- Stockton, Annis Boudinot. Only for the Eye of a Friend: The Poems of Annis Boudinot Stockton, edited by Carla Mulford. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.

Sources

- Bercovitch, Sacvan, ed. Typology and Early American Literature. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1972.
- Cowell, Pattie, ed. Women Poets in Pre-Revolutionary America 1650–1775: An Anthology. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1981.
- Schweitzer, Ivy. The Work of Self-Representation: Lyric Poetry in Colonial New England. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.
- Shields, David S. Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- White, Peter, and Harrison T. Meserole. Puritan Poets and Poetics: Seventeenth-Century American Poetry in Theory and Practice. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985.

Recommended Writings

- Barlow, Joel. The Vision of Columbus (1787)
- Bradstreet, Anne. The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America . . . (1650)
- Bradstreet. Several Poems Compiled with Great Variety of Wit and Learning, Full of Delight . . . (1678).
- Cook, Ebenezer. The Sot-weed Factor; or, a Voyage to Maryland (1708)
- Dwight, Timothy. Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts (1794)

- Faugères, Margaretta Bleecker. "The Following Lines Were Occasioned by Mr. Robertson's Refusing to Paint for One Lady, and Immediately After Taking Another Lady's Likeness, 1793" (1793)
- Fergusson, Elizabeth Graeme. "On a Beautiful Damask Rose, Emblematical of Love and Wedlock" (1789)
- Freneau, Philip. "The Rising Glory of America" (1775)
- Lewis, Richard. A Journey from Patapsko to Annapolis, April 4, 1730 (1732)
- Moore, Milcah Martha. "The Female Patriots. Address'd to the Daughters of Liberty in America, 1768" (1787)
- Morton, Sarah Wentworth Apthorp. "Ouabi: or the Virtues of Nature, An Indian Tale . . ." (1790)
- Morton. "The African Chief" (1823)
- Stockton, Annis Boudinot. "A Poetical Epistle, Addressed by a Lady of New Jersey, to Her Niece, upon Her Marriage" (1786)
- Stockton. "The Vision, an Ode to Washington" (1789)
- Taylor, Edward. God's Determinations Touching His Elect (circa 1682)
- Taylor. Preparatory Meditations (1682–1725)
- Turell, Jane Colman. [Lines on Childbirth] (1741)
- Turell. "To My Muse" (1741)
- Wheatley, Phillis. Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral . . . (1773)

Studying Early American Poetry

For studies in early American poetry students should consult Harold Stein Jantz's The First Century of New England Verse (New York: Russell & Russell, 1962); Robert Daly's God's Altar: The World and the Flesh in Puritan Poetry (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978); Peter White and Harrison T. Meserole's Puritan Poets and Poetics: Seventeenth-Century American Poetry in Theory and Practice (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985); Ivy Schweitzer's The Work of Self-Representation: Lyric Poetry in Colonial New England (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991); Jeffrey Hammond's Sinful Self, Sainly Self: The Puritan Experience of Poetry (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993); William J. Scheick's "Early Anglo-American Poetry: Genre, Voice, Art, and Representation," in Teaching the Literatures of Early America, edited by Carla Mulford (New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1999, 187–199); Hammond's The American Puritan Elegy: A Literary and Cultural Study (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000); Amy M. E. Morris's Popular Measures: Poetry and Church Order in Seventeenth-Century Massachusetts (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005). To investigate poetry within a larger historical context, see David S. Shields's Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990). Scheick's Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998). For a print bibliography, see William J. Scheick and JoElla Doggett's Seventeenth-Century American Poetry: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977).

Electronic sources for poetry include The Academy of American Poets (<<http://www.poets.org>> viewed May 16, 2007). Fire and Ice: Puritan and Reformed Writings is a helpful site for primary sources for individual poets, for example, Anne Bradstreet (<<http://www.puritansermons.com/poetry/anneindx.htm>> viewed May 16, 2007); Michael Wigglesworth (<<http://www.puritansermons.com/poetry/wiggindx.htm>> viewed May 16, 2007); and Edward Taylor (<<http://www.puritansermons.com/poetry/taylor.htm>> viewed May 16, 2007). For Phillis Wheatley's poems see Renascence Editions: An Online Repository of Works Printed in English Between the Years 1477 and 1799 (<<http://darkwing.uoregon.edu/~rbear/wheatley.html>> viewed May 16, 2007) and The Library of Congress Special Exhibits (<<http://www.loc.gov/exhibits/treasures/tri013.html>> viewed May 16, 2007).

Praying Indians and Praying Towns

Native Americans converted to Christianity in colonial America from among the Massachusett, Mohegan, NAR-RAGANSETT, Nipmuck, Pawtucket, Pequot, and WAMPA-NOAG. After the PEQUOT WAR in 1637, the Reverend John ELIOT, under the tutelage of Job Nesutan, John Sassamon, and other converted Massachusett, learned the native language and began preaching in the 1640s. Eliot established the first praying town in Natick, Massachusetts, around 1650. According to Jean M. O'Brien, Eliot planned for conversion in "geographically bounded places called 'Praying Towns' where English ideas about land use and ownership would prevail, gender roles would be transformed, and English ideas about institutions would instruct Indians about their place in the social order before extending them full religious rights in formally gathered Indian congregations." Eliot's Indian Bible (New Testament 1661; Old Testament 1663), provided a complete translation of the King James Bible into the Massachusetts language, for which Eliot created a written language.

These developments were inspired in part by millennialism, which predicted the second coming of Christ, and the perception that Native Americans were members of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel. Richard W. Cogley explains: "From Eliot's millenarian point of view, the special significance of the anticipated Indian Church was to rest in its communicant members, whose status as 'visible saints' would indicate that the latter-day conversion of non-Christian peoples was under way." According to a 1674 census taken by Daniel GOOKIN, who served as Superintendent of Indians from 1656 to 1687, approximately four thousand Indians lived in fourteen villages or praying towns; other estimates cite 1,100. The propagation of praying towns not only facilitated conversion, but also reinforced civil codes, so that agriculture largely replaced hunting, and native dress, religion, language, housing, medicine, marriage, and appearance all became subject to English custom. Conversion and admission into the church involved rigorous study and testing over years of instruction.

Mary White ROWLANDSON makes several references to praying Indians in her NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAURATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON. For example, in the "First Remove," written on February 10, she mentions "Marlborough's Praying Indians, which Capt. Mosley brought to Boston." The praying town in Marlborough, Massachusetts, located outside her hometown of Lancaster, had been organized by John Eliot. In her "Nineteenth Remove," she describes Tom Dublet (Nepanet) and Peter Conway (Tataquinea), two Native Americans who assisted in negotiating her ransom release: "Then came Tom and Peter, with the second Letter from the Council about the Captives. . . . It was a Praying Indian that wrote their letter for them. There was another Praying Indian, who told me, that he had a Brother that would not eat Horse; his Conscience so tender and scrupulous." In the final chapter, or the "Twentieth Remove," Rowlandson mentions "an Indian, called James the PRINTER," a praying Indian who had assisted Eliot in the translation of the Bible into Algonquian.

Praying towns and the proselytizing they supported were largely abandoned after KING PHILIP'S WAR, which damaged Anglo-Native relations. Ministers prominently involved in the conversion included John Eliot, Daniel Gookin, Thomas MAYHEW, and Experience Mayhew (1673–1758).

Sources

- Bross, Kristina. Dry Bones and Indian Sermons: Praying Indians in Colonial America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.
- Cogley, Richard W. "John Eliot and the Millennium," Religion and American Culture, 1, no. 2 (1991): 227–250.
- O'Brien, Jean M. Dispossession by Degrees: Indian Land and Identity in Natick, Massachusetts, 1650–1790. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Stevens, Laura M. The Poor Indians: British Missionaries, Native Americans, and Colonial Sensibility. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Prince, Lucy Terry (1730–1821) poet

Lucy Terry Prince was taken from Africa and sold into slavery at the age of five. Her master, a Congregationalist minister in Deerfield, Massachusetts, saw that she learned to read and write. In August 1746 the sixteen-year-old girl was an eyewitness to the surprise Indian attack on her small frontier village. Her description of the raid, in twenty-eight lines of couplets, makes her one of the earliest, if not the earliest, black poet in America.

Lucy Terry married a free black man, Abijah Prince, in 1756. Her husband purchased her freedom, and the couple bought land in the new town of Sunderland, Vermont. They had six children and hoped that their eldest son, William, would be admitted to Williams College. The school turned him down on racial grounds. William Prince later served with Ethan ALLEN's Green Mountain Boys. Lucy Terry Prince was undeterred by her race or lack of formal education. When a neighbor claimed land belonging to the Prince family, she argued the case to the U.S. Supreme Court—and won.

Prince's friends and neighbors knew her as a raconteur, always ready to recite "Bars Fight," her poem on the Indian raid, to young people who gathered in her home. Its vivid detail, including such descriptions as "Simeon Amsden they found dead / Not many rods off from his head," capture the terror and the bloodshed of the raid. The poem preserved the names and fates of many other Deerfield residents, in verses such as this one:

*The Indians did in ambush lay
Some very valiant men to slay,
The names of whom I'll not leave out.
Samuel Allen like a hero fout,
And though he was so brave and bold,
His face no more shall we behold.*

The poem, not published until 1855, was preserved by Prince's recitation and in vocal versions by local singers.

Lucy Terry Prince was an outspoken PATRIOT during the Revolutionary War. She died in 1821 at the age of ninety-one.

Work

- Prince, Lucy Terry. "Bars Fight," in George Sheldon, "Slavery in Old Deerfield," New England Magazine, 8 (March 1893): 49–60.

Sources

- Greene, Lorenzo Johnston. The Negro in Colonial New England, 1620–1776. New York: Columbia University Press, 1942.
- Harris, Sharon M. Executing Race: Early American Women's Narratives of Race, Society, and the Law. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2005.

Prince, Thomas (1687–1758) historian, theologian

Thomas Prince was a noted pastor in NEW ENGLAND. Among his major sermons was a series written and published in the 1740s that celebrated British military victories over European rivals. Prince's most important undertaking, however, was the two-volume Chronological History of New England (1736, 1755), which remained unfinished at his death. He intended the history, based on primary or original sources, to be factual, without interpretation and without any elements that might "raise the imagination" or stir "affections." The project was to begin with Adam and continue to the eighteenth century. However, the two volumes ended in 1633, just as the Puritans began their Massachusetts colony. The 1736 publication was poorly received, and Prince did not publish the second volume for almost twenty years. As most of the documents he had collected for the task dated after the 1630s, he never had the opportunity to use them in his history.

Thomas Prince was born in 1687 to Samuel and Mercy Hinckley Prince. His father was a successful merchant; his mother was the daughter of Governor Thomas Hinckley (1619–1705) of PLYMOUTH COLONY. Thomas, tutored by his mother and then by his maternal grandfather, entered HARVARD COLLEGE in 1703. He was a bibliophile, and early in life he began to develop an extensive library with volumes on history, theology, ancient languages, geography, and medicine. After graduating from Harvard in 1707, Prince taught school, but he quickly grew bored with the classroom. In spring 1709 he set sail for the West Indies and England. He remained in England until 1717, preaching in several country churches.

In July 1717 Prince returned to Boston. Approximately thirty members of his English congregation from Suffolk County, England, followed him across the ocean, including Deborah Denny, whom he married in 1719. He was immediately invited to serve as pastor of several churches but chose to join Joseph Sewall (1688–1769) at the prestigious Old South Church in Boston. Prince's ordination was attended by Increase MATHER, Cotton MATHER, Benjamin COLMAN, and the colonial governor. Prince served as pastor of the Old South Church until his death.

Although Prince was conservative on all significant theological questions, he was flexible regarding politics and ritual. He urged his congregants to practice religious tolerance, which he demonstrated by inviting the leading proponent of the GREAT AWAKENING, George WHITEFIELD, to preach at Old South Church.

Prince's sermons and treatises on earthquakes and other natural phenomena reflected the influence of the ENLIGHTENMENT, yet his writing always stressed a moral purpose behind natural occurrences: through earthquakes or outbreaks of disease, Prince argued, God revealed his displeasure at the behavior of the people of New England. In military victories and in human survival of natural disasters, God showed his support for his people. Prince died October 22, 1758.

Works

- Prince, Thomas. Earthquakes the Works of God & Tokens of His Just Displeasure. Boston: Printed for D. Henchman, 1727; Early American Imprints, 2945, 2946, 7549.
- Prince. A Chronological History of New-England in the form of Annals, 2 volumes. Boston: Printed by Kneeland & Green for S. Gerrish, 1736, 1755; Early American Imprints, 4068.
- Prince. Diary of Rev. Thomas Prince, 1737, edited by Albert Matthews. N.p., 1917.

Sources

- Breen, T. H. The Marketplace of Revolution: How Consumer Politics Shaped American Independence. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Lambert, Frank. Inventing the "Great Awakening." Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Promotional Tract

Similar to EXPLORATION LITERATURE, the promotional tract presented the New World in a favorable manner to encourage migration and to justify an explorer's sponsorship. Filled with detailed descriptions of plants, animals, climate, native peoples, landscape, and natural resources, these writings promoted the development and colonization of early America.

Notable promotional tracts include John SMITH's DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND (1606), Thomas MORTON's New English Canaan (1637), Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588), and Robert BEVERLEY's The History and Present State of Virginia (1705).

Sources

- Elliott, John Huxtable. Empires of the Atlantic World: Britain and Spain in America, 1492–1830. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006.
- Franklin, Wayne. Discoverers, Explorers, Settlers: The Diligent Writers of Early America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Quinn, David B. England and the Discovery of America, 1481–1620: From the Bristol Voyages of the Fifteenth Century to the Pilgrim Settlement at Plymouth: The Exploration, Exploitation, and Trial-and-Error Colonization of North America by the English. New York: Knopf, 1973.

Public Houses

Public houses (also known as taverns, inns, or ordinaries) were intended for socializing and accommodations. In Boston on March 4, 1634, Samuel Cole established the first house for entertaining and sheltering travelers. By 1644 the Colonial Records of Connecticut ordered "one sufficient inhabitant" in each town to keep an ordinary, since "strangers were straightened" for want of entertainment. Often located next to the town meeting house and the church, the public house also served various civil functions, providing postal services, for example, and was often the main source for news, either from gazettes that were read aloud or through oral communication and gossip. As David Conroy explains, "Newspapers were delivered via taverns; thus public houses were probably the most important gathering places to hear the news read and interpreted." Social clubs and organizations also congregated in taverns. According to Kym S. Rice, the Hungarian Club "adjourned at Todd's of New York City nightly in the 1740s" and the Beef-Stake

Club of Philadelphia “met every Saturday in the 1740s at the Tun Tavern.”

Early American travelers often provided descriptions of taverns and public houses in journals. Notable examples include Sarah Kemble KNIGHT’s 1704 Journal (1825); Dr. Alexander HAMILTON’s Itinerarium (1744); and François Jean, Marquis de Chastellux’s Travels in North America in the Years 1780, 1781, and 1782 (1788). On Tuesday evening, October 3, 1704, Sarah Kemble Knight lodged at Mr. Havens’s Tavern at Kingstown, Rhode Island. According to her account, she was “very civilly received, and courteously entertained, in a clean comfortable House; and the Good woman was very active in helping off [her] Riding clothes.” In Philadelphia on June 16, 1744, Hamilton “supped with the Hungarian Club at Todd’s,” where “after the bumpers began to go round according to their laudable custom, we fell upon vigorous conversation.”

During the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, taverns and public houses such as the Green Dragon Tavern in Boston, Drake’s Tavern in New York City, and the Old London Coffee House in Philadelphia were key gathering spots for PATRIOTS. Public houses welcomed men and women from all levels of society, and though men operated the majority of public houses, women often assumed ownership as widows. In Boston, for example, Rebecca Holmes ran the popular Bunch of Grapes Tavern on King Street. Other well-known taverns included the Royal Exchange Tavern in Boston; the Blue Anchor Tavern, City Tavern, Indian King Tavern, and Indian Queen Tavern in Philadelphia; the Hudibras Tavern in Princeton; and the Raleigh Tavern in Williamsburg.

Sources

- Conroy, David. In Public Houses: Drink and the Revolution of Authority in Colonial Massachusetts. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Salinger, Sharon V. Taverns and Drinking in Early America. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Thompson, Peter. Rum Punch and Revolution: Taverngoing and Public Life in Eighteenth-Century Philadelphia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999.

Publick Occurrences (1690) periodical

Published by Benjamin Harris (fl. 1673–1716?) in Boston on September 25, 1690, Publick Occurrences, Both Forreign and Domestick represented the first genuine newspaper published in the American colonies. Earlier publications were limited to reprints of the London Gazette and single-page news sheets or broadsides. Unlike its predecessors, Publick Occurrences included a title, a general assortment of news features, and a publisher’s announcement regarding his intention to continue regular publication.

Harris began his career as a printer of opposition PAMPHLETS in England and as publisher of Domestick Intelligence, a Whig newspaper that was suppressed in 1681 after two years of publication. He left England under the threat of arrest, arriving in Boston by way of Holland in 1686. Harris established a bookselling and printing shop and maintained a coffee shop, possibly at the same location, which became known as the London Coffee-House (see COFFEEHOUSES). Printer and historian Isaiah THOMAS remembered Harris as “a brisk asserter of English Liberties” and “the most ingenious and innocent Companion, that I had ever met with.”

As a forum for Boston’s intellectual elite, the London Coffee-House provided a place where information and news flourished, and Harris soon published the first edition of what he hoped would be a monthly newspaper. Publick Occurrences, Harris announced in the first edition, would offer a broad account of world and local news, carefully reviewed for accuracy. The breadth of coverage and the high standards Harris imposed seem to have targeted the city’s merchants as the primary audience for the newspaper. This intention would have been in keeping with the English tradition of journalism. Accordingly, Publick Occurrences replicated the physical features of the English newspaper in its format and in the type used.

Colonial authorities suppressed Publick Occurrences, citing as their justification the imposition of new licensing laws in England, and the paper ceased publication after its first edition. Harris’s political views were certainly an important consideration; colonial leaders seem to have feared the publication of unregulated information. The potential audience for a monthly newspaper also was limited, as was the need for news on the comings and goings of ships and cargo. The political and economic conditions that limited the success of Publick Occurrences changed dramatically over the next few decades, but not soon enough for Harris. He continued to run his coffeehouse and bookselling business, however, and became the official printer for the colonial government. In 1695 he returned to England, where he became editor of the London Post in 1699. Bostonians had to wait until 1704 for another newspaper, when John Campbell (1653–1728) initiated the publication of THE BOSTON NEWS-LETTER.

Works

- Publick Occurrences, Both Forreign and Domestic*. Sept. 25th, 1690. Boston: Printed by R. Pierce for Benjamin Harris, 1690; Early American Imprints, 546.
- Massachusetts. Governor. By the Governour and Council: Whereas Some Have Lately Presumed to Print and Disperse a Pamphlet, Entituled Publick Occurrences, Both Forreign and Domestick: Boston, Thursday, Septemb. 25th. 1690. Without the Least Privity or Countenance of Authority. The Governour and Council . . . Order That the Same Be Suppressed and Called In. Boston: Printed by Bartholomew Green, 1690; Early American Imprints, 533.

Sources

Brigham, Clarence S. History and Bibliography of American Newspapers, 1690–1820. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1962.

Copeland, David A. Colonial American Newspapers: Character and Content. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1997.

Puritanism

Puritanism is a form of Christianity initiated by sixteenth-century Protestant extremists who wanted to simplify or “purify” the Church of England by eliminating all remnants of Catholic influence. They believed that faith was solely a function of divine grace rather than human effort and could not be mediated either by the Church through its possession of the sacraments or by tradition through the transmission of correct doctrine. The Church was therefore defined as a communion of believers united by faith through which spiritual deliverance was granted by God. Biblical Scripture, rather than the Pope or any other spiritual leader, was considered to be the authority on God’s word.

Puritans rejected outward manifestations of worldliness, such as the wearing of liturgical vestments and the practice of ceremonial rituals. Rather than submit to a centralized church government, Puritans proposed an alternative form of church organization known as CONGREGATIONALISM, in which leaders were elected by the congregation. Unlike the SEPARATISTS, the Puritans did not break from the ANGLICAN CHURCH completely, but they did establish independent churches that were not answerable to ecclesiastical authority vested in bishops or synods. Congregants were instructed on religious and civic behaviors and followed rigorous requirements for membership, which was restricted to those who demonstrated evidence of their status as the Elect.

As Protestants, Puritans held to a theology based on a covenant that defined civil and spiritual relationships. It was modeled after the covenants between God and Adam, God and Moses (the Mosaic Law or Ten Commandments), and God and Abraham. Having entered into a “covenant of grace,” the Puritans saw themselves as a community of “visible saints” operating under the two main doctrines of Providence and Predestination. All events were considered to be predetermined by God and manifest in God’s sovereignty. As Calvinists, they believed that among the Elect, or chosen people, the experience of conversion separated the believer from the unbeliever. This experience carried no assurance that it would last or secure a position among the Elect; therefore, Puritans constantly scrutinized their lives and those of their brethren for signs of backsliding or indifference, and engaged in a lifelong project of self-examination and personal reformation.

In early America, this mission inspired the colonial settlement in PLYMOUTH, Massachusetts, as illustrated by William BRADFORD in his Journal (1861) and in his HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION, which attempts to document and justify providential design. Puritans were avid historians, leaving voluminous records and diaries. In addition to Bradford’s history, other texts include Thomas HOOKER’s The Soules Preparation (1632), Cotton MATHER’s MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA, John WINTHROP’s Journals, 1630–1649 (1908), Samuel SEWALL’s Diary, 1674–1729 (1878), and Esther Edwards BURR’s The Journal of Esther Edwards Burr 1754–1757 (1903). New England’s high literacy rates, encouraged for scriptural interpretation, further inspired the production of Puritan writers’ sermons and religious tracts, such as Winthrop’s A Modell of Christian Charity (1630), Thomas SHEPARD’s The Covenant of Grace (1651), Samuel DANFORTH’s A Brief Recognition of New Englands Errand into the Wilderness (1671), Mary White ROWLANDSON’s NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAURATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON (1682), Cotton MATHER’s THE WONDERS OF THE INVISIBLE WORLD, Samuel SEWALL’s The Selling of Joseph (1700), MATHER’s Bonifacius: An Essay . . . to Do Good (1710), Jonathan EDWARDS’s Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God (1741), and the poetry of Anne BRADSTREET, Michael WIGLESWORTH, and Edward TAYLOR.

Sources

Bercovitch, Sacvan. The American Jeremiad. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.

Caldwell, Patricia. The Puritan Conversion Narrative: The Beginnings of American Expression. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983.

Cohen, Charles Lloyd. God’s Caress: Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Hall, David D. Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgment: Popular Belief in Early New England. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1989.

Miller, Perry. Errand into the Wilderness. New York: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1956.

Page, Thomas Nelson (1853–1922) short-story writer, novelist

Thomas Nelson Page was born on a Virginia plantation into an aristocratic family. Trained as a lawyer, Page gave up this career in 1893 for that of a writer. His contemporary, novelist Grace KING, wrote: “He was the first Southern writer to appear in print as a Southerner, and his stories, short and simple, written in Negro dialect, and I may say, Southern pronunciation, showed us with ineffable grace that although we were sore bereft, politically, we had a chance in literature at least.” His first volume of short stories, In Ole Virginia (1887), reflected traditional Southern notions of romantic chivalry. His sentimental narratives employed the dialects of the South, making Page a popular participant in the LOCAL COLOR movement. His best-selling Red Rock (1898) concerned the revolt against Reconstruction that gave rise to the Ku Klux Klan. Page also wrote dialect verse and quasi-historical works and a hagiography, Robert E. Lee, Man and Soldier (1911). From 1913 to 1919, Page served as U.S. ambassador to Italy, an experience recounted in his Italy and the World War (1920).

Sources

Gross, Theodore L. Thomas Nelson Page. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Romine, Scott. The Narrative Forms of Southern Community. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999.

Parker, Theodore (1810–1860) theologian, essayist

Truth never yet fell dead in the streets; it has such affinity with the soul of man, the seed however broadcast will catch somewhere and produce its hundredfold.

—A Discourse Pertaining to Matters of Religion (1842)

Born in Lexington, Kentucky, Theodore Parker was a prodigious intellect who came from a family too poor to pay for his education. Between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one he worked as a schoolteacher until he passed the Harvard entrance examination. He could not pay his tuition, but he was granted a special dispensation that permitted him to graduate from Harvard Divinity School in 1836. The next year Parker took the pulpit of a Unitarian church in Roxbury, Massachusetts, where he became friends with Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Bronson ALCOTT, and other Transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM). As Parker's beliefs became increasingly unorthodox, he developed his own system of theology, which he explicated in The Previous Question between Mr. Andrews Norton and His Alumni (1840), published under the pen name Levi Blodgett, and in the sermon “The Transient and Permanent in Christianity” (1841). Parker was ostracized by his fellow clergy for having joined the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB and for having turned his back on traditional church doctrine; he was able to deliver the lectures later collected in A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion (1842) only outside of church venues.

Parker refused to resign from the church, however, and he retained a following that in 1845 installed him as minister of the new Twenty-eighth Congregational Society of Boston. There the seven thousand members of his congregation heard Parker preach about pressing contemporary concerns such as war, slavery, women's rights, and temperance. Outside the church he campaigned aggressively against slavery, not only delivering passionate speeches and publishing his Letter to the People of the United States Touching the Matter of Slavery (1848) but also rescuing fugitive slaves and aiding John Brown. The character Mr. Power, an inspired preacher in Louisa May ALCOTT's novel Work (1873), is based on Parker.

Sources

- Albrecht, Robert C. Theodore Parker. New York: Twayne, 1971.
- Chesebrough, David B. Theodore Parker: Orator of Superior Ideas. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Collins, Robert E., ed. Theodore Parker: American Transcendentalist: A Critical Essay and a Collection of His Writings. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1973.
- Grodzins, Dean. American Heretic: Theodore Parker and Transcendentalism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Parkman, Francis (1823–1893) historian

Faithfulness to the truth of history involves far more than a research, however patient and scrupulous, into special facts. . . . The narrator must seek to imbue himself with the life and spirit of the time.

—Introduction to Pioneers of France in the New World (1865)

Francis Parkman was born in Boston and graduated from Harvard in 1844, already having developed an interest in studying the frontier and Native American life. He graduated from Harvard Law School in 1846 but never practiced law. Instead, he journeyed west to Wyoming, intent on exploring the land and restoring his fragile health. Although the journey worsened his health and he was almost blind, he dictated his first book, THE OREGON TRAIL (1849), to his cousin and friend Quincy A. Shaw. The book immediately established Parkman as America's first great historian of the frontier experience.

Illness continued to make Parkman dependent on the help of others; yet, he undertook an epic historical project to examine the conflict of the French and English in North America, beginning with History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac (1851). Subsequent volumes provided accounts of French and English exploration; military and political strategies; encounters with indigenous people; and the fate of the French Huguenots (Protestants), Spanish Catholics, Native Americans, and the European religious mission in North America. Parkman was careful to shape his dramatic narratives in accordance with a strict sense of scholarship and accuracy.

Montcalm and Wolfe (1884), detailing the Seven Years' War—or the French and Indian War, as the American colonists called it—dramatized the final confrontation between the British and the French, in which the fate of much of North America was decided. Although Parkman was a partisan—the English represented the forces of an emerging democracy and the French the despotism of Europe—his conservative side prevented him from ignoring the excesses of democratic rule and prompted him to see the virtue of constitutional monarchies.

Like the Romantics (see ROMANTICISM), he had a special appreciation of nature, which resulted in the publication of The Book of Roses (1866) and his appointment at Harvard as professor of horticulture in 1871. He wrote one novel, Vasall Morton (1856). Parkman's Journals were published in 1948 and his Letters appeared in print in 1960.

Sources

- Gale, Robert L. Francis Parkman. New York: Twayne, 1973.
- Jacobs, Wilbur R. Francis Parkman, Historian as Hero: The Formative Years. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991.
- Levin, David. History as Romantic Art: Bancroft, Prescott, Motley, and Parkman. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1959.
- Pease, Otis A. Parkman's History: The Historian as Literary Artist. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1953.

Parley, Peter

See GOODRICH, SAMUEL GRISWOLD.

Parton, James (1822–1891) biographer, journalist

James Parton's first biography, Life of Horace Greeley (1854), set a precedent by publishing the life story of a living person. The GREELEY life was also the first interpretive biography, and it broke new ground in making biographies readable. A journalist for over thirty years, Parton contributed to many major periodicals, including THE NEW YORK LEDGER, the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, and THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. His first job, as writer and editorial assistant, was with the Home Journal, edited by Nathaniel Parker WILLIS, who hired Parton after he submitted an article that argued Currer Bell, author of Jane Eyre and Shirley, was really a woman. Willis later fired Parton because of his friendship with Willis's sister, Sara Payson Willis (Fanny Fern), whom Parton later married (see Sara Payson Willis PARTON).

Source

- Flower, Milton E. James Parton: The Father of Modern Biography. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1951.

—Vicki Martin

Parton, Sara Payson Willis (1811–1872) novelist, journalist

Oh, but books are such safe company! They keep your secrets well; they never boast that they made your eyes glisten, or your cheek flush, or your heart throb.

—“Study Men, Not Books,” in Shadows and Sunbeams and Other Stories (1854)

Sara Payson Willis Parton was a once-widowed, then divorced mother of two when she began her writing career after sewing failed to bring in enough money to support her family. In 1852 she joined the staff of the New York Musical World and Times where she published articles under the pen name Fanny Fern. A collection of these pieces, Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio (1853), was a best-seller. When she joined the staff of the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post the same year, she became the first female newspaper columnist in America. Two years later, earning $100 per column at the NEW YORK LEDGER, she was the most highly paid newspaper writer of her day. The author of two novels, the autobiographical Ruth Hall (1855) and Rose Clark (1856), Parton also produced several children's books and six collections of essays. She is remembered for her informal style and her championship of feminist issues. Parton is the originator of the aphorism "The way to a man's heart is through his stomach."

Sources

Walker, Nancy A., ed. Fanny Fern. New York: Twayne, 1993.
Warren, Joyce W. Fanny Fern: An Independent Woman. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1992.

The Pathfinder

See LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

"Paul Revere's Ride" by Henry Wadsworth

Longfellow (1861) poem

Originally published in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in January 1861, "Paul Revere's Ride" reappeared in Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW's Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863). It commemorates the legendary midnight ride of Paul Revere on April 18, 1775, when he alerted American Patriots that the expected British invasion of Boston was coming not over Boston Neck (by land), but down the Charles River (by sea). Longfellow wrote the poem on April 19, 1860, as a response to the country's growing inclination toward CIVIL WAR. Though failing to rekindle a spirit of national unity, it memorialized Revere as a hero of the American Revolution.

Source

van Shaick, John. Characters in Tales of a Wayside Inn. Boston: Universalist Publishing House, 1939.

—Connie Ann Kirk

Paulding, James Kirke (1778–1860) novelist, historian

Born in New York State and raised in Tarrytown, James Kirke Paulding was eighteen when he and his brother met Washington IRVING and his brother William. The four became fast friends (William Irving married Paulding's sister) and formed the nucleus of an informal literary group that called itself The Nine Worthies of Cockloft Hall. In 1807 and 1808 Paulding, the Irving brothers, and others collaborated on a series of humorous pamphlets collected under the title Salmagundi; or, The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq. and Others. Later, Paulding alone published a second series, Tellers from the South; A Sketch of Old England, Salmagundi; Second Series (1819–1820).

In 1812 Paulding published a comic account of the settling and revolt of the American colonies, The Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan, inspired by Washington Irving's History of New-York (1809). This work was later followed by a sequel, The History of Uncle Sam and His Boys (1835). Paulding clearly excelled at burlesque, which he combined with his distaste for the ROMANTICISM of the novelist Sir Walter Scott in the long poem The Lay of the Scottish Fiddle (1813). On the other hand, Paulding championed the ideal of rugged American individualism in the poem The Backwoodsman (1818). Between 1815 and 1825 he published a series of histories, some serious, others not, upholding American values while lampooning conservative British Toryism. Paulding's first truly important work of long fiction, Konigsmarke, The Long Finn: A Story of the New World (1823), is an historical ROMANCE concerning Swedish settlement of Delaware in the seventeenth century. It was followed by a drama about the western frontier, The Lion of the West (1831), which proved a popular success when it was adapted for the stage. Other works of historical fiction followed: The Dutchman's Fireplace (1831), an account of life in upper New York State during the French and Indian War, thought to be Paulding's best novel; Westward Ho! (1832), which follows a Virginia family's pioneering adventures in Kentucky; and The Puritan and His Daughter (1849), a tale of seventeenth-century Virginia.

Paulding's prodigious output of novels and dramas based on American history and his continuing interest in naval affairs won his appointment by President Martin Van Buren as secretary of the navy from 1838 to 1841. After returning to private life he continued to publish until 1849, when he retired to his estate in Hyde Park, New York.

Sources

Aderman, Ralph M., ed. Letters of James Kirke Paulding. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1962.

Aderman, and Wayne R. Kime. Advocate for America: The Life of James Kirke Paulding. Selinsgrove, Pa.: Susquehanna University Press, 2003.

Ratner, Lorman. James Kirke Paulding: The Last Republican. New York: Greenwood Press, 1992.

Reynolds, Larry J. James Kirke Paulding. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Peabody, Elizabeth (1804–1894) memoirist, essayist

Elizabeth Palmer Peabody was born in Billerica, Massachusetts, and began her career teaching at a local school run by her mother. Associated with the Transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), Peabody was tutored in Greek by Ralph Waldo EMERSON when she was eighteen. In the 1820s and 1830s she served as a secretary for William Ellery CHANNING, and from 1834 to 1836 she served as assistant at Bronson ALCOTT's Temple School, an experience she later recalled in her Record of a School (1835). In 1839 Peabody opened a Boston bookstore that became a meeting place for the local intelligentsia, including the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB. The site of Margaret FULLER's conversation classes, her bookstore was also the birthplace of the ideas that spawned BROOK FARM and THE DIAL, which was published in the back of the store between 1842 and 1843. An abolitionist (see ABOLITIONISM) and reformer, Peabody published a number of essays in the periodical. These were later reprinted, together with some of her memoirs, in A Last Evening with Allston (1886).

After the bookstore burned down in 1844, Peabody began a series of lecture tours and returned to teaching. In Boston in 1860 she opened one of the first kindergartens in the nation. The following year Peabody opened the first kindergarten training center in the United States. Influenced by her study of the German educator Friedrich Froebel, her work led to the publication of her and her sister Mary's Moral Culture of Infancy and Kindergarten Guide (1863). Ten years later she published a magazine, Kindergarten Messenger (1873–1875).

Sources

Ronda, Bruce A. Elizabeth Palmer Peabody: A Reformer on Her Own Terms. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Tharp, Louise Hall. The Peabody Sisters of Salem. Boston: Little, Brown, 1950.

The Pearl of Orr's Island by Harriet Beecher Stowe (Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1862) novel

The Pearl of Orr's Island: A Story of the Coast of Maine is considered Harriet Beecher STOWE's most autobiographical novel. Its main character, Mara Lincoln, is in many ways an analogue for Stowe herself, especially in her strong desire for the opportunities reserved to the men in her world. The novel was first published serially in THE INDEPENDENT beginning on January 3, 1861. As it progressed, it suffered from Stowe's overextending her energies. The early installments signaled that this was likely to be one of her best psychological studies; however, serialization was suspended temporarily because Stowe was unable to keep up with the production schedule, and eventually she finished the novel only by sacrificing the promising beginning to a conventional and sentimental ending.

Source

Hedrick, Joan D. Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

—Vicki Martin

Penny Press

The penny press, or penny paper, developed in the 1830s in the era of Jacksonian democracy, which championed the common person. It was perhaps inevitable that newspapers of the period reached out to this new popular audience. To do so, innovative editors had to rethink both the newspaper as a genre and the very idea of news itself, for the long-standing mercantile newspapers of previous decades—with their focus on trade and business—appealed to a highly educated and privileged readership.

The term “penny paper” implies very specific ideas about both the affordability of the paper and the type of news in its pages. Prior to the arrival of the penny press, most newspapers were sold on a subscription basis and cost about six cents per issue—a prohibitive price for most Americans. Furthermore, the information in the commercial and party papers did not have a broad appeal: the six-cent dailies focused largely on the commercial world of ship arrivals and advertising, and political newspapers served as mouthpieces for the parties that backed them. In contrast, the penny papers in most instances truly did cost a penny per issue and were sold on the street by news vendors. To attract a large readership, however, penny papers had to rely on more than a reduced price; they also had to include news of interest to the masses. One result was the development in the penny press of sensational journalism—the publication of crime news, courtroom notices, scandals, and disasters. Penny papers, though sometimes sensationalist, were also heavily invested in REALISM and appealed to the common reader by including local news and human-interest stories, which focused on portrayals of the human condition rather than on descriptions of remarkable persons or events. The papers also developed a style of writing that could be easily understood and enjoyed. Even when they tackled serious issues (which they regularly did), penny papers avoided the esoteric style of the commercial and party press.

New York was the center of the emerging penny press in the 1830s, though the first venture at a penny paper was the unsuccessful Philadelphia Cent in 1830. In New York, the first successful penny paper was Benjamin H. Day's Sun, which appeared on September 3, 1833. The New York Transcript followed shortly thereafter, and the New York Herald, which became an extremely influential newspaper, was founded in 1835. Viable penny papers soon emerged in Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore.

Philadelphia's first successful penny paper, the Public Ledger, appeared in 1836, as did the Boston Daily Times. The editors of the Public Ledger founded the Baltimore Sun in 1837, following the model they had established in Philadelphia. These papers marked the first wave of a successful penny press. Together, they helped to create a newspaper readership that had been ignored by the more expensive and genteel dailies, mercantile papers, and political presses.

Source

Mott, Frank Luther. American Journalism, A History of American Newspapers in the United States through 260 Years: 1690–1950, revised edition. New York: Macmillan, 1950.

—Elizabeth Lorang

Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart (1844–1911) novelist, short-story writer, poet, essayist

Born Mary Gray Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps adopted her mother's name sometime after her mother died in 1852. Phelps published her first pieces in a religious magazine at age sixteen. When she was twenty-four years old, her novel THE GATES AJAR (1868) became a best-seller; she followed this achievement with other social-reform novels such as Hedged In (1870), The Silent Partner (1870), The Story of Avis (1877), and Doctor Zay (1882). In much of her fiction Phelps focuses on the dilemma of female self-fulfillment through careers, marriage, and service to others. In 1888 she married Herbert Dickinson Ward, a writer seventeen years her junior. She died in 1911 of heart failure.

Sources

Kessler, Carol Farley. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Privett, Ronna Coffey. A Comprehensive Study of American Writer Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, 1844–1911: Art for Truth's Sake. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

—Jennifer Putzi

"The Philosophy of Composition" by Edgar Allan Poe (1846) essay

First published in GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, Edgar Allan POE's essay "The Philosophy of Composition" outlines a general theory on the most effective way to construct a story. In contrast to traditional Romantic values of intuition, imagination, and spontaneity (see ROMANTICISM), Poe emphasizes a more methodical and analytical approach to art. The starting point for his theory is that good artists should organize each of their stories around some planned and intended emotional response, or "effect." Following a precise and focused method of composition will help a writer construct a theme, characters, tone, and plot that all contribute to a story's "unity of effect." By describing the writing process involved with one of his own poems, "THE RAVEN," Poe shows how this theory works: brevity, emphasis on beauty, and a melancholic tone are three qualities that all contribute to his intended effect at the conclusion of the poem. Poe's "Philosophy of Composition" is important because it offers a critical exploration into the proper nature and purpose of art and asserts ideas that run counter to those held by many writers of his day. Instead of didactic morality or personal self-expression, Poe believed that the purpose of art was to explore the various and complex ways people form thoughts and ideas.

Source

Cassuto, Leonard, ed. Edgar Allan Poe: Literary Theory and Criticism. New York: Dover, 1998.

—Chris Lang

Piatt, Sarah Morgan Bryan (1836–1919) poet

Born on a plantation outside of Lexington, Kentucky, Sarah Piatt lost her mother at age eight. After graduating from Henry Female Seminary in 1855, she married John James Piatt and moved to Washington, D.C., as the CIVIL WAR began. Piatt published her poetry in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, HARPER'S, and St. Nicholas, as well as in seventeen volumes of her own. Dealing with issues from slavery to war to women's political involvement, Piatt's most notable poems include "Giving Back the Flower" (1867), "Beatrice Cenci" (1871), "The Palace-Burner" (1872), and "The Black Princess" (1872). Piatt stands out in her attention to form and is often considered an early modernist.

Sources

Bennett, Paula Bernat, ed. Nineteenth Century American Women Poets. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1998.

Piatt, Sarah. Palace-Burner: The Selected Poetry of Sarah Piatt, edited by Bennett. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2001.

Gray, Janet, ed. She Wields a Pen. London: Dent, 1997.

—Sara Elizabeth Klotz

The Piazza Tales by Herman Melville (New York: Dix & Edwards, 1856) short-story collection

After the mixed success of MOBY-DICK (1851) and the outright failure of PIERRE (1852), Herman MELVILLE turned to magazine writing in order to secure financial support for his family and himself. Between 1852 and 1856 he wrote fifteen tales and sketches, which were first published in Harper's New Monthly Magazine (see HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE) and PUTNAM'S MONTHLY. The best-known of these are "BENITO CERENO" and "BARTLEBY, THE SCRIVENER." In May 1856 several of these tales were published together in a collection titled The Piazza Tales, for which Melville wrote a new introductory piece, "The Piazza." In this story, the narrator has a piazza built next to his country house in order to admire the beauty of a mountain, and his imagination takes him on a journey that blurs the distinction between fantasy and reality.

Other notable tales in the collection include "The Encantadas, or Enchanted Isles," a series of ten sketches set in the Galapagos Islands and modeled after popular travel narratives of the time, and "The Lightning Rod Man." This latter tale describes the visit of a lightning-rod salesman to the narrator's home at the height of a thunderstorm. Afraid of getting near any part of the house, the salesman likewise attempts to strike fear in the heart of the narrator, who laughs him off, saying, "I stand at ease in the hands of my God." In a thinly veiled jab at religious fear-mongers, the narrator observes that, despite his driving the salesman away and warning his neighbors, the man continues to come around during storms, "driv[ing] a brave trade with the fears of man."

—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

Source

Melville, Herman. The Piazza Tales, and Other Prose Pieces, 1839–1860, edited by Harrison Hayford, Alma A. MacDougall, G. Thomas Tanselle, and others. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1987.

Pierre by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1852) novel

The main character of Herman MELVILLE's Pierre, or The Ambiguities is Pierre Glendenning, a young writer in rural New York. Pierre is thrown into a dark world of family secrets when his illegitimate half sister Isabel reveals her existence to him. Upon this revelation, Pierre forsakes his mother and fiancée, Lucy, and he travels to New York City, where he attempts to complete a book. As a writer he finds only rejection, however, which leads to personal collapse and tragedy.

Heavily influenced by William Shakespeare's Hamlet and Romeo and Juliet, Pierre was Melville's seventh novel and a radical departure from his previous sailing-adventure fiction. Often described as a parody of melodramatic Gothic fiction, it is also a probing philosophical and psychological drama on the existence and nature of virtue and vice—hence the "ambiguities" in the title's second half. Like MOBY-DICK's Captain Ahab, Pierre confronts a religious, existential crisis and risks personal and social peril in pursuit of outwardly inscrutable goals. Pierre was one of Melville's biggest commercial and critical failures, with fewer than two thousand copies sold in his lifetime.

