to pigeonhole. Other poets appreciated her work, and T. S. ELIOT and Elizabeth Bishop were among her admirers; Bishop called her "The World's Greatest Living Observer." Randall Jarrell recognized that Moore, with her style and perspective, had created "a new sort of subject."

Sources

- Costello, Bonnie, ed. The Selected Letters of Marianne Moore. New York: Knopf, 1997.
- Engel, Bernard F. Marianne Moore. New York: Twayne, 1964.
- Hall, Donald. Marianne Moore: The Cage and the Animal. New York: Pegasus, 1970.
- Sheehy, Eugene P., and Kenneth A. Lohf. The Achievement of Marianne Moore: A Bibliography, 1907–1957. New York: New York Public Library, 1958.

—Audra Himes

Moore, Merrill (1903–1957) poet

Born in Tennessee and educated at Vanderbilt University, Merrill Moore became one of the group of poets known as THE FUGITIVES. Although he pursued a career as a psychiatrist in Boston, he continued to write poetry throughout his life, publishing more than forty volumes. He specialized in writing sonnets, keeping to the convention of fourteen lines but introducing variations that critic Louis UNTERMEYER regarded as distinctively American contributions to the form. Moore's books include The Noise That Time Makes (1929), M: One Thousand Autobiographical Sonnets (1938), Clinical Sonnets (1949), and Experimental Sonnets (1956).

Sources

- Fitts, Dudley. The Sonnets of Merrill Moore. Sewanee, Tenn.: University of the South, 1939.
- Wells, Henry Willis. Poet and Psychiatrist: Merrill Moore, M.D.; A Critical Portrait with an Appraisal of Two Hundred of His Poems. New York: Twayne, 1955.

More, Paul Elmer (1864–1937) critic

Educated at Washington University and Harvard, Paul Elmer More was an editor at The Nation from 1909 to 1914. He later taught at Princeton University and produced fourteen volumes of his Shelburne Essays (1904–1936), commentaries on literature and culture. His name is often linked with Irving BABBITT as one of the founders of the NEW HUMANISM movement, which emphasized the importance of Greek classicism. Among More's other books are Platonism (1917) and Pages from an Oxford Diary (1937), an autobiography.

Sources

- Duggan, Francis X. Paul Elmer More. New York: Twayne, 1967.
- Hoeveler, J. David, Jr. The New Humanism: A Critique of Modern America, 1900–1940. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1977.

Mourning Becomes Electra (produced 1931) play

The influence of Greek tragedy upon the art of Eugene O'NEILL is most evident in Mourning Becomes Electra, a five-hour-long drama that was produced by the THEATRE GUILD, opening on October 26, 1931, and running for 157 performances. O'Neill set this reinvention of Aeschylus's Oresteia that structurally follows the original by being divided into three separate plays at the end of the American Civil War.

In the first play of the trilogy, "Homecoming," O'Neill focuses on Christine Mannon, modeled on Aeschylus's Clytemnestra. No longer in love with her husband, Ezra Mannon, a general in the Union army, Christine dreads his imminent return from the war. The Electra figure is Lavinia, the Mannon's twenty-three-year-old daughter, who resents her mother and competes with her for the affection of her father; her brother, Orin; and Adam Brant, her mother's lover. The play climaxes with the death of Ezra Mannon, who was poisoned by Christine. The second play, "The Hunted," begins with the arrival home from the war of Orin, who subsequently murders both Brant and Christine, even while still longing for his mother's love and forgiveness. In the final play, "The Haunted," set a year after the events of "The Hunted," O'Neill brings Orin and Lavinia to a full tragic reckoning as Orin commits suicide and Lavinia is left to mourn her dead, shutting herself away in the family mansion to live alone for the rest of her life in atonement.

—James Fisher

Mourning Dove (1885?–1936) novelist, folklorist

Of Okanogan and Colville descent, Mourning Dove was given the Christian name Christine Quintasket at her birth. Raised on the Colville Reservation in the state of Washington, she attended the Sacred Heart Convent in Ward, Washington, and business school in Calgary, Alberta, Canada. Her Cogewea, The Half Blood: A Depiction of the Great Montana Cattle Range (1927) is recognized as one of the first novels written by a Native American woman. Written more than a decade before its publication, the book sympathetically portrays efforts to maintain a Native American identity in a white-dominated nation. Mourning Dove also published Coyote Stories (1933), a collection of Okanagan traditional narratives. Both of these literary efforts were encouraged and edited by Lucullus Virgil McWhorter, a Euro-American businessman with a deep interest in Native American issues. In addition to her literary efforts, Mourning Dove participated in local politics, including serving on a tribal council and mediating white-Native conflicts.

Source

Jay Miller, ed. Mourning Dove: A Salishan Autobiography. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1990.

—David A. Allred

Muckraking Movement (1902–1917)

The term muckraking was taken from John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1678), which featured a character who was so busy raking the muck beneath his feet that he could not see the celestial crown above him. In a 1906 speech Theodore Roosevelt was the first to apply the term to journalists who specialized in exposing corruption in business and government. Roosevelt, who had made a name for himself as a trustbuster who broke up large industrial monopolies, agreed with the aims of reporters such as Ida TARBELL, although he did not approve of some of their methods. Thus, the term muckraker was initially used at least ambiguously if not pejoratively. Over time, as the movement spread across the country, muckrakers were widely regarded as crusaders for reform.

The advent of mass-circulation periodicals such as McClure's, Collier's, and Everybody's encouraged journalists to perform in-depth investigations, which attracted attention and increased circulation rolls for the magazines. Tarbell's investigation of Standard Oil for McClure's eventually led to her two-volume work The History of the Standard Oil Company (1904). Lincoln STEFFENS's articles in McClure's on corruption in Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago, and New York City were gathered in The Shame of the Cities (1904). Such works also influenced fiction writers, including Upton SINCLAIR, whose exposé of the meat-packing industry, The Jungle (1906), profoundly influenced public opinion and resulted in federal pure-food legislation. Another popular novel by a prominent muckraker was David Graham PHILLIPS's tale of a modern prostitute's adventures, Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise (1917). By the time the United States entered WORLD WAR I, the movement was largely spent.

Sources

Brasch, Walter M. Forerunners of Revolution: Muckrakers and the American Social Conscience. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1990.

Harrison, John M., and Harry H. Stein, eds. Muckraking: Past, Present, and Future. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1973.

Miraldi, Robert. Muckraking and Objectivity: Journalism's Colliding Traditions. New York: Greenwood Press, 1990.

Muir, John (1838–1914) naturalist

A fixture in the pantheon of conservationism and a prolific author of environmental literature, John Muir was known for his intrepid excursions into wilderness areas and for his ability to describe the natural world in artistic and scientific terms. Drawing on firsthand experiences and observations, Muir authored seven books during his lifetime and produced enough articles, essays, and letters to fill four additional books (published posthumously) and fifteen collections of newspaper and magazine articles. Included among his books is My First Summer in the Sierra (1911), a belletristic account of his sojourn into a region that remains associated with him, and Travels in Alaska (1915), a chronicle of his adventures in the last vestige of the Western frontier.

—Colin Irvine

Mumford, Lewis (1895–1990) critic, biographer

Lewis Mumford studied at City College of New York University, although he never received a degree. Herman Melville (1929), a biography that came at a time when Melville was being rediscovered, was his first important book. Mumford's reputation rests on four volumes: Technics and Civilization (1934), The Culture of the Cities (1938), The Condition of Man (1944), and The Conduct of Life (1951). His great achievement was to apply his aesthetic sensibility to architecture, to city living, and to a vision of the city as a construct built on a human scale. The impact of Mumford's ideas stretched well beyond the United States and influenced European thinkers and public figures who rebuilt Europe after WORLD WAR II. His later work, especially The Urban Prospect (1968), expresses his dismay at the way city planners have deprived cities of their human scale. Mumford's essays are collected in Interpretations and Forecasts (1973). His autobiographical books include Findings and Keepings (1975), My Works and Days (1979), and Sketches From Life (1982).

Sources

Hughes, Thomas P., and Agatha C. Hughes. Lewis Mumford: Public Intellectual. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Wojtowicz, Robert. Lewis Mumford and American Modernism: Eutopian Theories for Architecture and Urban Planning. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Murder in the Cathedral by T. S. Eliot (produced 1935) play

T. S. ELIOT's Murder in the Cathedral was written in response to an invitation to contribute a play to the 1935 Canterbury Festival. Long interested in the connection between religion and drama, Eliot responded with an historical play about Thomas à Becket. The plot concerns the conflict between Henry II and his archbishop about religious and secular power in English courts. The climax came on December 29, 1170, when the king's men entered Canterbury Cathedral and killed Becket while he was at vespers. Spontaneously embraced by the people as a martyr, Becket was canonized within two years. Henry II did penance at his tomb, and for centuries pilgrims flocked to his bejeweled shrine in the cathedral.

Eliot's play, divided into two acts written in verse separated by a prose interlude, is focused on the last month of Becket's life, with parallels to the temptation and murder of Christ. In the first part Becket is tempted with offers of pleasure, power, and martyrdom; in the interlude, he preaches a Christmas sermon in the cathedral; in the second act he is murdered. The play opens and closes with a chorus, representing the poor women of Canterbury. Influenced by Greek drama and medieval English plays, Murder in the Cathedral is part of the modern revival of verse drama. First performed in Canterbury Cathedral, it later moved to New York, opening on March 20, 1936, for a run of thirty-eight performances.

Sources

Browne, E. Martin. The Making of T. S. Eliot's Plays. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969.

Malamud, Randy. Where the Words are Valid: T. S. Eliot's Communities of Drama. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Smith, Carol. T. S. Eliot's Dramatic Theory and Practice. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Musical Theater

At the beginning of the twentieth century the American musical conformed to the European model of the operetta. Librettists at the time made little effort to craft texts that unified the spoken words and the sung lyrics. After WORLD WAR I the works of such songwriters as Irving BERLIN, Jerome KERN, George and Ira GERSHWIN, Richard Rodgers and Lorenz HART, and Cole PORTER dominated the musical stage. The plots of their shows were minimal and usually served merely as a means of introducing songs and dance performances. Hit musicals of the period, such as No, No, Nanette (produced 1924), are remembered only for their popular songs, such as "Tea for Two" by Vincent Youmans and Irving Caesar.

Audience expectations for the musical changed with the premier of SHOW BOAT in 1927. With a score by Jerome Kern and lyrics and book adapted by Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II from the novel by Edna FERBER, Show Boat was the first musical to explore the dramatic potential of the genre. Although the setting on a Mississippi River showboat allowed for traditional large production numbers, the serious plot that treated miscegenation and addictive gambling featured characters with substance and complexity previously not seen on the musical stage.

In the 1930s other musicals addressed contemporary social issues. The first musical to win the PULITZER PRIZE, Of Thee I Sing (produced 1931), words by Ira Gershwin and music by George Gershwin, book by George S. KAUFMAN and Morrie Ryskind, not only had a satirical edge to its presentation of American institutions, but also relied on the jazzy language of indigenous American music. The Gershwins, along with collyricist and colibrettist DuBose HEYWARD, extended their experiment with jazz and storytelling in Porgy and Bess (produced 1936). Subtitled a "Folk Opera" and adapted from Heyward's novel Porgy (1925), the play was performed by an all-African American cast. Pal Joey (produced 1940), with music by Rodgers and Hart and a libretto by John O'HARA adapted from his short-story series, continued the development of the form in its rich character development of unsympathetic characters and further integration of songs and action.

Richard Rodgers also composed the score for the pivotal American musical OKLAHOMA! (produced 1943), with lyrics and libretto by Rodgers's new partner Hammerstein, adapted from the nonmusical play Green Grow the Lilacs (1931). Like Show Boat, Oklahoma! takes place in a mythologized American past—in this case the American West of Oklahoma Indian Territory—but it also featured innovated dances choreographed by Agnes de Mille. Her work presaged the complex work of Jerome Robbins and Bob Fosse, both of whom made dance advance the story of the musical as much as its book did. With Oklahoma! the American musical established the inherent power of spectacle (songs and dance) to both enrich character complexity and reveal interior lives.

Sources

Bordman, Gerald. American Musical Theatre: A Chronicle, third edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Kislan, Richard. The Musical: A Look at the American Musical Theater, revised, expanded edition. New York: Applause, 1995.

Mordden, Ethan. Better Foot Forward: The History of American Musical Theatre. New York: Grossman, 1976.

Swain, Joseph P. The Broadway Musical: A Critical and Musical Survey. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

Mutiny on the Bounty by Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall (Boston: Little, Brown, 1932) novel

Mutiny on the Bounty is the first novel of an immensely popular trilogy, the most successful collaboration of two writers who met during their service in WORLD WAR I. Based on actual events, the story of the mutiny against Captain Bligh sets a principled but harsh captain against a compassionate but insubordinate officer. The story is continued in Men Against the Sea (1934) and Pitcairn's Island (1934). Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall collaborated on a dozen books, the first of which was a two-volume history they edited, The Lafayette Flying Corps (1920).

Source

Briand, Paul L. In Search of Paradise: The Nordhoff-Hall Story. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1966.

My Ántonia by Willa Cather (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1918) novel

Widely regarded as Willa CATHER's masterpiece, My Ántonia focuses on the friendship between the narrator Jim Burden, an orphan from Virginia who joins his grandparents on the Nebraska prairie in the early 1880s, and Ántonia Shimerda, a Bohemian immigrant girl who lives on a neighboring farm. The two characters enjoy an intense but platonic relationship that is threatened by many events, including the suicide of Ántonia's father, Jim's relocation to the town of Black Hawk, and Ántonia's seduction by a railroad employee and subsequent unwed motherhood. Jim's pursuit of his professional ambitions, which ultimately carry him far from the prairie where Antonia remains rooted, also tests their friendship. In the final section, Jim, now a middle-aged attorney locked in a socially advantageous but loveless marriage, returns to Nebraska after a twenty-year absence and finds Antonia still living on the land, married to a fellow Bohemian, and surrounded by children. Gazing at Antonia, who is no longer beautiful but undiminished in spirit, Jim feels reconnected to "the precious, incommunicable past." Though not a commercial success initially, My Ántonia secured Cather's reputation as the premier American novelist of the Great Plains.

Source

Cather, Willa. My Ántonia. Willa Cather Scholarly Edition, edited by Charles Mignon and Kari Ronning. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

—Steven Trout

Macdonald, Ross (1915–1983) novelist

*I felt uprooted from the time my parents separated.
It was a good background for a novelist, but not for anything else I can think of.*

—Interview (1971)

John Macdonald, John Ross Macdonald, and Ross Macdonald are pseudonyms for the writer Kenneth Millar, who was born in Los Gatos, California, to Canadian parents. After his family moved to Vancouver, British Columbia, his father abandoned his mother and him; he was three years old when his father left, and he was six when his mother took him as far as the gates of an orphanage before deciding not to leave him. He estimated that by the age of eighteen he had lived in fifty houses. These early experiences of abandonment informed his later fiction.

Macdonald received his A.B. with honors from the University of Western Ontario in 1938. The day after he graduated, he and Margaret Ellis Sturm were married. When Margaret Millar began publishing mysteries in the early 1940s, Kenneth acted as her editor. Her success as a writer contributed to his later decision to adopt a pseudonym. (He afterward abandoned the name John Macdonald to avoid confusion with the writer John D. MacDonald.)

Macdonald completed coursework for his doctorate at the University of Michigan in 1943 and published his first book, The Dark Tunnel (1944), a spy novel. He served in the navy during WORLD WAR II and was shipboard when he wrote his second novel, Trouble Follows Me (1946).

Lew Archer first appeared in The Moving Target (1949), his fifth novel. Archer, who is featured in eighteen of his novels, allowed the author to examine themes of lost fathers, broken families, and suffering children. Yet, as Macdonald noted in Self Portrait: Ceaselessly into the Past (1981), a posthumously published collection of essays, “Archer is not a fantasy projection of . . . my personal needs. . . . He is . . . a consciousness in which the meanings of other lives emerge.” While generated from a life of deprivation, Archer does not tell a story directly about that deprivation. New themes arose over the course of Macdonald’s thirty-year career; for example, his 1951 The Way Some People Die introduced the first of a series of women whose homicidal instincts stem from insecurity.

Macdonald returned to graduate school and was granted his Ph.D. in English from the University of Michigan in 1952. His writing reflects a broad grasp of literature, thematically referencing Greek drama, providing subtle cross-references to other works, and directly paying homage to influential writers—for example, Macdonald’s Black Money (1966) is a reworking of F. Scott Fitzgerald’s The Great Gatsby (1925). Other significant publications include The Barbarous Coast (1956), the first novel to be published under the name of Ross Macdonald, which Macdonald described as characterized by a newfound “social and moral complexity,” and The Galton Case (1959), considered by many, including Macdonald, to be his breakthrough novel. With The Galton Case—the story of a murdered father and the son who is left behind—Macdonald felt he had created “a more ordered world where fiction lays out its concentrated, terrifying versions of the truth.” For Macdonald, the sins of the past return. The past is never finished.

Books following The Galton Case include The Wycherly Woman (1961), The Zebra-Striped Hearse (1962), The Chill (1964), and The Far Side of the Dollar (1965). The Goodbye

Look (1969) was Macdonald's first best-seller. In The New York Times Book Review, William Goldman called Macdonald's Lew Archer books "the finest series of detective novels ever written by an American." Two years later another best-seller, The Underground Man (1971), was favorably reviewed by Eudora Welty in The New York Times Book Review. Macdonald's style, she wrote, is one of delicacy and tension, very rightly made, with a spring in it. It doesn't allow a static sentence or one without pertinence. And the spare, controlled narrative, built for action and speed, conveys as well the world through which the action moves and gives it meaning, brings scene and character, however swiftly, before the eyes without a blur.

Working to expand the psychological and literary nature of hard-boiled detective fiction, Macdonald aimed to bring the genre back to mainstream literature, "where it began." He consistently recognized his debt to Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler. But though Macdonald inherited the genre, his work was never imitative.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. Ross Macdonald. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984.

Gale, Robert L. A Ross Macdonald Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Nolan, Tom. Ross Macdonald: A Biography. New York: Scribner, 1999.

—Elizabeth Leverton

Madhubuti, Haki R. (1942– ) poet, essayist

Born Don L. Lee in Little Rock, Arkansas, Haki Madhubuti served in the U.S. Army from 1960 to 1963 and received his associate's degree from Chicago City College in 1966. He attended Roosevelt University in Chicago and later earned his M.F.A. at the University of Iowa (1984). A strong voice in the Black Power and Black Arts movements, he achieved early success with his strident poetry collections Think Black (1967) and Black Pride (1967). In 1967, with two colleagues, he founded Third World Press in Chicago to publish the works of African American writers. Dynamite Voices: Black Poets of the 1960s (1971) was a basic work in the development of the BLACK AESTHETIC, which argued for literary values that reflect black cultural experience. Madhubuti traded his "slave name" for his Swahili name in 1973, prior to the publication of Book of Life, a collection whose title poem begins, "You will recognize your brothers / by the way they act and move through the world." The poem concludes, "You will recognize these brothers / and they will not betray you." Claiming Earth: Race, Rage, Rape, Redemption: Blacks Seeking a Culture of Enlightened Empowerment (1994) is a collection of essays that emphasize the individual's responsibility to embrace and express his culture. Madhubuti has written more than twenty-five books of poetry and essays. His volumes of poetry include Directionscore: Selected and New Poems (1971), GroundWork: Selected Poems of Haki R. Madhubuti (1996), Heart Love: Wedding & Love Poems (1998), and Run toward Fear: New Poems and a Poet's Handbook (2004). He is professor of English and director of the Gwendolyn Brooks Center at Chicago State University.

Source

Jennings, Regina. Malcolm X and the Poetics of Haki Madhubuti. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006.

Mailer, Norman (1923–2007) novelist, journalist, biographer

Look, most writers who are timid are afraid of pissing people off, because they feel they'll lose part of their audience. My feeling has always been that one mustn't be afraid of that. It's much better to write with the notion that if you're good enough, you can change people's lives.

—Interview (2007)

Born in Long Branch, New Jersey, where his relatives had a seaside resort business, Norman Mailer moved with his parents and sister to Brooklyn, New York, where he attended public schools before going to Harvard to earn a bachelor's degree in engineering in 1943. In college Mailer realized that he wanted to be a writer. By the time he was drafted in 1944, he had already written several short stories—including an impressive depiction of combat in war—and two novels, and during the war he experienced limited but valuable periods of combat. Influenced by James T. Farrell and John Dos

Norman Mailer

Dust jacket for Mailer's first novel, a highly regarded best-seller about World War II

Passos, Mailer was determined to write a novel of WORLD WAR II that would portray in a naturalistic style not only the realities of war but also the underlying social and political significance of events. When his first novel, THE NAKED AND THE DEAD, was published in 1948 it became a best-seller, and Mailer has remained a celebrity author since.

His next novel, Barbary Shore (1951), was a COLD WAR allegory set in Brooklyn. The disturbing politics of this work (it excoriated both the United States and the Soviet Union) found little favor with critics. Mailer's third novel, The Deer Park (1955), was a study of Hollywood that received better reviews than Barbary Shore, yet did little to fulfill his promise as the great American novelist. Beginning in the mid 1950s, Mailer turned increasingly to short fiction and nonfiction as ways of testing out new styles and ideas. This period culminated in the groundbreaking Advertisements for Myself (1959), a collection that included Mailer's fiction and nonfiction, including his much-debated essay, "The White Negro" (1956), which many critics took as a rationale for urban violence.

In the 1960s as a full-time journalist, Mailer covered the national political conventions and treated politics with the imagination of a novelist. This work in NEW JOURNALISM led to two books that secured his reputation as an innovator in nonfiction: The Armies of the Night (1968), an account of the VIETNAM WAR protest at the steps of the Pentagon, and Miami and the Siege of Chicago (1968), an empathetic account of Richard Nixon and the 1968 Republican Convention. In both books Mailer the journalist and Mailer the novelist interacted with the key personalities and issues of American life and displayed a keen balance between the subjectivity of the novelist and the objectivity of the journalist.

Mailer was also writing innovative novels in the 1960s. An American Dream (1964) featured a hero, Stephen Rojack, who had served in Congress with John F. Kennedy, but who had, like Mailer himself, derailed his career. Rojack murders

Dust jacket for Mailer's 1979 "true-life novel" about Utah murderer Gary Gilmore

Dust jacket for Mailer's 1997 novel told in the first person by Jesus Christ his wife and gets away with it—a fact that outraged many reviewers of the novel. Mailer was attacked in part because his personal life came close to replicating his fiction: in 1960 he had stabbed his second wife at a party that was supposed to be the launching point for his campaign to be mayor of New York.

In the 1970s Mailer produced an experimental biography, Marilyn (1973), which raised fundamental questions about biography—how it is possible to understand another person's life, especially when individuals have many different sides or selves—as a form as well as elevating the importance of Marilyn Monroe as a key figure in the American imagination. By this point Mailer was being attacked as a male chauvinist by Kate Millet and other feminists, and his book on Monroe was dismissed by some critics as an exploitative commercial enterprise. Mailer responded to his feminist critics with The Prisoner of Sex (1971), a work of autobiography and literary criticism.

The Executioner's Song (1979), a NONFICTION NOVEL, was hailed for its grasp of the Mormon culture of Utah and for his comprehensive and sensitive portrayal of murderer Gary Gilmore, his family, friends, and victims.

Mailer's fiction includes Ancient Evenings (1983), a novel set in ancient Egypt; Tough Guys Don't Dance (1984), a crime novel; and Harlot's Ghost (1991), a novel about the CIA. Mailer investigated Lee Harvey Oswald and the Kennedy assassination in Oswald's Tale (1995). The Gospel According to the Son (1997) is a first-person account of the life of Jesus. His later work includes The Spooky Art: Thoughts on Writing, which was published in 2003. The Castle in the Forest, an imaginary psychological study of Adolf Hitler's childhood, appeared in 2007. Mailer died in New York City on November 10, 2007.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Norman Mailer. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.

Dearborn, Mary. Mailer: A Biography. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1999.

Lennon, J. M., ed. Conversations with Norman Mailer. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988.

Manso, Peter, ed. Mailer: His Life and Times. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1985.

Major, Clarence (1936– ) poet, short-story writer, essayist, editor, novelist

Born in Atlanta, Georgia, Clarence Major divided his youth between that city and Chicago, where he studied modern art and which has had an important influence on his experimental novels, especially Reflex and Bone Structure (1975) and Emergency Exit (1979). He received a Ph.D. from the Union of Experimenting Colleges and Universities in 1978. Major's delight in thwarting the conventions of narrative fiction—including the abandonment of plot, stable characters, and point of view—has caused his work to be compared to that of Ishmael REED, Thomas PYNCHON, and Donald BARTHELME. In novels such as All-Night Visitors (1969), No (1973), and My Amputations (1986), and in the short-story collection Fun and Games (1988), fiction is explored as a resource in itself—a kind of alternative reality—not as a report on reality. At the same time, he seconds Reed in believing that fiction is a comment on the disjunctions of contemporary culture and the difficulties of achieving a personal identity. Such Was the Season (1987) and Painted Turtle: Woman with Guitar (1988) are realistic explorations of African American community life and folkways and have been compared to the work of Ernest J. GAINES and Gloria NAYLOR. Major's later fiction includes Dirty Blues (1996).

Major's subjects are by no means only African American. He explores the lives of Americans in Venice in his poetry collection Surfaces and Masks (1988) and of Native Americans in another poetry collection, Some Observations of a Stranger at Zuni in the Latter Part of the Century (1989). His later poetry is collected in Poems (1998). Waiting for Sweet Betty (2002) was his eleventh volume of poetry.

Major's essays are collected in The Dark and Feeling (1974), where he argues for judging literature by its quality not its message, and Necessary Distance: Essays and Criticism (2001). In 2002 he wrote Come by Here, My Mother's Life, a memoir of the racial difficulties faced by his mulatto mother. His work as editor and lexicographer is reflected in the Dictionary of Afro-American Slang (1970) and in Juba to Jive (1994). He has also edited three influential anthologies: The New Black Poetry (1969), Calling the Wind: Twentieth-Century African-American Short Stories (1993), and The Garden Thrives: Twentieth-Century African-American Poetry (1996).

Sources

Bell, Bernard W., ed. Clarence Major and His Art: Portraits of an African American Postmodernist. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Bunge, Nancy, ed. Conversations with Clarence Major. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2002.

Malamud, Bernard (1914–1986) novelist, short-story writer

We have two lives, Roy, the life we learn with and the life we live with after that. Suffering is what brings us toward happiness.

—The Natural (1952)

A native of Brooklyn, New York, the son of Russian Jewish immigrants, Bernard Malamud grew up in New York City where he attended public grammar school. He received his B.A. in 1936 from City College and his M.A. in 1942 from Columbia

Bernard Malamud

University. He taught for many years at Oregon State University and then at Bennington College in Vermont. Along with Saul BELLOW and Philip ROTH, Malamud has had an enormous impact on post-WORLD WAR II American literature. All three were members of a large group of Jewish American writers who wrote about their ethnic identity and about the tensions of assimilation in a post-Holocaust world.

Malamud's most important novels, THE ASSISTANT (1957), The Fixer (1966), and The Tenants (1971), explore the nature of Jewish suffering, the legacy of the shtetl, and contemporary tensions between Jews and African Americans. In all his novels, even those like The Natural (1952) that do not feature Jewish characters, his protagonists must reckon with the past and take responsibility for their own actions. In much of Malamud's work there is a biblical reworking of Adam's fall from paradise. Equally important in Malamud's work is the nature of human suffering, which can sometimes lead to redemption.

Malamud's achievement in short fiction surpasses his work in the novel. He wrote many love stories, often about old men and women, as well as accounts of the strong bonds between men. His penchant for parables and fables fits well into the form of the short story. Many of his stories are at once whimsical and moving. In "The Jewbird," characteristic of Malamud's darker moods, a skinny crow flies into the Cohens' apartment window in the Bronx. The Yiddish-speaking bird irritates the father, who eventually kills it.

Malamud's stories have been collected in The Magic Barrel (1958), Idiots First (1963), Pictures of Fidelman: An Exhibition (1969), Rembrandt's Hat (1973), The Stories of Bernard Malamud (1983), and The People and Uncollected Stories (1989). His other novels include A New Life (1961), Dubin's Lives (1979), God's Grace (1982), and The People (1989). The last work was left uncompleted at the author's death.

Principal Books by Malamud

The Natural. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.

The Assistant. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1957.

The Magic Barrel. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1958.

A New Life. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1961.

Idiots First. New York: Farrar, Straus, 1963.

The Fixer. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1966.

A Malamud Reader, edited by Philip Rahv. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1967.

Pictures of Fidelman: An Exhibition. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1969.

The Tenants. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1971.

Rembrandt's Hat. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1973.

Dubin's Lives. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1979.

God's Grace. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1982.

The Stories of Bernard Malamud. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1983.

Long Work, Short Life. Bennington, Vt.: Bennington College, 1985.

Dust jacket for Malamud's third book, his first collection of stories

The People and Uncollected Stories, edited by Robert Giroux. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1989.

Talking Horse: Bernard Malamud on Life and Work, edited by Alan Cheuse and Nicholas Delbanco. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.

Studying Bernard Malamud

In order to more fully understand Bernard Malamud's literary career, one must look at his entire body of work, including his novels, short stories, and observations on writing. A good sampling of his work is included in A Malamud Reader, edited by Philip Rahv (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1967), which includes excerpts from his major novels and a selection of his best-known stories. The Complete Stories by Malamud (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1998) includes all fifty-five of his short stories and offers an introduction to Malamud's work by his long-time editor, Robert Giroux.

Talking Horse: Bernard Malamud on Life and Work, edited by Alan Cheuse and Nicholas Delbanco (New York: Columbia, 1996), includes selections from Malamud's notebooks, essays, unpublished manuscripts, lectures, and letters, in which he comments on the art and practice of writing. Conversations with Bernard Malamud, edited by Lawrence M. Lasher (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1991), is a collection of interviews with Malamud discussing his short stories, each of his novels, and his views on writing.

The only full-length biography of Malamud is Philip Davis's Bernard Malamud: A Writer's Life (New York: Oxford University, 2007), which explores the life and times of Malamud and includes an analysis of his work. In My Father Is a Book: A Memoir of Bernard Malamud (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2006), Malamud's daughter Janna Malamud Smith offers a personal account of Malamud's life as a father and a writer and reveals the autobiographical nature of his fiction. The Magic Worlds of Bernard Malamud, edited by Evelyn Gross Avery (Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001), compiles the personal recollections of Malamud's family, close friends, and colleagues.

Dust jacket for Malamud's fourth book, 1961, which he called "an 'American novel' . . . different from any I have done"

Dust jacket for the 1983 volume of works chosen and arranged by the author from his earlier story collections. Two of the stories, "God's Wrath" and "The Model," were previously uncollected.

For primary bibliography, students should consult Rita N. Kosofsky's Bernard Malamud: A Descriptive Bibliography (New York: Greenwood Press, 1991). Bernard Malamud: A Reference Guide by Joel Salzberg (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985) is a useful annotated secondary bibliography published the year before Malamud's death; it needs updating.

Bernard Malamud and His Critics, edited by Leslie A. Field and Joyce W. Field (New York: New York University Press, 1970), provides an introduction to criticism of Malamud's work. Bernard Malamud: A Collection of Critical Essays (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975), also edited by the Fields, includes essays on identity, the Jewish movement, race, and ethnicity. In Bernard Malamud Revisited (New York: Twayne, 1993), Edward Abramson reflects on Malamud's fiction in its entirety and provides a comprehensive analysis. Several critics have evaluated Malamud as a Jewish American author. Works like Iska Alter's The Good Man Dilemma: Social Criticism in the Fiction of Bernard Malamud (New York: AMS Press, 1981), Avery's Rebels and Victims: The Fiction of Richard Wright and Bernard Malamud (Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1979), and Warren Rosenberg's Legacy of Rage: Jewish Masculinity, Violence, and Culture (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2001) deal explicitly with Malamud's ethnic background and/or the ethnicity of his characters. Other critical works are Bernard Malamud, a collection of critical essays edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 1986); Kathleen Ochshorn's The Heart's Essential Landscape: Bernard Malamud's Hero (New York: Peter Lang, 1990); Critical Essays on Bernard Malamud, edited by Joel Salzberg (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987); and Understanding Bernard Malamud by Jeffrey Helterman (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1985).

The majority of Malamud's papers are in the Library of Congress's manuscript division. However, there is also a collection at the Harry Ransom Research Center at the University of Texas, Austin, and in the Special Collections Library at Oregon State University.

—Student Guide by Meeghan Kane

Mamet, David (1947– ) playwright

The film of comedy is such that in every scene, the hero makes a misstep and yet is rescued at the end by the forces of good, or by God, or by a deus ex machina. Tragedy is exactly the opposite. At each step, the hero seems to be doing the correct thing, but at the end of the movie ends up consigned to perdition, or death, or disgrace, because of some internal flaw.

—Interview (1997)

David Mamet was born and raised on the Jewish South Side of Chicago. After completing his undergraduate work at Goddard College in Vermont, he studied acting at the Neighborhood Playhouse and worked in Off-Broadway theater. He returned to Chicago in 1972, having written several short plays. Sexual Perversity in Chicago (produced 1974), his third produced play, first attracted major notices and won the first of his four Obie Awards; it was later filmed as About Last Night (1986). AMERICAN BUFFALO (produced 1975), with a characteristic mixture of profanity and insight, established Mamet as one of the most provocative playwrights of contemporary theater. It won a New York Drama Critics Circle Award and an Obie. Mamet's next major play, Glengarry Glen Ross (1983), winner of the Pulitzer Prize for drama and the New York Drama Critics Circle Award, is set in a sales office with a group of men desperately trying to peddle worthless Florida swampland. Critic Robert Brustein deemed the play better than Arthur MILLER's DEATH OF A SALESMAN. The brutal, competitive world of business is also the subject of Mamet's well-received Speed-the-Plow (produced 1988), which won a Tony for best play. Oleanna (1992) is one of his most controversial plays: it concerns a smug college professor who is accused of sexual harassment by one of his earnest female students. The play has already become a staple of college anthologies. Boston Marriage (produced 1999) is a departure from the tough, clipped language of his previous work.

Mamet has written several experimental plays, including A Life in the Theatre (produced 1977), which features a play within a play and comments from the characters on the theater and acting. Mamet has collected some of his shorter works in Short Plays and Monologues (1981), Three Children's Plays (1986), Three Jewish Plays (1987), Oh Hell: Two One-Act Plays (1991), and A Life With No Joy in It, and Other Plays and Pieces (1994).

He has been active as a screenwriter, producing original scripts for House of Games (1987), Things Change (1988), and Homicide (1992). He also adapted Glengarry Glen Ross (1992) and Oleanna (1994). His other movie credits include The Postman Always Rings Twice (1981), The Verdict (1982), The Untouchables (1985), We're No Angels (1989), Hoffa (1992), and Vanya on 42nd Street (1994). The Spanish Prisoner: and The Winslow Boy: Two Screenplays was published in 1999. Mamet has collected his writing for television in Five Television Plays (1990) and A Life in the Theatre (1993). He reflects on his movie experiences in Bambi vs. Godzilla: On the Nature, Purpose, and Practice of the Movie Business (2006).

Mamet is also a prolific novelist and essayist. His seven novels include Bar Mitzvah (1999) and Henrietta (1999). His essay collections include Writing in Restaurants (1986), Some Freaks (1989), On Directing Film (1991), The Cabin: Reminiscence and Diversions (1992), The Village (1994), A Whore's Professions: Notes and Essays (1994), Make-Believe Town: Essays and Remembrances (1996), 3 Uses of the Knife: On the Nature and Purpose of Drama (1998), and Jafsie and John Henry: Essays (1999). The Wicked Son: Anti-Semitism, Self-Hatred and the Jews (2006) is described by the publisher as "an angry collection of essays about anti-Semitism." His writing for children includes The Owl (1987; written with his wife), Warm and Cold (1988), and Passover (1995).

Sources

- Bigsby, Christopher, ed. The Cambridge Companion to David Mamet. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Kane, Leslie. Weasels and Wisemen: Ethics and Ethnicity in the Work of David Mamet. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- Kane, ed. David Mamet: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Sauer, David K., and Janice A., eds., David Mamet: A Research and Production Notebook. Westport, Conn. & London: Praeger, 2003.

The Man with the Golden Arm by Nelson Algren (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1949) novel

Along with A Walk on the Wild Side (1956), Nelson Algren's The Man with the Golden Arm (1949) is the novel upon which his reputation rests. Set in the Polish neighborhood surrounding Chicago's Division Street between the fall of 1946 and early spring 1948, the novel concerns Frankie Majcinek (known because of his skill at dealing cards as Frankie Machine or "Dealer"), who has returned from WORLD WAR II with an addiction to the morphine that was given to him to ease the pain of a shrapnel wound. He has come back to a life of petty crime and jail time, hours drinking at the Tug and Maul bar or dealing cards for Zero Schwiefka's poker games, and to his wife Sophie. The novel follows Frankie through his days, detailing the lives of Division Street's broken and defeated denizens.

The winner of the first National Book Award, The Man with the Golden Arm positioned Algren as one of most important novelists of his generation. Written in a poetic style that is both grim and comic, the novel, according to critic James R. Giles, combines a naturalistic belief in environmental determinism with Modernist complexity and the "harsh compassion" of EXISTENTIALISM. Algren wanted the humanity of society's least fortunate members sympathetically recognized. He later explained that he wanted to show that Frankie, his friend Sparrow, Sophie, and her friend Molly "were men and women like men and women everywhere, with a little less luck than most." The Man with the Golden Arm is a novel of compassion and forgiveness, mercy, and the recognition that "we are all members of one another."

Sources

- Giles, James R. Confronting the Horror: The Novels of Nelson Algren. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1989.
- Horvath, Brooke. "The Man with the Golden Arm," in Understanding Nelson Algren. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005, 66–83.
- Savage, William J., Jr., and Daniel Simon, eds. The Man with the Golden Arm, fiftieth-anniversary critical edition. New York: Seven Stories Press, 1999.

—Brooke Horvath

Manfred, Frederick (1912–1994) novelist

Born in Iowa, Frederick Manfred graduated from Calvin College in 1934 and became a journalist and then a prolific novelist, writing under the names Frederick Feikema and Feike Feikema. His fiction is set in the upper Midwest from Minnesota to South Dakota and is often about the Sioux. His rough regionalist style portrays the hard life of the land in such novels as This Is the Year (1947), The Chokecherry Tree (1948), The Primitive (1949), The Brother (1950), and The Giant (1951). His protagonist is often a young man at odds with his environment. A later novel, Scarlet Plume (1964), is about a white woman captured by the Sioux. A companion novel is The Manly-Hearted Woman (1976), which also deals with Sioux life. His stories are collected in Arrow of Love (1961) and Apples of Paradise (1968). The Wind Blows Free (1979) is based on his hitchhiking from Iowa to the Rockies in the 1930s. Manfred's essays and reminiscences were published in Prime Fathers (1987).

Source

Wright, Richard C. Frederick Manfred. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Marshall, Paule (1929– ) novelist, short-story writer

I grew up among poets. Nothing about them suggested that poetry was their calling. They were just a group of ordinary housewives, my mother included—the basement kitchen of the brownstone house where my family lived was the usual gathering place.

—“The Making of a Writer:
From the Poets in the Kitchen” (1983)

Paule Marshall was born in Brooklyn, New York, the daughter of Barbadian immigrants. Marshall attributes her affinity for fiction to her mother's storytelling powers.

Marshall graduated from Brooklyn College in 1953 and taught in college creative-writing programs. Her novel Brown Girl, Brownstones (1959) draws on the experience of her family and community, and the tensions that result when her main characters interact with whites in New York City. Soul Clap Hands and Sing (1961) is a collection of four novellas about Marshall's childhood. The Chosen Place, The Timeless People (1969) explores divided peoples on a Caribbean island. Marshall has slowly accumulated an audience and much critical praise for her elegant prose. Her later work includes the novels Praisesong for the Widow (1983), Daughters (1991), and The Fisher King (2000). She has also published Reena and Other Stories (1983), short fiction set in both Brooklyn and Barbados.

Sources

Delamotte, Eugenia C. Places of Silence, Journeys of Freedom: The Fiction of Paule Marshall. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.

Denniston, Dorothy Hamer. The Fiction of Paule Marshall: Reconstructions of History, Culture and Gender. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.

Marxist Criticism

Marxist critics interpret literature based on the social theories of nineteenth-century German philosopher Karl Marx, who believed that economic forces shape social conditions. The Marxists seek to apply Marx's theories about social class structure and the inevitability of change caused by economic tension to literature.

Mason, Bobbie Ann (1940– ) short-story writer, novelist, memoirist

I often write about characters who happen to watch TV. Most Americans do watch TV. It's a big deal in their lives, especially if they work hard at some mind-numbing job. . . . As a writer I can maintain a bit of detachment from the characters, showing them in their world and seeing a little bit more than they do. But I'm not looking down at them.

—Interview (2000)

Along with Raymond CARVER and Tobias WOLFF, Bobbie Ann Mason was one of the leading figures of the “dirty realism” movement of the 1980s. Renowned Granta editor Bill Buford coined this term to refer to stripped down, minimalist fiction that featured down-on-their-luck working-class characters living amid the arid wastelands of American consumer culture. Mason's stories of rural Kentuckians have been both applauded and derided for their repeated references to brand-name goods and pop-culture icons, while her affection for working-class characters unequipped to articulate their bewilderment helped spark a national debate about the future of the short story in America and earned her the dubious honor of being called a Kmart realist.

Mason was born in Mayfield, Kentucky, a rural town upon which she later modeled her fictional town of Hopewell, where much of her most distinctive work is set. She grew up on a farm and attended the local schools before moving to Lexington to attend the University of Kentucky, from which she graduated in 1962. After college she wrote for movie and television gossip magazines for a year, then began pursuing an advanced degree in English literature, completing her Ph.D. at the University of Connecticut in 1972. Her dissertation, a study of Vladimir NABOKOV's Ada (1969), was published two years later as Nabokov's Garden. Mason spent the rest of the decade teaching journalism in Pennsylvania, all the while pursuing her own writing.

After receiving nineteen rejection letters from The New Yorker, Mason finally landed a publication with the magazine in 1980 with her story “Offerings,” which also appeared, with fifteen other stories, in her first short-story collection, Shiloh and Other Stories (1982), winner of the Ernest Hemingway Foundation Award. It also earned nominations for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD, the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD, and the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD. The title piece remains one of the signature stories of the 1980s dirty-realist school. The protagonist is an injured trucker named Leroy who learns, while convalescing, that his wife, Norma Jean, has outgrown him. Mason informs all the otherwise mundane details of their working-class life—the tawdry string-art kits, Leroy's grounded rig, even their unsatisfying visit to a national park commemorating the Civil War Battle of Shiloh—with significance and symbolic import, thus giving eloquent voice to Leroy's inarticulate confusion.

Mason's well-received first novel, In Country (1985) addresses the lingering wound of the war in Vietnam. The protagonist, a seventeen-year-old named Samantha Hughes, goes on a quest to understand her father, who died in Vietnam, and, as a result, comes to a greater understanding about both herself and her country. The book was a national best-seller and helped solidify Mason's place as one of the most important emerging Southern writers of the 1980s.

As the 1980s drew to a close, the reaction against so-called truck-stop minimalism solidified. Many critics accused such work as being too facile and of stripping fiction of the things that make up its worth. Undaunted, Mason continued to cultivate her rich fictional soil, producing two more best-selling volumes, the novel Spence + Lila (1988) and the short-story collection Love Life (1989). In 1993 she published her most ambitious work to date, Feather Crowns, an historical novel about a Kentucky woman at the turn of the century who becomes a media phenomenon after she gives birth to quintuplets. The book won the Southern Book Award and was a finalist for the National Book Critics Circle Award. In her memoir, Clear Springs (1999), Mason recounts her experiences in rural Kentucky in the 1950s. An Atomic Romance (2005), her first novel in twelve years, is about a man with a risky job at a uranium-enrichment plant in conflict with his girlfriend, a pathologist who recognizes the danger of his work. That novel was followed by two story collections, Zigzagging Down a Winding Trail (2002) and Nancy Culpepper (2006), linked stories that cover a twenty-five-year period in the life of a woman who leaves rural Kentucky during the 1960s to pursue her education.

Source

Price, Joanna. Understanding Bobbie Ann Mason. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

The Matchmaker by Thornton Wilder (produced 1955) play

This comedy by Thornton Wilder, set in the late nineteenth century, follows the antics of characters in search of adventure and, ultimately, love. Wilder was also subtly criticizing materialistic society, especially in the play's original form, The Merchant of Yonkers, which was a critical and commercial failure in 1938. In 1955 Wilder slightly revised the play and retitled it The Matchmaker.

Dolly Levi, retained as a matchmaker by a wealthy merchant, Horace Vandergelder, spends the day in Yonkers and New York helping three couples—young lovers, bored store clerks, and a feisty widow and her assistant—to fulfill their desires. Dolly's altruism serves as a foil to Vandergelder's greed and oppression of his employees. She declares: "Money, I've always felt, money—pardon my expression—is like manure; it's not worth a thing unless it's spread about encouraging young things to grow."

As in his other plays, Wilder has characters break the "fourth wall" of the stage not only to explain his themes but also to invite the audience to participate in the sheer fun of theatrical farce. In 1964 the play was adapted as the successful musical Hello, Dolly!

Source

Wilder, Thornton. The Matchmaker. New York, Hollywood, London & Toronto: S. French, 1957.

—Lincoln Konkle

Matthiessen, F. O. (1902–1950) literary critic

We must come back where we started, to the critic's primary function. He must judge the work of art as work of art. But knowing form and content to be inseparable, he will recognize his duty to both. Judgment of art is unavoidably both an aesthetic and a social act, and the critic's sense of social responsibility gives him a deeper thirst for meaning.

—"The Responsibilities of the Critic" (1949)

Francis Otto Matthiessen is one of the most influential American literary critics of the first half of the twentieth century, particularly respected for his classic book, The American Renaissance (1941). Born in Pasadena, California, Matthiessen was educated at Yale University, Oxford, and Harvard, from which he received a Ph.D. in English literature in 1927 and where he taught for the bulk of his career. At a time when the academic study of American literature was still very much in its infancy, Matthiessen devoted himself to researching and analyzing the history of American literature within the broader context of American social and political culture. His first book, published in 1929, was a study of regional writer Sarah Orne Jewett; but it was The American Renaissance that made Matthiessen's career.

In this book Matthiessen argues that American literature officially came into its own in five years, 1850 to 1855. During that time an equal number of nineteenth-century masterpieces appeared: Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter (1850) and The House of the Seven Gables (1851), Herman Melville's Moby-Dick (1851), Henry David Thoreau's Walden (1854), and the first edition of Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855). Matthiessen argues that these five books not only represent the first burst of major American creativity unencumbered by English influence but that they also owe their distinctive Americanness, either directly or indirectly, to the work of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

In later books Matthiessen concentrated on Henry James and Theodore Dreiser, although he also published widely on the general subject of the social responsibilities and obligations of the literary critic. A posthumous collection of essays, The Responsibilities of the Critic: Essays and Reviews, appeared in 1952.

Sources

Gunn, Giles. F. O. Matthiessen: The Critical Achievement. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1975.

Stern, Frederick. F. O. Matthiessen: Christian Socialist as Critic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.

—Marshall Boswell

Matthiessen, Peter (1927– ) novelist, journalist

Born in New York City, Peter Matthiessen received his A.B. from Yale in 1950 and spent his formative years as a writer in Paris during the early 1950s, where he cofounded THE PARIS REVIEW with his childhood friends George PLIMPTON and Harold Hume and wrote his first novel, Race Rock (1954). He is best known for his fiction and nonfiction about the confrontation of indigenous cultures with exploitative outsiders and for his nature writing. He began pursuing these interests with Wildlife in America (1959), an inspiration for the environmental movement, and continued with the novels At Play in the Fields of the Lord (1965), set in the Amazon, and Far Tortuga (1975). Nonfiction on the same general topic ranges through South America, including The Cloud Forest (1961) and Under the Mountain Wall (1963); The Tree Where Man Was Born (1972) and The Snow Leopard (1978), which won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, are set in Africa. In the Spirit of Crazy Horse (1983), Matthiessen's attack on the treatment of Native Americans, prompted a $49 million lawsuit filed by an FBI agent and by a former governor of South Dakota, who felt he had been libeled; the suit was dismissed. Matthiessen's later work includes Indian Country (1984), Midnight Turney Gray: Short Stories (1984), African Silences (1991), Baikal: Sacred Sea of Siberia (1992), Lost Man's River (1997), and Bone by Bone (1999), novels set in pioneer Florida. Tigers in the Snow (2000) and Birds of Heaven: Travels with Cranes (2001) argue that human survival is linked to survival of animal and bird species. The Peter Matthiessen Reader: Nonfiction, 1959–1991 appeared in 2000.

Source

Dowie, William. Peter Matthiessen. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

McCarthy, Cormac (1933– ) novelist

On the day that followed they crossed a lake of gypsum so fine the ponies left no track upon it. The riders wore masks of bone-black smeared about their eyes and some had blacked the eyes of their horses. The sun reflected off the pan burned the undersides of their faces and shadow of horse and rider alike were painted upon the fine white powder in purest indigo.

—Blood Meridian (1985)

Cormac McCarthy was born in Providence, Rhode Island, and grew up in Tennessee. He attended the University of Tennessee from 1951 to 1952, served in the U.S. Air Force from 1953 to 1956, and when he returned to the university for two additional years in 1957, he began publishing fiction and winning awards for it. In 1965 his first novel, The Orchard Keeper, won the William Faulkner Foundation Award. The influence of Faulkner was apparent in his Southern Gothic plot, his theme of the erosion of traditional values, and his challenging style, which is coldly

Cormac McCarthy

Dust jacket for McCarthy's 1979 novel, which he said was twenty years in the making objective. His subsequent novels, Outer Dark (1968), Child of God (1973), Suttree (1979), and BLOOD MERIDIAN (1985), although they did not attract a popular audience, were highly praised by critics, who pointed to the essential moralism of McCarthy's works, despite their violence and their dark depictions of base human instincts. The dark comedy Suttree was regarded as McCarthy's most ambitious work to that time. Cornelius Suttree turns his back on money to pursue a life as a fisherman among plain people. The result is a novel that provides a precise depiction of a Southern setting. The book earned McCarthy a MacArthur Foundation grant, called a "genius grant." With Blood Meridian, McCarthy moved his setting to the Southwest, where he depicted with gruesome violence the activities of an outlaw gang engaged by the U.S. government to collect Indian scalps. With the publication of ALL THE PRETTY HORSES (1992), which won both the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, McCarthy began to attract a broader audience. Set in West Texas/New Mexico and in Mexico, the first two novels in The Border Trilogy, which also includes The Crossing (1994) and Cities of the Plain (1998), are dark coming-of-age novels in which young men are confronted with a violent and unforgiving world. In the third volume their stories intersect a terse, graphically violent account of cowboy life and adherence to strict standards of personal morality that leads to defeat. In No Country for Old Men (2005) a young antelope hunter discovers a group of murdered men, a cache of heroin, and $200,000 in cash. The novel describes the dreadful effect of that discovery. McCarthy's Pulitzer Prize-winning The Road (2006) is an account of a father and son traveling in an ashen, postapocalyptic world.