—Joshua Matthews

The Pioneers

See LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

"The Pit and the Pendulum" by Edgar Allan Poe (1843) short story

This classic horror story, written by Edgar Allan POE in 1842 and first published in The Gift the following year, recounts the tale of an unnamed narrator who is condemned to death by the judges of the Spanish Inquisition. He undergoes a series of horrifying tortures, including being bound beneath a scythe pendulum that descends ever closer to his chest as it swings back and forth, and being forced toward a fathomless pit. In the very moment of plunging into the abyss, the narrator is rescued by the French Army—an historical reference, presumably, to the French intervention in the Inquisition between 1808 and 1812.

"The Pit and the Pendulum" illustrates Poe's authorial belief in the "unity of design," the principle that all elements of a piece must work toward a single effect embodied in the narrator and shared by the reader. In this case, the single effect is the terror of being unjustly faced with a horrible and apparently inevitable death by blade, burn, or fall.

Source

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Selected Writings of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Gary Richard Thompson. New York: Norton, 2004.
Poe. The Works of the Late Edgar Allan Poe. New York: J. S. Redfield, 1850.

—E. N. S.

Poe, Edgar Allan (1809–1849) short-story writer, poet, critic

I would define, in brief, the poetry of words as the rhythmical creation of Beauty. Its sole arbiter is taste. With the intellect or with the conscience, it has only collateral relations. Unless incidentally, it has no concern whatever either with duty or with truth.

—The Poetic Principle (1850)

Edgar Allan Poe was born in Boston in 1809. By the time he was three his father had disappeared, and his mother had died shortly after moving her destitute family to Richmond, Virginia. John Allan, a Richmond merchant, took charge of Poe, although he never legally adopted the child. Poe accompanied the Allans to England and was educated there between 1815 and 1820; he later wrote about this period in his short story "William Wilson." Tensions between foster father and son developed, and by the time Poe entered the University of Virginia in 1826, he was receiving little support from Allan. Poe got into trouble over gambling debts and dropped out of school.

Poe returned to Boston, where he anonymously published his first book of poetry, Tamerlane and Other Poems (1827). Continuing to write, Poe published another book of verse, Al Aaraaf, in 1829. He enlisted in the army, and after a brief reconciliation with Allan was able to secure a place at the United States Military Academy in 1830; however, when Allan later refused to approve Poe's resignation from the Academy, Poe disobeyed orders and was expelled by court-martial. In 1831 he published his third volume, Poems by Edgar A. Poe. This collection includes Poe's famous poem "To Helen," about Helen of Troy, and the mysterious and suggestive poem "The City in the Sea."

Poe's early poetry was derivative, drawing on romantic conventions (see ROMANTICISM), but it also had a symbolic heft and ethereal quality quite unlike the poetry made popular at the time by Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, John Greenleaf WHITTIER, and William Cullen BRYANT. As his later critical essays demonstrated, Poe scorned didactic poetry that expressed conventional sentiments. His notion of art as autonomous was quite modern and later influenced twentieth-century poets and writers as various as Allen Tate, Hart Crane, Richard Wilbur, and Susan Sontag.

Daguerreotype of Edgar Allan Poe

In the mid 1830s Poe began to establish a reputation as a short-story writer. This led to an editorial position at The Southern Literary Messenger, in which he published reviews that articulated a strong sense of aesthetics. Poe favored American writers such as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE who did not imitate European models. Poe rejected realism in favor of highly subjective, metaphysical fantasies.

In 1838 Poe published The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, his longest piece of fiction. The novella's symbolic narrative, especially its emphasis on the meaning of whiteness and its exploration of extreme states of mind, has been called a precursor to the later novels of Herman MELVILLE, especially MOBY-DICK.

By the late 1830s and early 1840s Poe was publishing his most celebrated short stories, including "Morella," (1835) "THE FALL OF THE HOUSE OF USHER," (1839) and "William Wilson," (1840). In Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque (1840) he included "Berenice," "Ligeia," and "The Assig-nation," some of his most powerful short fiction. Poe's subject was often the brooding human consciousness of death and yearning for immortality, a morbid yet thrilling exploration of characters in various states of extremity. His work challenged much of the optimism of popular American literature during this period.

Poe confronted the human compulsion to repeat self-destructive acts in such tales as "A Descent into the Maelstrom," (1841) and "The Imp of the Perverse" (1845), both published in GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, which he edited. His essay "THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMPOSITION" (1846), one of his major statements on literature, emphasizes the importance of form over content. Poe sought to enforce the idea of writing as a craft, carefully thought out instead of spontaneously emotional.

An innovator in literary form, Poe has often been called the originator of detective fiction because of "THE MURDERS IN THE RUE MORGUE" (1841) and "The Mystery of Marie Roget" (1842–1843), which introduced his detective C. Auguste Dupin. Poe also achieved tremendous popular success with his poem "THE RAVEN," which demonstrated his dedication to form as a series of repetitions of a single idea or conceit: the inescapability of mortality.

Writing for the Broadway Journal in the 1840s, Poe produced several of his most popular tales, including "Eleonora" (1842), "THE PIT AND THE PENDULUM" (1843), "THE TELL-TALE HEART" (1843), "The Premature Burial" (1844), as well as his detective tale, "THE PURLOINED LETTER" (1845). Poe's grotesque, supernatural tales and his tales of Romanticism and rationalism were leading him to the metaphysical and poetical statement of the book EUREKA (1848). An intricately argued essay, Eureka posits a contracting universe, filled with doom and destined to disintegrate. Arguably, Poe's entire corpus could be read in the light of Eureka, which would make of him not the psychologist of extreme states of mind but instead the philosopher of a universe gradually pulling itself apart.

Poe's own frail health, apparently abetted by his weakness for alcohol (although the true extent of his addiction has never been determined), made his last few years miserable. He was found in a delirious state shortly before he died, having wandered the streets of Baltimore for several days.

Principal Books by Poe

Tamerlane and Other Poems. By a Bostonian. Boston: Thomas, 1827.

Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems. Baltimore: Hatch & Dunning, 1829.

Poems, by Edgar A. Poe, second edition. New York: Bliss, 1831.

The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, of Nantucket . . ., anonymous. New York: Harper, 1838.

The Conchologist's First Book; or, A System of Testaceous Malacology . . . Philadelphia: Haswell, Barrington & Haswell, 1839.

Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 1840.

The Prose Romances of Edgar A. Poe. Philadelphia: Graham, 1843.

Title page for Poe's first book. There are twelve copies known to have survived from a first printing estimated by different scholars to have been between 40 and 200.

Tales. New York & London: Wiley & Putnam, 1845.

The Raven and Other Poems. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1845.

Eureka: A Prose Poem. New York: Putnam, 1848.

Letters

Poe and His Friends: Letters Relating to Poe, volume 18 of The Complete Works of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by James A. Harrison. New York: Crowell, 1902.

The Letters of Edgar Allan Poe, 2 volumes, edited by John Ward Ostrom. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1948; republished with three supplements. New York: Gordian, 1966; fourth supplement, American Literature, 45 (January 1974): 513–536.

Studying Edgar Allan Poe

Perhaps more than any other American author, Edgar Allan Poe has been the focus of sustained and voluminous critical scholarship. Since Charles Baudelaire's initial essays on Poe in the mid nineteenth century, countless volumes have been published on just about every facet of Poe's writing and personal life. This guide lists only a small sample of the most compelling and useful volumes from this large body of work. For a general and readily available introduction to Poe scholarship, see Kevin J. Hayes's The Cambridge Companion to Edgar Allan Poe (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002). Another far more exhaustive and encyclopedic resource is Dawn B. Sova's Critical Companion to Edgar Allan Poe (New York: Facts On File, 2007). Other critical surveys include The Recognition of Edgar Allan Poe: Selected Criticism Since 1829, edited by Eric W. Carlson (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1966); Twentieth Century Interpretations of Poe's Tales: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by W. Howarth (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1971); and Scott Peeples's Edgar Allan Poe Revisited (Boston: Twayne, 1998). The academic journal Poe Studies/Dark Romanticism is an essential resource for studies of Poe's short fiction and poetry. Book-length works that focus specifically on Poe's poetry are G. R. Thompson's Circumscribed Eden of Dreams: Dream Vision and Nightmare in Poe's Early Poetry (Baltimore: Edgar Allan Poe Society, 1984) and Floyd Stovall's Edgar Poe the Poet: Essays New and Old on the Man and His Work (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1969).

The best resource for Poe's biography is Dwight Thomas and David K. Jackson's The Poe Log: A Documentary Life of Edgar Allan Poe, 1809–1849 (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987), a meticulously researched, day-by-day account of the writer's life. Another similar volume is John Carl Miller's Building Poe Biography (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1977). Other recent biographies include Daniel Hoffman, Poe Poe Poe Poe Poe Poe Poe (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972) and Kenneth Silverman, Edgar A. Poe: Mournful and Never-Ending Remembrance (New York: HarperCollins, 1991).

Several books use critical theory to focus on a specific story or motif. One of the most interesting of these is The Purloined Poe: Lacan, Derrida and Psychoanalytic Reading, edited by John P. Muller and William J. Richardson (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988), which reprints the fascinating debate over "The Purloined Letter" conducted by these giants of psychoanalysis and Deconstructionism. Stories such as "Murders in the Rue Morgue" reveal Poe's antebellum attitudes toward race, as discussed in Romancing the Shadow: Poe and Race, edited by J. Gerald Kennedy and Liliane Weissberg (New York: Oxford University Press, 2001). Terence Whalen, Edgar Allan Poe and the Masses: The Political Economy of Literature in Antebellum America (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999) examines Poe's relationship to the mass media and politics of his day. Poe's role as a founder of mystery fiction has been the subject of many interesting studies, including John Evangelist Walsh's Poe the Detective: The Curious Circumstances Behind the Mystery of Marie Roget (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1967) and Daniel Stashower's The Beautiful Cigar Girl: Mary Rogers, Edgar Allan Poe and

The System of Doctor Tarr and Professor Fether.

By Edgar A. Poe.

During the autumn of 18—, while on a tour through the extreme Southern provinces of France, my route led me within a few miles of a certain Maison de Santé, or private Mad-House, about which I had heard much, in Paris, from my medical friends. As I had never visited a place of the kind, I thought the opportunity too good to be lost; and so proposed to my travelling companion (a gentleman with whom I had made casual acquaintance, a few days before) that we should turn aside, for an hour or so, and look through the establishment. To this he objected; pleading haste, in the first place, and, in the second, a very usual horror at the sight of a lunatic.

the Invention of Murder (New York: Dutton, 2006). Of the several studies of Poe's only Gothic "novel," the most accessible is J. Gerald Kennedy's The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym and the Abyss of Interpretation (Boston: Twayne, 1995). Cinematic adaptations of Poe's tales are the subject of Don G. Smith's The Poe Cinema: A Critical Filmography of Theatrical Releases Based on the Works of Edgar Allan Poe (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1998) and Ronald Smith's Poe in the Media: Screen, Songs, and Spoken Word Recordings (New York: Garland, 1990).

—Student Guide by Mark Graham

The Portrait of a Lady by Henry James (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882; revised 1908) novel

The Portrait of a Lady, originally published in 1880–1881 (concurrently in Macmillan's Magazine and in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY), was Henry JAMES's seventh full-length novel and his most creatively ambitious work to that point. As Leon Edel, the eminent James scholar, has noted, the novel served as a capstone to James's "early," apprenticeship period as a writer. James himself in later life called it "to the author's own sense, the most proportioned of his productions after 'The Ambassadors.'"

The story centers on Isabel Archer, a young woman from Albany, New York. Recently orphaned, Isabel is adopted by her aunt, Lydia Touchett, who takes her to England with the aim of providing Isabel a social and cultural education. Isabel's struggle to assert her independence in the face of those who in one way or another attempt to dictate what she will become serves as the novel's central conflict. During the first half of the book, Isabel just manages to maintain this independence despite challenges: her aunt hopes to mold her into a refined socialite; the Touchetts' wealthy neighbor Lord Warburton, smitten with her virtually upon first sight, proposes marriage; Caspar Goodwood, an old friend from America, arrives and proposes as well; and her cousin Ralph, realizing that his wretched physical health disqualifies him from romance, secretly tries to arrange Isabel's life for her by having his father write Isabel into his will. Isabel, desperate to remain independent, and sensing the danger to her own intellectual growth and development, takes leave of her uncle's home and embarks on a tour of Europe.

Later, after having inherited the bulk of her uncle's estate, Isabel does finally fall prey to the designs of others: manipulated by the glamorous socialite Madame Merle into marrying Gilbert Osmond, Isabel spends the second half of the novel struggling to choose between her desire to be free and her sense of obligation toward Osmond's young daughter, Pansy. Osmond, a brooding American expatriate and sometime art collector, sees Isabel as little more than another object in his collection and as a means to financial stability, while the innocent Pansy relies on her adopted mother to protect her interests.

As one early reviewer in The Atlantic Monthly noted, "One can repeat almost in a single breath the incidental story of the book." What matters most in the novel are not the mere events but rather the internal struggles Isabel endures in order to discover her own identity. As James explained in the famous preface to his 1908 edition of the novel, his goal was to trace the psychological development of his heroine: "Place the centre of the subject in the young woman's own consciousness; I said to myself, 'and you get as interesting and as beautiful a difficulty as you could wish.'" This focus on the inner workings of a character's mind as opposed to what happens to that character externally represents a new development in late-nineteenth-century fiction, one that James continued to pursue throughout the remainder of his career in novels such as The Ambassadors, The Wings of the Dove, and The Golden Bowl, and that ultimately influenced important later writers including James Joyce, Virginia Wolfe, Katherine Anne Porter, and William Faulkner.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Henry James's The Portrait of a Lady. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999.

Edel, Leon. Henry James: A Life. New York: Harper & Row, 1985.

James, Henry. The Portrait of a Lady. New York: Norton, 1995.

Porte, Joel, ed. New Essays on The Portrait of a Lady. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Powell, John Wesley (1834–1902) geologist, ethnologist, nonfiction writer

John Wesley Powell was born in Mount Morris (now a part of New York City) but was raised in Illinois, where he exhibited an intense interest in geology, serving as secretary of that state's Society of Natural History. During his service in the CIVIL WAR, he rose to the rank of major and lost his right arm at the Battle of Shiloh (1862). Afterward he joined the staff of Illinois Wesleyan University at Bloomington as a professor of geology, a post he held while leading geological expeditions into Colorado, Utah, and Arizona. In 1869 he headed a three-month, one-thousand-mile-long geographical and geological survey of the Colorado River and Grand Canyon under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution. He memorialized his observations and experiences on this and a second trip two years later in Exploration of the Colorado River of the West and Its Tributaries (1875), later revised and republished as the scientific but vividly written Canyons of the Colorado (1895). His reconciliation of conflicting surveys of the American West helped bring about the formation of the U.S. Geological Survey, for which Powell served as director from 1881 to 1894. He also wrote Introduction to the Study of Indian Languages (1877) and the landmark Report on the Lands of the Arid Region of the United States (1878). In addition, Powell directed the U.S. Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution from 1879 to 1902. His scientific rigor and organizational powers shaped government policies toward reclamation and conservation in a process that has come to be known as the “second opening of the West.”

Sources

- Aton, James M. John Wesley Powell. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1994.
- Stegner, Wallace. Beyond the Hundredth Meridian: John Wesley Powell and the Second Opening of the West. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1954.
- Worster, Donald. A River Running West: The Life of John Wesley Powell. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Pragmatism

William JAMES defined pragmatism as a mode of thought that arose from the inadequacies of rationalism and empiricism. Instead of putting faith in the abstract ideas of rationalism or in the a priori concepts that empiricists consider useful, the pragmatist, James argued, discovers ideas in action. James identified pragmatism as an organizing tool that, rather than acting as a solution to problems, “unstiffens all our theories, limbers them up, and sets each one at work.” His notion that truth was “instrumental”—that is, derived from experience—became a driving tenet of John DEWEY’s educational philosophy.

The term pragmatic is often used to describe a distinctively American brand of thought that prefers concrete outcomes to abstract arguments or theories. Learning by doing is another way of describing pragmatism. Much of American literature reflects a pragmatic bias, with characters developing their ideas from their experiences in society. By the same token, American authors also have revealed the limitations of pragmatism. Henry JAMES’s novels, for example, might be said to refute his older brother’s pragmatism. In James’s THE PORTRAIT OF A LADY (1881), Isabel Archer relies too heavily on her ability to learn from her own experience and rejects the more traditional counsel of those grounded in European culture.

Sources

- Cormier, Harvey. The Truth Is What Works: William James, Pragmatism, and the Seed of Death. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001.
- Levin, Jonathan. The Poetics of Transition: Emerson, Pragmatism, & American Literary Modernism. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999.
- Menand, Louis. The Metaphysical Club. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2001.

The Prairie

See LEATHER-STOCKING TALES.

Prescott, William Hickling (1796–1859) historian

Born in Salem, Massachusetts, William Hickling Prescott received his B.A. and M.A. degrees from Harvard in 1814 and 1817. A childhood accident left him nearly blind, but he was determined to pursue a literary career. As a young adult Prescott set off for Europe, in part, hoping to find a doctor who could restore his eyesight. He steeped himself in Spanish history while writing articles and reviews later collected in Biographical and Critical Miscellanies (1845).

Prescott’s three-volume History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic appeared in 1838. Like Francis PARKMAN, Prescott wrote in a grand Romantic style that included picturesque scenes and a novelistic narrative. In 1843 he published another three-volume history, The Conquest of Mexico, an epic work critics have compared to the novels of Sir Walter Scott. Prescott was admired for his character portraits, especially those of Cortes and Montezuma. Prescott nearly equaled his earlier triumphs with a two-volume History of the Conquest of Peru (1847), this time centering his narrative on Pizarro. Despite failing health that made it difficult for him to command all the primary sources required for his histories, Prescott managed to publish the three-volume History of the Reign of Philip the Second, King of Spain in 1855–1858.

Sources

- Darnell, Donald G. William Hickling Prescott. Boston: Twayne, 1975.
- Gardiner, C. Harvey. William Hickling Prescott: A Biography. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1969.
- Levin, David. History as Romantic Art: Bancroft, Prescott, Motley, and Parkman. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1959.

The Prince and the Pauper by Samuel L. Clemens (London: Chatto & Windus, 1881; Boston: Osgood, 1882) novel

Written after considerable research into English history, The Prince and the Pauper: A Tale for Young People of All Ages was Clemens’s first historical romance. Set in England in the year 1547, the novel imagines an accidental switch of places between two teenage boys, Prince Edward and a commoner named Tom Canty. When King Henry VIII dies, Tom is declared the new king, while Edward is involved in a series of perilous adventures in the English countryside. In the end, the identities are restored, but not before the boys have gained valuable insight into each other’s lives. For Edward the experience has been especially powerful, and his reign is marked by efforts to relieve the oppression of society’s underclasses.

Clemens dedicated the book to his daughters, and he consciously aimed to produce a work that family and critics would find unobjectionable. It succeeded in drawing positive reviews, though sales were only middling. Clemens’s wife, Livy, adapted the story into a play that the family enjoyed performing. Many commercial adaptations have followed, and the book has remained popular as a children's novel. Modern assessments usually regard The Prince and the Pauper as a less successful treatment of many of the themes that Clemens more satisfactorily addresses in his later works, especially ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884) and A CONNECTICUT YANKEE IN KING ARTHUR'S COURT (1889).

Sources

Clemens, Samuel L. The Prince and the Pauper, edited by Victor Fischer and Lin Salamo. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979.

Towers, Tom H. "The Prince and the Pauper: Mark Twain's Once and Future King," Studies in American Fiction, 6 (1978): 193–202.

—Brett Barney

Pudd'nhead Wilson by Samuel L. Clemens (London: Chatto & Windus, 1894) novel

Set in the 1830s in Dawson's Landing, Missouri, on the Mississippi River, Samuel L. CLEMENS's The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson and the Comedy of Those Extraordinary Twins is a critical examination of slavery. The novel was originally serialized in CENTURY MAGAZINE from December 1893 to June 1894. The central plot concerns two babies born on the same day: one is the legitimate son of a white slave owner, the other is the product of miscegenation. Roxy, a slave who is one-sixteenth black and mother of the slave boy, fears that her son Chambers will be sold, so she switches him with the true heir, Tom.

In parallel plotlines, Pudd'nhead Wilson, a Northerner, comes to town to work as a lawyer, and the twins Luigi and Angelo, who claim to be heirs of an Italian nobleman, also show up in town. The three plotlines come together at the end of the novel when the grown "Tom" murders his uncle with a knife belonging to the twins. Pudd'nhead Wilson, using fingerprints as evidence, reveals "Tom" to be the murderer, and more importantly, discovers Tom's and Chambers's real identities. Exposed as a slave, the former "Tom" is "sold down the river," while "Chambers" is reinstated as the heir. However, having grown up a slave with black speech patterns, he cannot conform to white society. Written after Clemens had experienced personal financial losses and witnessed the failure of Reconstruction, the novel expresses pessimism about the possibilities for racial equality. In exploring the effects of slavery on both slaves and owners, the novel portrays individuals unable to overcome their environments, racial prejudice, and social customs.

Source

Gillman, Susan, and Forrest G. Robinson, eds. Mark Twain's Pudd'nhead Wilson: Race, Conflict, and Culture. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.

—Y. P. Renfro

Pulitzer, Joseph (1847–1911) journalist, editor

Born in Hungary, Joseph Pulitzer came to the United States in 1864, when he served in the Union army for a year during the CIVIL WAR. Afterward he became a reporter for a German newspaper in St. Louis, the Westliche Post, of which he later became part owner. In 1869 Pulitzer was elected to the Missouri legislature, where he earned a reputation as a liberal reformer. In 1878 he purchased the St. Louis Dispatch, transforming it into one of the most profitable newspapers in what was then the West. In 1883, after an editorial campaign against corruption resulted in a shooting in the newspaper offices, Pulitzer left for New York City. Once there, he bought the New York World and in seven years increased circulation of the paper tenfold through such means as illustrations, aggressive news coverage, and publicity stunts.

After 1895, when William Randolph Hearst established his New York Journal, Pulitzer resorted to more-drastic measures to outdo this rival, engaging in the kind of sensationalism and emotional exploitation that came to be known as "yellow journalism." Following the Spanish-American War, during which the rivalry reached fever pitch, the World became subdued, ultimately becoming the premier Democratic paper in the country.

Elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1885, Pulitzer served only briefly. He retired from public life in 1890 because of partial blindness and failing health. Upon his death, he left a $2.5 million bequest to the Columbia University School of Journalism for the establishment of the Pulitzer Prizes, annual awards for journalism and literature.

Sources

Brian, Denis. Pulitzer: A Life. New York: J. Wiley, 2001.

Juergens, George. Joseph Pulitzer and the New York World. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1966.

Rammelkamp, Julian S. Pulitzer's Post-Dispatch, 1878–1883. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Swanberg, W. A. Pulitzer. New York: Scribner, 1967.

"The Purloined Letter" by Edgar Allan Poe (1844)

short story

Edgar Allan POE once wrote, "'The Purloined Letter' . . . is perhaps the best of my tales of ratiocination." This third and final adventure of C. Auguste Dupin (after "THE MURDERS IN THE RUE MORGUE" and "The Mystery of Marie Roget") pits the master detective against Minister D—, a sinister blackmailer, and Monsieur G—, the prefect of police. A letter has been stolen from a "personage of exalted station"—most likely the Queen of France. The police know that Minister D— is keeping it somewhere in his apartment but cannot locate its hiding place, despite several searches. The prefect is desperate to collect the sizable reward being offered for the letter's safe return, and, as a last resort, he approaches Dupin, who deduces that it is lying in plain sight on an open rack, where no one would think to look. Before telling the prefect of its location, Dupin substitutes the letter for another in which he jeers at Monsieur G—. By the time the authorities arrive at Minister D—'s, Dupin has already returned the letter to the Queen for no other reward than the satisfaction of having outsmarted the police and their methods.

—Mark Graham

Putnam's Monthly Magazine (1853–1870; 1906–1910) periodical

Putnam's Monthly Magazine was founded in New York City in 1853 by George P. Putnam. The 120-page magazine published new work, most of it by American authors and always anonymously. Contributors included Herman MELVILLE, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, James Russell LOWELL, Henry David THOREAU, James Fenimore COOPER, and William Cullen BRYANT. When Putnam's publishing company ran into financial difficulty in 1855, he sold the magazine, which was edited by Charles F. BRIGGS and associate editor George William CURTIS. In 1857 it merged with Emerson's United States Magazine and was published as Emerson's Magazine and Putnam's Monthly until November 1858. Revived by Curtis and Briggs under the title Putnam's Magazine in January 1868, the magazine published writers such as Frank R. STOCKTON and William Dean HOWELLS. Putnam's Magazine merged with SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY at the end of 1870.

G. P. Putnam's Sons (1872– ) publishing house

The Putnam family's involvement in publishing began when, in 1833, George Palmer Putnam joined the John Wiley and George Long publishing firm, becoming a partner in 1838. Like his sons after him, Putnam was a leading advocate for the adoption of an international COPYRIGHT agreement. A half century before such a law required it, Wiley and Putnam routinely compensated the British authors whose works they published. In 1848 the firm divided, with Putnam assuming control over the literary publications. This firm, under the name George Palmer Putnam, republished Washington IRVING'S SKETCH BOOK and acted as first-time publisher of several of the revered American author's later works. Other noteworthy publications during this period included James Russell LOWELL'S A FABLE FOR CRITICS (1848), Francis PARKMAN'S The California and Oregon Trail (1849; see THE OREGON TRAIL), William Cullen BRYANT'S Letters of a Traveller (1850), Susan WARNER'S THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD (1851), and Herman MELVILLE'S ISRAEL POTTER (1855).

The company began publishing PUTNAM'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE in 1853 with the high-minded goal of publishing the works of American authors only, but abandoned the project after only a few years. After George P. Putnam's death in 1872, the firm assumed the name G. P. Putnam's Sons under the leadership of George Haven Putnam, who ran the firm for more than half a century. Under his leadership the company published mainly nonfictional works. Putnam's continued as one of the foremost champions of an international copyright agreement, and the eventual passage of the 1891 International Copyright Convention owed much to Putnam's efforts.

The company was involved in several mergers following the death of George H. Putnam in 1930 and again in the last half of the twentieth century, though the company name has survived. As of 2007 G. P. Putnam's is an imprint of the Penguin Group, owned by London-based media conglomerate Pearson Plc.

Sources

Greenspan, Ezra. George Palmer Putnam, Representative American Publisher. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2000.

Greenspan, ed. The House of Putnam, 1837–1872: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 254. Detroit: Gale Group, 2002.

Putnam, George Haven. A Memoir of George Palmer Putnam, Together with a Record of the Publishing House Founded by Him. New York: Putnam, 1903.

—Brett Barney

Pal Joey by John O'Hara (New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1940) story collection

A series of epistolary stories about a corrupt nightclub entertainer, these bragging letters from Joey Evans were influenced by Ring LARDNER's YOU KNOW ME AL. After book publication of the fourteen stories, O'HARA used his character for the successful 1940 Rodgers & Hart musical (see LORENZ HART), which was regarded as shocking but became a theatrical standard.

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J., ed. John O'Hara: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 324 (Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2006).

Pale Horse, Pale Rider by Katherine Anne Porter (1938) novella

Originally published in The Southern Review, Katherine Anne PORTER's Pale Horse, Pale Rider is set in Denver, Colorado, during the 1918 influenza epidemic and the final months of WORLD WAR I. The story unfolds through the consciousness of Miranda Gay, a reporter for a Denver newspaper. Gravely ill with influenza, she faces death and wills herself live in order to be with her soldier-lover, Adam. While Miranda is slowly recovering, Adam himself dies from the disease.

The influenza epidemic and the Great War are entwined in Miranda's consciousness, the epidemic a fitting metaphor for the sickness of war. Written on the eve of WORLD WAR II, the novella explores the power of love, the loss of innocence, the cruelty of war, and the opposing values of the physical and spiritual. Porter collected it with Noon

Wine and Old Mortality in Pale Horse, Pale Rider: Three Short Novels (1939).

Source

Unrue, Darlene Harbour. Understanding Katherine Anne Porter. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.
—Darlene Harbour Unrue

Parish, Mitchell (1900–1993) lyricist

Born in Lithuania, Michael Hyman Peretz immigrated with his family at the age of seven months to America, settling first in Louisiana, where the family changed its name to Parish. When Michael was three, the family moved to New York's Lower East Side. Parish grew up in poverty, but at the High School of Commerce, he learned to love the poetry of George Gordon, Lord Byron, Percy Bysshe Shelley, and A. C. Swinburne and to write light verse. Determined to become a physician, he enrolled in Columbia University and supported himself with a job as a hospital aide. When songs he wrote for a hospital benefit show caught the attention of music publisher Irving Mills, Parish accepted Mills's offer to work as a staff writer, dropped out of Columbia, and changed his first name to Mitchell.

Parish had his first success as a lyric writer in 1928 when he set words to Cliff Burwell's melody for "Sweet Lorraine." He then had his greatest success when he set lyrics to a jazz instrumental by Hoagy Carmichael. "Star Dust," published in 1929, became one of the greatest standards in American popular-song history. Mitchell Parish continued his success by setting lyrics to jazz instrumentals, such as Duke Ellington's "Mood Indigo" (1931) and "Sophisticated Lady" (1933). He also had hits with Frank Perkins on “Stars Fell on Alabama” (1934), Glenn Miller on “Moonlight Serenade” (1939), and Peter De Rose on “Deep Purple” (1939). Although Parish occasionally had one of his songs interpolated into a stage musical, his artistry lay in adding lyrics to songs that had already succeeded as instrumentals, such as Leroy Anderson’s “Sleigh Ride” (1950) and “Blue Tango” (1952). He was equally successful in creating English lyrics to foreign hits, most notably “Volaré” (1958). Such lyrics reflect Parish’s workmanlike approach to his craft; as he once told an interviewer who had asked him about artistic inspiration, “the only time a songwriter gets up in the middle of the night is to go to the bathroom.”

—Philip Furia

Parker, Dorothy (1893–1967) short-story writer, poet, screenwriter, critic

*Say I'm neither brave nor young,
Say I woo and coddle care,
Say the devil touched my tongue—
Still you have my heart to wear.
But say my verses do not scan,
And I get me another man!*

—“Fighting Words” (1926)

Dorothy Parker (née Rothschild) was born to a stern Jewish father but attended a Catholic school at her stepmother’s insistence. In 1917 she married Edwin Parker shortly before he shipped off to France to fight in WORLD WAR I. He returned from the war a morphine addict. In 1919 while working for VANITY FAIR magazine she began a lifelong friendship with humorist Robert Benchley. In the early 1920s Parker, Benchley, Alexander WOOLLCOTT, and other arts critics became famous as the ALGONQUIN ROUND TABLE, a group of witty tastemakers named for the Manhattan hotel where they would often lunch. During the 1920s Parker attempted suicide twice. In 1927 Parker became politically aware while protesting the execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (see SACCO-VANZETTI CASE).

She divorced her husband in 1928 after a long separation. She married actor Alan Campbell in 1933 who later became her screenwriting partner. They divorced in 1947 and remarried in 1950. (Campbell committed suicide in 1963.) Beginning in the 1930s Parker began to work regularly as a screenwriter in Hollywood, where she also continued her political activism, working primarily for screenwriter unionization and against European fascism. She visited Madrid in 1937 during the Spanish Civil War which inspired her story “Soldiers of the Republic” (1938). In 1949 she was blacklisted in Hollywood as a Communist sympathizer. She then returned to New York where she collaborated on several theater projects and worked as a book reviewer. She died of a heart attack in 1967.

Dorothy Parker enjoyed a varied career. She worked as a poet, essayist, magazine editor, theater and book critic, playwright, short-story writer, lyricist, and screenwriter. She began her career in the 1910s as a magazine editor and theater and book critic. She soon gained popularity as a contributor of satiric essays and witty light verse to popular magazines. She wrote three successful volumes of satiric poetry Enough Rope (1926), Sunset Gun (1928), and Death and Taxes (1931). She collaborated with Elmer Rice on the play Close Harmony, or the Lady Next Door (produced 1924), and in 1925 she served as one of the founding editors of THE NEW YORKER magazine. In the late 1920s she established herself as a short-story writer. Her most famous story “Big Blonde,” which won the O. Henry Award for best story in 1929, records the self-destructive behavior of an aging JAZZ AGE flapper. Parker collected her short stories in Laments for the Living (1930) and After Such Pleasures (1933). Unlike many of her literary contemporaries who went to Hollywood to work on movies, Parker enjoyed a successful career as a screenwriter. She and her husband Alan Campbell contributed to several screenplays, including the original version of A Star Is Born (1937). In 1954 Parker and Arnaud d’Usseau premiered The Ladies of the Corridor, a drama of lonely single women living in a Manhattan residential hotel.

Burton Rascoe, a fellow member of the Algonquin Round Table, described Parker’s stories as “character etchings” of “brevity, clarity, point, incisiveness, sympathy.” In Parker’s fiction romantic love is not required. Her women characters attract men with their wit and beauty but insist on a reciprocal passion, which is always denied. Although often rendered with humor, her stories project a misanthropy and pessimism. Her jokes are usually malicious and misogynistic. She often ridicules her female characters for their stupidity and sentimental foolishness. Playwright Lillian HELLMAN described her stories, particularly “Big Blonde,” as “imaginative projections of what she knew or feared for herself.” Parker’s verse especially exhibits a high level of self-loathing and fatalism as in “Inventory”: “Three be the things I’ll have till I die: / Laughter and hope and a sock in the eye.” Although regarded today primarily as a short-story writer and satiric poet, her literary criticism is acute and insightful. She recognized earlier than her contemporaries the significance of F. Scott FITZGERALD, Ernest HEMINGWAY, Dashiell HAMMETT, and John O’HARA.

Source

Meade, Marion. Dorothy Parker: What Fresh Hell is This? New York: Villard Books, 1987.

—Park Bucker

Parrington, Vernon (1871–1929) literary scholar

Vernon Louis Parrington, who taught at the University of Washington, is best known for his three-volume study, Main Currents in American Thought (1927–1930), for which he won a PULITZER PRIZE. His work was primarily historical, with little discussion of literary form or style, but Parrington was concerned with the material conditions of society that produced or provided the context for literature and examined ideas that informed works of literature. Parrington became a target of New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM) and of Lionel TRILLING, who believed Parrington's conception of literature was too narrow and paid insufficient attention to aesthetics. Nevertheless, Parrington was the first scholar in the academy to provide an overarching interpretation of the national literature.

Sources

- Hall, H. Lark. V. L. Parrington: Through the Avenue of Art. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1994.
- Hofstadter, Richard. The Progressive Historians: Turner, Beard, Parrington. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1968.

Partisan Review (1934–2003) periodical

Established by William Phillips and Philip RAHV as a radical Marxist-oriented journal, Partisan Review originally was subtitled "A Bi-Monthly of Revolutionary Literature." Phillips recalled, "We had the idea of launching a new literary movement, combining older with younger talents, and the best of the new radicalism with the innovative energy of modernism." The journal was reorganized in 1937 when editors Phillips and Rahv broke with Communism while remaining Marxists. Partisan Review was the most influential radical intellectual journal of the 1930s, and its impact on American cultural life continued into the 1960s. It promoted some of the most important European and American writers, including Lionel TRILLING, Hannah Arendt, Mary McCarthy, Saul Bellow, and Susan Sontag.

Sources

- Cooney, Terry A. The Rise of the New York Intellectuals: Partisan Review and Its Circle. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986.
- Phillips, William. A Partisan View: Five Decades of the Literary Life. New York: Stein & Day, 1983.

Patchen, Kenneth (1911–1972) poet

From a working-class Ohio family, Patchen attended the University of Wisconsin for a year but dropped out to ramble about the United States and Canada, doing odd jobs and writing. He began his prolific career with Before the Brave (1936), a collection of passionate proletarian verse. Patchen formed a lifelong friendship with publisher James LAUGHLIN, whose NEW DIRECTIONS brought out many of his books, beginning with his second collection, First Will & Testament (1939). In the 1950s Patchen became an important figure in the San Francisco Poetry Renaissance and was seen as an elder statesman of the avant-garde by young writers such as Allen Ginsberg. The Beats claimed Patchen's poetry as well as his experimental prose works, including The Journal of Albion Moonlight (1941), which employs a STREAM-OF-CONSCIOUSNESS technique, The Memoirs of a Shy Pornographer (1945), and Sleepers Awake (1946), as part of their literary heritage.

Sources

- Nelson, Raymond. Kenneth Patchen and American Mysticism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Smith, Larry. Kenneth Patchen: Rebel Poet in America. Huron, Ohio: Bottom Dog Press, 2000.

—Tilly Newell

Penrod by Booth Tarkington (Garden City, N.Y.:

Doubleday, Page, 1914) novel

Penrod Schofield, eleven, is imaginative, loveable, ingenuous, mischievous, and harmless. In a series of loosely related episodes, Penrod writes an adventure story, dresses inappropriately at a school pageant, uses money meant for church to attend the movies, daydreams in class and lies comically when caught, becomes ill from childish gluttony, and succeeds in defeating a goody-goody boy to win his childhood love. After he and his friend Sam deflate the egos of some pompous neighbors, their fathers secretly give them quarters.

For decades a popular boy's book, Penrod made TARKINGTON richer and more famous than did his more "serious" fiction (which won two PULITZER PRIZES). Its reputation diminished because times changed, and Penrod is less complexly imagined than The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, to which it nonetheless bears some resemblances.

—Roger Lathbury

The People, Yes by Carl Sandburg (New York:

Harcourt, Brace, 1936) poem

Like Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass, Carl SANDBURG's The People, Yes is a work about the American people and their experience. Writing in part in response to the economic inequities revealed by the GREAT DEPRESSION, Sandburg composed this epic prose poem over an eight-year period, using the American vernacular and drawing on history as well as contemporary events, incorporating vignettes and anecdotes, to address the good and bad of what constitutes America. The tone of the poem is confident and optimistic, as Sandburg answers his question "What else can be done?" with an assurance: "'We have come far and we are going farther yet.' / . . . Man is a long time coming / Man will yet win." The question that appears at the beginning and end of the work—"Where to? what next?"—indicates the questing spirit that animates the people in the development of their country. Although The People, Yes was popular with readers, Sandburg was disappointed with the response of critics, who he believed were too bound by “the existing prejudices and quirks regarding poetry.” He called the poem the “best memorandum I could file for the present stress.”

—Skye L. Suttie

Perelman, S. J. (1904–1979) humorist

Sidney Joseph Perelman graduated from Brown University, where he made friends with Nathanael WEST. Although his early ambition was to be a cartoonist, Perelman began writing for the college magazine and after graduation continued to develop his art of the short comic sketch for magazines such as Judge and College Humor. The first of many collections of his work, Dawn Ginsbergh's Revenge, was published in 1929. He became a lifelong contributor to THE NEW YORKER, placing his first work with the magazine in 1934. In exuberant parodies, often full of puns and word play, Perelman poked fun at contemporary culture and institutions, satirizing virtually anything that was popular and successful—such as novels, Hollywood, and advertising. Perelman also wrote for the stage, including One Touch of Venus (produced 1943), a comic musical co-authored with Ogden NASH, and the movies, winning an Oscar for his screenplay for Around the World in Eighty Days (1956).

Sources

Gale, Steven H., ed. S. J. Perelman: Critical Essays. New York: Garland, 1992.

Herrman, Dorothy. S. J. Perelman: A Life. New York: Putnam, 1986.

Perkins, Maxwell E. (1884–1947) editor

The legendary Maxwell Perkins remains the only literary editor known to students and scholars because of the stable of geniuses he recruited and encouraged at CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS. Harvard educated, Perkins joined Scribners in 1910 and rose to the position of head editor and vice president of the house. His first discovery was F. Scott FITZGERALD, whose first novel, THIS SIDE OF PARADISE, Perkins persuaded Charles Scribner II to publish in 1920. Fitzgerald brought Ernest HEMINGWAY and Ring LARDNER to Scribners. Because of Perkins's labors to publish Thomas WOLFE's unpublishable manuscripts, the editor acquired a distorted reputation as a collaborator. His strengths were the ability to recognize geniuses and encourage them. He did not rewrite their work. Reportedly a misogynist, Perkins built a list of notable women authors, included Caroline GORDON, Marcia Davenport, and Marjorie Kinnan RAWLINGS.

Sources

Berg, Scott. Max Perkins: Editor of Genius. New York: Dutton, 1978.

Brucoli, Matthew J., with Judith S. Baughman, eds. The Sons of Maxwell Perkins: Letters of F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, Thomas Wolfe, and Their Editor. Columbia, S.C.: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.

Delaney, John, ed. The House of Scribner, 1905–1930: An Illustrated Chronicle, Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 16. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1997.

—Morris Colden

The Petrified Forest by Robert E. Sherwood (produced 1935) play

Robert E. Sherwood, who studied drama with George Pierce Baker at Yale before serving in WORLD WAR I, often addressed antiwar sentiments in his work. The Petrified Forest, which opened on January 7, 1935, at the Broadhurst Theatre for a run of 197 performances, explores the intellectual and spiritual petrification of modern life amid the desperation of the GREAT DEPRESSION in the wake of one world war and the approach of another.

Set in the Black Mesa Bar-B-Q, a dusty roadside café in Arizona, the play brings together an assortment of idealists and pragmatists. Alan Squier, a down-and-out intellectual and pacifist whose ideals have faded since World War I, is invigorated by the purity and optimism of Gaby Maple, the idealistic daughter of the café's owner. When the brutal gangster Duke Mantee and his gang arrive and hold the café's patrons hostage, Squier and Mantee debate their differing philosophies of survival in a treacherous world, leading Squier to an act of self-sacrifice for Gaby. The Petrified Forest was made into a successful movie by Warner Bros. in 1936. Sherwood, who had established his career with The Road to Rome (produced 1927), a pacifist comedy set in ancient times, went on to win three PULITZER PRIZES for Idiot's Delight (produced 1936), Abe Lincoln in Illinois (produced 1938), and There Shall Be No Night (produced 1940), but The Petrified Forest remains his most enduring dramatic achievement.

Sources

Brown, John Mason. The Ordeal of a Playwright: Robert E. Sherwood and the Challenge of War. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.

Meserve, Walter J. Robert E. Sherwood: Reluctant Moralist. New York: Pegasus, 1970.

—James Fisher

The Philadelphia Story by Philip Barry (produced 1939) play

Philip BARRY's comedy of manners deals with the transformation of socialite Tracy Lord from a judgmental snob into a tolerant human being. Tracy divorced her first husband, the wealthy dandy C. K. Dexter Haven, because she could not accept his drinking. As the play opens, she is engaged to George Kittredge, a man of humble origins who covets prestige, but she falls for the intellectual reporter Mike Connor and has a tryst with him just before her wedding. George condemns Tracy's indiscretion, but Dexter tolerates her human weakness. Tracy realizes that she prefers Dexter to her other suitors and remarries him, promising to be more forgiving of his faults in the future. Barry wrote and set The Philadelphia Story during the GREAT DEPRESSION, a fact that informs the play's discussion of social class. While the play shows that it is not status but integrity of character that determines whether someone is a good person, it makes an ambiguous comment about class since—by choosing Dexter over George or Mike—Tracy reunites with her social equal. Katharine Hepburn played Tracy on Broadway and in the 1940 movie version. The success of The Philadelphia Story helped reestablish Hepburn and Barry as vital forces in the American theater.

Sources

Cavell, Stanley. Pursuits of Happiness: The Hollywood Comedy of Remarriage. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1981.

—Claudia Wilsch Case

Phillips, David Graham (1867–1911) journalist, novelist

Phillips was educated at Princeton and became an influential New York journalist. In the first decade of the twentieth century he devoted himself to MUCKRAKING. He published a series called The Treason of the Senate in Cosmopolitan in 1906, as well as a play and a succession of twenty-three “problem” novels dealing with contemporary social ills. Most of the latter—with titles such as The Great God Success (1901), Golden Fleece (1903), Light-Fingered Gentry (1907), and The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig (1909)—concern greed and corruption in the private and public lives of the privileged.

Beginning in 1908, when he published his play The Worth of a Woman, Phillips turned increasingly to the subject of the “new woman” and society's changing attitudes towards her. His most important work, the novel Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise (1917), tells the story of a country girl who achieves success as an urban prostitute. The strength of Susan Lenox led some to compare Phillips with the French writers Honoré de Balzac and Emile Zola. Shortly after completing Susan Lenox, which was published posthumously, Phillips was murdered in New York by a madman who believed that the novelist had maligned his sister in The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig.

Sources

Filler, Louis. Voice of the Democracy: A Critical Biography of David Graham Phillips, Journalist, Novelist, Progressive. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1978.

Ravitz, Abe C. David Graham Phillips. New York: Twayne, 1966.

Poetry

Walt Whitman died in 1892, but the spirit that defined his career—the willingness to break with the traditions and conventions of the past and forge a new direction—continued to animate American poetry in the decades after his death, particularly after the end of WORLD WAR I in the era of MODERNISM.

From 1895 to 1915 the most notable poets writing in America—Edwin Arlington ROBINSON, Edgar Lee MASTERS, and Robert FROST—were associated with particular localities and regions. Many of Robinson's best-known poems are poetic sketches of the inhabitants of the fictional Tilbury Town, based on Gardiner, Maine, where he grew up. His poem “RICHARD CORY” (1897), about the suicide of a well-to-do man who seems to have everything, represents a new tone in American poetry. The community envies Cory, and yet this elegant man's life has seemed to him a sham. The sometimes sardonic dramatic monologues, or “epitaphs,” Masters collected in his SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY (1915) were inspired by his recollections of small-town life in Illinois. And the setting for most of Frost's poetry is rural New England, where he had lived much of his life. These poets rejected sentimentality and examined nature and small-town life with precision, irony, and sometimes with humor, often focusing on individuals who felt alienated from their communities and finding larger meanings in everyday existence.

While Frost's poetry often seems to embrace New England life, much of his verse has dark intimations. “MENDING WALL” (1914), one of his best-known poems, may be read as affirming that man is “an old-stone savage armed” whose mind is bound by convention. Frost sometimes seeks solace in nature, but in a poem such as “Design” (1936) he finds the implications of a created nature terrifying. His verse, which is subtly innovative in its use of traditional meter and rhyme, is also ambiguous and fraught with uncertainty when it speaks of a humankind that can see “neither far out nor in deep.”

Especially in the early years of the twentieth century, innovative poets in the United States had difficulty in achieving recognition because literary journals were generally conservative. Frost wrote in obscurity for years and only achieved recognition in his native country when he was forty years old—after he had moved to England for a few years and had his first books, A Boy's Will (1913) and North of Boston (1914), published in London. One of the earliest Americans to choose to live abroad was the Idaho-born poet Ezra POUND. Deciding early on that the Old World was more conducive to his career as a poet and translator, Pound sailed for Europe in 1908 when he was twenty-two. A catalyst for modernism, Pound befriended and aided Frost, whose originality he recognized, as well as other important American poets who were living as expatriates, H.D. (see Hilda DOOLITTLE), and, most importantly, T. S. ELIOT.

Pound's most direct early influence on American poetry was through POETRY: A MAGAZINE OF VERSE, which was founded in 1912 by Harriet MONROE in Chicago—something of a hub of poetic activity in the years before the war (see CHICAGO RENAISSANCE). Not bound by any particular approach and open to experimental work, Poetry published a diverse array of poets, including William Carlos WILLIAMS, Carl SANDBURG, Marianne MOORE, Vachel LINDSAY, and Hart CRANE. Pound was one of the first contributors to Poetry and served as a foreign editor for the magazine, sending Monroe poems by H.D., Eliot, William Butler Yeats, and Amy LOWELL. He coined the term IMAGISM, defining an image as “that which presents a intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time.” Lowell, a wealthy socialite and self-taught poet with a gift for marketing, became the foremost champion of Imagism, elaborating its doctrine and promoting its authors.

The Great War was the galvanizing event that ushered in the modern era in American poetry, for as Pound wrote in his poem Hugh Selwyn Mauberly (1920), its devastation revealed “a botched civilization,” calling the values and practices of the past into question and revealing the need for new approaches in art. The landmark poem of modernism, and for many critics the most important poem of the twentieth century, is T. S. Eliot's THE WASTE LAND (1922), which he dedicated to Pound. An American who chose to live in England and became a British citizen, Eliot had earlier written “THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK” (1915), a poem often cited as the first modernist poem because the character of Prufrock—self-conscious, obsessed, anxious about sex, his own mortality, and overwhelming questions—captured the unsettled spirit of the age. In The Waste Land Eliot picks through personal and cultural wreckage to depict a spiritually barren world in the wake of the war, producing a fragmentary poem that shifts between contemporary and historical settings, eschews traditional meter and rhyme, makes use of slang and several languages, and includes so many mythical allusions that he decided to include notes with his poem when it was published as a book. The Waste Land was so radical a departure from the past that it raised fundamental questions about the nature of poetry.

In the United States after World War I, poetry was as varied as The Waste Land but not at all barren, as many new writers came to the fore. In the hotbed of the jazz culture in New York, African American poets such as Countee CULLEN and Langston HUGHES became important voices in the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Hughes used vernacular speech and patterned his poems with blues stanzas and jazz rhythms. Edna St. Vincent MILLAY, a Greenwich Village bohemian who wrote of her life in the traditional sonnet form, became the first woman to win the PULITZER PRIZE in poetry for her 1923 collection The Harp-Weaver and Other Poems; later

Pulitzers were awarded to historical verse epics by Stephen Vincent BENÉT for John Brown's Body (1928) and Archibald MACLEISH for CONQUISTADOR (1932). E. E. CUMMINGS was beginning his experiments with form and language in which he used typography to create poems as verbal objects. Hart Crane, whose poetry was as difficult and dense with allusions as Eliot's but who saw the world emerging from the war as one of promise and hope, used the Brooklyn Bridge as the central metaphor of his epic poem THE BRIDGE (1930). William Carlos Williams, who rejected Eliot's European sophistication but was greatly influenced by Pound's view of poetry as a hard-edged medium that can express not only feelings but also clearly render objects, became the key figure in the school of OBJECTIVISM, which included Louis ZUKOFSKY, George OPPEN, Carl Rakosi, and Charles REZNIKOFF.

In the South poets such as Allen TATE, John Crowe RANSOM, and Robert Penn WARREN and the other FUGITIVES brought traditionalist southern sensibilities to modernism. They emphasized irony and used well-wrought poems to evoke and critique not only their southern heritage but also the cultural climate of the modern world. These poets attempted to correct the excesses of emotionalism in modern poetry. Each standing alone and apart from other poets of the era, Robinson JEFFERS and Wallace STEVENS pursued their individual visions, with Jeffers writing lyric and narrative poems informed by his doctrine of “Inhumanism” and Stevens searching for “The poem of the mind in the act of finding / What will suffice.”

During the WORLD WAR II years, poets whose careers helped to define American poetry after 1945 were publishing their early work, including John Berryman, Elizabeth Bishop, Randall Jarrell, Robert Lowell, Kenneth Rexroth, and Theodore Roethke. Gwendolyn BROOKS's first book, A Street in Bronzeville (1945), includes poems about black soldiers who fought to preserve a democracy in which they were second-class citizens, capturing the restlessness in African American culture that later developed into the Civil Rights movement. A new era was coming, but the poets who had established their careers between the wars also continued to produce significant works. Eliot published what many critics believe is his greatest poem, FOUR QUARTETS, in 1943. Williams published the first four volumes of his epic Paterson in the years immediately following the war (1946–1951), adding a postscript “Book Five” in 1958. Stevens brought out major collections after the war and published his Collected Poems in 1954. Pound, who was imprisoned as a traitor for the pro-Mussolini radio broadcasts he made and later confined for nearly twelve years in St. Elizabeth's Hospital for the insane, continued to write THE CANTOS—the grand project he had begun to publish in Poetry in 1917—until his death. As a new generation of poets was beginning to find their voices, they continued to have to reckon with the poets who were still shaping modernism in America.

Sources

- Gray, Richard. American Poetry of the Twentieth Century. New York: Longman, 1990.
- Nelson, Cary, ed. Modern American Poetry: An Online Journal and Multimedia Companion to Anthology of Modern American Poetry. <<http://www.english.uiuc.edu/maps/index.htm>> (viewed July 26, 2007).
- Perkins, David. History of Modern Poetry. Two volumes. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976, 1987.
- Rexroth, Kenneth. American Poetry in the Twentieth Century. New York: Herder & Herder, 1971.
- Thomas, Lorenzo. Extraordinary Measures: Afrocentric Modernism and Twentieth-Century America Poetry. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2000.
- Von Hallberg, Robert. American Poetry and Culture. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.

Poetry: A Magazine of Verse (1912– ) periodical

Founded in Chicago by Harriet MONROE, this magazine published many of the important poets who emerged in the first half of the twentieth century, including Ezra POUND, T. S. ELIOT, Wallace STEVENS, William Carlos WILLIAMS, Edna St. Vincent MILLAY, Elinor WYLIE, Robinson JEFFERS, and Marianne MOORE. Monroe sought to create an audience for the new poets she published, taking Walt Whitman's line, "To have great poets there must be great audiences too," as the motto for her magazine. She raised the profile of Poetry by paying all contributors and establishing an annual prize. Under Monroe, Poetry championed IMAGISM, published controversial literary criticism, and generally served as a platform for modernist (see MODERNISM) statements about the function of literature. Monroe died in 1936, but the magazine has continued to publish new and established poets.

Source

- Williams, Ellen. Harriet Monroe and the Poetry Renaissance: The First Ten Years of Poetry, 1912–22. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.

Poetry Society of America (1910– )

Founded to encourage a national poetry renaissance, the Poetry Society of America is the oldest poetry organization in the country. Some of its distinguished early members include W. H. AUDEN, Robert FROST, Langston HUGHES, Edna St. Vincent MILLAY, Marianne MOORE, and Wallace STEVENS. Today the society sponsors regional groups and conferences and suggests candidates for the annual PULITZER PRIZE in poetry.

Sources

- Davidson, Gustav, ed. In Fealty to Apollo: Poetry Society of America, 1910–1950. New York: Fine Editions Press, 1950.

Poetry Society of America <<http://www.poetrysociety.org>>.

Pollyanna by Eleanor H. Porter (Boston: Page, 1913) novel

Originally serialized in the Christian Herald, Porter's novel about an orphaned young girl, Pollyanna, became a phenomenal bestseller. An adept at the "glad game"—a game she learned to play from her late minister father in which one looks for the good in any situation—Pollyanna brings happiness to her stern Aunt Polly and to others she meets. The name of Porter's heroine entered the dictionary to denote a person of "irrepressible optimism"—sometimes irritatingly so. Porter wrote a sequel, Pollyanna Grows Up (1914), also a bestseller, and other writers continued the series.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

Poole, Ernest (1880–1950) novelist, journalist

Educated at Princeton University, Poole began his writing career in New York as a muckraking journalist (see MUCKRAKING MOVEMENT) for McClure's magazine. His first novel, The Voice of the Street (1906), follows the efforts of a poor boy from the LOWER EAST SIDE to raise himself above his class and become a singer. Poole's most famous work is The Harbor (1915), a semiautobiographical novel that documents the activities around the wharves on the East Side. He explored the changing social conditions of New York in His Family (1917), the first novel awarded a PULITZER PRIZE, in which an aristocratic father of three daughters must come to terms with a world in which the rigid class system of his youth has crumbled. As a correspondent covering the Russian Revolution for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, Poole observed the effect of the conflict on the peasantry in articles collected in The Village (1918) and The Dark People (1918). In the novel Blind (1920) a journalist blinded in WORLD WAR I types his story as a form of therapy. Several of Poole's later novels deal with the reactions of European visitors to America. Silent Storms (1927), in which an American financier's young French wife tours the U.S. lecturing against fascism, is notable for its characterization of the principal characters and their conflicting values. Poole also wrote an autobiography, The Bridge (1940).

Source

- Keefer, Truman Frederick. Ernest Poole. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1966.

Poor White by Sherwood Anderson (New York: Huebsch, 1920) novel

Hugh McVey, the "poor white, son of the defeated dreamer by the river, who had forced himself in advance of his fellows along the road of mechanical development," could be the hero of a Horatio Alger novel: born in poverty in a bleak midwestern town, he moves steadily toward financial success through hard work, ingenuity, and luck. Sherwood ANDERSON subverts the Alger myth by exploring the hidden costs of success. By inventing a machine to ease the burdens of cabbage planters, McVey becomes a mythic figure to the townspeople desperate to be freed from agricultural drudgery. In the end, they trade one form of drudgery for another when factories replace cabbage fields.

—Bev Hogue

Porter, Cole (1891–1964) lyricist

It is surely one of the ironies of the musical theater that despite the abundance of Jewish composers, the one who has written the most enduring 'Jewish' music should be an Episcopalian millionaire who was born on a farm in Peru, Indiana.

—Richard Rodgers, Musical Stages (1975)

Cole Albert Porter, who in his life as well as his songs was the epitome of urbane sophistication, was born in the Midwest. His grandfather had made a fortune in the California gold rush and insisted his grandson be trained to take over the family business, but Porter's mother had Cole study piano and violin and sent him to Worcester Academy, an eastern prep school, and then to Yale where he spent much of his time writing songs and musical shows.

To placate his grandfather (and continuing receiving a generous allowance), Porter enrolled in Harvard Law School but did so poorly that the dean had him transferred to the music school. Even though Porter was wealthy enough to live a life of ease, he yearned to be a successful songwriter. He worked tirelessly at his songs yet always maintained the patrician image of tossing off music and lyrics with little apparent effort.

In 1918 in Paris he met Linda Lee Thomas, one of the wealthiest and most beautiful women of the day. She had been abused by her first husband and saw in Porter, ten years her junior and an open homosexual, a talented companion whose career she could help shape. They married in 1919 and Linda asked her friend Irving BERLIN to advise Porter, and the two men, from such different backgrounds, became lifelong friends. As the only two major songwriters of their era to write both music and lyrics, they shared a private joke about collaborative teams such as the Gershwins and Rodgers and Hart (see Ira GERSHWIN and LORENZ HART), saying to each other, "Can you believe it took two men to write one song?"

The Porters traveled extensively and entertained lavishly. At one of their parties Porter played some of his songs for Richard Rodgers. When Rodgers, who had already established himself on Broadway, asked Porter for his formula, Porter explained that since Rodgers, Berlin, and other songwriters were Jews, all he had to do was "write Jewish," by which Rodgers understood him to mean write in the brooding, chromatic, and minor-keyed style of Middle Eastern music. When Porter combined that musical idiom with witty, risqué lyrics, he finally found success on Broadway with such songs as "Let's Do It" (1928), "You Do Something to Me" (1929), and "What Is This Thing Called Love?" (1929).

In the 1930s Porter created a series of successful shows such as Gay Divorce (1932), Anything Goes (1934), and Jubilee (1935), whose glittering, cosmopolitan settings appealed to audiences during the GREAT DEPRESSION. He wrote with equal success in Hollywood for such movie musicals as Born to Dance (1936) and Rosalie (1937). From his shows and movies came "Night and Day" (1932), "I Get a Kick Out of You" (1934), "Just One of Those Things" (1935), "Easy to Love" (1936), "I've Got You Under My Skin" (1936), and other elegantly urbane songs.

In 1937, Porter was horseback riding when his horse fell and rolled over him, crushing both of his legs. A series of operations saved his legs, but for much of the rest of his life he endured excruciating pain and hobbled on crutches. Still, he continued to write for Broadway and Hollywood, creating scores with such songs as "My Heart Belongs to Daddy" (1938), "I Concentrate on You" (1940), and "You'd Be So Nice to Come Home To" (1943). With Rodgers and HAMMERSTEIN's Oklahoma! (1943) and the advent of the integrated musical, in which songs were crafted to fit into the plot, Porter found himself a show-business relic. Never a songwriter who was interested in anchoring his songs into the characters and dramatic situations of the book for a musical, he maintained the old-fashioned notion that a good show was simply a show with a lot of good songs.

In 1948, however, playwright Bella Spewack persuaded him to write the score for a musical based on William Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew, and Porter was inspired by the play's language, story, and characters. Kiss Me, Kate was his greatest musical and produced such integrated songs as "I've Come to Wive It Weathily in Padua" and "Brush Up Your Shakespeare," as well as enduring standards such as "So in Love," "Always True to You in My Fashion," and "Another Op'nin, Another Show." He went on to write successful Broadway musicals such as Can-Can (1953) and Silk Stockings (1955) and movie scores for High Society (1956) and Les Girls (1957) that produced such hit songs as "From This Moment On" (1950), "I Love Paris" (1953), and "All of You" (1955). The deaths of his mother in 1952 and Linda in 1954 removed the two women who had been the major supports of his life. The amputation of his right leg in 1958 broke Porter's spirit, and he ceased to write songs.

Cole Porter's music is among the most complex and intricate in the history of American popular song. His melodies shift keys, revel in chromatics, and draw upon Near Eastern, African, and Latin American models. His lyrics are literate, allusive, and witty. He was the master of the catalog song, which consists of a list of clever images, such as “You’re the Top” (1934), which dizzily piles compliment upon compliment, invoking allusions to the Mona Lisa, the tower of Pisa, and Botticelli but also to such American popular culture items as cellophane, Pepsodent, and Mickey Mouse. His songs also brought a new sensuality into American song, beginning with his first major hit, “Let’s Do It” (1928), where a multitude of creatures—centipedes, katydids, hippopotami, jellyfish—engage in procreation.

Expanding the traditional expressions of romantic love, Porter wrote about prostitution in “Love for Sale” (1930), about love as a masochistic addiction in “I Get a Kick Out of You” (1934) and a passing sexual fling in “Just One of Those Things” (1935) and “It’s All Right with Me” (1953). Along with such witty and erotic lyrics, Porter could also write such simple, melodramatic, and even cloyingly sentimental songs such as “Rosalie” (1937), “Begin the Beguine” (1935), and “True Love” (1956).

Porter was the master of literate wit, elegant sophistication, and sensual passion. He pushed the American popular song to new levels, musically and lyrically. Lyricist Johnny MERCER said that “Cole Porter is distinctive of an era.”

Sources

Citron, Stephen. Noel and Cole: The Sophisticates. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

McBrien, William. Cole Porter: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Schwartz, Charles. Cole Porter: A Biography. New York: Dial, 1977.

—Philip Furia

Porter, Katherine Anne (1890–1980) short-story writer, novelist, essayist, poet

My own habit of writing fiction has provided a wholesome exercise to my natural, incurable tendency to try to wrangle the sprawling mess of our existence in this bloody world into some kind of shape; almost any shape will do, just so it is recognizably made with human hands, one small proof the more of the validity and reality of the human imagination.

—“St. Augustine and the Bullfight” (1970)

Katherine Anne Porter was born in the frontier community of Indian Creek, Texas. Named Callie Russell Porter, she was the fourth child of Mary Alice Jones Porter and Harrison Boone Porter. After the death of his wife, Harrison Porter took his children to Kyle, Texas, to live with his widowed mother, Catharine Ann Skaggs Porter, a strong-willed woman who told her grandchildren romantic stories about her slaveholding family’s life in antebellum Kentucky. Porter absorbed her grandmother’s independence, Victorian manners, Protestant view of good and evil, and the stories from which she later created an important stream in her fictional canon.

Katherine Anne Porter, circa 1962

Between 1901, when her grandmother died, and 1919, when she went to New York, Porter attended the private Thomas School in San Antonio for one year; changed her name to Katherine Anne Porter in honor of her grandmother; married and divorced three times; contracted tuberculosis and spent months in sanitariums; nearly died in the 1918 influenza epidemic; and worked for a year on The Rocky Mountain News in Denver, Colorado, where she honed her writing skills and developed an aesthetic theory.

In Greenwich Village in 1919 and 1920 Porter became well acquainted with writers and editors. She also became friends with Mexican musicians, artists, and poets who encouraged her to go to Mexico, where, they told her, an exciting revolution was taking place. In the fall of 1920 she collected several journalistic assignments and set out on the adventure.

The Texas State Historical Marker near the entrance to Jordan Springs Cemetery, where Porter is buried

When Porter arrived in Mexico, her only publications had been her newspaper pieces, an amateurish poem in a trade journal, and re-told fairy tales. Between fall 1920 and summer 1921, when she returned to the United States, she published in the English-language section of El Heraldo de México reviews and essays that reflected her artistic stance as well as her support for the leftist social revolution in which she played a small part. Initially sympathetic with the revolution, she soon became disillusioned with revolutionary leaders driven by self-interest.

In the 1920s Porter struggled to make a living by her writing, but before 1930 she published only eight stories and a handful of poems, resorting to book reviewing for the most substantial part of her small income. Mexico inspired her first original stories: "María Concepción" (1922), "The Martyr" (1923), and "Virgin Violeta" (1924). In 1927 she began mining her Texas memories and personal experiences and produced the stories "He" (1927), "Magic" (1928), "Rope" (1928), "Theft" (1929), and "The Jilting of Granny Weatherall" (1929). "Flowering Judas," another "Mexican" story, appeared in the Spring 1930 issue of Hound & Horn and became the title story of her first collection, Flowering Judas (1930).

With a Guggenheim Fellowship Porter traveled from Mexico to Europe at the end of summer 1931, and she lived in Paris four years. Between 1935 and 1939 Porter continued to publish stories and novellas based on her personal history. By the end of the decade Porter had published eleven more stories and three novellas; she had married and divorced Eugene Pressly; and she had married editor Albert Erskine, her fifth and last husband, whom she divorced in 1942. In the 1930s Porter introduced her most outwardly autobiographical character, Miranda Gay. In "The Circus" (1935), "The Grave" (1935), and "The Fig Tree" (1960) Miranda appears as a young child experiencing initiation into the adult world, and in the final paragraph of "The Grave" she is revealed twenty years later as an adult woman able to put her childhood experience in perspective. Events in "Old Mortality" (1937) and "Pale Horse, Pale Rider" (1938) trace stages of Miranda's intervening journey. Her story is amplified with her grandmother's old South history, traced in "The Witness" and "The Last Leaf" (1935), "The Old Order" (1936), later renamed "The Journey," and "The Source" (1941). When Pale Horse, Pale Rider was published with Noon Wine and Old Mortality as Pale Horse, Pale Rider: Three Short Novels in 1939, reviewers compared Porter to Gustave Flaubert, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Henry James. She published a second major story collection as The Leaning Tower and Other Stories in 1944.

In the 1940s and 1950s Porter supported herself with university appointments, fellowships, employment as a screenwriter at movie studios in Hollywood, and residencies at the artist colony Yaddo at Saratoga Springs, New York. In the late 1920s she had vaguely conceived a three-part novel that would be, she said, "the story of America." The first two parts dropped away as short stories and short novels, but the third part, titled "The Present Day," evolved from the mid 1930s through 1962 as a novella called "Promised Land" to a long novel called "No Safe Harbor" and was ultimately published as Ship of Fools (1962).

According to her prefatory note, the title of Porter's novel, its shape, and its spirit were inspired by Sebastian Brant's fifteenth-century moral allegory, Das Narrenschiff. Based more specifically on her own voyage from Mexico to Europe in 1931, Ship of Fools is both a microcosm of humanity and a study of the seeds of Nazism sown between the world wars. Fourteen of the ship's 932 passengers, like the ship's officers, are German. Among the voyagers are also Gypsies, Cubans, Mexicans, Swedes, Swiss, Americans, and Spaniards, including 876 deportees in steerage. Consecutive episodes framed by embarkation and disembarkation dramatize the lovelessness, isolation, and self-delusion in which most people exist, although some persons such as the Basque artist Etchegaray and the German physician Dr. Schumann exhibit selflessness and the capacity for love, and some others have moments of self-awareness.

Reviews of the long-awaited Ship of Fools were mixed. In the predominant, enthusiastic reviews Porter's novel was labeled "a masterpiece" and "a rare and wonderful achievement" suffused with "intelligence and humor." In other reviews the work was faulted for its out-of-fashion allegory, "mechanical simplicity," and Porter's "abysmal view of life."

After 1962 Porter wrote no new fiction. In the remaining years of her life she published several autobiographical essays and futilely tried to finish a biography of Cotton Mather and a long work she referred to as her "French Murder Mystery." Her Collected Stories of Katherine Anne Porter was published in 1965, and a compilation of her nonfiction was published in 1970 as The Collected Essays and Occasional Writings of Katherine Anne Porter. In 1977 she published The Never-Ending Wrong, an autobiographical account of her involvement in the 1920s in the protest against the executions of immigrant anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (see SACCO-VANZETTI CASE). After her death, editions of her letters and uncollected early works, poetry, and book reviews were published.

Porter's distinguished reputation was established with the publication of Flowering Judas, and throughout the remainder of her life she received honors and prizes and praise for her crystalline prose. Although the critical reception of Ship of Fools was widely divergent, the novel became a best-seller that was made into a movie and brought Porter considerable wealth. In 1966 she received both the National Book Award and the PULITZER PRIZE for her Collected Stories.

—Darlene Harbour Unrue

Principal Books by Porter

My Chinese Marriage, as M. T. F. New York: Duffield, 1921.

Flowering Judas. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1930. Enlarged as Flowering Judas and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1935.

Hacienda. New York: Harrison of Paris, 1934.

Noon Wine. Detroit: Schuman's, 1937.

Pale Horse, Pale Rider: Three Short Novels. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.

The Leaning Tower and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1944.

The Days Before. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1952.

A Defense of Circe. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1955.

The Old Order: Stories of the South. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1955.

A Christmas Story. Limited edition, New York: Mademoiselle, 1955. Trade edition, New York: Seymour Lawrence, 1967.

Dust jacket for Porter's 1939 collection in which each of her three protagonists is attracted by the possibility of death

Ship of Fools. Boston & Toronto: Atlantic Monthly/Little, Brown, 1962.

Collected Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, & World, 1965.

The Collected Essays and Occasional Writings of Katherine Anne Porter. New York: Delacorte, 1970.

The Never-Ending Wrong. Boston: Little, Brown, 1977.

Uncollected Early Prose of Katherine Anne Porter, edited by Ruth M. Alvarez and Thomas F. Walsh. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993.

Studying Katherine Anne Porter

During her lifetime Katherine Anne Porter produced only one volume of short stories, one long novel, a volume of non-fiction pieces, a short memoir, and scattered, uncollected essays, reviews, and poems. The small canon should be read in its entirety, with the focus on the fiction but with clarification and amplification to be found in the nonfiction.

A study of Porter's fiction should begin with Collected Stories (1965) and the six stories set in Mexico in the order of their publication. Thomas F. Walsh's study Katherine Anne

Porter and Mexico: The Illusion of Eden (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992) illuminates the stories by reconstructing their background. Of equal value are Porter's comments on her Mexican experiences in The Collected Essays and Occasional Writings of Katherine Anne Porter (1970); book reviews and essays reprinted in Uncollected Early Prose of Katherine Anne Porter (1993); and Porter's interview with Hank Lopez, "A Country and Some People I Love," reprinted in Katherine Anne Porter: Conversations, edited by Joan Givner (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1987).

Porter's narrower focus on her personal experiences and her established aesthetic, which subsumed political themes in universal concerns, are revealed in the five other stories she produced in the 1920s. "He" (1927) is a story about a poor farm family coping with a retarded son. "Magic" (1928) is a New Orleans yarn that examines class divisions and moral responsibility. "Rope" (1928) depicts the twin forces of love and hate in a marriage, a conflict Porter addressed in her essay "The Necessary Enemy" in The Collected Essays. "The Jilting of Granny Weatherall" (1929) is Porter's confrontation with her personal pain at the death of her grandmother in 1901. "Theft" (1929) grew out of Porter's self-analysis at a time when she felt bereft of love and friendship.

Porter's autobiographical Miranda cycle—"Old Mortality" (1937) "Pale Horse, Pale Rider" (1938), and the seven stories that make up "The Old Order" (written in the 1920s and 1930s and published from 1935 to 1960)—should be read as a continuous saga, beginning with "The Old Order" and concluding with "Pale Horse, Pale Rider." "The Downward Path to Wisdom" (1939), an analysis of a child's intuition of the adult capacity for hate, and "Holiday" (1960) share the theme of initiation with the Miranda stories and are best understood as extensions of that cluster.

Three of Porter's works are distinctively different from others of her stories. Although "Noon Wine" (1937), Porter's novella set in the Texas farm country, shares atmosphere and some themes with "He," it is both a classical tragedy and a psychological study of subconscious forces. In her essay "'Noon Wine': the Sources" (reprinted in The Collected Essays) Porter elucidates the story and her own creative process by identifying the strands of inspiration for the work. "The Cracked Looking-Glass" (1932) and "A Day's Work" (1940), Porter's stories about Irish people, were inspired in part by James Joyce's Dubliners (1916). Jane DeMouy's analysis of "The Cracked Looking-Glass" in Katherine Anne Porter's Women: The Eye of Her Fiction (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983) offers an especially cogent interpretation of the story.

"The Leaning Tower" (1941), set in Berlin between the world wars, provides a logical nexus to Ship of Fools (1962) and should be read last of the stories. Thomas Austenfeld's chapter on Porter in his American Women Writers and the Nazis (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001) contributes important background information to the story as well as to Ship of Fools.

Comprehending the many layers of Porter's fiction can be facilitated by the concurrent reading of Letters of Katherine Anne Porter, edited by Isabel Bayley (Boston: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1990); general critical studies such as George Hendrick and Willene Hendrick's Katherine Anne Porter (Boston: Twayne, 1988) and Darlene Harbour Unrue's Understanding Katherine Anne Porter (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988); and Unrue's biography Katherine Anne Porter: The Life of an Artist (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2005) and Critical Essays on Katherine Anne Porter (New York: G. K. Hall, 1997). Mary Titus's The Ambivalent Art of Katherine Anne Porter (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005) provides valuable critical perspective on both the early works and Ship of Fools.

Katherine Anne Porter: An Annotated Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1990), by Kathryn Hilt and Ruth M. Alvarez, covers Porter scholarship through 1988. It should be supplemented with the online bibliographies of the Modern Language Association and with the online annotated bibliographies published since 1994 in The Newsletter of the Katherine Anne Porter Society (<<http://www.lib.umd.edu/Guests/KAP/>> viewed on July 26, 2007).

—Darlene Harbour Unrue

Porter, William Sydney (O. Henry) (1862–1910) short-story writer

There are stories in everything. I've got some of my best yarns from park benches, lampposts, and newspaper stands.

—attributed to Porter

The son of a physician, William Sydney Porter was born in Greensboro, North Carolina. After working as a clerk for his uncle's drugstore, he became a licensed pharmacist when he was nineteen. In 1882 he moved to Texas, where he worked as a ranch hand in La Salle County. Two years later he was in Austin, where he held jobs such as pharmacist, clerk, draftsman, and bank teller and bookkeeper. He married Athol Estes in 1887; their daughter, Margaret, was born in 1889. In 1894 Porter moved to Houston, where he worked as a journalist for the Houston Post. During this time Porter began to write humorous sketches, and in 1894 he owned, edited, and wrote for The Rolling Stone, a humor weekly.

In 1896 Porter was indicted for embezzlement. He skipped bail and spent some time in New Orleans and in Honduras. Upon news that his wife was dying, he returned to Austin, where after her death he was convicted in 1898 of the embezzlement charges and sentenced to an Ohio penitentiary, serving three years. In prison Porter worked at night as a hospital pharmacist and spent days writing to earn money to support his daughter. During this time Porter adopted the pseudonym O. Henry from the name of a prison guard and his stories appeared in popular magazines. In 1902 he moved to New York and began writing prolifically for the New York World.

In his short professional career O. Henry published an impressive body of short fiction in mass-circulation magazines and several volumes of short fiction: Cabbages and Kings (1904), The Four Million (1906), The Trimmed Lamp (1907), Heart of the West (1907), The Voice of the City (1908), The Gentle Grafters (1908), Roads of Destiny (1909), Options (1909), Strictly Business (1910), and Whirligigs (1910). Other collections appeared after his death in 1910 from cirrhosis of the liver. Most of O. Henry's stories are set in New York City or Texas in the late nineteenth or early twentieth century. He portrays an array of characters, representative of ordinary people such as policeman, clerks, cab drivers, artists, shop-girls, millionaires, and con artists. O. Henry's well-known description of New York City as "Bagdad on the Subway" indicates his affection for New Yorkers.

His best-known, frequently anthologized stories include "The Ransom of Red Chief," "The Gift of the Magi," "An Unfurnished Room," and "A Municipal Report," all of which exemplify qualities that identify an O. Henry story. A master of language who utilized puns, malapropisms, dialect, jargon, and foreign words, O. Henry often inserts himself into his story to speak directly to the reader, sometimes as an introduction. He specialized in plots that relied heavily on coincidence, and was famous for his surprise endings. The conclusions of such stories as "The Gift of the Magi" and "The Furnished Room" are prime examples of the irony and twists of fate synonymous with the name O. Henry.

O. Henry was an extraordinarily popular and successful writer in the first decade of the twentieth century. Although earlier writers such as Mark Twain, Bret Harte, and Ambrose Bierce wrote heavily plotted humorous short stories with twisted, ironic endings, O. Henry further developed and formalized such an approach. In 1919 friends of the author established the O. Henry Memorial Awards, which recognize the best short stories published each year.

Sources

- Blansfield, Karen Charmaine. Cheap Rooms and Restless Hearts: A Study of Formula in the Urban Tales of William Sydney Porter. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1988.
- Bloom Harold, ed. O. Henry: Comprehensive Research and Study Guide. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999.
- Current-Garcia, Eugene. O. Henry: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1993.
- Harris, Richard C. William Sydney Porter (O. Henry): A Reference Guide. Boston: Hall, 1980.
- Langford, Gerald. Alias O. Henry: A Biography of William S. Porter. New York: Macmillan, 1957.

—Laurie Champion

Ezra Pound, circa 1915

Pound, Ezra (1885–1972) poet, translator, editor, essayist

*Lovers of beauty, starved,
Thwarted with systems,
Helpless against the control . . .*

*Take thought:
I have weathered the storm,
I have beaten out my exile.*

—“The Bath” (1916)

Born in Hailey, Idaho, Ezra Loomis Pound from his earliest years exhibited a gift for languages, acquiring in the course of his life Latin, Greek, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, French (including Provençal), Chinese, and Japanese; he translated poetry from all of these. An expatriate who lived only occasionally in the United States from 1909 to 1958, Pound was a central figure among modernists (see MODERNISM). His poetry, his immense learning, his theories of composition, his encouragement of other experimentalists, his affectations, and his eccentric, disturbing political beliefs influenced a generation and earned him the admiration, gratitude, and exasperation of his peers and those who came after him.

Pound graduated from Hamilton College when he was twenty, having already met the poets H.D. (see Hilda DOOLITTLE) and William Carlos WILLIAMS. A dismissal from a college teaching job in Indiana persuaded him that academic life was not for him, and he commenced his career as a poet, moving in 1908 to Europe, where he entered into English and Continental literary life, publishing his own poetry and translations, and meeting James Joyce, W. B. Yeats, D. H. Lawrence, Wyndham Lewis, Robert FROST, Ford Madox Ford, and T. S. ELIOT.

Pound brought out four small limited editions of his own work in his first two years in England. His first book, A Lume Spento, was published in Venice in 1908 at his expense. The first work distinctively his own was Personae (1909). The quaintness of its lyricism, a holdover from the nineteenth century, is freshened by the author's erudition and classicism. Personae and Pound's succeeding books and translations—The Spirit of Romance (1910), Canzoni (1911), Riposte (1913), Cathay (1915), Lustra (1916; enlarged 1917), and Quia Pauper Amavi (1919), with the moving "Homage to Sextus Propertius"—show his increasing disenchantment with modern Western culture and his longing for a pure, idealized world of art. This theme was most effectively expressed in Pound's Hugh Selwyn Mauberly, published in 1920.

Pound's writing practices were explained in a poetic practice he called IMAGISM in a 1913 manifesto. By image Pound meant an instant of feeling and intellect. An imagist poet used no abstract or superfluous terms (love, peace, truth) but conveyed direct experience of a moment, unmediated truth, and respected, but was not bound by, formal rhythms. This doctrine had far-reaching influence, both on objectivist poets (see OBJECTIVISM) from 1915 to the 1930s and on prose writers such as Ernest HEMINGWAY, whose career Pound boosted. In 1923, recognizing the distinction of Hemingway's style, he saw that a small press in Paris published Hemingway's in our time (see IN OUR TIME).

Pound furthered many careers, imagist or not. He arranged for the initial publication of Frost's first two collections, A Boy's Will (1913) and North of Boston (1914), in London. He encouraged Joyce during the serialization of his novel A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man in The Egoist (1914–1915) and later helped to arrange financial assistance for him. Even more crucially, he acted as mentor and editor for Eliot when he was writing what was to be regarded as the central poetic statement of the era, THE WASTE LAND (1922). Only Joyce's Ulysses, also published in 1922, was its equal in modernist circles. Eliot's collage method in The Waste Land derives from and extends Pound's practices. An examination of the manuscript reveals that Pound shaped a highly original but imperfect poem into a great one. Eliot dedicated The Waste Land to "Ezra Pound, il miglior fabbro" (the superior maker).

In the 1920s Pound worked mainly on his ambitious poetic project he called THE CANTOS, a series of dramatic fragments drawn from all history and all locations. These cantos, lyrical and satiric, were written in disjointed free verse, often with references to Chinese and Eastern culture, and sometimes in Chinese language. A few were infused with Pound's special views of history and economics. During the 1930s while he was publishing literary and nonliterary works such as ABC of Economics (1933), ABC of Reading (1934), Make It New (1934), and Jefferson And/Or Mussolini (1936), Polite Essays (1937), and Guide to Kulchur (1938), Pound continued The Cantos, all the while drawn more into the political turmoil of the time. His quirkiness and eccentricities grew. Certainly misguided, and perhaps mentally unstable, he broadcast a series of pro-fascist, anti-Semitic radio talks during WORLD WAR II. These led to his arrest for treason and eventual incarceration in St. Elizabeth's mental hospital in Washington, D.C. Pound's imprisonment there lasted until 1958 when Hemingway, Frost, and Archibald MACLEISH arranged for his release. Although he continued to produce poems for The Cantos, he never formally concluded them. Largely silent for his final two decades, he died in Italy in 1972.

Pound published a great many books in limited editions; these were collected and made more generally available in the 1950s by James LAUGHLIN, the publisher of NEW DIRECTIONS. Laughlin also published Pound's Cantos as the poet produced them. Since his death Pound's reputation as a poet has rested mainly on a few of his short poems such as "Portrait d'une Femme" and "The River Merchant's Wife," and Hugh Selwyn Mauberly, which was published shortly after WORLD WAR I, the central disillusioning event in the twentieth century. The sixteen extended sections of the poem contrast the "Attic grace" of classical civilizations and art—Mauberly's "true Penelope / was Flaubert"—with the present debased existence, "an old bitch gone in the teeth / ... a botched civilization." Like Pound, Mauberly "strove to resuscitate the dead art / Of poetry; to maintain 'the sublime' / In the old sense." According to the poem, "all things save Beauty alone" break down. Energizing Hugh Selwyn Mauberly is its variety of metrical forms, each rigorously adhered to, as well as its astonishing mix of reference, languages, and diction.

Certain of The Cantos—I, XIII, XVI, XLVII, and the separate group called "The Pisan Cantos," LXXXI—have achieved prominence and are frequently anthologized because of their greater accessibility, their infamous pronouncements, their austere classicism, or their overwhelming musicality. Isolated, exquisite lyrics from The Cantos have achieved a status of their own. Beyond his own work, Pound's role as a supporter of modernism and his encouragement of other writers has given him the status of an icon.

—Roger Lathbury

Principal Books by Pound

A Lume Spento. Venice: Printed for the author by A. Antonini, 1908.

A Quinzaine for this Yule. London: Pollock, 1908.

Personae. London: Elkin Mathews, 1909.
Exultations. London: Elkin Mathews, 1909.
The Spirit of Romance. New York: Dutton, 1910.
Provença. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1910.
Canzoni. London: Elkin Mathews, 1911.
Ripostes. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1913.
Gaudier-Brzeska: A Memoir Including the Published Writings of the Sculptor and a Selection from his Letters. New York: John Lane, 1916.
Lustra. New York: Knopf, 1917.
Pavannes and Divisions. New York: Knopf, 1918.
The Fourth Canto. London: Ovid Press, 1919.
Quia Pauper Amavi. London: Egoist Press, 1919.
Instigations of Ezra Pound, Together with an Essay on the Chinese Written Character by Ernest Fenollosa. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1920.
Hugh Selwyn Mauberley. London: Ovid Press, 1920.
Umbra. London: Elkin Mathews, 1920.
Poems 1918–21. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1921.
Indiscretions. Paris: Three Mountains Press, 1923.
Antheil and the Treatise on Harmony. Paris: Three Mountains Press, 1924; Chicago: Covici, 1927.
A Draft of XVI. Cantos. Paris: Three Mountains Press, 1925.
Personae: The Collected Poems. New York: Boni & Liveright, 1926.
A Draft of the Cantos 17–27. London: John Rodker, 1928.
Selected Poems, edited by T. S. Eliot. London: Faber & Gwyer, 1928.
A Draft of XXX Cantos. Paris: Hours Press, 1930; New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1933.
Imaginary Letters. Paris: Black Sun Press, 1930.
How to Read. London: Harmsworth, 1931.
A B C of Economics. London: Faber & Faber, 1933; Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1940.
A B C of Reading. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1934.
Make it New. London: Faber & Faber, 1934; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1935.
Eleven New Cantos: XXXI–XLI. New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1934.
Homage to Sextus Propertius. London: Faber & Faber, 1934.
Alfred Venison's Poems: Social Credit Themes, as The Poet of Titchfield Street. London: Nott, 1935.
Social Credit: An Impact. London: Nott, 1935.
Jefferson And/Or Mussolini. New York: Liveright/Nott, 1936.
Polite Essays. London: Faber & Faber, 1937; Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1940.
The Fifth Decad of Cantos. New York & Toronto: Farrar & Rinehart, 1937.
Confucius: Digest of the Analects. Milan: Giovanni Scheiwiller, 1937.
Guide to Kulchur. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1938.
What Is Money For. London: Greater Britain Publications, 1939.
Cantos LII–LXXI. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1940.