Principal Books by McCarthy

The Orchard Keeper. New York: Random House, 1965.

Outer Dark. New York: Random House, 1968.

Child of God. New York: Random House, 1974.

Suttree. New York: Random House, 1979.

Blood Meridian, or The Evening Redness in the West. New York: Random House, 1985.

All the Pretty Horses. New York: Knopf, 1992.

The Crossing. New York: Knopf, 1994.

Cities of the Plain. New York: Knopf, 1998.

No Country for Old Men. New York: Knopf, 2005.

The Road. New York: Knopf, 2006.

Dust jacket for McCarthy's 1985 novel, described as an apocalyptic Western set in South Texas and Mexico during the 1840s

Studying Cormac McCarthy

Cormac McCarthy's literary output falls neatly into two geographically themed categories. His Southern phase is made up of the four books that began his career, all of which are set in and deal with Appalachian Tennessee. These include The Orchard Keeper (1965), Outer Dark (1968), Child of God (1974), and the most accomplished work of this group, the darkly comic Suttree (1979). Beginning with the novel that critics unanimously name his masterpiece, BLOOD MERIDIAN (1985), McCarthy launched the Western phase of his career. This cycle includes the works in the Border Trilogy: ALL THE PRETTY HORSES (1992), The Crossing (1994), and Cities of the Plain (1998), as well as his later novel No Country for Old Men (2005). McCarthy's The Road (2006), which takes place in a future, postapocalyptic America, fits easily into neither of these categories.

The notoriously reclusive author has allowed very little biographical information to disseminate in the publishing world, and as a result no book-length biography has yet been attempted. The best compendium for what little is available is the Dictionary of Literary Biography (Volumes 6, 143, and 256. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 1978, 1994, 2002). Likewise, McCarthy's letters remain uncollected. The only bibliography is Diane C. Luce's article-length "Cormac McCarthy: A Bibliography" in Perspectives on Cormac McCarthy (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1993). Ending in 1993, it deals with both primary and secondary sources, including novel excerpts, reviews, news articles, and references to McCarthy in works by other writers.

To a certain degree, McCarthy scholarship is still in its infancy, and as such, no single text has arisen as the most useful companion to the author's work and life. This is further complicated by the existence of two sharply competing trajectories in McCarthy criticism. One school centered around Vereen M. Bell's The Achievement of Cormac McCarthy (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988) argues for an essential bleakness and nihilism in the writer's canon. The other, championed by Edwin T. Arnold and Luce primarily in Perspectives on Cormac McCarthy, revised edition (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999), finds a moral and eventually hopeful vision in McCarthy's work.

Other important collections that deal with McCarthy's entire corpus include Myth, Legend, Dust: Critical Responses

Dust jacket for McCarthy's 1992 novel, the first in his Border Trilogy to Cormac McCarthy, edited by Rick Wallach (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2000); James D. Lilley's Cormac McCarthy: New Directions (Albuquerque: New Mexico Press, 2002); Cormac McCarthy, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House Publications, 2002); and the selected essays from the first ever McCarthy Conference in 1993 titled Sacred Violence: A Reader's Companion to Cormac McCarthy, edited by Wade Hall and Rick Wallach (El Paso: Texas Western Press, 1995). Two critical works of more narrow focus with which students should be familiar are Arnold and Luce's A Cormac McCarthy Companion: The Border Trilogy (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001) and John Sepich's Notes on Blood Meridian (Louisville, Ky.: Bellarmine College Press, 1993).

One of the best overall sources for information about McCarthy, his work, and the scholarship that surrounds it is the official website of the Cormac McCarthy Society (<<http://www.cormacmccarthy.com>> viewed July 13, 2007). The site features biographical information, discussion forums, ongoing additions to Luce's bibliography, and other valuable resources. It also hosts the on-line version of The Cormac McCarthy Journal, which the Society publishes annually.

—Student Guide by Todd Hagstette

McCarthy, Mary (1912–1989) novelist, essayist, short-story writer

Mary McCarthy was born in Seattle, but after her parents died during the World War I influenza epidemic, she was cared for by relatives in Minneapolis. She describes her unhappy childhood and abusive guardians in Memories of a Catholic Girlhood (1957). McCarthy developed her literary aspirations at Vassar College, where she received her degree in 1933. She satirized Vassar and its students in her best-selling and controversial novel, The Group (1963).

Early on, McCarthy developed a reputation for having a sharp tongue and a tendency to include her friends and enemies in her fiction. Her first publications, however, were nonfiction. She wrote theater reviews for Partisan Review and followed the Marxist journal's fierce anti-Stalinist line. She was one of the few women to be included in the journal's inner circle of writers, which included Bernard Malamud, Saul Bellow, Philip Rahv, Delmore Schwartz, and Dwight Macdonald.

After an early marriage to and divorce from Harold Johnson, an actor, McCarthy married the critic Edmund Wilson. Although it was a stormy marriage that also ended in divorce, Wilson convinced McCarthy to turn to fiction. McCarthy began her fiction career by writing stories about a promiscuous young woman and her adventures in bohemian circles. The sexual explicitness of McCarthy's fiction brought her much attention and criticism. Her first novel, The Company She Keeps (1942), included portraits of nearly every important male figure in her early career, exposing the rivalry and competitiveness of New Yorkers.

McCarthy's other novels, The Oasis (1949), The Groves of Academe (1952), Birds of America (1971), and Cannibals and Missionaries (1979), explored the worlds of college life, politics, and terrorism. McCarthy was a forceful opponent of the VIETNAM WAR, and she published two accounts of her trips to the war front in Vietnam (1967) and Hanoi (1968). She also wrote two travel books, Venice Observed (1956) and The Stones of Florence (1959). An astringent critic, she collected her literary and political essays in Sights and Spectacles (1956), On the Contrary (1961), The Mask of State (1974), Ideas and the Novel (1980), and Occasional Prose (1985).

Although McCarthy's later autobiographical writing, How I Grew (1987) and Intellectual Memoirs (1992), has not matched the success of Memories of a Catholic Girlhood, these later books are important contributions to American intellectual and literary life. Part of McCarthy's correspondence, Between Friends: The Correspondence of Hannah

Arendt and Mary McCarthy, 1949–1975, was published in 1995. Her public feud with Lillian Hellman, after calling Hellman a liar on a television interview program, was dramatized in the Broadway play Imaginary Friends (2002) by Nora Ephron.

Sources

Gelderman, Carol, ed. Conversations with Mary McCarthy. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991.

Kiernan, Frances. Seeing Mary Plain: A Life of Mary McCarthy. New York: Norton, 2000.

Swertka, Eve, and Margo Vicusi, eds. Twenty-Four Ways of Looking at Mary McCarthy: The Writer and Her Work. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

McClure, Michael (1932– ) poet

Born in Kansas but associated for most of his career with the BEATS and the SAN FRANCISCO RENAISSANCE, Michael McClure attended the University of Wichita and the University of Arizona before moving to California. He received his B.A. from San Francisco State College in 1955, where he studied under Robert DUNCAN. McClure's poetry, often intensely personal and passionate, has been collected in volumes such as Passage (1956), For Artaud (1959), Dark Brown (1961), and Fragments of Perseus (1983). He has written several verse plays, including The Beard (produced 1965) and Gorf (produced 1974). Scratching the Beat Surface (1982) is a collection of essays. The Adventures of a Novel in Four Chapters appeared in 1991. His Huge Dreams: San Francisco and Beat Poems and Rain Mirror: New Poems were both published in 1999. Plum Stones: Cartoons of No Heaven (2002) exemplifies McClure's belief that repetition gives poetry "energy."

McCorkle, Jill (1958– ) short-story writer, novelist

Along with Clyde EDGERTON and Bobbie Ann MASON, Jill McCorkle emerged in the 1980s as one of the leading new Southern writers determined to update the dust-worn conventions of Southern storytelling for the more contemporary South of shopping malls, used-record stores, and crash diets. Born in Lumberton, North Carolina, McCorkle earned her B.A. from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where she studied writing with Southern literary critic Louis RUBIN, and she earned her M.F.A. from Hollins College in Roanoke, Virginia. In 1984 Rubin's Algonquin Books published her first two novels simultaneously, The Cheer Leader and July 7th, a risk that succeeded in attracting attention. McCorkle's first short-story collection, Crash Diet, appeared in 1992. Her other well-received books include the novels Tending to Virginia (1987), Ferris Beach (1990), and Carolina Moon (1996), and the short-story collection Final Vinyl Days and Other Stories (1998). Her third collection of short stories, Creatures of Habit, was published in 2001.

Source

Bennett, Barbara. Understanding Jill McCorkle. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

McCullers, Carson (1917–1967) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

The trouble with me is that for a long time I have been just an 'I' person.

—The Member of the Wedding (1951)

A native of Columbus, Georgia, Carson McCullers was writing fiction and drama by the age of fifteen. At seventeen she went to New York City, where she studied creative writing, first at Columbia University and the next year at New York University, where she met Whit Burnett, editor of Story Magazine. She published her first story in 1936. Her first novel, The Heart Is a Lonely Hunter (1940) is sometimes called an exercise in the Southern Gothic or grotesque. McCullers's characters did not fit into conventional society, physically or mentally.

In 1941 McCullers published Reflections in a Golden Eye (1941), a novel about a homosexual army officer stationed in a Southern camp. McCullers's most famous work is The Member of the Wedding (1946), which Tennessee Williams helped her turn into a successful play. Both the novel and the play concentrate on Frankie, a young girl growing up in the South with a sense of alienation.

Her novella The Ballad of the Sad Café (1951) features a relationship between a hunchback and a tall, powerful woman. The Mortgaged Heart, a collection of essays, appeared in 1971, and Collected Stories in 1987. Her journals, Autumn Light: Illuminations of Age, were published in 1978. Illumination and Night Glare: The Unfinished Autobiography of Carson McCullers was published in 1999.

Sources

Carr, Virginia Spencer. The Lonely Hunter: A Biography of Carson McCullers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Carr. Understanding Carson McCullers. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1989.

Clark, Beverly Lyon, and Melvin J. Friedman, eds. Critical Essays on Carson McCullers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

McDermott, Alice (1953– ) novelist

Born to first-generation Irish immigrants, Alice McDermott writes passionately about contemporary Irish Americans from her native area of Long Island, New York. She attended Catholic schools as a child and received a B.A. degree from the State University of New York at Oswego in 1975. She earned her M.F.A. degree from the University of New Hampshire in 1978. That same year she published her first short story in Ms. magazine. Her first novel, A Bigamist's Daughter, appeared four years later, in 1982. The novel charts the unlikely romance of an Irish American book editor and one of her writers, a Southerner whose novel-in-progress gives McDermott's novel its title. Her second novel, The Night (1987), a wistful look back at her own adolescent years in 1960s Long Island, was a finalist for the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD, the Pulitzer Prize, the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and the Los Angeles Times Book Prize. Her other novels of suburban life and spiritual longing amid Long Island's Irish Catholic community include At Weddings and Wakes (1992); Charming Billy (1998), which won the National Book Award; Child of My Heart (2002); and After This (2006). In 1996 she accepted a teaching position in the writing program at Johns Hopkins University.

Source

Reilly, Charlie. "An Interview with Alice McDermott," Contemporary Literature, 46 (Winter 2005): 557–578.

—Marshall Boswell

McElroy, Joseph (1930– ) novelist

Born in Brooklyn, New York, McElroy earned a B.A. degree from Williams College and an M.A. (1951) and a Ph.D. (1960) from Columbia University. He taught for many years at Queens College and the City University of New York. Often compared to the work of contemporaries like Robert COOVER, Thomas PYNCHON, and William GADDIS, McElroy's fiction is viewed as experimental and demanding. His narrator-protagonists struggle to define the nature of reality against the ambiguous landscapes of their own minds. In perhaps his best novel, Lookout Cartridge (1974), McElroy harnesses his cerebral style to the sharply crafted plot of a mystery thriller hinging on a terrorist explosion in New York City. Women and Men (1987) is recognized as his most ambitious novel. Set in New York, where most of McElroy's fiction unfolds, the novel centers on James Mayn, a journalist specializing in science, technology, and economic issues, and on Grace Kimball, an extreme feminist leader. They live in the same apartment building and eventually come together in a pattern of coincidences. Like Lookout Cartridge, this novel develops McElroy's vision of the order, chaos, and contingency of modern life.

McElroy's other novels include A Smuggler's Bible (1966), Hind's Kidnap: A Pastoral on Familiar Airs (1969), Ancient History: A Paraphrase (1971), Plus (1974), The Letter Left to Me (1988), and the more traditional Actress in the House (2002) about a couple who come to terms with their troubled pasts.

Source

Hanke, Steffen. Conspiracy and Paranoia in Contemporary American Fiction: The Works of Don DeLillo and Joseph McElroy. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.

McGuane, Thomas (1939– ) novelist

Thomas McGuane was born in Wyandotte, Michigan, and received a B.A. degree from Michigan State University in 1962 and an M.F.A. from the Yale School of Drama in 1975, after which he was a Wallace Stegner Fellow at Stanford. Giving up the idea of an academic career, he concentrated on writing novels and screenplays. Ninety-two in the Shade (1973) is among his best and most characteristic works. The novel centers on Thomas Skelton, who pursues his desire to be a fishing guide in the face of a woman's vow to kill him if he continues to work on the land she considers hers. Skelton's determination to act according to his own values, even though he risks his life in doing so, is typical of McGuane's skill at portraying characters who pursue their own dreams at great risk. Much of McGuane's fiction is set in the West. Nobody's Angel (1982), for example, explores Deadrock, Montana, a listless environment of farmers and cowboys where Patrick Fitzpatrick wrestles with a stymied life on his family's ranch after an intense period in the tank corps of the army. McGuane's other protagonists confront similar challenges: how to cope with conventional life when the more-romanticized versions of the West and of the past elude the characters' grasp. McGuane's other novels include The Sporting Club (1969), The Bushwhacked Piano (1971), Panama (1978), Something to Be Desired (1984), Keep the Change (1989), Nothing but Blue Skies (1992), and The Cadence of Grass (2002).

McGuane has also had a significant career as a screenwriter with 92 in the Shade (1975), Rancho DeLuxe (1975), The Missouri Breaks (1976), and Tom Horn (1980). His short fiction has been collected in To Skin a Cat (1986). Gallatin Canyon: Stories was published in 2006. His nonfiction includes An Outside Chance: Essays on Sport (1980), The Longest Silence: A Life in Fishing (1999), and Some Horses (1999).

Source

Westrum, Dexter. Thomas McGuane. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

McInerney, Jay (1955– ) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Connecticut and educated at Williams College, Jay McInerney first worked as a fact checker at The New Yorker. Virtually all of his fiction is set in New York City and is practically regionalist in its attention to settings and characters shaped by the Manhattan milieu. His Bright Lights, Big City (1984), made into a motion picture, is the story of a young man coming to terms with New York City, struggling with his mother's death, and succumbing to drug addiction. McInerney involves his readers directly in his unnamed character's fate through use of second-person narration. His other novels, comic and satirical, are Story of My Life (1988), Brightness Falls (1992), The Last of the Savages (1996), and Model Behavior: A Novel and 7 Stories (1998). Bacchus & Me: Adventures in the Wine Cellar, a collection of essays about wine, appeared in 2000. He has also edited Cowboys, Indians and Commuters: The Penguin Book of New American Voices (1994). How It Ended is a collection of stories, most previously collected, that reinforces McInerney's reputation as a witty phrasemaker. In 2006 he published The Good Life, a sequel to Brightness Falls that dramatizes an adulterous affair in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center.

Sources

Garner, Dwight. "The Salon Interview: Bright Lights, Bad Reviews," 1996: <<http://www.salon.com/weekly/mcinerney1960527.html>> (viewed May 11, 2007).

Hogan, Ron. "The Beatrice Interview: Jay McInerney," 1996: <<http://www.beatrice.com/interviews/mcinerney/>> (viewed May 11, 2007).

McMurtry, Larry (1936– ) novelist

"You will read of all this in the histories, Janey, do not let them tell you Custer was a hero, he was cold and careless, listened to no one."

—Calamity Jane to her daughter in Buffalo Girls (1990)

Born in Wichita Falls, Texas, Larry McMurtry has made the Southwest the focus of most of his fiction. He grew up on a ranch, the grandson of a pioneer cattleman. He received a B.A. from North Texas State University in 1958 and an M.A. from Rice in 1960. He also studied at the Stanford University writers' program directed by Wallace STEGNER.

McMurtry's novels are often set in moribund small towns and decrepit ranches in north and west Texas. His early work—Horseman, Pass By (1961) and Leaving Cheyenne (1963)—best exemplifies his sense of a dying culture. Although McMurtry's setting is the Southwest, he did not write a traditional Western until Lonesome Dove (1985), now considered one of the finest examples of the genre and perhaps his best novel. It was later made into a six-hour television miniseries. McMurtry has also written Academy Award-winning screenplays, including The Last Picture Show (1966); Terms of Endearment (1975); and Brokeback Mountain (2005), based on the short story by Annie PROULX.

McMurtry often revives his characters and continues their stories through several novels, which gives his work characteristics of sagas. Duane's Depressed (1999), for example, returns to the locale and characters of Texasville (1987) and The Last Picture Show (1966). August McCraw and Woodrow Call, the main characters of Lonesome Dove, figure prominently in Streets of Laredo (1993), Dead Man's Walk (1995), and Comanche Moon (1997). The revivals of characters do not follow chronological order; that is, later novels often deal with periods before the characters' initial appearances in earlier novels. Although some readers have found McMurtry's time shifts confusing, he seems to take the Faulknerian view that fiction demands such latitude and reordering of history.

McMurtry has written a series beginning with Sin City: The Berrybender Narratives, Book 1 (2002). The second book, The Wandering Hill (2003), was followed the same year by By Sorrow's River: The Berrybender Narratives, Book 3. His Loop Group and Folly and Glory both appeared in 2004, followed by Telegraph Days (2006). His When the Light Goes: A Novel was published in 2007.

McMurtry has also published several works of nonfiction: In a Narrow Grave: Essays on Texas (1968), It's Always We Rambled: An Essay on Rodeo (1974), Film Flam: Essays on Hollywood (1987), Crazy Horse (1999), Walter Benjamin at the Dairy Queen: Reflections at Sixty and Beyond (1999), and Sacagawea's Nickname: Essays on the American West (2001). In 2005 he published Oh What a Slaughter: Massacres in the American West 1846–1890.

McMurtry is a respected bookman. He is the owner of Booked Up Inc., shops specializing in fine, rare, and scholarly books in Washington, D.C., Arizona, and Archer, Texas, where Booked Up occupies four buildings on the town square.

Sources

Busby, Mark. Larry McMurtry and the West: An Ambivalent Relationship. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1995.

Reynolds, Clay, ed. Taking Stock: A Larry McMurtry Casebook. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1989.

McPhee, John (1931– ) nonfiction writer

After graduation from Princeton University (A.B., 1953), where he has taught journalism, John McPhee became a staff writer for The New Yorker and wrote books that proved not only popular but also influential. The Pine Barrens (1968), his loving depiction of the unspoiled wilderness in the heart of New Jersey, was instrumental in forestalling plans to develop the area as a major airport. One of his finest narratives is Coming into the Country (1977), an account of his journeys in Alaska. His other important books include The Crofter and the Laird (1970), an account of Scotland; The Curve of Binding Energy (1974), an investigation of nuclear energy; Looking for a Ship (1990), stories of the seafaring life; and Annals of the Former World (1998), a revised collection of four previously published volumes about four-billion-year-old geologic formations: Basin and Range (1981), In Suspect Terrain (1983), Rising from the Plains (1986), and Assembling California (1993). The collection won the Pulitzer Prize for nonfiction in 1999. Irons in the Fire (1997) collects his essays on various subjects. The Founding Fish (2002) is a personal, scientific, and historic examination of American shad. Uncommon Carriers (2006) is an account of the professional lives of people in the transportation industry.

Sources

Pearson, Michael. John McPhee. New York: Twayne, 1997.
Weltzin, O. Alan, and Susan N. Mayer, eds. Coming into McPhee Country: John McPhee and the Art of Literary Nonfiction. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 2003.

Meredith, William (1919–2007) poet

A New York City native, William Meredith graduated from Princeton University and then served in the navy as an aviator. His first book of poetry, Love Letter from an Impossible Land (1944), was selected for the Yale Series of Younger Poets. His naval experience permeates Ships and Other Figures (1948), Open Sea (1958), and The Wreck of the Thresher (1964). Robert Frost's influence is evident in Earth Walk (1970). Much of Meredith's verse evokes the natural world and the human response to it. Hazard the Painter (1975) describes a fictional artist's philosophy of art and life. Partial Accounts (1987), which combines a selection of poems from earlier books with new poems, won a Pulitzer Prize. Meredith's later work includes Effort At Speech: New and Selected Poems (1997). Poems Are Hard to Read (1991) features his writing about poetry.

Source

Rotella, Guy. Three Contemporary Poets of New England: William Meredith, Philip Booth, and Peter Davison. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Merrill, James (1926–1995) poet

James Merrill was born in New York City, the son of one of the founders of the Merrill Lynch brokerage firm, and was educated at private schools and at Amherst College (B.A. 1947). Merrill was fortunate that his father recognized his literary talent and provided the financial security that allowed him to pursue a literary career. Merrill won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Nights and Days (1966), a Pulitzer Prize for Divine Comedies (1976), and another National Book Award for Mirabell: Books of Number (1978). His work is autobiographical and deals with his day-to-day life. Merrill wrote love poetry that was explicit about his homosexuality. He was also open about his intensely social life. His best work is elegant and philosophical, probing the complications of human relationships. In 1982 Merrill published From the First Nine: Poems 1946–1976. His later collections include Late Settings (1985), The Inner Room (1988), and A Scattering of Salts (1995), published just after his death from AIDS. His Collected Poems appeared in 2001 along with a memoir of Merrill and his longtime companion, David Jackson, by Alison LURIE titled Familiar Spirits.

Merrill's Collected Novels and Plays (2002) and Collected Prose (2004) followed.

Sources

Adams, Don. James Merrill's Poetic Quest. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
Rotella, Guy, ed. Critical Essays on James Merrill. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Merton, Thomas (1915–1968) poet, autobiographer

Thomas Merton's most representative writing can be found in The Seven Storey Mountain (1948), which recounts his conversion to the Catholic faith, his decision to abandon his literary career in New York, and how he committed himself to a religious life.

Educated at Clare College in Cambridge and at Columbia University where he earned his B.A. in 1938 and his M.A. in 1939, Merton became an ordained Catholic priest in 1949 and chose the vocation of a Trappist monk. A prolific author, he wrote more than fifty books, including The Collected Poems of Thomas Merton (1977) and Mystics and Zen Masters (1967), the latter exemplifying his broad and profound understanding of spirituality. Merton brought a critical and even satirical perspective to religious writing that made him a key figure for those interested in the intersection between the spiritual and secular worlds. His poetry tends to be aphoristic and autobiographical.

Sources

Cooper, David D. Thomas Merton's Art of Denial: The Evolution of A Radical Humanist. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989.
Kramer, Victor A. Thomas Merton. Boston: Twayne, 1984.
Shannon, William H., Christine M. Bochen, and Patrick F. O'Connell. The Thomas Merton Encyclopedia. Mary Knoll, N.Y.: Orbis, 2002.

Merwin, W. S. (1927– ) poet, translator

I don't have any ideological sense of what is Merwinlike or un-Merwinlike. I'm always happy to find I'm writing a poem which is different from anything I've written before, but I don't think you can really write out a paradigm.

—Interview in Artful Dodge (circa 1982)

W. S. Merwin grew up in Union City, New Jersey, and in Scranton, Pennsylvania. His father was a Presbyterian minister, and Merwin wrote his first verses (for hymns) at age five. He graduated from Princeton University and turned to translating other poets, beginning with The Poem of the Cid (1959), and Perseus's Satires (1961). Merwin has also translated The Song of Roland (1963), Pablo Neruda's Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair (1969), Asian Figures (1973), Osip Mandel'shtam's Selected Poems (1989), Dante's Purgatorio (2000), and Gawain and the Green Knight (2002).

Merwin achieved recognition as a poet in his youth. His A Mask for Janus (1952) was selected for the Yale Series of Younger Poets by W. H. Auden, who was impressed with Merwin's expert grasp of traditional verse forms and patterns as well as his profound understanding of myth. This aspect of his work, however, made Merwin feel his work was derivative, and he developed a different style with later books of poetry such as The Moving Target (1963), which critics praised for its epigrammatic style. He won the Pulitzer Prize for The Carrier of Ladders (1970), a deeply introspective volume that explores the presence of the past in the poet's life. In Finding the Islands (1982), inspired by Merwin's move to Hawaii, he experimented with haiku. Opening the Hand (1983) portrayed the poet's childhood. His later collections include Koa (1988), The Second Four Books of Poems (1993), Travels (1993), The Vixen (1996), The Folding Cliffs: A Narrative (1998), and The River Sound: Poems (1999). Merwin received the Lannan Foundation Lifetime Achievement Award in 2004, and in 2005 he received both the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and the National Book Foundation Award for Migration: New and Selected Poems.

Merwin's fiction is also strongly poetic. He has collected his short stories in The Miner's Pale Children (1970), Houses and Travellers (1977), Unframed Originals (1982), and The Lost Upland (1992). Regions of Memory: Uncollected Prose, 1949–1982 was published in 1987.

Sources

Hix, H. L. Understanding W. S. Merwin. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Merwin, W. S. Summer Doorways: A Memoir. Washington, D.C.: Shoemaker & Hoard, 2005.

Nelson, Cary, and Ed Folsom, eds. W. S. Merwin: Essays on the Poetry. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Metafiction

The term refers generally to fiction about fiction, and more specifically to novels that call self-conscious attention to their own status as fictions. Although this latter practice has characterized the literary novel almost from its inception—for instance, Miguel de Cervantes' Don Quixote (1605; 1615) and Laurence Sterne's Tristram Shandy (1760–1767) have both been described, in various ways, as metafiction—the strategy has become most directly associated with literary works that fall under the banner of POSTMODERNISM. In the context of Postmodernism, metafiction becomes a way for writers to revive the viability of outmoded literary conventions by paradoxically calling attention to that selfsame conventionality. This strategy also allows writers to blur the distinction between text and "reality," a hallmark of Postmodernist thought. Influential U.S. practitioners of metafiction include John BARTH, Thomas PYNCHON, Kurt VONNEGUT, and Philip ROTH, though the strategy has since become so pervasive that no coherent group of writers can claim ownership of it.

Sources

Christensen, Inger. The Meaning of Metafiction: A Critical Study of Selected Novels by Sterne, Nabokov, Barth and Beckett. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Scholes, Robert. Fabulation and Metafiction. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979.

—Marshall Boswell

Michener, James A. (1907–1997) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Before his death in 1997, James A. Michener had published nearly fifty books, including such imposing, yet spectacularly popular, epic historical novels as Hawaii (1959), The Source (1965), Centennial (1974), Chesapeake (1978), Poland (1983), Texas (1985), Alaska (1988), Caribbean (1989), and Mexico (1992). An orphan, Michener was adopted by a devout Quaker couple, and he grew up in the Quaker community of Bucks County, Pennsylvania. He graduated summa cum laude from Swarthmore College in 1929, received an A.M. degree from Colorado State College of Education, and after a decade of teaching and editing, joined the U.S. Navy in 1942. Upon his discharge following the end of WORLD WAR II, Michener composed a series of stories drawn from his wartime experiences. The resulting book, Tales of the South Pacific (1947), won a Pulitzer Prize and was later the basis of an immensely successful Rodgers and Hammerstein musical. He remains best known for his massive historical novels, which combine historical research with page-turning storytelling. Each novel retells the complete history of a specific location via a single family traced through many generations or through the lives of a collection of characters who are linked through the years and whose lives intersect with major events in the history of the region.

Sources

Groseclose, Karen, and David A. James A. Michener, A Bibliography. Austin, Tex.: State House Press, 1996.

Severson, Marilyn S. James Michener: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

—Marshall Boswell

Miles, Josephine (1911–1985) poet

Born in Chicago and educated at the University of California, Josephine Miles earned her B.A. in 1932, her M.A. in 1934, and her Ph.D. in 1938. Miles was a professor at Berkeley from 1940 to 1978, specializing in the philosophy of language. She published her first poem at age eight in St. Nicholas magazine. Her first book publication was Lines at Intersection (1939). Miles's academic interests are expressed in her poetry, which is gathered in Collected Poems, 1938–1983 (1983).

Source

Larney, Marjorie, ed. Josephine Miles, Teaching Poet: An Oral Biography. Berkeley, Cal.: Acacia Books, 1993.

Miller, Arthur (1915–2005) playwright

Willy was a salesman. And for a salesman, there is no rock bottom to life.

—“Requiem,” Death of a Salesman (1949)

Arthur Miller was born in upper Manhattan and raised in Brooklyn, New York. His father had a prosperous suit-and-coat company that went bankrupt when Miller was thirteen, a year before the stock market crashed. The family moved to modest quarters in Brooklyn, which many critics see as a motivating experience for many of Miller's plays.

Miller went to the University of Michigan in 1934, after two years of working at menial jobs. He won the Avery Hopwood Creative Writing Award for plays in his sophomore and junior years and placed second as a senior. He received his A.B. in 1938. His first play produced on Broadway, The Man Who Had All the Luck (1944), was a flop, closing after four performances. His second play, All My Sons (produced 1947), was a hit; it ran for 328 performances and received the New York Drama Critics Circle Award. The play concerns a manufacturer who sold shoddy airplane parts that led to the death of his son in WORLD WAR II. Although melodramatic and sentimental, this play showcased Miller's vision of what a moral society should stand for and the failures of individuals to abide by or to find their own standards of integrity.

DEATH OF A SALESMAN (produced 1949) is considered Miller's masterpiece. It ran for 742 performances and won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award, a Tony Award, and a Pulitzer Prize. It established him as one of the major voices in the postwar American theater. In the story of Willy Loman, Miller believed he had created the tragedy of the common man. Willy stands for every American who wants to get ahead, who dreams that he and his sons will be well liked and prosperous. Death of a Salesman melds different styles, combining realism and expressionism, so that the audience can both identify with the social consequences of what happens to Willy and his family and also appreciate the play as a psychological study.

While no other play by Miller has achieved the same level of acclaim, his reenactment of the Salem witch-hunts, THE CRUCIBLE (produced 1953), has proven to be an enduring work. At a time when Senator Joseph McCarthy was labeling certain Americans as communist subversives in what many called a witch-hunt, the parallels were difficult to ignore—and Miller apparently encouraged the analogy between the seventeenth century and his own time. A View from the Bridge (produced 1955) once again poses the struggle of a tormented man against the values of his own society. Eddie Carbone, a longshoreman who harbors incestuous feelings for his daughter, comes into conflict with the illegal immigrant he has welcomed into his house and who courts his daughter. Eddie turns informer and has the police apprehend the immigrant and implicates friends who had been Communists.

Arthur Miller

In 1956 Miller, who had just married actress Marilyn Monroe, was called to testify before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. He admitted attending a communist meeting but refused to name other participants. He was convicted the next year of contempt of Congress, a charge that was overturned on appeal in 1958.

Miller drew on his troubled marriage to Monroe, which ended in divorce in 1961, just a year before her death, and his political difficulties in After the Fall (produced 1964), which directly addresses the COLD WAR hysteria over communism. As in A View from the Bridge, After the Fall has a narrator, a device that reflects Miller's tendency in some of his work to direct his audience's attention to the message of his plays.

Miller's later plays received mixed reviews, except for The Price (1968), a taut drama about two brothers who struggle with each other for the meaning of their lives and their family history. The Creation of the World and Other Business (1972), a comic reworking of the Adam and Eve story, excited little interest—as did The American Clock (1980), Miller's portrayal of the Great Depression, and The Ride Down Mt. Morgan (1992), although the latter received favorable notices in England. Broken Glass (1994), the most recent Broadway production of a new Miller play, was a failure, largely due to its trite, melodramatic, and sentimental treatment of the Holocaust.

Collected Plays was published in 1957 and Collected Plays, Volume II in 1981. The latter includes Miller's screenplay, The Misfits (1961), a motion picture that starred Clark Gable and Monroe.

Miller published a novel, Focus (1945), a study of anti-Semitism. His short fiction is included in I Don't Need You Anymore (1967) and Homely Girl, A Life, and Other Stories (1995). Miller's nonfiction works include several travel books with photographs by his wife Inge Morath: In Russia (1969), In the Country (1977), and Chinese Encounters (1979). He wrote a memoir about the Chinese production of his most famous play, Salesman in Beijing (produced 1984). Miller published his memoirs, Timebends: A Life, in 1987. In 1999 Miller received the Tony Lifetime Achievement Award.

Principal Books by Miller

Situation Normal. New York: Reynal & Hitchcock, 1944.
Focus. New York: Reynal & Hitchcock, 1945.
All My Sons. New York: Reynal & Hitchcock, 1947.
Death of a Salesman. New York: Viking, 1949.
The Crucible. New York: Viking, 1953.
A View from the Bridge: Two One-Act Plays. New York: Viking, 1955—includes A Memory of Two Mondays.
The Misfits. New York: Viking, 1961.
Jane's Blanket. New York: Crowell-Collier / London: Collier-Macmillan, 1963.
After the Fall. New York: Viking, 1964.
Incident at Vichy. New York: Viking, 1965.
I Don't Need You Any More: Stories. New York: Viking, 1967.
The Price. New York: Viking, 1968.
In Russia, by Miller and Inge Morath. New York: Viking, 1969.
The Creation of the World and Other Business. New York: Viking, 1973.
In the Country, by Miller and Morath. New York: Viking, 1977.
The Theater Essays of Arthur Miller, edited by Robert Martin. New York: Viking, 1978.
Chinese Encounters, by Miller and Morath. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1979.
Playing for Time: A Screenplay. New York: Bantam, 1981.

Playbill cover for the first production, in 1955, of Miller's play about Italian dockworkers in New York. This one-act version was revised the next year as a two-act play.

The American Clock. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1982.
Elegy for a Lady. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1982.
Some Kind of Love Story. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1983.
The Archbishop's Ceiling. London: Methuen, 1984; New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1985.
Salesman in Beijing, by Miller and Morath. New York: Viking, 1984.
Danger: Memory! New York: Grove, 1987—comprises I Can't Remember Anything and Clara.
Timebends: A Life. Franklin Center, Pa.: Franklin Library, 1987.
The Last Yankee. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1991.
The Ride Down Mt. Morgan. New York: Penguin, 1992.
Homely Girl: A Life. New York: Peter Blum, 1992.
Broken Glass. New York: Penguin, 1994.
Mr. Peters' Connections. New York: Penguin, 1999.
Echoes Down the Corridor: Collected Essays 1944–2000, edited by Steven R. Centola. New York: Viking, 2000.
On Politics and the Art of Acting. New York: Viking, 2001.

Dust jacket for Miller's 1949 play, originally titled "The Inside of His Head," which ran for 742 performances on Broadway in its first production

Studying Arthur Miller

Students studying the life and work of Arthur Miller will be well served to begin with his first successful play, All My Sons (produced 1947), which will acquaint the reader with the themes and use of dialect common in Miller's work. From there the student should read DEATH OF A SALESMAN and THE CRUCIBLE, both of which contributed to Miller's recognition as a master playwright.

Penguin Books published The Portable Arthur Miller, edited by Christopher Bigsby (New York, 2003), which is a useful text for studying Miller's work. The 2003 edition includes both the original introduction to the first 1970 edition by Harold Clurman as well as a revised introduction by Bigsby, which allows the reader to observe the similarity of thematic concerns in Miller scholarship in the last four decades. The text also provides an extensive bibliography of Miller's large body of work that will guide the reader toward his twenty-four plays, his fiction and nonfiction, and articles and interviews. The Portable Arthur Miller also includes an excerpt from Miller's first published play, Golden Years (produced 1939), as well as his Broken Glass (produced 1994), which won the Oliver Award for Best Play of 1995.

Students wishing to read the entire early body of Miller's work should consult Arthur Miller: Collected Plays 1944–1961, edited by Tony Kushner. The collected work includes the autobiographical one-act play A Memory of Two Mondays, Miller's first Broadway-produced play The Man Who Had All The Luck, and the fictional writing The Misfits. The Misfits was made into a motion picture in 1961, starring Clark Gable and Miller's wife, Marilyn Monroe. In the introduction to the 1961 Viking Press edition of The Misfits Arthur Miller explains that it is written in "unfamiliar form, neither novel, play, nor screenplay."

There are two very useful companion texts for the student studying Miller's plays. The first, edited by Robert A. Martin, is The Theater Essays of Arthur Miller (New York: Viking, 1978); it includes reprints and his introductions to his own work, interviews, and essays by Miller explaining his theories regarding theater, including his take on the "art of style." The essays in this text also raise issues and explanations of the author's own work. The second book, Conversations with Arthur Miller, edited by Matthew C. Roudane (Mississippi: University Press of Mississippi, 1987), includes every printed interview with Miller, up to 1987, in which he discusses both the craft of writing and theater, as well as his body of work.

There are ample collections of literary criticism that address selected issues in Miller's work. Students who are interested in thematic elements including the dichotomy of strength and weakness, and forgiveness in Miller's plays are advised to read Harold Bloom's collection of essays, Arthur Miller (New York: Chelsea House, 2003). Alice Griffin's minibiography, Understanding Arthur Miller (Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1996), is useful for its biographical sketch as well as for its critical overviews of Miller's plays.

Miller's autobiography, Timebends (1987), provides a sketch of his experiences and their connection to the evolution of his literary works. Students looking for a full biography of Arthur Miller's life are advised to read Arthur Miller by Martin Gottfried (Cambridge: Da Capo Press, 2003).

—Student Guide by Jonathan Maricle

Millhauser, Steven (1943– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in New York City and reared in Connecticut, Steven Millhauser earned a B.A. degree from Columbia University in 1965. His first novel was Edwin Mullhouse: The Life and Death of an American Writer 1943–1954 by Jeffrey Cartwright (1972), an inspired parody of biography especially as practiced by such biographers as Leon EDEL. Millhauser excels in the novella form as exemplified by In the Penny Arcade (1986) and The Barnum Museum (1990), two recreations of nineteenth-century America. Little Kingdoms (1994) is a collection of novellas that also shows his gift for creating fantasy literature, some of it again set in the nineteenth century, some of it in the 1920s. Martin Dressler (1996), about an entrepreneur in turn-of-the-twentieth-century New York City, won the Pulitzer Prize for fiction.

Minimalism

Literary minimalism can be defined as the aesthetics of exclusion. Criticized by some as lacking in style, minimalists seek to rid their fiction of unnecessary detail and extraneous description. The result is straightforward, some would say dry, writing in which each word is freighted. Fictional minimalists include Raymond CARVER, Bobbie Ann MASON, and Ann BEATTIE, among others. Minimalist poets include William Carlos Williams and the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS.

Modern Language Association

The Modern Language Association is a professional organization of scholars and teachers of language and literature founded in 1883. In 2007 it claims a membership of thirty thousand in one hundred countries. The MLA has a publishing program that includes journals: ADE Bulletin, the ADFL Bulletin, Profession, and PMLA. It also compiles the annual MLA International Bibliography, the most comprehensive index of scholarly articles ever published. At its annual convention, MLA plays host to thousands of scholars and presents programs of scholarly presentations on diverse topics.

Momaday, N. Scott (1934– ) novelist, poet, historian

I am an Indian and I believe I'm fortunate to have the heritage I have. . . . I grew up in two worlds and straddle both those worlds even now. . . . It has made for confusion and a richness in my life. I've been able to deal with it reasonably well, I think, and I value it.

—Interview (2001)

Born in the Kiowa Nation in Lawton, Oklahoma, N. Scott Momaday moved to New Mexico, where he worked with the Jemez Indians and received a B.A. from the University of New Mexico. He earned an M.A. and Ph.D. from Stanford University and has held professorships at California universities and at the University of Arizona. Momaday won a Pulitzer Prize for House Made of Dawn (1968), the story of a young Indian who cannot come to terms with his native people or American culture. His later work evokes Native American myths as well as the modern material world that often comes into conflict with traditional Native American values. Much of his fiction is autobiographical, reflecting his feeling for family and for the land. He wrote two volumes of memoirs, The Way to Rainy Mountain (1969) and The Names: A Memoir (1976). After House Made of Dawn, Momaday turned his attention to poetry, stating that he regarded himself primarily as a poet. Momaday's Angle of Geese and Other Poems (1974) and The Gourd Dancer (1976) demonstrate his grasp of traditional verse (iambic pentameter) as well as of modern free verse and prose poems. Despite his earlier proclamation, he wrote his second novel, The Ancient Child (1989), an autobiographically inspired work about an Indian artist searching for his identity. Momaday is a respected artist who exhibits frequently. In the Presence of the Sun: Stories and Poems, 1961–1991 (1992) and In the Bear's House (1999) both include examples of his artwork in collections of his poetry and short prose.

Sources

Isernhagen, Hartwig. Momaday, Vizenor, Armstrong: Conversations on American Indian Writing. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1999.

Schweninger, Lee. Literary Masters: N. Scott Momaday. Detroit: Manly/Gale Group, 2001.

Moody, Rick (1961– ) novelist, short-story writer, memoirist

I still want short stories to save lives. I want people to feel about the short story the way they feel about "Strawberry Fields Forever" by the Beatles, like their lives were changed by it in some way. . . .

—Interview (2001)

Rick Moody—whose full name is Hiram F. Moody III—grew up in the affluent suburbs of Connecticut and he attended St. Paul's Academy in New Hampshire. He received his B.A. degree in 1983 from Brown University, where he came under the influence of Robert COOVER and John HAWKES, and he earned his M.F.A. from Columbia University in 1986. A year later he checked himself into a drug rehabilitation center to help control his drinking and drug intake. He moved to Hoboken, New Jersey, where he lived alone in a garage loft and drafted his first novel, Garden State (1991), a grim, minimalist account of a group of listless New Jersey youths. After being rejected by every major Manhattan publishing house, the novel was published by Pushcart Press, having won the Pushcart Press Editor's Award in 1991. Moody's second novel was the critically acclaimed tale of 1970s suburban adultery, The Ice Storm (1994).

His other novels include Purple America (1997) and The Diviners (2005), an epic satire of the television industry.

He has also published two short-story collections, The Ring of Brightest Angels around Heaven (1996) and Demonology (2000), the title piece from which touches upon the unexpected death of his sister, a single mother in her late thirties. His memoir, The Black Veil: A Memoir with Digressions (2002), interweaves the author's account of his childhood and later substance-abuse problems with a close reading of Nathaniel Hawthorne's short story "The Minister's Black Veil," based on a New England minister named Joseph Moody who covered his face to hide his shame. Right Livelihoods (2007) is a collection of three novellas dealing with fear, threats, and paranoia in post-9/11 New York.

Source

Dewey, Joseph. "Rick Moody," Review of Contemporary Literature, 23 (June 2003): 7–49.

—Marshall Boswell

Moore, Lorrie (1957– ) short-story writer, novelist

Having long lost its ability to pay an author's rent (in that golden blip between Henry James and television, F. Scott Fitzgerald, for one, wrote stories to fund his novels), the short story has been freed of its commercial life to become serious art, by its virtually every practitioner. As a result, short or long, a story lies less. It sings and informs and blurts. It has nothing to lose.

—Introduction, Best American Short Stories (2004)

Lorrie Moore's short stories focus on intelligent, self-conscious characters who confront the dread and desolation of their lives with wit, candor, and self-protective irony. Born Marie Lorena Moore, she earned her first publication at the age of nineteen when her short story "Raspberries" won first prize in a writing contest for Seventeen magazine.

Two years later Moore graduated with honors from Sarah Lawrence College. After spending two years working as a paralegal in Manhattan, she enrolled in the M.F.A. program at Cornell University, where she studied under Alison LURIE. Her creative thesis was a series of stories written in the second person and modeled after the language of self-help manuals. Those stories were eventually published as Self-Help (1985), her first short-story collection and a signature work of the 1980s.

In 1984 Moore began a teaching career at the University of Wisconsin and published her first novel, Anagrams, a kaleidoscopic work about a young woman's thwarted desire for a child. Her second story collection, Like Life (1990), received critical acclaim and established her as one of the leading literary talents of her generation. The best-known story, "You're Ugly, Too," features an unmarried history professor in the Midwest who beats back her feelings of loneliness and thwarted longing with whimsical, and at times biting, humor. Her third collection, Birds of America (1998), is her most successful to date: the book was on The New York Times best-seller list for a brief period, which is a rare achievement for a collection of literary short stories. Included in the volume is a frankly autobiographical tale of a successful female writer dealing with her infant's mysterious, and possibly life-threatening, illness, "People Like That Are the Only People Here: Canonical Babbling in Peed Onk." Moore is the Delmore Schwarz Professor in the Humanities at the University of Wisconsin.

Sources

Brockway, Michelle. "The Art of Reading Lorrie Moore," Poets and Writers, 28 (September–October 2000): 16–19.

Moore, Lorrie, and Don Lee. "About Lorrie Moore," Ploughshares, 24 (Fall 1998): 224–229.

—Marshall Boswell

Moraga, Cherrie (1952– ) poet, playwright, editor

Cherrie Moraga was born in Whittier, California, the daughter of Joseph Lawrence and a Chicana mother, Elvira Moraga. She earned her B.A. (1974) and M.A. (1980) from San Francisco State University. She co-edited an influential anthology, This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color (1981). Her first book of poetry, Loving in the War Years: Lo que nunca pasó por sus labios (1983), explored her Chicana and lesbian identities in both Spanish and English. Her play Giving Up the Ghost (produced 1987) has been cited as the first explicitly lesbian play by a Chicana. Constructed as a series of monologues by three women, the repression of lesbian and Chicana women is emphasized as these characters try to work through their sense of confusion and separateness.

Moraga has also co-edited Cuentos: Stories by Latinas (1983) and The Sexuality of Latinas (1993). She is the author of The Last Generation: Prose and Poetry (1993), Heroes and Saints & Other Plays (1994), and Waiting in the Wings: Portrait of a Queer Motherhood (1997). In 1997 she cofounded Kitchen Table: Women of Color Press in New York City.

Source

Yarbro-Bejarano, Yvonne. The Wounded Heart: Writing about Cherrie Moraga. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2001.

Morris, Willie (1934–1999) memoirist, editor, novelist

Willie Morris was born in Jackson, Mississippi, and he grew up in neighboring Yazoo City, which he wrote about in his autobiography, North toward Home (1967). He attended the University of Texas, where he became editor of the school newspaper. He was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford University in 1956–1957, and he worked as an editor and journalist in Texas before assuming his duties as associate editor of Harper's magazine in 1963. North toward Home, the book for which he is still best known, is a lyrical account of Morris's love-hate relationship with his native South. The book inspired comparisons to William Faulkner and Thomas Wolfe and was awarded the Houghton Mifflin Prize for nonfiction. In 1973 Morris published his first novel, The Last of the Southern Girls. In his lifetime he did not publish another novel, although a late novel, Taps (2001), was published posthumously. Morris's other books include autobiographies, essay collections, and works addressing political and social realities in the South. His popular 1995 memoir My Dog Skip returned Morris to the best-seller list some thirty years after North toward Home, and the book was later adapted into a motion picture. Morris died before the movie was released.

Source

Bales, Jack. Conversations with Willie Morris. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

Morris, Wright (1910–1998) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Nebraska, Wright Morris set much of his fiction in the Midwest. He can be defined as a regionalist, and he has been called the writer of situations around which he builds perceptive character studies. He has also been referred to as a “writer’s writer” because his novels are crafted so carefully. Morris’s early work includes My Uncle Dudley (1942), The Man Who Was There (1945), The World in the Attic (1949), and Man and Boy (1951). The Field of Vision (1956), which won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, is set in Mexico and concerns a group of Americans watching a bullfight. Ceremony in Lone Tree (1960) deals with a family reunion in Nebraska. One Day (1965) explores different characters’ reactions to the assassination of John F. Kennedy. Plains Song: For Female Voices (1980) explores the lives of Midwestern women. Collected Stories 1948–1986 appeared in 1986. His later work includes Three Easy Pieces (1993) and The Loneliness of the Long Distance Writer (1995).

Morris published several autobiographical volumes: Will’s Boy (1981), Solo: An American Dreamer in Europe (1983), and A Cloak of Light: Writing My Life (1985). A distinguished photographer, he published several books in which prose and photos are carefully integrated, including: Photographs and Words (1982) and Wright Morris: Origin of a Species (1992).

Morris wrote extensively about American themes and issues in The Territory Ahead (1958); A Bill of Rites, a Bill of Wrongs, a Bill of Goods (1968); About Fiction (1975); and Earthly Delights, Unearthly Adornments (1978).

Sources

Crump, G. B. The Novels of Wright Morris: A Critical Interpretation. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1978.

Wydeven, Joseph J. Wright Morris Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1998.

Morrison, Toni (1931– ) novelist

Don’t tell us what to believe, what to fear. Show us belief’s wide skirt and the stitch that unravels fear’s caul. . . . Language alone protects us from the scariness of things with no names. Language alone is meditation.

—Nobel Prize Acceptance Speech (1993)

The daughter of a welder, Toni Morrison was born Chloe Anthony Wofford in Loraine, Ohio. In the late 1940s she entered Howard University, where she received her B.A. in 1953. After graduating from Cornell in 1955 with an M.A., Morrison spent a decade teaching English, first in Houston, Texas, and then at Howard. In the mid 1960s she shifted her focus to editing and became a senior editor at Random House, where she concentrated on African American authors. In 1970 her employer published THE BLUEST EYE, a novel she had begun in the early 1960s. The novel’s main character is Pecola Breedlove, an impoverished, unattractive African American girl who tries to escape her plight by praying for blue eyes.

In her second novel, Sula (1973), Morrison examined the friendship between two women, the accommodating Nel and her rebellious counterpart, Sula. Her best-selling third novel, Song of Solomon (1977), employed the “mythic method” associated with such Modernist texts as James Joyce’s Ulysses (1922) and D. H. Lawrence’s Sons and Lovers (1913). Told from the perspective of Milkman Dead, an irresolute, affluent African American male who unexpectedly undertakes a heroic quest to discover his heritage, the novel combines African American mythology with biblical and Greek archetypes.

In many respects, Morrison’s fifth novel, BELOVED (1987), reads like a “romance” as defined by Nathaniel Hawthorne—that is, a more-or-less realistic novel in which the author has the freedom to bend the truth. The title refers to a ghost named Beloved, who acts as a symbol for America’s slaveholding past. Beloved won the Pulitzer Prize, and more. In 2006 it was voted as the most important work of fiction of the last twenty-five years by a group of writers and critics selected by The New York Times Book Review.

The same year she won the Pulitzer Prize, Morrison also accepted a position as the Robert Goheen Professor of Humanities at Princeton University. While at Princeton she completed her sixth novel, Jazz (1992), which is set in the so-called Roaring Twenties. The novel is structured like a jazz composition, with a group of unnamed narrators taking up the story one by one like a group of musicians stepping forward to improvise on a basic theme.

The year after Jazz was published Morrison won the Nobel Prize in literature. Morrison has published two novels since winning the Nobel Prize, Paradise (1998) and Love (2003), and both have been best-sellers. Reviewers have begun to

Dust jacket for Morrison's 1987 novel, voted the best work of American fiction in the past twenty-five years in a May 2006 poll conducted by The New York Times Book Review complain that Morrison's later work is too political; in her essays, particularly in Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992), Morrison has analyzed specific literary works and has identified what she sees as coded forms of racism embedded in American literature. Her essays and novels have been embraced by both African American and feminist theorists, however, and Morrison has not apologized for her political imperatives, remarking as early as 1974, "I don't believe any real artists have ever been non-political. They may have been insensitive to this particular plight or insensitive to that, but they were political because that's what an artist is—a politician."

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Morrison

The Bluest Eye. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1970.

Sula. New York: Plume, 1973.

Song of Solomon. New York: Knopf, 1977.

Tar Baby. New York: Knopf, 1981.

BeLoved. New York: Knopf, 1987.

Jazz. Franklin Center, Pa.: Franklin Library / New York: Knopf, 1992.

Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Paradise. New York: Knopf, 1998.

The Big Box, by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Hyperion Books for Children/Jump at the Sun, 1999.

The Book of Mean People, by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Hyperion Books for Children, 2002.

The Ant or the Grasshopper? by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Scribner, 2003.

The Lion or the Mouse? by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Scribner, 2003.

Poppy or the Snake? by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Scribner, 2003.

Love. New York: Knopf, 2003.

Remember: The Journey to School Integration. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2004.

The Mirror or the Glass? by Morrison and Slade Morrison. New York: Scribner, 2004.

Dust jacket for Morrison's second novel, which established her reputation as a serious novelist

Studying Toni Morrison

Toni Morrison's career includes important work as an editor, essayist, lecturer, and literary and social critic—in addition to her success as one of America's most acclaimed novelists and the first African American Nobel Laureate. The student seeking to understand Morrison should begin with Morrison's eight novels, including the two trilogies: Sula (1973), Song of Solomon (1977), and Tar Baby (1981); and BELOVED (1987), Jazz (1992), and Paradise (1998). At the center of Morrison's success as a novelist is Beloved, which many critics agree is Morrison's best work to date. For the student unfamiliar with Beloved, Toni Morrison's Beloved: A Casebook, edited by William L. Andrews and Nellie McKay (New York: Oxford University Press, 1999), is the place to start, as it includes essential critical commentary on the novel as well as Samuel J. May's 1856 account of Margaret Garner's murder of her daughter, the historical occurrence that inspired Morrison's novel.

As there is yet to be written a full-length biography on Morrison, a student interested in Morrison's childhood, creative processes, and her scholarly interests and theories should begin with Conversations with Toni Morrison, a book of interviews with Morrison edited by Danielle Taylor-Guthrie (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994). In order to broaden one's knowledge of Morrison's critical perspective, these interviews should be read in conjunction with Morrison's first work of literary criticism, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992), based on a series of lectures delivered at Harvard University. The standard annotated bibliography for works is David L. Middleton's Toni Morrison: An Annotated Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1987).

Dust jacket for Morrison's 1977 novel, which won both the National Book Critics Circle Award and the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters Award

Dust jacket for Morrison's fourth novel, 1981, set in the Caribbean. It deals with tension among and between the races, as well as social and class conflict.

The critical reception of Morrison's work is as abundant as it is sophisticated. The Toni Morrison Encyclopedia, edited by Elizabeth Beaulieu (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003), is an essential guide, especially the "Approaches to Morrison's Work" entries, which examine the criticism of Ecocritical, Feminist/Black Feminist, Historical, Pedagogical, Postcolonial, Psychoanalytic, and Womanist methodologies. Other important book-length studies include J. Brooks Bouson's Quiet as It's Kept: Shame, Trauma, and Race in the Novels of Toni Morrison (Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1999); John N. Duvall's The Identifying Fictions of Toni Morrison: Modernist Authenticity and Postmodern Blackness (New York: Palgrave, 2000); Gurleen Grewal's Circles of Sorrow, Lines of Struggle: The Novels of Toni Morrison (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998); and Jan Furman's Toni Morrison's Fiction (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996).

For important collections of contemporary criticism of Morrison's major works, the student should begin with the following: Toni Morrison, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005), and Toni Morrison's Beloved, also edited by Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004); Linden Peach's Toni Morrison (New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000); David L. Middleton's Toni Morrison's Fiction: Contemporary Criticism (New York: Garland, 2000); and Toni Morrison: Critical and Theoretical Approaches, edited by Nancy J. Peterson (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997).

For additional information regarding Morrison's life and career, one should see the website of The Toni Morrison Society (<<http://tonimorrisonssociety.org/>> viewed July 12, 2007), where memberships are available providing access to The Toni Morrison Society Newsletter, a semiannual publication that includes an annual Morrison bibliography.

—Student Guide by Jeremy Cagle

Moss, Howard (1922–1987) poet, critic, playwright, editor

A lyric poet devoted to traditional forms, Howard Moss was also a well-respected playwright, critic, teacher, and, for nearly forty years, the senior poetry editor for The New Yorker. He was born in New York City, and he grew up in Queens. After graduating from the University of Wisconsin at Madison (1943), he studied American literature at Columbia University. His first poetry collection, The Wound and the Weather, appeared in 1943. Moss began at The New Yorker in 1948, first as fiction editor and then as poetry editor, a position he held until his death in 1987. He also taught at Vassar College, Barnard College, and Columbia University. His major collections include The Toy Fair (1954), A Swimmer in the Air (1957); Finding Them Lost and Other Poems (1965); Second Nature (1968); A Winter Come, A Summer Gone: Poems 1946–1960 (1960); Buried City (1975); and Rules of Sleep (1982), as well as two volumes of light verse, A Swim Off the Rocks (1976), and Tigers and Other Lilies (1977). His two most important plays are collected in The Palace at 4 A.M. and The Folding Green (1980). A lifelong critic, Moss also published studies of Anton Chekhov and Marcel Proust.

Source

Gioia, Dana. "The Difficult Case of Howard Moss," Antioch Review, 45 (Winter 1987): 98–109.

—Marshall Boswell

The Moviegoer by Walker Percy (New York: Knopf, 1961) novel

Walker Percy's first novel about a clever, ironic New Orleans stockbroker on a quest for redemption remains his most famous work. Mixing Southern elegance and biting intelligence, The Moviegoer won the 1962 NATIONAL BOOK AWARD.

Binx Boling, the novel's hero, is single man on the verge of turning thirty who is squandering his potential on meaningless trysts with secretaries and long afternoons in movie theaters. But Boling assures the reader, in his coolly detached voice, that he is actually trying to cure the "malaise" that pervades modern existence. As Mardi Gras takes over New Orleans, he solicits his troubled, depressive cousin Kate to join him on his quest. By the end of the novel Kate's need for companionship and guidance provides him with the purpose he has been looking for all along.

Deeply influenced by the work of Danish existentialist writer Søren Kierkegaard (see EXISTENTIALISM), The Moviegoer is the first in a series of novels in which Percy explores the problems of dread, anxiety, subjectivity, and faith, as Binx Boling's cagey and supple narrative voice allows Percy to move seamlessly back and forth from dramatic to essayistic modes.

—Marshall Boswell

Mukherjee, Bharati (1940– ) novelist

Born and educated in Calcutta, Bharati Mukherjee came to the United States to study at the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP where she earned her M.F.A. (1963) and her Ph.D. (1969). Her first two novels, The Tiger's Daughter (1972) and Wife (1975), are autobiographical and concentrate on Indian women adjusting to U.S. culture. A third novel, Jasmine (1989), expands on her first two works of fiction by following the odyssey of an Indian woman across the North American continent. Out of her own immigrant experience, Mukherjee has fashioned a body of work demonstrating both the separateness and interconnections of different societies. The Holder of the World (1993), set in 1670, is the story of the imagined daughter of Hester Prynne in Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. Desireable Daughters (2002), the first novel of a trilogy, is about the coming-of-age of three Brahmin sisters whose lives take drastically different directions. The trilogy is continued in The Tree Bride (2004). Mukherjee has also published The Middleman and Other Stories (1988). Her nonfiction, cowritten with her husband, Clark Blaise, includes Days and Nights in Calcutta (1977) and The Sorrow and the Terror (1987), an account of an Air India plane crash off the Irish coast.

Sources

Alam, Fakul. Bharati Mukherjee. Boston: Twayne, 1995.

Dlaska, Andrea. Ways of Belonging: The Making of New Americans in the Fiction of Bharati Mukherjee. Wien, Austria: Braumüller, 1999.

Mura, David (1952– ) poet

A third-generation Japanese American (sansei), Mura was born and raised in Great Lakes, Illinois, a Chicago suburb. He grew up hearing more Yiddish in his neighborhood than Japanese, and his reading was primarily focused on white male writers. His parents did not discuss their heritage, not even that they had been in U.S. detention camps during WORLD WAR II. Mura earned his B.A. at Grinnell College in 1974 and his M.F.A. in 1991 at Vermont College. In A Male Grief: Notes on Pornography and Addiction (1987), Mura has traced his difficulties as a young adult—his indulgence in drug use and sexual promiscuity—to the absence of an identity, or rather to the repression of his sansei identity. His first book of poetry, After We Lost Our Way (1989), explores the way he came to accept and cherish his heritage. His suggestive, open-ended poems have been compared to Japanese verse forms. Turning Japanese: Memoirs of a Sansei (1991) is an account of Mura's trip to Japan, during which he recognized that he could not live in such a restrictive culture and that he could not call himself Japanese. The Colors of Desire (1994) is a poetry collection in which Mura examines his personal responsibility for condoning racism, for not dealing honestly with his sexuality, and with his concerns about his daughter's ability to handle similar issues.

Mura has also published Listening (1992), a collection of poetry, and another memoir/study, Where the Body Meets Memory: An Odyssey of Race, Sexuality, and Identity (1996). His work is remarkable for its sophisticated melding of introspection and social analysis. Song for Uncle Tom, Tonto, and Mr. Moto: Poetry and Identity (2002) is a collection of essays and interviews arguing for a set of literary standards that embrace all of world literature.

Narragansett Tribe

The Narragansett, one of the oldest Native American tribes in North America, were located in the upper northeast regions of Narragansett Bay, later known as Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. In the early 1600s the Narragansett numbers were estimated at around ten thousand, and by the late 1670s an estimated five thousand remained. Their name, Narragansett, means “people of the small point.” Agriculture included the cultivation of beans, corn, and squash, which along with seafood constituted their diet. Giovanni da Verrazano’s (1485–1528) Written Record of the Voyage of 1524 includes a letter to Francis I, king of France, on July 8, 1524, providing these impressions of the Narragansett: “These people are the most beautiful and have the most civil customs that we have found on this voyage. They are taller than we are; they are a bronze color, some tending more toward whiteness, others to a tawny color; the face is clear-cut; the hair is long and black, and they take great pains to decorate it; the eyes are black and alert, and their manner is sweet and gentle, very like the manner of the ancients.”

Following his exile to Rhode Island in 1636, Roger WILLIAMS lived among the Narragansett, studied their language, and became an advocate for their land rights. His linguistic handbook, A Key into the Language of America (1643), also provides a history of the tribe and detailed information on cultural practices, including the Narragansett religion, custom, and dress. During KING PHILIP’S WAR, the “Great Swamp Fight” of 1675 led to the near destruction of the tribe, reducing their numbers to around three thousand. The Narragansett relocated first to Charleston, Rhode Island, and then to eastern Connecticut and upstate New York. Mary White ROWLANDSON’S 1674 CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE includes extensive descriptions and commentary about the Narragansett.

Source

Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.

Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson by Mary Rowlandson (Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Samuel Green, 1682) autobiography

Mary ROWLANDSON’S A Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson recounts her nearly three-month captivity during KING PHILIP’S WAR when her town of Lancaster was attacked on February 10, 1676, and twenty-four women and children were taken as captives, including thirteen members of the Rowlandson family. After eleven weeks and five days, Mary Rowlandson was released, having helped arrange her own £20 ransom.

Structured by twenty “removes,” each segment of this CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE marks Rowlandson’s adjustment to a wholly new situation and illustrates her ability to survive through her adaptation to Native American ways and her faith in God’s providence. Written four years after her captivity and published initially as The Sovereignty and Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682), Rowlandson’s account was widely read, with four editions in the first year.

A fourth edition was also published in London as A True History of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682).

Sources

Breitwieser, Mitchell Robert. American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991.

Derounian-Stodola, Kathryn Zabelle, ed. Women's Indian Captivity Narratives. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Native American Oral Literature

Native American oral literature preserves cultural legacy and traditions through storytelling, oratory, and performance. Passed on through myths, songs, legends, and tales, oral literature places great importance on language. In the retelling, information must be remembered accurately. N. Scott Momaday explains: "Words are spoken with great care, and they are heard. They matter, and they must not be taken for granted; they must be taken seriously, and they must be remembered. . . . At the heart of the American Indian oral tradition is a deep and unconditional belief in the efficacy of language. Words are intrinsically powerful."

While subject matter and performance of oral literature varies, several categories of Native American literature are common among tribes—for example, creation or origin myths, trickster tales, and coup stories or heroes tales. Creation myths explain the origins of the natural world and human existence. Emphasizing the interconnectedness among all life, these sacred stories tell of the Earth Diver, Father Sky and Mother Earth, and tricksters—and they take on many forms, such as Emergence Stories and the Two Creators Myth. Creation is thus explained in several ways. The world emerges from a speck of earth brought up from beneath floodwaters, or from a woman who grows up from the earth. In some tales, competing beings, sometimes siblings, create the world in a contest. Trickster tales often involve a clever animal—such as a spider, coyote, raven, or hare—that teaches important lessons through humorous, sometimes outlandish behavior. Coup stories, told by a reliable witness, describe heroic acts such as touching but not killing a living enemy. Delivery is highly developed. Tone, repetition, silence, syntax, and description all contribute important elements to the telling of the tale.

Sources

Gustafson, Sandra M. Eloquence is Power: Oratory and Performance in Early America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Momaday, N. Scott. "The Native Voice," in Columbia Literary History of the United States, edited by Emory Elliott. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998, 5–15.

Swann, Brian, ed. Smoothing the Ground: Essays on Native American Oral Literature. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983.

New England

The name "New England" first appeared on Captain John SMITH's 1616 map of Virginia, denoting a large northeastern tract of land that included the Chesapeake Bay area. Immigrants to New England were generally of modest means and followed rigorous religious practices associated with Puritan doctrine. New England's running streams, hilly landscape, and abbreviated growing season made it an attractive, healthy, yet demanding location. In Smith's DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND, he emphasizes the richness of the land: "the ground is so fertill, that questionless it is capable of producing any Grain, Fruits, or Seeds you will sow or plant." Settled by both men and women, this ethnically homogenous area was more dependent upon indentured servitude than slavery. The New England colonies of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire were generally less wealthy than their southern counterparts. In 1670 New England's population was about fifty-two thousand, and by 1700 it had reached ninety-two thousand. Major commercial enterprises included fishing, shipbuilding, and mercantile trade.

Histories and descriptions of New England and Virginia include: Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588); John SMITH's A True Relation . . . Virginia (1608), A DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND, and THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF VIRGINIA; Edward Maria WINGFIELD's A Discourse of Virginia (1608); and Robert BEVERLEY's History and Present State of Virginia (1705). Notable chroniclers of early New England life and culture include John WINTHROP, William BRADFORD, Samuel SEWALL, and Cotton MATHER, whose histories and diaries provide detailed records. Early American poets associated with New England include Anne BRADSTREET and Edward TAYLOR, who wrote spiritual and secular poems, and Joel BARLOW and Timothy DWIGHT, who in their epics and pastorals depicted an ideal, glorified America.

Sources

Brückner, Martin. The Geographic Revolution in Early America: Maps, Literacy, and National Identity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

Fischer, David Hackett. Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America. Cambridge & New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York, Viking, 2001.

The New England Primer by Benjamin Harris (1690) primer

The New England Primer was early America's first schoolbook. Compiled by Benjamin Harris, the Primer was modeled after British schoolbooks, such as Orbis Pictus and The Protestant Tutor. This small book, designed to fit in a child's hand, presented each letter of the alphabet as a woodcut followed by rhymed verse that reinforced lessons with moral instruction from the Old Testament. The primer begins with "A: In Adam's Fall We Sinned All." Although an estimated five million copies were sold into the eighteenth century, copies of the book are now rare.

Source

Crain, Patricia. The Story of A: The Alphabetization of America from The New England Primer to The Scarlet Letter. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2000.

The New-England Courant (1721–1726) periodical

The first edition of The New-England Courant was published in Boston on August 7, 1721, by printer James Franklin (1697–1735), the elder brother of Benjamin Franklin. The Courant benefited from the experience of its predecessors, THE BOSTON NEWS-LETTER and THE BOSTON GAZETTE, which had pioneered the commercial press in NEW ENGLAND and eliminated the need for a royal license. To a large extent, therefore, The Courant followed the pattern established by The News-Letter and The Gazette—including commercial, foreign, and local news and gaining revenue by selling subscriptions and advertising. In a major break from journalistic practice, The Courant also featured lengthy editorials clearly intended as opinion pieces. Prior to this time colonial newspapers followed the practice initially established by Benjamin Harris in his short-lived paper PUBLICK OCCURRENCES, in which editorials were limited to a few sentences tacked on at the end of each article.

This change in editorial policy was the product of a conscious decision on James Franklin's part. Trained in England, Franklin styled The Courant along the lines of Joseph Addison (1672–1719) and Richard Steele's (1672–1729) The Spectator, which served simultaneously as a source of news, an arena for political and social critique, and a literary journal. From the beginning, Franklin saw The Courant as a voice of opposition against the political and religious hierarchy of Massachusetts. Although he expected to do some of the writing himself, he depended on his readership for the majority of the articles. The core of these articles originated in the Hell-Fire Club, an intellectual group that met at Richard Hall's Tavern.

Franklin encouraged his writers to employ humor, particularly SATIRE, to explore and exploit local issues and personalities. Their essays were featured on the front page of The Courant. Fearing reprisal, writers published these pieces using pseudonyms to disguise their identities. Among the contributors was Benjamin Franklin, who at the time was serving as his brother's apprentice. Benjamin's "Silence Dogood" essays offered cutting criticism of the Puritan clergy and, in particular, of the Mathers. In this sense his essays were consistent with the opinion pieces written by the editor and by the members of the Hell-Fire Club. James Franklin's essays attacking Cotton MATHER's advocacy of smallpox inoculations were a way of criticizing the Puritan hierarchy as a whole.

The Courant became immediately popular by offering a rare taste of public debate and resistance to clerical authority. But the risks of this type of journalism were high. The Mathers were among the most influential leaders of the colony. More important, Massachusetts had a long history of suppressing dissension and a recent history of censorship of the press. Mather confronted Franklin in public and attacked his editorials in The Boston Gazette, a progovernment newspaper. Mather's supporters followed with a broadside, The Little-Compton Scourge: Or, The Anti-Courant. The Courant responded with an inflammatory essay by John Checkley (1680–1754), an Anglican clergyman and the author of many anti-Puritan essays. Ministers throughout the colony then denounced Franklin and The Courant. Franklin responded by apologizing and eliminating Checkley as a contributor. The damage was done, however. The paper and its editor were clearly identified as antiestablishment.

In 1722 the authorities responded to Franklin's criticism of the government's policy toward pirates by arresting and imprisoning him for sedition, but The Courant continued publication under Benjamin Franklin's control. Released from prison, James Franklin continued to publish essays highly critical of the religious and political hierarchy. In 1723 the General Court voted to censure him, ordering him to submit all copy for review prior to publication. James Franklin avoided the order by naming his brother Benjamin as publisher. James escaped trial altogether when the grand jury failed to indict him.

From 1723 forward, Franklin became extremely cautious, and the editorial content of The Courant became less political. The paper folded in June 1726 after publishing 255 editions. In 1726 Franklin moved to Newport, Rhode Island, where he established The Rhode Island Gazette, the first paper in that colony. Although the local authorities succeeded in suppressing the editor and the paper, The Courant made some important contributions to the development of the American newspaper. The case of Franklin and The Courant established an early precedent for arguments concerning freedom of the press. The editorial content and style of The Courant and its decidedly factional leanings set the stage for the political journalism of the Revolutionary era. Finally, borrowing from the English tradition, The Courant introduced the potential of the newspaper as a literary journal.

Works

The New-England Courant. Boston: J. Franklin, 1721–1726; Early American Imprints.

Walter, Thomas. The Little-Compton Scourge: or, The Anti-Courant. Boston: Printed by J. Franklin, 1721; Early American Imprints, 39756.

Franklin, Benjamin. Silence Dogood, the Busy-Body, and Early Writings: Boston and London, 1722–1726. Philadelphia, 1726–1757, London, 1757–1775. Edited by J. A. Leo Lemay. New York: Library of America, 2002.

The New-England Courant; A Selection of Certain Issues Containing Writings of Benjamin Franklin or Published by Him during His Brother's Imprisonment. Reproduced from Copies of the Originals Owned by the Massachusetts Historical Society in Honor of the 250th Anniversary of His Birth. Introduction by Perry Miller. Boston: American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1956.

Sources

Kobre, Sidney. The Development of the Colonial Newspaper. Gloucester, Mass.: Peter Smith, 1960.

Pasley, Jeffrey L. "The Tyranny of Printers": Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Sloan, William David, and Julie Hedgepeth Williams. The Early American Press, 1690–1783. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

The New-England Weekly Journal (1727–1751) periodical

The New-England Weekly Journal was established in Boston in 1727 by Samuel Kneeland (1696–1769) as a replacement for the defunct NEW-ENGLAND COURANT. Ousted as postmaster and, as a consequence, as editor of THE BOSTON GAZETTE, Kneeland capitalized on his experience in publishing and on James Franklin's (1697–1735) recent success with The Courant. Accordingly, he followed Franklin's lead, designing The Journal primarily as a literary newspaper that included some news features. Like Franklin, Kneeland's influence was Joseph Addison (1672–1719) and Richard Steele's (1672–1729) Spectator, the leading organ of manners and politeness in England.

Unlike Franklin, Kneeland was not much interested in using his newspaper as a political organ. Franklin had used The Courant to attack the Puritan clergy; Kneeland took the opposite tack. Besieged by Franklin's attacks, the clergy had apparently awakened to the value and influence of newspapers. Leading members of the clergy, who included Mather BYLES, nephew of Cotton MATHER, and Thomas PRINCE, pastor of the Old South Church, supported Kneeland's enterprise. In turn, Kneeland actively sought the clergy as contributors to the paper. According to Isaiah THOMAS, Prince actively edited the content of the paper, which included frequent submissions from other members of the Puritan clergy. Responding to the interests of his sponsors—Prince, Byles, and Samuel Danforth (1701–1774), who were keenly interested in science, medicine, and geography—Kneeland added scientific articles to Franklin's original mix, thereby broadening the scope of the newspaper and enhancing its literary quality.

Within four months of the inception of The Journal, Kneeland took Timothy Green Jr. as a partner; Kneeland filled the role of editor, and Green acted as the printer. In 1741 Kneeland and Green merged The Journal with The Gazette. This merger, the first of its kind in the colonies, created The Boston Gazette, or, New-England Weekly Journal—the first paper to combine literary features with a full range of news features. The combined paper, which became a leading advocate of George WHITEFIELD and other revivalist ministers, lasted until 1751.

Works

New-England Weekly Journal, Containing the Most Remarkable Occurrences, Foreign and Domestick. March 20, 1727–October 13, 1741. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland and T. Green; Early American Imprints.

The Boston Gazette, or, New-England Weekly Journal. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland and T. Green, 1741; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Cook, Elizabeth Christine. Literary Influences in Colonial Newspapers, 1704–1750. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1912; reprint, 1966.

Kobre, Sidney. The Development of the Colonial Newspaper. Gloucester, Mass.: Peter Smith, 1960.

Pasley, Jeffrey L. "The Tyranny of Printers": Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Sloan, William David, and Julie Hedgepeth Williams. The Early American Press, 1690–1783. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers . . ., 2 volumes. Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1810; second edition, Albany, N.Y.: Printed by J. Munsell, 1874; reprinted and edited by Marcus A. McCorison, New York: Weathervane, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 21483.

New France

This northeastern area, colonized by the French—primarily for fur trade with the Micmac, Algonkin, Montagnais, and Huron—included Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and areas along the St. Lawrence River valley. The area was initially explored by Jacques Cartier (1491–1557) in 1534 and 1541, followed in 1608 by Samuel de CHAMPLAIN. These regions were settled through beneficent relationships between the Native Americans and the French, who were particularly keen to learn the Native American languages in order to facilitate both the fur trade and their missionary efforts. Champlain made the following observation of Lake Huron during his 1615 voyage: "the country is pleasant, most of it cleared up. It has the shape of Brittany, and is similarly situated, being almost surrounded by the Mer Douce.” In 1627 Cardinal Richelieu (1585–1642) formed the Company of New France, and as the chief minister of France, charged the settlement to colonize two hundred to three hundred immigrants annually in exchange for complete dominance of the fur trade in that region for a term of fifteen years.

Notable works about exploration of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the St. Lawrence River valley, and New France include Cartier's The Voyages of Discovery in Canada, between the Years 1534 and 1542 (1580); CHAMPLAIN's Voyages and Discoveries in New France . . . (1615–1618); THE JESUIT RELATIONS; Louis Hennepin's (1626–1701?) Descriptions of Louisiana, Recently Discovered Southwest of New France . . . (1683); Pierre-Esprit Radisson's (1636–1710?) The Relation of My Voyage . . . (1665); Antoine-Simon Le Page du Pratz's (1695?–1775?) Historie de la Louisiana (3 volumes, 1758).

Works

Biggar, H. P., ed. The Works of Samuel Champlain, 6 volumes. Toronto: Champlain Society, 1922–1936.

Biggar, ed. The Voyages of Jacques Cartier: Published from the Originals with Translations. Ottawa: Printed by F. A. Acland, 1924.

Champlain, Samuel de. Voyages et descouuertes faites en la Nouvelle France, depuis l'année 1615. Paris: Collet, 1619. Translated by Michael Macklem as Voyages to New France, 1599–1603. Ottawa: Oberon, 1971.

Sources

Bosher, J. F. Business and Religion in the Age of New France (1600–1760). Toronto: Canadian Scholars' Press, 1994.

Eccles, William J. Essays on New France. Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1987.

“France in America,” Library of Congress: <<http://international.loc.gov/intldl/fiahtml/fiahome.html>> (viewed August 15, 2006).

Pritchard, James. In Search of Empire: The French in the Americas, 1670–1730. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

New Republic (1789–1828)

The era of the new nation referred to as the New Republic (or Early Republic) was marked by the ratification of the CONSTITUTION in 1789 and the election of Andrew Jackson (1767–1845) in 1828. During this period of nation building, the new government developed its infrastructure and expanded its territories. Upon George WASHINGTON's inauguration on April 30, 1789 Congress established the executive branches of the departments of state, treasury, and war, and the judicial branches on federal, state, and local levels. To alleviate the tremendous war debt, Alexander HAMILTON initiated plans for a Bank of the United States to allow the Treasury Department to “fund the national debt.”

During Thomas JEFFERSON's presidency (1801–1809), the United States doubled its size with the Louisiana Purchase (1803) when for fifteen million dollars it acquired lands from France that included the territory from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains. THE WAR OF 1812 firmly established America as a significant military and economic force in the Anglo-European world.

Culturally, the era of the New Republic inspired literary works that commemorated the establishment of the new nation: poetry, such as Joel BARLOW's Advice to the Privileged Orders in the Several States of Europe (1792) and The Columbiad (1807); Timothy DWIGHT's The Conquest of Canaan (1785) and America (1790); and Philip FRENEAU's “On the Emigration to America” (1784); essays by Benjamin FRANKLIN, Thomas PAINE, and Alexander Hamilton; letters of Abigail ADAMS, John ADAMS, and Thomas Jefferson; drama, such as Royall TYLER's THE CONTRAST (1787); Mercy Otis WARREN's History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (3 volumes, 1805); and fiction, such as Charles Brockden BROWN's WIELAND (1798), William Hill BROWN's The Power of Sympathy (1789), J. Hector St. John de CRÉVECOEUR's Letters from an American Farmer (1782), James Fenimore Cooper's Leatherstocking Tales (1826–1841), Hannah Webster FOSTER's THE COQUETTE, Gilbert IMLAY's The Emigrants (1793), Washington Irving's (1783–1859) The Sketch Book (1819–1820), Susanna ROWSON's CHARLOTTE: A TALE OF TRUTH, Catherine Maria Sedgwick's (1789–1867) Hope Leslie (1827), and Tabitha TENNEY's Female Quixotism (1801).

Sources

Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Elliott, Emory. Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic 1725–1810. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Ferguson, Robert A., Reading the Early Republic. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2004.

New Spain

The area known as New Spain comprised regions of southwestern colonial America and South America that were ruled by Spain in the mid sixteenth century. Governed by appointed archbishops, these tightly controlled vicerealties were mined for gold and silver for the enrichment of the Spanish Empire. Christopher COLUMBUS's 1492–1493 voyage to the West Indies allowed Spain to colonize the Caribbean by establishing a base at Hispaniola (now Haiti). Alvar Nuñez CABEZA DE VACA's memoir of a failed attempt to explore and to colonize the Gulf coast of Mexico in 1528 chronicles key conflicts between native and Spanish contact. In 1528 Cabeza de Vaca describes northern Florida with its “immense trees and open woods” and “many lakes, great and small” with abundant wild life: “There are deer of three kinds, rabbits, hares, bears, lions, and other wild beasts.” Floridian exploration was, in fact, initiated by Juan Ponce de León in 1515; the Mississippi region was explored by Hernando de Soto between 1539 and 1542; and California was charted by Juan Rodríguez Cabrillo in 1542. South American conquistadors included Hernán Cortés, who conquered the Aztecs in 1519–1521. Missionary efforts extended north and south under the jurisdiction of Jesuits and Franciscans, respectively. To implement these conversion and acculturation efforts, missionaries established a congregacion, settlements separated from native villages, and by 1630 approximately sixty thousand Christianized Native Americans were under Spanish control.

Notable chroniclers of New Spain include poets, Sor Juana Inéz de la CRUZ and Gaspar Pérez de Villagrà (1555–1620); missionaries Eusebio Francisco Kino (1644–1711) and Francisco PALÓU; explorer José Longino Martínez (?–1803); historians El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega (1539–1616) and Felipe Guamán Poma de Ayala (1525?–1615?).

Sources

Bauer, Ralph. The Cultural Geography of Colonial American Literatures: Empire, Travel, Modernity. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.

Mundy, Barbara E. The Mapping of New Spain: Indigenous Cartography and the Maps of the Relaciones Geograficas. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

The New-York Gazette (1725–1744) periodical

The New-York Gazette, edited by William Bradford (1663–1752), was the first paper published in New York City and the first to use this title. Bradford, his son Andrew BRADFORD, and a third partner had established THE AMERICAN WEEKLY MERCURY in Philadelphia six years earlier. William Bradford had extensive prior experience as a printer and publisher. Trained in London by QUAKER printer Andrew Sowle, who was also his father-in-law, Bradford immigrated to Philadelphia sometime prior to 1685, where he established his own shop.

His first publication, an ALMANAC for 1686, Kalendarium Pennsilvaniense, or, America's Messinger, Being an Almanack, written by Samuel Atkins, included a remark that was offensive to the Quaker authorities. Bradford was ordered to cease publication without prior clearance from the council. He resisted, and the attempt to suppress him forced him to drift further away from his religious affiliation. In 1692 Bradford printed the tracts of George Keith (1639?–1716), a schismatic Quaker leader, under the title An Appeal from the Twenty-Eight Judges to the Spirit of Truth (1692). He was arrested and imprisoned for sedition.

Following his release from jail in 1693, Bradford moved his family to New York City. He also converted from Quakerism to the Anglican faith. Establishing himself in New York, he quickly became one of the most prominent printers, securing an extensive amount of government business.

With its initial publication on November 8, 1725, The New-York Gazette became only the second newspaper established in the colonies outside Boston and the fifth paper overall. Like THE BOSTON NEWS-LETTER, THE BOSTON GAZETTE, and Andrew Bradford's American Weekly Mercury, The New-York Gazette concentrated on the news—commercial, foreign and domestic—as a means of securing readers who were also interested in commercial notices and advertisements. Most of this news was gleaned from imported newspapers and from reports gathered from the readership of the Gazette. Bradford also reprinted essays and literary pieces taken from English newspapers. At the same time he shared features and advertising with his son's paper in Philadelphia.

As a government printer, Bradford avoided controversy in order to maintain his contracts. His strategy succeeded in terms of circulation: the Gazette was widely read in New York, New Jersey, and the southern colonies. Bradford's editorial position changed in 1733 during the controversy over John Peter ZENGER, publisher of Zenger's Weekly Journal. Offended by Zenger's antigovernment articles, the governor accused him of libel. Zenger was arrested and tried; but, defended by Andrew Hamilton, the ablest lawyer of the period, he was acquitted. Bradford, who was Zenger's competitor and also tied to the government printing contracts, supported the case against Zenger, as did his son Andrew in Philadelphia.

In the end the Zenger controversy was costly for The New-York Gazette. Zenger emerged as the popular figure and the legal victor. The Gazette lost circulation, and Zenger took control of its most important government printing contract. The Gazette suspended publication in 1744, when Bradford retired from the printing business altogether.

Work

The New-York Gazette. New York: Printed and sold by William Bradford, 1725–1744; Early American Imprints.

Sources

Kobre, Sidney. The Development of the Colonial Newspaper. Gloucester, Mass.: Peter Smith, 1960.

Sloan, William David, and Julie Hedgepeth Williams, The Early American Press, 1690–1783. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

William Bradford his Connection with Early Printing: A Sketch Delivered at a Meeting of the New York Historical Society Subsequent to the Placing of a Tablet at the Hanover Square Corner of the Cotton Exchange. New York: A. D. Farmer & Son Type Founding, 1898.

Northwest Territory and Northwest Ordinances

The Northwest territory refers to the land between the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers belonging alternately to the French, British, and Native Americans that was disputed during the Seven Years' War (1754–1763; see FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR) and gradually annexed and settled in the period following the Treaty of Paris (1783), which officially signaled the end of the Revolutionary War. Large portions of the territory came under the jurisdiction of the Continental Congress as individual colonies sold lands to pay off war debts. Prior to the ratification of the CONSTITUTION (1789), the Continental Congress produced several key documents to provide for the governance, sale, and eventual statehood of these lands. As the chairperson of a committee, Thomas JEFFERSON released the Report on Government for Western Territory, on March 1, 1784, which states in part “that the territory ceded or to be ceded by Individual States to the United States whensoever the same shall have been purchased of the Indian Inhabitants & offered for sale by the U.S. shall be formed into distinct States bounded in the following manner as nearly as such cessions will admit. . . .” With the Ordinance of 1785, Congress officially designated federal lands in the territory north and west of the Ohio River and sectioned off the territory into townships, which would be further divided into plots of 640 acres each and sold at $1.00 per acre.

Throughout these developments, government officials met with delegations from the DELAWARE, Wyandot, Chipewewa, Ottawa, and Shawnee tribes to negotiate treaties for land acquisition. The Northwest Ordinance, or the “Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States, North-West of the River Ohio,” passed on July 13, 1787, made provisions for the governance of the surveyed lands: “Be it ordained by the United States in Congress assembled, That the said territory, for the purposes of temporary government, be one district, subject, however, to be divided into two districts, as future circumstances may, in the opinion of Congress, make it expedient.” Slavery was banned in this territory north of the Ohio River, and goodwill toward Native Americans was extended with the goals of maintaining “peace and friendship” and the promise that “their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent.” When a district’s population reached sixty thousand free citizens, it could apply for statehood and frame a state constitution. In this manner the Old Northwest was settled: Ohio (1803), Indiana (1816), Illinois (1818), Michigan (1837), and Wisconsin (1848). As the territory became organized, land-seeking pioneers pushed further west across the Mississippi River.

Notable chroniclers of the Northwest territory include Samuel de CHAMPLAIN, Jean Nicolet (1598?–1642), Pierre Esprit (1636?–1710); Nicolas Perrot (1644–1718), Father Claude Allouez (1620–1690?), Father Jacques Marquette (1637–1675); and Daniel Boone (1734–1820).

Sources

American Journeys: Eyewitness Accounts of Early American Exploration and Settlement: A Digital Library and Learning Center. Wisconsin Historical Society: <<http://www.americanjourneys.org/>> (viewed August 15, 2006).

Hunt, Douglas R. The Ohio Frontier: Crucible of the Old Northwest, 1720–1830. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1996.

Watts, Edward. An American Colony: Regionalism and the Roots of Midwestern Culture. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2002.

Norton, John (1715–1778) minister, captivity narrative writer

John Norton wrote one of the many CAPTIVITY NARRATIVES that arose from almost a century of imperial conflict between Great Britain and its rivals, France and Spain. Although the British managed to win some Indian allies in these wars, the border towns of English colonies were frequently raided and attacked by enemy tribes. Norton’s account of his capture and imprisonment is one of the best known of this genre. While Narrative of the Capture and Burning of Fort Massachusetts by the French and Indians (1748) includes the customary Puritan attention to God’s role in delivering Christians from the hands of heathens and Papists, Norton’s narrative has a distinctive political and nationalistic theme. He condemns French imperialistic ambitions and is careful to record evidence of French cruelty and deception, including a description of the French mutilation of a dead British soldier’s body.

Norton was born in Berlin, Connecticut, on November 16, 1715, the fourth son of John and Ann Thompson Norton, pioneer settlers in the region. John was sent to Yale, where he graduated in 1737. Four years later he was ordained a Congregationalist minister at Deerfield, Massachusetts. Soon afterward he took the pulpit of the Falltown (Bernardston) Congregational Church. In 1746, during King George’s War, the Reverend Norton accepted a post as chaplain for the British troops and families at Fort Massachusetts. On August 20 of that year the British garrison was stormed by French and Indian troops, and Norton was among those captured and taken by forced march to Canada. He remained in a Quebec jail until he was ransomed the following summer. For his suffering, the Connecticut General Court awarded Norton reparations of £100. In fall 1748 Norton became pastor of the Middletown (Chatham), Connecticut, church where he remained, with his family, until he died of smallpox on March 24, 1778.

Work

Norton, John. Narrative of the Capture and Burning of Fort Massachusetts by the French and Indians, in the Time of the War of 1744–1749. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland, 1748; Albany, N.Y.: Printed by Joel Munsell for S. G. Drake, 1870; reprinted as The Redeemed Captive, New York: Garland, 1977.

Sources

Ashley, Jonathan. The United Endeavours and Earnest Prayers of Ministers and People, to Promote the Great Design of the Ministry. . . . Upon . . . the Ordination of Mr. John Norton, a Pastor to the Church There. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland & T. Green, 1742; New York: Readex Microprint, 1985.

Strong, Pauline Turner. Captive Selves, Captivating Others: The Politics and Poetics of Colonial American Captivity Narratives. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1999.

The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym by Edgar

Allan Poe (New York: Harper, 1838) novel

Serialized in part in the January–February 1837 issue of THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER, Poe's only completed novel, The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym of Nantucket, chronicles the travels at sea of Pym, a young adventurer. These begin in Nantucket and end near the South Pole in an all-white environment guarded by a huge, absolutely white, shrouded human figure. In the course of this journey Pym survives mutiny, cannibalism, starvation, animal attacks, and captivity at the hands of barbaric islanders. Poe suppressed his authorship from the title page of the novel; a preface (signed A. G. Pym) and an afterword claim the tale to be fact. Although the book did not sell well in the United States, it was reasonably popular in England (where it was generally accepted as a true account) and in France, where it was translated by Charles Baudelaire. In the twentieth century many have seen this as one of Poe's most important works.

Sources

Kopley, Richard, ed. Poe's Pym: Critical Explorations. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1992.

Sanborn, Geoffrey. "A Confused Beginning: The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym of Nantucket," in The Cambridge Companion to Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Kevin J. Hayes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002. pp. 163–177.

—Nicole de Fee

Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass by

Frederick Douglass (Boston: Anti-Slavery Office, 1845) autobiography

The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave, Written by Himself presents in written form the heroic story Douglass had been delivering on the abolitionist circuit for four years prior to its publication. It tells of his birth as a slave in Maryland sometime around 1818 and of his long struggle against the captivity of his mind and body. Douglass recounts his secret efforts to learn to read and write and his two attempts to escape his masters. After his second attempt, in 1838, proves successful, he spends three years as a fugitive. The narrative ends with Douglass joining the abolitionists as a reluctant but powerfully eloquent orator for the cause. In an appendix Douglass denounces the hypocrisy of proslavery Christianity. By announcing in print his identity as an escaped slave, Douglass incurred considerable risk to himself. The Narrative achieved a tremendous influence, selling fifty thousand copies in its first five years. A powerful antislavery tract, the book gives a firsthand report of both the cruelties of the slave system and the brutal reality of a slave's life. It testifies equally powerfully, however, to the intellectual and rhetorical achievement of an African American former slave.

Source

Douglass, Frederick. Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, An American Slave, Written by Himself, edited by William L. Andrews and William McFeely. New York: Norton, 1997.

—Perry Trolard

Nasby, Petroleum Vesuvius

See LOCKE, DAVID ROSS.

Nast, Thomas (1840–1902) journalist, illustrator

Born in Germany, Nast came to the United States when he was six years old and began a career as an illustrator when he was fifteen, working for FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. After providing sketches for European newspapers on Giuseppe Garibaldi's 1860 campaign for Italian unification, Nast joined the staff of HARPER'S WEEKLY in 1862 as a cartoonist who lampooned Northern defeatists in support of the Union effort during the Civil War. In 1863 he drew his first political caricature, a form he pioneered, making him and Harper's the most powerful media voices in the United States. Nast was the first to use illustrations of the donkey and the elephant to represent the Democratic and Republican parties, and he created the image of the Tammany tiger to campaign against the corrupt Tweed Ring that controlled New York City government in the 1870s.

Nast left Harper's in 1886 but continued drawing cartoons, which he submitted to various newspapers until 1892 when he began publishing his own Nast's Weekly. The paper was short-lived, failing in 1893. In March 1902 Nast accepted President Theodore Roosevelt's offer of a consulship in Guayaquil, Ecuador. Several months later Nash contracted yellow fever. He died December 7, 1902.

Sources

Keller, Morton. The Art and Politics of Thomas Nast. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Visnon, John C. Thomas Nast, Political Cartoonist. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1967.

The Nation (1865– ) periodical

Since its founding in 1865, this New York weekly journal has published articles about politics and culture. The first editor, E. L. Godkin, published the work of America's foremost writers, including William Dean HOWELLS, Henry JAMES Sr. and his two sons William JAMES and Henry JAMES JR., Francis PARKMAN, and Charles Francis Adams Jr. The journal also became known for printing well-informed and exacting reviews of the literature of the day. Devoted to democratic principles and progressive politics, The Nation was abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM) and strongly promoted public education. Its editors campaigned against corrupt city political machines such as the Tweed Ring, and for civil-service reform. The Nation was sold to the New York Post in 1881, and when Godkin retired, W. P. Garrison began an editorship that continued through the turn of the century.

Source

Humes, Dollena J. Oswald Garrison Villard: Liberal of the 1920s. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1960.

The National Anti-Slavery Standard (1840–1872) periodical

Published in New York by the American Anti-Slavery Society, this periodical called for emancipation of slaves and their subsequent education. Strongly pro-Union, it was edited from 1848 to 1849 by James Russell LOWELL, who remained affiliated with the magazine until 1852, publishing in it many of the pieces that were collected later as THE BIGLOW PAPERS (1902). After 1870 the magazine variously changed its title, publication schedule, and causes, taking on TEMPERANCE and women's rights before expiring.

The National Era (1847–1860) periodical

This Washington, D.C., antislavery journal was edited by Gamaliel Bailey and featured the serialization of Harriet Beecher STOWE'S UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1851–1852). The National Era also published Nathaniel HAWTHORNE'S short story "The Great Stone Face" (1850) and many works by John Greenleaf WHITTIER.

Source

Harrold, Stanley. Gamaliel Bailey and Antislavery Union. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.

Native American Literature

With the exception of a few pictographs, such as those that characterize the epic WALAM OLUM of the Delaware Indians, Native American literature for the most part remained an oral tradition until the nineteenth century. Tribal histories often included myths and legends, but first-person memoirs that incorporated elements of oral storytelling were among the earliest examples of Native American literature to take the form of written narratives. The first of these to be published was A Son of the Forest (1829), written in English by the Pequot William APRESS and reflecting the type of spiritual confessions popular during the period. Other significant personal narratives combining autobiography with ethnography include The Life, History, and Travels of Kah-ge-ga-gah-bowh (1847) by the Ojibway George COPWAY, and Life among the Piutes (1883) by the Paiute Sarah Winnemucca.

Some Native Americans narrated their life stories to others. The first—and to many readers the most impressive of these—was the Sauk chief BLACK HAWK'S Black Hawk, an Autobiography (1833), translated by Antoine Le Claire and edited by John B. Patterson. Governor Blacksnake's narrative, which was recorded around the same time as Black Hawk's, was set down in Seneca-style English by Benjamin Williams. Blacksnake's narrative was edited and published much later under the title Chainbreaker (1989).

The first Native American author to publish in English was the Mohegan, Samson Occom, whose popular A Sermon Preached at the Execution of Moses Paul, an Indian (1772), reflected Occom's calling as a missionary. In 1854 Cherokee John Rollin RIDGE's The Life and Adventures of Joaquin Murieta, which mythologized the real-life mixed-blood bandit was both the first Native American novel and the first novel published in California. Ridge's posthumously collected Poems (1868) was also the only volume of poetry published by a Native American writer in the nineteenth century. Among the earliest novels by a Native American woman was the Creek Sophia Alice Callahan's Wynema, a Child of the Forest (1891), which concerns the interaction between a Creek girl and her missionary teacher.

Sources

Jaskoski, Helen, ed. Early Native American Writing: New Critical Essays. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Krupat, Arnold. The Voice in the Margin: Native American Literature and the Canon. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Walker, Cheryl. Indian Nation: Native American Literature and Nineteenth-Century Nationalisms. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1997.

Nature by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1836)

essay

Originally published anonymously, Ralph Waldo EMERSON's first book, Nature, laid the foundation for TRANSCENDENTALISM by identifying nature as a source of the spirit as he urged his readers to establish an "original relation to the universe." Emerson proposed that, instead of relying on received ideas, Americans should "have a poetry and philosophy of insight and not of tradition, and a religion by revelation to us, and not the history of [our ancestors]." To accomplish this, individuals must experience nature directly, consulting their own intuition and observations.

Emerson urged readers to look for evidence of the spirit in the material world by observing nature precisely, learning to appreciate its beauty, studying its processes, and cultivating knowledge of "natural facts." In this way a person's mind (understanding, reason, and imagination) would become disciplined. Proximity to nature, Emerson suggested, would also bring one closer to the "OVER-SOUL," or "Universal Mind" of existence. By performing this faithful dedication to nature, Emerson explained, man would naturally restore and perpetuate a proper (and essentially optimistic) view of himself and his surroundings.

Sources

Emerson, Ralph Waldo, anonymously. Nature. Boston: Munroe, 1836.

Hodder, Alan D. Emerson's Rhetoric of Revelation: Nature, the Reader, and the Apocalypse Within. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1989.

Neal, John (1793–1876) poet, dramatist, novelist, critic

John Neal, born into a Quaker family in Portland, Maine, was immersed in a literary career by the time he was in his mid twenties. His works include a narrative poem, "Battle of Niagara" (1818); a blank-verse tragedy, Otho (1819); and several novels, including Logan, A Family History (1822), the story of an Indian chief. Seventy-Six (1823), a novel about the Revolutionary War, is regarded as the best of Neal's early work. When he published Randolph (1823), an epistolary novel that attacked both British and American authors, he was challenged to a duel by Edward Pinkney, the son of one of Neal's literary targets, Baltimore editor William Pinkney. Neal left the country rather than face his adversary.

In England, Neal wrote for Blackwood's Magazine, attempting the first serious studies of American authors (collected and published in 1937 as American Writers). Neal also continued to write novels, including another tale of the American Revolution, Brother Jonathan (1825), and Rachel Dyer (1828), an account of the Salem witchcraft trials. A prolific writer, he published many other popular novels about New England and the West.

Neal's work was important because he was among the first American writers to address subjects such as American literary history, but his writing is riddled with factual errors. Neal preferred flamboyance over accuracy, as demonstrated in his memoir, Wandering Recollections of a Somewhat Busy Life (1869).

Sources

Lease, Benjamin. That Wild Fellow John Neal and the American Literary Revolution. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.

Sears, Donald A. John Neal. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

The New-England Magazine (1831–1835)

periodical

This Boston monthly, published and edited by Joseph T. Buckingham, was considered the nation's premier magazine before the advent of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in 1857. It was politically conservative and published notable contributors such as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, Noah WEBSTER, and Oliver Wendell HOLMES. In 1835 The New-England Magazine was taken over by THE AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

A New England Nun and Other Stories by Mary E. Wilkins Freeman (New York: Harper, 1891)
short-story collection

The stories in Mary E. Wilkins FREEMAN's second collection originally appeared in popular periodicals such as THE CENTURY MAGAZINE, THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, and HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE. As works of LOCAL COLOR, they memorialize the New England of the past, rapidly disappearing into the modern age. Freeman's characteristic thematic foci—the toll of poverty, the burden of religion, family relationships, courtship, and the unyielding New England will—are central to the collection. All of the stories deal with the necessity to fulfill societal and familial obligations while trying to achieve individual fulfillment. “The Revolt of ‘Mother’” and “A Church Mouse” depict apparently meek women whose wills prevail over patriarchal authority; others, such as “A New England Nun,” depict women rejecting marriage in favor of independence. Several of the stories focus on family love, pride, old age, and poverty as factors that govern actions. For example, in “A Gala Dress,” sisters share one good dress, taking turns attending social events; and in “A Kitchen Colonel,” Abel Lee sacrifices his one pleasure for the sake of his granddaughter. In “Christmas Jenny,” the meek Mrs. Carey stands up to the minister and townspeople to defend Jenny, an eccentric, poverty-stricken woman who has been labeled a witch. Developed through complex character relationships, these stories are especially valued for the psychological insights into women's actions they offer as points of contrast to the era's prevailing domestic ideology, which confined women's influence to within the walls of the home and to moral and religious matters.