Title page for one of the early editions of Pound's Cantos, the poetic project that occupied much of his career

A Selection of Poems. London: Faber & Faber, 1940.
Carla da Visita. Rome: Edizioni di Lettere d'Oggi, 1942. Republished as A Visiting Card, translated by John Drummond. London: Russell, 1952.
L'America, Roosevelt e le Cause della Guerra Presente. Venice: Edizioni Popolari, 1944. Republished as America, Roosevelt and the Causes of the Present War, translated by Drummond. London: Russell, 1951.
Oro e Lavoro. Rapallo: Tip. Moderna [Canessa], 1944. Republished as Gold and Work, translated by Drummond. London: Russell, 1952.
Introduzione alla Natura Economica degli S.U.A. Venice: Edizioni Popolari, 1944. Republished as An Introduction to the Economic Nature of the United States, translated by Carmine Amore. London: Russell, 1950.
Orientamenti. Venice: Edizioni Popolari, 1944.
"If This Be Treason . . ." Siena: Printed for Olga Rudge by Tlp. Nuova, 1948.
The Pisan Cantos. New York: New Directions, 1948.

- The Cantos*. New York: New Directions, 1948.
- Selected Poems*, edited by T. S. Eliot. New York: New Directions, 1949.
- Patria Mia*. Chicago: Seymour, 1950.
- Literary Essays*, edited by Eliot. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1954.
- Lavoro ed Usura*. Milan: All'Insegna del Pesce d'Oro, 1954.
- Section: Rock-Drill 85–95 de los cantares*. New York: New Directions, 1956.
- Gaudier-Brzeska*. Milan: All'Insegna del Pesce d'Oro, 1957.
- Pavannes and Divagations*. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1958.
- Versi Prosaici*. Rome: Biblioteca Minima, 1959.
- Thrones 96–109 de los cantares*. New York: New Directions, 1959.
- Impact: Essays on Ignorance and the Decline of American Civilization*. Chicago: Regnery, 1960.
- Patria Mia and The Treatise on Harmony*. London: Owen, 1962.
- Nuova Economia Editoriale*. Milan: Vanni Scheiwiller, 1962.
- A Lume Spento and Other Early Poems*. New York: New Directions, 1965.
- Être Citoyen Romain*, edited by Pierre Aelberts. Liège: Editions Dynamo, 1965.
- Canto CX*. Cambridge, Mass.: Sextant Press, 1965.
- Selected Cantos*. London: Faber & Faber, 1967. Enlarged edition, New York: New Directions, 1970.
- Redondillas*. New York: New Directions, 1968.
- Drafts and Fragments of Cantos CX–CXVII*. New York: New Directions, 1969.
- The Cantos of Ezra Pound*. New York: New Directions, 1970.
- Selected Prose 1909–1965*, edited by William Cookson. New York: New Directions, 1973.
- Selected Poems 1908–1959*. London: Faber & Faber, 1975.
- Collected Early Poems*, edited by Michael John King. New York: New Directions, 1976.
- Ezra Pound and Music: The Complete Criticism*, edited by R. Murray Schafer. New York: New Directions, 1977.
- “Ezra Pound Speaking”: Radio Speeches of World War II*, edited by Leonard W. Doob. Westport, Conn. & London: Greenwood Press, 1978.
- Ezra Pound and the Visual Arts*, edited by Harriet Zinnes. New York: New Directions, 1980.
- From Syria: The Worksheets, Proofs, and Text*, edited by Robin Skelton. Port Townsend, Wash.: Copper Canyon Press, 1981.

Studying Ezra Pound

Ezra Pound was an unusually prolific writer and protean poet. The bibliography of his works is long and complex because sometimes he published and republished the same material, edited or altered or not, in America, England, and Continental Europe. Moreover, he can be studied not only as a poet but also as a translator, editor, and critic—or extraliterarily, as a political and cultural figure.

Pound's poetry divides into three rough groups. In the first are early lyrical works such as A Lume Spento (1908) and Personae (1909) and the poems after 1913 written under his imagist theories (see IMAGISM). These gave way, after WORLD WAR I, to the second phase, the work for which Pound is now best known, Hugh Selwyn Mauberly (1920), and other poems that lament in bitter, satirical verse the loss of aesthetic integrity and humanist values of western civilization. Finally, there are THE CANTOS, loosely allusive, multilingual and varied poems ranging over all history and culture. New Directions has published a convenient one-volume edition of The Cantos of Ezra Pound (1970) in addition to a judicious Selected Poems (1949), edited by T. S. ELIOT, that makes the earlier work available. A fuller representation of Pound's poetry, excluding the Cantos, can be found in Ezra Pound: Poems and Translations, edited by Richard Sieburth (New York: Library of America, 2003).

It is best to engage the poems chronologically. A reader who begins with the Cantos, or even a selection from them, is easily overwhelmed; it is preferable to start with the simpler, lyrical poems in Personae and Exultations (1909). The best of Pound's later modernist verse never abandons the attractions of the ear evident in these first works, with their flawless timing and purity of feeling, their intimacy and classicism.

From there a student should read Hugh Selwyn Mauberly and the poetry of the 1920s. Pound in important ways remained an imagist. Even in his most difficult poetry his language will seep into the reader's consciousness to create effects if the reader is not too focused on “meaning.” The later works—especially the poems in the Cantos—should be permitted to work as best they can without trying to understand them obsessively in every detail.

The most useful overall study of Pound remains Hugh Kenner's The Pound Era (Berkeley & Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1971). In addition to explaining much about Pound's poetry it illuminates the work of those associated with Pound—T. S. Eliot, W. B. Yeats, and Wyndham Lewis—as well as vorticism. A good selection of essays on the poetry and prose may be had in The Cambridge Companion to Ezra Pound, edited by Ira B. Nadel (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999). It presents Pound as a poet, translator, and critic and has useful further references. The best bibliography is the revised edition of Donald C. Gallup's Ezra Pound: A Bibliography (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1983).

Pound's foray into fascism and his ambiguous retreat from that position have generated many studies, often highly antagonistic in nature. A balanced treatment is Leon Surette's Pound in Purgatory: From Economic Radicalism to Anti-Semitism (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999). The recommended biography is Humphrey Carpenter's A Serious Character: The Life of Ezra Pound (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1988). An affectionate, personal look at Pound and the atmosphere of Paris in the 1920s may be found in Ernest HEMINGWAY's A Moveable Feast (New York: Scribners, 1964). Pound was, in addition, the subject of a PBS documentary, which may be bought on VHS. Pound's own reading of his poetry for Caedmon brings to life its erudition, its aural magnificence, and its bracing cantankerousness. A literary journal, Paideuma, was started at the University of Maine in 1972; it has since then expanded in range to include other modernist poetry in English. A useful website, based in Japan (<<http://www.lit.kobe-u.ac.jp/~hishika/pound.htm>> viewed July 26, 2007) and its American sister (<<http://web.csustan.edu/english/reuben/pal/chap7/pound.htm>> viewed July 26, 2007), contains a plethora of biographical, critical, and bibliographical citations.

—Roger Lathbury

Powell, Dawn (1897–1965) novelist, journalist

Reared on various farms and in small midwest towns, Powell edited a school magazine and graduated from Lake Erie College in 1918. She published her first novel, Whither, in 1925. She also collaborated on radio scripts and musical plays. She used her Ohio background in such novels as A Time to Be Born (1942) and My Home is Far Away (1944).

Powell's reputation was enhanced when she started writing for THE NEW YORKER. She found her true subject in writing about New York City life and as a satirist of the middle class. Although she wrote twenty novels, her work fell into obscurity until other writers began writing about her as a neglected American genius.

Many of Powell's best novels have been reissued, including Angels on Toast (1940; revised as A Man's Affairs, 1956), her hilarious burlesque of New York businessmen; The Locusts Have No King (1948), a satire set in the New York publishing industry; The Wicked Pavilion (1954), which centers on a Manhattan cafe; and The Golden Spur (1962).

Sources

Page, Tim. Dawn Powell: A Biography. New York: Henry Holt, 1998.

Powell, Dawn. The Diaries of Dawn Powell, 1931–1965, edited by Page. South Royalton, Vt.: Steerforth Press, 1995.

Powell. Selected Letters of Dawn Powell, 1913–1965, edited by Page. New York: Holt, 1999.

"Prairie" by Carl Sandburg (1918) poem

CARL SANDBURG wrote "Prairie" and the other poems in Cornhuskers (1918) while he worked abroad as a WORLD WAR I correspondent. In this free verse celebration of his Midwestern roots, Sandburg invokes both the solace and inspiration that comes from the "prairie and the milk of its wheat, the red of its clover." He expresses a lasting faith in the future of humankind, writing, "To a man across a thousand years I offer a handshake. / I say to him: Brother, make the story short, for the stretch of a thousand years is short." While "Prairie" mentions the struggles of westward expansion with the sorrows inflicted on Native Americans, Sandburg's tone remains positive. As in many of his other works, Sandburg recognizes the importance of progress, especially the urbanization of the prairies of his youth. Nevertheless, he affirms his connection to the prairie and to "the cornhuskers who say / at sundown: / To-morrow is a day."

Source

Sandburg, Carl. "Prairie." Cornhuskers. New York: Holt, 1918.

—Skye L. Suttie

The Professor's House by Willa Cather (New York:

Knopf, 1925) novel

WILLA CATHER's boldest venture into literary MODERNISM focuses on Godfrey St. Peter, a middle-aged history professor at a fictional Midwestern university, and Tom Outland, the professor's brilliant protégé who dies in WORLD WAR I. Set in the early 1920s and narrated in the third-person, Book I presents St. Peter's indifference toward the modern house that he has recently purchased with funds provided by a lucrative academic award and his growing dissatisfaction with his materialistic wife and daughters. Rosamond, the professor's oldest daughter, was once engaged to Outland. After his death, she becomes wealthy by marrying an engineer who capitalizes on Outland's research. Outland narrates Book II, set roughly a decade earlier, and, like St. Peter's, his story deals with the defeat of scholarly idealism by commercial forces. While working as a cowpuncher in the Southwest, Outland discovers a cliff city filled with Anasazi relics. He travels to the Smithsonian Institution in an unsuccessful effort to stir governmental interest in his find but returns to the cliff city to discover that his friend, Roddy Blake, has sold the artifacts to a German collector. Book III continues the third-person account of St. Peter's crisis, which ends, after a half-hearted suicide attempt, with his recommitment to life—albeit a life without joy.

Source

Cather, Willa. The Professor's House. Willa Cather Scholarly Edition, edited by James Woodress, Kari Ronning, and Frederick M. Link. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002.

—Steven Trout

Prohibition (1918–1933)

During the Prohibition period the Eighteenth Amendment prohibited the production, sale and transport of alcoholic beverages in the United States. It was enacted as a result of pressure from women's groups and religious organizations such as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League. The law was widely and openly violated in speakeasies—so-called because patrons were required to identify themselves in order to be admitted. Some of these establishments became literary hang-outs. Some American expatriate writers claimed that Prohibition influenced their decision to leave America. Prohibition proved unenforceable and spawned a criminal empire. Al Smith unsuccessfully ran for president in 1928 on a wet platform. Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected as a repeal candidate in 1932, and the Twenty-First Amendment ended Prohibition the following year.

Sources

Kyvig, David E. Repealing National Prohibition. Second edition. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2000.

Merz, Charles. The Dry Decade, with a new introduction by the author. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1969.

Prokosch, Frederic (1908–1989) novelist, poet

The son of a respected linguist and a distinguished pianist, Prokosch as he was growing up was exposed to different parts of America and the world, attending schools in Wisconsin, Texas, and Pennsylvania as well as in Austria and Germany, before graduating from Haverford College and going on to earn a doctorate at Yale University. He began his career as a poet, publishing his first verse in the VIRGINIA QUARTERLY REVIEW in 1927. His first book, The Asiatics (1935), a picaresque novel set in several exotic locations, was followed by the collection of poems The Assassins (1936). Prokosch, who traveled and lived as an expatriate, published three more collections of poems but mainly wrote novels, making fiction out of his travels. His novels include The Seven Who Fled (1937), set in the Russian exile community; Night of the Poor (1939), the story of a boy on the move from Wisconsin to Texas; The Skies of Europe (1941), set on the eve of WORLD WAR II; The Conspirators (1943), a spy tale set in Lisbon; Storm and Echo (1948), about men traveling in Africa in search of values they can live by; The Dark Dancer (1964), a historical novel about the prince who built the Taj Mahal; and The Missolonghi Manuscript (1968), a fictional version of George Gordon, Lord Byron's autobiography. Prokosch wrote about himself and his literary contemporaries in Voices: A Memoir (1983).

Source

Squires, Radcliffe. Frederic Prokosch. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Proletarian Literature

This term describes novels about the poor and working-class life in the 1930s. The term proletarian refers to the Marxist analysis of society, in which the workers, the proletariat, are exploited by the capitalist owners of industry, or the means of production. This school of American writing—also called “protest fiction”—flourished during the 1930s as a response to the GREAT DEPRESSION. Plays such as WAITING FOR LEFTY (1935) by Clifford ODETS dramatized the conditions in which the working class would rise up and strike against the status quo. In Lillian HELLMAN's drama Days to Come (1936), union organizers become the heroes. In some cases proletarians were shown as victims of society, as in Michael GOLD's novel Jews without Money (1930), which depicted a society shaped almost exclusively by the power of money. Daniel FUCHS also wrote of working-class life in the Jewish ghetto in his Williamsburg trilogy: Summer in Williamsburg (1934), Homage to Blenhol (1936), and Low Company (1937). Many proletarian novels were set in urban environments, but the spirit of proletarian fiction is also evident beyond the city limits. Nelson ALGREN in his first novel Somebody in Boots (1935), dedicated to “Those innumerable thousands: The Homeless Boys of America,” depicts the brutal hobo experiences of an illiterate Texas youth driven from his home by a violent father. Writers who were not necessarily Marxist saw in proletarian fiction a way to address the shortcomings of society. Thus John STEINBECK's THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939) features a hero, Tom Joad, who comes to the conclusion that he must fight for all men, especially the downtrodden, against the rich and powerful.

Proletarian literature also became associated with the fight for the rights of minorities and for any class or group that could be considered a part of the underprivileged. James T. FARRELL's Studs Lonigan trilogy—Young Lonigan: A Boyhood in Chicago Streets (1932), The Young Manhood of Studs Lonigan (1934), and Judgment Day (1935),—with its portrayal of the urban Irish poor, has been associated with proletarian fiction. Richard WRIGHT's NATIVE SON (1940) is a powerful naturalistic study of Bigger Thomas, an African American youth who is suddenly overwhelmed by his proximity to the wealth and privileges of the upper class. Other classic proletarian novels include Josephine HERBST's Pity Is Not Enough (1933), Henry ROTH's Call It Sleep (1934), and John Dos Passos's trilogy U.S.A. (1938).

WORLD WAR II helped to erase some of the grievances that proletarian novels addressed. Some writers also became disenchanted with the idea of proletarian literature, finding it sentimental in its glorification of the working class. Marxist influence on writers waned after Stalin formed his pact with Hitler in 1939, establishing an alliance between Germany and Russia that left Hitler free to attack Poland from the west while Stalin invaded the country from the east. The idea that writers of all kinds on the left were contributing to a literature that spoke the truth about social and political injustice was destroyed by conflicts between liberals and Communists over the sudden alliance between fascism and communism.

Sources

Aaron, Daniel. Writers on the Left: Episodes in American Literary Communism. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1961.

Hicks, Granville, ed. Proletarian Literature in the United States. New York: International Publishers, 1935.

Provincetown Players (1915–1929) theater group

One of the most important groups of the American LITTLE THEATER MOVEMENT, the Provincetown Players were begun informally by George Cram Cook and his wife, Susan GLASPELL, when they organized a production of their play Suppressed Desires (produced 1915), a satire on psychoanalysis, at the Wharf Theatre—an old, derelict fish house on a pier in Provincetown, Massachusetts. The group evolved to encourage young new talent who wrote experimental and provocative plays that challenged the conventional drama popular on Broadway. In summer 1916 they performed Eugene O'NEILL's first produced plays, Bound East for Cardiff and Thirst, as well as Glaspell's Trifles at the Wharf. In the fall of that year Cook formally incorporated the group as the Provincetown Players and secured a brownstone in Greenwich Village, which the group refashioned into a theater. Instrumental in bringing O'Neill and his work before New York audiences, the small company performed plays by more than forty other writers, including Paul GREEN, Edna St. Vincent MILLAY, Alfred Kreymborg, Djuna BARNES, Edna FERBER, Floyd Dell, and Michael GOLD. Its productions in the early 1920s powerfully influenced the New York stage, providing O'Neill in particular with the opportunity to have his more ambitious, experimental, full-length plays produced for larger audiences. Such O'Neill plays as THE EMPEROR JONES (produced 1920), THE HAIRY APE (produced 1922), and All God's Chillun Got Wings (produced 1924) were first performed by the Provincetown Players.

Sources

- Deutsch, Helen, and Stella Hanau. The Provincetown; A Story of the Theatre. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1931.
- Kenton, Edna. The Provincetown Players and the Playwrights' Theatre, 1915–1922, edited by Travis Bogard and Jackson R. Bryer. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004.
- Sarlós, Robert Károly. Jig Cook and the Provincetown Players: Theatre in Ferment. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1982.

Pulitzer Prizes (1917– )

The newspaper publisher Joseph Pulitzer (1847–1911) established an endowment for the creation of the Columbia School of Journalism, which began accepting students in 1912, and for awards to writers whose work advanced the cause of American literature, education, and public service and morality. Under the auspices of the school of journalism, the Pulitzer Prizes are awarded annually to journalists in various categories as well as to outstanding work in the novel, drama, history, biography or autobiography, and poetry. A general nonfiction category was added in 1962.

Sources

- Bates, J. Douglas. The Pulitzer Prize: The Inside Story of America's Most Prestigious Award. New York: Carol Publishing, 1991.
- Hohenberg, John. The Pulitzer Diaries: Inside America's Greatest Prize. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1997.

Pulp Magazines

These fiction magazines—also called dime novels—were printed on cheap paper and usually sold for 10¢. There were hundreds of them during the 1920s and 1930s, most of which terminated after a couple of issues. The pulps paid writers 1¢ or 2¢ cents per word and were usually restricted to a single topic: sports, mystery, science fiction, romance, westerns. Few achieved literary recognition, except for BLACK MASK, which introduced the detective novelists Dashiell HAMMETT and Raymond CHANDLER, and science-fiction journals such as Amazing Stories and Weird Tales, which published H. P. LOVECRAFT. The pulps provided a place for writers to break into print and supported them during the GREAT DEPRESSION.

Sources

- Goodstone, Tony, ed. The Pulps: Fifty Years of American Pop Culture. New York: Chelsea House, 1976.
- Gunnison, John, ed. Adventure House Guide to the Pulps. New York: Adventure House, 2000.

Pyle, Ernie (1900–1945) journalist

Ernie Pyle attended Indiana University, where he wrote for The Student. Leaving school in his senior year, he worked on newspapers in Indiana, Washington, D.C., and New York. Pyle began to make his national reputation as an aviation columnist for the Washington Daily News. Established as a syndicated columnist in the late 1930s, Pyle began covering WORLD WAR II in London, covering the firebombing of the city but also the everyday scenes of a country at war. His daily columns made the war a story with which millions of Americans could identify. His first collection was published as Ernie Pyle in England (1941). After the United States entered the war, Pyle became a battlefield correspondent. His columns from North Africa were collected in Here Is Your War (1943). Pyle wrote about the campaign in Italy and covered the D-Day invasion and the Allied victory in France, winning a PULITZER PRIZE for distinguished correspondence. He followed the war to the Pacific, where he was killed by Japanese machine-gun fire on the island of Ie Shima. More of his work was collected in Brave Men (1944) and Last Chapter (1946).

Sources

- Miller, Lee G. The Story of Ernie Pyle. New York: Viking, 1950.
- Tobin, James. Ernie Pyle's War: America's Eyewitness to World War II. New York: Free Press, 1997.

Pale Fire by Vladimir Nabokov (New York: Putnam, 1962) novel

Vladimir NABOKOV's fifth English-language novel consists of a foreword, a poem in heroic couplets of 999 lines, more than 200 pages of commentary, and an index. The poem, which gives the novel its title, is a work in four cantos by a fictional American writer named John Shade. The foreword and commentary are attributed to Dr. Charles Kinbote, who lives near Shade in the small college town of New Wye. In the foreword Kinbote reveals that Shade was violently murdered by an escapee from a mental institution just before completing the poem, which, Kinbote insists, is missing its final line. The commentary that follows spends less time explicating the poem than it does relating the history of Charles II, the deposed king of Zembla, the "distant northern land" of Kinbote's birth. Eventually, the reader learns that Kinbote is Charles II, and that an assassin has been dispatched to kill him—or, just as likely, that Kinbote is insane and only imagines that he is the deposed king.

Source

Boyd, Brian. Nabokov's Pale Fire: The Magic of Artistic Discovery. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1999.

—Marshall Boswell

Paley, Grace (1922– ) short-story writer

Grace Paley was born in the Bronx, New York, the child of Jewish socialist immigrant parents. She attended Hunter College and New York University but never took a degree. Paley's first story collection, The Little Disturbances of Man: Stories of Men and Women (1959), featured characters that appeared in later books in a rich texture of social and political life that reflects Paley's own experience as a political activist and anti-war protestor. Paley established her reputation with another collection, Enormous Changes at the Last Minute (1974), which won praise for its shrewd humor and deft handling of family relationships. Paley's other books include Later the Same Day (1985), Long Walks and Intimate Talks: Poems and Stories (1991), and Begin Again: Collected Poems (1999). In 1998 she published a memoir, Just as I Thought.

Sources

Arcana, Judith. Grace Paley's Life Stories: A Literary Biography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

Bach, Gerhard, and Blaine H. Hall, eds. Conversations with Grace Paley. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

The Paris Review (1953– ) periodical

Founded by George PLIMPTON in Paris and published in New York City as a quarterly journal, The Paris Review publishes fiction, poetry, criticism, and interviews with renowned writers. Its contributors have included Jack KEROUAC, Philip ROTH, W. D. SNODGRASS, and Susan SONTAG. Plimpton published The Paris Review Anthology in 1990, and the magazine regularly publishes a series of interviews with writers, titled Writers at Work.

Patchett, Ann (1963– ) novelist

Born in Los Angeles to a police-captain father and a nurse mother, Ann Patchett is often recognized for creating convincing, diverse characters in her fiction. She received a B.A.

from Sarah Lawrence College in 1984 and an M.F.A. from the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP in 1987. While her four novels—The Patron Saint of Liars (1992), Taft (1994), The Magician's Assistant (1997), and Bel Canto (2001)—all involve personal relationships, their subjects range from a Catholic nun to an African American blues drummer to an opera singer. Bel Canto was chosen as a finalist for the 2002 PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. Run (2007); involves a family after a serious accident. Patchett has also published a memoir, Truth and Beauty: A Friendship (2004), which explores her friendship with poet Lucy Grealy.

—Amber Shaw

Paterson* by William Carlos Williams (1946–1958)

poem

Considered a masterpiece of modern American literature, Paterson is the major achievement of William Carlos Williams's career. Published in five books from 1946 to 1958, Paterson is an experimental urban epic consisting of a combination of prose and free-form poetry. Williams juxtaposes lyric passages, prose, letters, autobiography, and historical facts with actual newspaper clippings, obituaries, and personal letters. In part a response to T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land and to the decline of values in modern American culture, the five books of Paterson grew from the poet's ambition to express the mind of modern man in relation to society as well as the image of man as a city in himself. In the preface to Paterson, Williams outlines the major elements of the epic, stressing his attempt to find adequate language to express his vision of man's correlation to his environment through episodes that characterize "all that any one man may achieve in a lifetime." In Paterson, the city, the history of New Jersey, and the poet's sensibility meld in an historical and aesthetic work that parallels Williams's collection of essays on American history titled In the American Grain (1925).

Sources

- Axehod, Stephen Gould, and Helen Deese, eds. Critical Essays on William Carlos Williams. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. William Carlos Williams: Comprehensive Study and Research Guide. Broomal, Pa.: Chelsea House, 2002.
- Williams, William Carlos. Paterson (Book One). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1946.
- Williams. Paterson (Book Two). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1948.
- Williams. Paterson (Book Three). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1949.
- Williams. Paterson (Book Four). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1951.
- Williams. Paterson (Book Five). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1958.

—Lori Shores

PEN/Faulkner Award

The PEN/Faulkner Foundation initiated a writer's award in 1980. Named for William Faulkner, who donated part of his winnings from his Nobel Prize to encourage young writers, the award is given annually. Each year three established writers are designated to determine the award winner. The William Faulkner Foundation Award for First Novel, administered at the University of Virginia, was a predecessor of the PEN/Faulkner Award.

—Marshall Boswell

Percy, Walker (1916–1990) novelist

... you cannot translate ... anger immediately into writing. It has to undergo a transformation, it has to be sublimated into some other form.

—Interview (1968)

Born in Birmingham, Alabama, Walker Percy was brought up by his father's cousin, William Alexander Percy, a distinguished writer best known for his autobiography, Lanterns on the Levee (1941). Walker Percy's father committed suicide when his son was eleven, and the boy lost his mother two years later in a car accident. Percy received his B.A. from the University of North Carolina and earned an M.D. from Columbia University in 1941. Although trained as a doctor, Percy never practiced. He struggled for years to find his voice as a writer and then succeeded with his first novel, THE MOVIEGOER (1961), which won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. The novel is the story of an alienated young man who seeks refuge in an obsession with the movies. A devout Roman Catholic interested in moral issues, Percy wrote elegant, understated, and often comic prose. Like other Southern writers, he had a tragic sense of history, but his work is buttressed with a high philosophical mentality that questions the nature of existence and the ambiguity of human motivations. His other novels include The Last Gentleman (1966), Lancelot (1977), Love in the Ruins (1971), The Second Coming (1980), and The Thanatos Syndrome (1987). His nonfiction includes The Message in the Bottle (1975) and Novel Writing in an Apocalyptic Time (1986).

Walker Percy

Principal Books by Percy

The Moviegoer. New York: Knopf, 1961.

The Last Gentleman. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1966.

Love in the Ruins: The Adventures of a Bad Catholic at a Time Near the End of the World. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1971.

The Message in the Bottle: How Queer Man Is, How Queer Language Is, and What One Has to Do with the Other. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1975.

Lancelot. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1977.

The Second Coming. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1980.

Lost in the Cosmos: The Last Self-Help Book. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1983.

The Thanatos Syndrome. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1987.

State of the Novel: Dying Art or New Science. New Orleans, La.: Faust, 1988.

Signposts in a Strange Land, edited by Patrick Samway. Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1991.

Studying Walker Percy

Walker Percy's four major novels are THE MOVIEGOER (1961), The Last Gentleman (1966), Love in the Ruins (1971), and Lancelot (1977). The Message in a Bottle (1975) is a collection of twenty years' worth of essays that explain his philosophy of language.

There are three biographies of Percy. The recommended starting place is Patrick H. Samway's Walker Percy: A Life (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1997). Father Samway is a Jesuit priest who knew Percy and his family. He brings to his fully detailed biography a particular understanding of the religious and philosophical concerns that inform Percy's work. Conversations with Walker Percy and More Conversations with Walker Percy, both edited by Lewis A. Lawson and Victor A. Kramer (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1985 and 1993), provide the author's own comments on his life and work.

Linda Whitney Hobson's Walker Percy: A Comprehensive Descriptive Bibliography (New Orleans: Faust, 1988) is a primary bibliography published two years before the author's death, but after his life's work was essentially completed. It should be supplemented with book collector Stuart Wright's Walker Percy: A Bibliography, 1930–1984 (Westport, Conn.: Meckler, 1986). Andrew Lytle, Walker Percy, Peter Taylor: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983) provides a long-out-of-date annotated secondary bibliography that must be supplemented by the MLA annual bibliographies.

Dust jacket for Percy's first novel, 1961, which won the National Book Award

A good start for any student is Walker Percy, edited by Harold Bloom, in the Modern Critical Views series (New York: Chelsea House, 1986). This collection of critical essays provides accessible readings of Percy's work, addressing a variety of literary issues from a variety of perspectives. Critical Essays on Walker Percy (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989), opens with a series of contemporary reviews but quickly turns to a comprehensive look at a variety of themes and approaches to Percy's novels.

Several works provide insight into the religious flavor of Walker Percy. Kieran Quinlan's Walker Percy: The Last Catholic Novelist (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996) provides a religious reading of the Percy canon, arguing that the "centrality of religious belief" defined both Percy's life and writings. Gary M. Ciuba considers the work of Walker Percy as a series of revelations, clearly invoking biblical imagery. His Walker Percy: Books of Revelations (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991) walks steadily through each of Percy's novels, providing an archetypal reading of this author's work. Robert H. Brinkmeyer's Three Catholic Writers of the Modern South (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1985) provides a concise look at the inextricable union between Percy's religious faith and his regional heritage.

Percy's emphasis on the human role within modernity is taken up by several later critics. In The Sovereign Wayfarer: Walker Percy's Diagnosis of the Malaise (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1972), Martin Luschei attempts to move the discussion of Walker Percy's novels beyond the typical demarcations of "Catholic" and "Southern" in order to engage Percy as a "contemporary American voice." Walker Percy: Novelist and Philosopher, edited by Jan Gretland and Karl-Heinz Westarp (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991), is a collection of essays divided into four thematic sections exploring Percy not only as a novelist but also as a regionalist, a philosopher, and a moralist. While each novel claims a part of the discussion, Percy's final novel, The Thanatos Syndrome, is the primary focus of this collection. Some critics seek to look beyond the religious and regional elements within Percy's work. John Desmond's Walker Percy's Search for Community (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2004) considers the interrelated quality of Percy's highly communal world of fiction.

Similar to the critics mentioned above, but moving beyond the theoretical to the practical, the following works emphasize cultural readings. The Last Physician: Walker Percy and the Moral Life of Medicine, edited by Carl Elliott and John Lantos (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1999), explores the influence of Percy's medical training on his writing, incorporating articles by philosophers, literary critics, and physicians. This collection of essays also includes an article by Laurie Zoloth which emphasizes a gendered reading of several Percy novels. For a thoroughly gendered reading of Walker Percy, see Walker Percy's Feminine Characters, edited by Lawson and Elzbieta Oleksy (Troy, N.Y.: Whitson, 1995), a collection of essays dedicated to exploring the feminine within the Percy canon.

—Abigail A. Lundelius

Petry, Ann (1908–1997) novelist

Born in Connecticut and educated at the Connecticut College of Pharmacy, where she earned a Ph.G. (graduate in pharmacy) degree, Ann Petry worked as a pharmacist for seven years in her family's business before moving to New York to become a writer. She earned critical praise for her novel The Street (1946), which depicts the struggle of a woman determined to make a decent life for herself and her son in the midst of the poverty and frustration of Harlem. Petry was one of the first female African American novelists to achieve fame. Her later work includes Miss Muriel (1971), a collection of short stories, and several children's books: The Drugstore Cat (1949), Harriet Tubman: Conductor on the Underground Railway (1955), and Tituba of Salem Village (1964), the story of a Caribbean woman accused of stirring up witchcraft.

Sources

Ervin, Hazel Arnett, and Hilary Holladay, eds. Ann Petry's Short Fiction: Critical Essays. Westport, Conn. & London: Praeger, 2004.

Holladay. Ann Petry. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Phillips, Jayne Anne (1952– ) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Buckhannon, West Virginia, Phillips earned a B.A. degree in 1974 from West Virginia University and an M.F.A. from the University of Iowa in 1978. Sweethearts (1976), her first novel, draws on her West Virginia background with evocative portraits of rural families. Counting (1978) has an urban setting and deals with sex and politics. Black Tickets (1979) expanded Phillips's audience and is her most experimental work, developing different narrators and a cast of characters who have been called "urban grotesques." The novel Machine Dreams (1984) is an expansive canvas of social and popular history set in West Virginia from the Great Depression to the VIETNAM WAR. Shelter (1994) is a novel set in a girls' camp in West Virginia in 1963. Fast Lanes (1987) depicts the extremes of urban existence. Motherkind (2000) is about a mother dying of cancer and her daughter's visit home to tell her mother she is going to have a baby.

Source

Robertson, Sarah. The Secret Country: Decoding Jayne Anne Phillips' Cryptic Fiction. Amsterdam & New York: Rodopi, 2007.

The Piano Lesson by August Wilson (produced 1987) play

First performed in 1987 at the Yale Repertory Theater, six months after the author's JOE TURNER'S COME AND GONE saw its debut on the same stage, The Piano Lesson has become one of August WILSON's most enduring works. It earned him his second Pulitzer Prize and ran on Broadway for 329 performances.

Set in Pittsburgh in 1936, the play concerns the battle between Boy Willie and his sister, Berniece, over what to do with the family piano. A rich and overdetermined symbol, the piano was acquired by their great-grandfather's slave owner in exchange for the great-grandfather's wife and nine-year-old son. In his despair the great-grandfather carved a series of African figurines on the piano's legs. Years later Boy Willie and Berniece's father was killed by Sutter, one of the sharecropper's descendants, for stealing the piano. After Sutter is mysteriously killed, the children maintain ownership of the piano, which Boy Willie wants to sell in order to buy back the plantation on which his descendants were slaves. Berniece wants to keep the piano as a symbol of their past. The play reaches its climax when Berniece, after refusing for years to play the piano, sits down and plays a song that "is intended as an exorcism and a dressing for battle. A rustle of wind blowing across two continents." The music banishes Sutter's ghost, which has been haunting Boy Willie, and reconnects Berniece to her ancestry.

Sources

Elam, Harry Justin. The Past As Present in the Drama of August Wilson. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2006.

Wilson, August. The Piano Lesson. New York: Dutton/Plume, 1990.

—Marshall Boswell

Piercy, Marge (1936– ) novelist, poet

Marge Piercy was born and raised in a working-class section of Detroit. She earned a B.A. degree in 1957 from the University of Michigan and an M.A. in 1958 from Northwestern University. Piercy traveled and wrote many unpublished works of fiction in the late 1950s and early 1960s, most of them with feminist themes, reflecting her experience as a political activist in New York City. In the novel Going Down Fast (1969), Piercy comments on the corrupt influence of power. In this and other novels that included Dance the Eagle to Sleep (1970) and Vida (1980), Piercy developed a distinctive mix of characters who are politically committed and sexually liberated.

Piercy has experimented with different genres of fiction, including science fiction in Woman on the Edge of Time (1976), which has a Chicana protagonist, and in He, She, and It (1991), an amalgam of science fiction and Jewish mysticism. Gone to Soldiers (1987) is an ambitious attempt to create an encyclopedic narrative of the different peoples affected by WORLD WAR II. In City of Darkness, City of Light (1996), Piercy explores the French Revolution, concentrating on neglected female figures.

Piercy has written poetry that reflects her radical sentiments: Hard Loving (1969), Living in the Open (1976), The Moon Is Always Female (1980), My Mother's Body (1985), and What Are Big Girls Made Of? (1997). Her essays have been collected in The Grand Coolie Dam (1970) and Parti-Colored Blocks for a Quilt (1982). Her later fiction includes Storm Tide (1998), which she cowrote with her husband, Ira Wood; and Three Women (1999).

Sources

Shands, Kerstin W. The Repair of the World: The Novels of Marge Piercy. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Thielmann, Pia. Marge Piercy's Women: Visions Captured and Subdued. Frankfurt, Germany: R. G. Fischer, 1986.

Pinsky, Robert (1940– ) poet, critic, translator

A New Jersey native and graduate of Rutgers (B.A. 1962), Robert Pinsky earned his Ph.D. at Stanford in 1966 and has taught at several universities, including the University of California at Berkeley and Boston University. His writing has been influenced by jazz, and Pinsky maintains that he has tried to make words into the harmonic structures of musicians such as Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. His poetry collections include An Explanation of America (1979), History of My Heart (1984), The Want Bone (1990), and Jersey Rain (2000).

Pinsky's books of criticism include The Situation of Poetry (1977), Poetry and the World (1988), and The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998). He has edited collections of poetry, and his 1994 translation of Dante's Inferno is acclaimed. Seeking to come as close to the original as possible, he used slant rhyme and near rhyme so as not to force the meaning of the poem into the metrical structure of the English language. His bilingual edition allows readers to compare the translation and the original side by side.

Pinsky served as the POET LAUREATE of the United States from 1997 to 2000. During his tenure he initiated the Favorite Poem Project, in which he aimed to record one hundred American citizens reading their favorite poem, collected as a permanent archive in the Library of Congress. Overwhelming response to the project demonstrated Pinsky's belief in the importance of poetry in everyday life.

Source

Thomas, Harry, ed. Talking with Poets. New York: Handsel, 2002.

Pirsig, Robert (1928– ) novelist

... the title of the book, "Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance," ... seems almost calculated to invite academic disrespect. One hundred and twenty one publishers turned it down, setting a Guinness World Record for editorial rejection. The paperback publishers themselves classified it as "New Age," which translates as beads and incense and drugs and free love and the sort of low-class uniformed speculation called "pop philosophy."

—Opening Statement for the first conference on the Metaphysics of Quality (2005)

Robert Pirsig was educated at the University of Minnesota where he earned his B.A. in 1950 and his M.A. in 1958. After studying and teaching at Montana State College and the University of Illinois between 1959 and 1962, teaching rhetoric and studying philosophy, he had a mental breakdown and was institutionalized for three years. In 1968 he took a sixteen-day motorcycle trip from Minneapolis to San Francisco with his twelve-year-old son Christopher, recounted in Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance: An Inquiry into Values (1974). The book combines a sustained philosophical argument about the nature of value with a candid self-examination and a psychologically intense autobiographical narrative. His second book, Lila: An Inquiry into Morals (1991), similarly presents a philosophical investigation conducted during the course of a trip. In his review of Lila, Harvard psychiatrist Robert Coles called it "an intellectual rebel's book, a loner's book—the writing of a thoughtful, sensitive social and cultural observer who has had his fill of academic pretentiousness and phoniness, not to mention the arrogance of our various secular experts." Pirsig guards his privacy.

Sources

DiSanto, Ronald L., and Thomas J. Steele. Guidebook to Zen and the Art of Motorcycle Maintenance. New York: Morrow, 1990.

Hayles, Katherine. The Cosmic Web: Scientific Field Models and Literary Strategies in the Twentieth Century. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1984.

Plath, Sylvia (1932–1963) poet, novelist

"Neurotic, ha!" I let out a scornful laugh. "If neurotic is wanting two mutually exclusive things at one and the same time, then I'm neurotic as hell. I'll be flying back and forth between one mutually exclusive thing and another for the rest of my days."

—The Bell Jar (1963)

Sylvia Plath was born in Boston. Her father, a faculty member at Boston University, died when she was eight. Plath began writing at an early age, and by the time she entered

Sylvia Plath

Smith College in the fall of 1950 she had published stories in Seventeen magazine and the Christian Science Monitor. After a summer guest editorship at Mademoiselle magazine in 1953, Plath attempted suicide. She returned to Smith and graduated summa cum laude in June 1955. Plath went to study at Oxford University, where she met the English poet Ted Hughes. The couple married and had two children. By early 1962 the couple separated, and Plath and her children moved to London. She began writing the poems later collected and published as Ariel (1965)—often considered her greatest work—but she continued to suffer from depression. Her poetry reflected her suicidal tendencies and her struggle to reconcile the absence of a male figure in her life. Plath committed suicide in the winter of 1963, just after publication, anonymously, of her novel, The Bell Jar (1963), which deals with her emotional breakdown in 1953.

In it Plath reflected the peculiar pressures placed on a young woman of genius and examined the conflict between her own ambitions and her desire to please men in a male-dominated society.

Plath's CONFESSIOAL style speaks of more than her own suicidal tendencies. In poems like "Lady Lazarus" she fuses myth, history, and the universal theme of self-destructiveness and resurrection with her personal experience; she merges her personal suffering with the suffering of the twentieth century, so that her poetry and the age have become indissoluble.

The Collected Poems of Sylvia Plath was published in 1981 and Selected Poems in 1985. Letters Home, an expurgated edition of her letters to her mother, Aurelia Plath, appeared in 1975, and the expurgated Journals of Sylvia Plath in 1982. Plath's short fiction has been collected in Johnny Panic and the Bible of Dreams (1979). She wrote two books for children: The Bed Book (1976) and The It-Doesn't-Matter Suit (1996).

The Unabridged Journals of Sylvia Plath, 1950–1962 was published in 2000.

Principal Books by Plath

The Colossus. London, Melbourne & Toronto: Heinemann, 1960; abridged edition, New York: Knopf, 1962.

The Bell Jar, as Victoria Lucas. London, Melbourne & Toronto: Heinemann, 1963; New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1971.

Ariel. London: Faber & Faber, 1965; New York: Harper & Row, 1966.

Crossing the Water. New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1971.

Winter Trees. New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1972.

Johnny Panic and the Bible of Dreams: Short Stories, Prose and Diary Excerpts. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.

Dust jacket for the pseudonymous autobiographical novel published the month before Plath's death

The Collected Poems, ed. Ted Hughes. New York: Harper & Row, 1981.

Studying Sylvia Plath

Sylvia Plath's poetry is associated with the CONFessional movement and can be compared against other confessional poets, such as her teacher Robert LOWELL and her colleague Anne SEXTON. Students should begin their study of Plath chronologically, reading first the only work published during her lifetime, The Colossus (1960). Though her ex-husband, Ted Hughes, did not publish Ariel until 1965, the manuscript was written by Plath in 1962. In 2004 Harper Collins published Ariel: The Restored Edition, which contains her originally intended emendations to the text. This restored edition includes an introduction by Frieda Hughes, Sylvia Plath's daughter, and the text is based upon original facsimile copies from the Sylvia Plath Collection at Smith College.

The Bell Jar (1963) is a semi-autobiographical novel released by Plath under the pseudonym Victoria Lucas. It has proved to be a seminal text for both psychobiographies of Plath and also for feminist critical theory. Reflecting on The Bell Jar, edited by Pat Macpherson (New York: Routledge, 1991), is part of the Heroines? Series, which examines fictional women who have become mythologized in the West, through the lens of feminist inquiry. Reflecting on The Bell Jar examines the novel against the backdrop of COLD WAR paranoia, McCarthyism, and gender maladjustment.

Hughes later collected Plath's poetry and published three more collections: Crossing the Water (1971); Winter Trees (1972); and The Collected Poems (1981). Collected Poems, which gathers material written between 1956 and 1963, received the most press and won the Pulitzer Prize in 1982. Plath was the first poet to win the Pulitzer Prize posthumously.

Dust jacket for the 1965 collection of poems, most of which were written in the months before Plath's suicide in 1963

Plath wrote a considerable amount of prose before and after The Bell Jar. Two longer works are extant—Double Exposure and Stone Boy with a Dolphin. The latter is included in Johnny Panic and the Bible of Dreams (1979). All 130 pages of Double Exposure went missing sometime in the 1970s and has never resurfaced. Johnny Panic is a collection of Plath's short stories, prose, and diary excerpts; the rest of her diaries, The Journals of Sylvia Plath and The Unabridged Journals of Sylvia Plath, were released in 1982 and 2000, respectively.

Inquiring students will find a wealth of information on the works and life of Sylvia Plath. Stephen Tabor's Sylvia Plath: An Analytical Bibliography (Kent, U.K.: Meckler Publications, 1987) provides a primary bibliography as well as a cursory time line of Plath's career. It extensively catalogues her monographs, her audio recordings, broadcasts, musical/dramatic adaptations, and works regarding the author and Ted Hughes. My Sylvia Plath Page (<<http://www.sylvia-plath.de>> viewed July 11, 2007) supplies an annotated primary and secondary checklist and other useful features.

Students interested in Plath's marriage to Ted Hughes can consult Diane Middlebrook's Her Husband: Hughes & Plath—A Marriage (New York: Viking, 2003), which addresses the couple's aggressive intellectual and erotic relationship. William Todd Shultz also provides a psychoanalytical approach to Plath's paternal issues in his Handbook of Psychobiography (New York: Oxford University Press, 2005).