Sources

Donovan, Josephine. New England Local Color Literature: A Woman's Tradition. New York: Ungar, 1983.

Reichardt, Mary R. Mary Wilkins Freeman: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1997.

—Mary Rose Kasraie

A New Home—Who'll Follow? by Caroline Stansbury Kirkland (1839) novel

Edgar Allan POE lauded A New Home—Who'll Follow? or, Glimpses of Western Life as a book of “truth and novelty,” a blend of satire, personal history, and ethnography whose conversational tone and “clavering” (gossipy) digressions critique the rugged individualism popularized by James Fenimore COOPER's LEATHER-STOCKING TALES and other antebellum FRONTIER FICTION. The book, now usually termed a novel, grew from letters Kirkland wrote to friends about her odd experiences at the Michigan settlement she and her husband founded. Its conception of “home” thus emerges from Kirkland's relationships both to her East Coast readers and to the Western phenomenon of land speculation. One of America's earliest examples of literary REALISM, the novel is a witty, pointed critique of speculation. Its narrator, an urbane New Englander named Mary Clavers, is self-aware of her outsider status. By placing a female narrator within the strictly masculine tradition of Western writing, Kirkland transcended gender expectations, but A New Home does not exploit the entertainment value of her narrator's fish-out-of-water status. Instead, her satire targets the genre itself by countering the macho ROMANTICISM of frontier fiction with anecdotal tales of frontier domesticity.

Source

Kirkland, Caroline. A New Home, Who'll Follow?; or, Glimpses of Western Life. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1990.

—Jason Arthur

The New York Ledger (1855–1903) periodical

In 1851 the publisher Robert Bonner purchased the Merchants' Ledger, an illustrated weekly, changing its name in 1855 to The New York Ledger. Bonner served as editor until 1887, using his skill as a marketer to make it the most successful magazine of its day. The New York Ledger appealed to both popular and sophisticated tastes, publishing Fanny Fern (Sara Payson Willis PARTON) alongside the English poet Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Bonner also solicited requests for advice from readers, then printed responses from various experts. Bonner retired in 1887, and the publication continued for another decade largely as he created it. In 1898 it became a monthly, and in 1903 it ceased publication altogether.

The New York Times (1851– ) periodical

Founded in 1851 by Henry J. Raymond, The New York Times was initially a penny newspaper that reflected the Whig views of its financial backers. After 1856, however, it favored the newly reformed Republican Party. Following Raymond's premature death in 1869, George Jones, one of the paper's financiers, took over the editorial chair. Under Jones's leadership the paper assumed a somewhat more sensational tone as it went after the corrupt Tammany Hall political machine that had a stranglehold on New York City. After Jones died in 1891, the quality of journalism at the Times began a five-year decline, until it was purchased by Adolph Ochs, who helped restore the respectability of the paper that boasts “All the News That's Fit to Print.”

Sources

Davis, Elmer H. History of the New York Times, 1851–1921. New York: Greenwood Press, 1969.

Salisbury, Harrison E. Without Fear or Favor: The New York Times and Its Times. New York: Times Books, 1980.

New-York Tribune* (1841–1924) periodical

Founded and edited by Horace GREELEY, the Tribune became known for its biting editorials and superior journalism, including the literary criticism of George RIPLEY, who wrote the first daily book review in the nation. Also on Greeley's staff were H. J. Raymond, who went on to found THE NEW YORK TIMES; and Charles Anderson Dana, later part owner of The New York Sun. Before the CIVIL WAR Greeley opposed slavery and was instrumental in the election of Abraham Lincoln to the presidency. After the war, Greeley's liberal editorials embraced suffrage for former slaves and opposed punitive Reconstruction measures. After Greeley's death in 1872, Whitelaw Reid held the editorial post, turning the Tribune into the nation's most prominent Republican newspaper. Upon the death of his father, Ogden Mills Reid assumed leadership of the paper, which lost circulation until it merged in 1924 with the New York Herald, becoming the Herald Tribune. The Herald Tribune ceased publication in 1966.

Sources

Isely, Jeter Allen. Horace Greeley and the Republican Party, 1853–1861. New York: Octagon Books, 1965.
Williams, Robert Chadwell. Horace Greeley: Champion of American Freedom. New York: New York University Press, 2006.

Nick of the Woods* by Robert Montgomery Bird (2 volumes, Philadelphia: Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837) novel

Set in Kentucky during the 1780s, Nick of the Woods; or, The Jibbenainosay; A Tale of Kentucky is Robert Montgomery BIRD's most popular novel. While journeying to find a new home on the frontier, Roland Forrester and his cousin Edith hear the local legend of Nick of the Woods, a fierce Indian killer known to the Shawnees as Jibbenainosay. They also meet Nathan Slaughter, a man known as "the only man in Kentucky that won't fight." In a fast-paced and complicated series of captures, escapes, and revelations, the cousins are saved from gruesome deaths at the hands of the Shawnees, learn of an inherited fortune, and happily return together to Virginia. Slaughter, whose actions have been crucial to their survival, is revealed as Jibbenainosay.

Bird's novel owes much to the FRONTIER FICTION of James Fenimore COOPER, William Gilmore SIMMS, and others. Deeming the "noble savage" portrayed in such works a "poetical illusion," however, Bird drew what he considered a more realistic portrait of Indians "not softened by cultivation,—ignorant, violent, debased, brutal." Often reprinted throughout the nineteenth century, Nick of the Woods was also well known through several different dramatizations.

Source

Bird, Robert Montgomery. Nick of the Woods; or, The Jibbenainosay; A Tale of Kentucky, edited by Curtis Dahl. New Haven, Conn.: College and University Press, 1967.

—Brett Barney

The North American Review* (1815– ) periodical

Founded in Boston in 1815, this review grew out of a magazine called the Monthly Anthology, or Magazine of Polite Literature, which was started in 1803 by a group of "gentlemen of literary interests" who in 1805 organized themselves into the Anthology Club. This literary society, whose members included George Ticknor, William Cullen BRYANT, and Joseph Story, financed and published the magazine until the club disbanded. When the Monthly Anthology expired in 1811, the same group of individuals began The North American Review, which became the most influential review in the country.

The first editor of The North American Review was William Tudor, who, with the aid of such important literary figures as Richard Henry DANA Sr., helped create a literary, critical, and historical review of unprecedented scope. The Review emulated its British counterparts, but it also strove to promote American literature and culture. Markedly scholarly, The Review never had a large circulation, but its pages were a repository for some of the most important American art and philosophy articulated over the next 125 years. Among its most significant early contributions were Bryant's poems "THANATOPSIS" and "TO A WATERFOWL," both of which appeared anonymously, like everything else the magazine published during its early years. The list of early contributors to The Review includes Alexander Everett, Edward Everett, John Adams, Daniel Webster, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, and Francis PARKMAN. Several of these individuals also served as editors of the magazine, as did James Russell LOWELL and Henry ADAMS.

When Lowell became editor in 1863, he accepted the challenge of rejuvenating the magazine and began recruiting new writing talent. Adams took over as editor in 1872 and spent the next four years helping the magazine enlarge its focus to include politics, science, and philology. In 1878 The Review moved to New York City, where it became yet more contemporary, focusing on the latest, most controversial social, religious, and political movements. Literature was not neglected, however; the magazine published works by Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Walt WHITMAN, and by the turn of the century The Review was also publishing foreign authors such as the Russian novelist Leo Tolstoy and the Italian poet Gabriel D'Annunzio.

After World War I, the magazine's then owner and editor, George Harvey, served as U.S. ambassador to Great Britain, and circulation declined. Finally, unable to compete with the new illustrated reviews, The North American Review ceased publication in 1939. A quarterly bearing the same name appeared in 1963 at the University of Northern Iowa.

The North Star (1848–1864) periodical

An antislavery weekly founded by Frederick DOUGLASS in 1848, The North Star was published in Rochester, New York, and financed by a mortgage on Douglass's home. Adhering to Douglass's philosophy of peaceful political change, the newspaper featured articles not only about ABOLITIONISM but also concerning capital punishment, TEMPERANCE, peace, and education. In 1851, after copublisher William C. Nell resigned over political differences, the newspaper merged with the Liberty Party Paper to become Frederick Douglass's Paper.

Source

Levine, Robert S. Martin Delany, Frederick Douglass, and the Politics of Representative Identity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Nye, Bill (1850–1896) journalist

Born in Maine, Edgar Wilson Nye—better known as Bill Nye—grew up on what was then the Wisconsin frontier. Reaching adulthood, he moved farther west to Laramie, Wyoming, where he was admitted to the practice of law and where, in 1881, he founded the Laramie Boomerang. This local newspaper proved to be an excellent outlet for Nye's humorous sketches, which were frequently reprinted elsewhere. In 1886 Nye went to work for the New York World, where he continued to publish his broad humor laced with malapropisms and mangled syntax. New York was his springboard to the greater world, and he soon embarked on the successful lecture tours that made his name a household word. Starting with Bill Nye and Boomerang (1881), Nye published numerous collections of his newspaper pieces, as well as longer works, such as his comic History of the United States (1894) and two plays.

Sources

Kesterson, David B. Bill Nye. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Kesterson. Bill Nye: The Western Writings. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1976.

Nash, Ogden (1902–1971) poet

Frederick Ogden Nash specialized in light verse with a slight satiric bite. He often employed the mannerisms of bad poetry, such as excessive rhyming, to comic effect. His books include The Bad Parents' Garden of Verse (1936), Parents Keep Out (1951), You Can't Get There from Here (1957), and Everyone but Thee and Me (1962).

Sources

Crandell, George W. Ogden Nash: A Descriptive Bibliography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1990.

Nash, Ogden. Loving Letters from Ogden Nash: A Family Album, edited by Linell Nash Smith. Boston: Little, Brown, 1990.

Nathan, George Jean (1882–1958) theater critic

George Jean Nathan graduated from Cornell in 1904. By 1908 he was associated with THE SMART SET, a literary magazine, and later founded THE AMERICAN MERCURY with H. L. MENCKEN. An influential reviewer of Broadway plays, he also published several books, including The Critic and the Drama (1922), Materia Critica (1924), Art of the Night (1928), The Morning after the First Night (1938), and Encyclopaedia of the Theatre (1940). Nathan was instrumental in helping to establish Eugene O'NEILL's reputation as the theater's greatest living playwright.

Sources

Connolly, Thomas F. George Jean Nathan and the Making of Modern American Drama Criticism. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2000.

O'Neill, Eugene. "As Ever, Gene": The Letters of Eugene O'Neill to George Jean Nathan, edited by Nancy L. Roberts and Arthur

W. Roberts. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1987.

Nathan, Robert (1894–1985) novelist, poet, playwright

Robert Gruntal Nathan was a prolific author of short novels. Peter Kindred (1919) is set in a boys' prep school and at Harvard. Several of his works are fantasies, such as The Puppet Master (1923), in which puppets come to life; The Bishop's Wife (1928), the story of an angel who falls in love with a bishop's wife; and There Is Another Heaven (1929), in which a Jew finds himself in a Christian heaven. Other novels have a parable-like quality: One More Spring (1933), Road of Ages (1935), Mr. Whittle and the Morning Star (1947), and Sir Henry (1955). Still others are romances and travel stories, such as Mia (1970) and The Elixir (1971).

Source

Sandelin, Clarence K. Robert Nathan. New York: Twayne, 1968.

Native Son by Richard Wright (New York & London: Harper, 1940) novel

A major contribution to the literature of American NATURALISM, Richard WRIGHT's Native Son was a Book-of-the-Month-Club selection (the first novel by an African American author to be so honored), sold 250,000 copies in its first year, and was awarded the NAACP's Spingarn Medal.

The novel centers on Bigger Thomas, who lives in a rat-infested Chicago slum and is looking for work, having promised his mother he will go to an interview for a chauffeur's job. Knowing only his neighborhood, Bigger is intensely fearful of whites and uncertain how to behave with them. He gets the job and is immediately in trouble—not sure how to react to Mary Dalton, an attractive white girl who associates with communists and includes Bigger in her conversations as he drives her to her meetings.

Mary does not realize how not only her attention but also her lack of understanding of Bigger contributes to his growing sense of panic. When he takes the drunken Mary home, Bigger is aroused by her body and fondles her. When Mary's blind mother enters the room, the hysterical Bigger puts a pillow over Mary's face to keep her from making any noise. By the time her mother leaves, Mary is dead.

Bigger flees when the body is discovered, and he later murders his girlfriend Bessie in sheer terror that she will reveal his hideout. The last section of the novel focuses on Bigger's trial, and on the racism directed at him even as he acknowledges that he is a murderer, albeit one who has killed out of his enormous fear of white society. A powerful mixture of psychological insight and gritty, urban realism, Native Son is both a key modern novel and a tragic examination of African American and American identity.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Bigger Thomas. New York: Chelsea House, 1990.

Kinnamon, Keneth, ed. Critical Essays on Richard Wright's Native Son. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Wright, Richard. How "Bigger" Was Born. New York: Harper, 1940.

—Ben Railton

Naturalism

American literary naturalism was strongly influenced by the French writer Emile Zola and the nineteenth-century emergence of Darwinian science. Determinism, the concept that individuals are controlled by impersonal internal and/or external forces, is the philosophical basis of naturalism. From its American origins in the turn-of-the-century fiction of Frank NORRIS, Stephen CRANE, and Theodore DREISER, naturalism has been devoted to documenting, with apparent objectivity, the extreme experiences of characters existing on the margins of society. Like the so-called realists (see REALISM), naturalists are committed to documenting the surfaces of American life and to probing its concealed depths, but unlike realists, who most often treated recognizable middle-class lives, naturalists usually focused on the desperate existence of characters trapped in slums or in other oppressed settings.

The city has been the favored setting of most naturalists, whose novels and stories are filled with characters living on the margins of society and overwhelmed by forces beyond their control and comprehension. The belief that individual character and fate are predetermined either by heredity or environmental factors characterizes the initial phase of the developing movement (roughly 1895 to 1920). Crane's MAGGIE: A GIRL OF THE STREETS (1893, 1896), Norris's MC-TEAGUE (1896), and Dreiser's SISTER CARRIE (1900) are early examples in this intensely pessimistic genre of American fiction. Maggie is set in the Bowery district of New York City, McTeague in a poor area of San Francisco, and Sister Carrie in both Chicago and New York and encompasses a variety of socioeconomic levels in the two cities. Appearing a few years later than these naturalist texts, Upton SINCLAIR's THE JUNGLE (1906) exposed the unsanitary conditions and the exploitation of immigrant laborers prevalent in the meatpacking industry in Chicago.

Important naturalistic works were also set beyond the city limits, however. THE OCTOPUS (1901), the first volume of Norris's projected trilogy organized around the concept of wheat as an organic force, examined the conflict between farmers and the railroad in the San Joaquin Valley of California. The Alaskan frontier is the setting of Jack LONDON's THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903) and WHITE FANG (1906).

In naturalistic works published in America after 1920, an emphasis upon economic conditions replaced the essentially Darwinian determinism that characterized the fiction of Norris, Crane, and London. Dreiser's AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY (1925) is one of the most ambitious of all naturalistic novels. Inspired by a real murder and its subsequent media coverage, An American Tragedy exemplifies the documentary thrust of naturalism. Writing from a panoramic perspective, John DOS PASSOS in MANHATTAN TRANSFER (1925) examines the cultural and social diversity of New York City. A disintegrating Irish American Chicago neighborhood is the setting of James T. FARRELL's trilogy, STUDS LONIGAN (1935), which consists of Young Lonigan (1932), The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment Day (1935). These novels document the corresponding spiritual degeneration of its eponymous protagonist.

During the GREAT DEPRESSION, American naturalists revived the social-protest novel. In Jews without Money (1930), Michael GOLD detailed the economic sufferings of Jewish immigrants. Refining the narrative techniques of Manhattan Transfer, Dos Passos attacked the excesses of the class structure in The 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936)—the novels that make up his powerful U.S.A. (1938) trilogy. Nelson ALGREN documented the lives of uprooted American workers in Somebody in Boots (1935). D'Arcy McNickle depicted the oppressed circumstances of Native Americans in his naturalistic The Surrounded (1936). Pietro DI DONATO's Christ in Concrete (1939) depicts the exploitation of Italian immigrant construction workers in New York City. Richard Wright in NATIVE SON (1940) mounts an angry protest against the bitter circumstances of African Americans. John STEINBECK's exposés of the sufferings of migrant workers in California, In Dubious Battle (1936) and THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939), are especially important examples of this literary genre.

Naturalism influenced the American stage as well as the novel. By wedding an essentially naturalistic vision with experiments in dramatic technique, Eugene O'NEILL advanced the American theater to new levels of maturity and sophistication. Evolutionary philosophy underlies two of O'Neill's early plays, THE EMPEROR JONES (produced 1921), which was staged in a highly expressionistic style, and THE HAIRY APE (produced 1922). Later O'Neill envisioned classic Greek tragedy from a nineteenth-century New England perspective and in a distinctly naturalistic style in MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA (produced 1931).

Social protest also found its way into the American theater, especially in the plays of Elmer RICE, Clifford ODETS, Langston HUGHES, and Sidney KINGSLEY. In STREET SCENE (produced 1929) Rice evoked the disillusionment among the working-class residents of a New York City tenement. Odets first achieved fame with his overtly Marxist proletarian one-act play Waiting for Lefty (produced 1935). Two other important protest plays were produced that same year: Hughes's angry exposé of white racism in Mulatto and Kingsley's slum drama DEAD END.

Sources

Condor, John J. Naturalism in American Fiction: The Classic Phase. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1984.

Walcott, Charles Child. American Literary Naturalism: A Divided Stream. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1956.

—James R. Giles

"The Negro Speaks of Rivers" by Langston Hughes (1921) poem

First published in THE CRISIS and collected in The Weary Blues (1926), "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" was the poem that established Langston HUGHES as a significant voice in African American literature. Of its genesis, Hughes recalled in his autobiography The Big Sea (1940) that he had just graduated from high school in Cleveland and was traveling across the country by train. Inspired by the beauty and historical significance of the Mississippi, Hughes began to draw connections between it and other great rivers, his own life, and the lives of people throughout history and in other parts of the world. Thinking of the admirable and heroic moments and qualities in black life, Hughes wrote the line "I've known rivers" on an envelope, and in less than an hour he had drafted the poem that helped to define his aesthetic sensibilities, identify his thematic commitments, and launch his professional writing career.

Written in unrhymed free verse, "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" introduces a black poetic persona who transcends human limitations of time and space in proclaiming an identity comprised of experiences linked to the great rivers of the world. The speaker has been both a participant and an observer in his or her own history. The poem's repeated line—"My soul has grown deep like the rivers"—signifies that experience and history, though often oppressive, have not extinguished but rather emboldened the development of a soul, the birth of an immortal self, the proud "I" that now speaks to all who will listen.

—Christopher C. De Santis

Neihardt, John G. (1881–1973) poet, novelist

John Gneisenau Neihardt's formative experience was living in Bancroft, Nebraska, near the Omaha Indians from 1900 to 1907. His most important work as a poet was a five-part poem about the Plains Indians and their defeat during the white conquest of the continent: The Song of Hugh Blas (1915), The Song of Three Friends (1919), The Song of the Indian Wars (1925), The Song of the Messiah (1935), and The Song of Jed Smith (1941). These five books were collected as A Cycle of the West (1949).

Neihardt's fiction includes Indian Tales and Others (1926) and the novel When the Tree Flowered: An Authentic Tale of the Old Sioux World (1951). His most acclaimed work was Black Elk Speaks: Being the Life Story of a Holy Man of the Oglala Sioux (1932), his transcription of the dreams and stories told to him. This text has become central in Native American studies because it appears to render the Indian's voice in such unmediated clarity. Two volumes of Neihardt's memoirs have been published: All Is but a Beginning (1972) and Patterns and Coincidences (1978).

Sources

Aly, Lucille F. John G. Neihardt. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1976.

Deloria, Vine, Jr., ed. A Sender of Words: Essays in Memory of John G. Neihardt. Salt Lake City: Howe Brothers, 1984.

New Criticism

This school of analysis of the elements—metaphor, imagery, symbolism, semantics, meter, tone—of a poem or other forms of literature, concentrates on the work itself and not on its historical, biographical, or cultural context. The New Critics were especially influential from 1940 to 1960.

Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn WARREN established and spread the methodology of New Criticism through textbooks such as Understanding Poetry (1938) and Understanding Fiction (1943). These critics, who both taught at Yale University in the 1950s, emphasized the multiple meanings of great works of literature. In their view a poem or a novel has an organic form that can be analyzed and interpreted, although any interpretation would have to recognize the ambiguity and often the irony inherent in art. Literature is by definition paradoxical, and style and form are unified, so that the meaning of a work of literature cannot be separated from its inner organization. In other words, the work of art stands for itself, not for some message or content extracted from the work. In The New Criticism (1941), John Crowe RANSOM (closely associated with Brooks and Warren) codified the critical credo of the New Critics.

The critics W. K. Wimsatt and Monroe Beardsley added to the method of New Criticism by emphasizing the dangers of the “intentional fallacy”—the idea that a work of literature can be interpreted in terms of the author’s stated intentions. From the New Criticism standpoint, the author is not the privileged interpreter of his or her work, because the work itself has an independent life.

The ideas of organic form and the intentional fallacy drew on the long tradition of criticism in England. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, for example, developed the idea of organic form in the Biographia Literaria (1817). D. H. Lawrence expressed his own understanding of the intentional fallacy when he advised readers to “trust the tale, not the teller.” Other English critics who contributed to the methodology of New Criticism include William Empson in Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930) and I. A. Richards in Practical Criticism (1929).

Source

Royden, Mark. Cleanth Brooks and the Rise of Modern Criticism. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1996.

New Directions (1936– ) publishing house

Founded by James LAUGHLIN while he was a Harvard undergraduate, New Directions published modern and experimental literature by world authors, including Ezra POUND—who served as an adviser—Vladimir NABOKOV, Tennessee WILLIAMS, Henry MILLER, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Dylan Thomas. The list was especially strong in poetry. New Directions promoted the reputations of many noncommercial authors. Important foreign works were introduced to American readers in translation. The publication of THE CRACK-UP in 1945 was a key event in the F. Scott FITZGERALD revival that followed.

Sources

Howe, Susan. “New Directions: An Interview with James Laughlin,” in The Art of Literary Publishing: Editors on Their Craft, edited by Bill Henderson. Yonkers, N.Y.: Pushcart Press, 1980, pp. 13–48.

Laughlin, James. Byways: A Memoir, edited by Peter Glassgold. New York: New Directions, 2005.

The New Humanism

New Humanism was a literary and philosophical movement headed by Irving BABBITT and Paul Elmer MORE. The New Humanists emphasized rationality and were opposed to romanticism. They found their source of support in the ancient Greeks. These thinkers believed they were restoring the classical values of civilizations that had been obscured, if not destroyed, by too much emphasis on emotion and subjectivity. They influenced T. S. ELIOT, who believed too much emphasis had been placed on the writer’s personality.

Sources

Hoeveler, David J. The New Humanism: A Critique of Modern America, 1900–1940. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1977.

Samson, Leon. The New Humanism. New York: I. Washburn, 1930.

The New Masses

See THE MASSES.

The New Republic (1914– ) periodical

This newsmagazine and journal of opinion has a distinguished history of commentary on literature and politics. Its contributors have included Rebecca West, Malcolm Cowley, James AGEE, Edmund WILSON, and Walter Lippmann. For much of its history, The New Republic was identified with liberal and progressive politics. Since the 1980s the journal has become more conservative, although it retains its progressive character and maintains a strong pro-Israel political stance.

Sources

Peterson, Merrill D. Coming of Age with the New Republic, 1938–1950. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1999.

Seidman, David. The New Republic: A Voice of Modern Liberalism. New York: Praeger, 1986.

The New Yorker (1925– ) periodical

Founded by Harold Ross, this weekly magazine has significantly influenced the cultural life of the United States. Its contributors have included James THURBER, E. B. WHITE, Dorothy PARKER, John O’HARA, Vladimir NABOKOV, J. D. Salinger, and John Updike. The archetypal “New Yorker story” has little plot, marked wit, and an understated style. Its nonfiction includes both profiles and full-length essays on a wide variety of subjects. Its cartoons are celebrated.

Source

Yagoda, Ben. About Town: The New Yorker and the World It Made. New York: Scribners, 2000.

—Judith S. Baughman

New York Intellectuals

This influential group of writers radicalized by the GREAT DEPRESSION included many, such as William Phillips and Philip RAHV, editors of PARTISAN REVIEW (the premier journal of the New York intellectuals), who began as Communists, but by the mid 1930s opposed Stalinism and often favored Communist dissenters such as Leon Trotsky. Like Phillips and Rahv, many of the New York intellectuals came from immigrant Jewish backgrounds. While Phillips, Rahv, Harold Rosenberg, Clement Greenberg, Lionel TRILLING, Diana TRILLING, and others were primarily literary critics, art historians, and political commentators, others such as Delmore SCHWARTZ, Mary McCarthy, and Elizabeth Hardwick wrote fiction.

McCarthy and Hardwick were exceptions to the rule, however, both as women and as creative artists. They were not from New York, and they were not Jewish, but they became a part of the New York intellectual milieu by espousing the views of the anti-Stalinists and by writing fiction and criticism that had the argumentative edge favored by a group of writers who passionately debated writing and personal beliefs.

Through the Partisan Review, the New York intellectuals introduced European MODERNISM to America and formed the terms of intellectual debate about Abstract Expressionism and popular culture. European exiles such as Hannah Arendt became part of the New York intellectual group. A devotion to high literary standards allowed the New York intellectuals to make connections with Southern writers such as Allan TATE and Caroline GORDON. These writers in turn mentored such figures as Robert LOWELL, who became a kind of ambassador between North and South and between modern and traditional conceptions of literature.

What united the New York intellectuals and won them adherents outside New York was their commitment to works of art. They were allied with critics and poets such as Tate, Robert Penn WARREN, and John Crowe RANSOM, who advocated what came to be called the NEW CRITICISM, a form of literary commentary that concentrated exclusively on the structure and style of the literary work, eschewing discussion of the author's intentions, life, and historical background.

As Norman Podhoretz has pointed out, the New York intellectuals were a kind of family, rife with conflict, jealousy, and competitiveness but united by an aspiration to elevate literary and political discussion to the highest levels. In later years, some members of the group, such as Irving Kristol and Nathan Glazer, became more conservative and rejected not only communism but all forms of Marxism and socialism. Others, like Irving Howe, remained lifelong socialists. Still others like Lionel and Diana Trilling, Mary McCarthy, and Elizabeth Hardwick retained a set of liberal, anticommunist beliefs.

The New York intellectuals as a group began to break up after WORLD WAR II when the United States became engaged in a Cold War with the Soviet Union. Some members of the group became anti-anti-Communists—that is, they rejected an ideology that led to witch-hunts and the rise of Senator Joseph McCarthy, who made his reputation searching out Communist subversives in American institutions. Other members of the group, while deploring McCarthy's tactics of smearing people with the Communist label so that they were blacklisted and lost their jobs, supported the idea that communism was indeed a threat to American institutions.

The Vietnam War also helped to fragment the New York intellectuals. Lionel and Diana Trilling, for example, were appalled by the student riots, even though the Trillings opposed the war itself. Hannah Arendt, on the other hand, supported student protests and opposed the war. Mary McCarthy, one of the most outspoken members of the group, not only opposed the war but supported the North Vietnamese Communists.

As the New York intellectuals began to divide along political lines, their journal, Partisan Review, which had united their conflicting personalities under the banner of anti-Stalinism, lost influence. Arguments about popular culture and politics did not advance beyond positions the group had taken in the 1930s and 1940s. A new generation of writers, such as Susan Sontag, acknowledged the importance of critics such as Lionel Trilling and Harold Rosenberg while trying to forge a new unity between high and low art, thereby recasting the definition of modernism.

Sources

Dorman, Joseph. Arguing the World: The New York Intellectuals in Their Own Words. New York: Free Press, 2000.

Laskin, David. Partisans: Marriage, Politics, and Betrayal Among the New York Intellectuals. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2000.

The New York Times Book Review (1896– ) periodical

The book review section of The New York Times was begun as a Saturday section in 1896 by publisher Adolph Ochs. From its inception, it was published as a tabloid-sized section intended as a literary periodical distinct from the rest of the newspaper. It was changed to a Sunday section in 1911. The New York Times Book Review has the greatest cultural impact on readers and literary opinion of any of the American newspaper review supplements. A favorable first-page review can make a book successful; and the Book Review can damage the prospects for a book by ignoring it.

Source

Shepard, Richard F. The Paper's Papers: A Reporter's Journey through the Archives of The New York Times. New York: Times Books/Random House, 1996.

New York Herald Tribune (1924–1966) periodical

In 1924 The New-York Tribune became the New York Herald Tribune when it merged with the New York Herald. Noteworthy for its coverage not only of news events but also of the theater and books, it was the best-written newspaper in New York but perished in 1966.

—Morris Colden

Newton, A. Edward (1863–1940) bibliophile, essayist
Born in Philadelphia, Alfred Edward Newton became a wealthy man in the electrical equipment business who subsequently devoted himself to his avocation: books. Most of his writings are devoted to his bibliomania, bearing titles such as The Amenities of Book-Collecting and Kindred Affections (1918), A Magnificent Farce and Other Diversions of a Book-Collector (1921), The Greatest Book in the World and Other Papers (1925), and End Papers (1933). Newton also wrote the play Doctor Johnson (1923) about the eighteenth-century English literary figure Samuel Johnson (1709–1784).

Source

Newton, E. Swift. AEN/Remarks Made by E. Swift Newton on the Occasion of His Presentation of the Personal Library of His Father A. Edward Newton to the Free Library of Philadelphia. Philadelphia: Free Library, 1954.

Nightwood by Djuna Barnes (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1937) novel

Djuna BARNES's innovative and influential novel of 1920s Paris, American expatriates, and bisexual lovers centers on Robin Vote, an unstable young woman who attracts and destroys a series of lovers. Men and women alike are drawn to her with physical craving. An alcoholic with a boy-like body and a sensuous aura, Robin marries Felix Volkbein, an Austrian. Although she agrees to have a child with him, she is absent from home for long periods, and he realizes he cannot control her. She gives birth to a son but rejects the role of mother, deserts Felix, and moves to America. There she takes up with Nora Flood, noted for her salon of artists, radicals, and practitioners of black magic. Robin again wanders off and engages in lesbian affairs and alcoholic binges. Finally, Robin leaves Nora for Jenny Petherbridge, a middle-aged woman who is an old hand at breaking up couples and stealing lovers. This time Jenny deserts Robin.

Robin represents the unattainable love object. She is as much a creation of other characters' fantasies as she is of her own actions. Without a stable identity—sexual or otherwise—she cannot remain attached to anyone or fixed to a single locale. Barnes rejected the idea that her book was a lesbian novel, perhaps because the novel itself resists the simple labeling of sexuality and the confinement of individuals to single roles. Aside from the sensational sexual material, the novel is a modernist (see MODERNISM) work that raises important questions of institutions such as marriage and of society itself.

Sources

Plumb, Cheryl J., ed. Nightwood: The Original Version and Related Drafts. Normal, Ill.: Dalkey Archive Press, 1995.

Scott, Bonnie Kime. Refiguring Modernism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.

Frank Norris, circa 1900

Norris, Frank (1870–1902) novelist, short-story writer

To-day is the day of the novel. In no other way and by no other vehicle is contemporaneous life so adequately expressed; and the critics of the twenty-second century, reviewing our times, striving to reconstruct our civilization, will look not to the painters, nor to the architects and dramatists, but to the novelists to find our idiosyncrasy.

—“Responsibilities of the Novelist” (1902)

Frank Norris believed in the importance of fiction to reflect life and to shape it. His vigorous novels were written in a span of nine years: Norris died at thirty-two.

Norris was the first major novelist of the Far West. He was born in Chicago—his father was a wholesale jeweler and his mother an actress—and the Norrises moved to San Francisco when Norris was fifteen. His mother encouraged his artistic talent, and Norris at first thought of becoming a painter. While studying art in Paris, he wrote a long imitation medieval ballad that his mother had printed in a San Francisco newspaper. Norris's interests turned to literature.

Upon his return to the United States, he briefly attended Berkeley, studying geology and zoology. After reading the naturalistic novels of Emile Zola—which crystallized his attitudes toward writing—Norris enrolled at Harvard, where, under the tutelage of Professor Lewis E. Gates, he began, simultaneously, work on two novels, Vandover and the Brute (posthumously published in 1914) and McTeague (1899). Inspiration for this latter work came from a newspaper article, also the starting point for novels by Norris's admired master, Zola.

After leaving Cambridge, with his manuscripts still incomplete, Norris traveled to South Africa to report on the Boer War. Expelled from that country, he returned to San Francisco, where he at last completed McTeague. It was published by the New York firm of Doubleday & McClure, for whom Norris was then working as a reader. Norris proved to be a shrewd judge of others' literary talent; he recommended the publication of Theodore Dreiser's Sister Carrie (1900).

At this time, Norris planned a trilogy of novels centered on wheat—its production, distribution, and consumption. The first of these, The Octopus (1901), a sprawling, exciting novel, sold more than any Norris book to date: 33,000 copies. He straightaway began work on The Pit, the second book of the trilogy, which he completed before he died of peritonitis in October 1902.

In his lifetime Norris published six books: the juvenile poem Yvernelle (1892); Moran of the Lady Letty (1898), a violent story of a shanghai; Blix (1899), a love story; A Man's Woman (1900), a melodramatic tale of arctic exploration; McTeague; and The Octopus. Two of Norris's novels were published after his death: The Pit (1903) and Vandover and the Brute, which was assembled by Norris's younger brother, Charles.

Norris's production was uneven. Half of his published books are dismissible. Moran of the Lady Letty, for all its exciting narrative—ships shanghai, valuable treasure, exotic locales, swashbuckling fights, and romance, seems a commercial product; Blix is resolved by a too-convenient plot device. However, McTeague, The Octopus, and the posthumously published Vandover and the Brute retain their great force. The Pit occupies a middle ground as the sections on Curtis Jadwin's speculations in the wheat market have some of the clarity of The Octopus, but the resolution of the marital difficulties between Jadwin and his wife and the attendant affirmation of a life of simplicity and hope amidst poverty betray the novel's promising complexity of vision.

McTeague is regarded by many as Norris's masterwork. The scenes of lower-class life in San Francisco plus the effects of money and the desire for it on the dentist McTeague and his wife are cold-eyed NATURALISM. The novel gathers power as its episodes accumulate: McTeague's brutish sexuality; McTeague's murder of Trina, his wife; and the final tableau in which McTeague, handcuffed to the body of his enemy, is left to die in the desert are Norris at his best: each scene, however

Frank Norris while a student at the University of California in 1893, the year after his first novel, Yvernelle: A Legend of Feudal France, was published crude, outdoes the previous in excitement and surprise, and the whole is linked together by a chain of events that reinforces the deterministic understanding that drives the novel.

While McTeague is Norris's most unified book, The Octopus is his largest canvas. Its panorama mirrors the largeness of the country with which it deals. Norris provides inside views of railroad-company officials squeezing the wheat farmers out of business to take the profits for themselves; the elemental, shrewd, and rustic ranchers oppose them. Their vision of agriculture and business sets forth Norris's socialistic ideas.

Cover for Norris's novel about a brutish dentist who is deprived of his livelihood and murders his miserly wife

When the railroad defeats the ranchers in a shoot-out, the story acquires tragic depth. Filled with highly melodramatic scenes, including a train robbery and the horrific death of a grain speculator, The Octopus is an exciting novel that uses elements found only in this country.

Vandover and the Brute, available only in a questionable text, is slighter, showing the power of Norris as it traces the decline in fortunes of a Harvard graduate as his beast ("wolf") nature takes over him.

Following his death, Norris's novel The Pit was published to wide acclaim and strong sales. In 1903 it was judged his crowning achievement. However, in the century since its appearance, The Octopus has eclipsed it as richer and more complex, depending less on the sentimentality and coincidences that are some of Norris's weaknesses. McTeague has remained the favorite novel for the classroom. Although not in the front rank of American writers with Dreiser or Ernest HEMINGWAY, Norris is recognized as one of the major figures of American naturalism and the first serious novelist of California and the Far West.

—Roger Lathbury

Principal Books by Norris

Yvernelle: A Legend of Feudal France. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1892.

Moran of the Lady Letty: A Story of Adventure off the California Coast. New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1898.

McTeague: A Story of San Francisco. New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1899.

Blix. New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1899.

A Man's Woman. New York: Doubleday & McClure, 1900.

The Octopus: A Story of California. New York: Doubleday, Page, 1901.

The Pit: A Story of Chicago. New York: Doubleday, Page, 1903.

A Deal in Wheat and Other Stories of the New and Old West. New York: Doubleday, Page, 1903.

The Responsibilities of the Novelist and Other Literary Essays. New York: Doubleday, Page, 1903.

The Third Circle. New York & London: John Lane, 1909.

Vandover and the Brute. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Page, 1914.

Collected Writings Hitherto Unpublished in Book Form, volume 10 of The Argonaut Manuscript Limited Edition of Frank Norris's Works. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1928.

Frank Norris of "The Wave": Stories and Sketches from the San Francisco Weekly, 1893–1897, edited by Oscar Lewis. San Francisco: Westgate Press, 1931.

The Literary Criticism of Frank Norris, edited by Donald Pizer. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1964.

A Novelist in the Making: A Collection of Student Themes and the Novels Blix and Vandover and the Brute, edited by James D. Hart. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1970.

The Apprenticeship Writings of Frank Norris, 1896–1898, edited by Joseph R. McElrath Jr. and Douglas K. Burgess. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1996.

Studying Frank Norris

In his short life—he died at thirty-two—Frank Norris published six books, of which two are central to understanding his work, and one other novel of equal quality; an important collection of essays was assembled from papers left after his death. A student who wants to read these four essential texts will find them neatly packaged in Frank Norris: Novels and Essays, edited by Donald Pizer (New York: Library of America, 1986).

The two important novels are McTeague (1899) and THE OCTOPUS (1901), as well as the posthumous Vandover and the Brute, written in 1894–1895 but published in 1914. Vandover and McTeague are studies in NATURALISM, the literary philosophy with which Norris is most immediately identified. Of these two McTeague is more many-sided and subtler. The Octopus, a long, energetic, episodic novel, shows the development of Norris's political thought. An impassioned plea for socialism, the book is made more complicated and arguably is weakened by a naturalistic argument introduced at its end. This novel was the first volume of Norris's projected "Epic of the Wheat" trilogy. The second entry, almost completed at his death, The Pit, was published to great contemporary acclaim in 1903, although later readers have judged its optimism facile.

Norris's critical writings, produced for newspapers and reviews, were not systematic and were not collected by him. However, the assemblers of The Responsibilities of the Novelist (1903) were not wrong in titling the book after that important essay. Norris's argument for clear-sighted REALISM permeates most of his critical writing.

All of Norris's writings were included in the ten-volume Argonaut Manuscript Limited Edition of Frank Norris's Works (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, Doran, 1928). For this edition, Doubleday included a manuscript leaf from McTeague as a frontispiece; the volume with this page is eagerly sought by Norris scholars. This Argonaut edition includes Norris's lesser writings, which are surprisingly romantic and sentimental for one whose name is associated with the quasi-scientific approach of naturalism. Among these lesser works are Norris's early attempt at Romantic verse, Yvernelle (1892), which only the most devoted will want to attempt (and perhaps not even they), and three lesser novels, Moran of the Lady Letty (1898), Blix (1899), and A Man's Woman (1899). The short stories A Deal in Wheat and Other Stories of the New and Old West (1903) repeat, without the same breadth of canvas and concomitant power, the work of the major novels.

Norris has not been as subject to intense critical commentary as have contemporaries such as Theodore Dreiser and Jack London. The primary bibliography is Joseph R. McElrath Jr.'s Frank Norris: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1992). Jesse S. Crisler and McElrath's secondary bibliography, Frank Norris: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1975), is supplemented in the "Current Publications" section of Frank Norris Studies (1986–2004). The only collection of his correspondence is Frank Norris: Collected Letters, edited by Crisler (San Francisco: Book Club of California, 1986). The most recent biography is McElrath and Crisler's Frank Norris: A Life (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2006). Lawrence Hussian's Harbingers of a Century: The Novels of Frank Norris (New York: Peter Lang, 1999) puts Norris in historical context, argues for materialism as the foundation of Norris's understanding of American life, and surveys previous Norris criticism. Don Graham's Critical Essays on Frank Norris (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980) presents a useful selection of criticism.

—Roger Lathbury

The Novel

At the beginning of the twentieth century the novels of Henry James (1843–1916) represented a highly stylized standard that provides a means for discussing the REALISM of the previous century and the evolution to the REALISM, NATURALISM, and MODERNISM of the new century.

James's brand of realism, like that of his literary contemporaries such as Sarah Orne Jewett (1849–1909), Bret Harte (1836–1902), and William Dean Howells (1837–1920), emphasized the individual over the community, and it functioned within certain implicit and understood conventions associated with the use of authentic settings and familiar character types. Like the later naturalists, James in his narratives exposes what he perceived as the insensate nature of relationships between individuals and between classes in the modern, increasingly industrialized and incorporated world. Rather than presenting a world inevitably and invariably improving, James, in such novels as The Portrait of a Lady (1881), THE AMBASSADORS (1903), and The Golden Bowl (1905), offered scenes and relationships that suggest how volatile modern life is beneath its often placid veneer. Further, through use of metaphoric language, he provided glimpses into the minds of individuals struggling, sometimes heroically and sometimes pathetically, to create fulfilling lives—a style and purpose that foreshadow the aim and aesthetics of modernist writers.

The suggestion in James's fiction that certain laws or forces—not unlike those governing nature—likewise control even life in high society connects his work to that of authors such as Kate Chopin (1851–1904) and Edith WHARTON, and, to some extent, to Stephen CRANE, Theodore DREISER, Jack LONDON, Sinclair LEWIS, Frank NORRIS, and Upton SINCLAIR, all of whom occupy various points along the continuum between realism and naturalism.

An austere version of realism, naturalism was paradoxical in its purposes. On the one hand, authors in the vein of Norris and Sinclair proposed with muckraking novels that, through fiction and through action, wrongdoing could be exposed. In Norris's THE OCTOPUS (1901), for instance, and in Sinclair's THE JUNGLE (1906), the gilded exterior of the railroad monopoly in California and the meatpacking industry in Chicago is pulled away to reveal the sordid side of capitalism run amuck.

Other naturalists took a more literal and, in some instances, more literary approach to themes and issues associated with the universal struggle to survive and to find meaning. In their interpretation of naturalism's theoretical cornerstone, Charles Darwin's Origin of the Species (1859), these writers presented with a certain impassive detachment a pessimistic view of life, one in which events and outcomes were predetermined genetically and environmentally. Among these, London, in his novels THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903) and WHITE FANG (1906), presented thinly veiled allegories through, respectively, a domesticated dog's adaptation to the wild and a wolf dog's domestication.

In THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE (1895), Crane taps into naturalism not for the purposes of reform but instead to convey and explain the young soldier Henry Fleming's rational response to war and his retreat from it. Replete with conventions drawn from the realist camp, the novel highlights the locale, the language, and the ordinary, representative soldier's view of a subject valorized by Romantic writers.

Although Chopin deals with a decidedly different topic in a dissimilar style, the tone and termination of THE AWAKENING (1899) is similar to The Red Badge of Courage in its treatment of its protagonist. Compelled by an essential force she can neither name nor suppress, Edna Pontellier searches for a place in turn-of-the-century American southern society where she might feel at home and at peace. Failing because her nature will not resonate with that of her society, she is driven by her instinctive desire for tranquility to take her own life. Similarly, Wharton in The House of Mirth (1905) constructs a situation in which high society looks not unlike the wild environs inhabited by London's canines, as her heroine Lily Bart is destroyed in the attempt to maintain her tenuous position among the New York upper class.

Even before the end of the Progressive Era and the beginning of WORLD WAR I, American realists and naturalists used their novels to show how political, economic, and biological forces and systems control and determine lives. Two responses to this fundamentally naturalistic view dominated American literature in the ensuing years. The first involved the production of popular, sentimental novels intended to assuage and/or entertain wide audiences; the second entailed the creation of high art designed for audiences with similar needs but different tastes. The former presented readers with formulaic, predictable narratives based loosely on reality and, as was the case with the WESTERN, the latter often acknowledged society's determined nature while proposing the belief that through art people could find and, to some extent, create meaning.

One influential and representative popular novel written near the turn of century was Owen WISTER's THE VIRGINIAN (1902). Frequently cited as the first Western, The Virginian features the now-commonplace laconic cowboy living on the fading frontier according to the unwritten code of the West. The tale reaches its climax when the titular hero kills the villain in a final shoot-out. Wister's novel established a formula followed by countless writers bent on selling books. Zane Grey, a particularly prolific producer of Westerns, had twenty of his works appear on the best-seller list between 1919 and 1939, a testament to his talent for reaching readers and to the popularity of formulaic fiction during the first half of the century.

All novels written by westerners about the West did not follow the pattern established by Wister. Willa CATHER, in her novel MY ÁNTONIA (1918) breaks new ground by broadening the scope of stories set on or near the frontier at the turn of the century. With a framed narrative that is more stark and succinct than sentimental and formulaic, Cather presented an artistic novel akin to those written by her more-acclaimed male contemporaries.

Sherwood ANDERSON, F. Scott FITZGERALD, and Ernest HEMINGWAY tapped into the elastic nature of the novel and presented fiction that offered aesthetic avenues for reconstructing the fragmented post-World War I world. Anderson in WINESBURG, OHIO (1919), Fitzgerald in THE GREAT GATSBY (1925) and TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934), and Hemingway in THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926), A FAREWELL TO ARMS (1929), and FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (1940) found new styles and forms to reexamine long-standing ideas and ideals such as the American Dream and the related myth of progress. Differing from the realistic and romantic fiction that preceded them, their novels, though conspicuously dissimilar, are commonly characterized by a style that relies for its effects on dialogue, image, and action rather than on description, sentiment, and adornment.

On what was initially a "lower frequency," to quote author Ralph Ellison, African American authors—many of whom were associated with the HARLEM RENAISSANCE—created novels that, as was the case with Nella LARSEN's Passing (1929), attempted to untangle the complexities of gender, race, and class. The works of such novelists as Jean TOOMER, Zora Neale HURSTON, and Richard WRIGHT shed light on both new and known problems that African Americans confronted in the first half of the twentieth century, giving voices to the suppressed and silenced. In the process, as is evident from the scope and artistic ingenuity of Toomer's CANE (1923), Hurston's THEIR EYES WERE WATCHING GOD (1937), and Wright's NATIVE SON (1940), they contributed to the development of the novel in American literature.

The problems associated with race relations affected all Americans, a reality not lost on William FAULKNER, a Southern writer whose novels often examined race relations in the Deep South. "In assuming a racial heritage based on dominance and difference," explains Thadious M. Davis, "Faulkner understood himself and his work in both racial and regional perspectives." His understanding of what his work was about and what ends it should serve shaped its content and its construction. The end results were modernist novels such as THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929), LIGHT IN AUGUST (1932), and ABSALOM, ABSALOM! (1936), each of which unfolds in YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, a fictional place that, like the novels themselves, is characterized by multiple perspectives.

Finally, by the late 1930s and early 1940s, with the GREAT DEPRESSION in full swing, many writers produced work that was pragmatic in purpose and proletarian in disposition, including such novels as Michael GOLD's Jews without Money (1930), Nelson ALGREN's Somebody in Boots (1935), and James T. FARRELL's Studs Lonigan trilogy, Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in Chicago Streets (1932), The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment Day (1935). Perhaps best represented by John STEINBECK's THE GRAPES OF WRATH

(1939), these narratives utilized aesthetic innovations to urge reform. In this regard—to paraphrase Alexis de Tocqueville in DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA (1895)—these authors wrote in a time and place wherein many readers, because of trying circumstances, preferred “the useful to the beautiful,” while insisting that “the beautiful be useful.”

Sources

- Cawelti, John G. The Six-Gun Mystique Sequel. Bowling Green: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1999.
- Donaldson, Susan V. Competing Voices: The American Novel 1865–1914. New York: Twayne, 1998.
- Elliot, Emory, and others. The Columbia History of the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.
- Gray, Richard. A History of American Literature. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2004.
- Minter, David. A Cultural History of the American Novel: Henry James to William Faulkner. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

—Colin Irvine

Nabokov, Vladimir (1899–1977) novelist, short-story writer, poet, autobiographer

*Lolita, light of my life, fire of my loins. My sin, my soul.
Lo-lee-ta: the tip of the tongue taking a trip of three steps down the palate to tap, at three, on the teeth. Lo.
Lee. Ta.*

—Lolita (1955)

The author of nine novels written in Russian and eight NOVELS written in English, Vladimir Nabokov spent his early years in his native Russia and his adulthood as an expatriate in England, Europe, and ultimately the United States. Born in the final year of the nineteenth century in St. Petersburg, Nabokov spent his childhood in the sort of aristocratic luxury associated with Leo Tolstoy, one of Nabokov's most significant artistic forebears. Fluent in Russian, French, and English almost from the beginning, Nabokov also discovered early in his childhood the three primary obsessions of his life: chess, butterflies, and literature. In the wake of the Russian Revolution, Nabokov's father moved his family first to England, where Nabokov matriculated at Trinity College, Cambridge, then to Berlin. Just before Nabokov graduated from Trinity College in 1922, with honors in French and Russian Literature, his father was assassinated in Berlin. Nabokov moved to Berlin in summer 1922, working as a writer and as a tutor. He published two volumes of poetry, short fiction, and drama. In 1925, the year he married Véra Slonim, he completed his first Russian-language novel, Mary, published in Berlin under the pseudonym Sirin. Eight more novels in Russian followed, in addition to scores of stories and poems, the whole corpus pitched at a small audience of Russian exiles. In the wake of the Nazi ascendancy in the late 1930s, Nabokov took his wife and son, Dmitri, to France.

Vladimir Nabokov

Front covers for the two-volume first edition of Nabokov's 1955 novel, published in the Olympia Press Traveler's Companion series, a Paris imprint that specialized in racy English-language fiction

While in France Nabokov began his first English-language novel, The Real Life of Sebastian Knight, and published it in the United States in 1941, the year after he moved his family there to teach, first at Stanford, then at Wellesley, and, beginning in 1948, at Cornell, where he established his reputation as a brilliant teacher. His lectures on literature were collected after his death in Lectures on Literature (1980), Lectures on Russian Literature (1980), and Lectures on Don Quixote (1983). The change in language did not affect the unique particulars of Nabokov's art, however, for, like the nine Russian novels that preceded it, The Real Life of Sebastian Knight is an elaborately designed invention that employs allusions, coincidences, and complex patternings to create a work that is less a story in prose than a hall of mirrors interspersed with gaps suggesting the presence of another world behind the world of the novel itself. Typical of a Nabokov novel, the book also features a work-within-the-work, in this case a biography about an imagined writer, the Sebastian Knight of the title, written by the writer's brother, who begins to confuse his own life with that of the subject of his biography. In this novel as well as its successor, the politically charged Bend Sinister (1947), Nabokov invites his readers to look beyond the surface story to, as he puts it in his autobiography Speak, Memory (1951), "the mirror-like angles of his clear but weirdly misleading sentences . . . the real life of his books flow[s] in his figures of speech, which one critic has compared to 'windows giving upon a contiguous world . . . a rolling corollary, the shadow of a train of thought.'" The critic is, of course, Nabokov himself.

After 1954, when he translated his autobiography from English into Russian, Nabokov wrote exclusively in English. In December 1953 Nabokov completed Lolita, his best-known novel, about a middle-aged man's obsession for a twelve-year-old American girl. Due to its provocative subject matter, the novel was rejected by American publishers. Nabokov published the novel anonymously in 1955 with the Paris-based Olympia Press, a small house specializing in erotica and pornography. An American edition was published in 1958 and became a best-seller. The narrator, a pedantic European in his forties named Humbert Humbert, narrates his lyrical and disturbing tale of erotic obsession from behind the bars of a prison cell, where he is languishing following the murder of Lolita's lover, Clare Quilty. As a piece of scandalous erotica, Lolita is something of a disappointment; for, as Humbert Humbert himself remarks, "I am not concerned with so-called 'sex' at all. Anybody can imagine those elements of animality. A greater endeavor lures me on: to fix once for all the perilous magic of nymphets."

Nabokov followed Lolita with Pnin (1957), a collection of linked tales about a hapless Russian professor negotiating his way through the strange, gaudy landscape of post-war America. It is one of his most accessible and endearing English language novels. Now wealthy and famous, Nabokov quit teaching and moved to Switzerland, where he continued to publish such remarkable works as Pale Fire (1962) and Ada, or Ardor: A Family Chronicle (1969), while translating his Russian novels into English. Pale Fire, published to great acclaim in 1962, is a novel in the form of a 999-line poem in heroic couplets and 275 pages of commentary plus an index. The latter two sections are written by another glacially self-important pedant named Charles Kinbote, who sees in the title poem a "submerged" narrative detailing the fate of Charles Xavier, the deposed king of Zembla, the "distant northern land" of Kinbote's birth and a metaphor for Nabokov's adored, lost Russia.

Ada, Nabokov's longest and most ambitious book, is a vast Tolstoyan family saga set in the fully imagined alternative world of Antiterra, in which the continents of America and Russia are joined. The culmination of his writing career, Ada reprises and recapitulates Nabokov's artistic obsessions and influences, from its opening parody of the first sentence of Tolstoy's Anna Karenina to its dense, lyrical evocation of Nabokov's Russian past, wherein Nabokov pays direct homage to French writer Marcel Proust's seven-volume novel, In Search of Lost Time.

After Ada, Nabokov wrote only two more novels, the slim intriguing novella Transparent Things (1972), narrated by the ghost of a young publisher named Hugh Person, and Look at the Harlequins! (1974), another novel in the form of a critical work, this time an autobiography of a writer, Vadim Vadimovich, whose career invites, but also cagily disrupts, comparisons with that of his creator. Nabokov died in Switzerland in 1977.

Nabokov looms undisputed as one of the giants of twentieth-century literature, standing alongside such figures as James Joyce and Marcel Proust. Alone among his contemporaries, however, Nabokov's long and distinguished career straddles the dividing line between Modernism and Post-Modernism. As such, his work can be compared, in its complex allusiveness and formal ingenuity, with that of Joyce, and in its playful self-reflexivity and use of parody, with the work of such Postmodern fabulists as John BARTH and Thomas Pynchon, on whom he has exerted an indelible influence. Although critics have often dismissed his formal virtuosity as an end in itself, recent work, particularly that of Michael Wood and Nabokov's biographer Brian Boyd, has sought to trace out an elusive but committed ethical component to Nabokov's insular gamesmanship.

—Marshall Boswell

Dust jacket for the first English translation, 1935, of Nabokov's novel. In 1938 Nabokov retranslated the novel as Laughter in the Dark.

Principal Books by Nabokov

Laughter in the Dark, translated by Nabokov from his Kamera obskura (1933). Indianapolis & New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1938.

The Real Life of Sebastian Knight. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1941.

Nikolai Gogol. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1944.

Bend Sinister. New York: Holt, 1947.

Nine Stories. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1947.

Conclusive Evidence: A Memoir. New York: Harper, 1951.

Lolita. 2 volumes, Paris: Olympia Press, 1955; 1 volume, New York: Putnam, 1958.

Vesna v Fial'te i drugie rasskazy. New York: Chekhov, 1956.

Pnin. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1957.

Nabokov's Dozen: A Collection of Thirteen Stories. New York: Doubleday, 1958.

Inscription by Nabokov to his wife Vera in a 1969 reprint of Nabokov's Dozen: A Collection of Thirteen Stories. Underneath Nabokov's drawing, which he named "Brenthis dozenita Nab", he wrote in Russian "the pre-zenithal mother-of-pearler."

Invitation to a Beheading, translated by Dmitri Nabokov from Nabokov's Priglasenie na kazn' (1938). New York: Putnam, 1959.

Poems. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1959.

Pale Fire. New York: Putnam, 1962.

The Gift from Dar. Translated by Scammell and Nabokov. New York: Putnam, 1963.

The Defense, translated by Michael Scammell and Nabokov from Nabokov's Zashchita Luzhina (1930). New York: Putnam, 1964.

Notes on Prosody: From the Commentary to His Translation of Pushkin's Eugene Onegin. New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1964.

The Eye, translated by Nabokov and Dmitri Nabokov from Nabokov's Sogliadatai (1938). New York: Phaedra, 1965.

Despair, revised and translated by Nabokov from his Otchaianie (1936). New York: Putnam, 1966.

The Waltz Invention: A Play in Three Acts, translated by Dmitri Nabokov. New York: Phaedra, 1966.

Nabokov's Quartet, translated by Dmitri Nabokov. New York: Phaedra, 1966.

King, Queen, translated by Nabokov and Dmitri Nabokov from Nabokov's Knave, Korol', dama, valet (1928). New York: McGraw-Hill, 1968.

Nabokov's Congeries, edited by Page Stegner. New York: Viking, 1968.

Ada, or Ardor: A Family Chronicle. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1969.

Mary, translated by Michael Glenny and Nabokov from Nabokov's Mashen'ka (1926). New York: McGraw-Hill, 1970.

Poems and Problems. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1970.

Glory, translated by Dmitri Nabokov and Nabokov from Nabokov's Podvig (1932). New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971.

Transparent Things. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972.

A Russian Beauty and Other Stories, translated by Nabokov, Dmitri Nabokov, and Simon Karlinsky. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1973.

Strong Opinions. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1973.

Lolita: A Screenplay. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974.

Look at the Harlequins! New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974.

Tyrants Destroyed and Other Stories, translated by Nabokov and Dmitri Nabokov. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1975.

Details of a Sunset and Other Stories, translated by Nabokov and Dmitri Nabokov. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.

Stikhi. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1979.

Lectures on Literature, edited by Fredson Bowers. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich / Columbia, S.C.: Brucoli Clark, 1980.

Lectures on Ulysses: Facsimile of the Manuscript. Bloomfield Hills, Mich.: Brucoli Clark, 1980.

Lectures on Russian Literature, edited by Bowers. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Brucoli Clark, 1981.

Lectures on Don Quixote, edited by Bowers. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich/Brucoli Clark, 1983.

The Man from the USSR and Other Plays: With Two Essays on the Drama, translated by Dmitri Nabokov. San Diego: Brucoli Clark/Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984.

The Enchanter, translated by Dmitri Nabokov. New York: Putnam, 1986; London: Picador, 1987; Russian version published as "Volshebnyk," Russian Literature Triquarterly, 24 (1991): 9-41.

The Stories of Vladimir Nabokov. New York: Knopf, 1995.

Nabokov's Butterflies: Unpublished and Uncollected Writings, edited by Brian Boyd and Robert Michael Pyle, translations by Dmitri Nabokov. Boston: Beacon, 2000.

Studying Vladimir Nabokov

Vladimir Nabokov was a prolific and famously difficult writer. A student is well advised to begin by reading the Library of American volumes Novels and Memoirs, 1941–1951 (1996), which includes The Real Life of Sebastian Knight, Bend Sinister, and Speak, Memory and Novels, 1955–1962 (1996), which includes LOLITA, Invitation to a Beheading, Pale Fire, and Lolita (A Screenplay).

Nabokov's biography is as fascinating as his prose. His childhood in the Russian aristocracy, his many travels and, often forced, emigrations, his interest in lepidopterology and chess, and his ever evident engagement with language inform any study of his fiction. Important biographies include Brian Boyd's pair of texts, Vladimir Nabokov: The Russian Years (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990) and Vladimir Nabokov: The American Years (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992). There is also a collection of photographs edited by Elendea Proffer titled Vladimir Nabokov: A Pictorial Biography (Ann Arbor, Mich: Ardis, 1991). Students may also examine Vera (Mrs. Vladimir Nabokov) (New York: Random House, 1999) by Stacy Schiff, which examines the life of Nabokov's wife. Much can be learned from studying Nabokov's collected letters, and perhaps the best place to start is Vladimir Nabokov: Selected Letters, 1940–1977 (San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1989), edited by Dmitri Nabokov and Matthew J. Brucoli.

Michael Juliar's Vladimir Nabokov: A Descriptive Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1986) remains the best primary bibliography, and the Nabokovian, a semiannual journal published by the International Vladimir Nabokov Society at the University of Kansas, includes an annual secondary bibliography, with abstracts of articles and books, photographs and illustrations, notes and queries. The International Vladimir Nabokov Society also sponsors Nabokov Studies, an annual collection of criticism and book reviews.

The scholarship and criticism typically focuses on Nabokov's linguistic playfulness, which engenders a seemingly endless complexity. The student reading such scholarship will quickly realize that Nabokov scholars split into two camps when it comes to Nabokov's facility with language. One side celebrates Nabokov's genius and proclaims him a peerless stylist of English prose, while the other acknowledges his linguistic skill but sees his motivations as pretentious and self-aggrandizing. The most useful appraisals include The Cambridge Companion to Nabokov, edited by Julian Connolly (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005), Discourse and Ideology in Nabokov's Prose, edited David H. J. Larmour (New York & London: Routledge, 2002), and Maxim Shrayer's The World of Nabokov's Stories (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1999).

—Student Guide by Jonathan Elmore

The Naked and the Dead by Norman Mailer (New York: Rinehart, 1948) novel

A hard-boiled, realistic portrayal of foul-mouthed soldiers clashing with a callous officer class during WORLD WAR II, Norman MAILER'S THE NAKED AND THE DEAD directly reflects Mailer's own wartime experience in the Philippines. Lieutenant Robert Hearn, a college graduate, challenges the sadism and paranoia of his commanding officer, General Cummings. To punish Hearn for insubordination, Cummings sends him on a perilous, and ultimately pointless, mission on a small Japanese island called Anopopei. Hearn's platoon leader is a battle-hardened sergeant named Croft. In addition to Hearn and Croft, the platoon consists of more than a dozen vividly drawn characters representing a cross-section of American ethnic and social types, including the angry Irishman, Gallagher; Roth, the sensitive New York Jew; and the Southern country boy, Wilson. Mailer, who took his influence from writers such as James T. Farrell, John Dos Passos, and, especially, Ernest Hemingway, became a best-selling author with the publication of The Naked and the Dead.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Norman Mailer. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.

Merrill, Robert. Norman Mailer Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1992.

—Marshall Boswell

National Book Award

First established in 1950, the National Book Award is awarded each year to four books, one each from the following categories: fiction, nonfiction, poetry, and children's literature. A five-member judging panel, new each year, selects the winning books from hundreds of entries. The final nominees in each category are announced in the early fall, and the winners are formally announced at the National Book Awards ceremony and dinner, held in New York City each November. Each winning writer wins a crystal trophy as well as a cash prize of $10,000. Runner-ups receive $1,000.

The National Book Award Foundation, which has overseen the award since 1988, also gives out the Medal of Distinguished Contribution to American Letters (DCAL), which recognizes a writer's lifetime achievement. Winners of the DCAL include Eudora Welty (1991), James Laughlin (1992), Clifton Fadiman (1993), Gwendolyn Brooks (1994), David McCullough (1995), Toni MORRISON (1996), Studs TERKEL (1997), John UPDIKE (1998), Oprah Winfrey (1999), Ray BRADBURY (2000), Arthur MILLER (2001), Philip ROTH (2002), Stephen KING (2003), Judy Blume (2004), Norman MAILER (2005), and Adrienne RICH (2006).

In 2005 the NBAF established the Literarian Award, given out to "an individual for outstanding service to the American literary community, whose life and work exemplify the goals of the National Book Foundation to expand the audience for literature and to enhance the cultural value of literature in America.”

The first award in fiction went to Nelson Algren’s THE MAN WITH THE GOLDEN ARM, while the first award in poetry went to William Carlos Williams’s Paterson: Book III and Selected Poems (see PATERSON). Between 1973 and 1975, the fiction and the poetry awards were split between two finalists, while between 1980 and 1983, a separate award was given to a hardcover and a paperback novel. From 1985 to 1990, no award was given for poetry. Prominent winners in fiction include: James JONES’s FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (1951); Ralph ELLISON’s INVISIBLE MAN (1952); Saul BELLOW’s THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH (1953); John O’Hara’s TEN NORTH FREDERICK (1955); Bernard MALAMUD’s The Magic Barrel (1958); Philip ROTH’s GOODBYE, COLUMBUS (1959); Walker PERCY’s THE MOVIEGOER (1961); Thomas PYNCHON’s GRAVITY’S RAINBOW (1973); John UPDIKE’s Rabbit Is Rich (1981; (see RABBIT ANGSTROM: A TETRALOGY); Alice WALKER’s THE COLOR PURPLE (1982); Don DELILLO’s WHITE NOISE (1985); Cormac MCCARTHY’s ALL THE PRETTY HORSES (1992); Charles FRAZIER’s Cold Mountain (1997); Jonathan FRANZEN’s THE CORRECTIONS (2001); William VOLLMANN’s Europe Central (2005); and Richard POWERS’s The Echo Maker (2006).

Prominent winners in the poetry category include: Robert LOWELL’s LIFE STUDIES (1959); Randall JARRELL’s The Woman at the Washington Zoo (1960); William STAFFORD’s Traveling through the Dark (1962); Theodore ROETHKE’s The Far Field (1964); James DICKEY’s Buckdancer’s Choice (1965); Robert BLY’s The Light Around the Body (1967); John BERRYMAN’s His Toy, His Dream, His Rest (1968; see THE DREAM SONGS); Elizabeth BISHOP’s The Complete Poems (1969); Mona VAN DUYN’s To See, to Take (1970); and Frank O’HARA’s The Collected Works of Frank O’Hara (1971). More-recent winners include Howard Moss, A. R. AMMONS, Allen GINSBERG, Adrienne RICH, John ASHBERRY, Howard NEMEROV, James MERRILL, James TATE, and W. S. MERWIN.

—Marshall Boswell

National Book Critics Circle Award

The National Book Critics Circle Award is awarded each year by the National Book Critics Circle (NBCC), a nonprofit group of seven hundred active book reviewers which was first established in 1974. The first round of National Book Critics Circle Awards was issued the following year. The members of the NBCC select five books a year in six categories: fiction, nonfiction, poetry, memoir/autobiography, biography, and criticism. Unlike the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, which focuses only on books written by American writers, the National Book Critics Circle Award recognizes all works written in English. The NBCC also gives out the Ivan Sandrof Lifetime Achievement Award and the Nona Balakian Citation for Excellence in Reviewing. The first award in the fiction category went to E. L. DOCTOROW’s RAGTIME (1975), while the first award in the poetry category went to John ASHBERRY’s SELF-PORTRAIT IN A CONVEX MIRROR (1975).

—Marshall Boswell

National Medal of Arts

The highest United States award given to artists and their patrons, the National Medal of Arts is awarded each year by the president of the United States. Recipients of the prize are considered to be “deserving of special recognition by reason of their outstanding contributions to the excellence, growth, support, and availability of the arts in the United States.” Nominees for the awards are culled from nationwide nominations submitted to and selected by the National Council on the Arts.

The first round of National Medal of Arts awards was given out by President Ronald Reagan in 1985. Since then, more than two hundred awards have been given to individuals and groups who have contributed significantly to the literary, visual, and performing arts. Past winners in the literature category include Ralph ELLISON (1985), Eudora Welty (1986), Robert Penn Warren (1987), Howard NEMEROV (1987), Saul BELLOW (1988), John UPDIKE (1989), Czeslaw Milosz (1989), William STYRON (1993), Richard WILBUR (1994), Gwendolyn Brooks (1995), Edward ALBEE (1996), Maya ANGELOU (2000), Rudolfo ANAYA (2001), Anthony Hecht (2004), Louis AUCHINCLOSS (2005), and Gregory Rabassa (2006).

—Marshall Boswell

Native American Literature

In much the same way that Jewish, Hispanic, and African American writers of the postwar period succeeded in transforming themselves from marginalized outsiders to centralized voices positioned to challenge the dominant culture from within, so, too, have Native American writers found new readers eager to understand the Native American experience while simultaneously expanding their own conception of what it means to be an American. Whereas the Native American literature of the 1920s and 1930s tended to focus primarily on the struggle of reservation dwellers to negotiate the conflict between tribal obligation and mainstream assimilation, by the 1960s many Native American authors were inspired to embrace a sense of ethnic solidarity amid the revisionist and revolutionary spirit of that decade. No work better encapsulated this new attitude than N. Scott MOMADAY’s Pulitzer Prize-winning best-seller, House Made of Dawn (1968), the story of a modernized Native American given the Biblical name of Abel who struggles to recapture the timeless, mythic, and communal values of his father. The NOVEL, with its poetic identification with the land and collective mythology, captured the utopian spirit of the times and helped elevate Native American identity into a new synecdoche for authentic Americanness.

James WELCH, who was educated for the most part in Montana reservation schools, became the next major Native American success story after Momaday with Winter in the Blood (1974), a slim but powerful novella about a heavy-drinking, self-destructive Native American man trying to recover his connection to Montana, the land of his forefather. The novel turned out to be the first installment in a trilogy that traces the struggle of Native Americans from the nineteenth to the twentieth century and their efforts to create a coherent cultural identity that embraces tribal obligations and the American mainstream. The other books in this series are The Death of Jim Loney (1979) and what many consider Welch's greatest achievement, Fools Crow (1986). Gerald VIZENOR is another writer deeply indebted to the trailblazing example of Momaday; his first novel, Darkness in Saint Louis Bearheart (1978), a dystopian science-fiction novel, imagines the struggles of a group of Native Americans confronted with a bleak, postapocalyptic landscape ravaged by a battle for domination of the oil markets.

Leslie Marmon SILKO's first novel, Ceremony (1977), a contemporary classic, chronicles an emotionally shattered Vietnam veteran's attempt to reconnect with pueblo life, while Storyteller (1981) innovatively combines poetry, autobiography, photographs, oral history, and short fiction to evoke a kaleidoscopic portrait of the author's own fragmented but rich experience as a mixed-blood Native American, Hispanic, and Anglo-Saxon American. Silko solidified her reputation with Almanac of the Dead (1991), a 760-page novel that weaves a Pynchonesque tale of drug dealers, evil capitalists, eco-warriors, and witches who converge when a TV psychic discovers an ancient text that warns of an imminent Indian insurrection.

Louise ERDRICH, another mixed blood writer, of Native American/German extraction, came to national attention with her award-winning first book, Love Medicine (1984), a story cycle about a group of mixed-blood Chippewa families. Set in the fictional town of Argus, North Dakota, the book drew comparisons to William Faulkner's Yoknapatawpha County novels, a connection Erdrich has encouraged with her subsequent Argus works, The Beet Queen (1986), Tracks (1988), The Bingo Palace (1994), and The Antelope Wife (1998). Silko famously attacked Beet Queen for substituting self-conscious "literariness" for more strident political engagement, indicating a split in Native American intellectual life concerning the obligations of the artist.

More recently, writers such as Martin Cruz Smith, Thomas King, and Sherman ALEXIE have achieved both popular and critical acclaim for their multifaceted work, which often explores the complexities of contemporary Native American identity via fiction that employs the elements of such popular genres as the mystery, the political satire, and the crime thriller.

Many postwar Native American novelists and short-story writers are also highly esteemed poets. Momaday, Erdrich, Vizenor, Welch, Silko, and Alexie have all produced widely acclaimed poetry collections. Other major poets include Joy Harjo, a graduate of the University of Iowa Workshop who published, with Gloria Bird, a groundbreaking anthology of Native American poetry, Reinventing the Enemy's Language: Contemporary Native Women's Writing of North America (1997). Another Native American poet with strong feminist interests is the lesbian writer Paula Gunn ALLEN, who, in addition to producing a half dozen major poetry collections, has also campaigned actively for Native American, feminist, and gay and lesbian rights.

Allen is also the editor of Studies in American Indian Literature: Critical Essays and Course Designs (1983), The Sacred Hoop: Recovering the Feminine in American Indian Traditions (1986), and Spider Woman's Granddaughters (1989).

Sources

Fleck, Richard F., ed. Critical Perspectives on Native American Fiction. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents, 1993.

Internet School Library Media Center. Native American Authors Teachers Resources. <<http://falcon.jmu.edu/~ramseyil/nat-auth.html>> (viewed May 20, 2007).

Krupat, Arnold. The Voice in the Margin: Native American Literature and the Canon. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

Wiget, Andrew, ed. Critical Essays on Native American Literature. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.

—Marshall Boswell

Naylor, Gloria (1950– ) novelist

Gloria Naylor was born and grew up in New York City. She earned her B.A. at Brooklyn College in 1981 and her M.A. at Yale in 1983. Toni MORRISON's novel THE BLUEST EYE was an early influence and convinced Naylor of the need to write about African American women in fiction. The Women of Brewster Place (1982), Naylor's best-known novel, won the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD for best first novel. It immerses the reader in the African American experience with an intensity that approaches melodrama and Gothic fiction. Naylor, who was once a Jehovah's Witness, writes with missionary fervor about her female characters and their environments. Her novel Linden Hills (1985) explores the problems of African American middle-class identity with grim realism, while Mama Day (1988) returns to a more optimistic view of the prospects for African American women. Bailey's Cafe (1992) has been called Naylor's most ambitious work because it combines her concern for the lives of African American women with more global concerns, including the story of Mariam, who is both Ethiopian and Jewish. Male characters also play more dominant roles in this novel. The Men of Brewster Place (1998) not only marks a return to Naylor's fictional beginnings but also allows her to recast her views of males as presented in her first novel. It, too, won an American Book Award.

Sources

- Kelley, Margot Anne, ed. Gloria Naylor's Early Novels. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1999.
- Whitt, Margaret Earley. Understanding Gloria Naylor. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1998.
- Wilson, Charles E. Gloria Naylor: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Nemerov, Howard (1920–1991) poet

Howard Nemerov, a Harvard graduate, taught for many years at Washington University. Although he wrote fiction, including The Melodramatists (1949), Federigo, or The Power of Love (1954), and The Homecoming Game (1957), his major reputation was built on his subtle poetry. His Collected Poems (1977) won a Pulitzer Prize, a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and a BOLLINGEN PRIZE. Nemerov was named POET LAUREATE in 1988. Trying Conclusions: New and Selected Poems, 1961–1991 appeared in 1991.

Nemerov's criticism and essays have been collected in Poetry and Fiction (1963), Journal of the Fictive Life (1965), Reflections on Poetry and Poetics (1972), New and Selected Essays (1985), and The Oak in the Acorn: On Remembrance of Things Past, and on Teaching Proust, Who Will Never Learn (1987).

Sources

- Labrie, Ross. Howard Nemerov. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
- Mills, William. The Stillness in Moving Things: The World of Howard Nemerov. Memphis, Tenn.: Memphis State University Press, 1975.

New Historicism

The critical movement called New Historicism is a response to the New Criticism, which flourished from the end of WORLD WAR II until the 1960s and insisted that a work of literature is self-contained. The New Historicists claimed that social and political contexts are an integral part of literature. They argue that one cannot understand a literary work without understanding the culture of the time when it is set and the time it was written. They argue further that literary works have different meanings for different readers, depending on the reader's cultural orientation. Many New Historicists emphasize the political significance of literature, in terms of the author's intention, the political forces that shaped the author's worldview, and the political forces that shape the reader's sensibility.

—Marshall Boswell

New Journalism

The "New Journalism" is the collective name given to a style of journalistic nonfiction popularized in the 1960s and 1970s in which authors blended the techniques of nonfiction reportage with those of literary fiction. This hybrid approach to nonfiction has also been termed art-journalism, fact-fiction, and journalit. Truman CAPOTE's IN COLD BLOOD (1965), which its author called a nonfiction novel, is generally thought to be the first major work in this genre. Subtitled "A True Account of a Multiple Murder and Its Consequences," Capote's book tracks with novelistic narrative, drive, and concreteness the trial and hanging of two Kansas drifters accused of first-degree murder. Most importantly, Capote eschews traditional journalistic "objectivity" in favor of a decidedly literary attempt to explore and possibly even shape the meaning of the events being reported through authorial selection, structure, and thematic underpinnings. In an introduction to an anthology of this new hybrid style, journalist Tom WOLFE argued that the nonfiction novel had emerged to fill a vacuum left by the widespread rejection among 1960s novelists of the socially engaged realism associated with Balzac and Charles Dickens in favor of Postmodern METAFICTION and a preoccupation with autobiographical self-disclosure. In this same introduction Wolfe also listed the main features of the nonfiction novel, namely the use of blocked-out scenes, fully reported dialogue, authorial presence, and novelistic detail. Other significant works that draw heavily upon Capote's example include Wolfe's Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (1968), a wry look at the California counterculture of the 1960s, in which Wolfe appears as a character; and Norman MAILER's The Armies of the Night: History As a Novel, the Novel As History (1968), which addressed the 1968 march on the Pentagon in protest of the VIETNAM WAR, with Mailer appearing in the third person. Also included in this group are the authors Hunter S. THOMPSON, Gay Talese, Joan DIDION, and George PLIMPTON. By the early 1980s, with the publication of Wolfe's The Right Stuff (1979), Mailer's The Executioner's Song (1979), and Talese's Thy Neighbor's Wife (1981), the term New Journalism had begun to give way to the more inclusive term CREATIVE NONFICTION.

Sources

- Boynton, Robert S. The New Journalism: Conversation with America's Best Nonfiction Writers on their Craft. New York: Vintage, 2005.
- Connery, Thomas B., ed. A Sourcebook in American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre. New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.
- Wolfe, Tom. The New Journalism, with an Anthology Edited by Tom Wolfe and E.W. Johnson. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

—Marshall Boswell

The New York Review of Books (1963– ) periodical

Founded during a New York City newspaper strike, this bi-weekly book review is respected as an intellectual publication. It was founded by the novelist and critic Elizabeth HARDWICK, and the publisher Jason Epstein and his wife, Barbara Epstein, one of the review's editors, although the driving force has been editor Robert Silvers. The New York Review of Books features analytical essays—often not book—by distinguished contemporary writers such as Susan SONTAG, Gore VIDAL, and Norman MAILER.

Source

Nobile, Philip. Intellectual Skywriting: Literary Politics & The New York Review of Books. New York: Charterhouse, 1974.

Nin, Anaïs (1903–1977) novelist, diarist, critic

My diary is a mirror telling the story of a dreamer who, a long long time ago went through life the way one reads a book.

—Quoted in Anaïs Nin:
An Understanding of Her Art (1997)

Anaïs Nin was born in Neuilly, France, to Joaquin Nin, a Spanish-born composer, and Rosa Culmell, a singer. At the age of ten she began keeping a diary, originally in French, which she continued nearly every day of her life thereafter. When her parents separated, she moved with her mother to New York, where she became a model. Nin educated herself at home. She married her first husband, Hugh (Hugo) Parker Guiler, a banker, in 1923, and a year later moved to Paris, where she entertained various avant-garde artists and entered into psychoanalysis with Otto Rank. During this time she also became close to such figures as French playwright Antonin Artaud, British novelist Lawrence Durrell, and the American writer Henry Miller, who became her lover.

Her first book, a study of D. H. Lawrence, came out in 1932, and was followed four years later by The House of Incest, a long prose poem which bears clear traces of her interest in psychoanalysis and the unconscious. Three years later she published The Winter of Artifice, a collection of novellas, one of which, “Djuna,” fictionalizes her experiences with Henry Miller and his wife June, with whom Nin also conducted an affair and who had already appeared as the character “Sabina” in The House of Incest.

In the early 1940s Nin moved to New York, established her own publishing house—Gemor Press—and published a revised version of Winter of Artifice, minus the opening story, “Djuna.” Next she published a story collection, Under a Glass Bell (1944), that launched her career. While in New York she also began publishing erotica anonymously.

In 1946 she published another collection of novellas titled Ladders to Fire, which eventually constituted the first volume in her five-book “continuous novel,” Cities of the Interior, first published as one volume in 1959 and expanded and republished in 1974. These five lyrical, Impressionistic volumes investigate the artistic, emotional, and erotic lives of a half dozen female characters. The other novels in the series are Children of the Albatross (1947), The Four Chambered Heart (1950), A Spy in the House of Love (1954), and The Seduction of the Minotaur (1961; originally published in shorter form in 1958 as Solar Barque).

In 1966, while living alternately in New York and Los Angeles, Nin published the first volume of her celebrated diary, for which she is best known. The complete diary, excluding the recently published “unexpurgated” editions, now runs to ten volumes and covers Nin's life from 1914 to 1974. When she died in 1977, she was a famous heroine of the feminist movement and a major literary figure. A posthumous collection of her erotica from the 1940s, Delta of Venus, appeared in 1977 and became her first—and only—best-seller.

Sources

Bair, Dierdre. Anaïs Nin: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1995.

Nin, Anaïs. The Diary of Anaïs Nin, volumes 1–4, edited by Gunther Stuhlman. New York: Harcourt, Brace and World, 1966–1980.

—Marshall Boswell

Nonfiction Novel

See NEW JOURNALISM.

Norman, Marsha (1947– ) playwright

Born in Louisville, Kentucky, Marsha Norman grew up in a fundamentalist Christian family and attended local schools. After graduation from Agnes Scott College in Decatur, Georgia, she returned home in 1969, married Michael Norman, a high-school English teacher (whom she later divorced), and earned an M.A. at the University of Louisville. She worked with disturbed children at Kentucky Central State Hospital and taught adolescents at the Brown School. She also wrote articles and reviews for the Louisville Times.

Norman turned to playwriting in 1976, when she formed a relationship with the Louisville Actors Theatre through its artistic director, Jon Jory. Her first play, Getting Out (produced 1977), won the Theatre's prize for best first play and was well reviewed. The play focuses on Arlene, a former prostitute attempting to move on—even though her only alternative seems to be a menial job. She has no job skills, but almost any job, in the end, seems attractive if she manages to maintain some degree of control over her life.

Norman has said that all of her plays treat the same essential issue: Will the characters have the fortitude to overcome their liabilities? In each play characters confront a range of debilitating experiences such as child abuse and other family disorders, yet they ultimately have to take responsibility for their own lives. She experienced several critical failures before her fifth play, 'night, Mother (produced 1982), won a Pulitzer Prize and confirmed her position as one of the important playwrights of her era. This play suggests there is nothing certain about her characters' efforts to prevail over their weaknesses. Indeed, the main character, Jessie, commits suicide. What is extraordinary about the play is that Jessie makes the right choice for herself. She has run out of options, and she faces ending her life with enormous courage and insight.

None of Norman's subsequent plays—Traveler in the Dark (produced 1984), Sarah and Abraham (produced 1988), D. Boone (produced 1992)—has achieved the same acclaim as 'night, Mother, but her 1990 adaptation of a children's classic, Frances Hodgson Burnett's The Secret Garden (produced 1990), to the musical stage won a Tony Award.

Sources

Brown, Linda. Marsha Norman: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1996.

Kintz, Linda. The Subject's Tragedy: Political Poetics, Feminist Theory, and Drama. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1992.

Notes of a Native Son by James Baldwin (Boston: Beacon, 1955) essay collection

The title of James BALDWIN's collection of eleven essays about race and important African American authors refers to Richard Wright's novel Native Son (1940). Baldwin brought a special authority to his writing not only because of his achievement as a novelist but also because he related his observations of literature and society to his own autobiography. He tested his perceptions of history against his own experiences, and he expressed a view of the individual African American writer and his society that had not been previously accessible to whites or blacks. In examining Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), for example, Baldwin faulted the novel for its sentimentality and crude employment of protest literature. Stowe's characters were stereotypes, he argued, created to manipulate and move the reader to accept her propagandistic aims. To this analysis Baldwin added a startling and disturbing analysis of Richard Wright's fiction, especially Native Son, which had inspired a generation of African American writers. Baldwin argues that Wright actually perpetuates stereotypes even as he excoriates white society. Like Ralph ELLISON, Baldwin reacted against Wright's determinism because it did not allow for individual growth or for the changing of history. Indeed, much of Notes of a Na- tive Son suggests that the African American's central place in the world is being recognized. "This world is white no longer, and it will never be white again," Baldwin concludes.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. James Baldwin. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2006.

McBride, Dwight A., ed. James Baldwin Now. New York: New York University Press, 1999.

Novel

In the years just prior to WORLD WAR II, the dominant form of literary fiction was the so-called proletariat novel. Drawing inspiration from naturalist writers such as Theodore Dreiser and Stephen Crane, the proletariat novelists of the 1930s rejected the aesthetics of such 1920s writers as F. Scott Fitzgerald and Ernest Hemingway in favor of a socially engaged approach that sought to disclose the harmful influence upon the working classes of capitalism, industrialism, and the resultant class stratification—all pressing concerns amid the economic deprivations of the Great Depression. Key works from this period include John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath (1938), a savage indictment of American capitalism as seen through the eyes of exploited migrant workers; James T. Farrell's "Studs Lonigan Trilogy," which includes the novels Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in Chicago Streets (1932), Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment Day (1935); and Erskine Caldwell's savage portraits of poor Southerners, Tobacco Road (1932) and God's Little Acre (1933).

Immediately after World War II, however, the most pressing issue for the U.S. literary community revolved around who would be the Tolstoy of this most recent plunge into war and peace. Two unexpected voices quickly emerged to lay claim to this title, NORMAN MAILER, whose best-selling account of the Pacific theater, THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1949), drew heavily upon the example of John Dos Passos, an innovative novelist of the 1930s whom critics often regard as the missing link between the politically engaged writers of the proletariat mode and the more experimental, formally self-conscious novelists of the 1920s; and James JONES, who quickly followed Mailer with the best-selling FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (1951), which addresses stateside army life leading up to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

With the war securely addressed, the U.S. novel entered into one of its most explosive periods. In the final decades before television and rock music took hold of the public attention span, novelists still commanded center stage, and a great many of the country's best writers saw this new power as a license to push the boundaries. First and foremost, writers of the 1950s embraced a new spirit of sexual frankness, as evidenced by popular novelists such as John O'Hara, whose chart toppers A RAGE TO LIVE (1949), TEN NORTH FREDERICK (1955), and From the Terrace (1958) exposed the sexual realities of the northeastern monied classes. In the subsequent decade younger novelists such as Philip ROTH and John UPDIKE, having been granted even greater license thanks to the 1961 Grove Press publication of Henry Miller's once-banned novel Tropic of Cancer (originally written in 1934), rose to the top of the best-seller list with their frank portraits of the budding sexual revolution underway not just in such bohemian enclaves as Haight Ashbery and Greenwich Village but also, thanks to widely available new forms of contraception, in such "traditional" settings as the suburbs of New England. Freedom and liberation from the stranglehold of middle-class decorum lay also at the heart of the BEAT writers of the 1950s, the most prominent of whom was Jack KEROUAC, the author of the definitive document of the Beatnik ethos, ON THE ROAD (1957).

The 1950s also witnessed the emergence of key voices from once-marginalized cultures. When Richard Wright's Native Son (1940) became the first novel by an African American to be honored as a Book-of-the-Month-Club selection, a new era in American literary had been inaugurated. In the 1950s two key successors to Wright rose to public and critical prominence: Ralph ELLISON, whose novel INVISIBLE MAN (1952) combines Wright's spirit of social protest with a bitter humor indebted equally to Dostoevsky and to the musical idiom of the blues; and James BALDWIN, who acknowledged his debt to Wright in his first novel, GO TELL IT ON THE MOUNTAIN (1953), and in his famous essay collection, NOTES OF A NATIVE SON (1955). At the same time Jewish American writers such as Saul BELLOW, Bernard MALAMUD, and Philip ROTH staked their claim in the American mainstream with such works as THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH (1953), THE ASSISTANT (1955), and GOODBYE, COLUMBUS (1959), all of which in various ways are energized by the unique position Jewish Americans occupied as both insiders and outsiders to the American experience.

By the 1960s a great many American novelists, influenced by the European existentialists and by French advocates of the novella roman (the new novel), had begun to reject realism in favor of more-absurdist renderings of an increasingly surreal American experience. Originally termed the black humorists, these novelists depicted the paradoxes and absurdities of contemporary existence as a morbid comedy, perhaps the leading example of which is Joseph HELLER's CATCH-22 (1961). By the late 1960s John BARTH connected this absurdist vision with a general anxiety about the "death of the novel," and so proposed a new method in which writers could put off this death by writing work that called attention to itself. Many of Barth's contemporaries—including William GASS, Robert COOVER, Thomas PYNCHON, and Donald BARTHELME—also produced work that self-consciously exposed its own artifice, a technique that has since been described as METAFICTION. This group later became identified as the leading members of Postmodern fiction.

While the nation's major male novelists continued to explore the possibilities of metafiction throughout the 1970s, women writers across cultures exerted their newfound sexual and political freedom in such works as Toni MORRISON's THE BLUEST EYE (1970), Erica JONG's Fear of Flying (1973), Lisa ALTHER's Kinflicks (1975), Alice WALKER's Meridian (1976), and Leslie Marmon SILKO's Ceremony (1977), among many others. Walker in particular gained substantial critical and commercial success with her 1982 novel, THE COLOR PURPLE, which won both the Pulitzer Prize and the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. Morrison capitalized on this new interest in African American fiction by women with her Pulitzer Prize winner, BELOVED (1987), the tale of an escaped slave who is haunted by the ghost of the daughter she murdered. This now-classic novel was instrumental in helping her win the Nobel Prize in literature in 1993. The 1980s also brought a flowering of new talent among Hispanic American women writers (Julia ALVAREZ, Sandra CISNEROS, and Cristina García) and Asian American women writers (Amy TAN and Maxine Hong KINGSTON).

These two strains of Postmodern experimentation and multicultural expansion have in recent years come full circle as younger writers working in the Barth/Pynchon tradition—David Foster WALLACE, Lorrie MOORE, and William VOLLMANN—seek to extend the possibilities of metafictional self-awareness while recovering some of the readerly engagement of the past, while the heirs to Morrison and Silko—Edwidge DANTICAT, Sherman ALEXIE—begin to address the possibilities and complexities of the truly diverse American identity.

Sources

Elliot, Emory, ed. The Columbia History of the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1991.

Hendin, Josephine G. A Concise Companion to Postwar American Literature and Culture. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Occom, Samson (1723–1792) preacher, theologian

In the 1770s, Samson Occom published two works, A Sermon Preached at the Execution of Moses Paul, an Indian (1772) and A Choice Collection of Hymns and Spiritual Songs; Intended for the Edification of Sincere Christians, of All Denominations (1774), making him the first Native American to publish in America. A Sermon is considered by many scholars to be Occom's most important work, as it illustrates the modernity and clarity of his mind. In this sermon, Occom does not exonerate Paul, who killed a white man in a drunken rage; instead, he attributes the crime, in part, to the evils of racial inequality, which poisons both Indian and white minds: "a man in drunkenness is in all manner of dangers." Occom uses the occasion to denounce the evils of liquor as well, claiming that alcohol renders the Indian who drinks it "a despised creature."

Samson Occom was born in 1723 in Mohegan, a settlement outside of New London, Connecticut, to Joshua and Sarah Tomacham. At the age of sixteen, Occum was inspired by the evangelical revivalist movement to study English in order eventually to read the scriptures. In his ten-page autobiographical, "A Short Narrative of My Life," Occum explains, "at which time, I began to Learn the English Letters; got me a Primer, and used to go to my English Neighbours frequently for Assistance in Reading." A year later he converted to Christianity. In 1743, with his mother's assistance, Occum enrolled in Eleazar WHEELOCK's free school for Indians in Lebanon, where he studied for four years. An ardent convert, he developed preaching skills that distinguished him throughout his life. In addition to English, Occum learned to write Greek, Hebrew, and Latin and hoped to continue his formal education at Yale. His increasingly poor eyesight, however, made this goal impossible: "I over Strained my Eyes to such a Degree, I Could not persue my Studies any Longer." Instead, he turned his linguistic skills to mastering the languages of neighboring tribes and eventually taught himself to speak Oneida.

In 1749 Occom was sent to Long Island at the request of the Montauk to serve as schoolmaster. Samson Occom married Mary Fowler, a Montauk, in 1751. They had ten children. Occom returned to New London, where he taught the Montauk Indians who lived within the white community. In "A Short Narrative of My Life," Occum provides details of his daily life, his family, and his associates in addition to describing his innovative teaching techniques. He used songs and games, and he printed verses on cards. In teaching, Occum describes "making an Alphabet on Small bits of paper, and glued them on Small Chips of Cedar after this manner A B & C." Letters were then set "on a Bench," and students would then bring a designated letter to him.

In 1756 Occum was ordained as a New Light Calvinist minister, serving the Montauk congregation. He received no compensation for his pastorate. His commitment to the New Light's GREAT AWAKENING led him to accompany renowned revivalist preacher George WHITEFIELD on his sixth tour of the colonies. Whitefield was so impressed with Occom's intellect and zeal that he arranged a trip to England for his admirer.

Occom's English trip was a great success. English audiences applauded his preaching skills, and he was instrumental in raising almost £12,000 for the support of the Indian school he had attended. Offered an honorary doctorate at Edinburgh University, Occum modestly declined. Problems at home drew him back to New England. He had left his wife and their large family in the care of his old teacher and schoolmaster Eleazar Wheelock, but Wheelock had failed him miserably. Occom found his family on the verge of starvation, and he learned that Wheelock was siphoning off the money Occom had raised in England in order to establish Dartmouth College, which would be restricted to white students only. Disappointed and bitter, Occom broke all ties with Wheelock.

Samson Occom remained active as a clergyman after his split from Wheelock but increasingly drew his support from the Indian community. In the 1780s he founded a settlement in New York State for Christian Indians, called Brothertown, which attracted 250 settlers. In 1792 he founded that community's first Indian Presbyterian Church. The practical reality of a large family vied for his time with these spiritual undertakings, however, and Occom spent most of his days carving wooden household goods for sale to neighboring whites. He died in 1792 at the age of sixty-nine; a reported three hundred mourners attended the funeral. To the end, Occom remained committed to an identity as a Christian and a Native American.

Works

Occom, Samson. "A Short Narrative of My Life," September 17, 1768, in The Heath Anthology of American Literature, volume 1, edited by Paul Lauter. Lexington, Mass.: Heath, 1994.

Occom. A Sermon Preached at the Execution of Moses Paul, an Indian. New Haven, Conn.: Printed by T. & S. Green, 1772; Early American Imprints, 12493; second series, 1073, 48966.

Occom. A Choice Collection of Hymns and Spiritual Songs; Intended for the Edification of Sincere Christians, of All Denominations. New London, Conn.: Printed by Timothy Green, 1774; Early American Imprints, 13507.

Sources

Brooks, Joanna. American Lazarus: Religion and the Rise of African-American and Native American Literatures. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Love, William DeLoss. Samson Occom and the Christian Indians of New England. Boston: Pilgrim Press, 1899; reprint, Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Richardson, Leon B. An Indian Preacher in England; Being Letters and Diaries Relating to the Mission of the Reverend Samson Occom and the Reverend Nathaniel Whitaker to Collect Funds in England for the Benefit of Eleazar Wheelock's Indian Charity School, from which Grew Dartmouth College. Hanover, N.H.: Dartmouth College, 1933

Olive Branch Petition (July 5, 1775)

The Olive Branch Petition was composed by the Second Continental Congress in the tense days following the exchange of fire between the American colonists and the British at Lexington and Concord, Massachusetts. It was the last attempt by American radicals to find a peaceful resolution to the conflict between the mother country and the colonies.

This attempt at reconciliation reflected a remaining hesitation within the ranks of the American leadership over a declaration of independence. While some delegates to the Congress were already calling for independence, a contingent of conservatives, many of whom became LOYALISTS, persuaded the Congress to send one final appeal for a peaceful compromise.

The Olive Branch Petition was drafted originally by New York lawyer John JAY, but it was extensively revised by Pennsylvania delegate John DICKINSON. The petition, addressed "To the King's Most Excellent Majesty. Most Gracious Sovereign," declared the continued attachment of the American people to George III and expressed the hope that harmony would be restored between the colonies and Great Britain. It implored the king to prevent any further hostile actions against the colonies—a reference to both the Coercive Acts of 1774, which closed the port of Boston and reorganized the Massachusetts government, and the occupation of Boston by the British Army—until reconciliation could be achieved.

The petition began by stressing the benefits the colonies had provided to Great Britain: "The union between our Mother Country and these Colonies," said the petition, "and the energy of mild and just Government, produce benefits so remarkably important, and afforded such an assurance of their permanency and increase, that the wonder and envy of other nations were excited, while they beheld Great Britain rising to a power the most extra-ordinary the world had ever known." It went on, however, to point out the recent abuses "practised by many of your Majesty's Ministers, the delusive pretences, fruitless terrours, and unavailing severities, that have, from time to time, been dealt out by them. . . ." The petition took care to lay the blame entirely on the king's ministers rather than on the king himself and to assure him of the loyalty of the colonists and their attachment "to your Majesty's person, family, and Government." The petition then called on the king to use his "royal authority and influence" to provide the colonists with relief from "our afflicting fears" and to "settle peace through every part of our Dominions."

On November 9, 1775, the Continental Congress learned that King George III had refused to receive the Olive Branch Petition and had, on August 23, proclaimed the American colonies to be in open rebellion.

Work

United States Continental Congress. The Olive Branch Petition; facsimile with notes by N. E. Evans. London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1972.

Oliver, Peter (1713–1791) historian

Like many elite LOYALISTS, Peter Oliver was both enraged and bewildered by the revolutionary movement and by his countrymen's treatment of him. He believed he had served his colony ably and with devotion. In keeping with other Massachusetts Loyalists, Oliver thought the revolution was unnecessary and unjustified, the evil plot of a band of demagogues with thwarted ambitions. His history of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, The Origins and Progress of the American Rebellion: A Tory View (1961), is a chronicle of the rise of those demagogues, their manipulation of the masses, their trickery, and the violence they provoked. It included vivid and detailed accounts of the humiliations suffered by decent men whose only crime was loyalty to the king. While Oliver also composed an occasional poem, he is chiefly remembered for his outlook on these turbulent years.

A merchant and jurist, Oliver was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on March 17, 1713. His father, Daniel Oliver, was a prosperous merchant, and his mother, Elizabeth Belcher, was the daughter of former governor Jonathan Belcher. Despite two disciplinary actions—one for stealing a goose, the other for stealing a turkey—Oliver graduated at the head of his HARVARD class in 1730, a position honoring his social status rather than his scholarly abilities. In 1733 he received an M.A. degree, and in the same year he married Mary Clark, daughter of prominent Boston merchant Richard Clark. Six of the couple's children survived infancy.

Together with his older brother, Andrew, Peter Oliver took over the running of the family's mercantile firm on the death of their father. Oliver soon diversified his interests, purchasing an ironworks in partnership with a Boston lawyer in 1744. By the 1750s this operation, powered by eight water wheels, was one of the largest ironworks in North America. Setting himself up as a country squire in Middleborough, Oliver mastered the literature on scientific agriculture. He published the third edition of Jared Eliot's (1638–1694) Essays Upon Field Husbandry in 1761, adding his own appendix. This work won him a membership in the British Society for Promoting Agriculture. Oliver was appointed justice of the peace in 1744, and by 1748, although he lacked legal training, he had risen to judge of the court of common pleas. In 1756 he became a member of the Massachusetts Superior Court, apparently delighting the public by riding the court circuit in a coach bearing his coat of arms and accompanied by servants in livery. He served in the Massachusetts assembly from 1749 to 1751 and, beginning in 1759, in the council.

Oliver's stand on the controversial British legislation of the 1760s diminished his popularity. His support of the STAMP ACT and of his brother Andrew's appointment as stamp collector, as well as his close association with his widely disliked brother-in-law, Lt. Governor Thomas HUTCHINSON, all contributed to the end of his role in elective politics. Although he seemed to epitomize the haughty Loyalist, Oliver was, in fact, far less combative and confrontational than many of his family members. He took his ouster from government with apparent grace, returning to the life of a country gentleman without protest. Oliver humorously requested compensation for providing shelter to fellow Loyalists during the Stamp Act riots, pointing to his social prominence as a significant factor. "If I am not a man of the first consequence," he wrote his brother-in-law, "there is no man of any consequence at all. I expect great reward for my services."

Oliver continued to serve on the colonial bench, however, and his position ensured that he would be caught up in the deepening political tension of the day. He served as presiding judge in the trial of the British soldiers following the Boston Massacre (1770), incurring the wrath of local radicals when he instructed the jury to find that the soldiers had acted in self-defense. Hostility increased when, as the new chief justice of the superior court in 1773, he began receiving part of his salary from the Crown. Despite threats and protests, he refused to decline this royal support. By the end of the year the legislature had voted to impeach Oliver for accepting a Crown salary and to issue a demand for his removal from the bench. Defiantly, Oliver took his seat when the court session opened in April of 1774. That November he was dragged out of the courtroom by protesters. Forced to remain in Boston under military protection, he left Massachusetts when the British army evacuated the colony in 1776. He found refuge in England, occupying his time by traveling throughout the countryside and recording his impressions in a diary. By 1778 the high cost of living in London, coupled with his dwindling resources, drove Oliver to resettle in Birmingham. He died there, in obscurity, on October 12, 1791.

Work

Oliver, Peter. Origin and Progress of the American Rebellion: A Tory View. Edited by Douglass Adair and John A. Schutz. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1961; reprint, 1967.