The Cambridge Companion to Sylvia Plath, edited by Jo Gill (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006), is a collection of critical essays that cut across the range of interests in her life and work. Sylvia Plath, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 1989), is a good beginning collection of critical studies.

—Student Guide by Jonathan Maricle

Play It as It Lays by Joan Didion (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1970) novel

A novel about the drug-filled decadence of Southern California in the late 1960s, Joan DIDION's Play It as It Lays is a landmark work of minimalism that combines stoicism with existentialist élan. The novel's heroine, Mariah Wyeth, is a failed actress and the wife of an up-and-coming director named Carter. After an affair with her lover Les Goodman results in a pregnancy, Mariah submits to the abortion demanded of her by Carter. Eventually, she joins Carter in a dry, dust-blown desert in Nevada, where he is shooting a movie (and conducting an affair with the lead actress). Against this bleak, symbolic backdrop, Mariah comes to embrace "nothing" as the ground of her values. In the end, Mariah insists, "I know something Carter never knew . . . I know what 'nothing' means and keep on playing." Written in clipped prose and arranged as a series of finely carved episodes, Play It as It Lays has exerted a profound influence on later writers such as Ann BEATTIE, Raymond CARVER, and Bret Easton ELLIS.

Source

Henderson, Katherine Usher. Joan Didion. New York: Ungar, 1981.

—Marshall Boswell

Plimpton, George (1927–2003) journalist, editor

The outsider did not belong, and there was comfort in that being proved.

—Paper Lion (1966)

George Plimpton is best known for his participatory sports journalism, particularly Paper Lion (1966), an account of his stint as an "amateur" member of the Detroit Lions professional football team at preseason training camp. He was born in 1927 in New York City, attended Phillips Exeter Academy, and Harvard University, from which he was graduated in 1948. He also studied at King's College, Cambridge University, where he received a B.A. in 1952 and an M.A. in 1954. In 1953 he co-founded the THE PARIS REVIEW with fellow writer PETER MATTHIESSEN. Originally based in Paris, the magazine moved its base of operations to New York in 1957. Plimpton edited the magazine for the rest of his life. His other books about his experiences with professional sports include Out of My League (1961), The Bogey Man (1968), Mad Ducks and Bears (1973), Shadow Box (1977), and Open Net (1985), the latter of which recounts his experience as a goalie for the Boston Bruins hockey team. A selection of his essays, The Best of Plimpton, appeared in 1990. He also edited some twenty volumes, including The Paris Review Anthology (1990); The Writer's Chapbook: A Compendium of Fact, Opinion, Wit, and Advice from the 20th-Century's Preeminent Writers (1990); and The Norton Book of Sports (1992). In 1997 he published a biography of his friend, Truman Capote: In Which Various Friends, Enemies, Acquaintances, and Detractors Recall His Turbulent Career.

—Marshall Boswell

Poet Laureate

According to the Library of Congress, the poet laureate "serves as the nation's official lightning rod for the poetic impulse of Americans." From 1937 to 1986 the position was titled "Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress." Louise Bogan, Robert LOWELL, Elizabeth BISHOP, and William Carlos Williams, among others, served the Library of Congress during this era. Recent poet laureates include Rita DOVE, Robert HASS, and Louise GLÜCK. Because the mandate from the Library of Congress is intentionally vague, each poet laureate is given freedom to explore the duty of addressing the public's relationship with poetry and poetry's relationship with its audience. From Louise Bogan's workshops for women to Robert PINSKY's "Favorite Poem Project" (in which thousands of Americans “say the poems they love”), the laureate position has been an important vehicle by which poetry and readers are connected.

Source

The Library of Congress, Poet Laureate. <<http://loc.gov/poetry/laureate.html>> (viewed May 20, 2007).

—Tod Marshall

Poetry

American poetry after WORLD WAR II underwent several radical transformations that continue to shape the art in the twenty-first century. These changes were brought about both by and in reaction to the influence of T. S. Eliot, William Carlos Williams, Wallace Stevens, and other high Modernist writers; the tenets of various literary-criticism movements; and the impact of political upheaval, globalization, ethnicization, and feminization on the genre.

Among all the Modernist writers, Eliot's impact was first and strongest. Through his arguments in “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” “The Music of Poetry,” and “Hamlet,” as well as through his role as editor at Faber and Faber, he informed both the poetic and critical perspective of John Crowe Ransom, Allen Tate, Robert Penn Warren, Yvor Winters, I. A. Richard, William Empson, W. H. Auden, and the early writing of Robert LOWELL. In fact, most of the writers who went on to leave vivid impressions on the succeeding generations of writers—including James WRIGHT and Adrienne RICH—began their writing careers heavily influenced by the dictates of Eliot and New Criticism. This influence led to the creation of poetry that was intellectually driven and reliant upon dense figurative language, allusions, and metrical mastery.

During the 1950s poets began to rebel against this orthodoxy in a variety of ways. The reasons for this rebellion are numerous: political dissatisfaction that arose after the Depression and World War II; responses to inequities in civil and women's rights; and a rejection of what some writers saw as a staid American lifestyle of consumption were all integral in creating this rebellion. Many writers identified the conservative poetics of Eliot and the New Critics with conservative politics, stagnant social forces, and a destructive American way of life. By pursuing formal experimentation in poetry that rejected metrical verse, by writing about highly personal subject matter that ignored the dictates of impersonality, and by being openly critical of American values, poets such as Lowell, Muriel RUKEYSER, Gregory CORSO, Allen GINSBERG, and others turned to the poetics of William Carlos Williams as a new aesthetic model.

The highly personal CONFESSIOAL POETRY of Lowell, Sylvia PLATH, Anne SEXTON, W. D. SNODGRASS, and John BERRYMAN arose out of this reaction against impersonality. The poetry of this movement found its energy in the candid revelation of autobiographical details—the more lurid, the more powerful. Radical in its openness, the confessional mode of this time period fostered similar writing in the latter part of the twentieth century. Perhaps more important than revealing the specific details of many of these writers' lives, this poetry expanded the definition of what was considered appropriate subject matter for poetry. Many writers marginalized by sexism, racism, and economic disparities began to find voices through this more egalitarian mode of poetics.

Poets such as Adrienne RICH, Marge PIERCY, and Anne SEXTON played important roles in shaping women's political movements in the 1960s and 1970s by giving voice to women's experiences of domestic life, sexuality, and social and political oppression in intensely personal writing. African American writers such as Gwendolyn Brooks, Amiri BARAKA, Don LEE, and Lucille CLIFTON wrote poetry with a highly charged political agenda during the 1960s; representatively, the BLACK ARTS MOVEMENT involved these poets' work and pursued a nonintegrationist stance toward promoting African American culture and rejecting white American culture. During this time period many writers, including Lowell, Denise LEVERTOV, Galway KINNELL, and Robert BLY, responded in protest to the VIETNAM WAR. Their poetry stands with feminist work and with the political poetry of African American writers as an indicator of the impulse of this era toward poetry that was formally looser, wide-ranging in subject matter, and possessed of a public role.

Not all writing of the 1960s and early 1970s was socially motivated. Taking cues from surrealism and from South American poetry in translation, as well as from the writing of George Trakl and Tomas Tranströmer and other Europeans, the “Deep image” poets felt that poetry loosed from conscious control could plumb the depths of the imagination and create surrealistic archetypal imagery. Wright, Bly, and W. S. MERWIN are often identified as writers of this movement. A noteworthy outgrowth of the Deep image movement was the interest of these writers in translation, which began a rapid proliferation of works from other cultures, in turn influencing the writing of American poets. From the Spanish writing of Pablo Neruda to the Polish poetry of Czesław Miłosz, translation has had a powerful influence on American poetry since the 1960s and 1970s.

The New York School is another group of writers that was influenced by translation, particularly by French poetry, and by painting and HUMOR. Writers such as Frank O'HARA, Kenneth KOCH, James SCHUYLER, and Barbara GUEST created works of poetry that were both insightful and irreverent. Other poetry of the 1970s both continued exploration of confessional terrain, opening up new subject matter and new voices through poetry, and shifted toward an emphasis of interiority and the philosophical. Where Eliot stressed erudition and impersonality and Williams allowed for writers to use a looser poetry to explore their everyday experiences, Stevens emphasized epistemological inquiry. His poetry has inspired writers such as John ASHBERRY, Robert HASS, and Jorie GRAHAM to focus on the role of the philosophical in their work. It is, however, important to note that none of these poets (nor the zeitgeist) should be classified as merely philosophical in orientation. The careful attention to the everyday of Williams can be found in Hass's poetry; the playful exuberance of O'Hara can be found in Ashbery; the erudition of Eliot can be found in Graham. By the end of the twentieth century, influences had become myriad and movements had become relatively meaningless in classifying the work of an individual writer.

The lack of an orthodoxy is perhaps one of the catalysts behind the New Formalist movement of the 1980s. Asserting that free-verse poetry had led to uncultivated slackness in writing, the NEW FORMALISTS called for a return to metrical frameworks as organizing principle in verse. Timothy STEELE, Brad LEITHAUSER, Mary KARR, Dana GIOIA, and others also connected what they saw as a slackness in contemporary poetry with the rise of the master of fine arts degree in creative writing.

The emergence of voices from different American subcultures has been myriad and abundant. From the Asian American writing of Li-Young LEE and Cathy SONG to the Native American writing of Sherman ALEXIE and Joy HARJO, many volumes of poetry published in the 1990s have allowed for new cultural voices and experiences to enter into the diverse poetic dialogue that has continued into the twenty-first century.

Sources

Gray, Richard. American Poetry of the Twentieth Century. London & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1976.

Perkins, David. A History of Modern Poetry: Modernism and After. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1987.

—Tod Marshall

Pop Art

Pop art refers to a movement in the visual arts in which artists employ the images and icons of popular culture—comic books, brand-name packages, magazine advertisements, and so on—as part of their work. The images are often used self-consciously in the manner of kitsch. By placing such banal, familiar imagery in the context of high art, pop art seeks to enhance the aesthetic value of these shallow, disconnected images while also calling into question the integrity of elitist culture. The pop-art movement began in both Britain and the United States in the 1950s and reached its height in the 1960s. It is generally regarded as the first Postmodern development in the visual arts. The most famous American pop artists were Andy Warhol, whose lithograph of a Campbell's soup can has become a classic American painting, and Roy Lichtenstein, who is most famous for his massive oil canvas homages to comic-book art. In literature the techniques of pop art can be found most notably in the work of Thomas PYNCHON, whose novels were some of the first to combine erudite learning with “low” slapstick humor; Kurt VONNEGUT, who paid his most direct homage to his pop-art leanings with his cartoon novel, Slapstick: Or, Lonesome No More! (1976); and Donald BARTHELME, whose use of collage owes much to the pop-art style.

Source

Harrison, Sylvia. Pop Art and the Origins of Post-Modernism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

—Marshall Boswell

Portis, Charles (1933– ) novelist

Born in El Dorado, Arkansas, and educated at the University of Arkansas, where he received his B.A. in journalism in 1958, Charles Portis published his first novel, Norwood, in 1966. It has been called a Southern version of Jack Kerouac's ON THE ROAD. His second novel, True Grit (1968), established an original voice through a comic narrative by Mattie Ross, a fourteen-year-old girl seeking revenge for her father's murder. Like Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Portis's True Grit captures the nature of frontier anarchy while affirming the integrity of the individual and a sense of justice. The Dog of the South (1979) and Gingros (1991) confirm Portis's gift for writing picaresque fiction.

Source

Charles Portis: <<http://www.rci.rutgers.edu/~wvest/>> (viewed April 10, 2007).

Portnoy's Complaint by Philip Roth (New York: Random House, 1969) novel

Roth's fourth book, and third novel, became a controversial best-seller in 1969 and established Roth as one of the most daring writers of our time. The book details the psychological disorder of the novel's narrator, Alexander Portnoy, who suffers from conflicting “strongly-felt ethical and altruistic purposes” and “extreme sexual longings, often of a perverse nature.” Diagnosed with “Portnoy's complaint,” Portnoy narrates his moral coming-of-age directly to his psychiatrist, Dr. Spielvogel, in the form of a sustained dramatic monologue. Portnoy remembers his domineering Jewish mother and his complaining, constipated father, and provides a detailed, comic account of his pampered childhood, replete with episodes of masturbation and sexual misconduct. He also describes his adult life in the sexually liberated milieu of 1960s New York, where his uncontrollable sexual longings conflict with his desire to be the Nice Jewish Boy of his mother's dreams.

Roth's breakthrough novel combines the surreal absurdity of Franz Kafka with the timing of stand-up comedian Lenny Bruce. Even more important, the book challenges the standard perceptions of Jewish family life, all part of Roth's determined effort to inflame the ire of those critics who accused his early stories of expressing anti-Semitism.

—Marshall Boswell

Postmodernism

Although the term rarely fails to generate controversy, Postmodernism generally refers to the dominant stylistic developments, changes, and approaches that emerged in the art, literature, music, and architecture of advanced capitalist nations following the demise of the so-called Modernist age. Roughly speaking, the Postmodernist era begins in conjunction with the COLD WAR of the late 1940s and continues to the present day.

As its name suggests, Postmodernism is defined against what it followed, namely Modernism, which most cultural critics date from 1890 to 1945. As a cultural dominant, Modernism emerged in the aftermath of major Victorian shifts in political, scientific, and philosophical thinking that had the collective effect of dismantling a great many of the transcendent underpinnings upon which so much of European thought had once relied. Charles Darwin's theory of evolution and natural selection, Karl Marx's cultural materialism, Friedrich Nietzsche's concept of the will to power, and Sigmund Freud's tripartite model of the psyche radically changed the way artists and intellectuals regarded, respectively, their own origins, the mechanisms of historical change, the ground for morality, and the very nature of the self. The result was a widespread sense of alienation from a once-continuous historical past. The art of this period reacted to this sense of fragmentation and alienation by trying to wrest a new coherence via symbolism, myth, formal ingenuity, and a new preoccupation with subjectivity and the interior. The result was an explosion of new artistic forms and approaches, including Impressionism, ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM, Cubism, the mythic novel, stream of consciousness, interior monologue, Surrealism, and Imagism.

Postmodernism emerged as a reaction to this flowering of newness. Confronted with the image-based, technologically ramped-up postwar world, many artists of the 1950s and 1960s began to doubt the efficacy of art to achieve the encompassing coherence sought by the Modernists. Instead, these new writers, artists, and architects regarded the abundance of superficial images and dehumanizing technologies with a new attitude of ironic surrender. Image and style became disconnected and free-floating, forcing the Postmodern artist to seize these ready-made images and redeploy them through pastiche, bricolage, parody, and fabulation, all with a new spirit of hyper self-consciousness. Although the term sometimes refers to the general postwar period, it is perhaps more usefully applied to works of literature, music, art (such as Andy Warhol's famous paintings of Campbell soup cans and Brillo boxes), and architecture in which such features as parody and pastiche are self-consciously applied.

Among American novelists, John BARTH is perhaps the first writer formally to diagnose the Postmodern artistic agenda both in his work, Giles Goat-Boy (1966) and LOST IN THE FUNHOUSE (1968), and in his famous essay, "THE LITERATURE OF EXHAUSTION." Also included among the American "Postmodern" writers are such figures as Thomas PYNCHON, Vladimir NABOKOV, Robert COOVER, William GADDIS, and Donald BARTHELME. In more-recent years such writers as Don DELILLO, David Foster WALLACE, and Richard POWERS have been characterized as moving beyond Postmodernism, though there is little critical agreement as to what this new cultural dominant will be called or what characterizes it as a coherent movement.

Sources

Green, Jeremy. Late Postmodernism: American Fiction at the Millennium. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.

McHale, Brian. Postmodern Fiction. New York: Methuen, 1987.

—Marshall Boswell

Poststructuralism

Poststructuralism is the name given to more-recent developments in Structuralist practice and can be said to possess roughly the same relationship to its predecessor movement as POSTMODERNISM does to Modernism. Whereas the STRUCTURALISTS of the first half of the century sought to interpret phenomena as a discrete arrangement of signs that could best be understood within the larger system surrounding the entity under scrutiny, Poststructuralists bring to this practice a strain of metaphysical doubt about the possibility of achieving a final or even stable understanding. While Structuralists take their cue primarily from French linguist Ferdinand de Saussure's theory of language articulated in his celebrated Course in General Linguistics (1916), Poststructuralists draw primarily upon the critique of that theory as leveled by Jacques Derrida, the principal architect of the practice known as DECONSTRUCTION. Poststructuralists emphasize the instability of language and, hence, the instability of formal, Structuralist interpretation. In the late 1960s Roland Barthes, a central figure in the development of Structuralism and semiotics, embraced, and also helped formulate, the Poststructuralist turn. Other key figures associated with this brand of inquiry include radical anthropologist and philosopher Michel Foucault, feminist critic Julia Kristeva, and psychoanalytic theorist Jacques Lacan.

Source

William, James. Understanding Poststructuralism. Montreal, Quebec: McGill-Queens University Press, 2006.

—Marshall Boswell

Potok, Chaim (1929–2002) novelist, short-story writer, playwright, historian, theologian

Master of the Universe . . . if You are truly real, then You are powerless and cruel. If You are able to prevent evil but are unwilling, You are cruel. If You are willing to prevent evil but are not able, then You are without power. And if you are able and willing, why then is there evil?

—“The Dark Place Inside” (1967)

Best known as the author of the classic novel The Chosen (1967), Chaim Potok was born Herman Harold Potok in 1929 in the Bronx to Orthodox Jewish parents, who called him by his Jewish name, Chaim Tzvi. He received his B.A. in English literature from Yeshiva University in 1950 and five years later was ordained as a rabbi by the Jewish Theological Seminary. In 1965 he received his Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania and two years later published The Chosen to great acclaim. A story of education, or a bildungsroman, The Chosen follows the friendship of two Jewish boys, Reuven Malter and Danny Saunders, who, somewhat like the literary-minded Potok, battles with his Orthodox father over his desire to pursue a secular field of study, in Danny’s case, psychology.

In addition to a fourteen-volume theological study of Jewish ethics and nearly a dozen other novels, including several works for children, Potok also wrote My Name Is Asher Lev (1972), about a Jewish painter.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Chaim Potok’s The Chosen. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.

Sternlicht, Sanford. Chaim Potok: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

Powers, J. F. (1917–1999) novelist

J. F. Powers was born in Jacksonville, Florida, and lived there until he graduated from high school, when he moved with his family to Chicago. He studied nights at Northwestern University while working at various jobs, including as an editor for the Illinois Historical Records Survey. When he refused a call into the army, citing his commitment to pacifism, he was imprisoned for thirteen months for draft evasion, a charge that was pardoned after the war. During that time Powers began writing short stories often dealing humorously and satirically with the lives of Catholic priests. His stories were collected in Prince of Darkness (1947) and The Presence of Grace (1956). In 1962 he won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for his first novel, Morte d’Urban, the story of Father Urban, a worldly man who is nevertheless committed to his religious vocation. Wheat that Springeth Green (1988) returns to similar themes and characters, this time from a comic point of view. Powers taught creative writing at St. John’s University, Marquette, the University of Michigan, and Smith College.

Source

Hagopian, John V. J. F. Powers. New York: Twayne, 1968.

Powers, Richard (1957– ) novelist

So many of my books are dialogues between little and big. There’s this desire to see how the parts of the whole can see the whole, come to know it, suffer the consequences of it.

—Interview (1998)

Richard Powers writes ambitious novels that explore complex scientific, artistic, and political ideas within the framework of Postmodernist METAFICTION. Born in Evanston, Illinois, Powers was the fourth of five children. In 1968 his family moved to Bangkok, Thailand, where his father had accepted a position at the International School. While in Thailand, Powers read widely in both literary fiction and nonfiction while also mastering the cello and European vocal music. After returning with his family to Illinois in the mid 1970s, Powers entered the University of Illinois, where he studied physics and English literature, thus inaugurating the joint interest in science and literature that later characterized his best work. In 1979 he completed an M.A. in English literature and moved to Boston, where he secured work as a technical writer and computer programmer.

After two years Powers quit his day job to write his first novel, Three Farmers on Their Way to a Dance (1985). Taking his inspiration from the 1914 August Sander photograph referenced in the title, the book intertwines two related narrative lines, one featuring a contemporary copyeditor and the other featuring the three men in the title photograph. A critical success, the novel was a finalist for the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD; this recognition prompted Powers to concentrate exclusively on his writing. While living in southern Holland, he wrote his second novel, Prisoner’s Dilemma (1988), which looks back to his teenage years in Illinois while also exploring such apparently unrelated subjects as game theory, nuclear proliferation, the internment of Americans of Japanese descent during WORLD WAR II, and Walt Disney. The intricate structure of the novel allows Powers to establish fresh connections between global catastrophe and private life.

THE GOLDBUG VARIATIONS (1991), also written in Holland, is Powers’s most ambitious and significant novel. The book combines two narrative lines, a present-tense account of a librarian’s budding love affair with a coworker, and a fictional account of three scientists in the 1940s rushing to crack the DNA code. The chapter arrangement corresponds point by point with the thirty short pieces that constitute Johann Sebastian Bach’s famous keyboard piece, The Goldberg Variations (1741). The novel was a finalist for the National Book Critics Circle Award.

Operation Wandering Soul (1993), another finalist for the National Book Award, followed two years later; it dramatizes the psychic meltdown of a young surgical resident in the pediatrics ward at a public hospital.

In 1992 Powers accepted a position as writer-in-residence at the University of Illinois, where he completed his fifth novel, Galatea 2.2 (1995), in which a cognitive neurologist named Philip Lentz attempts to create a computerized model of the human brain. This novel was followed by Gain (1998), another “double-helix” narrative that interweaves a contemporary story of a real estate broker’s illness with a 170-year account of the rise of a massive soap and chemical company.

Powers continues to link the personal and the political, the human and the technological. In Plowing the Dark (2000) he juxtaposes a computer research team’s attempt to create a virtual-reality program with a harrowing account of a young American schoolteacher’s four-year ordeal as a blindfolded captive of radical Islamic fundamentalists. The Time of Our Singing (2003) addresses the history of race relations in twentieth-century America as experienced by a mixed-race American family of musicians. The Echo Maker (2006) tells the story of Mark Schulter, a truck driver who suffers a fourteen-day coma following a violent wreck. When he awakes, he suspects that his sister, Karin, is an imposter. She, in turn, puts him under the care of a famous neuroscientist, a decision that allows Powers to explore such issues as the relationship between reality and perception and the neurological basis for consciousness. This novel won the 2006 NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for fiction.

Source

Dewey, Joseph. Understanding Richard Powers. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

A Prayer for Owen Meany by John Irving (New York: Morrow, 1989) novel

John IRVING’S A Prayer for Owen Meany is a bildungsroman about a young man who comes to believe that the childhood friend who killed his mother—the Owen Meany of the title—might actually be an instrument of God.

The novel’s narrator, John Wheelwright, who has left his hometown of Gravesend, New Hampshire, to live in Toronto, partly in protest of his nation’s involvement in the VIETNAM WAR, retells the story of his mother’s death from a foul ball hit by Owen Meany and of his adventures growing up in the 1950s and 1960s as a ward of the local prep school. Owen Meany, whose dialogue is reprinted in all-caps to convey the peculiarly “wrecked” quality of his voice, is convinced that the accidental murder has marked him, and he spends the rest of his life preparing to play his part in what he discerns as God’s unfolding plan. In the meantime, the turmoil of the 1960s begins to erupt, and Owen in particular gets caught up in the countercultural zeitgeist.

Inspired by his former teacher Frederick BUECHNER, Irving seeks in this novel to combine a complex exploration of faith with an account of how his generation has been shaped by historical events, beginning with John F. Kennedy’s assassination in 1963 and continuing through the Iran-Contra scandal in the 1980s. The novel also looks back to nineteenth-century British novelists Charles Dickens and William Makepeace Thackeray in its style, vividness of its characterization, and intricacy of its plot.

Sources

Campbell, Josie P. John Irving: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Davis, Todd F., and Kenneth Womack. The Critical Response to John Irving. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Price, Reynolds (1933– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright, essayist

I think our knowledge of one another is simply there, waiting. It's a common room where we inhabit, and it's waiting to be used by each of the genders.

—Conversations with Reynolds Price (1991)

Reynolds Price was born in Macon, a small rural town in North Carolina. He was educated at Duke University, where he received his B.A. in 1955. Price’s debut novel, A Long and Happy Life (1962), draws on his family experience and explores the comic and romantic adventures of its younger characters, Rosacake Mustion and Wesley Beavers, lovers who have trouble sorting out their feelings. Kate Vaiden (1986), one of Price’s most important novels and winner of the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, explores through his main character the degree to which individuals bear a responsibility to their families. Other novels, such as Love and Work (1968), have grown out of Price’s experience as a college professor. The Surface of the Earth (1975) and The Source of Light (1981) continue Price’s concern with family destinies and sibling relationships, as do A Generous Man (1966), Good Hearts (1988), and The Promise of Rest (1995). In The Good Son’s Priest (2005), his fourteenth novel, a New York art conservator decides to go home to rural North Carolina to reconcile with his father, an emotionally distant Episcopal priest, in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

Price has also published important work in other genres. His Collected Stories was published in 1993. Among his published plays are Early Dark (1977) and Full Moon and Other Plays (1993). His poetry is collected in several volumes, including Vital Provisions (1982), The Laws of Ice (1986), and The Use of Fire (1990).

A wide-ranging essayist who is concerned with literature, autobiography, and the Bible, Price has published A Common Room: Essays 1954–1987 (1987); Clear Pictures: First Loves, First Guides (1989); A Whole New Way of Life (1994); and The Three Gospels (1996).

Sources

Schiff, James. Understanding Reynolds Price. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.

Schiff, ed. Critical Essays on Reynolds Price. New York: G. K. Hall, 1998.

The Prince of Tides by Pat Conroy (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986) novel

PAT CONROY's fifth novel, The Prince of Tides, is a lyrical tale of Southern dysfunction that, both in its verbosity and in its preoccupation with hereditary violence and guilt, looks back to such classics of Southern literature as William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury (1929), Robert Penn Warren's ALL THE KING'S MEN (1946), and, most directly, Thomas Wolfe's Look Homeward, Angel (1929).

Conroy's narrator is Tom Wingo, an unemployed English teacher and high-school football coach who, on the same evening that his wife informs him that she's seeing another man, learns from his mother that his sister, Savannah, has tried to kill herself. Tom flies to New York to help, and while there, begins a series of therapeutic sessions with Savannah's psychiatrist.

The novel moves back and forth from 1980s Manhattan to Tom's memories of his past in short vignettes—such as the sequence in which his grandmother Tolitha visits a funeral home to try out coffins—that often directly recall Wolfe's Look Homeward, Angel. Although some critics faulted Conroy for what they regarded as overblown prose, others praised the book as a satisfying, thunderous melodrama.

Source

Burns, Landon C. Pat Conroy: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

—Marshall Boswell

Proulx, Annie (1935– ) novelist, short-story writer

Place and history are central to the fiction I write, both in the broad, general sense and in detailed particulars.

—Interview (1999)

Born in Norwich, Connecticut, in 1935, the oldest of five daughters, Annie Proulx worked as freelance writer and had written several cooking and gardening “how-to” books before establishing her critical reputation as a literary writer in her late fifties. In her three novels and two collections of short fiction, Proulx has explored the remote reaches of North America, perhaps most memorably in the fading, demythol-ogized American West depicted in Close Range: Wyoming Stories (1999). Proulx's first novel, Postcards (1992), won the 1993 PEN/FAULKNER AWARD, while her second, The Shipping News, published the following year, won many literary awards, including the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for fiction and the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1994. Her third novel, Accordion Crimes, a picaresque novel spanning the 1890s through the 1990s, was published in 1996. Proulx's fiction has typically centered on seemingly ordinary characters as they struggle to come to terms with the overarching historical changes that have transformed both their lives and the landscape they inhabit.

Because of her father's career in the textile industry, Proulx moved frequently throughout her childhood, living at various times in Connecticut, North Carolina, upstate New York, Vermont, Maine, and Rhode Island. She attended Colby College in Maine, but dropped out; Proulx later attended the University of Vermont in Burlington, where she earned a B.A. in 1969. While in school, she also began to publish stories for young adults in the teen magazine Seventeen; her first story, “All the Pretty Little Horses,” appeared in June 1964. In 1973 Proulx earned an M.A. in history from the Sir George Williams University in Montreal, and she pursued a Ph.D. in Renaissance economic history before dropping out of graduate school in 1975 to become a freelance journalist, writing for such magazines as Gray's Sporting Journal and Outdoor Life. While working as a journalist, she began to publish short stories, mainly in sporting and outdoor magazines, several of which appeared in her first book of fiction, Heart Songs and Other Stories (1988).

In addition to the Pulitzer Prize and the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, Proulx has won a National Magazine Award for her short story “Brokeback Mountain,” collected in Close Range. Her short story “The Half-Skinned Steer,” also in Close Range, was included by John Updike in The Best American Short Stories of the Century (1999). In 2001 The Shipping News was adapted into a motion picture starring Kevin Spacey, and four years later “Brokeback Mountain” also appeared as an award-winning movie by the same title.

Sources

“An Interview with Annie Proulx,” Missouri Review, 22, no. 2 (1999): 79–90.

Rood, Karen L. Understanding Annie Proulx. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

—Matthew Shipe

Psychoanalytic Criticism

Psychoanalytic criticism adapts the principles of psychoanalysis to the interpretation of literature. The first major wave of psychoanalytic criticism, which reached its zenith in the 1940s and 1950s when the theories developed by Sigmund Freud had achieved widespread circulation, borrowed heavily from Freudian concepts such as the Oedipal complex, the id/ego/superego model of the psyche, and his general theories of neurosis and sexual repression. Freud had an interest in literature, and he often used literary works in his writings for vivid illustrations of his theories. His reading of the Oedipus myth and its relationship to William Shakespeare's Hamlet, as well as such works as "Some Character-Types Met with in Psychoanalytic Work" (1916), served as models for the original psychoanalytic critics of the postwar period.

Edmund Wilson, Lionel Trilling, and Frederick Crews applied Freudian models to a wide range of literary works and to their authors, locating latent oedipal anxieties, childhood trauma, maternal fixations, and other staples of Freudian thinking in the novels (as well as in the personal experiences) of Edith Wharton, Ernest Hemingway, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and many others. Harold Bloom developed his general theory of "the anxiety of influence" around Freud's oedipal conflict. Bloom suggested that each new poet must wrestle with the artistic debt he owed to his predecessor poets, a debt that Bloom compares to the complex matrix of resentment and obligation a son feels toward his father.

In the late 1960s French psychoanalytic theorist Jacques Lacan, applying a Poststructuralist twist to Freud's basic theories, proposed that the unconscious was structured the same way Poststructuralists viewed language—that is, as an unstable chain of signifiers whose signified was always already deferred. Thanks to its unique blending of psychoanalytic practice and literary theory, Lacan's model has in many respects eclipsed that of Freud among contemporary psychoanalytic literary critics, though both models are still in wide circulation.

In recent years, as psychological research increasingly favors biological and chemical solutions in the United States, the reputations of both Freud and Lacan have come under attack by practicing psychotherapists as well as by cultural critics (including, with especial vehemence, Crews), casting doubt on the sustainability of current psychoanalytic critical practice.

Source

Wright, Elizabeth. Psychoanalytic Criticism: Theory in Practice. London: Methuen, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

The Public Burning by Robert Coover (New York: Viking, 1977) novel

The Public Burning is Postmodern novelist Robert COOVER's POP-ART send-up of the trial of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who, in the early 1950s, were accused, tried, and found guilty of treason at the height of the COLD WAR. The novel's primary narrator is a young Richard M. Nixon, second in command to President Dwight D. Eisenhower. From his position as vice president Nixon looks back at his days as a congressman and his close involvement in the 1948 Alger Hiss spy investigation as a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Although E. L. DOCTOROW had already fictionalized historical characters in his novels The Book of Daniel (1971) and RAGTIME (1974), Coover's employment of this same device in the context of self-reflexive Postmodern fiction helped pave the way for such works as Don DELILLO's Libra (1988), which fictionalizes the life of Lee Harvey Oswald, and Christopher Sorrentino's Trance (2006), which retells the kidnapping of Patty Hearst by the Symbionese Liberation Army in 1974.

Source

Evenson, Brian. Understanding Robert Coover. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Purdy, James (1923– ) novelist, poet, playwright

Purdy was born in Fremont, Ohio, and attended the University of Chicago and the University of Puebla in Mexico. He taught at Sarah Lawrence College and at New York University, but since 1953 has devoted himself to writing full-time.

Purdy's work often features grotesque characters, and his novels explore the relationship between parents and children. Sex, love, and violence are often intertwined in his plots. Malcolm (1959), the novel that established his reputation, is about an orphan in search of a father. Many of the characters the orphan meets resemble stereotypical comic-book figures, and the novel itself questions the substantiality of the world Malcolm confronts. The Nephew (1960), Purdy's next novel, also focuses on an orphan, this time a man missing in action in Korea. One of the families he lives with attempts to reconstruct the story of his life, learning in the process how difficult it is ever to fathom another individual.

Much of Purdy's writing, as in his third novel, Cabot Wright Begins (1964), takes a dim view of American life, seeing it as dominated by the media, big business, and popular culture. Cabot Wright, yet another orphan, asserts himself through the act of raping a woman. Purdy's later novels—Eustace Chisholm and the Works (1967), Jeremy's Version (1970), and The House of the Solitary Maggot (1974)—heighten Purdy's perception of violence at the core of the American family. In general, Purdy's novels reveal a pessimistic examination of the ambiguous and often surrealistic nature of American life.

Purdy has collected his short fiction in Selected Stories, 1956–1987 (1991). He has published several plays, including Proud Flesh: Four Short Plays (1980) and Scrap of Paper, and the Berry-Picker (1981). He has also published several volumes of poetry.

Source

Chupack, Henry. James Purdy. Boston: Twayne, 1975.

Pynchon, Thomas (1937– ) novelist, short-story writer

Get too conceptual, too cute and remote, and your characters die on the page.

—Pynchon's introduction to Slow Learner, 1984

Thomas Pynchon has succeeded in keeping the details of his life obscure and inaccessible. He was born in 1937 in Glen Cove, Long Island, to Thomas Ruggles Pynchon Sr., an industrial surveyor, and Frances Bennet Pynchon. After graduating salutatorian of the Oyster Bay High School Class of 1953, Pynchon accepted a scholarship to Cornell University, where he studied engineering. After a short stint in the navy, he returned to Cornell, changed his major to English, and attended Vladimir NABOKOV's course on the European novel. Pynchon's first published story, "The Small Rain," appeared in The Cornell Writer in 1959.

After graduating in 1959, Pynchon spent a brief period in New York City's Greenwich Village before moving to Seattle to accept a job with Boeing as a technical writer. He quit the job in 1962 to complete his first novel, V. (1963), which won the William Faulkner Foundation Award for best first novel

Thomas Pynchon

Dust jacket for Pynchon's first book, 1963, which won the William Faulkner Foundation First Novel Award of the year. A quest narrative, V. is a sprawling, multifarious novel that ranges from Greenwich Village to Malta to Africa. At the center of the book's dizzying plot stands Herbert Stencil, a former employee of the London Foreign Office who undertakes an obsessive quest for the identity of a mysterious woman known only as V. Set against Stencil is Benny Profane, a "schlemihl and human yo-yo" who, in direct contrast to the regimented and order-demanding Stencil, drifts through his bohemian existence in 1950s New York comically avoiding all responsibility. The novel stages a conflict between Stencil's vision of rigid order and Profane's nihilistic resistance to systemization.

The Crying of Lot 49 (1965), Pynchon's follow-up novella, redefines the opposition between Stencil and Profane as one of paranoia vs. antiparanoia. Oedipa Mass, a dissatisfied California housewife, gets assigned as executor of the vast estate of her former love, Pierce Inverarity, a successful California real estate mogul. In the course of her researches into Pierce's

From the reviews of Thomas Pynchon's V.

"Nothing more intricately conceived than Thomas Pynchon's first novel has appeared in American fiction since the work in the thirties by Faulkner, Nathanael West and Djuna Barnes. . . . His ambitions in V. are prodigious, enough to demand comparison less with Perelman than with the Joyce of the Circe episode of Ulysses. He shows unusual capacities for philosophical discriminations, an astonishing knowledgeability—of history, medicine, geography, sexual lore—all expressed with an authoritative ease, especially remarkable in a young writer, and he has the eye and ear of a great parodist."

—Richard Poirier, New York Review of Books

"The identity of V., what her many guises are meant to suggest, will cause much speculation. What will be remembered, whether or not V. remains elusive, is Pynchon's remarkable ability—which includes a vigorous and imaginative style, a robust humor, a tremendous reservoir of information . . . and, above all, a sense of how to use and balance these talents."

—George Plimpton, The New York Times Book Review

Dust jacket for Pynchon's second novel, 1966, which won the Rosenthal Foundation Award of the National Institute and American Academy of Arts and Letters estate, she stumbles upon—or is directed toward—the existence of an alternative postal system named the Trystero whose roots perhaps reach all the way back to Jacobean England. Oedipa is never sure if she's discovering something real or merely being put on. Readers of the novella are invited to wonder the same thing.

Gravity's Rainbow (1973) is in many respects the true follow-up novel to V.; some critics have jokingly suggested that it should be called V-2. Nearly eight hundred pages long, Gravity's Rainbow is an encyclopedic novel set in London and in Occupied Germany in the final months of WORLD WAR II. It focuses on the V-2 rocket, developed by the Germans and notable as the first rocket to travel faster than the speed of sound. The novel's protagonist, Lieutenant Tyrone Slothrop, is an American working in London who becomes convinced—perhaps not without reason—that his sexual experiences around the city are somehow tied to the location of V-2 bombings. From this basic premise Pynchon spins an intricate and unwieldy tale consisting of over four hundred characters and a dozen or so plotlines, some of which never intersect. Pynchon's culminating vision of the war is less one of battles won and lost than of systems of exchange taking place behind the scenes and glimpsed at furtively. The novel is arguably the most important Postmodern novel in the American literary canon.

Since Gravity's Rainbow, Pynchon has published three more novels. The relatively cheerful Vineland (1989) returns Pynchon to the contemporary California setting of The Crying of Lot 49 and follows the fate of an assortment of 1960s hippies as they negotiate the conservative Reagan era. Mason & Dixon (1997) is another encyclopedic work, reminiscent of John Barth's 1960 Postmodern classic, The Sot-Weed Factor. Set in the eighteenth century and written in a remarkable pastiche of eighteenth-century prose, Pynchon's Mason & Dixon features as joint protagonists the two men who established the Mason-Dixon line, which created the informal division between the Northern and Southern United States. In the novel the two surveyors cross the still untamed country while charting the transit of Venus, an astrological phenomenon in which Venus passes between the earth and the sun. Along the way they smoke hash with George Washington, meet Benjamin Franklin, and encounter a robotic dog, among other wonders.

Dust jacket for Pynchon's third novel, 1973, winner of the National Book Award, which he refused to accept

In November 2006 Pynchon published his longest and most surprising novel yet, the 1,085-page Against the Day. The novel is set in the decades spanning from the 1893 Chicago World's Fair until the end of World War I. It begins with a quartet of boyish adventurers dubbed The Chums of Chance as they arrive at the Fair via air balloon. There they meet Merle Rideout, a traveling photographer who is friends with a Colorado miner and anarchist dynamiter named Webb Traverse. The book addresses arcane mathematics, the career of renegade inventor (and enemy of Thomas Edison) Nikola Tesla, the rise of technology, the triumph of capitalism and its connection to the twentieth-century world-war phenomenon, lens optics, union politics, and countless other themes. Numerous plotlines and a kaleidoscopic range of prose styles also invoke such genres as adolescent adventure stories and the Western revenge drama as well as specific works by Jules Verne, Mark Twain, H. G. Wells, and other writers of the period dramatized in this exhaustive novel.

Pynchon's work is so influential and distinctive that critics have coined the term "Pynchonesque" to describe novels that seem particularly indebted to or suspiciously derivative of Pynchon's style. A Pynchonesque novel usually exhibits a quartet of heterogeneous features associated with Pynchon's own novels: the work must be ambitious; it must be nonlinear in structure and feature numerous narrative strands that interact in intricate ways or not at all; it must demonstrate expertise in both arcane science and occult history, in high culture and popular culture; and it must be both grimly apocalyptic and comic.

Even more important than the existence of the term is its prevalence. Pynchon's distinctive style and approach have been embraced and replicated by some of the most important writers of the last two generations, including Salman Rushdie, Martin Amis, Don DeLillo, David Foster Wallace, Richard Powers, and a host of others.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Pynchon

V. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1963.

The Crying of Lot 49. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1966.

Gravity's Rainbow. New York: Viking, 1973.
Slow Learner. Boston: Little, Brown, 1984.
Vineland. Boston: Little, Brown, 1990.
Mason & Dixon. New York: Holt, 1997.
Against the Day. New York: Penguin, 2006.

Studying Thomas Pynchon

As of 2007, Thomas Pynchon has written six novels and a collection of short stories. He is regarded as master of Postmodern fiction.

Biographical details about Thomas Pynchon are a scant few. One useful source of biographical information, however, is Bernard Duyfhuizen and John M. Kraft's Thomas Pynchon entry in the Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 173 (Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale, 1996). Duyfhuizen and Kraft's entry collects the available biographical information and provides contextual information about most of Pynchon's publishing career.

If the absence of Pynchon's biographical details has created a vacuum of information, the amount of critical attention his novels garner overfills that void. As of spring 2007, the MLA bibliography lists 1,274 critical works. Pynchon Notes is a biannual journal that maintains a cumulative bibliography of articles on its website (<<http://www.ham.muohio.edu/~krafftjm/pynchon.html>> viewed July 11, 2007). That abundance of critical material makes identifying the essential works a daunting task; however, there exists some foundational critical works that will assist the inquiring student about Pynchon's works. The earliest book-length critical work is Joseph Slade's Thomas Pynchon (New York: Warner, 1974), which studies several of the subjects (science, math, physics) that Pynchon's fiction examines. Two more important early works are William M. Plater's outline of Pynchon's major themes in The Grim Phoenix: Reconstructing Thomas Pynchon (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978), and David Cowart's Thomas Pynchon: The Art of Allusion (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1980), which investigates Pynchon's allusions to art, music, film, and literature. In Ideas of Order in the Novels of Thomas Pynchon (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1983), Molly Hite examines the literariness of Pynchon's prose. David Seed explicates Pynchon's early novels in The Fictional Labyrinths of Thomas Pynchon (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1988), while Deborah L. Madsen's The Postmodernist Allegories of Thomas Pynchon (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991) considers Pynchon's Postmodern appropriation of allegory. Helpful collected works to which students could turn include Thomas Pynchon, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003); Thomas Pynchon: Reading from the Margins, edited by Niran Abbas (Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2003); and American Postmodernity: Essays on the Recent Fiction of Thomas Pynchon, edited by Ian D. Copestack (Bern: Peter Lang, 2003).

Pynchon's complex style also attracts individual reading guides and full studies produced for readers of his novels. The student studying Pynchon will be well served by consulting the following guides: J. Kerry Grant's A Companion to V. (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001) and A Companion to The Crying of Lot 49 (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001), Kathryn Hume's Pynchon's Mythography: An Approach to Gravity's Rainbow (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987), Steven Weisenburger's A Gravity's Rainbow Companion (Athens: University Georgia Press, 1988), and Mason & Dixon & Pynchon by Charles Clerc (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2000).