Sources

Potter-MacKinnon, Janice. The Liberty We Seek: Loyalist Ideology in Colonial New York and Massachusetts. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Weston, Thomas. Peter Oliver, the Last Chief Justice of the Superior Court of Judicature of the Province of Massachusetts Bay. Boston: Cupples, Upham, 1886.

"On the Equality of the Sexes" by Judith Sargent Murray (Massachusetts Magazine, 1790) essay

Written in 1779, Judith Sargent MURRAY's "On the Equality of the Sexes" advocates women's rights and catalogues women's intellectual, creative, civic, and religious accomplishments and strengths. The essay begins in verse with the lines, "That minds are not alike, full well I know," and asserts at the poem's end that women are capable of achievement, as "noble passions, swell e'en female hearts." Murray examined the presumption that men were by nature superior to women and, after noting the limitations that female stereotypes produced, promoted the importance of education for women at a time when it was socially unacceptable. The essay also identified religious women as female role models.

Printed in two installments in the Massachusetts Magazine (March–April 1790), and as part of a series of essays called “The Gleaner” signed by her pen name, “Constantia,” “On the Equality of the Sexes” concluded by returning to its initial comparison of men and women, proposing that they share a similar goal of domestic efficiency and harmony:

... for are you not equally interested in those matters with ourselves? Is not the elegancy of neatness as agreeable to your sight as to ours; is not the well savoured viand equally delightful to your taste; and doth not your sense of hearing suffer as much, from the discordant sounds prevalent in an ill regulated family, produced by the voices of children and many et ceteras?

Judith Sargent Murray’s essay anticipated the women’s rights movement by asserting intellectual and social equality.

Osborn, Sarah (1714–1796) correspondent, diarist

Sarah Hagggar Osborn published only one work in her lifetime, The Nature, Certainty, and Evidence of True Christianity (1755). Begun as a series of letters to a friend, this tract is a retrospective account of her spiritual awakening. It was later expanded into Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Osborn (1799), which was compiled and published three years after her death by her friend the Reverend Samuel Hopkins. The emotional content of the Memoirs sets it apart from the austere spiritual autobiographies of earlier New England women. Osborn’s decision to present her religious conversion as a life story, complete with a cast of characters that includes the devil, Christ, her family, friends, and ministers, as well as with dialogue and plot, marks another radical departure from earlier works. Memoirs thus resembles a sentimental novel rather than the conversion narratives of the seventeenth century.

Sarah Hagggar was born in London, England, on February 22, 1714, the daughter of a brazier, Benjamin Hagggar, and his wife, Susanna Guyse Hagggar. The family immigrated to Boston in 1722 and later settled in Newport, Rhode Island. Sarah Hagggar defied her parents’ wishes and married a sailor, Samuel Wheaton, when she was eighteen years old. She was widowed two years later when Wheaton died at sea. Left with an infant son, Sarah Wheaton took over the management of a small school, signaling the beginning of a lifelong career as a schoolteacher and director.

In 1737 she was admitted to membership in the First Congregational Church of Newport, but her religious commitments deepened during the revivalist movement of the 1740s. “Awakened” by the preaching of such men as George Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent (1703–1764), a devout Calvinist, Sarah Wheaton led a women’s prayer group in her home that continued to meet throughout her lifetime. The prayer group’s emphasis on benevolent activities made it a precursor of the female associations created in the nineteenth century.

In 1742 Sarah Hagggar Wheaton married Henry Osborn, a widower with three grown sons. Henry became an invalid soon after they were wed. To support her family, Sarah established a new school, the enrollment of which grew steadily, reaching more than sixty students of both sexes and both the white and African American races, rich and poor.

Osborn’s willingness to educate African American students suggested a liberality that blossomed in the 1760s. In 1766 she hosted weekly meetings of a group called the “Ethiopian society,” probably composed of members of Newport’s free black community. She also provided a meeting place for more than forty slaves, participants in the religious revival that swept Newport in 1766 and 1767. Osborn’s home became a hub of revivalist activity for whites and blacks who gathered for religious celebrations in groups sometimes numbering more than three hundred. Criticism arose, focused on Osborn’s role as a leader and instructor not only of women and African Americans but also of white men and boys. Even her good friend the Reverend Joseph Fish (1706–1781) expressed his disapproval, urging Osborn to abandon the meetings and pursue more “feminine” interests. Osborn refused. Responding to Fish’s advice, she wrote: “Would you advise me to shut up my Mouth and doors and creep into obscurity?”

Osborn’s resentment against those who criticized her for her activism often surfaced in her personal writings. Speaking of herself in the third person in her diary in 1767, she wrote: “[T]he poor distressed oppressed one she is the work of thy Hands &c and now all yt should be for her are against Her I pray thee appear for Her Help preserve her from any dreadful thing and snatch her as a brand out of the burning.” Despite public disapproval, she remained convinced that God supported her decision to align herself with groups marginalized by race or gender.

Taken together, Osborn’s memoir and her correspondence with her lifelong friend Susanna Anthony (edited by Elizabeth West Hopkins and published in 1807 as Familiar Letters Written by Mrs. Sarah Osborn and Miss Susanna Anthony) provide a vivid account of revivalism in Newport, educational practices of the eighteenth century, and women’s organizations in the new republic.

In the 1770s Osborn found a supporter in the Reverend Samuel Hopkins, who owed his call to a Newport pulpit to Sarah Osborn and her female society. As Osborn’s health failed, Hopkins took on greater responsibility for her charitable work with the African Americans of the city. When British occupation of Newport during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION forced Hopkins and other Congregational ministers to flee the city, Osborn sustained the congregational community by opening her home to weekly worship services. Her failing health, however, slowly diminished her role in community affairs. She died on August 2, 1796, leaving behind a controversial legacy of female activism, religious leadership, and benevolence.

Works

Osborn, Sarah. The Nature, Certainty and Evidence of True Christianity. In a letter from a Gentlewoman in New-England, To Another her dear Friend, in Great Darkness, Doubt and Concern of a Religious Nature. Boston: Printed by S. Kneeland, 1755; Boston, 1927; Early American Imprints, 7523.

Osborn. Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Osborn Who Died at Newport, Rhodeisland, on the Second Day of August, 1796. Worcester, Mass.: Leonard Worcester, 1799; New York: Readex Microprint, 2002–2004.

Osborn. Familiar Letters Written by Mrs. Sarah Osborn and Miss Susanna Anthony, edited by Elizabeth West Hopkins. Newport, R.I.: Newport Mercury, 1807.

Sources

Norton, Mary Beth. “‘My Resting Reaping Times’: Sarah Osborn’s Defense of Her ‘Unfeminine’ Activities, 1767,” Signs, 2 (1976), pp. 515–529.

Woloch, Nancy. Early American Women: A Documentary History, 1600–1900. Belmont, Calif.: Wadsworth, 1992.

Otis, James, Jr. (1725–1783) essayist

The end of government being the good of mankind, points out its great duties: It is above all things to provide for the security, the quiet, and happy enjoyment of life, liberty, and property.

—The Rights of the British Colonies (1764)

James Otis Jr. was a leader of the more radical faction of colonial opposition to British rule. Otis outlined and defended colonial rights in his writings and speeches, a feat for which he is remembered today. Otis was born in 1725 in Barnstable, Massachusetts, the son of James Otis and Mary Allyne Otis. The senior Otis, a prosperous farmer, merchant, country lawyer, and provincial politician, had ambitions that included a major position for himself within the colonial government and high social status for his family as a whole.

As envisioned by Otis Sr., each of his children had a role in this plan. Mercy Otis, who became an important poet, playwright, and political critic, married James Warren, creating an important alliance with one of the colony’s most important families (see Mercy Otis WARREN). Joseph Otis assumed responsibility for the family plantation. Samuel Allyne Otis became an important link to Boston’s merchant community. As the eldest son, James Otis Jr. represented the key link in his father’s plan. He received a classical education, beginning with a private tutor and continuing with two degrees at HAR-VARD COLLEGE. Otis’s education had a clear purpose, at least from his father’s perspective. Otis was expected to enter the law, not as a country lawyer like his father but as an attorney able to plead cases in the highest courts.

James Otis had other interests, however. He was a scholar with a particular interest in language, speech, and literature. After completing his bachelor’s degree in 1743, he remained at Harvard and earned a master’s degree in 1746. During that time Otis wrote two treatises on prosody, the science of versification, which includes meter and pronunciation. The first of these works, The Rudiments of Latin Prosody, was published in 1760. It was later adopted by Harvard as a textbook. The second study focused on Greek prosody. Never published, it was probably destroyed by Otis along with the majority of his papers.

Otis never lost his interest in the classics. His literary studies influenced his legal and political writings, and on at least one occasion he treated John ADAMS to a lecture on the Greek poet Homer and the Latin poet Horace. Otis might have preferred to remain in academia, but because he was dependent on his father’s financing, he followed the prescribed plan. He trained for the law under Jeremiah Gridley (1701–1767), the most prominent trial attorney in Boston. Two years of legal apprenticeship were followed by two years of private practice in Plymouth, where he honed his skills as a lawyer by preparing various writs, wills, and deeds. In 1750 Otis moved his practice to Boston. From that vantage point he was strategically positioned to practice in the major courts and, as expected, to represent his father’s interests in the capital.

A gifted orator with an academic approach to the law, Otis was immediately successful. In 1755 he married Ruth Cunningham, daughter of a prominent Boston merchant. In 1756 he became a justice of the peace, and four years later he was appointed advocate general of the Vice-Admiralty Court. Both of these appointments identified Otis as a favorite of the colonial government. Otis’s next triumph represented a direct repudiation of the government. Resigning as advocate general in 1761, Otis accepted the leading role in the contest against the writs of assistance, which were issued in order to enforce the Sugar Act (1764). Through the writs, customs collectors were given blanket warrants to conduct searches for smuggled goods whenever or wherever they saw fit. Opposed to the sugar tax, Otis and many of his contemporaries saw these writs as an essential violation of their constitutional rights.

As counsel for the merchants, Otis delivered an oration attacking the writs as “the worst instrument of arbitrary power, the most destructive of English liberty . . . that ever was found in an English law-book.” More important, Otis used the occasion to redefine the relationship between the colonies and England. The speech catapulted Otis to the forefront of the PATRIOT leadership. Later that year he was elected as Boston’s representative to the General Court. He also became the primary target for the government’s supporters, including

Thomas HUTCHINSON, the current lieutenant governor and future governor of Massachusetts.

The following year, Otis attacked again with his first political publication, A Vindication of the Conduct of the House of Representatives (1762). Using an expenditure not authorized by the colonial legislature as the basis for his argument, Otis outlined the argument that would play a major role in the rhetoric of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Otis insisted that taxes could only be levied by a representative government.

In The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved (1764), Otis added a second building block of revolutionary thought, arguing that rights and therefore government derived from nature and God, instead of from institutions constructed by men. Government did not exist to serve monarchs, he wrote, "the end of it is manifestly the good of the whole." Considerations on Behalf of the Colonists (1765) expanded on the theme of natural rights by suggesting equal representation.

Otis contradicted his own argument in his final two political pamphlets, A Vindication of the British Colonies (1765) and Brief Remarks on the Defence of the Halifax Libel (1765). Having argued that only direct representation could justify taxation, Otis granted full authority over the colonies to Parliament. Otis's reversal has been the subject of much conjecture. He may have tempered his position in order to blunt accusations of treason; a coffeehouse brawl may have caused a brain injury that led to erratic behavior; or he may have had a bout of inherited mental illness.

Otis continued to play a leading role in the protests against taxation for the next few years, working with Samuel ADAMS and John Adams to rally support among the merchants, artisans, and laborers of Boston. By 1769, however, he was no longer a vital member of the Patriot cause. Hampered by alcoholism and erratic behavior, his legal practice was in shambles, and he had become financially dependent on his father. He spent part of the final years of his life in seclusion at informally operated homes for the insane. Otis died on May 23, 1783, according to family legend, from being struck by lightning.

Works

Otis, James. The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved. Boston: Printed by Edes & Gill, 1764; Early American Imprints, 9773.

Otis. Considerations on Behalf of the Colonists. In a letter to a Noble Lord. London: Printed for J. Almon, 1765; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1986.

Otis. A Vindication of the British Colonies, Against the Aspersions of the Halifax Gentleman, in His Letter to a Rhode-Island Friend. Boston: Printed by Edes & Gill, 1765; Early American Imprints, 10117.

Sources

Galvin, John R. Three Men of Boston. New York: Crowell, 1976.

Shaw, Peter. American Patriots and the Rituals of Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.

Smith, Maurice Henry. The Writs of Assistance Case. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.

Waters, John Jay Jr. The Otis Family in Provincial and Revolutionary Massachusetts. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968.

"O Captain! My Captain!" by Walt Whitman (1865)
poem

Walt WHITMAN's "O Captain! My Captain!" first appeared in the November 4, 1865 New-York Saturday Press. The poem is an elegy to President Abraham Lincoln, written shortly after his assassination in 1865. Whitman uses a ship as a symbol of the American nation on a journey, with the captain as the leader of the people. Just as "the ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done" (the CIVIL WAR has ended), the captain is discovered to have "fallen cold and dead." The poem uses regular rhyme and meter, highly uncharacteristic of the poet known for his long, free verse lines. Considered to be a weaker, minor work by many critics, "O Captain! My Captain!" is nonetheless one of Whitman's most famous and most frequently anthologized poems.

—Y. P. Renfro

"An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge" by

Ambrose Bierce (1891) short story

Ambrose BIERCE's most famous short story, first published in the July 13, 1890 San Francisco Examiner, is set during the CIVIL WAR. As the story opens, Peyton Farquhar, a Confederate sympathizer, is about to be hanged from a bridge. The second part of the story describes the events that have led up to the hanging: induced to the action by a disguised Union soldier, Farquhar has attempted to sabotage the bridge and has been captured. In the next section Farquhar's rope breaks, and he falls into the water, ultimately swimming to safety through volleys of gunfire. As he travels through the forest at night, he begins to experience strange psychological phenomena. In a memorable twist at the end of the story, it is revealed that Farquhar has imagined his entire escape in the brief time between his being pushed from the bridge and the noose's breaking his neck. The story is lauded for its intensive psychological examination of a mind facing death in wartime.

Sources

Bierce, Ambrose. Tales of Soldiers and Civilians. San Francisco: E. L. G. Steele, 1891.

Blume, Donald T. Ambrose Bierce's Civilians and Soldiers in Context: A Critical Study. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2004.

—Y. P. Renfro

Old Creole Days by George Washington Cable (New York: Scribners, 1879) short-story collection

George Washington CABLE's first book is an example of the LOCAL-COLOR movement of the nineteenth century. The stories take place in New Orleans among the French Creoles—a fact that has led to comparisons with the work of fellow local colorist Kate CHOPIN. Cable's stories were originally published in the early 1870s, and many are set in antebellum New Orleans shortly after the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. Topics of Race, miscegenation, and the introduction of "Americans" (or other immigrants) into Creole strongholds play central roles in these stories. Much of the narrative tension arises from conflicts between human experience and social conventions—as when, in the story "Tite Poulette," the white Dutch clerk Kristian Koppig asks for the hand of Madame John's mixed-race daughter despite the illegality of such marriages.

Source

Cleman, John. George Washington Cable Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1996.

—Julie M. Cox

Oldtown Folks by Harriet Beecher Stowe (Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1869) novel

Harriet Beecher STOWE considered Oldtown Folks, one of her four New England novels, to be her favorite. Set several decades after the American Revolution, the novel allows Stowe the opportunity to examine a potential utopian society without class or gender roles, with particular attention to both men and women as nurturers of the children. Among other sources, Stowe used both her husband's childhood memories and her own. She also employs colloquial humor (see LOCAL COLOR) to depict the religious debate between the Calvinists, who believed in the absolute sovereignty of God, and those who believed in salvation through faith and good works.

Source

Stowe, Harriet Beecher. Oldtown Folks, edited by Dorothy Berkson. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1987.

—Vicki Martin

Olmsted, Frederick Law (1822–1903) landscape architect, travel writer

Born in Connecticut, Frederick Law Olmsted is remembered today for his landscape designs of Central Park in New York City; the Capitol grounds in Washington, D.C.; the Boston park system; and for his conservation efforts in areas like Niagara Falls and Yosemite. Olmsted also landscaped the campsite at Lake Chautauqua where the CHAUTAUQUA movement originated.

Before he became known for his work as a landscape architect (a term he apparently coined), Olmsted was famous for his travel writing. Praised for his Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England (1852), he was hired to write a newspaper column during a tour through the American South. Opposed to slavery, Olmsted wrote objectively about the slaveholding South in 1850, and the resulting books—A Journey in the Seaboard Slave States (1856), A Journey through Texas (1857), and A Journey in the Back Country (1860)—made Olmsted a popular CIVIL WAR-era writer. In 1861 Olmsted's three accounts of his southern travels were collected in one volume, The Cotton Kingdom.

Sources

Mitchell, Broadus. Frederick Law Olmsted: A Critic of the Old South. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1924.

Rybczynski, Witold. A Clearing in the Distance: Frederick Law Olmsted and America in the Nineteenth Century. New York: Scribner, 1999.

Todd, John E. Frederick Law Olmsted. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Omoo by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1847) novel

Melville's second book and sequel to TYPEE (1846), Omoo: A Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas continues the fictionalized narrative of the author's adventures in the southern Pacific. Having been rescued from Nuku Hiva by an Australian whaler at the close of Typee, the narrator joins the crew, which turns mutinous in the face of poor conditions and the captain's incompetence. The main action of Omoo concerns the narrator's adventures as he roves the Tahitian islands with his roguish companion, Doctor Long Ghost. Though the novel received some censure for its critical portrayal of missionary efforts and its "dark hints of innumerable amours," for nineteenth-century readers Omoo represented, along with Typee, the height of Melville's success.

Source

Melville, Herman. The Writings of Herman Melville, Volume II: Omoo: A Narrative of Adventures in the South Seas, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, and G. Thomas Tanselle. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1968.

—Perry Trolard

Optic, Oliver

See ADAMS, WILLIAM TAYLOR.

The Oregon Trail by Francis Parkman (New York & London: Putnam, 1849) travel narrative

Based on an extensive trip Francis PARKMAN took in 1846, The Oregon Trail was first published serially in KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE in 1847. When it appeared as a book two years later, it bore the title The California and Oregon Trail: Being Sketches of Prairie and Rocky Mountain Life. Parkman's admiration for the historical fiction of James Fenimore COOPER and Sir Walter Scott is evident in this engaging and highly regarded narrative, which recounts the author's journey from St. Louis to Fort Laramie and Pueblo, Colorado. Among the scenes Parkman describes are a buffalo hunt and various encounters with white settlers as well as with American Indians. The book's success encouraged Parkman's plans for further treatments of the American West and its history, works that made him one of the most influential Western historians.

—Brett Barney

O'Reilly, John Boyle (1844–1890) journalist, poet, novelist

Born into a large family near Drogheda, Ireland, John Boyle O'Reilly was educated by his father, a schoolmaster, and before the age of twelve he became a printer's apprentice at the Drogheda Argus. In 1859, O'Reilly moved to Preston, England, where he lived with his aunt and uncle while working as compositor and reporter for the Preston Guardian. In 1863 he returned to Ireland to enlist in a cavalry regiment of the English Army, and for the next several years he covertly proselytized among his fellow soldiers for the overthrow of British rule in Ireland. Court-martialed in 1866 for treason, O'Reilly received a death sentence that was subsequently reduced to twenty years in prison. In January 1868, he was among the last group of English prisoners to arrive at the Western Australia penal colony, where he spent a year before escaping aboard an American whaler. Upon his arrival in Philadelphia, O'Reilly applied for naturalization. Settling in Boston, he wrote for magazines, lectured, and reported for the Boston Pilot. He later became the newspaper's editor and co-owner.

The first of O'Reilly's four poetry collections, Songs of the Southern Seas, appeared in 1873. Three other volumes followed: Songs and Ballads (1878), The Statues in the Block (1881), and In Bohemia (1886). His first novel, Moondyne Joe, was serialized in the Pilot in 1878 and published as a book in 1879 under the title Moondyne: A Story of the Underworld. Although it takes its name from another legendary Western Australia convict, the novel is actually loosely based upon O'Reilly's own experiences as an outlaw and reformer. In 1884 O'Reilly and three other authors collaborated on The King's Men, a novel set in the twentieth century, when England's king, "George the Fifth" has been forced into foreign exile.

O'Reilly's literary works, especially his poems, were reasonably well received in their time, and the author counted among his friends and admirers such eminent writers as Oliver Wendell HOLMES, Samuel L. CLEMENS, and Walt WHITMAN. Few people read his writing today, however, because the most powerful virtues of O'Reilly's work—its earnestness and vigor—have come to be less valued, thus making more prominent the deficiencies of style brought on by O'Reilly's habitual hurry and his disinclination to revise.

Sources

Evans, A. G. Fanatic Heart: A Life of John Boyle O'Reilly, 1855–1890. Nedlands, Western Australia: University of Western Australia Press, 1997.

McManamin, Francis G. The American Years of John Boyle O'Reilly, 1870–1890. New York: Arno, 1976.

—Brett Barney

James R. Osgood and Company (1871–1878; 1880–1885) publishing house

James R. Osgood began in the publishing business as a clerk for TICKNOR & FIELDS in 1855. In 1864 he became a partner in the firm, which, after a series of reorganizations became known as James R. Osgood and Company in 1871. The impressive roster of Osgood authors included Ralph Waldo EMERSON, William Dean HOWELLS, Henry JAMES, Bret HARTE, Harriet Beecher STOWE, Elizabeth Stuart PHELPS, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, John Greenleaf WHITTIER, Celia THAXTER, and James Russell LOWELL. Osgood also published several successful and respected periodicals: THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, Our Young Folks, Every Saturday, and THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. A fire in 1872 and a series of financial problems eventually led to a merger with the firm of Hurd and Houghton in 1878, the new company emerging as Houghton, Osgood, and Company. After only two years, however—during which time the firm sustained another fire—James Osgood was forced out, and the business was renamed Houghton, Mifflin and Company. Osgood, along with his brother Edward and two partners, reestablished James R. Osgood and Company. In its second incarnation the company published novels by Howells, James, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, and Samuel L. CLEMENS. In 1881 Osgood became the first major publisher to bring out an edition of Walt WHITMAN's LEAVES OF GRASS. Under threat of legal action for violating obscenity laws, the company withdrew the book almost immediately, however. In 1885 the firm closed its doors permanently, having failed to turn a profit despite its reputation for publishing high quality literature.

Source

Winship, Michael. American Literary Publishing in the Mid-Nineteenth Century: The Business of Ticknor & Fields. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

—Brett Barney

"Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" by Walt Whitman (1859) poem

Walt WHITMAN's "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" takes on the themes of love, death, and the birth of the poet. Set on the shore of rural Long Island (Paumanok), the poem is narrated by an adult poet who is reminded by the sea of an experience he had as a child, watching a male and female mockingbird nesting in the spring. One day the female disappears, and the male pines for her, singing a beautiful song of lament. The sea also speaks to the boy; he asks it to name "the word final, superior to all," and it whispers its answer, "Death." This knowledge of death allows the boy to realize his mortality and to see his place within the whole of creation. The mature poet recalls the experiences of observing the birds and listening to the sea as, taken together, the decisive moment in his development as an artist—the origin of his poetic vision.

"Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking" was first published in the December 24, 1859 New-York Saturday Press as "A Child's Reminiscence." In 1860 Whitman added the poem to his LEAVES OF GRASS as "A Word Out of the Sea."

—Y. P. Renfro

"The Outcasts of Poker Flat" by Bret Harte (1869)

short story

Probably the best known of Bret HARTE's immensely popular LOCAL-COLOR stories of the American Southwest, "The Outcasts of Poker Flat" is a character study of Western stereotypes. The tale follows a group of "objectionable characters" evicted from Poker Flat as they trek toward another nearby town. Along the way, philosophical gambler John Oakhurst, town drunk Uncle Billy, prostitute Duchess, and her madam Mother Shipton are joined by the naive Tom Simson and his would-be bride, Piney Woods. Caught in a deadly snowstorm, each character's true personality emerges: Uncle Billy abandons the others; Mother Shipton sacrifices herself for the child-like Piney; and Oakhurst stoically reassures the others, while his poker face hides the belief that his own luck has run out.

Sources

Harte, Bret. The Luck of Roaring Camp and Other Sketches. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1870.

Scharnhorst, Gary. Bret Harte. New York: Twayne, 1992.

—King Adkins

Overland Monthly (1868–1875) periodical

Published in San Francisco and originally edited by Bret HARTE, the Overland Monthly was a regional magazine that published works by Harte and other California writers such as the poet Charles Warren STODDARD and the humorist Prentice Mulford. When the magazine was revived in 1883, it published works by prominent writers such as Jack London, but its contents at that point were largely undistinguished.

"The Over-Soul" by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1841)

essay

"The Over-Soul" is the ninth essay in Ralph Waldo EMERSON's 1841 collection, Essays (First Series). "Over-Soul" is a term Emerson used for the spiritual force that emanates through every animate and inanimate object in the universe. This force unites man, God, and nature into one whole, and it can be sought through the power of the mind. The Over-Soul is the spirit behind all of our actions. It exceeds all limitations of language, time, and space. Emerson's essay captures the essence of his search for a form of spirituality beyond tradition, organized religion, and the physical senses.

Source

Cavanaugh, Cathy. "The Aeolian Harp: Beauty and Unity in the Poetry and Prose of Ralph Waldo Emerson," Rocky Mountain Review of Language and Literature, 56, no.1 (2002): 25–35.

—Chris Lang

Objectivism

The term objectivism was used in the 1930s by the poet William Carlos WILLIAMS and others to express their belief that the primacy of the image, rather than ornamental language, should govern the form of poetry. Along with the poets Louis ZUKOFSKY, George OPPEN, Carl Rakosi, and Charles REZNIKOFF, Williams cultivated a poetry that was pared down to essentials (sometimes only a few words per line), making a poem a brief but intense experience, a moment of perception akin to what Amy LOWELL called IMAGISM—poetry that concentrates on the impact of a single image or a cluster of images. But objectivists, like Williams, often isolated individual words in a cluster of two or three, as if the words themselves were objects shaped by the special dimensions of the page.

Objectivist poets were first recognized as such in the February 1931 issue of POETRY, in which Zukofsky presented an objectivist manifesto. In 1934 Williams's poems were published by the Objectivist Press. Later, such poets as Allen GINSBERG took Williams as a model, and Williams's central tenet “no ideas but in things” has had an enormous influence on modern poetry.

Source

DuPlessis, Rachel Blau and Peter Quartermain, eds. The Objectivist Nexus: Essays in Cultural Poetics. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999.

The Octopus by Frank Norris (New York: Doubleday, Page, 1901) novel

The Octopus, the first novel in Frank NORRIS's planned trilogy on the production, distribution, and consumption of wheat, was the last novel he published before his death at age thirty-two. Set in the San Joaquin Valley of California, it is his longest and most variegated work. Many plot strands run concurrently throughout, almost all centered on the subject of wheat—its growth and economic importance. A federation of honest ranchers fight the Southwestern and Pacific Railroad—the “octopus” of the title—as the company attempts to wrest their land from them to achieve total control of the wheat. In the depiction of the practices of the railroad, a rapacious monopoly stealing from poor, hardworking farmers what is rightfully theirs, the novel seems openly anticapitalistic, while the landscape is portrayed, particularly by the mystic loner named Vanamee, in rhapsodic terms: fecund, vast, boundlessly beautiful.

Vanamee's only friend is another outsider, the poet Presley, who knows the farmers and eventually sides with them, writing a socialistic poem that makes him famous but that is powerless to stop the complex economic forces at play. A key figure among the threatened ranchers is Annixter, a shy, blond man, awkward around women, who falls in love with a hired girl. State and local governments are bribed to set conditions that make the railroad's seizure legal, and some betrayers even come from inside the ranchers' own families. In the climactic scenes the ranchers are decisively defeated in a shoot-out, and the arch villain, the Jew S. Behrman (the novel has racist overtones), dies a horrific death in an elevator filled with grain that he has stolen.

When Presley, appalled at what he has witnessed, interviews the railroad official Shelgrim for a news article, the story takes a turn. Shelgrim disavows responsibility: “Can any one stop the Wheat? Well, then no more can I stop the Road.” The railroad, he argues, is subject to forces larger than itself. While this scene may be read as reinforcing Norris's NATURALISM, it calls into question the efficacy of the socialist position the first half of the novel apparently endorses. Norris does not provide easy answers to the many questions he raises.

Norris completed the second volume of his trilogy of the wheat, The Pit: A Story of Chicago, a story of the trading of the commodity which was published posthumously in 1903, but he died before beginning what was to be the final volume, which he planned to title "The Wolf."

Source

Davison, Richard Allan, ed. The Merrill Studies in The Octopus. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1969.

—Roger Lathbury

Odets, Clifford (1906–1963) playwright, screenwriter

In America all we hear about is the heaven of opportunity of success. No one seems ready or willing to talk of the hell of failures and perhaps lovingly comment on those who people that hell. Those blistered, lacerated and roasted.

—note, Billy Rose Theatre Collection,
Lincoln Center Library

Clifford Odets was born July 18, 1906, in Philadelphia, the son of Eastern European Jewish immigrants. Odets's father, Lou Gorodetsky (he changed his name soon after arriving in America), was a printer by trade and throughout Odets's childhood moved his wife, Pearl, and their three children around Philadelphia and New York in search of better jobs. By 1912 they had settled in the Bronx, where Lou found increasing success. Odets attended public school in New York. However, as his interest in the theater increased, so did his indifference to school, and he drifted away from Morris High School after a couple years, choosing to pursue a career as a performer. He occasionally appeared as a "Rover Reciter" of narrative poems at amateur nights, wrote theater reviews, and for a time worked as a disc jockey, writing and performing in plays for radio. He joined amateur theater companies and in the late 1920s began working as an actor in small parts in stock companies in New Jersey, serving an informal apprenticeship in theatrical technique. In 1930, as the GREAT DEPRESSION was beginning, Odets managed to catch on with the newly formed GROUP THEATRE, which aimed to create the first ensemble art theatre in the United States. Odets remained with the Group Theatre throughout its ten-year existence, appearing first as an actor but never really rising beyond the status of bit performer. It was not until 1934, when his first play, Awake and Sing!, was chosen by the Group as part of their season that he found his place as the Group's playwright. The play chronicles the struggles of a lower-middle-class Jewish family trapped between assimilation and independence, between materialism and idealism. Living in a society where "economics comes down like a ton of coal on the head," the Bergers struggle to maintain their dignity. Generally praised for its sharp, living dialogue and its poetic realism, Awake and Sing! reflects the Jewish culture that had filtered down to Odets through his family; he borrows much of his style from the rhythms and vocabulary of the Yiddish-English spoken by many first and second generation immigrants.

Clifford Odets, 1937

In addition to Awake and Sing!, three other Odets plays appeared on Broadway in 1935. Waiting for Lefty, a one-act piece about a taxi-drivers' strike, was his first produced play, debuting in January. It was an immediate success, praised both for its lyric expressions of working-class discontent and for the sympathetic and rounded characters he created. The reception of Odets's first two plays marked him both as a playwright of talent and as a spokesperson for leftist causes, a dual identification that followed him the rest of his career. After Awake and Sing! appeared in February, Waiting for Lefty was paired with Till the Day I Die, another one-act play, about Communist resistance to German fascism. Odets's final play of the year, Paradise Lost, appeared in December to

THE • PLAYBILL • PUBLISHED • BY • THE • NEW • YORK • THEATRE • PROGRAM • CORPORATION

BEGINNING
TUESDAY EVENING,
FEBRUARY 19, 1935
ap 22

MATINEES
THURSDAY AND SATURDAY

THE GROUP THEATRE, INC.

presents

THE GROUP THEATRE ACTING COMPANY

in

"AWAKE AND SING!"

By CLIFFORD ODETS

"Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust."—Isaiah 26:19

Production directed by HAROLD CLURMAN

Setting by BORIS ARONSON

CAST

(In the order of appearance)

|               |       |           |       |                  |
|---------------|-------|-----------|-------|------------------|
| MYRON BERGER  | ..... | Played by | ..... | ART SMITH        |
| BESSIE BERGER | ..... | "         | "     | STELLA ADLER     |
| JACOB         | ..... | "         | "     | MORRIS CARNOVSKY |

Theater program for Odets's second produced play, which takes its title from Isaiah 26:19: "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust."

mixed reviews; some praised his deep understanding of the contradictions in American life, and others condemned the play as wandering, neither as politically charged as his earlier plays nor as structurally clear. Odets had made his reputation and had cemented in place his importance to the economic and artistic survival of the Group Theatre.

Like many successful playwrights of the era, Odets soon received the call to be a Hollywood screenwriter, and in 1936 he wrote his first screenplay, The General Died at Dawn. He moved back and forth between Hollywood and Broadway for the next twenty-five years, earning writing credits on such movies as None but the Lonely Heart (1946), which he also directed; Humoresque (1946); Sweet Smell of Success (1957); and writing and directing The Story on Page One (1959). He married his first wife, the acclaimed actress Luise Rainer, in 1937. But even while in Hollywood, Odets continued to write plays for the Group Theatre. Golden Boy (produced 1937), Rocket to the Moon (produced 1938), and Night Music (produced 1940) all helped to keep the Group Theatre solvent and successful. These plays received a mixed critical reception, often tinged by the assumption that Odets had "sold out" to the movie industry and had ruined his talent for writing plays. Golden Boy, which depicts a violinist turned boxer struggling with the decision to surrender his art for money, was seen by many critics to be Odets's apology for accepting Hollywood money.

After the Group Theatre dissolved in 1940, Odets continued to work as an independent playwright, producing four more full-length plays: Clash by Night (produced 1941), The Big Knife (produced 1949), The Country Girl (produced 1950), and The Flowering Peach (produced 1954). The last two of these received strong critical praise, and The Flowering Peach was chosen by the selection jury for the PULITZER PRIZE (though the Advisory Board gave it instead to Tennessee WILLIAMS's Cat on a Hot Tin Roof). Though he tempered the political tone in his later plays, they nevertheless explore the same theme evident in his earlier work: the inherent conflict in American society

Dust jacket for the 1937 play about a young man who gives up the violin for prizefighting, which became the greatest commercial success of Odets's career between idealism and materialism and the effects of that conflict on the individual. His reputation as a political playwright persisted, and in 1952 Odets was called before the House Un-American Activities Committee to discuss Communist influence in Hollywood. Odets eventually "named names" to avoid blacklisting and remained productive for the last ten years of his life—at the time of his death on August 14, 1963 from stomach cancer, the fifty-seven-year-old Odets was working as the head writer for The Richard Boone Show.

—Christopher Herr

Principal Books by Odets

Three Plays by Clifford Odets. New York: Covici-Friede, 1935—includes Awake and Sing!, Waiting for Lefty, and Till the Day I Die.

Rifle Rule in Cuba, by Odets and Carleton Beals. New York: Provisional Committee for Cuba, 1935.

Paradise Lost. New York: Random House, 1936.

Golden Boy. New York: Random House, 1937.

Rocket to the Moon. New York: Random House, 1939.

Six Plays of Clifford Odets. New York: Random House, 1939—including Waiting for Lefty, Awake and Sing!, Till the Day I Die, Paradise Lost, Golden Boy, and Rocket to the Moon.

Night Music. New York: Random House, 1940.

Clash by Night. New York: Random House, 1942.

The Big Knife. New York: Random House, 1949.

The Country Girl. New York: Viking, 1951.

The Flowering Peach. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1954.

The Time is Ripe: The 1940 Journal of Clifford Odets, edited by William Gibson. New York: Grove, 1988.

Studying Clifford Odets

Eleven of Clifford Odets's plays were produced on Broadway, and he is credited with seven screenplays, though little has been written about his career as a screenwriter. Critics generally separate his theater work into two periods: the plays produced while Odets was a member of the GROUP THEATRE, and those produced after the disbanding of the Group in 1940. In his stylistically and thematically connected Group plays, Odets made use of a well-trained ensemble, often creating several roles of relatively equal importance. The early Group plays, especially Awake and Sing!, Waiting for Lefty, and Paradise Lost, focus on the struggles of ordinary people to make sense of the economic collapse, and many critics tie Odets's leftist politics to the larger cultural and historical context of the GREAT DEPRESSION. Study of Odets should begin with Awake and Sing!, considered to be his best play, and Waiting for Lefty, regarded as the best example of American agit-prop theater, but his other early plays as well as the post-Group plays—which are less clearly political but explore similar themes and have not received as much critical attention—are also worthy of study. William DeMastes' Clifford Odets: A Research and Production Sourcebook (New York: Greenwood Press, 1991) and Robert Cooperman's Clifford Odets: An Annotated Bibliography, 1935–1989 (Westport, Conn.: Meckler, 1990), while dated, are useful general references, especially for historical research.

There are several good book-length works on Odets's life and career. Margaret Brenman-Gibson's biography, Clifford Odets, American Playwright: The Years from 1906 to 1940 (New York: Atheneum, 1981) makes exhaustive use of primary sources to detail Odets's life up to the dissolution of the Group and offers complex psychoanalytic readings of the plays. No biography of Odets's later life and career yet exists. Students who wish to explore thematic, structural, and historical readings of Odets's plays should look first at Gerald Weales's Clifford Odets, Playwright (New York: Pegasus, 1971), which provides historical contexts for the plays as well as an examination of Odets's work as a screenwriter and the idea that he was a Hollywood sell-out. Harold Cantor's Clifford Odets, Playwright-Poet (second edition, Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2000) offers the most detailed discussion of Odets's borrowings from Yiddish and the linguistic strategies he uses. Also recommended are Gabriel Miller's Clifford Odets (New York: Continuum, 1989) and Christopher Herr's Clifford Odets and American Political Theatre (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003).

—Christopher Herr

Of Mice and Men by John Steinbeck (New York: Covici-Friede, 1937) novel

An immediate popular success, Of Mice and Men was written as an experimental novel designed to make a "play that can be read or a novel that can be played." Originally titled "Something That Happened," the novel reflects John STEINBECK's increasing interest in nonteleology, the belief there is no causation but only what "is." The plot follows the actions of two bindlestiffs, Lennie Small and George Milton, whose dream consists of making a living on a little farm of their own. Gradually, other misfits, all segregated by defects which include prejudices based on age, gender, race, and physical disabilities, also adopt their goal, despite having differences that eventually undermine their attainment of the American dream of success and ownership. Steinbeck also intended the novel to depict the loneliness and isolation experienced by all migrant workers in the 1930s and how their rejection by society resulted in mistreatment and personal tragedy. Eventually, Lennie's limited mental capacity threatens the shared dream that has been developed, as he accidentally causes the death of the wife of the boss's son, an act that destroys the hopes of the little group of isolates and also results in his own death. Like the novel, the play—which was published as Of Mice and Men: A Play in Three Acts (1937) and successfully produced by George S. KAUFMAN on Broadway, opening on November 23, 1937—asserts the truth of Robert Burns's poem "To a Mouse": "The best-laid plans o' mice and men / Gang aft a'gley an' lea'e us naught but grief an' pain / For promis'd joy."

Source

Hadella, Charlotte Cook. Of Mice and Men: A Kinship of Powerlessness. New York: Twayne, 1995.

—Michael J. Meyer

Of Time and the River by Thomas Wolfe (New York: Scribners, 1935) novel

Thomas WOLFE's second novel, Of Time and the River, extends the odyssey of Eugene Gant beyond LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL (1929), tracing his development from a graduate student into a passionate and engaged young artist. It is a bildungsroman that evokes an intricate tradition of myth in detailing Eugene's quest for knowledge and experience, for the artist's life, for the face of his nation, and for a father. The reliance on myth and poetic and oratorical prose suggests the universality of Eugene's experience. This novel manifests another stage in its author's own often uneasy artistic growth. Though Of Time and the River supplied Wolfe with popular acclaim and commercial success, the novel's disconnected narrative structure left him open to the fiercest criticisms of his professional career. Wolfe's own account of the novel's creation in THE STORY OF A NOVEL (1936) prompted many critics, chief among them Bernard DEVOTO of THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, to charge that he was an undisciplined writer, too dependent upon his editor, Maxwell PERKINS, in shaping his books. Wolfe himself remained highly dissatisfied with the novel in its final form, embittered by the cuts and alterations he felt his editors had pushed on him, and fervent in his belief that he had not achieved the full articulation of his creative vision for this work. Such misgivings and suspicions contributed to his eventual break with the House of Scribner (see CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS) in 1937.

Source

Kennedy, Richard S. The Window of Memory: The Literary Career of Thomas Wolfe. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967.

—S. Zebulon Baker

O'Hara, John (1905–1970) novelist, short-story writer

I saw and felt and heard the world around me and within my limitations and within my prejudices I wrote down what I saw and felt and heard. I tried to keep it mine and where I was most successful it was mine.

—quoted in The O'Hara Concern (1995)

John O'Hara's fiction was and is consistently underrated or ignored by academic types and literary critics. His fourteen novels and thirteen volumes of stories sold well—unusually well for story collections. He remains best-known for his first novel, APPOINTMENT IN SAMARRA (1934), set in GIBBSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA—based on O'Hara's hometown, Pottsville—which he augmented for thirty-five years and made the most thoroughly documented community in American literature. O'Hara referred to the region around Pottsville as "my Pennsylvania protectorate." Because his work set in Gibbsville has recognizable qualities, readers incorrectly assume that most of his work is set there; but it is accurate to state that most of his best work is set in Pennsylvania. He also wrote fiction with New York and Hollywood settings.

O'Hara's major novels include A Rage to Live (1949), Ten North Frederick (1955), From the Terrace (1958), and Ourselves to Know (1960)—all set in Pennsylvania. Grace Caldwell Tate, the central character in A Rage to Live, is a Pennsylvania aristocrat whose marriage is destroyed by her adultery. The main figure in Ten North Frederick is Joseph Chapin, a Gibbsville lawyer who wants to be president of the United States. From the Terrace, which O'Hara regarded as his best novel, is about Alfred Eaton, a partner in a Wall Street investment house who serves as undersecretary of the Navy during World War II.

John O'Hara, circa 1940

O'Hara was America's greatest short-fiction writer; he published 402 short stories and novellas, mostly in The New Yorker. He is frequently credited with having formulated "the New Yorker story," a character-driven story based on moments of insight or revelation. His most admired stories include "THE DOCTOR'S SON," "Graven Image," "Over the River and Through the Wood," and "Fatimas and Kisses." The three novellas collected as Sermons and Soda-Water (1960) include "Imagine Kissing Pete." O'Hara wrote plays, movies, and newspaper columns. The 1940 Rodgers and Hart musical PAL JOEY, based on his stories, is regarded as the first realistic American musical play.

O'Hara was a deterministic realist who believed that all great fiction is great social history. He declared in the foreword to SERMONS AND SODA-WATER: "The Twenties, the Thirties, and the Forties are already history, but I cannot be content to leave their story in the hands of the historians and the editors of picture books. I want to record the way people talked and thought and felt, and do it with complete honesty and variety." He accurately employed the details of American social stratification—utilizing speech and possessions to develop characterizations. Hostile critics condescendingly conceded that he had "a great ear"; but they dismissed his "surface reality," although no American writer matched his ability to document American life on all levels of society. His material was not restricted to upper-class life: the range of characters includes working-class people, show-biz people, and criminals, as well as the American aristocracy of wealth and family.

The critics misleadingly categorized O'Hara's style and tone as hard-boiled (see HARD-BOILED FICTION). His style was unobtrusive and controlled. Although his point of view was objective, his tone was often sentimental. His main themes are the pain of exclusion and loneliness, the need for love, and the consequences of cruelty. He also examined the sexual conduct of his characters, which gave his work a reputation for lubricity; but it is tame by later standards. The Dust jacket for O'Hara's first novel, in which Julian English, a Cadillac dealer, commits suicide. O'Hara, who adopted "psychological patterns" to his purpose, later explained that "the basic Julian English was from the wrong side of the tracks and never wore a buttoned-down collar in his life."

critical hostility to O'Hara in part resulted from his contempt for the literary establishment and his refusal to provide fashionable political messages.

John O'Hara wrote truthfully and accurately about American society and people, producing a body of fiction unsurpassed in its fidelity to American life. His epitaph reads "Better than anyone else, he told the truth about his time. He was a professional. He wrote honestly and well."

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Principal Books by O'Hara

Appointment in Samarra. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1934.

The Doctor's Son and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.

Butterfield 8. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.

Hope of Heaven. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1938.

Files on Parade. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.

Pal Joey. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1940.

Pipe Night. New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1945.

Hellbox. New York: Random House, 1947.

A Rage to Live. New York: Random House, 1949.

The Farmers Hotel. New York: Random House, 1951.

Pal Joey: The Libretto and Lyrics, libretto by O'Hara and lyrics by Lorenz Hart. New York: Random House, 1952.

Sweet and Sour. New York: Random House, 1954.

Ten North Frederick. New York: Random House, 1955.

A Family Party. New York: Random House, 1956.

From the Terrace. New York: Random House, 1958.

Ourselves to Know. New York: Random House, 1960.

Sermons and Soda-Water, 3 volumes—The Girl on the Baggage Truck, Imagine Kissing Pete, and We're Friends Again. New York: Random House, 1960.

Five Plays. New York: Random House, 1961.

Assembly. New York: Random House, 1961.

The Big Laugh. New York: Random House, 1962.

The Cape Cod Lighter. New York: Random House, 1962.

Elizabeth Appleton. New York: Random House, 1963.

The Hat on the Bed. New York: Random House, 1963.

The Horse Knows the Way. New York: Random House, 1964.

The Lockwood Concern. New York: Random House, 1965.

My Turn. New York: Random House, 1966.

Waiting for Winter. New York: Random House, 1966.

The Instrument. New York: Random House, 1967.

And Other Stories. New York: Random House, 1968.

Lovey Childs: A Philadelphian's Story. New York: Random House, 1969.

The Ewings. New York: Random House, 1972.

The Time Element and Other Stories. New York: Random House, 1972.

Good Samaritan and Other Stories. New York: Random House, 1974.

"An Artist Is His Own Fault," edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. Carbondale & Edwardsville: Southern Illinois University Press, 1977.

Dust jacket for O'Hara's 1949 novel, in which Grace Paley betrays her husband with another man and breaks the "set of rules" he believed they both lived by

The Second Ewings. Bloomfield Hills, Mich. & Columbia, S.C.: Bruccoli Clark, 1977.

Selected Letters of John O'Hara, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Random House, 1978.

Two by O'Hara. New York & London: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich / Bruccoli Clark, 1979.

Gibbsville, Pa.: The Classic Stories, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992; second edition, 2004.

John O'Hara's Hollywood, edited by Bruccoli. New York: Avalon, 2006.

Studying John O'Hara

John O'Hara's career can be divided into three phases. First: from APPOINTMENT IN SAMARRA (1934) up to the publication of his fourth novel, A Rage to Live (1949) and his temporary cessation of writing short stories. Second: the period of the big novels between 1950 and 1960: Ten North Frederick (set in Gibbsville), From the Terrace (set in New York) and Ourselves to Know (set in The Region). The third phase commenced when he returned to short fiction in 1960 with the novella "Imagine Kissing Pete." During the last decade of this life O'Hara consolidated his position as America's greatest social realist and greatest short-story writer with seven story collections and wrote six more novels.

Dust jacket for O'Hara's 1955 novel that presents a stark contrast between the public Joe Chapin, a man who aspired to become president of the United States, and the private man, whose life is dominated by his manipulative wife

O'Hara published so much—stories, novelettes, and fourteen novels, as well as volumes of plays and columns—that it is difficult for a student to grasp the scope of his work. Although most of O'Hara's fiction is set away from his GIBBSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA, his enduring reputation is based on the socio-historical realism of the Gibbsville and Lantenengo County fiction set during the 1920s and 1930s. Accordingly, the study and reading of O'Hara should commence with his first novel, Appointment in Samarra (set in Gibbsville), and the collection of stories, Gibbsville, PA (1992).

O'Hara's four hundred short stories constitute a major contribution to the canon of American fiction. He was a master of the novella: "Doctor's Son" (probably the best introduction to O'Hara), "Fatimas and Kisses," "The Bucket of Blood," "The Cellar Domain," The Farmers Hotel, A Family Party, Sermons and Soda-Water.

The most useful companion to his work and reputation is John O'Hara: A Documentary Volume (Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 324. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2006), edited by Brucoli—which includes extensive sampling of the reviews of his books. It is difficult to gauge O'Hara's position among major American authors without understanding his reputation among the unfriendly academic critics and the so-called literary establishment who complained that he wrote too much and disparaged his work because he wrote about things and people of which they were ignorant.

The standard biography is The O'Hara Concern (revised edition, Pittsburgh & London: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1995) by Brucoli, who also edited The Selected Letters of John O'Hara (1978). The best of the unimpressive critical volumes is Sheldon Grebstein's John O'Hara (New York: Twayne, 1966). O'Hara's literary essays and talks were collected by Brucoli in "An Artist Is his Own Fault" (1977).

The primary bibliography is Brucoli's John O'Hara: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1978). There is no secondary bibliography apart from the annual MLA bibliography volumes, available in print or online at major libraries. O'Hara's papers are at Penn State University; Kent State University has a comprehensive collection of his published work.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

Oklahoma! by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein II (produced 1943) play

The first collaboration of composer Richard Rodgers and librettist Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II, Oklahoma! completed the evolution of the American musical from a poor imitation of European operetta to a mature native art form. Originally titled "Away We Go!," the play received its final title during out-of-town previews when Rodgers and Hammerstein quickly wrote the rousing title song for the show's closing anthem. It became an enormous hit when it opened on March 31, 1943, making an initial run of 2,212 performances.

Rodgers, who had broken with his longtime partner Lorenz HART, approached Hammerstein to work on a musical version of Lynn Riggs's agrarian play Green Grow the Lilacs (produced 1931). Rodgers and Hammerstein embraced the simplicity of the rural setting of Riggs's play. In place of the usual uproarious curtain-raising song common to musicals of the time, the authors began the play with simple images. Rodgers described the decision-making process behind the composition of the opening number "Oh, What a Wonderful Mornin'": "[N]ot to have a chorus on-stage (phony); utilize three-quarter time in short sixteen-bar verses and repeated refrain (indigenous); have Aunt Eller on-stage churning butter to emphasize rhythm (self-evident); let Curly enter singing but unaccompanied (intimate); better not seat audience during song (impressive).” Choreographer Agnes De Mille described the opening night’s audience reaction to the show’s understated first number as “Aaaaaah!” Like people seeing their homeland.”

Oklahoma! traces the parallel development of two love stories, each involving a love-triangle. In the major plot Laurey Williams must choose between the cocksure cowboy Curly McClain and the brooding farmhand Jud Fry. The secondary love story depicts Ado Annie Carnes (the girl who “Cain’t Say No”) comically trying to decide between her regular boyfriend, cowboy Will Parker, and a traveling Persian peddler.