—Student Guide by Casey Boyle

Quakers

Founded by George Fox (1624–1691), Quakerism, or the Society of Friends, is a spiritual practice that believes each individual is capable of experiencing divine guidance through the indwelling spirit or “light of Christ,” as described in the apostle Paul’s proclamation “Ye are all children of light” (1 Thess. 5:5). As part of the larger movement of dissenters in Protestant England, Quakers espoused radicalism regarding church governance and membership. They embraced simplicity and believed in the spirit within. Jerry William Frost explains, “The inward light was not a subjective feeling, a mystical intuition, reason, or conscience; it was a ‘real spiritual substance’ that the soul of man could ‘feel and apprehend.’” Known by various names, such as Children of Light, Friends in the Truth, and Friends, their formal name is the Religious Society of Friends. The term “Quaker,” meant to be derogatory, was used by an English judge to describe George Fox, who had rebuked the judge by proposing that he “tremble at the word of the Lord.”

Believing that each day is holy, Quakers, like the SEPARATISTS, did not celebrate specific religious holidays, nor did they refer to the days or months of the calendar by their non-Christian derived names, such as June, named for the god Jupiter, and Monday, named for the moon, so that instead of referring to Monday, June 1, they referred to Second Day, Third Month. In addition, Quakers did not recognize conventional authority and refused to bow or remove hats when in the presence of English royalty or magistrates. These collective behaviors led to persecution in England and caused many Quakers to immigrate to America, where they also experienced prejudice; however, they did find refuge in New Jersey, in Roger WILLIAMS’s Rhode Island, and in William PENN’s Pennsylvania. Because the conditions in England were uncertain, Quakers remained in the New World, many not returning even after passage of the Toleration Act of 1689.

As pacifists, Quakers did not support the slave trade and abstained from using its products—tea, sugar, and molasses. Daniel B. Shea describes the inherent egalitarianism of Quakerism: “the notion that all men possess something of divinity within themselves laid a strong base for democratic political ideas and for the development of the Quaker testimony against slavery.” John WOOLMAN, for example, administered to the poor, advocated for Native Americans, and fought for the abolition of slavery. In Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (1754), he asserts, “To consider mankind otherwise than brethren, to think favours are peculiar to one nation and exclude others, plainly supposes a darkness in the understanding.”

Quakers supported women speaking in meetings and encouraged them to write. Elizabeth ASHBRIDGE’s Some Account of the Fore Part of the Life of Elizabeth Ashbridge (1755) describes her trials with an unbelieving husband and her own self-doubt: “it was required of me in a more Publick manner to Confess to the world what I was and to give up in Prayer in a Meeting, the sight of which & the power that attended it made me Tremble, & I could not hold my Self still.” From their immigration to Pennsylvania in 1656, Quakers initiated a vital discussion of religious tolerance and freedom throughout early America.

Sources

Bacon, Margaret Hope. The Quiet Rebels: The Story of the Quakers in America. New York: Basic Books, 1969.

Frost, Jerry William. The Quaker Family in Colonial America: A Portrait of the Society of Friends. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1973.

Marietta, Jack D. The Reformation of American Quakerism, 1748–1783. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984.

Weddle, Meredith Baldwin. Walking in the Way of Peace: Quaker Pacifism in the Seventeenth Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

R

Ramsay, David (1749–1815) physician, statesman, historian

The political creed of an American Colonist was short but substantial. . . . He believed that . . . all government was a political institution between men naturally equal, not for the aggrandizement of one, or a few, but for the general happiness of the whole community.

—The History of the American Revolution (1789)

David Ramsay was born in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, a son of James Ramsay and Jane Montgomery Ramsay. He graduated from the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University) in 1765 and became a Latin tutor in Worcester County, Maryland. He went on to receive medical training at the College of Philadelphia from 1770 to 1773.

In 1773, Ramsay moved to Charleston, South Carolina. In 1775 he married Sabina Ellis, the daughter of a prosperous local merchant. She died the following year. In 1783 he married Frances Witherspoon, a daughter of Princeton's president, who died one year later; they had one son. Ramsay's last marriage was to Martha Laurens, the daughter of Henry Laurens, one of South Carolina's wealthiest merchants and one-time president of the Continental Congress; they had eleven children.

Ramsay began a career in the South Carolina state legislature in 1776, which was interrupted by his service as a physician at the British army's siege of Savannah in 1779 and Charleston in 1780. When South Carolina fell to the British in 1780, Ramsay was arrested and exiled to Florida. He returned to the United States in July 1781 and was elected to Congress as a representative for South Carolina, serving from 1782 to 1786. As a political leader, he was able to collect the documents he needed for The History of the Revolution of South-Carolina, from a British Province to an Independent State (1785). His South Carolina history emphasized the justness of the cause, but also the cost of the struggle, especially the destruction of property and the trampling of civil liberties. The "security and protection which individuals expect by entering into civil society," he wrote, "ceased almost totally" when the British moved through South Carolina.

Upon completion of his history of South Carolina, Ramsay began work on The History of the American Revolution (1789). Again he took advantage of his proximity to both the documents and the political figures of the Revolution. According to Ramsay, the roots of the Revolution lay in England's Glorious Revolution of 1688, which brought William and Mary to the throne. "At that eventual aera," he wrote, "the line was first drawn between the privileges of subjects, and the prerogatives of sovereigns." The original settlers, he continued, were "of that class of people, which was most hostile to the claims of prerogative" Thus, division was inevitable.

Ramsay was outspoken in his histories, pointing out that disputes tend to take on a life of their own, blurring original disagreements. About the Intolerable Acts of 1774, he wrote:

By the first, the property of unoffending thousands is arbitrarily taken away, for the act of a few individuals; by the second our chartered liberties are annihilated; and by the third, our lives may be destroyed with impunity. Property, liberty, and life, are all sacrificed on the altar of ministerial vengeance.

Portrait of David Ramsay

After serving in Congress, Ramsay became an advocate of stronger central government. In a letter to Thomas JEFFERSON dated April 7, 1787, he pointed out:

Our governments in the Southern States are much more quiet than in the northern but much of our quiet arises from the temporising of the legislatures in refusing legal protection to the prosecution of the just rights of creditors. Our eyes now are all fixed on the continental convention to be held in Philada. in May next. Unless they make an efficient federal government I fear that the end of the matter will be an American monarch or rather three or more confederacies.

In 1788 Ramsay tried to run for the House of Representatives of the first American Congress but failed because of his abolitionist sympathies. His attempt at senatorial election in 1794 failed for the same reason. He did serve in the South Carolina House of Representatives from 1789 to 1790 and the South Carolina Senate from 1790 to 1800, and was president of the latter from 1790 to 1798. With the ascendancy of the Jeffersonians in 1800, Ramsey, a FEDERALIST, abandoned hope of national office.

Ramsay spent the last fifteen years of his life writing history. His Life of George Washington appeared in 1807, and was dedicated “to Emperors, Kings, and Others, exercising sovereign power in the Old World; in hopes that from the example of George Washington in the New, they will learn to avoid War, to promote good will in the family of mankind, and use all the power they possess, for the Public good. . . .” His History of South-Carolina from Its First Settlement in 1670, to the Year 1808 (1807) appeared the same year. This two-volume work provided information about the state of South Carolina from its beginning to the date of publication, including its political, military, social, administrative, economic, medical, legal, ecclesiastical, agricultural, artistic, natural, and literary history.

Ramsay’s return to local history after his history of the Revolution and biography of Washington may have been the result of his disillusionment with politics on the national level. After the political struggles of the 1790s and his exile at the hands of the Jeffersonians—and with the growing divisiveness of slavery—he may have doubted that unity in America was possible. Ramsay died on May 8, 1815.

Works

Ramsay, David. The History of the Revolution of South-Carolina, from a British Province to an Independent State, 2 volumes. Trenton, N.J.: Printed by Isaac Collins, 1785; Early American Imprints, 19211.

Ramsay. The History of the American Revolution, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by R. Aitken, 1789; Early American Imprints, 22090; Indianapolis: Liberty Classics, 1990.

Ramsay. The Life of George Washington, Commander In Chief of the Armies of the United States of America, throughout the War Which Established Their Independence, and First President of the United States. New York: Printed by Hopkins & Seymour, 1807; <<http://www.earlyamerica.com/lives/gwlife>> (viewed August 18, 2006).

Sources

Cohen, Lester H. The Revolutionary Histories: Contemporary Narratives of the American Revolution. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1980.

Gillespie, Joanna Bowen. The Life and Times of Martha Laurens Ramsay, 1759–1811. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

Hostetler, Michael J. “David Ramsay and Louisiana: Time and Space in the Adolescent Rhetoric of America,” Western Journal of Communication, 70 (2006): 134–146.

Shaffer, Arthur H. To Be an American: David Ramsay and the Making of the American Consciousness. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Title page for Ramsay's history compiled by sending questionnaires to leading men throughout the state

Recommended Writings

The History of the American Revolution (1785)

The Life of George Washington . . . (1807)

Studying David Ramsay

David Ramsay was a physician, statesman, and Revolutionary-era historian known most famously for his works on South Carolina and George WASHINGTON. For a study of David Ramsay and his contemporary world, see Lester H. Cohen's The Revolutionary Histories: Contemporary Narratives of the American Revolution (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1980); Arthur H. Shaffer's To Be an American: David Ramsay and the Making of the American Consciousness (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991); Joanna Bowen Gillespie's The Life and Times of Martha Laurens Ramsay, 1759–1811 (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001); and Robert A. Ferguson's Reading the Early Republic

(Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press, 2004). For an examination of Ramsay and the Louisiana Territory, see Michael J. Hostetler's "David Ramsay and Louisiana: Time and Space in the Adolescent Rhetoric of America." Western Journal of Communication 70 (2006): 134–146. For studies on the writing of history, students should consult William Raymond Smith's History As Argument; Three Patriot Historians of the American Revolution (The Hague: Mouton & Co, 1967); Richard Brandon Morris, Alden T. Vaughan, and George Athan Billias's Perspectives on Early American History; Essays in Honor of Richard B. Morris (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); and Steven H. Jaffe's Who Were the Founding Fathers: Two Hundred Years of Reinventing American History (New York: Holt, 1996). The David Ramsay Letters (1786–1808) and other archival materials are located at the University of South Carolina Library.

Ramsay, Martha Laurens (1759–1811) diarist

Martha Laurens was born on November 3, 1759, in Charleston, South Carolina, to Henry and Eleanor Ball Laurens. Her mother, older sister, and both her brothers died when she was young, and by the time she was nineteen, only her father remained. Although Henry Laurens was a leading PATRIOT during the American Revolution, he sent Martha to live in England and France during the war. They were reunited when Henry went to France as one of the peace negotiators in 1782; Martha then joined him as his secretary.

Martha Laurens began writing as a child, drawing up a "Covenant with God" when she was fourteen. In her private musings, she expressed her concern that she would be corrupted by the "gay, worldly, & even . . . profane Company" she would encounter abroad. Instead, the evangelical movement in England reinforced her tendency to religiosity, and during her years in Europe she wrote meditations on the condition of her soul.

She returned to Charleston in 1785 at the age of twenty-five. Her elderly father, who was dying, was treated by the physician David RAMSAY, a widower and the father of an infant son. In 1787 Laurens married Ramsay, and the couple had eleven children, whom Martha Ramsay educated at home. By 1791 Ramsay had returned to diary-keeping, recording her fears of alienation from God after the deaths of three of her children and her husband's frequent financial difficulties. The diary focused more on her emotional state than on the details of these events; however, the distress that was evident in the diary did not prevent Ramsay from providing maternal support to her children, evident in letters to her family.

Although Ramsay intended her writings as a private means to help her cope with life, her husband published her diary, letters, religious meditations, and religious exercises in 1811, soon after her death. To introduce this collection, Memoirs of the Life of Martha Laurens Ramsay, David Ramsay wrote a forty-six-page biography of his wife. The publication brought Martha Laurens Ramsay immediate admiration within nineteenth-century evangelical Protestant circles, whose members praised her for her spiritual intensity.

Work

Ramsay, Martha Laurens. Memoirs of Martha Laurens Ramsay, Who Died in Charleston, S.C., on the Tenth of June, 1811, in the Fifty-Second Year of Her Age. Philadelphia: Printed by James Maxwell, 1811; Philadelphia: American Sunday-School Union, 1845.

Sources

Gillespie, Joanna Bowen. The Life and Times of Martha Laurens Ramsay, 1759–1811. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

Gillespie. "Martha Laurens Ramsay: A Case Study of Diary as Autobiography," in A Women's Diaries Miscellany, edited by Jane Dupree Begos. Weston, Conn.: Magic Circle Press, 1989.

Reed, Esther De Berdt (1746–1780) philanthropist, relief worker, organizer

Esther De Berdt Reed is best remembered for Sentiments of an American Woman, in which she called for women's participation in the Revolutionary War. Her war-relief work helped lay the foundation of women's future participation in philanthropy and in public life in general.

Esther De Berdt was born on October 22, 1746 in London, the only daughter of Dennys De Berdt, a prosperous merchant who helped repeal the STAMP ACT, and Martha Symons. The De Berdts were descended from Flemish Huguenot exiles and were strident Independents. In 1763 Joseph Reed (1741–1785) from Trenton, New Jersey, arrived in London to study law at the Middle Temple and to represent his father's interests with the De Berdt mercantile firm. For the next two years, Esther De Berdt and Joseph Reed became closely acquainted, and when he departed for America in 1765, they maintained a five-year-correspondence. On May 31, 1770, Esther De Berdt and Joseph Reed were married in London, and along with her widowed mother they returned to America. They settled in Philadelphia, where Joseph became a prosperous lawyer and a political leader. They were close friends of leading congressmen, including George WASHINGTON and John ADAMS. From July 1775 to January 1777, Joseph Reed was military secretary to George Washington, and then adjutant general of the Continental Army. He also served in the Continental Congress from 1777 to 1778. While her husband served with Washington in the Continental Army, Esther Reed embraced the PATRIOT's cause. In a letter to her brother Dennis in London, Esther wrote from Philadelphia on July 22, 1775: "every heart and every hand almost, is warm and active in the cause: certainly, my dear brother, it is a glorious one. You see every person willing to sacrifice his private interest in this glorious contest. Virtue, honor, unanimity, bravery, —all conspire to carry it on, and sure it has at least a chance to be victorious. I believe it will, at last, whatever difficulties and discouragements it may meet with at first."

Reed began organizing the women of Philadelphia to canvass for donations for the Continental Army and mounted a broad canvassing effort, designed to mobilize women in neighboring states. When criticisms were levied against her public activities, Reed responded with The Sentiments of an American Woman, published anonymously as a broadside on January 10, 1780. It reflected the growing confidence of American women that they were capable of patriotic commitments no less deeply held than men's. Reed wrote:

Our ambition is kindled by the fame of those heroines of antiquity, who have rendered their sex illustrious, and have proved to the universe, that, if the weakness of our Constitution, if opinion and manners did not forbid us to march to glory by the same path as the Men, we should at least equal and sometimes surpass them in our love for the public good. I glory in all that which my sex has done great and commendable.

In the days following the broadside, Reed and a group of about forty of Philadelphia's most prominent women, including Sarah Franklin Bache and Julia Stockton Rush, gathered to organize efforts to benefit the Revolutionary soldiers. Over the next six months, the women collected 1645 individual donations and raised $300,766. They then presented General Washington with a plan to supplement each revolutionary soldier's pay by $2; when this idea was rejected they instead took on a massive sewing project and delivered 2200 hand-made shirts, each with monogrammed with the woman's name who had sewn the garment. As the project was being completed, Esther de Berdt Reed died in a dysentery epidemic on September 18, 1780.

Sources

Kerber, Linda. Women of the Republic: Intellect and Ideology in Revolutionary America. Chapel Hill: Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture by the University of North Carolina Press, 1980.

Norton, Mary Beth. "The Philadelphia Ladies Association," American Heritage, 31, no. 3 (1980): 102–107.

Republicanism

Republicanism is the belief in upholding civic virtue as the foundation for a limited government built upon the consent of the governed, wherein the needs of the larger society take precedence over individual interests. Republicanism in early America was founded upon the principles of virtue, disinterestedness, and popular sovereignty, in which the electorate ultimately holds the power; it is devoted to the preservation of the public good and guided by a benevolent leadership committed to protecting the disenfranchised—women, slaves, nonlandholding men, and the poor—from tyranny, conquest, and natural disasters. Democratic participation was essential for republicanism; with the ideal gentleman farmer voting alongside the enlightened merchant, American government could avoid the greed and corruption associated with British and European values. Classical models of Greek governance and the Roman republic and ENLIGHTENMENT sources from the commonsense philosophy of John Locke (1632–1704), David Hume (1711–1776), and Charles de Secondat, Baron de Montesquieu (1689–1755) provided inspiration for revolutionary pamphleteers, such as Thomas PAINE, and leaders, such as John ADAMS and Thomas JEFFERSON, involved in forming and constituting an American form of republicanism devoted to a free government that extended individual rights to pursue “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.”

Sources

Appleby, Joyce. Liberalism and Republicanism in the Historical Imagination. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992.

Beeman, Richard R. The Varieties of Political Experience in Eighteenth-Century America. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Gould, Philip. Covenant and Republic: Historical Romance and the Politics of Puritanism. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Revere, Paul (1735–1818) patriot, silversmith

In Medford, I awaked the Captain of the Minute men; and after that, I alarmed almost every House, till I got to Lexington.

—Paul Revere to Jeremy Belknap, 1798

Paul Revere was born in Boston's North End on December 21, 1735, the son of French Huguenot, Apollos Rivoire (1702–1754; Apollos changed the family name to Revere) and a Bostonian, Deborah Hitchborn (1704–1777). Revere learned silversmithing from his father and attended North Writing School, where he learned grammar. In 1754 his father died, leaving him to provide the family's income. In 1756 Revere volunteered to fight the French at Lake George, New York. The following year he married Sarah Orne (1736–1773); the couple had eight children. After his wife's death Revere married Rachel Walker (1745–1813), and they had eight children.

Revere was not only an important silversmith but also a copperplate engraver. He produced illustrations for a variety of sources, such as gazettes, books, political cartoons, menus, and bookplates. Revere was also a dentist, performing tasks from teeth cleaning to wiring-in false teeth. As a member of the Masonic Lodge of St. Andrews, Revere became involved in local politics and was acquainted with many of the earliest PATRIOTS, including James OTIS and Dr. Joseph Warren (1741–1775).

In 1774 Revere conducted regular reconnaissance of British Soldiers, gathering information and intelligence for the Boston rebels. On April 18, 1775, after days of building tension in which the colonists observed increasing British presence in the Harbor and along the roads, Warren discovered British plans to seize Samuel ADAMS and John Hancock, who were at Lexington, and then to burn the stores at Concord. That night, between nine and ten o'clock, Warren summoned Revere and gave orders for him to ride from Boston to Lexington to warn Hancock and Adams of this plan. Another rider, William Dawes Jr. (1745–1799), traveled a different route. The two riders carried messages from Warren that stated:

A large body of the King's troops (supposed to be a brigade of about 12, or 1500) were embarked in boats from Boston, and gone to land at Lechmere's point.

Revere first stopped off at the houses of Robert Newman who had been previously instructed to help hang lanterns, or lathorns (made from paper-thin slices of cow's horn), in the steeple of the Old North Church, Boston's tallest building. The predetermined signal was to hang two lights if the British went out by water and one light if they went out by land. With Revere on his way home to collect his riding boots and clothes, Newman and Captain Pulling, another PATRIOT, then climbed the 154 steps to the church's steeple height and, for a few moments, held the two-lighted lanterns out the window for their fellow Whigs to see. Once the Charleston Patriots saw two lights flickering, they knew that the British were, as David Fischer Hackett explains, “leaving Boston by boat across the Back Bay to Cambridge.” Revere then hastened to Charleston by boat; after crossing the Charles River with help from Joshua Bentley and Thomas Richardson, Revere reached the shore, where he was given the deacon Larkin's horse, “Brown Beauty.” At about eleven o'clock that night, Revere set off for Lexington, arriving around midnight at the Reverend Jonas Clarke's house, where Adams and Hancock were in hiding. Dawes appeared with the same message half an hour later. After a brief rest, Revere and Dawes were then dispatched to Concord to warn of the approaching “Regulars,” or British soldiers.

Although Revere was momentarily captured and Dawes was forced to return to Lexington, the two riders managed to alert the countryside and subsequently mobilize the colonists. Revere later served in the Continental Army as a lieutenant colonel in the Massachusetts State Train of Artillery and commander of Castle Island in Boston Harbor.

Though Revere was not an author of early American literature, his stature as a figure in colonial history and as the subject of many songs and stories secures his place in early American culture. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's (1809–1882) "Paul Revere's Ride," from Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863), tells an embellished tale of a solitary rider alerting the countryside:

*Listen, my children, and you shall hear
Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere,
On the eighteenth of April, in Seventy-five;
Hardly a man is now alive
Who remembers that famous day and year.*

This romanticized image of Paul Revere stands at the forefront of the notion of an American as a passionate believer in liberty who would risk one's life for the greater call of preserving freedom.

Sources

Fischer, David Hackett. Paul Revere's Ride. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Triber, Jayne E. A True Republican: The Life of Paul Revere. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1998.

Rittenhouse, David (1732–1796) publisher, scientist

David Rittenhouse left a legacy of many papers on astronomy, the physical sciences, and mathematics, published in the first four volumes of The Transactions of the American Philosophical Society (1771–1774). In his An Oration, Delivered February 24, 1775, before the American Philosophical Society (1775), he argued that a moral universe would become more evident through scientific study.

Rittenhouse expressed his hope for America's permanent physical separation from Europe. "I am ready," he told his audience, "to wish—vain wish! that nature would raise her everlasting bars between the new and old world; and make a voyage to Europe as impracticable as one to the moon." Such a separation, he argued, would ensure the colonies' safe enjoyment of the "natural harmonies of the New World" and would protect the colonies from the corruptive influence of the Old. Rittenhouse was born to Matthias and Elizabeth Williams Rittenhouse in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on April 8, 1732. His family soon moved to Norriton, twenty miles from Philadelphia. He grew up on a farm, doing mathematical calculations on his plough, mastering Isaac Newton's (1642–1727) Principia (1687), and performing scientific experiments of his own devising. His mechanical ingenuity became evident when, at the age of seven, he constructed a complete miniature water mill. In his teenage years he abandoned farming and set up a small workshop for making clocks and mathematical instruments.

At the age of nineteen Rittenhouse met the Reverend William Barton, who later became his brother-in-law. Barton was educated and had a small personal library where Rittenhouse began to study late at night. In 1766 he married Eleanor Coulston and became the father of two children. Despite his growing responsibilities, he continued to find time to construct delicate or complex mechanisms, and in the late 1760s he built an orrey—an early planetarium—that won the attention of Philadelphia scientists. Encouraged, he moved to the city in 1770, and set up a business there.

As a member of the American Philosophical Society, Rittenhouse plotted the Transit of Venus with a telescope. His skill at manufacturing surveying instruments earned him international recognition, and his business expanded. During the AMERICAN REVOLUTION he served in the Pennsylvania General Assembly and was a delegate to the state constitutional convention of 1776. He was serving as state treasurer in 1779 when the state of Pennsylvania hired him to serve as one of the commissioners to settle its boundary dispute with Virginia. In 1784 he surveyed the western boundary of the state, and in 1786, its northern boundary. Other states invited him to do similar work. While in the countryside on these surveying assignments, he made scientific observations of the soil and rivers. In 1792 he was appointed a director of the U.S. Mint.

Rittenhouse's scientific reputation grew apace with his business. He was a member of the Board of Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania from 1779 to 1796 and was Professor of Astronomy there in 1780–1781. By 1791 he was president of the American Philosophical Society, and in 1795 he was appointed a foreign member of the Royal Society of London. Rittenhouse published several ALMANACS, including The Philadelphia Newest Almanack, for the Year of Our Lord 1775 (1774), which included this note: "The public is desired to observe, that the astronomical calculations of this almanack are given us by the ingenious David Rittenhouse, A.M. of this city."

Poor health affected Rittenhouse throughout his career, and in 1795 it forced him to retire from his position at the U.S. Mint. He died in June 1796 and was buried, at his request, beneath his observatory.

Works

Rittenhouse, David. The Philadelphia Newest Almanack, for the Year of Our Lord 1775. Philadelphia: Printed by R. Aitken, 1774.

Rittenhouse. An Oration, Delivered February 24, 1775, before the American Philosophical Society. Philadelphia: Printed by John Dunlap, 1775; Early American Imprints, 14432.

Sources

Ford, Edward. David Rittenhouse, Astronomer-Patriot, 1723–1796. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1946.

Hindle, Brooke. David Rittenhouse. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1964.

Kelly, M. Ruth. The Olmsted Case: Privateers, Property, and Politics in Pennsylvania, 1778–1810. Selinsgrove, Penn.: Susquehanna University Press, 2005.

Rivington, James (circa 1724–1802) publisher

James Rivington, the most influential LOYALIST editor of the revolutionary period, was born in London around 1724 to Charles and Eleanor Pease Rivington. His father was a BOOKSELLER and publisher, and upon Charles's death in 1742, James and his brother took over the family business. By 1756 Rivington had left the family firm to set up a partnership in a publishing business.

Although his business was profitable, Rivington lost much of his money gambling at the Newmarket racetrack. He managed to pay off his debts and decided to immigrate to America in 1760. He brought enough capital with him to set up as a bookseller in Philadelphia, and moved to New York City, where he and a partner opened first a successful bookstore and then an art gallery. While he spent much of his money gambling, he was able to create a comfortable life, first with Elizabeth Minshull Rivington, his wife from 1752 until her death, and later with a second wife, Elizabeth Van Horne Rivington, whom he married in 1769 and with whom he had three children.

In 1773 Rivington began publishing Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, or the Connecticut, New-Jersey, Hudson's River, and Quebec Weekly Advertiser, and met with immediate success. Isaiah THOMAS of The Massachusetts Spy conceded that "no newspaper in the colonies was better printed, or more copiously furnished with foreign intelligence." Rivington, himself a staunch opponent of the American protest against Great Britain, made clear his intention to publish all "Views and Inclinations" in an era when newspapers smacked of partiality.

Rivington's impartiality faded, however, as the conflict between the colonies and England intensified. The Gazetteer branded New York radical Isaac "King" SEARS (circa 1730–1786) of the Sons of Liberty (a radical political group during the 1760s and 1770s) "a tool of the lowest order," a "political cracker," and "the laughing-stock of the whole town." When SEARS demanded to know the author of this invective, Rivington refused the information, saying, "I am ready to defend the freedom of the press when attacked in my person." Rivington's coverage of political events had an openly anticolonial bias, and his newspaper published anti-Patriot SATIRE and pro-British diatribes. PATRIOT Isaiah Thomas soon referred to Rivington as a "Judas," and Patriot publishers Benjamin EDES and John GILL of THE BOSTON GAZETTE labeled him "dirty" and "malicious." Rivington responded with equal venom, characterizing Thomas as the "Boston Snake of Sedition" and dismissing Edes and Gill's newspaper as "Monday's Dung Barge."

Patriot threats did not faze Rivington: he publicly ridiculed a New Jersey mob for hanging him in effigy on April 13, 1775, and challenged them to try to hang him in reality. Rivington's bold challenge was poorly timed from a financial perspective, for news of the Battle of Lexington and Concord reached New York on April 23. Patriot sympathizers withdrew advertisements, and subscriptions began to fall.

Worried about financial ruin and about his physical welfare, Rivington wrote on May 4, 1775 that he would embrace "such principles as shall not give offence." The promise came too late. A mob led by Isaac SEARS destroyed Rivington's printing shop and press, and Rivington was forced to find refuge on a British vessel in the harbor.

Rivington appealed to the Second Continental Congress for permission to publish again. He admitted he had made "mistakes" but said he had intended only to be honest. The New York Provincial Congress pardoned him on June 6, 1775, and Rivington's newspaper was soon back in operation. It quickly became evident that he could not maintain a neutral tone, however, and in November of that year SEARS and the Sons of Liberty returned to New York and once again destroyed Rivington's presses. The New York Provincial Congress, although critical of Rivington, denounced SEARS and petitioned Connecticut governor Jonathan Trumbull (1710–1785) on behalf of the freedom of the press. Trumbull denied any jurisdiction, reminding the Congress that SEARS was a New Yorker. Recognizing that he was in danger, Rivington left for England in January 1776 and did not return to America for eighteen months. His departure dampened the spirits of New York's remaining Loyalists.

Rivington returned in September 1777 after the British army took control of New York City. Appointed the king's printer, he resumed publication of his paper, renaming it first The New York Loyal Gazette and later The Royal Gazette. Operating under the protective wing of the British military, Rivington abandoned all restraint. GEORGE WASHINGTON sarcastically described Rivington to New York governor George CLINTON (1739–1812) as "one of your subjects who has been a man of no small notoriety during the whole rebellion, and who has been so remarkably distinguished for his regard to veracity." New Jersey governor WILLIAM LIVINGSTON (1723–1790) wrote that "If Rivington is taken, I must have one of his ears; Governor CLINTON is entitled to the other; and General WASHINGTON, if he pleases, may take his head."

In the wake of the British surrender at Yorktown in 1783, Rivington's influence was greatly diminished. Indeed, after the British defeat he pleaded for mercy; he was subsequently allowed to stay in New York City and publish his newspaper. However, Isaac SEARS soon persuaded military and political figures to shut down Rivington's press, and the last issue of the Gazette was published on December 31, 1783.

Rivington spent much of the last nineteen years of his life in poverty, working as a bookseller and stationer. His wife died in 1795, and by 1797 he was confined to debtor's prison. By the time of his death on July 4, 1802, Rivington's name had become synonymous with "traitor" among newspaper publishers. During the Civil War, criticism of Abraham LINCOLN's policies in The New York World prompted a Boston newspaper to warn its readers that "Rivington lives in history as well as [Benedict] ARNOLD."

Work

Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, or, the Connecticut, New-Jersey, Hudson's-River, and Quebec Weekly Advertiser. 1773–1775; Early American Imprints, 12982, 14435.

Source

Ketchum, Richard M. Divided Loyalties: How the American Revolution Came to New York. New York: Holt, 2002.

Roanoke Island

Roanoke colony was the first attempted site of British settlement in Virginia, beginning in 1585 when Sir Walter Raleigh (1554?–1618) commanded Sir Richard Greenville (1542–1591) to establish a colony with one hundred men. Initially, the colonists found this island off the Atlantic Coast strategically favorable, as it protected them from Spanish attack, but the rocky waters made for difficult landings by supply ships, and the poor soil failed to provide viable planting conditions for corn. Ill equipped to survive on their own and overly dependent upon native tribes to provide them with food, the colonists either abandoned the settlement voluntarily, when the infrequently passing ship came close enough to its shores, or perished from hunger. When, in 1586, Sir Francis Drake (1540?–1596) returned with supplies, he found only a small number of colonists remaining, and took them back to England. Days later, Greenville arrived with a relief ship to the now-deserted island and dispatched a party of fifteen men to recolonize Roanoke.

In another attempt at settlement Raleigh dispatched John White in 1587, who brought ninety-four colonists, including seventeen women and nine children. Although they planned to settle north of Roanoke in the Chesapeake Bay area, they too were left on the island to fend for themselves. Upon White's return in August 1590, he found the island empty again. All of the colonists, including his granddaughter, Virginia Dare (1587–?), the first white child of English parents born in America, had disappeared. The fate of the Roanoke colonists remains a mystery, the only possible hint being the word "Croatoan," the name of another island, which had been carved into a tree. Some speculate that conflicts with the Powhatan, combined with hunger, drove any remaining colonists north. The mismanagement of these colonies has also been blamed on a desire on the part of the mariners to abandon their passengers in search of treasures in the Caribbean.

Mentions of Roanoke are made in Thomas HARRIOT's A Brief and True Report of the New Found Land of Virginia (1588); John SMITH's A True Relation . . . Virginia (1608), A DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND, and THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF VIRGINIA; Edward Maria WINGFIELD's A Discourse of Virginia (1608); and Robert BEVERLEY's History and Present State of Virginia (1705).

Sources

Kupperman, Karen Ordahl. Roanoke, the Abandoned Colony. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman & Allanheld, 1984.
Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York: Viking, 2001.

Romanticism

Romanticism refers to a literary, philosophical, and artistic style or theory that emphasizes nature as a guiding, elevated force, recognizes the central significance of individual experience, and—as a departure from the more stylized poetry and subject matter of the Augustan period—uses simple diction focused on rural and idyllic country life. While romanticism flourished in America during the nineteenth century, romantic impulses were displayed gradually in literature, beginning in the early eighteenth century. They were expressed in the Gothic novels of Charles Brockden BROWN, which relied on the mysterious and unexplainable forces of nature in human encounters. They showed up in the nature poetry of Philip FRENEAU and in the travel writing of William BARTRAM. The short stories of Washington

Photograph of Washington Irving by Mathew Brady

IRVING, with their emphasis on memory, the past, and the significance of common experience, are early expressions of romanticism. And the sentimental novels of Susanna Haswell Rowson centered on individual experience and emphasizing emotion over reason mirrored the romantic rebellion against the rationality of the classical period.

By the time of the Romantic Period in American literature, usually defined as 1830 to 1865, the groundwork had been laid for the novels of Nathaniel Hawthorne, the poetry of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and the short stories of Edgar Allan Poe.

Works

Bartram, William. Travels Through North and South Carolina, Georgia, East and West Florida, the Cherokee Country, the Extensive Territories of the Muscogulges. . . . Philadelphia: Printed by James and Johnson, 1791; 1792; republished as Travels, and Other Writings, edited by Thomas P. Slaughter. New York: Library of America, 1996.

Brown, Charles Brockden. Wieland; Or the Transformation. An American Tale. New York: Printed by T. & J. Swords for H. Caritat, 1798; republished in Three Gothic Novels. New York: Library of America, 1998.

Brown. Arthur Mervyn; Or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, part 1, Philadelphia: H. Maxwell, 1799; part 2, New York: George F. Hopkins, 1800; 1 volume, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1980.

Brown. Edgar Huntly; Or Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker. Philadelphia: H. Maxwell, 1799; republished in Three Gothic Novels. New York: Library of America, 1998.

Brown. Clara Howard; In a Series of Letters. Philadelphia: Asbury Dickins, 1801; Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.

Brown. Jane Talbot, A Novel. Philadelphia: John Conrad, 1801; Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986.

Cowell, Pattie, ed. Women Poets in Pre-Revolutionary America 1650–1775: An Anthology. Troy, N. Y.: Whitston, 1971.

Donahue, Jane. Early American Poetry: Selections from Bradstreet, Taylor, Dwight, Freneau, and Bryant. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.

Dwight, Timothy. Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts. . . . New York: Printed by Childs and Swaine, 1794.

Freneau, Philip. A Poem, on the Rising Glory of America. . . . Philadelphia: Printed by Joseph Cruikshank, 1772; republished in The Poems of Philip Freneau, Poet of the American Revolution, edited by Fred Lewis Pattee. New York: Russell & Russell, 1963.

Morton, Sarah Wentworth Apthorp. Ouâbi; Or, The Virtues of Nature. An Indian Tale. In Four Cantos. Boston: Printed by Isaiah Thomas and Ebenezer T. Andrews, 1790.

Newman, Lance, Joel Pace, and Chris Koenig-Woodyard, eds. Transatlantic Romanticism: An Anthology of British, American, and Canadian Literature, 1767–1867. New York: Pearson Longman, 2006.

Portrait of William Bartram by Charles Willson Peale, 1808

Rowson, Susanna. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth. London: William Lane, 1791; republished as Charlotte Temple. Philadelphia: Matthew Carey, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27649; New York: Oxford University Press, 1986. New York: Modern Library, 2004.

Sources

Andrews, William L. Literary Romanticism in America. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Ellis, Kate Ferguson. The Contested Castle: Gothic Novels and the Subversion of Domestic Ideology. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.

Watts, Steven. The Romance of Real Life: Charles Brockden Brown and the Origins of American Culture. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Recommended Writings

Brown, Charles Brockden. Wieland; Or the Transformation. An American Tale (1798)

Brown. Arthur Mervyn (1799)

Brown. Edgar Huntly; Or Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker (1799)

Brown. Ormond; Or the Secret Witness (1799)

Brown. Clara Howard; In a Series of Letters (1801)

- Brown. Jane Talbot (1801)
 Dwight, Timothy. Greenfield Hill: A Poem in Seven Parts (1794)
 Freneau, Philip. "The Power of Fancy" (1770).
 Freneau. "The Rising Glory of America" (1775)
 Freneau. "The Wild Honey-Suckle" (1786)
 Freneau. "The Indian Burying Ground" (1787)
 Freneau. "To Sir Toby" (1792)
 Freneau. "On the Universality and Other Attributes of the God of Nature" (1815)
 Freneau. "On Observing a Large Red Streak Apple" (1822)
 Morton, Sarah Wentworth Apthorp. Ouâbi; Or, The Virtues of Nature (1790)
 Rowson, Susanna Haswell. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791)

Studying American Romanticism

Students interested in an overview of American Romanticism should consult Stanley Bank's American Romanticism: A Shape for Fiction (New York: Putnam, 1969); Michael J. Hoffman's The Subversive Vision: American Romanticism in Literature (Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972); William L. Andrews's Literary Romanticism in America (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981); Michael T. Gilmore's American Romanticism and the Marketplace (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985); Jennifer A. Hurley's American Romanticism (San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000); Megan Marshall's The Peabody Sisters: Three Women Who Ignited American Romanticism (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2005); and Jerry Phillips's Romanticism and Transcendentalism: 1800–1860 (New York: Facts On File, 2006). For studies in both American and British Romanticism, see Richard Harter Fogle's The Permanent Pleasure; Essays on Classics of Romanticism (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1974).

For studies of early American writers whose works illustrate Romantic sensibilities, see, for Philip FRENEAU: Mary Weatherspoon Bowden's Philip Freneau (Boston: Twayne, 1976) and Richard C. Vitzthum's Land and Sea: The Lyric Poetry of Philip Freneau (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1978). For connections between Romanticism and the GOTHIC ROMANCE in Charles Brockden BROWN, see Steven Watts's The Romance of Real Life: Charles Brockden Brown and the Origins of American Culture (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994); Philip Barnard, Mark Kamrath, and Stephen Shapiro's Revising Charles Brockden Brown: Culture, Politics, and Sexuality in the Early Republic (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2004); and Peter Kafer's Charles Brockden Brown's Revolution and the Birth of American Gothic (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004). For nature writing and early American Romanticism, see Thomas P. Slaughter's The Natures of John and William Bartram (New York: Knopf, 1996); Edward J. Cashin's William Bartram and the American Revolution on the Southern Frontier (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000); Susan Scott Parish's American Curiosity: Cultures of Natural History in the Colonial British Atlantic World (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006); and Judith Magee's The Art and Science of William Bartram (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2007).

Rowlandson, Mary White (1637–1711) captivity narrative writer

Before I knew what affliction meant, I was ready sometimes to wish for it. . . . Affliction I wanted, and affliction I had, full measure (I thought), pressed down and running over. Yet I see, when God calls a person to anything, and through never so many difficulties, yet He is fully able to carry them through and make them see.

—A Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682)

Mary White Rowlandson was the author of one of the most famous CAPTIVITY NARRATIVES in colonial history. Her account, The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together with the faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson—commonly called A NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAURATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON (1682)—describes in detail the weeks of deprivation and torment she suffered at the hands of her Indian captors. She concedes that Quano-pen, one of her captors, showed her occasional kindnesses, but condemns another, Weetamoo, as a merciless savage, to be feared but never to be respected. Rowlandson mocks Wetamo's behavior, noting that the "[savage] . . . bestowed every day in dressing herself near as much time as any gentry in the land." To this Puritan matron, the Indians are "hell-hounds," "the bloody Heathen," or "the Infidel," and, as in most examples of this literary genre, the captivity becomes a backdrop for a simplistic conflict between good and evil, Christian and heathen, civilization and savagery. To Rowlandson, her captivity was both a test by God of her faith and uncontestable proof of his care and mercy.

Mary White was born in Somerset, England, the sixth of John and Joan White's ten children. The White family immigrated to NEW ENGLAND shortly after Mary's birth, settling first in the frontier town of Wenham, Massachusetts, and later in a new settlement at Lancaster, Massachusetts. At the age of nineteen, Mary married Lancaster's first minister, Joseph Rowlandson, and began a family.

Tensions between local Indian tribes and the land-aggressive English settlers came to a climax in the 1760s when war broke out between Massachusetts colonists and a coalition led by the warrior chief Metacomet (King Philip). When Indians attacked her town, Mary Rowlandson and her children were alone; Joseph and his brother were on their way to Boston to petition the colonial government for added protection for their vulnerable settlement. The two men returned to find the town in ruins and friends and family either missing or dead. Altogether, five Lancaster residents had been killed and twenty-four taken captive.

Mary Rowlandson and her three children—Joseph, Mary, and Sarah—were among those captured. The two older children were separated immediately from their mother; the youngest child, six-year-old Sarah, was allowed to remain in Rowlandson's care. Sarah had been seriously injured in the attack and died a week later. Rowlandson was held captive for two months by a NARRAGANSETT sachem (Indian chief), Quanopen, and his wife, Wetamo, who was a sister-in-law of Metacomet. A powerful political and military leader in her own right, Wetamo emerged in Rowlandson's account of the captivity as the true villain.

Mary Rowlandson and her two children were eventually ransomed. Their home had been destroyed, so the family went to Boston briefly and then resettled in Wethersfield, Connecticut. Here, in 1678, Joseph Rowlandson died, and Mary Rowlandson long was assumed to have died soon afterward, having been seriously affected by the captivity. In 1985, however, David L. Greene discovered that Mary had married Samuel Talcott soon after Joseph's death and had lived on for some thirty years, dying at the age of seventy-three in 1711.

A Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson appeared in print in 1682. There is strong evidence that the Reverend Increase MATHER, a family friend, assisted Mary Rowlandson in preparing her account of capture and redemption. If Mather is responsible for the emphasis on providential interventions, the power of the narrative lies in Rowlandson's detailed account of life with the Narragansetts and her vivid, though thoroughly biased, portraits of the "proud, wild, barbarous, brutish . . . diabolical Creatures" who held her captive. The narrative has continued to be published under slightly modified titles for more than three hundred years.

Work

Rowlandson, Mary. The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. . . . Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Samuel Green, 1682; republished as A True History of the Captivity & Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. . . . London: Sold by Joseph Poole, 1682; Early American Imprints, 331, 332, 2173; reprinted in The Account of Mary Rowlandson and Other Indian Captivity Narratives. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2005.

Source

Breitwieser, Mitchell Robert. American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1990.

Title page for the corrected second edition of Mary Rowlandson's only book

Recommended Writing

The Sovereignty & Goodness of God, Together with the Faithfulness of His Promises Displayed; Being a Narrative of the Captivity and Restauration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson . . . (1682)

Studying Mary Rowlandson

Mary White Rowlandson immigrated to NEW ENGLAND from London with her parents as a young child and after settling in Salem moved to the frontier town of Lancaster, Massachusetts, where she met and married the Reverend Joseph Rowlandson. Her only known work is an account written four years after she was held captive for nearly three months by Native Americans in the midst of KING PHILIP'S WAR in 1676. A NARRATIVE OF THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTAURATION OF MRS. MARY ROWLANDSON (1682) has since become one of the most well-known CAPTIVITY NARRATIVES from early America. A Narrative has been a popular text since its first printing and was reprinted four times in the first year. The original manuscript copy has since been lost. Rowlandson's narrative appears in numerous anthologies including recent compilations, such as: Women's Indian Captivity Narratives, edited by Kathryn Zabelle Derounian-Stodola (New York: Penguin, 1998) and American Captivity Narratives: Olaudah Equiano, Mary Rowlandson, and Others, edited by Gordon M. Sayre (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 2000). For scholarly studies of Mary Rowlandson and the captivity narrative genre, see Roy Harvey Pearce's "The Significance of the Captivity Narrative" (American Literature, 29 [March 1947]: 1–20); Richard Van Der Beets's Held Captive by Indians: Selected Narratives 1642–1836 (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1973); John Williams's The Redeemed Captive (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1976); Van Der Beets's The Indian Captivity Narrative: An American Genre (New York: University Press of America, 1984); David L. Greene's "New Light on Mary Rowlandson" (Early American Literature, 20, no. 1 [1985]: 24–38); Derounian's "The Publication, Promotion, and Distribution of Mary Rowlandson's Indian Captivity Narrative in the Seventeenth Century" (Early American Literature, 23, no. 3 [1988]: 239–261); and Derounian-Stodola and James A. Levernier's The Indian Captivity Narrative, 1550–1900 (New York: Twayne, 1993).

For a better understanding of Rowlandson's narrative within the context of Puritan New England, see Mitchell Robert Breitwieser's American Puritanism and the Defense of Mourning: Religion, Grief, and Ethnology in Mary White Rowlandson's Captivity Narrative (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1990); Michelle Burnham's Captivity & Sentiment: Cultural Exchange in American Literature, 1682–1861 (Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 1997). Rebecca Blevins Faery's Cartographies of Desire: Captivity, Race, and Sex in the Shaping of an American Nation (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1999); and Emory Elliott's The Cambridge Introduction to Early American Literature (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002).

To learn more about the Native Americans from this time period, see William Wood and Alden T. Vaughan's New England's Prospect (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1977) and Gary B. Nash's Red, White, and Black: The Peoples of Early North America, fourth edition (Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 2000). To study PRAYING INDIANS in particular, see Kristina Bross's Dry Bones and Indian Sermons: Praying Indians in Colonial America (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2004) and Laura M. Stevens's The Poor Indians: British Missionaries, Native Americans, and Colonial Sensibility (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004). For studies of King Philip's War consult Jill Lepore's The Name of War: King Philip's War and the Origins of American Identity (New York: Knopf, 1998) and James D. Drake's King Philip's War: Civil War in New England, 1675–1676 (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2000). For an electronic source that displays facsimile covers of Rowlandson's Narrative, see the University of Pennsylvania Library (<<http://www.library.upenn.edu/exhibits/rbm/kislak/colonial/rowlandson1.html>> viewed May 2, 2007). For the complete narrative online, see the Gutenberg Project at Carnegie Mellon University (<<http://www.gutenberg.org/dirs/etext97/crmmr10.txt>> viewed May 2, 2007).

Rowson, Susanna Haswell (1762–1824) novelist, poet, playwright

"I am at a loss what to do. Montraville placed me here, and promised to defray all my expenses: but he has forgot his promise, he has forsaken me, and I have no friend who has either power or will to relieve me. Let me hope, as you may see my unhappy situation, your charity."

—Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791)

Susanna Haswell Rowson

Known as the first best-selling American author, Susanna Haswell Rowson wrote ten novels, including Victoria (1786), The Test of Honour (1789), The Inquisitor (1793), and CHARLOTTE: A TALE OF TRUTH (republished as Charlotte Temple), her most famous work. She also published A Spelling Dictionary (1807), Poems on Various Subjects (1788), and numerous plays and songs. Charlotte Temple appeared first in England, in 1791, and later in America, in 1794. Its popularity grew steadily, resulting in a “Charlotte cult,” which made it the most frequently published novel in the United States by the mid nineteenth century. By 1900 it had gone through two hundred editions.

Susanna Haswell was born in Portsmouth, England, in 1762, the daughter of a British royal navy officer. She spent her childhood in Massachusetts until the AMERICAN REVOLUTION forced her LOYALIST family to return to England. Here, with her family fortune lost, she became a governess and began writing novels.

In 1786, at the age of twenty-four, she married William Rowson, a merchant and a trumpeter in the Royal Horse Guard. When his business failed in 1792, the couple joined a provincial theater company. The following year Rowson’s theatrical career brought her back to America. As a member of a traveling company she performed in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston. In America she continued to write, producing Slaves in Algiers; or, a Struggle for Freedom, in 1794. This tale of piracy and white slavery was an immediate hit. Slaves in Algiers ends with a statement that reverses traditional gender relations: “Women were born for universal sway / Men to adore, be silent, and obey.”

Charlotte Temple—originally titled Charlotte, A Tale of Truth—is a story of seduction. Its heroine, Charlotte, is a young English schoolgirl who is seduced by an army officer named Montraville and carried off to America. An evil friend persuades Montraville that his young mistress has been unfaithful. Enraged, Montraville leaves her and marries another woman. The abandoned Charlotte gives birth to a daughter and dies. In her preface, Rowson makes it clear that the blame for such a tragedy lay, in part, in the lack of education and thus the naïveté and dependence of young women.

The need for improvement in women’s education, as well as the value of a community of women, were consistent themes in Rowson’s fiction. In her novels she attacked stereotypes of women and demonstrated that women were capable of great achievements if not bound by ignorance. Although both Charlotte Temple and the central character of Victoria (1786) are overwhelmed by their misfortune, Rowson’s later heroines are women of good sense who successfully face physical and moral dangers. In Sarah (1813), the heroine is a strong, independent woman whose unhappiness is directly attributable to the confining aspects of marriage.

In 1797 Rowson abruptly abandoned her career in the theater and became an educator. For the next twenty-five years she was the respected headmistress of her own Young Ladies Academy and the author of textbooks and school materials. She continued, however, to write fiction, newspaper essays, and poetry. Although Rowson never had children of her own, she put her theories of female education into practice as she raised her husband’s younger sister, Charlotte. She also raised William Rowson’s illegitimate son and an adopted daughter. Rowson died in 1824.

Works

- Rowson, Susanna Haswell. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth. London: William Lane, 1791. Republished as Charlotte Temple. Philadelphia: Matthew Carey, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27649; New York: Modern Library, 2004.
- Rowson. Mentoria, or, The Young Lady’s Friend: In Two Volumes. Philadelphia: Printed for Robert Campbell by Samuel Harrison Smith, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27654.
- Rowson. Slaves in Algiers, or, A struggle for Freedom: A Play, Interspersed with Songs, in Three Acts. Philadelphia: Wrigley & Berriman, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27649; Acton, Mass.: Copley, 2000.

Sources

- Bontatibus, Donna R. The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation: A Call for Socio-Political Reform. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.
- Parker, Patricia. Susanna Rowson. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- Weil, Dorothy. In Defense of Women: Susanna Rowson (1762–1824). University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1976.

Recommended Writings

- Charlotte: A Tale of Truth* (1791)
- Slaves in Algiers* (1794)

Studying Susanna Rowson

Susanna Rowson, novelist and playwright, was also actively involved in education. Her novel CHARLOTTE: A TALE OF TRUTH (1791; republished as Charlotte Temple) was a best-seller and remains a key text for early American literary studies. For biographical treatments of Rowson, a good place to start is with Patricia Parker’s Susanna Rowson (Boston: Twayne, 1986). Students should also consult Wendy Martin’s “Profile: Susanna Rowson, Early American Novelist” (Women’s Studies 2 [1974]: 1–8); Ellen B. Brandt’s Susanna Haswell Rowson, America’s First Best-Selling Novelist (Chicago: Serbra Press, 1975); Dorothy Weil’s In Defense of Women: Susanna Rowson (1762–1824) (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1976); Eve Kornfeld’s “Women in Post-Revolutionary American Culture: Susanna Haswell Rowson’s American Career” (Journal of American Culture 6 [Winter 1983]: 56–62); Cathy N. Davidson’s “The Life and Times of Charlotte Temple: The Biography of a Book,” in Reading in America: Literature and Social History, edited by David-

CHARLOTTE

A TALE OF TRUTH.

By MRS. ROWSON,
OF THE NEW THEATRE, PHILADELPHIA: AUTHOR OF VICTORIA, THE INQUISITOR,
FILLE DE CHAMBRE, &c.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

She was her parent's only joy :
They had but one—~~one darling~~ child.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Her form was faultless, and her mind,
Untainted yet by art,
Was noble, just, humane, and kind,
And virtue warm'd her heart.
But ah ! the cruel spoiler came—

VOL. I.

PHILADELPHIA:
PRINTED BY D. HUMPHREYS,
FOR M. CAREY, No. 118, MARKET-STREET,
M.DCC. XCIV.

Title page for the first American edition of Rowson's novel better known as Charlotte Temple, as it was retitled for the 1797 edition son (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986). For scholarly editions see Charlotte Temple, with an introduction by Cathy N. Davidson (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986) and Charlotte Temple; and, Lucy Temple, with an introduction by Ann Douglas (New York: Penguin, 1991). Rowson critical studies are numerous; some articles to consider include Marion Rust's "What's Wrong with Charlotte Temple?" (The William and Mary Quarterly, 60 [2003]: 99–118) and Elizabeth Maddox Dillon's "Slaves in Algiers: Race, Republican Genealogies, and the Global Stage" (American Literary History, 16 [2004]: 407–436). Also see Joseph J. Fichtelberg's "Uncivil Tongues: Slander and Honour in Susanna Rowson's Trials of the Human Heart" (Eighteenth-Century Fiction, 18 [2006]: 425–451). Bibliographies include Robert W. G. Vail's Susanna Haswell Rowson, the Author of Charlotte Temple; A Bibliographical Study (Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society, 1933); Edward J. Piacento's "Susanna Haswell Rowson: A Bibliography of First Editions of Primary Works and of Secondary Sources" (Bulletin of Bibliography, 43 [1986]: 13–16); and Devon White's "Contemporary Criticism of Five Early American Sentimental Novels, 1970–1994: An Annotated Bibliography" (Bulletin of Bibliography, 52 [December 1995]: 293–305). Students should consult the MLA bibliography for recent and ongoing criticism. For reference guides see Patricia L. Parker's Early American Fiction: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1984); Barbara Anne White's American Women's Fiction, 1790–1870: A Reference Guide (New York: Garland, 1990); and Doreen Alvarez Saar and Mary Anne Schofield's Eighteenth-Century Anglo-American Women Novelists: A Critical Reference Guide (New York: G. K. Hall, 1996).

Students interested in studies of the early American novel see SENTIMENTAL NOVEL. For studies of Rowson's Slaves in Algiers and early American DRAMA in general, see Zoe Detsi-Diamanti's Early American Women Dramatists, 1775–1860 (New York: Garland, 1998); Heather S. Nathans's Early American Theatre from the Revolution to Thomas Jefferson: Into the Hands of the People (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003); and Jeffrey H. Richards's Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005).

For electronic resources, see the Albert H. and Shirley Small Special Collections Library at the University of Virginia (<http://www.lib.virginia.edu/small/exhibits/theatre/voice\_women.html> viewed May 2, 2007). The Papers of Susanna Rowson (1770–1879) are available as part of the Clifton Waller Barrett Library of American Literature Special Collection at The University of Virginia.

Rush, Benjamin (1745–1813) essayist

Benjamin Rush, PATRIOT and physician, is most noted for connecting his patriotism and his medical practice, arguing that medicine provided a guide to the good health of a republic. According to Rush, men and women who valued cleanliness, took exercise, and practiced moderation in both eating and drinking were the type of virtuous citizens needed to sustain the new nation.

Rush was born outside of Philadelphia January 4, 1745, the child of John Rush, a gunsmith and farmer, and Susanna Hall Harvey Rush. Benjamin's father died when he was six, but his uncle, the Reverend Samuel Finley (1715–1766), who later served as the president of the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University), prepared the boy for college. Rush graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1760, and the following year he began his apprenticeship in medicine with noted physician William Shippen (1712–1801). In 1766 Rush traveled to Scotland to get his medical degree from Edinburgh University. With financial help from another Philadelphian abroad, Benjamin FRANKLIN, Rush remained in London to continue his postgraduate studies.

In 1769 Rush returned to Pennsylvania and became the first professor of chemistry at the College of Philadelphia (later the University of Pennsylvania). He later became Professor of Medicine and Clinical Practice there. By the time of the American Revolution, Rush was acknowledged as the most important and influential doctor of his era.

In 1775 Rush married sixteen-year-old Julia Stockton, daughter of Richard and Annis STOCKTON. The following year, Rush was elected to the Continental Congress and signed his name to the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. He served as physician general of the Middle Department during the Revolution, caring for wounded soldiers at Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Valley Forge. After the Revolution, he served as surgeon to the Pennsylvania Hospital for twenty-nine years. During this time Rush co-founded Dickinson College, and in 1786 he founded the Philadelphia Dispensary.

Rush published both scientific papers and social commentaries, many of which appeared in the American Museum and The Columbian Magazine. His medical papers covered a wide variety of topics, from smallpox to the source of tetanus infection to the effect of alcohol on aging. He collected these writings in five volumes, Medical Inquiries and Observations (1789; 1793; 1794–1798). His essays earned him a membership in the American Philosophical Society and in the Society for Promoting Political Enquiries, and he emerged as the central figure in a group of Americans devoted to advancing science and the arts in the new nation. Rush also hoped to improve the literary style of American writers. His own style was both clear and energetic, with logical, carefully developed arguments.

Rush's social and political essays were eventually collected in Essays: Literary, Moral and Philosophical (1798). These essays covered such topics as slavery, female education, the need for a public school system, and the death penalty. He earned a reputation as a reformer for his positions on these topics. Rush's autobiography was not published until long after his death in 1813. The Autobiography of Benjamin Rush; His "Travels through Life" Together with His Commonplace Book for 1789–1813 (1948) added to Rush's reputation as a major writer of eighteenth-century America.

Works

Rush, Benjamin. The Autobiography of Benjamin Rush; His "Travels through life" together with His Commonplace Book for 1789–1813, edited by George W. Comer. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1948; Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1970.

Rush. Essays, Literary, Moral and Philosophical, second edition, revised. Philadelphia: Thomas & William Bradford, 1806; Early American Imprints, 34495.

Rush. Medical Inquiries and Observations on the Diseases of the Mind, 5 volumes. Philadelphia: Printed by Thomas Dobson, 1794–1798; Birmingham, Ala.: Classics of Medicine Library, 1979; Early American Imprints, 27660, 31144, 32784, 34496.

Sources

Brodsky, Alyn. Benjamin Rush: Patriot and Physician. New York: Truman Talley, 2004.

Haakonssen, Lisbeth. Medicine and Morals in the Enlightenment: John Gregory, Thomas Percival and Benjamin Rush. Amsterdam & Atlanta: Rodopi, 1997.

Hawke, David Freeman. Benjamin Rush: Revolutionary Gadfly. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1971.

Russell, Benjamin (1761–1845) journalist, publisher

Benjamin Russell was born in Boston on September 13, 1761, the eldest son of John Russell, a mason. Benjamin was married in 1783 to Esther Rice, and the couple had three children. After Esther's death Russell married a widow, Guest Campbell, with whom he had three more children.

Russell showed an early interest in printing, spending time at Isaiah THOMAS's shop, where he learned to set type. Following the battles of Lexington and Concord, he attached himself to the militia at Cambridge, where he ran errands and served as a messenger. Only thirteen at the time, Russell apparently was acting without his father's consent: Apprehended and punished by his father, he was sent to Worcester, Massachusetts, where he was formally apprenticed as a printer to Thomas, who had left Boston during the British occupation. Under Thomas's tutelage Russell mastered the craft of printing and the art of journalism, helping to publish The Massachusetts Spy, or, American Oracle of Liberty (1775–1776). In 1777 he returned to military service.

In 1783 Russell moved to Boston with plans to establish his own shop. On March 24, 1784, Russell and his partner, William Warden, published the first edition of The Massachusetts Centinel. Warden died two years later, leaving Russell as the sole proprietor, editor, and publisher. The paper was written with a clear editorial bias, including Russell's treatment of the debate over the Constitution, which reflected his position as a FEDERALIST. Russell also recognized the importance of advertising and the need to treat it as a specialized part of the publishing business.

In 1785 Russell promoted The Centinel as a leading forum for free discourse by publishing opposing editorials on a newly established social organization, the Tea Assembly. Dubbed the "Sans Souci Club" by its detractors, who considered it frivolous, the Tea Assembly catered to Boston's elite, offering a venue for fashionable display, card games, and dancing. Samuel ADAMS, Boston's leading PATRIOT and social critic, attacked the Tea Assembly as a threat to public morality and patriotic fervor. In turn, supporters of the Tea Assembly attacked Adams as old-fashioned and prudish. The debate, which quickly grew in scope and scale, included a new pseudonymous satirical play that was harshly critical of the Assembly and its organizers. Russell, publisher of the play, promoted the SATIRE in The Centinel. Some of the Assembly's supporters, feeling threatened by Russell's implications that the public would recognize the individuals who were being satirized, promised violence if the play were released to the public. Russell used this threat as an opportunity to promote his newspaper, claiming the confrontation as a victory for the press. The front page of the January 19, 1785, edition of The Centinel proudly announced his position: "I exult, I glory in the Freedom of the Press; that Palladium of Liberty."

By 1790 readership of The Centinel had spread throughout Massachusetts and into the other states, and Russell renamed the newspaper The Columbian Centinel. In the end, The Centinel outlasted most of its competition. Sold by Russell in 1828, The Centinel merged with three other papers over the next twelve years. Russell died a widower January 4, 1845.

Works

Massachusetts Centinel (Boston), edited by William Warden and Russell, 1784–1790; Early American Imprints.

Columbian Centinel (Boston), edited by Russell, 1790–1799; Early American Imprints.

Columbian Centinel & Massachusetts Federalist (Boston), edited by Russell, 1799–1804; Early American Imprints, 35322.

Source

Pasley, Jeffrey L. "The Tyranny of Printers": Newspaper Politics in the Early American Republic. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2001.

Ramona by Helen Hunt Jackson (Boston: Roberts, 1884) novel

The work for which Helen Hunt Jackson is best remembered, Ramona: A Story, extended the reputation for ardent Native American rights advocacy that Jackson had built as the author of A CENTURY OF DISHONOR (1881). Originally serialized in The Christian Union (May 1884), Ramona continued Jackson's work for Indian reform by fictionalizing the people she had met and the events she had chronicled in 1883 when, as a commissioner for the Interior Department, she investigated suitable lands for the displaced California Mission Indians. Jackson wrote the novel in four months—some two to three thousand words each day.

Ramona depicts the struggle of the first Californians—Mexicans, Indians, and Spanish—to maintain their hold on the region against encroaching waves of American industrialism. In this sentimental “Cinderella” tale, Scots/Indian orphan Ramona is ill-treated by her domineering foster mother, Señora Morena, and casts her fate with the sheepherder and noble Indian chief's son, Alessandro. Ramona's happy ending is tragically thwarted when, in the novel's second half, her husband is murdered by white settlers.

The novel attracted attention from the time of its publication, though Jackson was somewhat disappointed that the positive response owed as much to its melodramatic love story as to its political agenda; she had hoped it would do for Indian rights what UNCLE TOM'S CABIN had done for ABOLITIONISM. Undoubtedly the book did to some extent shift the public's perceptions toward Native Americans as victims rather than as aggressors. Its vigorous promotion of a more multicultural America resonates clearly with the writings of Jackson's Hispanic contemporaries, including Maria Amparo RUIZ DE BURTON. Ramona's popularity sparked vigorous tourism to sites in California associated with important events in the novel; it was also the basis for a series of stage and screen adaptations, including the ongoing Ramona Pageant, performed in Hemet, California annually since 1923.

Sources

May, Antoinette, ed. The Annotated Ramona. San Carlos, Calif.: Wide World Publishing/Tetra, 1989.

Phillips, Kate. Helen Hunt Jackson: A Literary Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2003.

—Deborah Evans

“Rappaccini's Daughter” by Nathaniel Hawthorne
(1844) short story

Much of the action of this tale by Nathaniel HAWTHORNE takes place in an Italian garden, where, in an elaborate experiment, the physician Rappaccini has raised his daughter with only the company of the beautiful but deadly flowers. In part an allegory of the Garden of Eden, the story portrays characters who represent and confront multiple tensions: between nature and science, between science and religion, between free will and desire, and between good and evil. As such, “Rappaccini's Daughter” exploits the binary nature of American thought and deals with some of the major themes that have shaped American literature. The story first appeared in the December 1844 United States Magazine and Democratic Review.

Source

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Mosses from an Old Manse, 2 volumes. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

—Earl Yarrington

"The Raven" by Edgar Allan Poe (1845) poem

One of Edgar Allan Poe's most famous poems, "The Raven" is narrated by a distraught lover who describes the ominous visit of a raven. Brooding over the loss of his love, Lenore, the narrator speaks to the raven, asking questions to which the bird repeatedly replies, "Nevermore." Characteristic of Poe's work, the poem features musical, stylized language, employing repetitions, alliteration, and a trochaic meter. The speaker can be said to represent a trapped, disintegrating, incoherent self, obsessed with death. The underlying darkness and supernatural quality to the poem are common elements in Poe's work. The dark night, the brooding loneliness of the scene, and the menacing presence of the bird reflect the dark, self-destructive inner landscape of the narrator.

Since the poem's appearance in the New York Evening Mirror (January 29, 1845), various questions have remained unanswered: Does the raven really exist, or is it symbolic of the narrator's psyche? Does Lenore exist, or is she too an invention of the narrator? Some critics read "The Raven" as a solipsistic work.

Sources

Hayes, Kevin J. The Cambridge Companion to Edgar Allan Poe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Poe, Edgar Allan. The Raven and Other Poems. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1845.

—Y. P. Renfro

Realism

As a movement in American literature, realism is associated with the rise of novelists such as Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Henry JAMES, Rebecca Harding DAVIS, and William Dean HOWELLS, who defined it as "nothing more and nothing less than the truthful treatment of material." The influence of realism on American literature was strongest between the end of the CIVIL WAR in 1865 and the mid 1890s, and its tenets and tendencies encompass a broad spectrum of related ideologies and practices (see DIALECT OR VERNACULAR WRITING; LOCAL COLOR; PRAGMATISM). Several important factors combined in this period to prompt many writers to see ROMANTICISM and related modes as no longer appropriate. Among these were a rise in literacy rates, the harsh consequences of the war, and the often sober realities of newly ascendant industrialism. In place of the noble hero or heroine, exponents of realism tended toward average, middle-class characters; instead of depicting remarkable events and exotic locales, they focused on everyday actions close to home. These emphases led also to differences in form and method, with set structures and ordered plots exchanged for experimentalism and seeming randomness.

Writers such as Twain, George Washington CABLE, and Bret HARTE used colloquial American language to capture the rhythms of American speech that accurately reflected regional differences. ADVENTURES OF HUCKLEBERRY FINN (1884), for example, is narrated by the uneducated Huck, whose voice is far removed from that of the typical literary, formal narrators of earlier American fiction. The realistic quality of Twain's novel comes in large part from using Huck's idiosyncratic personality and perspective to report honestly on events and social phenomena as they appear to him. Thus, Twain creates the illusion that his novel is not shaped by a literary sensibility but rather by the fresh and unaffected sensibility of a child.

To a rather different effect, Henry James developed a realism that probed the manners of society mostly through a focus on characters' states of mind. Although James's later style, convoluted and allusive, may seem far from the plain and everyday diction typical of other realists, it was meant to capture the complexities and meanderings of his characters' consciousness. Because James dramatized the way the mind perceives reality, he has often been called a psychological realist. In short stories of the supernatural, such as "The Jolly Corner" and "The Turn of the Screw," where ghosts appear in vivid, haunting scenes, James leaves open the possibility that reality is only what his characters imagine or project onto their environment.

The spokesman for American realism, Howells wrote novels that are almost sociological in their emphasis on mundane details of dress, speech, and action. He thus strove to avoid melodrama with a "plain style" aimed at recording, rather than heightening, reality. Howells also usefully articulated the goal of the realist as instruction rather than entertainment.

Although the general ideological and stylistic characteristics of realism can be usefully enumerated and contrasted with other movements such as Romanticism and Naturalism, it should be noted that all of these characteristics are also present in works of literature from earlier and later periods. For instance, "average" characters and common settings are featured in the earlier (and wildly popular) UNCLE TOM'S CABIN and in THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD, and much of the interest and humor in Frances Miriam Whitcher's sketches is rooted in the distinct speech of their characters.

Sources

Lehan, Richard D. Realism and Naturalism: The Novel in an Age of Transition. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005.

Pizer, Donald, and Earl N. Harbert, eds. American Realists and Naturalists. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 12: Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale, 1982.

Smith, Christopher, ed. American Realism. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.

Sundquist, Eric J., ed. American Realism: New Essays. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982.

Redburn by Herman Melville (New York: Harper, 1849) novel

Herman MELVILLE wrote Redburn, His First Voyage in the quasi-autobiographical mode that had gained him such popular success with TYPEE (1846) and OMOO (1847) a few years before. Driven by the need to support his growing family, he turned his experiences as a sailor on a merchant ship into a semifictional account that casts the young Wellingborough Redburn in the role he himself had played at the age of nineteen, when, in 1839, he sailed from New York to Liverpool and back.

Redburn, the “son of a gentleman,” is the main character and first-person narrator. He signs on the Highlander, bound for Liverpool under the command of the arrogant Captain Riga. Redburn’s inexperience and confusion are cause for many comical scenes. Memorable characters featured in the novel include the diabolical bully Jackson and Harry Bolton, who befriends Redburn and takes him on a trip to London.

Though Redburn was well received both in Britain and America, Melville looked disparagingly on this novel.

Source

Melville, Herman. Redburn, His First Voyage; Being the Sailor-Boy Confessions and Reminiscences of the Son-of-a-Gentleman, in the Merchant Service, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, and G. Thomas Tanselle. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1969.

—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

Representative Men by Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1850) essay collection

This collection of seven essays that Ralph Waldo EMERSON had previously delivered as lectures begins with an introductory piece, “On the Uses of Great Men,” which explains his philosophy of the individual in history. Then follow biographical sketches of six historical figures who represent, for Emerson, not only men of great achievement but also universal ideals to which all individuals might aspire. These representative men and their realms of genius are “Plato; or, the Philosopher,” “Swedenborg; or, the Mystic,” “Montaigne; or, the Skeptic,” “Shakespeare; or, the Poet,” “Napoleon; or, the Man of the World,” and “Goethe; or, the Writer.”

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Ridge, John Rollin (1827–1867) novelist, poet, journalist

[T]here is nothing so dangerous in its consequences as injustice to individuals—whether it arise from prejudice of color or from any other source; . . . a wrong done to one man is a wrong to society and to the world.

—The Life and Adventures of Joaquin Murieta (1854)

A fiery political commentator and novelist, John Rollin Ridge was born into an influential Cherokee family of practicing Christians in New Echota, Georgia. His childhood was dominated by the removal of the Cherokees from Georgia and its aftermath. His father and grandfather, John Ridge and Major Ridge, both signed the Treaty of New Echota, which ceded Cherokee land to Georgia. In 1834 the Ridge family safely removed to Van Buren, Arkansas, two years before the forced march referred to as the Trail of Tears. As a lawyer and slave owner, Ridge’s father prospered there. However, tensions in 1839 between the “Ross” and “Ridge” Cherokee factions led to the murders of prominent signers of the Treaty of New Echota, among them Elias BOUDINOT and Ridge’s father and grandfather. The twelve-year-old John Rollin Ridge witnessed his father’s mutilation and murder by members of the John Ross faction, an event that shaped the rest of Ridge’s life.

A precocious youth, Ridge attended Protestant missionary schools and excelled in several subjects. In 1843 he traveled to Massachusetts and studied law for two years before returning to Arkansas, where he married Elizabeth Wilson, a white woman, in 1847. Together they had one daughter.

Ridge’s career turned in 1849, when he killed a Ross faction member who had stolen his horse. Fearing retaliation and lacking money, Ridge traveled to California on the Overland trail to prospect for gold during the boom days of the California gold rush. His mining career was short-lived, though, and in 1850 he became a correspondent for the New Orleans True Delta, thus beginning a lifelong career in journalism. Thereafter, Ridge hopped from one newspaper to another. He became the founding editor of the Sacramento Daily Bee in 1857, was editor of the Daily National Democrat by 1858, and worked briefly at the San Francisco Evening Journal in 1861.

As a journalist, Ridge published political editorials, sketches of Indian history, and poetry. He assumed many controversial political positions, defending Manifest Destiny and Indian assimilation but attacking maltreatment of the Yuba Indians, supporting Stephen Douglas in 1860 and criticizing Abraham Lincoln and the Union during the CIVIL WAR. Ridge wrote numerous anti-Mormon editorials and had associations with the Knights of the Golden Circle, a secretive Copperhead (pro-Confederacy) group.

In 1854 Ridge published his only novel, The Life and Adventures of Joaquin Murieta, The Celebrated California Bandit.

Based on a real person, the book mythologizes a wronged Mexican outlaw, whose banditti gang rampages California and runs from U.S. rangers. Though not an immediate success, Ridge's novel helped propel the Joaquín Murieta figure to the status of cultural icon; he has been the subject of many stories and plays since. A forerunner of popular nineteenth-century Western DIME NOVELS, The Life and Adventures of Joaquín Murieta is one of the first novels written by a Native American.

In 1865 Ridge headed a Cherokee treaty delegation to Washington, D.C. He died on October 5, 1867, after returning to California. His wife subsequently published his only book of poetry, Poems, by a Cherokee Indian, with an Account of the Assassination of His Father, John Ridge (1868).

Source

Parins, James W. John Rollin Ridge: His Life and Works. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991.

—Joshua Matthews

Riis, Jacob August (1849–1914) journalist, reformer

Born in Denmark, Jacob Riis came to the United States in 1870 and settled in New York City, where he took a job as a police reporter. His experiences while covering this beat for various newspapers led him to become one of the most outspoken—not to say eloquent—crusaders for social reform of his day. His reporting on slum dwellers and on the conditions of lower-class urbanites, heavily illustrated with poignant photographs, resulted in How the Other Half Lives (1890), which attracted the attention and support of Theodore Roosevelt, then head of the New York police board, and probably influenced Stephen Crane's novel Maggie: A Girl of the Streets (1895; privately published in 1893). Riis's other books tackled such problems as child labor (The Children of the Poor [1892]) and the evils of tenements (The Battle with the Slum [1902]). Riis's autobiography, The Making of an American, was published in 1901. In addition to writing about and photographing the underclass, he took concrete action to improve their living conditions, establishing a pioneer settlement house and agitating for public parks and playgrounds. In 1901 the settlement house was named for him, and his work on behalf of the park and playground movement was commemorated with the establishment of Jacob Riis Park on Long Island.

Sources

Fried, Lewis. Makers of the City. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1990.

Gandal, Keith. The Virtues of the Vicious: Jacob Riis, Stephen Crane, and the Spectacle of the Slum. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Lane, James B. Jacob A. Riis and the American City. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1974.

Riley, James Whitcomb (1849–1916) journalist, poet
Indiana poet James Whitcomb Riley took a job selling patent medicines and then painted houses before he finally landed a job with the Anderson (Indiana) Democrat. He promptly lost this job after publishing a poem he attributed to Edgar Allan Poe that was actually an imitation he had written himself. He next went to work for the Indianapolis Journal where, in 1877, he contributed a series of local dialect poems under the pen name “Benjamin F. Johnson, of Boone.” The series, subsequently published as “The Old Swimmin’-Hole” and “Leven More Poems” (1883), included such sentimental works as “When the Frost Is on the Pumpkin” and launched his career as a popular bard. Numerous other collections followed, repeating Riley’s formula combining quaintness, cheerfulness, and simplicity, and making him the most highly paid poet American had yet seen. He was also a successful reader of his own work, often appearing with the humorist Bill Nye on a bill that catered to the public’s taste for sentimentality.

Sources

Revell, Peter. James Whitcomb Riley. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Van Allen, Elizabeth J. James Whitcomb Riley: A Life. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.

“Rip Van Winkle” by Washington Irving

(1819–1820) short story

Published as part of Washington IRVING’s SKETCH BOOK (1819–1820), this tale concerns a layabout Dutch American man who lives with his shrewish wife in a Hudson River village before the time of the Revolutionary War. In the story, which is based on an ancient folktale, the eponymous hero escapes his wife’s nagging one day by wandering into the Catskills with his dog, Wolf. There they encounter a stranger who leads them deeper into the woods, where a group of dwarfish fellows are engaged in a game of ninepins in a clearing. Rip, who has helped the stranger carry a keg to this place, takes a drink or two of its liquor and then falls into a deep sleep.

Rip Van Winkle’s slumber proves so profound that when he awakens—twenty years later—the whole village has changed. George Washington’s portrait has replaced that of King George III on the signboard at the inn and the once quiet streets bustle with traffic. Irving’s story describes Rip Van Winkle’s escape from domestic tyranny and comments on the disappearance of British rule in America.

Dramatized repeatedly, the standard play about Rip Van Winkle was written by Dion BOUCICAULT in 1865, commissioned by the actor Joseph Jefferson; Jefferson had forty years of success with the play.

Sources

Bowden, Mary Weatherspoon. Washington Irving. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Irving, Washington. The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., 7 parts, as Geoffrey Crayon. New York: Printed by C. S. Van Winkle, 1819–1820.

Ripley, George (1802–1880) reformer, literary critic

Born in Massachusetts, George Ripley was educated in theology at Harvard Divinity School before becoming a Unitarian (see UNITARIANISM) minister in Boston in 1826. He remained in the post for the next fifteen years, studying the German transcendentalist thinkers (see TRANSCENDENTALISM) and editing the Christian Register, a liberal Unitarian periodical. He also co-edited, with F. H. Hedge, Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature (1838–1845), a fifteen-volume work that had considerable influence on the American transcendentalist movement. After defending his own Discourses on the Philosophy of Religion (1836) and Ralph Waldo EMERSON'S Harvard Divinity School Address (see AN ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE SENIOR CLASS IN DIVINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE) (1838) from attacks by more-conservative Unitarians, Ripley retired from the ministry.

In 1841, together with other members of the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB, Ripley helped found BROOK FARM in Roxbury, Massachusetts. Ripley became president of the community and helped start THE DIAL, acting as assistant to the journal's first editor, Margaret FULLER. Ripley also worked on the farm and helped the community make the transition into FOURIERISM. He edited the Fourierist journal THE HARBINGER from 1845 to 1847. After a fire destroyed a major Brook Farm phalanstery in October 1847, Ripley moved to Brooklyn, New York, where he continued editing The Harbinger until, in 1849, he became literary critic of the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE. While at the Tribune, Ripley instituted the first daily book reviews in the nation. Over the next thirty years he exerted enormous influence over American letters, promoting books such as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE'S THE SCARLET LETTER (1850) and helping to found several important periodicals, among them HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. His ambitious History of Literature and the Fine Arts (1852), which he prepared with Bayard TAYLOR, was followed in 1858 by his work on volume one of the sixteen-volume New American Cyclopaedia (1858–1863).

Source

Golemba, Henry L. George Ripley. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

The Rise of Silas Lapham by William Dean

Howells (1 volume, Boston: Ticknor, 1885) novel

In what is often regarded his best work, William Dean HOWELLS paints a memorable portrait of an upwardly mobile, self-made American businessman. The action centers on the protagonist's failure to turn his wealth into social capital and the consequences to his evolving sense of ethics. Raised on an unproductive Vermont farm, Silas Lapham has, as an adult, exploited the mineral wealth discovered there just before his father died. He formulates the mineral into a paint, which sells so successfully that it makes him one of the richest men in Boston.

Howells is careful in the novel to avoid sentiment or simplistic moralizing. Lapham's "rise"—his eventual conquest over base self-interest—is in some sense also a "fall," for the consequence is bankruptcy. For Howells, the Horatio ALGER version of the American dream, in which virtue is always rewarded, is an empty promise.

Sources

Howells, William Dean. The Rise of Silas Lapham: An Authoritative Text, Composition and Backgrounds, Contemporary Responses, Criticism, edited by Don Cook. New York: Norton, 1982.

Pease, Donald E., ed. New Essays on The Rise of Silas Lapham. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Ritchie, Anna Mowatt (1819–1870) poet, novelist, playwright

The daughter of a New York merchant, Anna Cora Ogden was born in France and came to America when she was seven. She married James Mowatt at the age of fourteen, and, often sickly, she spent much of her time indoors, writing poetry, novels, and plays. Her first produced drama, Fashion; or, Life in New York, proved to be a success when it was staged in 1845. That same year Mowatt also began acting. Although ill health forced her retirement in 1854, she gained enough material from the stage to write her Autobiography of an Actress (1854) as well as two romantic narratives about life on the stage: Mimic Life (1856) and Twin Roses (1857). After 1861 she spent her life abroad, continuing to write romantic novels and historical sketches.

Source

Barnes, Eric Wollencott. The Lady of Fashion: The Life and the Theatre of Anna Cora Mowatt. New York: Scribners, 1954.

Robinson, Rowland Evans (1833–1900) short-story writer

A native of Vermont, Robinson was a prolific writer of sketches based on the simple rural existence he had known as a farmer. His first collection of short fiction, Forest and Stream Fables (1886), was followed by several others featuring a character named Uncle Lisha, a shoemaker who serves as the community leader of a small rural Vermont community. Robinson's apt renderings of Down East humor and ear for Vermont dialect made him an important figure in the LOCAL COLOR movement. He also wrote with great skill about other aspects of his native region in such works as Vermont: A Study of Independence (1892), In New England's Fields and Woods (1896), and Hunting without a Gun and Other Papers (1905).

Source

Baker, Ronald L. Folklore in the Writings of Rowland E. Robinson. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1973.

"Roger Malvin's Burial" by Nathaniel Hawthorne (1831) short story

First published anonymously in the 1832 Token (i.e., 1831), Nathaniel Hawthorne's short story "Roger Malvin's Burial" is a tale of loss, regret, and—as with most of Hawthorne's stories—the consequences of sin. After John Lovewell leads an unsuccessful battle against Indians, two wounded survivors escape through the woods. Roger Malvin, realizing that he is mortally wounded, orders the much younger Reuben Bourne to leave him. Bourne promises that after his own recovery he will return to bury Malvin and that he will tell Dorcas, the elder man's daughter, what has transpired. Fearing Dorcas's reaction, however, Bourne lies, claiming that he waited to leave Malvin until after he was dead and buried. Bourne marries Dorcas, but his conscience begins to bother him. Years later, when their son is fifteen, the Bournes leave their home to begin a new life in the wilderness. On the trip, while hunting for food, Reuben accidentally shoots his own son. The son's body is discovered beneath the same tree under which Malvin had been left to die years before. Dorcas faints at the sight of her son, and the bloody handkerchief that Reuben had left as a signal crumbles and falls to the ground. Tearfully Reuben realizes that his promise is at last fulfilled, his sin paid for.

Source

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Mosses from an Old Manse. The Centenary Edition of Nathaniel Hawthorne, volume 10. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1974.

—Julie M. Cox

Romance

Many of the novels written in the first half of the nineteenth century were billed as romances. The term arose in Europe during the Middle Ages, when it described lengthy compositions in prose or in verse delivered in one of the Romance languages. Later the term was applied to works of fiction dealing with knights, chivalry, and courtly love. The first American writer to borrow heavily from this tradition was James Fenimore COOPER, who explicitly referred to his novels—filled with adventure and set in remote lands—as romances. Of Cooper's followers, two writers stand out as having created a specifically American form of the romance: Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman MELVILLE.

In Hawthorne's preface to THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES (1851), he described how a romance concerns "the truth of the human heart." Hawthorne's definition of the genre, according to the scholar Nina Baym, suggested the importance of the inner lives of his characters—details that today would be considered aspects of psychological writing. In his preface Hawthorne explained how a writer might manipulate these characteristics in order to "bring out or mellow the lights and deepen and enrich the shadows of the picture." Hawthorne's romances include four longer works, THE SCARLET LETTER (1850), THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES, THE BLITHEDALE ROMANCE (1852), and THE MARBLE FAUN (1860)—as well as works of short fiction. His onetime friend, Melville, added new dimensions to the romance by increasing the quotient of supernatural and allegorical elements in his novels—for example, in MOBY-DICK (1851).

In the latter half of the century, romance fell out of favor as many writers and critics—spurred perhaps, by the horrors of the CIVIL WAR—called for a more realistic fiction. A new trend began with the LOCAL-COLOR movement, resulting in REALISM (and later, in naturalism).

Sources

- Bell, Michael D. The Development of American Romance: The Sacrifice of Relation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980.
- Budick, E. Miller. Fiction and Historical Consciousness: The American Romance Tradition. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Greenwald, Elissa. Realism and the Romance: Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry James, and American Fiction. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Research Press, 1989.
- Hurley, Jennifer A., ed. American Romanticism. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.

Romanticism

Romanticism, typically defined by its opposition to classicism, favors the imagination, feelings, and intuition. Whereas classicism emphasizes reason and the imitation of traditional art forms, the Romantic seeks to create original forms or to revolutionize traditional genres. Romanticism is associated with the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The literature of this period was based on the concepts of the individual and of individual freedom. Often, the source of authority and inspiration for the Romantic was nature—for example, in Walt WHITMAN's LEAVES OF GRASS. For the Romantic writer, the individual soul or imagination was paramount; at times, the heroic aspect was illustrated by a character's stand against a community that censured the individual, as in Nathaniel Hawthorne's THE SCARLET LETTER (1850). In America, Romanticism became connected to ideas about utopian community and to the establishment of societies based on these ideas (see BROOK FARM and FRUITLANDS). ABOLI-

TIONISM and the women's rights movement grew out of the Romantic spirit of reform. The TRANSCENDENTALISM that emerged in Concord, Massachusetts, offered the secular proposition that the individual is capable of apprehending universal truths. Ralph Waldo EMERSON's emphasis on man's ability to learn from nature and his charge that the American scholar not rely so heavily on the teachings of Europe also led to an exuberant confidence in the common man and in public education as promulgated by such Transcendentalists as Bronson ALCOTT. Experience became a kind of school in itself, and book learning—the province of the classicists—was balanced against the concept of a native wit that could be developed by communing with its sources in nature. Man's power of observation, Emerson implied, was enhanced as he began to react to his place in nature. Henry David THOREAU gave this Emersonian doctrine of self-reliance a practical turn when he emphasized that the individual could set himself apart from society and learn by doing for himself virtually everything that civilization could teach him.

Another side of Romanticism was revealed in the histories of Francis PARKMAN and William Hickling PRESCOTT. Like the great Romantic novelists, these historians were attracted to the past as the repository of great human dramas and picturesque scenes that stimulated the imagination. They evoked the past not as a model for the present but instead as a way to identify with heroic individuals of the past who transcended their times and created, like the heroes of gothic romances, new worlds by the force of their will. Hawthorne and Herman MELVILLE also pointed out, however, the dangers of the Romantic hero's titanic will in novels that highlighted human isolation (as with Hester Prynne in The Scarlet Letter) or self-destructiveness (as with Ahab in MOBY-DICK). Romanticism gradually gave way to REALISM in the mid to late nineteenth century.

Sources

- Andrews, William L., ed. Literary Romanticism in America. Baton Rouge: Louisiana University Press, 1981.
- Bickman, Martin. American Romantic Psychology: Emerson, Poe, Whitman, Dickinson, Melville. Dallas, Tex.: Spring Publications, 1988.
- Hurley, Jennifer A., ed. American Romanticism. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.
- Lieber, Todd M., ed. Endless Experiments: Essays on the Heroic Experience in American Romanticism. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1973.