In addition to the perfectly integrated lyrics and text, Oklahoma! also marked an advance in the combination of dance with character. Ballet-trained De Mille choreographed an expressionistic dream sequence that concludes the first act in which doubles of Curly, Laurey, and Jud act out their subconscious desires in dance. In an essay for a 1998 London revival critic Mark Steyn wrote that Rodgers and Hammerstein “fused the naturalism of the straight play, the musicality of the operetta, the colour of the imagery of musical comedy lyrics and the emotional sweep of dance.”

—Park Bucker

O'Neill, Eugene (1888–1953) playwright

Strange interlude! Yes, our lives are merely strange dark interludes in the electrical display of God the Father!

—Strange Interlude (1928)

Eugene O'Neill achieved a reputation as the first internationally significant American playwright by writing more than sixty one-act and full-length plays for which he received four PULITZER PRIZES and the Nobel Prize in literature. Profoundly influenced by the dysfunction of his family and his personal spiritual struggle, he began writing plays with the goal of making room on an American stage dominated by melodrama and light comedies for theatrical experimentation and modernist drama (see MODERNISM). O'Neill's plays, however, were as much a product of the late-nineteenth-century stage as they are a rejection of it. While his own work was sometimes sentimental and melodramatic and his experiments were not always successful, O'Neill was able to achieve a tragic vision, capturing the deep psychological anguish born of the sense of isolation and moral confusion often present in modern life.

Born in a New York City hotel room on October 16, 1888, O'Neill was the son of James O'Neill, an actor who was most famous for his starring role in the melodrama The Count of Monte Cristo. His father's career and fear of dying in the poorhouse became an important theme of what many consider O'Neill's greatest play, Long Day's Journey into Night (produced 1956). He spent his early childhood barnstorming the United States with his parents and elder brother Jamie, who figures in several of his plays, and later attended Catholic schools and Princeton University for a year. He served as a seaman and read Joseph Conrad, whose stories of the sea influenced his early plays. In September 1914 O'Neill took George Pierce Baker's English 47 course on playwriting at Harvard.

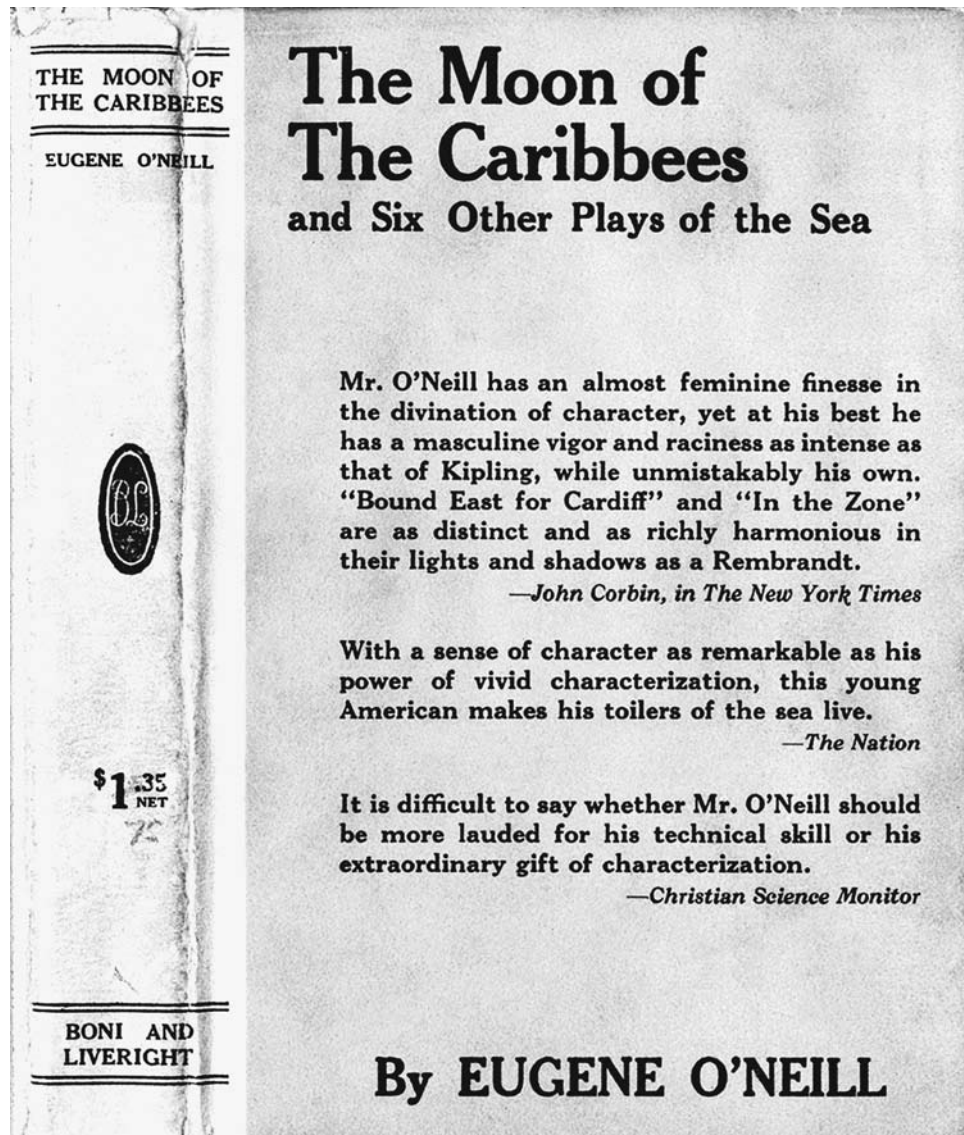

In the first phase of his artistic development, O'Neill wrote one-act plays that typically depicted the lives of seafaring men and the denizens of wharfside saloons. He avoided commercial theater and in 1916 joined the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS. Many of his early plays—including BOUND EAST for CARDIFF (produced 1916), In the Zone (produced 1917), The Long Voyage Home (produced 1917), and The Moon of the Caribbees (produced 1918)—were performed at the Provincetown Playhouse.

O'Neill's full-length drama Beyond the Horizon (produced 1920), which explored a young man's yearning to leave home and explore the world, was his first play to be performed on Broadway. It received a Pulitzer Prize, and

Eugene O'Neill, circa 1925

Dust jacket for O'Neill's 1919 collection of one-act plays involving the crew of the S.S. Glencairn commenced a fourteen-year period in which O'Neill's plays dominated the American stage. O'Neill wrote of troubled family dynamics and sibling rivalry, lost dreams and shattered faith, and the disillusionments of contemporary life. He also explored provocative racial and political issues, as in The Emperor Jones (produced 1920), the story of an African American Pullman porter who becomes the tyrant of a West Indies island. In subject and style, O'Neill's plays were groundbreaking. He gave his African American characters dramatic monologues composed of both colloquial speech and a kind of grandeur that harkens back to William Shakespeare and other classic playwrights. He won his second Pulitzer Prize for ANNA CHRISTIE (produced 1921), the story of a fallen woman presented with sympathy, insight, and somberness.

In The Great God Brown (produced 1926) O'Neill experimented with masks, adapting the dramatic devices of the ancient Greeks to the modern stage. The use of the mask was in part influenced by O'Neill's reading of Sigmund Freud. The mask dramatized not only the face individuals showed to society; it also was the symbol of repression, underneath which individuals expressed their true feelings. O'Neill again employed masks in the experimental drama Strange Interlude (produced 1928), in which characters speak their true feelings not by taking off masks but by asides—as characters do in Shakespeare's plays. He won his third Pulitzer for the drama.

O'Neill's Civil War trilogy, Mourning Becomes Electra (produced 1931), drew directly on Aeschylus's Orestia as he melded modern psychological notions with the Greek concept of fate and the furies. Other notable O'Neill dramas from the 1920s and early 1930s include All God's Chillun Got Wings (produced 1924), THE HAIRY APE (produced 1924), DESIRE UNDER THE ELMS (produced 1924), Marco Millions (produced 1928), Lazarus Laughed (produced 1928), and his only comedy, AH, WILDERNESS! (produced 1933).

The failure of his last avant-garde drama, Days without End (produced 1934), coupled with health problems, led to O'Neill's withdrawal from active participation in production of his plays. After winning the Nobel Prize in 1936, he had only one more Broadway production, The Iceman Cometh (produced 1946), in which a traveling salesman addresses the meaning of life, exhorting a group of saloon derelicts to forsake their illusions. Though the play is now recognized as one of O'Neill's greatest works, it won few accolades from contemporary critics. He nevertheless continued to write during the last decade of his life, producing psychologically complex, naturalistically stark personal dramas, before a degenerative muscle disease curtailed his ability to write. He planned an eleven-play cycle, "A Tale of Possessors Self-Dispossessed," of which he completed only A Touch of the Poet (produced 1957) and a lengthy draft of More Stately Mansions (produced 1962). This generation-by-generation chronicle of an Irish American family tragically entrapped by their possessions and a legacy of family betrayals was to be complemented by a projected cycle of one-act character studies titled "By Way of Obit," but he completed only one of these plays, Hughie (produced 1959). O'Neill died on November 27, 1953.

At the time of O'Neill's death, the critical consensus was that his best work had been written during the 1920s. This dismissive view was radically transformed in 1956 with the premiere production of Long Day's Journey Into Night, a semiautobiographical drama in which a father, mother, and two adult sons are inextricably bound together by their inadequacies, addictions, feelings of guilt, and a profound sense of loss epitomized in the failure of the mother to defeat an addiction to morphine. It won O'Neill a posthumous Pulitzer Prize and inspired a critical reevaluation of his achievement. He remains widely regarded as America's foremost dramatist.

—James Fisher

Principal Books by O'Neill

Thirst and Other One Act Plays. Boston: Gorham Press, 1914.
Before Breakfast. New York: Shay, 1916.
The Moon of the Caribbees and Six Other Plays of the Sea. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1919.
Beyond the Horizon. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1920.
The Emperor Jones, Diff'rent, The Straw. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1921.
Gold. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1921.

The Hairy Ape, Anna Christie, The First Man. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922.

All God's Chillun Got Wings and Welded. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1924.

The Complete Works of Eugene O'Neill, 2 volumes. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1924.

Desire Under the Elms. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1925.

The Great God Brown, The Fountain, The Moon of the Caribbees and Other Plays. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926.

Marco Millions. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.

Lazarus Laughed. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1927.

Strange Interlude. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1928.

Dynamo. New York: Liveright, 1929.

Mourning Becomes Electra. New York: Liveright, 1931.

Ah, Wilderness! New York: Random House, 1933.

Days Without End. New York: Random House, 1934.

The Iceman Cometh. New York: Random House, 1946.

Lost Plays of Eugene O'Neill. New York: New Fathoms, 1950—includes Abortion, The Movie Man, The Sniper, Servitude, and A Wife for a Life.

A Moon for the Misbegotten. New York: Random House, 1952.

Long Day's Journey Into Night. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1956.

A Touch of the Poet. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1957.

Hughie. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959.

More Stately Mansions. New Haven & London: Yale University Press, 1964.

Ten "Lost" Plays. New York: Random House, 1964—includes Thirst, The Web, Warnings, Fog, Recklessness, and Abortion.

"Children of the Sea" and Three Other Unpublished Plays. Washington, D.C.: Microcard Editions, 1972—includes Bread and Butter, Now I Ask You, and Shell Shock.

Poems 1912–1944, edited by Donald C. Gallup. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1980.

Studying Eugene O'Neill

Eugene O'Neill wrote fifty plays between A Wife for Life in 1913 and A Moon for the Misbegotten in 1943, which was finished as O'Neill's mounting physical impairments prevented further work. This accounting does not include drafts of plays intended as components of two cycles O'Neill planned and did not complete, as well as notes, outlines, and partial drafts for other unfinished works. In his last years, O'Neill destroyed most of his incomplete plays and plans, although some material escaped destruction and is collected in Eugene O'Neill at Work: Newly Released Ideas for Plays (New York: Ungar, 1981) and The Unfinished Plays (New York: Continuum, 1988), both edited by Virginia Floyd, and The Unknown O'Neill: Unpublished or Unfamiliar Writings of Eugene O'Neill (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2005), edited by Travis Bogard. Analysis based on drafts and notes for one of the planned cycles in Donald C. Gallup's Eugene O'Neill and His Eleven-Play Cycle: "A Tale of Possessors Self-Dispossessed"

Helen Hayes Theatre

---

FIRE NOTICE: The exit indicated by a red light and sign nearest to the seat you occupy is the shortest route to the street. In the event of fire please do not run—WALK TO THAT EXIT.
EDW. F. CAVANAGH, JR.
FIRE COMMISSIONER

Thoughtless persons annoy patrons and distract actors and endanger the safety of others by lighting matches during the performance and intermissions. This violates a city ordinance and renders the offender liable to ARREST. It is urged that all patrons refrain from lighting matches in the auditorium of this theatre.

---

THE • PLAYBILL • A • WEEKLY • PUBLICATION • OF • PLAYBILL • INCORPORATED

---

Beginning Wednesday Evening, November 7, 1956 • No Matinees

OPENING NIGHT, NOVEMBER 7, 1956

Leigh Connell, Theodore Mann and José Quintero present

FREDRIC MARCH

FLORENCE ELDRIDGE

in

EUGENE O'NEILL'S LONG DAY'S JOURNEY INTO NIGHT

Directed by JOSE QUINTERO with

JASON ROBARDS, JR.

BRADFORD DILLMAN

KATHERINE ROSS

Setting by DAVID HAYS
Lighting by THARON MUSSER
Costumes by MOTLEY

CAST
(In order of appearance)

JAMES TYRONE .....

FREDRIC MARCH

MARY CAVAN TYRONE .....

FLORENCE ELDRIDGE

---

Program for the American premiere of O'Neill's play based on his family

(New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1998) offers a vision of what O'Neill intended. The only evidence of the other projected cycle, "By Way of Obit," is the sole completed play, Hughie.

The most complete collection of O'Neill's plays currently in print is the three volumes edited by Travis Bogard and published by the Library of America: Eugene O'Neill: Complete Plays 1913–1920, Eugene O'Neill: Complete Plays 1920–1931, and Eugene O'Neill: Complete Plays 1932–1943 (New York: Literary Classics of the United States, 1988). These volumes present the three distinct periods critics identify in O'Neill's career: the first volume includes his formative one-acts, most particularly his plays of the sea, emphasizing themes of masculinity and the failure of technology to tame the natural world; the second volume is dominated by overtly experimental plays in which O'Neill sought to create a language and stage style conducive to his themes; and the third volume includes new works he withheld from production, notably the acclaimed works The Iceman Cometh, Long Day's Journey Into Night, and A Moon for the Misbegotten.

Students seeking critical examinations of O'Neill's plays are likely to feel overwhelmed by the vast amount of material dating from the first book-length study, Barrett H. Clark's Eugene O'Neill: The Man and His Plays (New York: Robert M. McBride, 1929). Between Sophus K. Winther's Eugene O'Neill: A Critical Study (New York: Random House, 1934) and Edwin A. Engel's The Haunted Heroes of Eugene O'Neill (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953), both written during O'Neill's lifetime, his work received comparatively limited critical attention, but in the aftermath of the first production of his posthumous masterpiece Long Day's Journey Into Night in 1956 critical interest intensified. Doris V. Falk's Eugene O'Neill and the Tragic Tension (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1958; New York: Gordian, 1982) and Doris Alexander's The Tempering of Eugene O'Neill (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1962) followed by her subsequent volumes, Eugene O'Neill's Creative Struggle: The Decisive Decade, 1924-1933 (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992) and Eugene O'Neill's Last Plays: Separating Art from Autobiography (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005), focus on O'Neill's middle and late plays as they relate to his life, while Travis Bogard's Contour in Time: The Plays of Eugene O'Neill (New York: Oxford University Press, 1972, 2001) offers a balanced view of all major O'Neill plays and the particular influences on their creation, with a minimum of academic jargon.

Critical studies after the mid 1980s have tended to be less comprehensive and more focused on aspects of O'Neill's art. Michael Manheim's Eugene O'Neill's New Language of Kinship (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1982) emphasizes the dramatist's experimentation with form and genre, while Virginia Floyd's The Plays of Eugene O'Neill: A New Assessment (New York: Ungar, 1985) explores the influences and intellectual background of his work. Stephen A. Black's Eugene O'Neill: Beyond Mourning and Tragedy (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2002) firmly ties O'Neill's plays to the unhappiness of his personal life and the traditions of the tragic form, while Egil Tornqvist's Eugene O'Neill: A Playwright's Theatre (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004) examines the plays in regard to the international theater of his day and since. Thierry Dubost's Struggle, Defeat or Rebirth: Eugene O'Neill's Vision of Humanity (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2005) gives equal weight to both personal and theatrical aspects of O'Neill's oeuvre.

O'Neill's vision of modern American culture is explored in John Patrick Diggins's Eugene O'Neill's America: Desire Under Democracy (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2007), stressing O'Neill's departure from images of American optimism in mid-twentieth-century literature. Joel Pfister's Staging Depth: Eugene O'Neill and the Politics of Psychological Discourse (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995) and Maria T. Miliora's Narcissism, the Family, and Madness: A Self-Psychological Study of Eugene O'Neill and His Plays (New York: Peter Lang, 2000) probe a range of psychological theories embedded in O'Neill's plays.

Decades of criticism are brought together in John C. Houchin's The Critical Response to Eugene O'Neill (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993). Two excellent collections of scholarly essays, Eugene O'Neill's Century: Centennial Views on America's Foremost Tragic Dramatist (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1991), edited by Robert F. Moorton, and The Cambridge Companion to Eugene O'Neill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004), edited by Michael Manheim, offer students a range of approaches to the playwright. The Eugene O'Neill Review, an annual periodical published by Suffolk University, features critical essays, performance and book reviews, and O'Neill news.

Students will frequently encounter scholarship on O'Neill's predominant place in the evolution of Broadway drama and in his influence on subsequent American playwrights, as in Anne Fleche's Mimetic Disillusion: Eugene O'Neill, Tennessee Williams, and U.S. Dramatic Realism (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1997) and decades of periodical essays. John Orlandello's O'Neill on Film (Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1982) examines cinematic treatments of the O'Neill plays, while Ronald H. Wainscott's Staging O'Neill: The Experimental Years (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988) and Yvonne Shafer's Performing O'Neill: Conversations with Actors and Directors (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2000) focus on performance issues.

O'Neill biographies are dominated by Arthur and Barbara Gelb's O'Neill (New York: Harper, 1962), a highly readable account that was superseded by their O'Neill: Life with Monte Cristo (New York: Applause, 2000), the first volume of a projected three-volume biography. Louis Sheaffer's O'Neill: Son and Playwright (Boston: Little, Brown, 1968) and O'Neill: Son and Artist (Boston: Little, Brown, 1973) covers the same ground, with more emphasis on the content of O'Neill's plays as they reflect developments in O'Neill's life. O'Neill never wrote an autobiography, but his second wife, Agnes Boulton, published Part of A Long Story: Eugene O'Neill as a Young Man in Love (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958), a less-than-reliable account of their marriage and his rise to prominence as a dramatist in the 1920s. A more complete portrait of their relationship emerges in A Wind is Rising: The Correspondence of Agnes Boulton and Eugene O'Neill, edited by William Davies King (Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2000). The intensely private O'Neill gave few interviews during his life, but the existing ones are collected in Conversations with Eugene O'Neill, edited by Mark W. Estrin (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990).

No complete collection of O'Neill's letters exists. Selected collections include Selected Letters of Eugene O'Neill (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988), edited by Jackson R. Bryer and Travis Bogard, who also edited his correspondence with his trusted friend and Provincetown Player coworker in The Theatre We Worked For: The Letters of Eugene O'Neill to Kenneth Macgowan (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1982). Arthur W. and Nancy L. Roberts edited his correspondence with critic George Jean NATHAN in As Ever, Gene: The Letters of Eugene O'Neill to George Jean Nathan (Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1987). Dorothy Commins edited the correspondence of O'Neill and her husband and O'Neill confidante, Saxe Commins, as Love and Admiration and Respect: The O'Neill-Commins Correspondence (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1986). The most important sources of biographical materials on Eugene O'Neill are the manuscript collection at the Beinecke Library at Yale University and the Shaeffer-O'Neill Collection at the Charles E. Shain Library at Connecticut College.

Additional resources essential to the serious study of O'Neill include Jennifer McCabe Atkinson's Eugene O'Neill: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1974) and Madeline C. Smith and Richard Eaton's Eugene O'Neill: An Annotated International Bibliography, 1973-1999 (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2001). Smith and Eaton also published Eugene O'Neill Production Personnel (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2005), an encyclopedic work including biographical sketches on actors, directors, designers, and producers associated with O'Neill and his plays. Margaret Loftus Ranald's The Eugene O'Neill Companion (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984) is a rich compendium. Several series of student companions that focus on individual playwrights or plays feature useful volumes on O'Neill and/or his major plays, with Stephen F. Bloom's Student Companion to Eugene O'Neill (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 2007) being the most recent. The recommended websites for O'Neill are eOneill.com: An Electronic O'Neill Archive (<<http://www.eoneill.com/>>) and Eugene O'Neill Foundation, Tao House (<<http://www.eugeneoneill.org/>>).

—James Fisher

"One Trip Abroad" by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1930)

short story

First published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST and collected in Afternoon of an Author (1957) after F. Scott FITZGERALD's death, this story treats an important idea in Fitzgerald's fiction: the destructive effects of Europe on Americans. Nelson and Nicole Kelly, an attractive young American couple who have inherited money, go to France to improve themselves by studying art and music. But they are corrupted by the people they associate with. He drinks too much, and they both engage in romantic involvements. After four years abroad they are in Switzerland, recovering from their dissipations: "Switzerland is a country where very few things begin, but many things end." Throughout the story the Kellys notice another young couple who become increasingly unattractive. At the end Nicole realizes that the other couple are the Kellys' doubles: "They're us! Don't you see?"

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

"The Open Boat" by Stephen Crane (1897) short story

Based on Stephen CRANE's harrowing experience in January 1897, this short story was first published in SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE with the full title "The Open Boat: A Tale Intended to Be After the Fact. Being the Experience of Four Men from the Sunk Steamer 'Commodore'" and collected in The Open Boat, and Other Tales of Adventure (1898). After abandoning the Commodore, Crane and three crew members spent thirty hours in a ten-foot dinghy attempting to reach the Florida coast. The ship's oiler drowned in the attempt to swim to shore. A model of terse storytelling, "The Open Boat" begins, "None of them knew the color of the sky"—a line that suggests the single-minded focus of the men in the dinghy on their immediate situation and their efforts to stay alive. In the story rough water and a menacing shark symbolize the men's precarious existence in an indifferent universe in which individuals are powerless against an "abominable injustice." Although they are at the mercy of chance and "the unconcern of the universe," they create a microcosmic community based on trust and solidarity.

Sources

Schaefer, Michael. A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of Stephen Crane. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.

Wolford, Chester L. Stephen Crane: A Study of the Short Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

—Paul Sorrentino

O Pioneers! by Willa Cather (Boston & New York:

Houghton Mifflin, 1913) novel

With O Pioneers!, her second novel, Willa CATHER placed the Great Plains on the American literary map. Set on the Nebraska prairie in the late nineteenth century, the novel celebrates a landscape that few writers of the time regarded as a worthy subject for fiction and presents a remarkable feminist heroine—Alexandra Bergson, a Swedish immigrant who achieves success as a farmer through determination and an intuitive understanding of her natural environment. Loosely plotted and written in the deceptively simple, nuanced style that characterizes Cather's mature work, the novel juxtaposes Alexandra's dedication to the land (and resulting loneliness) with a tragic romance involving her brother Emil and Marie Shabata, a Bohemian immigrant trapped in a disastrous marriage. Spared the hardships endured by pioneers such as Alexandra, the two younger characters lack a sense of purpose and are ultimately murdered by Marie's jealous husband, Frank. The novel ends quietly with Alexandra's engagement to Carl Linstrum, a friend from her childhood.

Source

Cather, Willa. O Pioneers! Willa Cather Scholarly Edition, edited by Susan Rosowski and Charles Mignon with Kathleen Danker. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992.

—Steven Trout

Oppen, George (1908–1984) poet

George Oppen is an important member of the Objectivist school of poets (see OBJECTIVISM). Admirers praise his poetry for its terseness and vivid imagery, while critics fault his work for being abstract and impersonal. Although he was a supporter of the Communist Party, his work rarely addresses overt political themes. His first collection, Discrete Series (1934), was introduced by Ezra POUND and was praised by William Carlos WILLIAMS. He later explained his reason for choosing a mathematical phrase for his title: “A pure mathematical series would be one in which each term is derived from the preceding term by a rule. A discrete series is a series of terms each of which is empirically derived, each one of which is empirically true. And this is the reason for the fragmentary character of those poems.” Following the publication of this collection, Oppen gave up poetry for political activism and did not publish another book of poems until The Materials in 1962. Oppen won the PULITZER PRIZE for Of Being Numerous (1968). The Collected Poems of George Oppen was published in 1975, and his last collection, Primitive, in 1978.

Source

Hatlen, Burton, ed. George Oppen, Man and Poet. Orono, Maine: National Poetry Foundation, 1981.

Osborn, Paul (1901–1988) playwright

Paul Osborn was educated at the University of Michigan and did graduate work at Yale, where he studied with George Pierce Baker. His first plays, Hotbed (produced 1928), a drama set on a college campus, and the melodrama A Ledge (produced 1929), attracted little attention, but he won critical acclaim with The Vinegar Tree (produced 1930), a comedy about a middle-aged woman in pursuit of an old lover. He achieved another success with On Borrowed Time (produced 1938), a dramatic fantasy adapted from a novel by Lawrence Edward Watkin about an old man’s attempt to outsmart the embodiment of Death. His next play, Morning’s at Seven (produced 1939), a comedy-drama centered on the lives of four elderly sisters in a Midwestern small town, was a failure in its initial production but triumphed forty years later in a long-running 1980 Broadway revival.

The common links among Osborn’s works are the richly drawn characters and an optimistic, if frequently bittersweet, view of human foibles. Osborn’s later work was mainly dramatic adaptations of novels by other writers, including The Innocent Voyage (produced 1943), A Bell for Adano (produced 1944), Point of No Return (produced 1951), and The World of Suzie Wong (produced 1948). He also wrote many screenplays, including The Yearling (1946), East of Eden (1955), Sayonara (1958), South Pacific (1958), and several of his own plays.

—James Fisher

Our Town by Thornton Wilder (produced 1938)play

Perhaps more than any other work written for the American stage, Thornton WILDER’s Our Town deserves to be called the Great American Play. Since its Broadway premiere on February 4, 1938, for an initial run of 336 performances, no play written by an American has been produced by professional and amateur theater companies and schools as often as Our Town, which won the PULITZER PRIZE in drama. Though an embodiment of American culture, Wilder’s play appeals to audiences around the world.

A modern morality play, Our Town, like the medieval allegory Everyman, raises timeless philosophical issues about life. The setting, Grover’s Corners, New Hampshire, is our town, or Every town. But the play asks its universal questions in a specifically American context: daily life in a small New England village at the turn of the twentieth century illustrated principally by two neighboring families, the Webbs and the Gibbsses. The setting, characters, and actions are all concretely American, yet foreign audiences and readers can relate to what is revealed about the human condition. The Stage Manager, the play’s chorus-like narrator, reminds the audience that human beings have the occupations of daily life in common, whether they live in present-day America or ancient Babylon.

Our Town also alludes to the transcendent. Rebecca Gibbs, for example, tells her brother George about a letter with an address that begins at the microcosmic level, a family farm, and extends up to the macrocosm, “the Mind of God.” In the third act the Stage Manager speaks to the audience from the cemetery about an existence after life, affirming that something about human beings is eternal. The language Wilder uses is so abstract that the religious point of view is not limited to Christianity.

Another reason for the enduring appeal of Our Town is the way Wilder dramatizes the conflict between everyday demands on our attention and a more existential awareness of life. When Emily revisits her twelfth birthday after she has died, she asks the Stage Manager, “Do any human beings ever realize life while they live it,—every, every minute,” to which he replies, “No. The saints and poets, maybe—they do some.” Most audience members and readers are profoundly moved by this tragic understanding Emily acquires only after it is too late.

A final aspect that makes Our Town a great play is its theatrical style, the likes of which had not been seen on American stages before 1938 when it premiered. First, plot and time are nonlinear; flashbacks and foreknowledge of characters’ fates give the audience an omniscient awareness of the past, present, and future. Second, there is no curtain, no scenery, no props; actors pantomime such stage business as cooking breakfast, delivering milk, and sipping ice-cream sodas. Third, the Stage Manager repeatedly “breaks the fourth wall” to comment directly to the audience on the characters and actions. The function of these nonrealistic theatrical techniques is to highlight the ideas Wilder is trying to get across, and to encourage audiences to use their imagination to picture perhaps their own towns, thus creating the empathy that makes Our Town as moving and thought-provoking to an international audience as to an American one. Furthermore, though speaking realistically and costumed in accordance with American styles in the early 1900s, the characters are written as types to which all people can relate: mother, father, son, daughter, sister, brother, neighbor, doctor, undertaker, minister, constable, choir director, teacher, and housekeeper. That is the genius of the play: it walks a tightrope between the specific and the general, the concrete and the abstract.

Source

Siebold, Thomas. Readings on Our Town. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven, 2000.

—Lincoln Konkle

The Ox-Bow Incident by Walter Van Tilburg Clark

(New York: Random House, 1940) novel

Walter Van Tilburg CLARK's riveting story of the lynching of innocent men is a WESTERN without heroes. The story is narrated by Art Croft, a cowboy who has been tending cattle on the winter range. He becomes swept up in a posse that is formed by the men of Bridger's Wells when cowhand Larry Kincaid is believed to have been murdered by cattle rustlers. Arthur Davies, a local store owner, objects to vigilante justice and the mob psychology it promotes, but neither he nor any other man is willing to stand against the will of the group, which is led by Major Tetley, a former Confederate officer. A probing, psychological study of different types of men, The Ox-Bow Incident is a landmark of the genre.

Source

Heilman, Robert B. "Clark's Western Incident: From Stereotype to Model," in Walter Van Tilburg Clark: Critiques, edited by Charlton Laird. Reno: University of Nevada Press, 1983.

Oates, Joyce Carol (1938– ) novelist, short-story writer, poet, playwright, critic

When people say there is too much violence in my books, what they are saying is there is too much reality in life.

—Conversations with Joyce Carol Oates (1989)

Joyce Carol Oates was born in Lockport, New York, an economically depressed area eighteen miles east of Niagara Falls, the “Eden County” of her fiction. After graduating class valedictorian from Syracuse University in 1960, Oates earned a master’s degree in English from the University of Wisconsin in 1961. She married the critic and editor Raymond J. Smith and moved with him to Detroit in 1962. Detroit became the setting for several of her novels and the place where she launched her literary career. In 1968 Oates accepted a position as professor of literature at the University of Windsor in Ontario, Canada, where she and her husband founded The Ontario Review. Ten years later she accepted a position at Princeton University, where she is currently the Roger S. Berlind ’52 Professor in the Humanities.

Oates established herself with her trilogy of A Garden of Earthly Delights (1967), a multigenerational family saga set in rural New York State; Expensive People (1968), a more experimental novel told by an unreliable narrator about a murder set in the affluent suburbs; and the award-winning them (1969), a politically charged novel of urban violence that won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD in 1970. Wonderland (1971), often considered to be her best book, is a dense, psychological novel chronicling the life of a celebrated brain surgeon named Jesse Harte and the grotesque members of his adopted family. The title inaugurates an extended pattern of allusions to Lewis Carroll’s Through the Looking Glass.

Oates’s novels and stories consistently return to the themes of sex, violence, and their congruence, against the broad background of contemporary American domestic life and its discontents. Her style and approach have often been described as reminiscent of the work of William Faulkner and John Dos Passos, the latter’s influence especially evident in the way her work directly addresses political and social history. Oates has also embraced popular genres such as young-adult fiction, horror, romance (under the pseudonym Rosamund Smith) and suspense (as Lauren Kelly). Her The Assassins: A Book of Hours (1975) follows the fates of three family members of a recently assassinated right-wing senator. Childwold (1976) parodies Vladimir NABOKOV’s LOLITA. Bellefluer (1980) is an ambitious Gothic Romance, while My Heart Laid Bare (1998) is a multigenerational saga that ranges from the nineteenth century to the present. In such books as Foxfire: Confessions of a Girl Gang (1993) and Rape: A Love Story (2003) Oates continues to explore the themes of female empowerment and sexual violence. *We Were the Mulvaney*s (1996), about a family’s reaction to the rape of their daughter and sister, was revived in 2001, when it was chosen as a selection for the Oprah Winfrey Book Club. Her international best-seller Blonde (2000) transformed Marilyn Monroe into a metaphor for the convergence of celebrity, politics, and myth-making in the twentieth century.

Oates is also widely regarded as a master of the short story. “Where Are You Going, Where Have You Been?” is her most famous short work, a surrealistic story of teenage sexuality and violence set against the background of mid 1960s rock music, while "How I Contemplated the World from the Detroit House of Correction and Began My Life Again," reminiscent of the work of Flannery O'CONNOR and Eudora Welty, is a humorous dramatic monologue told by a female juvenile delinquent. Her most important story collections include The Wheel of Love (1970), Marriages and Infidelities (1972), and the anthology High Lonesome: Stories 1966–2006 (2006).

The best of her poetry can be found in Invisible Woman: New and Selected Poems, 1970–1982 (1982); her essays and book reviews have been collected in Contraries: Essays (1981), The Profane Art: Essays and Reviews (1983), and, most recently, in The Faith of a Writer: Life, Craft, Art (2003) and Uncensored: Views and Reviews (2005). Also of note is her famous book-length study On Boxing (1987). Any discussion of Oates's career and reputation must include her astounding productivity. Oates has doggedly ignored the criticism that she writes too fast, and, as her career has progressed, she has increased her rate of production. Her fifty-third adult novel, Black Girl/White Girl, was published in 2006. She has published a like number of volumes of short stories, poetry, nonfiction, plays, and young-adult and children's books.

Sources

Cologne-Brookes, Gavin. Dark Eyes on America: The Novels of Joyce Carol Oates. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2005.

Johnson, Greg. Invisible Writer: A Biography of Joyce Carol Oates. New York: Dutton, 1998.

Johnson. Understanding Joyce Carol Oates. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1987.

—Marshall Boswell

O'Brien, Tim (1946– ) novelist

To carry something was to hump it, as when Lieutenant Jimmy Cross humped his love for Martha up the hill and through the swamp. In its intransitive form, to hump meant to walk, or to march, but it implied burdens far beyond the intransitive.

—The Things They Carried (1990)

William Timothy O'Brien, a Minnesota native, was drafted for service in Vietnam as soon as he graduated from Macalester College with a B.A. in 1968. Wounded in action, he used the experience for three highly regarded novels: If I Die in a Combat Zone, Box Me Up and Ship Me Home (1973); Going After Cacciato (1978), winner of a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD; and The Things They Carried (1990). Often compared to Joseph HELLER's CATCH-22, O'Brien's work has been praised for its evocative scenes of the absurdity of war. As Norman MAILER did in his THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1948), O'Brien concentrates on the platoon experience in war. His style shifts from ultra-realistic to a kind of magical, mythical dimension. His other novels, including Nuclear Age (1985) and In the Lake of the Woods (1994) continue his exploration of the effects of the war on students, in the first instance, and veterans, in the latter. Tomcat in Love (1998) is about a man who loves his wife and yet struggles with uncontrollable lust for other women, and July, July (2002) is about a group of alumni returning for their thirtieth class reunion. These works depart from the focus on Vietnam that marks his other novels.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Tim O'Brien's The Things They Carried. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.

Heberle, Mark A. A Trauma Artist: Tim O'Brien and the Fiction of Vietnam. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2001.

Herzog, Tobey C. Tim O'Brien. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Kaplan, Steven. Understanding Tim O'Brien. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.

O'Connor, Flannery (1925–1964) novelist, short-story writer

I have found that violence is strangely capable of returning my characters to reality and preparing them to accept their moment of grace. . . . This idea, that reality is something to which we must be returned at considerable cost, is one which is seldom understood by the casual reader.

—Letter (1959)

Flannery O'Connor was born in Savannah, Georgia, and moved to Milledgeville, Georgia, in 1938. After graduating from Women's College of Georgia in 1945, she attended the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP and graduated in 1947 with an M.F.A. Her master's thesis, "The Geranium: A Collection of Six Stories," led to her receipt of the Rinehart-Iowa fiction prize. Though the collection was published for the first time in her Complete Stories (1971), the stories formed the basis for her first novel, Wise Blood (1952).

O'Connor has sometimes been called a practitioner of Southern Gothic, and certainly her work evokes the darker strains of Southern history. Violence in O'Connor's work, however, is the sign of a corrupt and fallen world, which she sees partly through a Roman Catholic vision of evil. Her work does not reflect specific religious dogma, but it does articulate a devout spiritual vision.

The Baptist, fundamentalist South spawned characters and stories that naturally appealed to O'Connor's theological sensibility. If readers of all beliefs and persuasions have been attracted to O'Connor's vision, it is because she grounds it so specifically in everyday reality and in precise language. Her characters speak and act with conviction and are driven by a spiritual sense even if they do not lead religious lives. Thus, Hazel Motes, the protagonist of Wise Blood, is a "Christian malgré lui" (despite himself). The idea that Christianity speaks to a world that might even reject the doctrines of Christianity—that this is a Christian world in spite of itself—endows O'Connor's story with an irony that nonbelievers often find compelling.

Flannery O'Connor

The Violent Bear It Away (1960), O'Connor's second novel, hinges on a verse in Matthew 11:12: "From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent bear it away." This is the quintessential dilemma for the world O'Connor creates: on the one hand, there is the consciousness of a kingdom of heaven, of salvation; on the other, there is the constant desire of a flawed, evil humanity to "bear it away"—to cancel out the Christian message through violence.

The impact of O'Connor's imagery and language is even more apparent in such stories as "The Enduring Chill," "Good Country People," and "The Lame Shall Enter First." Each of O'Connor's stories is a study of the human will caught in a tension between desire and duty, passion and belief, feeling and faith. These dichotomies reflect the internal conflicts of her characters and her compassionate handling of paradox.

O'Connor's short fiction has been collected in two volumes, A Good Man Is Hard to Find (1955) and Everything That Rises Must Converge (1965). Her commentary on the craft of fiction was collected in Mystery and Manners (1969).

Principal Books by O'Connor

Wise Blood. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.

A Good Man Is Hard To Find and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1955.

The Violent Bear It Away. New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1960.

Everything That Rises Must Converge. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1965.

Mystery and Manners: Occasional Prose, edited by Sally and Robert Fitzgerald. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1969.

The Complete Stories of Flannery O'Connor. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1971.

The Presence of Grace and Other Book Reviews, compiled by Leo J. Zuber, edited by Carter W. Martin. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1983.

Collected Works. New York: Library of America, 1988.

Studying Flannery O'Connor

Flannery O'Connor's Roman Catholic outlook informs all of her fiction, and her short stories are the proper starting place for students to become acclimated with her typical themes and symbols. All of O'Connor's short stories, including twelve previously uncollected pieces, are available in The Complete Stories (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1971). "A Good Man Is Hard to Find," "Good Country People," "The Life You Save May Be Your Own," and "The Artificial Nigger," from her first collection, are among her most discussed before proceeding to the novels. While her novels and short-story collections are available in separate paperback editions, Three by Flannery O'Connor (New York: Signet Classic, 1983) contains both novels and the second collection, Everything That Rises Must Converge. The title story of this collection, as well as "Revelation" and "Greenleaf"—all three of which were first-place O. Henry Award winners—provides a suitable introduction. The lectures and essays collected in Mystery and Manners: Occasional Prose (1969) elucidate O'Connor's views on writing fiction, particularly as a Southerner and a Catholic. A Habit of Being (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1979), O'Connor's exhaustive volume of collected letters, edited by Sally Fitzgerald, provides the most candid insight available

Dust jacket for O'Connor's first book, 1952, which she described as a "comic novel about a Christian malgré lui" into her life, ideas, and artistic process. Finally, the most complete edition of O'Connor's writing, Flannery O'Connor: Collected Works, edited by Fitzgerald (New York: Library of America, 1988), contains both of her novels and short-story collections as well as selected essays and over 250 letters.

Secondary sources regarding O'Connor are abundant. Conversations with Flannery O'Connor, edited by Rosemary M. Magee (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987), collects interviews with the author from 1952 to 1963. Among the best critical overviews are Miles Orvell's Flannery O'Connor: An Introduction (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991), Dorothy Tuck McFarland's Flannery O'Connor (New York: Ungar, 1976), Dorothy Walters's Flannery O'Connor (New York: Twayne, 1973), and Margaret Early Whitt's Understanding Flannery O'Connor (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995). Walters's and Whitt's books also provide thorough primary and secondary bibliographies. Flannery O'Connor: Comprehensive Re- search and Study Guide, edited by Harold Bloom (Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999), focuses its analysis on the short stories. Students can explore a variety of viewpoints regarding O'Connor's work in Critical Essays on Flannery O'Connor, edited by Melvin J. Friedman and Beverly Lyon Clark (Boston, G. K. Hall, 1985), which contains reviews, tributes and essays. Additional responses to O'Connor's writing can be found in Flannery O'Connor: New Perspectives, edited by Sura P. Rath and Mary Neff Shaw (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996). Jean Cash's Flannery O'Connor: A Life (Knoxville: University of Tennessee, 2002) is the most thorough biography. Two additional sources provide an intimate look into O'Connor's world. Flannery O'Connor's Georgia by Barbara McKenzie (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1980) includes photos taken by McKenzie in Milledgeville and the surrounding Georgia region with captions connecting the images to scenes from O'Connor's fiction. Arthur F. Kinney's Dust jacket for O'Connor's second novel, 1960. The title is from Matthew 11:12: "From the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away."

Flannery O'Connor's Library: Resources of Being (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985) catalogues O'Connor's personal library by subject, often including marginalia and the location of underlined passages.

David Farmer's Flannery O'Connor: A Descriptive Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1981) provides a complete primary bibliography that includes not only book and periodical publications by O'Connor but also translations, film and television adaptations, parodies, and publications that featured her visual artwork. The Society for the Study of Southern Literature Bibliography on the Mississippi Quarterly website (<<http://www.missq.msstate.edu/ssl>> viewed July 13, 2007) provides an annotated secondary bibliography which includes more than six hundred sources. The Flannery O'Connor Review, a journal devoted to O'Connor's life and work, has been published annually by the Georgia College and State University since 2001 and contains the most recent scholarship. Its predecessor, The Flannery O'Connor Bulletin, was published between 1972 and 2000.

—Student Guide by John Cusatis

O'Hara, Frank (1926–1966) poet, critic, playwright

Associated with the so-called New York School of poets and artists that also included Kenneth KOCH, John ASHBURY, Jackson Pollock, and Jasper Johns, Frank O'Hara grew up in Grafton, Massachusetts, and was a Harvard graduate. He received his M.A. from the University of Michigan in 1951. O'Hara combined his talents in literature and art while working at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, where he became curator. Known as a "poet among painters," O'Hara wrote essays and reviews for Art News that established him as an important critic and impresario of modern art. His first book of poetry, A City in Winter (1952), demonstrated his urbane, witty style. He included many details from his own life and reveled in the details of living in the hectic, stimulating world of Manhattan. O'Hara's most distinctive volumes of poetry include Meditations in an Emergency (1957) and Lunch Poems (1964). Collected Poems appeared in 1971 and Collected Plays in 1978.

Sources

Elledge, Jim, ed. Frank O'Hara: To Be True to a City. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990.

Gooch, Brad. City Poet: The Life and Times of Frank O'Hara. New York: Knopf, 1993.

Shaw, Lytle. Frank O'Hara: The Poetics of Coterie. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2006.

The Old Man and the Sea by Ernest Hemingway (New York: Scribners, 1952) novella

Winner of the 1953 Pulitzer Prize and instrumental in Hemingway's being awarded the Nobel Prize in literature in 1954, The Old Man and the Sea is Hemingway's most popular work. In this novella Hemingway returns to one of his favorite themes, the undefeated, or the triumph of the indomitable human spirit in the face of overwhelming odds.

Santiago, an old Cuban fisherman, hooks a giant marlin and fights it for three days before bringing it alongside and lashing it to his boat. While the old man sails back to his village, his fish is repeatedly attacked by sharks, which, despite Santiago's exhaustion, he clubs and stabs throughout the day and much of the night until only the fish's skeleton remains. Having endured the obvious toll of his ordeal, Santiago remains determined to continue doing that "which [he] was born for."

Source

Reynolds, Michael. Hemingway: The Final Years. New York: Norton, 1999.

—John C. Unrue

Olds, Sharon (1942– ) poet

Sharon Olds was born in San Francisco in 1942. She is the author of ten volumes of poetry, including Satan Says (1980), The Father (1992), and The Unswept Room (2002). She received her B.A. from Stanford University in 1964 and her Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1972. Her work is both praised and condemned for its frank portrayal of sexuality and domestic conflict. Her admirers note the brutal honesty and emotional power of her work; detractors point to the formlessness of her free verse—Olds's poems are frequently driven by radical enjambments—and to the sensational aspects of her subject matter. Her collection The Dead and the Living (1984) was a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD in 1985. Olds teaches in the graduate creative writing-program at New York University. She was New York State Poet Laureate from 1998 to 2000.

Source

Dillon, Brian. "Never Having Had You, I Cannot Let You Go": Sharon Olds' Poems of a Father-Daughter Relationship," Literary Review: An International Journal of Contemporary Writing, 37 (Fall 1993): 108–118.

—Tod Marshall

Olsen, Tillie (1912–2007) novelist, short-story writer, nonfiction writer, poet

Tillie Olsen was born in Wahoo, Nebraska, the daughter of Russian Jewish immigrants. She attended Omaha public schools but was forced to leave high school to find a job. Brought up a socialist, she became a member of the Young Communist League and was imprisoned briefly twice for participating in strikes. She married Jack Olsen, a warehouseman and printer, in San Francisco in 1943.

In the 1930s Olsen wrote political articles about striking workers and literary life, as well as poetry that explored the lives of poor women. She wrote part of a novel, Yonnondio: From the Thirties, which she did not complete and publish until 1974.

In the 1950s Olsen began to publish the short fiction that would place her in anthologies of the best American writing. "I Stand Here Ironing" and "Tell Me a Riddle" explored the consciousness of women (especially mothers and daughters), not only their devotion to domestic life but also their quest to establish their own identities.

Olsen's memoir, Silences (1978), which explores the difficult choices a woman has to make between domestic life and her urge to write, won Olsen instant acclaim. In 1984 Olsen published the anthology Mother to Daughter, Daughter to Mother, Mothers on Mothering. In 1987 she published Mothers and Daughters: That Special Quality: An Exploration in Photographs.

Sources

Frye, Joanne S. Tillie Olsen: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Nelson, Kay Hoyle, and Nancy Huse, eds. The Critical Response to Tillie Olsen. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Pearlman, Mickey, and Abby H. P. Werlock. Tillie Olsen. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Olson, Charles (1910–1970) poet

Charles Olson was born and grew up in Worcester, Massachusetts. Educated at Wesleyan University, where he earned his B.A. and M.A. degrees, he left a Ph.D. program at Harvard to work for the Office of War Information during WORLD WAR II. After the war he turned to a career in literature, producing his first book in 1947, Call Me Ishmael: A Study of Melville, an examination of William Shakespeare's influence on Herman Melville. Olson's first important writing about poetry appeared in an essay, "Projective Verse" (1950), in which he argued that a poem should reflect the poet's perceptions in lines that naturally followed his own system of breath control. Meter, rhythm, line length, stanza structure—all the traditional tools of poetry—should be a projection of the poet's own energy. Olson's views influenced poets such as William Carlos Williams, Robert CREELEY, Robert DUNCAN, Ed DORN, and Denise LEVERTOV.

Many of these poets congregated around Olson at Black Mountain College in North Carolina, where they became known as the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS. Olson's own poetry, which he began publishing in the late 1940s, received increased attention with the appearance of The Maximus Poems 1–10 (1953), followed by The Maximus Poems 11–22 (1956). Written in letter form, the speaker Maximus addresses the citizens of Gloucester, Massachusetts, where Olson spent his summers as a child. Maximus writes in detail about the town—its streets, people, sights—evoking its beauty as well as the urban decay that prompted urban renewal which, in turn, destroyed much historic housing. Other editions of the Maximus poems appeared in 1960, 1968, 1975, and 1983. In their entirety the series has been compared to Ezra Pound's Cantos (1917) and William Carlos Williams's PATERSON (1946–1958) as among the most ambitious poems of the twentieth century.

Olson's other poetry collections include The Collected Poems of Charles Olson: Excluding "The Maximus Poems" (1987) and A Nation of Nothing but Poetry: Supplementary Poems (1989).

Sources

Clark, Tom. Charles Olson: The Allegory of a Poet's Life. New York: Norton, 1991.

Merrill, Thomas F. The Poetry of Charles Olson: A Primer. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1982.

On the Road by Jack Kerouac (New York: Viking, 1957) novel

The most famous novel of the 1950s BEAT movement, Jack KEROUAC's picaresque tale follows the exuberant exploits of a pair of vagabond travelers searching for ecstatic transcendence amid the buttoned-down conventionality of post-WORLD WAR II America.

The novel's two principal characters, Dean Moriarty and the narrator Sal Paradise, are friends who share a preference for "the mad ones, the ones who are mad to live, mad to talk, mad to be saved, desirous of everything at the same time, the ones who never yawn or say a commonplace thing, but burn, burn, burn." The novel traces their travels from East to West, North to South, and back again. Along the way, Sal and Dean meet up with fellow "Beats," many of whom are based on actual figures from Kerouac's own circle, including Allen GINSBERG, whose character, Carlo Marx, is described by Kerouac as an "Old Testament Prophet." The grizzled Old Bull Lee is modeled on William S. BURROUGHS.

The novel is governed less by plot than by its sensibility. In place of carefully arranged episodes leading toward an inevitable conclusion, the novel moves from episode to episode without plan or direction, much like the spontaneous movement of the characters themselves across the American landscape.

Steeped in Eastern thinking, Kerouac and his Beat colleagues regarded Dionysian energy, rather than studied, Apollonian mastery, as the true path toward wisdom. The first draft of On the Road was written in three weeks of sustained composition, on a continuous scroll some thirty-five feet long. Kerouac called this technique "automatic writing," and it was greatly influenced by jazz music, particularly bebop, with its emphasis on improvisation. Yet, Kerouac also saw himself as recovering a lost American tradition, specifically that of Walt Whitman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and, most particularly, Thomas Wolfe, whose style had the most direct influence on Kerouac's own narrative voice.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Jack Kerouac's On the Road. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Theado, Matt. Understanding Jack Kerouac. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest by Ken Kesey (New York: Viking, 1962) novel

Ken Kesey wrote this novel about the destructive forces of conformity in American society after working as a psychiatric aide in a Veterans Administration hospital and participating in a government-sponsored drug experiment involving hallucinogenic drugs. Narrated by a schizophrenic American Indian in an Oregon mental hospital, the novel focuses on Randle Patrick McMurphy, a rough-and-tumble misfit who manages to get himself admitted to the hospital as an alternative to jail, not realizing that his commitment is classified as involuntary. The hospital ward is supervised by "Big Nurse," Miss Ratched, who prizes law and order above all else. McMurphy is determined to undermine her authority, and gradually the other patients begin to admire his resistance, joining him in an attempt to wrest control from Nurse Ratched. When McMurphy gets into a fight, Nurse Ratched arranges electric-shock treatments, and when they are ineffectual, a lobotomy. The success of McMurphy's rebellion is demonstrated when the narrator escapes from the hospital after McMurphy's death.

The novel can be seen as a parable about a repressive society and its demand that individuality be crushed. The mental hospital is an extreme example of a society that identifies eccentrics as insane because it values control above all else.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Ken Kesey's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.

Pratt, John Clark, ed. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest: Text and Criticism. New York: Viking, 1973.

Ortiz, Simon (1941– ) poet, short-story writer

A Pueblo Indian born in Albuquerque, New Mexico, Ortiz received his B.A. from the University of New Mexico in 1968 and his M.F.A. from the University of Iowa in 1969. His first major poetry collection, Going for the Rain (1976), retells the creation myth of the Acomas while also dealing with the present. A Good Journey, his 1977 poetry collection, is deeply immersed in Acoma culture. Rising in the Heart Which Is Our America (1981) is an emotional work that draws parallels between massacres of Native Americans and the VIETNAM WAR. Woven Stone (1992) and After and Before the Lightning (1994) are both set on the Great Plains. Ortiz has collected his stories in The Howbah Indians (1978), Fightin': New and Collected Stories (1983), and Men on the Moon (1999). The latter collection emphasizes his interest in spiritual conflicts between Indian and white cultures. Like his poetry, his fiction re-creates the rhythms of an oral tradition of storytelling. He has also edited Speaking for the Generations: Native Writers on Writing (1998).

Source

Wiget, Andrew. Simon Ortiz. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1986.

Ozick, Cynthia (1928– ) short-story writer, novelist, essayist

Puttermessa was thirty-four, a lawyer. She was also something of a feminist, not crazy, but she resented having "Miss" put in front of her name; she thought it pointedly discriminatory; she wanted to be a lawyer among lawyers.

—The Puttermessa Papers (1997)

Ozick was born and brought up in the Bronx, where her parents, Russian Jewish immigrants, owned a pharmacy. She went to public school and then to New York University (B.A., 1949) and Ohio State University (M.A., 1950), where she wrote a master's thesis on Henry James, one of the principal influences on her fiction. Indeed, Ozick's first novel, Trust (1966), explores James's favorite theme, the interaction of Europeans and Americans.

By the early 1970s Ozick had begun to explore the ramifications of the Jewish American experience. The Cannibal Galaxy (1983) focuses on Joseph Brill, a Holocaust survivor. The Messiah of Stockholm (1987) is a study of Lar Andemening, a Polish refugee who claims to be the son of Bruno Schulz, the great Polish Jew who wrote about the Holocaust. The Puttermessa Papers (1997) is a novel developed out of short stories about Ruth Puttermessa, a retiring, literary-minded woman who works for New York City's Department of Receipts and Disbursements. She lives in the Bronx and is keenly absorbed in her Jewish identity, which estranges her from her assimilated parents. Heir to the Glimmering World (2004) is narrated by an eighteen-year-old girl who works for a proud but poor family of Jewish refugees during the Depression.

Ozick is renowned for her experimentation with point of view and her explorations of the meaning of art in both her fiction and nonfiction. Many critics consider her short stories to be superior to her novels. Her important collections of short fiction include The Pagan Rabbi and Other Stories (1971), Bloodshed and Three Novellas (1976), Levitaton: Five Fictions (1982), and The Shawl (1989).

Ozick's nonfiction is collected in Art and Ardor (1983), Metaphor and Memory: Essays (1989), What Henry James Knew and Other Essays on Writers (1993), Portrait of the Artist as a Bad Character and Other Essays on Writing (1994), Fame and Folly: Essays (1996), Quarrel and Quandary: Essays (2000), and The Din in the Head (2006). In 2002 she edited The Complete Works of Isaac Babel.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Cynthia Ozick. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
- Friedman, Lawrence S. Understanding Cynthia Ozick. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.
- Kauvar, Elaine M. Cynthia Ozick's Fiction. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993.

P

Paine, Thomas (1737–1809) pamphleteer

Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigue of supporting it.
—The American Crisis (1776)

Thomas Paine's place in history and literature is secured by his ability to convey the ideas of the ENLIGHTENMENT to the average woman or man. Paine captured the meaning of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION in his writings, using the revolt against England to express his contempt for authority and tradition.

Born into a QUAKER family in Thetford, England, on January 29, 1737, Thomas Paine later recalled that his parents "were not able to give me a shilling, beyond what they gave me in education; and to do this they distressed themselves." In his schooling at Thetford Grammar School, Paine developed what became a lifelong appreciation for learning. After his school years ended, Paine read the philosophy of Isaac Newton (1642–1727) and John Locke (1632–1704) and embraced their argument that reason could decipher the mysteries of human life. The emphasis of these philosophers on human perfectibility and the description they provided of a universal order left an indelible imprint on Paine's consciousness.

During the 1750s and 1760s Paine worked as a corset maker, a profession that earned him a modest living but offered him no outlet for his intellectual abilities. He tried a seaman's life aboard the privateer King of Prussia but abandoned it quickly. In 1772 Paine was fired from a job as customs officer after writing The Case of the Officers of the Excise, an essay demanding higher wages. In 1774 he immigrated to America.

In the tumultuous political environment of the colonies in the mid 1770s, Paine found a situation suited to his talents. As the editor of The Pennsylvania Magazine, he published essays such as "Reflections on Titles," in which he attacked the institution of hereditary privilege, and "The Abolition of Slavery."

Paine believed that American independence would usher in a new age, free of class and social distinctions. This vision was the central theme of his pamphlet Common Sense, published in January 1776. Accusing monarchies in general and the British Crown in particular of subverting the natural order, Paine reasoned that the duty of Americans was to break free from the yoke of arbitrary rule. Only then could a virtuous society be created. Thus, "the sun never shone on a cause of greater worth" than an American revolution. Common Sense called the colonists to be reborn, to embrace the noble cause of rebellion. Only those with "the heart of a coward and the spirit of a sycophant" could do otherwise. Common Sense was an immediate best-seller, outstripping even the sale of the Bible in 1776. John ADAMS criticized Paine's vernacular writing, but he did not fault the sentiments of the pamphlet or deny its impact.

Paine's influence continued when independence was declared on July 4, 1776; that month he joined the Continental Army as an aide-de-camp to General Nathanael Greene (1742–1786). While stationed with George WASHINGTON's forces outside of Trenton, New Jersey, in December 1776, Paine composed The American Crisis. This account of Washington's soldiers retreating from New York served as a rallying cry for the American cause. Before leading troops on their successful assault against the Hessians on December 24,

T. Paine

Portrait of Thomas Paine at age sixty-nine by John Wesley Jarvis, 1806

1776, George Washington read from Paine's The American Crisis to his troops:

These are times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph.

As a blunt appeal to patriotic sentiments, The American Crisis earned Paine a commendation from John Adams and an appointment to the position of Secretary for Foreign Affairs in 1777.

At the close of the war, Paine was faced with the problem of making a living. Ever the man of principle, he had refused to accept money for his patriotic writings. He instead petitioned Congress for remuneration in return for his war service and was awarded $3,000. In addition, the state of New York recognized his patriotism by giving him a confiscated LOYALIST estate in New Rochelle. This sudden wealth gave Paine the freedom to continue with his political and intellectual interests.

His polemical aggressiveness and his contentious nature, however, did not serve him well in the give-and-take world of government, and his forays into the Continental Congress and the government of Pennsylvania ended in failure. Nor did Paine enjoy much success in his scientific endeavors. In the early 1780s he embarked on a project of designing a single arched bridge that could be used for commercial purposes. In 1786 he put a model of his bridge on display at the New York State House, where it was deemed too impractical to be constructed.

By 1787 Paine was perhaps feeling like a general without an army, as his revolutionary fervor no longer had an outlet in America. Sensing an opportunity for his polemical talents in France, he departed for that troubled nation. When the French Revolution began on July 14, 1789, with crowds storming the Bastille, Paine rejoiced. He spent most of his time from 1790 to 1792 in England, hoping to foment a similar revolution in his homeland. However, most British Tories and Whigs looked with disdain on the direction in which France was moving and associated the French Revolution with anarchy and chaos. Paine's efforts to sway the British political leaders in the direction of radical change instigated a break with his friend Edmund Burke (1729–1797), who had been a supporter of the American Revolution. When Burke published his defense of the rights of the aristocracy and monarchy in 1790, Paine responded with part 1 of his essay Rights of Man (1791).

Paine's essay, which was dedicated to George Washington, flatly rejected Burke's defense of tradition in government, asserting that "A government is for the living and not for the dead." A mere change of personnel would not heal the wounds that a corrupt system had inflicted on its people, Paine argued. Genuine progress required a new political order. Using Lockean logic, Paine reasoned that individuals were protected only when a government respected the natural rights of every citizen.

Part 1 of Rights of Man was widely read in America, France, and England, where it was highly controversial. In 1792 Paine published another, more controversial broadside, his Rights of Man: Part the Second. In it Paine inveighed against all monarchical systems, calling their leaders "Bands of robbers." In a spirit reminiscent of Common Sense, Paine wrote that "human nature is not of itself vicious," but monarchs corrupt their subjects by taxing their hard-earned money for the purpose of waging wasteful wars and indulging in useless luxuries. If Common Sense had argued against government interference in people's lives, Rights of Man stressed the obligation of government to provide for the physical welfare of its subjects. Writing that a just government must secure work and education for all or otherwise suffer a violent overthrow, Paine warned Europe's monarchs: "The iron is becoming hot all over Europe."

The British government considered Paine's words near sedition, and officials in London expressed concern over the effect his essay would have on the working class. Notified that he would be tried for antigovernment activities, Paine fled to France on September 12, 1792. In France he was greeted as a hero of the republic. He was made a French citizen and then elected as a representative to the radical-controlled legislative body of Paris. Paine was entirely ignorant of the volatile political rivalries that characterized French revolutionary circles. Not understanding the risks involved, he plunged himself into the controversial debate over the fate of the royal family, who were then being held under house arrest.

When Paine voiced support for leniency toward the king, radical leader Maximilien de Robespierre (1758–1794) had Paine arrested on charges of obstructing the revolution. Sentenced to death, Paine languished in prison for eighteen months until the American minister in Paris, James Monroe (1758–1831), secured Paine's release. During his months in prison, Paine wrote THE AGE OF REASON (1794, 1796), an affirmation of his deistic principles. Arguing that God's greatness was revealed through nature, not Scripture, he concluded that all religions, except the Quaker faith, had gained sway over their flock through physical coercion and for selfish ends. The Age of Reason diminished Paine's popularity in America. Reviled by many as a dangerous infidel, he made matters worse for himself in 1796 when he sent George Washington an insulting letter accusing him of deliberately refusing to offer any help to Paine during his French imprisonment.

In ill health and dissatisfied with the course of the French Revolution, Paine returned to America in November 1802 at the invitation of President Thomas JEFFERSON. Unpopular and impoverished, Paine, a central figure of the American Revolution as author of its most inspirational tract, died in obscurity on June 8, 1809, on the New Rochelle estate given to him by a once-grateful New York.

Works

Paine, Thomas. Collected Writings. New York: Library of America, 1995.

Paine. Political Writings. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Sources

Foner, Eric. Tom Paine and Revolutionary America. London: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Larkin, Edward. Thomas Paine and the Literature of Revolution. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Nelson, Craig. Thomas Paine. New York: Viking, 2006.

Title page for Paine's forty-eight-page pamphlet calling for American independence

Recommended Writings

African Slavery in America (1775)

An Occasional Letter on the Female Sex (1775)

Common Sense (1776)

The American Crisis (1776–1783)

Rights of Man (1791, 1792)

The Age of Reason (1794)

Agrarian Justice (1797)

Studying Thomas Paine

Thomas Paine, pamphleteer and author, contributed significantly to the American Revolutionary cause. Writings such as COMMON SENSE (1776) galvanized the PATRIOT effort, while a series of essays on the war efforts, The American Crisis (1776), inspired the troops and helped to sustain public support for the war. Paine also advocated women's rights in works such as An Occasional Letter on the Female Sex (1775) and abolitionism in works such as African Slavery in America (1775). He wrote about DEISM in The Age of Reason (1794). Paine scholarship is extensive and offers students a wide range of subjects.

Early biographies of Paine include Alfred Owen Aldridge's Man of Reason, The Life of Thomas Paine (Philadelphia: Lipincott, 1959); Audrey Williamson's Thomas Paine: His Life, Work and Times (London: Allen & Unwin, 1973); David Freeman Hawke's Paine (New York: Harper & Row, 1974); and Jerome E. Wilson and William Ricketson's Thomas Paine (Boston: Twayne, 1978). For studies that consider Paine within his historical context, see Eric Foner's Tom Paine and Revolutionary America (London: Oxford University Press, 1976); Harvey J. Kaye's Thomas Paine and the Promise of America (New York: Hill & Wang, 2005); Edward Larkin's Thomas Paine and the Literature of Revolution (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005); and Craig Nelson's Thomas Paine: Enlightenment, Revolution, and the Birth of Modern Nations (New York: Viking, 2006).

For collections of Paine's writings, students should consult: Thomas Paine Reader, edited by Michael Foot and Isaac Kramnick (New York: Penguin, 1987); Thomas Paine: Collected Writings, edited by Eric Foner (New York: Library of America, 1995); and Common Sense and Other Writings, edited by Gordon S. Wood (New York: Modern Library, 2003). Students interested in more-advanced study should consult Property, Welfare, and Freedom in the Thought of Thomas Paine: A Critical Edition, edited by Karen M. Ford (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001).

For students interested in archives and primary sources, several major libraries have extensive collections of Paine's writings. For example, the Richard Gimbel Collection of Thomas Paine Papers at the American Philosophical Society includes materials from 1775 to 1808, notably, Paine's 1776 manuscript notes for Common Sense; and the Clements Library at the University of Michigan has a collection of Thomas Paine Papers, 1776–1811, "comprising a small number of extraordinary manuscripts documenting the life of the most feared radical in Europe during the late 18th century." There are also six items in the Thomas Paine Papers at the Library of Congress. For electronic resources, see Revolutionary America, 1763–1789 at the Hoover Presidential Library (<<http://hoover.archives.gov/exhibits/RevAmerica/index.html>> viewed May 1, 2007).

Palóu, Francisco (circa 1722–1789) biographer, historian

A native of Palma, Island Majorca, Spain, Francisco Palóu was born around 1722. He joined the Franciscan Order in 1739 and became an ordained priest in 1743. As part of a missionary group under the guidance of Father Junípero Serra, Palóu traveled in 1749 to Vera Cruz, Mexico. In 1767, when the Jesuit priest fell from favor, the Franciscans assumed administration and expanded their missionary work north to Loreto in Lower (Baja) California and into Upper (Alto) California missions as well. From 1776 to 1784, Palóu worked in the San Francisco mission. When Father Junípero Serra died in 1784, Palóu moved to Carmel and assumed the presidency of the Upper California missions. In September 1785, he retired to the College of San Fernando and was elected guardian of the college a year later. All the while he was gathering materials for and writing major works on mission history: Historical Memoirs of New California and his Life of Junípero Serra. Palóu's four-volume Noticias is a history of the California missions from 1767 to 1784. The Life of Junípero Serra includes the history of the first nine missions, San Diego to San Buenaventura. Francisco Palóu died in Mexico in 1789.

Works

Palóu, Francisco. Life of Junípero Serra. Mexico, 1787; translated by Maynard J. Geiger. Washington, D.C.: Academy of American Franciscan History, 1955.

Palóu. Francisco Palóu's Life and Apostolic Labors of the Venerable Father Junípero Serra, Founder of the Franciscan Missions of California, translated by George Wharton James and C. Scott Williams. Pasadena, Calif.: G. W. James, 1913.

Palóu. Historical Memoirs of New California, 4 volumes, translated and edited by Herbert E. Bolton. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1926.

Pamphlet

A pamphlet was an unbound, brief publication on current issues, sometimes controversial or polemical, in which the author argued passionately for a cause or an issue. Boosted by the relatively high literacy rates in colonial America (estimates as high as seventy to 85 percent in NEW ENGLAND by 1750) and by the increasing efficiency of printing and distribution, the pamphlet provided an important forum for discussing key issues between Britain and colonial America. Conservative pleas for benevolent relationships and reasonable contracts were printed alongside impassioned calls for revolution. Pamphleteers wrote on taxation, representation, and revenue.

Notable pamphlets of the period include John ADAMS's A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law (1765); James OTIS's The Rights of the British Colonies Asserted and Proved (1764); James DICKINSON's Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania (1768); Thomas JEFFERSON's A Summary View of the Rights of British America (1774); David RITTENHOUSE's An Oration Delivered February 24, 1775, Before the American Philosophical Society (1775); and Thomas PAINE's Common Sense (1776). In revolutionary America, pamphlets played a key role in igniting support for the cause. Thomas Paine's

Common Sense, for example, which sold 250,000 copies in its first three months, significantly swayed public opinion away from reconciliation and toward revolution. Printed in January 1776, this pamphlet helped influence and hasten the drafting of the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE later that summer. Supported by an active printing industry that produced affordable texts, pamphlets could thus address contemporary issues that encouraged debate and discussion in early America.

Source

Butler, Jon. Becoming America: The Revolution before 1776. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2000.

Pastorius, Francis Daniel (1651–circa 1720)

geographer, historian, theologian, poet

Francis Daniel Pastorius wrote poems, pedagogical materials, and PAMPHLETS. His most important work, Kurtze Geographische Beshreibung der lentzmahls erfundenen Americanischen Landschafft (1692), a geographical description of Pennsylvania, was translated in 1850 and published in English as A Particular Geographical Description of the Lately Discovered Province of Pennsylvania. It comprises seventeen chapters rich with descriptions of the local Native Americans, the flora and fauna of Pennsylvania, the history of settlement, the religious sects within the colony, and its political institutions. The volume also included Pastorius's recommendations for economic growth and a strong declaration that Pennsylvania was the best destination for immigrants. Pastorius was highly favorable in his evaluation of the Native Americans, portraying them as simple, happy, and temperate people who had been mistreated by white settlers.

Some critics consider Pastorius to have been a poet of modest talent; others praise as a masterwork his Bee Hive poems, a collection of wise observations and adages on nature and society written for the edification of his own sons. His strongest supporters argue that these poems, humorous and innovative in form and rhythm, make him the premier literary figure of his era. The Bee Hive poems certainly reveal Pastorius's humor, as does his advice in "If Thou Wouldest Roses Scent":

*Put nothing in thy mouth;
But freely Fill thy Nose and Eyes
With all my Garden's growth.
For, if thou imitate the Apes,
And Clandestinely steal my grapes,
One wishes thee the Belly-Gripes, Another hundred Scaffold-Stripes.*

Pastorius was born in Sommerhausen, Franconia, Germany, on September 26, 1651, the son of a respected city official and religious writer, Melchior Adam Pastorius, and his wife, Magdalena Dietz. Francis was well educated, having attended several colleges and having received a law degree from Altdorf University in 1676. Although he practiced law in Germany for several years, he was not devoted to that career. He immigrated to America with a small contingent of German Pietists.

Pastorius had become interested in Pietism, a religious movement that stressed personal, emotional experience rather than intellectualism, after he met the founder of the movement, Philipp Jakob Spener (1635–1705), in Frankfurt. When Pastorius and his traveling companions, other QUAKERS and some Mennonites, arrived in Pennsylvania in 1683, Pastorius took a leadership role in purchasing fifteen thousand acres of land from William PENN. The German immigrants named their community Germantown and, in appreciation for Pastorius's assistance, elected him their first mayor. He became the major spokesperson for Germans in Pennsylvania and served in the General Assembly of the colony from 1687 to 1691. During this time he married Ennecke Klostermanns and became the father of two sons.

Pastorius taught for three years in a Quaker school in Philadelphia before establishing a school in Germantown. There he taught until 1718, creating an innovative setting, including coed classes, and an innovative curriculum, including bilingual teaching materials that Pastorius wrote himself. One of the most learned men in colonial America, fluent in as many as ten languages and possessed of one of the largest private libraries in the colonies, Pastorius was always willing to write letters and documents for his illiterate neighbors, and he volunteered to keep the Germantown public records. A modest man throughout his life, he characterized himself as "gentle, given to sobriety, solitary . . . and of a slow wit."

Works

Pastorius, Francis Daniel. A New Primmer or Methodical Directions to Attain the True Spelling, Reading & Writing of English.

New York: Printed by William Bradford in New-York, 1698; Boston, 1939; Early American Imprints, 851.

Pastorius. Deliciae Hortenses, or, Garden-Recreations; and Voluptates Apianae, edited by Christoph E. Schweitzer. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1982.

Sources

Faust, Albert Bernhardt. Francis Daniel Pastorius and the 250th Anniversary of the Founding of Germantown. Philadelphia: Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation, 1934.

Learned, Marion Dexter. The Life of Francis Daniel Pastorius, the Founder of Germantown. Philadelphia: W. J. Campbell, 1908.

Patriot

Supporters of the American war for independence, the Patriots were initially strongest in the NEW ENGLAND colonies, which were under immediate attack, but as the war progressed, other colonists pledged their support.

Patriot songs were particularly impassioned as they gave voice to the dramatic events and deeply felt emotions that the ensuing separation and ongoing war evoked; thus, they celebrated military victories, disparaged British leadership, and promoted patriotism. Songs and BALLADS were often set to traditional, familiar tunes. One of the most popular songs, "The Liberty Song," begins "Come, join hand in hand, brave Americans all, / And rouse your bold hearts at fair Liberty's call; / No tyrannous acts shall suppress your just claim, / Or stain with dishonor America's name"; the chorus followed, "In Freedom we're born and in Freedom we'll live. / Our purses are ready. Steady, friends, steady; / Not as slaves, but as Freemen our money we'll give." Another popular song, still remembered by schoolchildren today, is "Yankee Doodle," originally titled "The Yankee's Return from Camp." It dates from the 1740s as a popular song used by the British to make fun of the Americans, but during the war the Patriots claimed the song as well. "Yankee" refers to a New Englander; a "doodle" to an unsophisticated person, a country bumpkin; and a "dandy" to a young man impressed by his dress and appearance. The song begins "Father and I went down to camp, / Along with Captain Goodin', / And there we see the men and boys, / As thick as hasty puddin'," followed by the chorus: "Yankee Doodle, keep it up, / Yankee Doodle, dandy, / Mind the music and the step, / And with the girls be handy." Another popular song was "The World Turned Upside Down, or, The Old Woman Taught Wisdom" (1767), which was played after the battle of Yorktown and sung to the tune of "Derry Down." It begins: "Goody Bull and her daughter together fell out, / Both squabbled and wrangled and made a great rout! / But the cause of the quarrel remains to be told / Then lend both your ears and a tale I'll unfold. / Derry down, down. Hey derry down." Other patriot songs and ballads include "Chester," "Alphabet," "The King's Own Regulars; And their Triumphs over the Irregulars," "The Irishman's Epistle to the Officers and Troops at Boston," "Nathan Hale," "The Public Spirit of the Women," "A Toast to Washington Francis Hopkinson," "Adams and Liberty Thomas Paine," and "Volunteer Boys."

Literary works expressing patriot perspectives include Milcah Martha Hill MOORE's "The Female Patriots. Addressed to the Daughters of Liberty in America, 1768"; Philip FRENEAU's "The Rising Glory of America" (with BRACKENRIDGE, 1775), "A Political Litany" (1775), and "George the Third's Soliloquy" (1779); Mercy Otis WARREN's The Adulter (1772), The Defeat (1773), The Blockheads (1776), and The Motley Assembly (1779).

Sources

Berns, Walter, and Ellen M. Litwicky. Making Patriots. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.

Fischer, David Hackett. Paul Revere's Ride. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Gould, Eliga H., and Peter S. Onuf. Empire and Nation: The American Revolution in the Atlantic World. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2005.

Penn, William (1644–1718) essayist

Religious activist, political critic, and founder of Pennsylvania, William Penn was born in London on October 14, 1644, the son of Sir William Penn, a naval officer who became an admiral, and later general of the fleet, and Margaret Jasper Penn, the daughter of a merchant. Penn is noted for his writings on religious toleration and personal liberties, among many other topics. A leading dissenter in his day, Penn was a talented and persuasive polemicist.

Raised as an Anglican, Penn attended Christ Church College in London. Having developed an interest in PURITANISM, Penn encountered difficulties with college officials when he expressed his opinions and was expelled from the school in 1662. The balance of his education and training was varied and discontinuous. He traveled to France, where he briefly attended the Huguenot Academy. He served in the British navy during the Dutch Wars of 1652–1654, and in 1665 he studied law at Lincoln's Inn.

In 1666 Penn left for Ireland to oversee his father's estates. Isolated from his father and influenced by a broad exposure to ideas and an early history as a nonconformist, Penn became an advocate of Quakerism. His My Irish Journal (1669) offers a record of this experience. He returned to London as a well-known nonconformist with several publications to his credit. Arrested for his defense of the QUAKERS in The Sandy Foundation Shaken (1668), Penn composed a second essay while imprisoned in the Tower of London. In No Cross, No Crown (1669), Penn demanded increased tolerance for religious beliefs in "Defence of the Poor Despised Quakers, against the Practice and Objections of Their Adversaries."

Penn quickly became one of the most notable advocates of personal liberties, as well as religious tolerance. Arrested once again in 1670, he represented himself and a codefendant, William Meade, winning acquittal; the decision reshaped English law concerning jury rights to judge evidence without regard to the judge's directions. Buoyed by his legal success and by a deathbed reconciliation with his father, Penn continued to support the Quakers, making missionary trips throughout England, Ireland, Holland, and Germany.

On his return to England in 1672, Penn married his first wife, Gulielma Maria Springett, with whom he had eight children. He became involved in the colonization of New Jersey, seeing colonization as an opportunity to escape religious restrictions in England. He continued to work for the Quaker cause, undertaking a second mission in 1677 to Holland and Germany.

Returning to England, Penn actively supported Whig opposition to the royal government, calling—unsuccessfully—on all Quakers for increased involvement in politics, and writing important pseudonymous political pamphlets, including England's Great Interest in the Choice of This New Parliament (1679). Penn's opposition to the royal government did not, however, deter him from pursuing the dream of a Quaker colony in America. He petitioned King Charles II for a CHARTER and the Duke of York for financial and political support. He secured the charter by exchanging a debt owed to his father for a grant of land in what became Pennsylvania. The charter, issued in 1681, gave Penn proprietary title to the land and with it absolute legal power. Penn promoted the colonization scheme in two PAMPHLETS that were published in 1681 and followed these publications with the first colonial constitution, The Frame of the Government of the Province of Pennsylvania (1682).

With this preparatory work completed, Penn joined the colonization effort, departing England on August 30, 1682, and arriving in America in late October. Penn remained in the colony for twenty-two months, supervising the colonial government in Philadelphia, securing land from the Native Americans, and traveling to the other colonial regions. He returned to England to find the political landscape in turmoil. The death of Charles II had placed James II (formerly the Duke of York), a Catholic, on the throne. The change in monarchy led to active persecution of political and religious dissenters. Penn assumed the role of mediator, helping to secure a general pardon for Quakers.

The situation changed once again in 1688 with the ascension of William and Mary of Orange to the throne of England. A warrant was issued for Penn's arrest. Suspected of conspiracy, Penn had his properties confiscated and lost control of the colony in Pennsylvania. He went into hiding, but he continued to write, producing an anonymous treatise advocating disinterested government, An Essay towards the Present and Future Peace of Europe (1693). In 1694 his wife Gulielma, died.

Absolved of all charges by the British government, Penn resumed conditional control of Pennsylvania, returning to the colony in 1699 with his new wife, Hannah Callowhill, and his daughter Laetitia. His second experience in Pennsylvania was unpleasant. The colony had encouraged settlement, which had in turn led to a diversity of interests. Consequently, Pennsylvania was experiencing serious political conflicts, including concerted opposition to Penn's proprietary colonial government. Denounced by the opposition and demoralized, Penn returned to England in 1702. Burdened by financial problems, he attempted to sell his proprietorship to the royal government. He was unsuccessful and wound up in debtor's prison until his debt was paid by a group of Quakers. Penn's last effort at writing, "A Serious Expostulation with the Inhabitants of Pennsylvania . . ." (1710), expressed bitterness and disillusionment with the lack of support he had received from the colonial elite. Penn died July 30, 1718, enfeebled by a stroke he had suffered in 1712.

Works

Penn, William. The Frame of the Government of the Province of Pennsylvania in America. London: A. Sowles, 1682; Early American Imprints, 496.

Penn. The Papers of William Penn, 5 volumes. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981–1987.

Sources

Pencak, William A., and Daniel K. Richter, eds. Friends and Enemies in Penn's Woods: Indians, Colonists, and the Racial Construction of Pennsylvania. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2004.

Geiter, Mary K. William Penn. New York: Longman, 2000.

Pennsylvania Gazette (1728–1766) periodical

Originally titled The Universal Instructor in All Arts and Sciences and Pennsylvania Gazette, this weekly periodical was printed by Samuel Keimer. He began publication on December 24, 1728, but due to financial difficulties he sold the paper in June of 1729 to Hugh Meredith and Benjamin FRANKLIN, Keimer's twenty-three-year-old employee. Franklin published his first issue on October 2, 1729, under an abbreviated title, The Pennsylvania Gazette, and served as its editor and owner until 1766. By mid century, according to Charles E. Clark, circulation of the Pennsylvania Gazette was between 1,500 and 2,000 readers.

Pequot War (1637)

In May 1637 English armies led by John Mason and John Underhill, along with NARRAGANSETT allies, surrounded and attacked a Pequot village on Mystic River to retaliate for the murders of two English ship captains. The village was set on fire, and fleeing Pequots were shot. An estimated three to seven hundred Pequots were killed—nearly half the population—and any survivors were taken captive and sold, thus dispersing the Pequot. The event is chronicled in William BRADFORD'S HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION, "Chapter XXVIII, Anno Domini 1637," as a sign of providential design:

It was thus conceived they thus destroyed about 400 at this time. It was a fearful sight to see them thus frying in the fire and the stream of blood quenching the same, and horrible was the stink and scent thereof, but the victory seemed a sweet sacrifice, and they gave the praise thereof to God, who had wrought so wonderfully for them, thus to enclose their enemies in their hands and give them so speedy a victory over so proud and insulting an enemy.

The Pequot War represented a turning point in Anglo-Native relations, especially for the PILGRIMS who had generally maintained a distance from such conflicts. The scale and the violence of the Pequot War emboldened the settlers in new ways to expand their land claims in New England.

Sources

Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.

Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York: Viking Penguin, 2001.

Personal Narrative

Personal narrative refers to first-person accounts such as diaries, journals, letters, or autobiographies, and may include the CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE, the SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY, the SLAVE NARRATIVE, and EXPLORATION LITERATURE. For early Americans personal narratives served a range of purposes, from providing a record of the Puritans' concern for reinforcing divine providence for the spiritual benefit of others to documenting travelers' desires to inform others about comfortable accommodations. William C. Spengemann addresses the secular application of the personal narrative, specifically the travel narrative, which gave "Americans the meaning of their unique historical situation." In each case the first-person narrative has a direct connection to society by affirming beliefs or providing information. Rarely printed, unless written by a leader or well-known person, personal narratives were, instead, often shared and read aloud. Letters, for example, were shared for their news and information, whether that information included details of captivity, slavery, travel, or of a conversion experience.

Drawn from spiritual and secular models—for example, St. Augustine of Hippo's (354–430) Confessions (circa 400), Michel Eyquem de Montaigne's (1533–1592) Essais (1580), and Francis Bacon's (1561–1626) Essays (1597–1625)—personal narratives offered the reader guidance and reflection. The earlier, seventeenth-century personal narratives were most often expressed in spiritual contexts without focusing solely on personality or individual achievement—as in the diaries and journals of such NEW ENGLAND Puritans as William BRADFORD, John WINTHROP, and Samuel SEWALL, and in the spiritual autobiographies of Elizabeth ASHBRIDGE, Jonathan EDWARDS, and Thomas SHEPARD. Less religiously centered personal narratives highlighted individual achievement. Benjamin Franklin's AUTOBIOGRAPHY, a self-improvement narrative, provides instructive examples throughout. He recalls his family history, early education, multifaceted career, and major achievements, and describes his self-improvement regimen in a style that mimics the challenges and breakthroughs of the spiritual narrative.

The slave narrative follows this template with the intention to not only improve oneself but also to document the horrors of slavery and thus to serve the ends of the Abolitionist Movement. Examples include the texts of Olaudah EQUIANO, Frederick Douglass (1818–1895), and Harriet Ann Jacobs (1813–1897). Native American autobiography focuses on the history of European conquest and the inequities of Indian removal and relocation. Examples of Native American narratives include those written by Samson OCCOM, Hendrick AUPAUMUT, and William Apess. Personal narratives may also take up political and topical issues when addressed by national figures, as in the letters and autobiographies of Thomas JEFFERSON and John ADAMS, and the letters and essays of Mercy Otis WARREN and Judith Sargent MURRAY. In early American literature the narratives of exploration by John SMITH and Thomas HARRIOT inform the reader of new lands. The travel narrative, while informative, can also express humor and focus on areas of entertainment and leisurely activity, as in the travel accounts of Sarah Kemble KNIGHT, Dr. Alexander HAMILTON, and Elizabeth House Trist (1751–1784). Personal narratives express a range of intentions—to instruct, to inspire, and even to entertain—as they provide a literary record of the individual's experience.

Sources

Egan, Jim. Authorizing Experience: Refigurations of the Body Politic in Seventeenth-Century New England Writing. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Elliott, Emory. The Cambridge Introduction to Early American Literature. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Hall, David D. Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgment: Popular Belief in Early New England. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1989.

Kagle, Steven E. American Diary Literature, 1620–1799. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979.

Ziff, Larzer. Writing in the New Nation: Prose, Print, and Politics in the Early United States. New York: Yale University Press, 1991.

Pierce, Sarah (1767–1852) educator

Sarah Pierce was the founder of one of the first female academies in America. Born June 16, 1767, she was the youngest of seven children born in Litchfield, Connecticut, to Mary Pater-son and John Pierce. Her mother died when Pierce was quite young, and her father, who remarried, died when Sarah was fourteen. Her brother, John Pierce, took over the family responsibilities, sending both Sarah and a sister, Nancy, to school in New York, apparently hoping they would become teachers.

In 1792 Sarah Pierce returned to Litchfield and established a school for women in her home. Beginning with only a few students, the school quickly expanded as its reputation spread. By 1798 Pierce was able to move to her own building, and her school was incorporated as the Litchfield Female Academy in 1827. Pierce guided the Academy for its first forty years, developing an unusually broad curriculum that included not only such standard courses for women as manners, sewing, and music but also such academic courses as reading, writing, composition, arithmetic, geography, history, and science. Later, with the assistance of her nephew, John Pierce Brace, Pierce continued to add more-advanced courses. In the nineteenth century Litchfield Academy claimed Catharine Beecher (1800–1878) and Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811–1896) among its most notable alumnae.

When Pierce relinquished the position of principal to her nephew in 1825, Litchfield Academy had a solid reputation as an outstanding institution for female education. Pierce's vision had guided every aspect of the school, from its governance to its pedagogical mission. She continued to teach at the school until she resumed the role of principal on her nephew's departure in 1833.

In an address to the student body in 1818, Pierce explained her educational philosophy:

It is equally important to both sexes that memory should be stored with facts; that the imagination should be chastened and confined within its due and regular limits; that habits of false judgment, the result of prejudice, ignorance, or error, should be destroyed or counteracted; that the reasoning faculties should be trained to nice discriminations and powerful and regular research. Hence then all those sciences and all those exercises which serve in our sex for those important purposes should be part of a well regulated female education.

Pierce's educational writing was designed to remedy the complaint of her students that the textbooks they were using were dull. She enlivened hers by presenting the material in the form of questions and answers. Four volumes were published between 1811 and 1818 under the title Sketches of Universal History Compiled from Several Authors. For the Use of Schools.

In 1851, at Litchfield's centennial celebration, the chief justice of Connecticut paid tribute to Pierce's educational contributions, noting that through her academy she had given "a new tone to female education" in the United States. Sarah Pierce died in Litchfield on January 19 the following year, after an illness ending in "a slight paralysis."

Work

Sketches of Universal History. Compiled by Sarah Pierce, 4 volumes. New Haven: Printed by Joseph Barber, 1811–1818; Early American Imprints, second series, 23942b, 45337.

Sources

Kelley, Mary. Learning to Stand and Speak: Women, Education, and Public Life in America's Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

Sizer, Theodore and Nancy Sizer. To Ornament Their Minds: Sarah Pierce's Litchfield Academy 1792–1833. Litchfield, Conn.: Litchfield Historical Society, 1993.

Pilgrim

See SEPARATIST

Pinckney, Eliza Lucas (circa 1722–1793)

correspondent, diarist

An avid letter writer with interests in science, agriculture, poetry, philosophy, and travel, Eliza Lucas Pinckney was also an able businessperson. She wrote thoughtfully on matters personal and topical, as evident in both The Letterbook of Eliza Lucas Pinckney, 1739–1762 and Journal and Letters of Eliza Lucas Pinckney. Eliza Lucas was born around 1722, probably on the island of Antigua. Her father, Lieutenant Colonel George Lucas, was a wealthy planter and later lieutenant governor of Antigua. When Eliza was a young girl, her family relocated to South Carolina, where her father had inherited several plantations. They settled on the Wappoo estate, where her ailing mother Anne became an invalid, leaving the fifteen-year-old Eliza to assume most of the duties of mistress of the household. In 1740 the outbreak of a new imperial conflict known popularly as "The War of Jenkins' Ear" led her father to return to the Caribbean. With her brothers in England for schooling, Eliza took over the management of the family's extended properties in Carolina.

George Lucas's confidence in his daughter's abilities was both unusual and well founded. He had urged her to study not only philosophy, history, French, and music, but also law and science. Eliza found time to record comet sightings, assist neighbors with drawing up wills and deeds, and experiment with the cultivation of a new cash crop for Carolina, indigo. As a result of her success, indigo became the colony's second most important export next to rice.

In 1744 she married her former mentor, lawyer and planter Charles Pinckney, who was also the widower of one of her closest friends. The couple had four children, three of whom survived. Sons Charles and Thomas both rose to be leading figures on the national political scene after the colonies achieved independence, and daughter Harriott followed in her mother's footsteps, managing the extensive holdings of her husband after his death. Of Harriott, Eliza Pinckney wrote, "She is fond of learning and I encourage her in it. It shall not be my fault if she roams abroad for amusement, as I believe 'tis want of knowing how to employ themselves agreeably that makes many women too fond of going abroad." Pinckney recorded that her children were raised according to the educational philosophy of John Locke (1632–1704), who urged parents to allow a child to "play himself into learning."

In April 1753 Eliza joined her husband in England, where he was serving as the commissioner for South Carolina. When war with France broke out in 1758, the Pinckneys returned home, leaving their sons in England to complete their schooling. Immediately after their return to South Carolina, Charles Pinckney died of malaria and Eliza took over the management of his seven plantations. She remained a widow, living in her later years with her daughter Harriott at her plantation on the Santee River and helping to raise her son Charles's three children after the death of his wife. In 1792 Pinckney died of cancer. At his own request, President George WASHINGTON served as a pallbearer at her funeral.

Work

Pinckney, Eliza Lucas. The Letterbook of Eliza Lucas Pinckney. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Sources

Rogers, George C. Charleston in the Age of the Pinckneys. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1969.
Williams, Frances Leigh. Plantation Patriot: A Biography of Eliza Lucas Pinckney. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1967.

Plymouth Colony

This Massachusetts colony was established in 1620 by members of the Scrooby PILGRIMS who had fled persecution in England in 1608 and settled as exiles in Leyden, Holland until 1620. With financial support from Thomas Weston, a London ironmonger, the Pilgrims secured a patent to settle in Virginia. The MAYFLOWER departed Holland on July 22, 1620, carrying 102 passengers, 35 of whom were Pilgrims, or Separatists, and 66 of whom were non-Separatists, or Strangers, as the Puritans called them. After several false starts and a leaking second ship, the Mayflower departed Plymouth, England on September 16, 1620 for the New World and arrived near Cape Cod in November, nearly a month later than originally planned. With no CHARTER for settling in territory above 41 degrees north latitude, the ship headed south; but, when landing proved impossible, the Mayflower scouted the coast above Cape Cod. During this delay, passengers began to complain and to threaten mutiny. The Mayflower Compact was drawn up and signed onboard the ship by the forty-one adult freemen on November 11, 1620. William BRADFORD describes the purpose of the Compact in book 2, chapter 11 of his HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION: to “enact, constitute and frame such just and equal Laws, Ordinances, Acts, Constitutions and Offices.” The document established a civil government based on congregational structure wherein government leaders would be elected.

The Mayflower finally set anchor on December 26, 1620. Having arrived too late to build up food stores, and weakened by disease and exhaustion from the sixty-five-day passage, nearly half of the passengers died in the first winter. Bradford describes this period as “The Starving Time.” The colonists who did survive did so by eating the corn stored by Indians who had originally lived on the site, but who had either migrated south or died during a contagion between 1617 and 1619, from their contact with fishermen and traders of the Old World.

Established as a religious refuge for Separatists, Plymouth Plantation was intended as a family settlement that would become self-sufficient through agriculture and trade. To this end, land was evenly divided into one-hundred-acre allotments. In November 1621, a new patent arrived by the ship the Fortune that legalized the settlement. By 1624 the colony of 124 pilgrims could generate its own food supply. Governed first by John Carver (1576–1621) and later by Bradford, who served from 1621 to 1656, the PLYMOUTH COLONY eventually merged with the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY in 1684.

From the onset, Native Americans aided the colonists. Squanto, a Patuxet, was particularly generous in his assistance. Recently escaped from captivity in Spain, Squanto returned via England to find his tribe decimated by smallpox. Taken prisoner by the Pokanokets, Squanto was sent to negotiate a treaty with the Pilgrims, with whom he remained as guide and interpreter until his death in 1622. On March 22, 1621 the Plymouth colonists established a treaty for mutual defense with Wampanoag chief Massasoit.

Histories and primary records of Plymouth include: Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588); John SMITH's A True Relation . . . Virginia (1608), A DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND, and THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF VIRGINIA; Edward Maria WINGFIELD's A Discourse of Virginia (1608); and Robert BEVERLEY's History and Present State of Virginia (1705).

Sources

Demos, John. A Little Commonwealth: Family Life in Plymouth Colony, second edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
Langdon, George D., Jr. Pilgrim Colony: A History of New Plymouth, 1620–1691. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966.
Nash, Gary B. Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America. Fourth edition. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000.
Seelye, John. Memory's Nation: The Place of Plymouth Rock. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.

Poetry

Early American poetry arises from the Elizabethan and Renaissance traditions of the lyric, the ELEGY, and the epic. Colonial American poets wrote on themes such as migration, war, death, childbirth, religion, courtship, marriage, and nature. They gradually adapted these traditional themes to their own experiences, using the meter, rhyme, and form of the sonnet, heroic couplet, ballad stanza, and sesta rima. NEW ENGLAND Puritans had a utilitarian view of life and literature that would seem incompatible with poetic expression. However, Puritans often wrote verse, much of it unpublished, if only to make religious statements. They were instructed to read the Bible, where they found vivid images—both harrowing and divine—expressed in verse. Poetry was an acceptable way for Puritans to express religious experience by blending scriptural metaphor with spiritual imagery. As Emory Elliott explains, “By 1650, a major shift had become evident authorizing writers to use sensual imagery more freely and even consciously for eloquence.” The first book in English printed in the colonies, THE BAY PSALM BOOK, a 1651 translation of the psalms from Hebrew into English, for example, is a book of poetry published to complement devotional study. It was prepared under the guidance of the respected ministers Richard MATHER, John ELIOT, and Thomas Welde.

Title page for the first edition of Anne Bradstreet's poems, many written between 1635 and 1645

The poetry of the early Puritan settlers in New England, including that of Anne BRADSTREET, Michael WIGGLES-

WORTH, and Edward TAYLOR, illustrates the diverse nature of early American verse. Trained in the Elizabethan tradition, Anne Bradstreet wrote orthodox contemplations, dialogues, and elegies. In an elegy for Queen Elizabeth, she writes, “So great's thy glory and thine excellence, / The sound therof rapt's every human sense.” Bradstreet also wrote thoughtful reflections on religion, marriage, and family, including “To My Dear and Loving Husband” (1678).

Michael WIGGLESWORTH's poetry expressed a dramatic belief in divine will. For example, in his popular The Day of Doom (1662), he wrote:

*The mighty word of this great Lord links body and soul together
Both of the just, and the unjust, to part no more forever*

Edward Taylor, regarded as the best New England poet of the time, wrote lyrical, metaphorical poetry that focused on his spiritual practice and provided an extension of his devotions. In his God's Determinations Touching His Elect (circa 1682), which includes thirty-five poems, Taylor traces a path from the Book of Genesis to the Resurrection. His Preparatory Meditations (1682–1725) includes more than two hundred poems that Taylor composed to aid him in his ministry.

Portrait of George Alsop from the frontispiece for the first edition of A Character of the Province of Maryland, 1666

Detail from a portrait of Sarah Wentworth Apthorp Morton, circa 1801–1802, by Gilbert Stuart

Taylor also addresses more personal issues; for example, in “Upon Wedlock, & Death of Children,” he writes:

*Grief o’er doth flow: & nature fault would finde
Were not thy Will, my Spell Charm, Joy, & Gem:
That as I said, I say, take, Lord, they’re thine.*

For these poets, verse complemented their devotional practices.

Early American poets also wrote about worldly issues, such as love, race, and travel. Examples of these more-secular themes include John Josselyn’s (circa 1610–circa 1692) “Verses Made Sometime Since upon the Picture of a Young and Handsome Gypsie, Not Improperly Transferred upon the Indian Squa” (1673), John SAFFIN’s “The Negroes Character” (1701), George ALSOP’s “Trafique is Earth’s Great Atlas” (1666), and Richard Steere’s (1643?–1721) “On a Sea-Storm Nigh the Coast” (circa 1700).

Poets from the Revolutionary era drew inspiration from classic poems such as Homer’s Iliad and Virgil’s Aeneid. Revolutionary poets borrowed the epic form to celebrate American independence and to signal an increasingly distinct culture. America is depicted as a land of new beginnings with high ideals and agrarian values. In Joel BARLOW’s The Vision of Columbus (1787), an explorer, whose guide is an angel, learns the history and future of America. In book 2, “He saw, at once, as far as eye could rove . . . tribes innumerable.” In Philip FRENEAU’s “The Rising Glory of America” (1772), Independence, Liberty, and Peace triumph over tyranny. Timothy DWIGHT’s Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts (1794), describes

Portrait of Timothy Dwight by John Trumbull, 1817

*FAIR Verna! loveliest village of the west;
Of every joy, and every charm, possess'd;
How pleas'd amid thy varied walks I rove,
Sweet, cheerful walks of innocence, and love,
And o'er thy smiling prospects cast my eyes,
And see the seats of peace, and pleasure, rise,
And hear the voice of Industry resound.*

Poems also addressed political topics, such as Joel Barlow's "Advice to a Raven in Russia" (1812):

*No raven's wing can stretch the flight so far
As the torn bandrols of Napoleon's war.
Choose then your climate, fix your best abode,
He'll make you deserts and he'll bring you blood.*

Title page for Timothy Dwight's first published poem, probably published in 1780

Title page for Freneau's 1786 collection, including revised versions of several previously published poems

Barlow advises the Raven to follow in the wake of Napoleon's bloody path and depicts tyranny at its basest level. Poets in the New Republic took up additional topics related to the Revolutionary War and nation building, finding inspiration in the poetry of John Dryden (1631–1700) and Alexander Pope (1688–1744).

Poetry also provided an opportunity for divergent viewpoints and social protest, as in Phillis WHEATLEY's "On Being Brought from Africa to America" (1773) and "Liberty and Peace" (1784), and in Milcah Martha MOORE's "The Female Patriots. Address'd to the Daughters of Liberty in America, 1768" (1787).

Increasingly, poetry became the expression of polite society, and the men and women of the genteel class were expected to compose verse. Examples include Susanna WRIGHT's "To Eliza Norris-at Fairhill" (c.1750); Jane Colman TURELL's [Lines on Childbirth] (1741) and "To My

Title page for Phillis Wheatley's first collection of poetry, published when she was nineteen Muse" (1741); Annis Boudinot STOCKTON's "A Poetical Epistle, Addressed by a Lady of New Jersey, to Her Niece, upon Her Marriage" (1786) and "The Vision, an Ode to Washington" (1789); Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON's "On a Beautiful Damask Rose, Emblematical of Love and Wedlock" (1789); Sarah Wentworth Apthorp MORTON's "Ouabi: or the Virtues of Nature, An Indian Tale. In Four Cantos By Philenia, a Lady of Boston" (1790) and "The African Chief" (1792); and Margaretta Bleecker FAUGÈRES's "The Following Lines Were Occasioned by Mr. Robertson's Refusing to Paint for One Lady, and Immediately After Taking Another Lady's Likeness, 1793" (1793).

For other poets, verse was an occasion for wit and song. Examples include Ebenezer Cook's The Sot-Weed Factor: Or, a Voyage to Maryland (1708); Richard LEWIS's "A Journey from Patapsco to Annapolis, April 4, 1730" (1731), John Leacock's (1729–1802), "Song, The First May, to St. Tammany" (1776).

Early American poets thus celebrated birth, marriage, and liberty, commemorated deaths and battles, and contemplated seasons, religion, and nationhood. Whether writing on broad topics or on intimate ones, both men and women composed and exchanged poetry within a circuit of salons and literary clubs as well as in COMMONPLACE BOOKS, newspapers, and periodicals.

Works

- Cowell, Pattie, ed. Women Poets in Pre-Revolutionary America 1650–1775: An Anthology. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1971.
- Eberwein, Jane Donahue. Early American Poetry: Selections from Bradstreet, Taylor, Dwight, Freneau, and Bryant. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.
- Lemay, J. A. Leo. A Calendar of American Poetry in the Colonial Newspapers and Magazines and in the Major English Magazines through 1765. Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society, 1972.
- Meserole, Harrison T. Seventeenth-Century American Poetry. New York: New York University Press, 1968.
- Silverman, Kenneth. Colonial American Poetry. New York: Hafner, 1968.