Roughing It by Mark Twain (Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing Company, 1872) nonfiction

A sequel to Mark Twain's (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) popular travel book THE INNOCENTS ABROAD (1869), Roughing It is a semi-autobiographical account of his travels in the territories and states of the American West from 1861 to 1867. Beginning with Twain's stagecoach journey to his brother, Orion Clemens, who worked as the secretary of the Nevada Territory, Roughing It chronicles Twain's visits to Salt Lake City, Carson City, San Francisco, and the Hawaiian Islands. The book contains dozens of humorous sketches of Western life, which satirically treat silver-mining booms, Mormonism, Native Americans, and tales of Western outlaws. A major success, Roughing It sold 75,000 copies in its first year of publication, and Twain began a popular lecture tour in 1872, based on the book.

Source

- Twain, Mark. Roughing It, edited by Franklin R. Rogers and Paul Baender. The Works of Mark Twain, volume 2. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972.

—Joshua Matthews

Rouquette, Adrien Emmanuel (1813–1887) poet

Adrien Emmanuel Rouquette was born in New Orleans of a Creole mother and a French father who died before Rouquette was five. Enamored of American Indian life, Rouquette frequently ran away from his parents' summer home to live among the local Choctaw tribe. His love of nature and the Indian way of life first found expression in a collection of verse, Les Savanes (1841). After becoming a priest, Rouquette continued to publish poetry; Wild Flowers: Sacred Poetry appeared in 1848. He also spoke out fervently against slavery and was led by his abolitionist sentiments to join the company of the Choctaw, whom he served as a priest. When he died, he was working on a dictionary of the Choctaw language. He also wrote a romance titled La Nouvelle Atala (1879) and—under the pen name E. Junius—Critical Dialogue between Aboo and Caboo (1880), a denunciation of George Washington CABLE's depiction of Creoles.

Source

- Le Breton, Dagmar Renshaw. Chahta-Ima: The Life of Adrien-Emmanuel Rouquette. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1947.

Royall, Anne Newport (1769–1854) travel writer

Born in Maryland and raised on what was then the Pennsylvania frontier, Anne Newport moved back to the South after her father died; she was then thirteen years old. In Virginia, she and her mother kept house for Captain William Royall, who educated Anne. Captain Royall and Anne were married in 1797; however, when he died sixteen years later, he left his money to another heir, forcing Anne to rely on her own resources. From 1824 to 1831 she made her way in the world by traveling throughout the United States and recording her impressions. Royall's observations of virtually every significant settlement in the country were published in ten separate volumes, including the three-volume Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States (1826) and Letters from Alabama (1830). Settling in Washington, D.C., she published two newspapers, Paul Pry (1831–1836) and its successor, The Huntress (1836–1854). A frequent critic of government corruption and social decadence, she was herself a frequent target of retaliatory ridicule in the press.

Sources

- James, Bessie Rowland. Anne Royall's U.S.A. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1972.
- Maxwell, Alice S., and Marion B. Dunlevy. Virago!: The Story of Anne Newport Royall (1769–1854). Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1985.
- Royall, Anne Newport. Letters from Alabama, 1817–1822. Biographical introduction and notes by Lucille Griffith. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1969.

Ruiz de Burton, María Amparo (1832–1895) novelist, playwright

If my strength fails me . . . then I ask you not to judge me with severity. Remember that I am a woman . . . and Mexican . . . with my soul enclosed in an iron cage. In this manner Society confines us as soon as we are born, like the Chinese and the feet of their women.

—Letter to a cousin dated August 12, 1869 from Staten Island, N.Y.

María Amparo Ruiz was born in La Paz, Baja California, Mexico, to a prominent Mexican family. When the Mexican-American War ended in 1848, Ruiz relocated to San Francisco, California. In 1849 she married Henry S. Burton, a U.S. military captain; their first child, Nellie, was born in 1850. In 1852 Captain Burton was granted command of the military post in San Diego, and the family enjoyed an aristocratic lifestyle there. While in San Diego, Ruiz de Burton wrote several plays for the Mission Theater. It is not known how many plays she wrote or how many, if any, were performed. Taking advantage of a provision in the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo that allowed Mexican Americans to claim land, the family purchased property on Pío Pico's Jamul land grant in San Diego, made improvements, and submitted the title to the Court of Land Claims. A second child, Henry, was born in 1852. In 1859 the Burtons moved to the eastern United States, living in several coastal states and in the District of Columbia. Ruiz de Burton became friends with Mary Todd Lincoln and Varina Davis, Jefferson Davis's wife. In 1869 Henry Burton died of malaria, and Ruiz de Burton returned to San Diego in 1870, finding that some of their land had been sold to pay off debts. Other large tracts had been taken over by squatters—a circumstance made possible by the California Land Act of 1851, which contradicted the previous provisions and declared all Mexican lands public domain until a Land Commission verified the authenticity of land titles.

To support her children, Ruiz de Burton turned to writing, becoming the first known Mexican-born author to write novels in English. Under the name Mrs. Henry C. Burton she published Who Would Have Thought It? (1871), a satire of the white Yankee lifestyle she had observed during her ten-year residence in the East. A play, Don Quixote de la Mancha: A Comedy in Five Acts (1876) was drawn in part from Cervantes's novel. Ruiz de Burton's second novel, The Squatter and the Don (1885), appeared under the pen name C. Loyal. It focuses on Mexican land rights in California, criticizing white squatters who move in on land owned by displaced Mexicans. The novel's strong political statement reflects Ruiz de Burton's own involvement in dozens of lawsuits over a twenty-year period. When she died in Chicago, she was destitute, still trying to secure her claim on Rancho Jamal.

In part due to the interest of feminist and Chicana scholars in retrieving the "lost writings" of women and minorities, Ruiz de Burton's work has been republished in recent years and has drawn significant critical attention as an affirmation of gender and ethnic equality.

Sources

- Luz Montes, Amelia María de la, and Anne Elizabeth Goldman, eds. María Amparo Ruiz de Burton: Critical & Pedagogical Perspectives. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2004.
- Ruiz de Burton, María Amparo. Conflicts of Interest: The Letters of María Amparo Ruiz de Burton, edited by Rosaura Sánchez and Beatrice Pita. Houston: Arte Público Press, 2001.

—Carmel Morse

Running a Thousand Miles for Freedom by William and Ellen Craft (London: William Tweedie, 1860) memoir

Running a Thousand Miles for Freedom; or, The Escape of William and Ellen Craft from Slavery is an autobiographical account of the authors' daring escape from slavery in December 1848. The narrative details a trip from Georgia to Boston aboard trains and steamships during which the fair-skinned Ellen posed as a young white planter, wealthy but sickly, and the much darker William posed as her slave. Once in Boston, the Crafts were persuaded by abolitionists such as William Lloyd GARRISON and William Wells BROWN to speak about their experiences, and for two years the couple remained in Boston while William spoke on the lecture circuit; social customs prevented Ellen from speaking publicly, however. With the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law in 1850 the Crafts moved to England, where their memoir was first published.

—Cacee DeYoung

Rahv, Philip (1908–1973) editor, literary critic

The cofounder of PARTISAN REVIEW, Philip Rahv was born as Ivan Greenberg in Russia. He came to the United States as a child and attended grade school in Providence, Rhode Island. In 1933 he became a Communist and adopted the name Philip Rahv (Rahv is the Hebrew word for rabbi). The following year he and William Phillips founded Partisan Review, which changed course when the editors became anti-Stalinist and Rahv left the Communist Party in 1937. Although many contributors were leftists and the journal remained Marxist, the journal thereafter maintained a consistent anti-Communist stance. Rahv became an influential literary critic whose essays were collected in Image and Idea (1949; enlarged 1957) and The Myth and the Powerhouse (1965).

Source

Edelstein, Arthur, ed. Images and Ideas in American Culture: The Functions of Criticism: Essays in Memory of Philip Rahv. Hanover, N.H.: Brandeis University Press, 1979.

Rand, Ayn (1905–1982) novelist, playwright, philosopher

Born Alysia Rosenbaum in St. Petersburg, Russia, Rand grew up and was educated in her native country, graduating with honors in history from the University of Petrograd in 1924. When she immigrated to the United States in 1926, she changed her name to Ayn Rand, taking her surname from the Remington-Rand typewriter. Rand's reaction against the Russian Revolution contributed to her staunch belief in individualism and capitalism.

In her early years in America, Rand worked in the movie industry in Hollywood. She became an American citizen in 1931. Her first success as a writer was her play, Night of January 16th, which had a successful Broadway run in 1935. Her first novel, We the Living (1936), is set in Russia and is based on her experiences with Communism. Her novella Anthem (1938), a mix of science fiction and fantasy, presents a collectivist world in which a man and woman must escape to the wilderness to discover the meaning of the words "I" and "we."

Rand's enduring fame and reputation rest on her novels The Fountainhead (1943) and Atlas Shrugged (1957). The former was said to be loosely based on the life of architect Frank Lloyd Wright, although Rand disputed that claim. The latter novel is Rand's most complete statement of her philosophy, which she called "Objectivism." In both her fiction and non-fiction, Rand argued for the idea of "rational self-interest" rather than altruism. Only when the individual's needs were satisfied, she argued, could society expect to benefit.

Rand turned to nonfiction to explicate her philosophy after the publication of Atlas Shrugged. Her later works include The Virtue of Selfishness (1964), Introduction to Objectivist Epistemology (1967), and Philosophy, Who Needs It (1982). Her books continue to attract a large and devoted following.

Sources

Binswanger, Harry, ed. The Ayn Rand Lexicon: Objectivism from A to Z. New York: New American Library, 1986.

Branden, Barbara. The Passion of Ayn Rand: A Biography. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1986.

Random House (1927– ) publishing house

In 1925 Bennett Cerf and Donald S. Klopfer acquired The MODERN LIBRARY, a line of reprints of modern classics, from Horace LIVERIGHT. With this lucrative purchase as the foundation of their company, the partners began to publish a few new books in 1927 under the imprint Random House. In 1933 Cerf and Klopfer won their legal battle to have James Joyce's Ulysses declared publishable in the United States. Random House authors included William FAULKNER, Robert Penn WARREN, John O'HARA, Eugene O'NEILL, and Dr. Seuss. The house of Alfred A. KNOPF merged with Random House in 1960. The Random House imprints were acquired by Newhouse Publications in 1980.

Source

Cerf, Bennett. At Random. New York: Random House, 1977.

Ransom, John Crowe (1888–1974) poet, critic, editor

Educated at Vanderbilt University, John Crowe Ransom also studied at Oxford as a Rhodes scholar. In 1914 he returned to Vanderbilt to teach in the English department and soon began participating in informal off-campus discussions of religion and philosophy—the germ that in the 1920s evolved into the FUGITIVES, a group of influential poets and critics that included Ransom's students Allen TATE and Robert Penn WARREN. With the encouragement of his Vanderbilt colleague Donald DAVIDSON, Ransom published his first book of poems, Poems About God (1919), while he was serving as a lieutenant in the army in France. Upon his return to Vanderbilt, Ransom's commitment to poetry gave direction to the meetings of the FUGITIVES, and he became one of the editors of the group's influential journal, The Fugitive (1922–1925). Ransom's maturation as a poet is evident in such collections as Chills and Fever (1924) and his last volume of original verse, Two Gentlemen in Bonds (1927). A fastidious poet whose body of work is small, Ransom is known for exquisite diction and understatement. His poetry has been called spare and classical. While at Vanderbilt, Ransom also became involved in the group known as the AGRARIANS, contributing "Statement of Principles" and "Reconstructed but Unregenerated" to the essay collection I'LL TAKE MY STAND (1930), a Southern response to the country's growing industrialization and urbanization.

In 1937 Ransom joined the faculty of Kenyon College, where in 1939 he founded the KENYON REVIEW, an important and enduring literary quarterly. As a poet, editor and critic, he believed in the integrity of the work of literature and that its meaning should not be compromised by extraneous discussions of history, of the author's biography, or of anything that might detract from a close reading of the work. He codified his view of literary criticism in The New Criticism (1941). His literary essays appear in God without Thunder (1930), The World's Body (1938), and Beating the Bushes: Selected Es- says 1914–1970 (1972). His critical views and his work as a poet greatly influenced the next generation, particularly such poets as Robert Lowell and Randall Jarrell.

Sources

Young, Thomas Daniel. Gentleman in a Dustcoat: A Biography of John Crowe Ransom. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1976.

Young, ed. John Crowe Ransom: Critical Essays and a Bibliography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1968.

Rawlings, Marjorie Kinnan (1896–1953) novelist, short-story writer

Born and raised in Washington, D.C., and a graduate of the University of Wisconsin, Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings made her reputation by writing about life in the backcountry of North Florida. Following her marriage in 1919, Rawlings lived with her husband in New York, where she wrote for the Rochester Times Union and unsuccessfully tried to publish fiction. In 1928 a vacation in Florida prompted the couple to buy a farm with an orange grove in Cross Creek, near Gainesville. Following the 1931 publication in SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE of her first Florida piece—"Cracker Chidlings," a series of sketches about poor white "Crackers" that was subtitled "Real Tales from the Florida Interior"—editor Maxwell PERKINS urged her to write more about the region she later called "the Invisible Florida."

Rawlings's first novel, South Moon Under (1933), about a young Cracker who becomes a moonshiner, was followed by a less well-received second novel, Golden Apples (1935), the story of an English cad who comes to Florida in the nineteenth century and betrays a Cracker girl. Rawlings is chiefly remembered for her PULITZER PRIZE-winning novel, The Yearling (1938), set in 1870–1871, about a lonesome thirteen-year-old boy who must shoot his pet fawn when it ruins his family's meager crop. Rawlings's other important work includes a collection of stories, When the Whippoorwill—(1940), and Cross Creek (1942), a book of autobiographical essays that details Rawlings's own Florida experiences and that has been compared to Henry David Thoreau's Walden (1854).

Sources

Silverthorne, Elizabeth. Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings: Sojourner at Cross Creek. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1988.

Tarr, Rodger L. Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings: A Descriptive Bibliography. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1996.

Bigelow, Gordon E., and Laura V. Monti, eds. Selected Letters of Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1983.

Razaf, Andy (1895–1973) lyricist

Andreamenentania Paul Razafinkeriefy was born in Washington, D.C.; his father was the son of a member of the royal family of Madagascar, and his mother was the daughter of a former slave, John Louis Waller, who was the United States consul to Madagascar. After working as an elevator operator for a Tin Pan Alley music-publishing firm, Andrea Razaf, as he had shortened his name, managed to publish a few songs but still spent several frustrating years trying to break into a world that was not friendly to blacks.

In the early 1920s, however, blues singers such as Bessie Smith had created a market for “race records,” primarily among urban blacks but also with many white listeners. At the same time Razaf met the young pianist Thomas “Fats” Waller, and the two began a collaboration. As with so many songwriting teams, Razaf and Waller were opposites—Razaf disciplined and focused; Waller carefree and hedonistic. Yet, they worked successfully together, particularly for Harlem nightclub revues for which they wrote “Honeysuckle Rose” (1929), “Ain’t Misbehavin’” (1929), and “(What Did I Do to Be So) Black and Blue” (1929).

Their very success led to the team’s demise as white music professionals wanted to market Waller’s hit-making music to a general audience and separate him from a collaborator they felt was too outspoken against racism. Razaf had to turn to other composers, and with Eubie Blake he wrote a revue, Blackbirds of 1930, which featured the soaring melody “Memories of You.” Razaf’s personal and professional life declined during the 1930s, and in 1948, shortly after his fourth marriage, he suffered from an illness that left him paralyzed. “My color made life interesting,” he said. “With it came a sense of humor and the gift of laughter and a soul. It has given me something to strive for and shown me every advantage over thousands of white men, born with every advantage, who turned out to be nobodies.”

Source

Singer, Barry. Black and Blue: The Life and Lyrics of Andy Razaf. New York: Schirmer, 1992.

—Philip Furia

Realism

Realism as a literary movement in the United States developed in the latter half of the nineteenth century through the work of such authors as Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain) and William Dean Howells, both of whom continued to write into the twentieth century. The naturalist Frank Norris (see NATURALISM) rebelled against what he came to regard as the confinements of the realism practiced by Howells and his generation—realism as “the drama of a broken teacup,” as he called it—but Norris as well as other naturalists and most writers in the twentieth century continued to write what may broadly be described as realistic fiction.

American literary realism is characterized by fidelity to an empirical reality assumed to be widely perceived and objectively verifiable, the creation of multidimensional characters, an emphasis on rationality rather than emotion, and a concern with representative human experiences in society rather than in nature. It is generally seen as having two distinct strands: social realism (the recording of observable experiences of individual characters within distinct social classes) and psychological realism (the exploration of the hidden and complex workings of the conscious minds of individual characters).

Interest in the variety of American life led to the emergence of REGIONALISM as an important subgenre of literary realism as writers responded to the many distinct surfaces of American life. Following late-nineteenth-century exponents of “local color” fiction such as Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Sarah Orne Jewett, and George W. Cable, many writers in the twentieth century became associated with particular regions or locales, including Zane GREY (the West), Willa CATHER (Nebraska, the Southwest), Sherwood ANDERSON (Ohio), William FAULKNER (Mississippi), Thomas WOLFE (North Carolina), John O’HARA (Pennsylvania), John MARQUAND (New England), John STEINBECK (California), and Majorie Kinnan RAWLINGS (Florida).

The novel of manners, concerned with conflict between and within distinct social classes, represented another form of literary realism. Especially in THE HOUSE OF MIRTH (1905) and THE AGE OF INNOCENCE (1921) Edith WHARTON demonstrated her mastery of this kind of fiction. Writers such as F. Scott FITZGERALD in THE GREAT GATSBY (1925) and O’Hara in APPOINTMENT IN SAMARRA (1934) brought new vitality to novels that explored class tensions within American society.

Elements of realism as well as naturalism are evident in the work of modernist writers (see MODERNISM) who in a variety of ways explored the psychology of an evolving culture and individuals coping with unprecedented change. Disillusionment and alienation were perhaps the main legacies of WORLD WAR I for modernist American writers, especially the group of male writers born at the turn of the century and misleadingly labeled “the lost generation” (See THE LOST GENERATION). The prototype lost generation novel is Ernest HEMINGWAY’S THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926), which documents the lifestyle of a small group of disillusioned American expatriates. Realistic and naturalistic influences can be detected in African American fiction produced during the HARLEM RENAISSANCE of the 1920s and early 1930s, including Jean TOOMER’S experimental novel Cane (1923), as well as in Faulkner’s challenging modernist writings in which characters are driven, and not infrequently destroyed, by the legacy of a Southern past.

In the first half of the twentieth century, realism and naturalism dominated some distinct kinds of American fiction and drama, while influencing others in a more subtle manner. Regionalism, war fiction, and novels of manners were dominant forms of realism, while naturalism informed urban fiction including hard-boiled detective novels as well as social-protest novels.

Sources

- Kolb, Harold H. Jr. The Illusion of Life: American Realism as a Literary Form. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1969.
- Pizer, Donald, and Earl N. Harbert, eds. American Realists and Naturalists. Detroit: Gale, 1982.
- Smith, Christopher, ed. American Realism. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.

—James R. Giles

The Red Badge of Courage* by Stephen Crane
(New York: Appleton, 1895) novel

Stephen CRANE's masterpiece and the most realistic fictional depiction of the Civil War, The Red Badge of Courage was written by someone who had not experienced combat and who was born six years after the war had ended. The book is an initiation story about Henry Fleming, a naive young recruit who enlists in the army hoping to find the kind of glory and honor he has read about in romantic depictions of war, but who discovers its horror. Though the novel treats war realistically, it is primarily a psychological portrayal of Henry's terrifying experience of combat during two days. Rather than focusing on external details such as weaponry, battlefield tactics, and other military issues, Crane is concerned with the internal workings of Henry's ever-changing emotional state and attitude towards bravery and the nature of war.

Whether or not Henry has indeed become a mature hero at the end of the story has been one of the most debated issues about the book. Given Henry's constant shifts between smug confidence and self-doubt, some critics find it difficult to accept that a youth could suddenly gain maturity after only two days. Stated more broadly, the question is this: By the end of the novel, should readers agree with Henry that he has grown in insight and has become a man; should they read the ending ironically, thus suggesting that Henry is as much the victim of his own romantic delusions as he was in the first chapter; or is the narrator—possibly even the author himself—ambivalent about Henry? Ironically, he receives his wound, which his comrades perceive as “a red badge of courage,” when another retreating Union soldier hits him in the head with the butt end of a rifle.

Besides the matter of character development, the book is also notable for its imagery and point of view. Crane uses colors literally to describe what Henry sees and figuratively to depict how he feels. With the exception of the opening and closing paragraphs, the point of view is solely that of Henry. Throughout the book, the focus is on his fragmented, disconnected experiences. He knows little about what is going on around him. Often what he hears are rumors; and when he tries to see clearly, he is stymied by darkness, smoke, and gunfire. Rather than utilizing an omniscient narrator who sees the big picture and records accurately, Crane provides readers with the subjective impressions of a raw recruit experiencing terror firsthand.

Sources

- Crane, Stephen. The Red Badge of Courage: An Episode of the American Civil War, edited by Fredson Bowers. The University of Virginia Edition of the Works of Stephen Crane, volume two. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1975.
- Crane. The Red Badge of Courage: A Facsimile Edition of the Manuscript, 2 volumes, edited by Fredson Bowers. Washington, D.C.: Brucoli Clark/NCR Microcard Editions, 1973.
- Pizer, Donald, ed. Critical Essays on Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1990.

—Paul Sorrentino

The Red Pony* by John Steinbeck (New York: Covici-Friede, 1937; enlarged edition, New York: Viking, 1945) novella

As published in 1937, The Red Pony was made up of three stories that had been published separately in magazines: “The Gift,” “The Great Mountains,” and “The Promise.” Each story follows young Jody Tiflin, a farm boy in Salinas Valley, California, as he learns about life and death, joy and sorrow. In his collection The Long Valley (1938) John STEINBECK added a fourth story to the sequence, the previously unpublished “The Leader of the People.” As each story builds upon the next, several characters, including his grandfather and father, Billy Buck, the stable hand on the family ranch, and an old Mexican named Gitano, impact Jody's maturation process in this coming-of-age/rite-of-passage narrative.

Sources

- Hayashi, Tetsumaro, and Thomas J. Moore. Steinbeck's “The Red Pony”: Essays in Criticism. Steinbeck Monograph Series, No. 13. Muncie, Ind.: Ball State University Press, 1988.
- Hughes, R. S. Beyond “The Red Pony”: A Reader's Companion to John Steinbeck's Complete Short Stories. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1987.

—Michael J. Meyer

Reed, John (1887–1920) journalist, poet

After he graduated from Harvard in 1910, John Silas (Jack) Reed began his journalistic career in New York. In 1913 he went to work for Max EASTMAN at THE MASSES. Reed first achieved recognition for his reports on the Mexican Revolution, which he published in Insurgent Mexico (1914). His dispatches on WORLD WAR I were collected in The War in Eastern Europe (1916). As Reed gained a reputation as a socialist and progressive journalist, he was also writing poetry and associating himself with avant-garde cultural movements. He became a founding member, with Eugene O'NEILL, Susan GLASPELL, and others, of the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS.

Reed's enduring reputation rests on his eyewitness reports on the Russian Revolution, which he crafted into Ten Days That Shook the World (1919). Having established relationships with Vladimir Ilyich Lenin and Leon Trotsky, Reed purported to give the inside news on this great event. Before his death of typhus in Russia, Reed organized the Communist Labor Party in the United States.

With the advent of the GREAT DEPRESSION, The New Masses promoted the formation and growth of John Reed Clubs, which were intended to advance proletarian culture (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE). Reaching an estimated peak membership of 1,200 in chapters across the nation, the clubs in the early 1930s attracted such writers as Nelson ALGREN, Langston HUGHES, Meridel LE SUEUR, Tillie Olsen, Kenneth REXROTH, and Richard WRIGHT.

Sources

"Draft Manifesto of the John Reed Clubs." New Masses, 7 (June 1932): 3–4.

Hicks, Granville. John Reed: The Making of a Revolutionary. New York & London: Blom, 1968.

Lamont, Corliss, ed. The John Reed Centenary. New York: John Reed Centenary Committee, 1988.

Regionalism

Some American writers are associated with certain regions of the country because their work provides detailed and dramatic portraits that draw on characteristic speech and manners. Sherwood ANDERSON, for example, is associated with the Midwest, which inspired some of his greatest fiction, especially WINEBURG, OHIO (1919). Edgar Lee MASTERS, Carl SANDBURG, and Willa CATHER were also associated with the Midwest—small-town, urban, and farming settings, respectively.

To Anderson, the more specific a writer was about the setting of his story, the more believable he could make his characters; for him, the particular led to the universal. William FAULKNER—who writes about YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, Mississippi, in most of his novels and stories—was fond of quoting Anderson's advice and chose to create fiction out of his "little postage stamp of native soil." Like Faulkner, many writers have explored particular locales within regions: John STEINBECK's Salinas Valley, California; Thomas WOLFE's ALTAMONT (the fictional name for his native Asheville, North Carolina); John O'HARA's GIBBSVILLE (based on Pottsville, Pennsylvania); Marjorie Kinnan RAWLING's Cross Creek, Florida.

Writers who write about real or made-up locales make use of the history or ideas associated with particular regions. Cather's Scandinavian immigrants, for example, suggest the difficult yet durable quality of American pioneers. The American West embodies the American myth of the self-made man, the loner, and the adventurer heading out for new territory and exploring the frontier. The novels of Owen WISTER and Zane GREY made the cowboy a staple of the American mythos. The South, with its legacy of the Civil War that left it the only part of the United States to have been invaded and to have lost a war, has inspired the work of Faulkner as well as later writers such as Robert Penn WARREN, Carson McCULLERS and Eudora WELTY. New England, with its importance to the nation's history and its developing character, has inspired writers such as E. A. ROBINSON, Robert FROST, Eugene O'NEILL, and George SANTAYANA. Although the term regionalist is sometimes used to describe an author whose work has limited appeal, many of the best American writers write about specific communities that have an intrinsic interest for them—so much so that author and place cannot be conceived of apart. In this sense, the term regionalist is descriptive and not limiting.

Sources

Burke, John Gordon, ed. Regional Perspectives: An Examination of America's Literary Heritage. Chicago: American Library Association, 1973.

Kowalewski, Michael, ed. Reading the West: New Essays on the Literature of the American West. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Quantic, Diane Dufva. The Nature of the Place: A Study of Great Plains Fiction. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1995.

Turner, Frederick. Spirit of Place: The Making of an American Literary Landscape. San Francisco: Sierra Club Books, 1989.

Watkins, Floyd C. In Time and Place: Some Origins of American Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1977.

Rhodes, Eugene Manlove (1869–1934)

short-story writer, novelist

Raised in Nebraska, Kansas, and New Mexico, Eugene Manlove Rhodes drew on his experience as a cowboy to write WESTERNS that not only were popular but also earned him respect as a regionalist (see REGIONALISM). Rhodes attended the University of the Pacific in San Jose, California, for two years (1888–1890) but was largely self-educated. While working as a ranch hand, he read books that he often acquired with coupons from packs of tobacco. Much of his work first appeared in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST before being published in book form. His books include Good Men and True (1910), The Desire of the Moth (1916), Stepsons of Light (1921), Copper Streak Trail (1922), Once in the Saddle, and Pasó por Aquí (1927), The Trusty Knaves (1933), Beyond the Desert (1934), and The Proud Sheriff (1935).

Sources

Gaston, Edwin W. Jr. Eugene Manlove Rhodes: Cowboy Chronicler. Austin, Tex.: Steck-Vaughn, 1967.

Hutchinson, W. H. A Bar Cross Man: The Life & Personal Writings of Eugene Manlove Rhodes. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1956.

Rice, Elmer (1892–1967) playwright

Born Elmer Reizenstein into a German Jewish family in New York City, Elmer Rice attended New York Law School and was admitted to the bar before he turned to playwriting. He gained instant celebrity with his play On Trial (produced 1914), a murder mystery that introduced the flashback structure to American theater. Though Rice never returned to the practice of law after his Broadway debut, many of his plays focused on lawyers, legal settings, and themes of truth and justice. He followed his initial success with two more courtroom dramas, For the Defense (produced 1919) and It Is the Law (produced 1922).

In the early part of his career Rice explored experimental forms such as EXPRESSIONISM and NATURALISM. He earned a place in the history of American drama with THE ADDING MACHINE (produced 1923), an expressionist play that posed questions about the effect of modern technology on human identity. Rice's other major success was the PULITZER PRIZE-winning STREET SCENE (produced 1929), a complex, realistic drama set in New York City. Rice had modest successes with The Left Bank (produced 1931), which dramatizes the life of American expatriates in Paris, and Counselor-at-Law (produced 1931), which explores the rather sordid world of a successful New York lawyer.

During the 1930s Rice wrote several earnest, didactic political plays, including We, the People (produced 1933), Judgment Day (produced 1934), and Between Two Worlds (produced 1935), in response to the GREAT DEPRESSION and the tensions that were leading to WORLD WAR II. Rice was one of the first playwrights to draw attention to the Nazi threat, and his plays were burned in Nazi-occupied areas. In late 1935 he became the head of the New York wing of the FEDERAL THEATRE PROJECT, a position he soon resigned when the United States government censored Ethiopia, the dramatization of a news story.

In 1938 Rice joined with other dramatists to form the Playwrights' Company, which became a major force in the New York theater scene. He had another popular success with the light expressionistic comedy Dream Girl (1945). Throughout his long career Rice wrote both commercial and noncommercial work, balancing his need for financial gain against his desire to create a serious artistic theater. He wrote in a variety of forms, styles and genres, following no clear line of aesthetic development. At best, his plays were experimental and grounded in sharp social criticism; at worst, his plays relied on melodramatic conventions and were burdened with dramatic argument.

Sources

Durham, Frank. Elmer Rice. New York: Twayne, 1970.
 Palmieri, Anthony F. R. Elmer Rice: A Playwright's Vision of America. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980.

—Kimberly M. Jew

"Richard Cory" by Edwin Arlington Robinson

(1897) poem

"Richard Cory," Edwin Arlington ROBINSON's most anthologized poem, appeared in his second collection of poetry, The Children of the Night. The sixteen-line poem is well known for its unsettling final couplet, which the poet Yvor Winters unfairly referred to as a "very cheap surprise ending." After describing the awe and envy that the rich, elegant gentleman Richard Cory inspires in the working-class townspeople, the narrator concludes: "And Richard Cory, one calm summer night, / Went home and put a bullet through his head." The impact of the poem, however, derives less from sensationalism than from its dispassionate tone, unfaltering meter, subtle symbolism, and use of irony and understatement. The poem conveys a favorite theme of Robinson's: the illusive value of social prestige and material comforts.

Source

Anderson, Wallace L. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Critical Introduction. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1968.

—John Cusatis

"The Rich Boy" by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1926) novelette

Appearing soon after THE GREAT GATSBY, this novelette was first published in The Redbook Magazine and collected in F. Scott FITZGERALD's third story collection, ALL THE SAD Young Men (1926). The title character in "The Rich Boy" is Anson Hunter, a member of a wealthy, aristocratic New York family who is controlled by his sense of superiority. The story includes one of Fitzgerald's most frequently quoted—or misquoted—passages: "Let me tell you about the very rich. They are different from you and me. They possess and enjoy early, and it does something to them, makes them soft where we are hard, cynical where we are truthful, in a way that, unless you were born rich, it is very difficult to understand."

Hunter is unable to yield to the expectations of Paula Legendre, the only girl he loves. He is a heavy drinker and a successful Wall Streeter as well as an active womanizer: "I don't think he was ever happy unless someone was in love with him . . . Perhaps they promised that there would always be women in the world who would spend their brightest, freshest, rarest hours to nurse and protect that superiority he cherished in his heart." The treatment of Anson Hunter is not a straight denunciation. Fitzgerald examines the complexity of his character and accounts for his conduct.

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

Richter, Conrad (1890–1968) novelist, short-story writer

Conrad Richter's writing is largely based on two landscapes: Pine Grove, Pennsylvania, where he was born and died—the Unionville of several of his novels—and the Southwest, where he lived for more than twenty years. The son of a Lutheran minister, Richter declined a scholarship to attend college. Working at many odd jobs, Richter by nineteen was editing a country weekly. He sold his first short story to a magazine in 1913, and his story "Brothers of No Kin" was selected for The Best Short Stories of 1915. His first book, Brothers of No Kin and Other Stories, was published in 1924.

In his next two books, Human Vibration: The Underlying Mechanics of Life and Mind (1925) and Principles in Bio-Physics: The Underlying Processes Controlling Life Phenomena and Inner Evolution (1927), Richter began to work out the philosophical and scientific foundation for his later fiction. He believed in the concept he called "hardship into gain," which he applied to the pioneers he later wrote about. According to Richter, beauty always has pain associated with it. His characters who do not work for what they have do not enjoy or appreciate their good life, while his pioneers have a sense of joy as they overcome the great obstacles they face.

In 1928 Richter and his wife moved to New Mexico for her health. His second work of fiction, Early Americana and Other Stories, appeared in 1936. The following year he published his first novel, The Sea of Grass (1937), an account of an Eastern woman who becomes involved in the turn-of-the-century homesteader-cattleman battle for the ranges of the Southwest. This work set the course for his career as his interest in men and women of vigor led him into the nation's past. Richter's attention focused on two frontiers, that of the Ohio River Valley from the end of the Revolutionary War until the beginning of the Civil War, and that of the Southwest at the close of the nineteenth century. He carefully researched the history of these frontiers and tried to create settings and characters with fidelity.

Richter's Ohio trilogy, The Trees (1940), The Fields (1946), and The Town (1950)—collected as The Awakening Land (1966)—is his greatest work. It records in painstaking detail the settling of the Ohio Valley from the late eighteenth century on by the Lockett family. The heroine and central character, Sayward Lockett Wheeler, is the embodiment of all the virtues Richter admired and that he felt the pioneers who went West possessed. The trilogy begins in the wilderness of the Ohio territory, with a cast of characters ranging from the strong who are able to contend with any hardship to those who are destroyed by adversity. The Fields moves into the nineteenth century and describes the taming and farming of the land. The Town, which describes the rapid development of a more modern way of life, won a PULITZER PRIZE. Richter, disliking the title "historical novelist," says in his introduction to The Town that he wanted to write about "those men and women of pioneer stock . . . whose names never figured in the history books but whose influence on their own times and country was incalculable."

In 1950 Richter returned to Pine Grove, where he continued his productive career. The Light in the Forest (1953), based on a story he had heard as a boy about a white child captured and raised by Native Americans, became a best-seller. The Lady (1957), Richter's last novel about the Southwest, was followed by the first two novels of a projected autobiographical trilogy that he did not complete: The Waters of Kronos (1960), which won a National Book Award, and A Simple Honorable Man (1962), which was about his father. His last books include The Grandfathers (1964), the sometimes humorous story of a fatherless sixteen-year-old girl in the Maryland mountains; A Country of Strangers (1966), a sequel to The Light in the Forest; and his last novel, The Aristocrat (1968), about an eighty-year-old Victorian spinster who lives by her own elegant and rigid rules.

Conrad Richter wrote clearly and straightforwardly about a simpler world—about a vanished breed of pioneers who grew strong through struggle. An honorable man himself, he believed in the virtues he extolled. His reputation as a chronicler of the settlement of the Ohio Valley and the Southwest is firmly established.

Sources

Gaston, Edwin W. Jr. Conrad Richter. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
LaHood, Marvin J. Conrad Richter's America. The Hague Netherlands: Mouton, 1975.
Johnson, David R. Conrad Richter: A Writer's Life. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 2001.

—Marvin J. LaHood

Riding, Laura (1901–1991) poet, critic

Born into a working-class immigrant family in New York City, Laura Reichenthal published her work mainly as Laura Riding, a name she chose in the mid 1920s, and became one of the most original, difficult, and controversial poets to write in English between the World Wars. Reichenthal attended Cornell College, where she married history professor Louis Gottschalk in 1920. In 1923 the couple moved to Louisville, Kentucky, and her poems began to appear in such important LITTLE MAGAZINES as The Fugitive and POETRY. Her work was so well received by THE FUGITIVES that she became the only woman member of the group. After her divorce from Gottschalk in 1925, Riding moved to Greenwich Village and the following year, at the invitation of the poet Robert Graves, moved to England. She lived with Graves and his wife Nancy Nicholson first in England and then in Egypt, precipitating their divorce. Riding's early publications include the first collection of her poems The Closed Chaplet (1926); Voltaire: A Biographical Fantasy (1927); A Survey of Modernist Poetry (1928), which she wrote with Graves; and A Pamphlet against Anthologies (1928). Shortly after the publication of her volume Collected Poems (1938), Riding renounced poetry and began to work, with her soon-to-be husband Schuyler Jackson, on the unfinished philosophical work Rational Meaning: A New Foundation for the Definition of Words (1997). Riding has been written about extensively, in part because of her relationship with Graves.

Source

Friedmann, Elizabeth. A Mannered Grace: The Life of Laura (Riding) Jackson. New York: Persea Books, 2005.

—James Hoff

Riggs, Lynn (1899–1954) playwright

Born in northeast Indian Territory (which became the state of Oklahoma in 1907) to a mother who was part Cherokee, Lynn Riggs was a regionalist (see REGIONALISM) who wrote about the people of the Plains in such plays as Roadside (produced 1930), Russet Mantle (produced 1936), All the Way Home (produced 1948) and Out of Dust (produced 1949). His best-known work is Green Grow the Lilacs (produced 1931), set in 1900 in Indian territory, which became the source of the Broadway musical OKLAHOMA! (produced 1943). The Cherokee Night (produced 1932) is an important work that treats the difficulty Cherokees experience in attempting to adapt to the white world, showing the failure of the policy of assimilation and the need for Cherokee pride.

Source

Braunlich, Phyllis Cole. Haunted by Home: The Life and Letters of Lynn Riggs. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1988.

Rinehart, Mary Roberts (1876–1958) novelist, playwright

Mary Roberts Rinehart, who began writing when her husband was bankrupted in the stock market crash of 1903, became one of the most popular and highest paid writers in the first half of the twentieth century. Known for blending mystery and romance fiction, she had major successes with her first novels, The Circular Staircase (1908) and The Man in Lower Ten (1909), both of which were serialized in magazines before being published in book form. As her career developed, Rinehart became associated with THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, the leading popular magazine. In both her plays and novels she developed the popular amateur detective “Tish,” an idiosyncratic spinster. The first in the series, Tish, appeared in 1916 and was followed by such works as More Tish (1921), Tish Plays the Game (1926), and Tish Marches On (1937). In her long career Roberts wrote more than sixty books.

Sources

Cohn, Jan. Improbable Fiction: The Life of Mary Roberts Rinehart. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1980.

MacLeod, Charlotte. Had She But Known: A Biography of Mary Roberts Rinehart. New York: Mysterious Press, 1994.

Rinehart, Mary Roberts. My Story. New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1931. Enlarged as My Story: A New Edition and Seventeen New Years. New York: Rinehart, 1948.

“The Road Not Taken” by Robert Frost (1915) poem

Robert FROST chose this poem, which was first published in the Atlantic Monthly, to open his third collection of poetry, Mountain Interval (1916). Originally intended as a satiric jest toward Frost’s indecisive friend Edward Thomas, the poem illustrates the choices one must make in life. The speaker has come to two diverging roads in “a yellow wood.” Since both roads are equally fair, he chooses the second one because “it was grassy and wanted wear.” The fourth and final stanza has the speaker telling “with a sigh” that his decision has made all the difference in his life. Whether the sigh is satisfaction or regret is the key to the poem’s contradictory meanings—a quality often evident in Frost’s seemingly simple lyrics. Various interpretations of the metaphor of two different roads exist, from hope, on future reflection, that the speaker will be pleased with his choice, to a darker realization that certain choices—roads not taken—lead to anxiety and unhappiness.

Source

Frost, Robert. Mountain Interval. New York: Holt, 1916.

—Gary L. Kerley

Roan Stallion by Robinson Jeffers (1925) poem

Robinson JEFFERS compared his powerful narrative poem Roan Stallion, first published in Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems (1925), to the Greek myth of Leda who is ravished by Zeus in the form of a swan. The protagonist of the poem, a part-Indian woman named California, is drawn to the beautiful roan stallion her dissolute, brutal husband has won in a card game. In the magnificent horse she recognizes the divine: “Oh if I could bear you! / If I had the strength. O great God that came down to Mary, gently you / came. But I will ride him / Up into the hill, if he throws me, if he tramples me, is it not my desire / To endure death?” After she rides the stallion away from her farm and into the wild, calvary and crucifixion are among the “figures / And symbols” thrown up by the fire, “racial myths formed and dissolved . . . the / phantom rulers of humanity.” The union of human and divine leads to violence when the woman and horse return to civilization. After the stallion tramples her husband, California, “moved by some obscure / human fidelity,” shoots the horse and “turned then on her little / daughter the mask of a woman / Who has killed God.”

Source

Brophy, Robert J., ed. Robinson Jeffers: Dimensions of a Poet. New York: Fordham University Press, 1995.

—Audra Himes

Roberts, Elizabeth Madox (1881–1941)

novelist, poet

A Kentucky native who lived most of her life in the small town of Springfield, Elizabeth Madox Roberts entered the University of Chicago as a thirty-six-year-old freshman and graduated in 1921. She began her literary career as a poet and published two significant collections: Under the Trees (1922), in which many of the poems, conventional in meter and rhyme, are written from a child's point of view, and Song in the Meadow (1940), a volume more varied in form and subject in which she treats contemporary social issues and legends. But Roberts is best remembered as a fiction writer. Her first novel, The Time of Man (1926), about the struggles of Kentucky tenant farmer Ellen Chesser, was a popular and critical success. Writing in the regionalist tradition (see REGIONALISM), Roberts continued to evoke authentic speech and manners in such novels as My Heart and My Flesh (1927), The Great Meadow (1930), and He Sent Forth a Raven (1935). Roberts also published two volumes of short stories: The Haunted Mirror (1932) and Not by Strange Gods (1941).

Sources

McDowell, Frederick P. W. Elizabeth Madox Roberts. New York: Twayne, 1963.

Rovit, Earl H. Herald to Chaos: The Novels of Elizabeth Madox Roberts. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1960.

Roberts, Kenneth (1885–1957) novelist

After graduating from Cornell University in 1908, Kenneth Roberts worked for the Boston Post and in 1919 was engaged by his friend George Horace LORIMER to become a roving correspondent for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. Seven of his early books were collections of articles written for the magazine. Roberts turned to historical fiction with Arundel (1930), a first-person account of Benedict Arnold's march on Quebec as told by the son of an Arundel (now Kennebunk, Maine) innkeeper and hunter. Roberts, who usually employed a first-person narrator, prided himself on basing his work on original research into contemporary accounts. He returned to the story of Arnold's military exploits in Rabble In Arms (1933). Roberts's other work includes The Lively Lady (1931) and Captain Caution (1934), both set during the War of 1812; Northwest Passage (1937), the story of Robert Rogers's efforts to find a Northwest Passage to China; Oliver Wiswell (1940), a compassionate account of a Loyalist during the American Revolution; and Lydia Bailey (1947), the story of a young Maine lawyer who becomes involved in the Haitian Revolution. In 1957 Roberts was awarded a special PULITZER PRIZE for having "long contributed to the creation of greater interest in our early American history."

Sources

Bales, Jack. Kenneth Roberts. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Harris, Janet. A Century of American History in Fiction: Kenneth Roberts' Novels. New York: Gordon Press, 1976.

Robin, Leo (1895–1984) lyricist

Born into a working-class family in Pittsburgh, Leo Robin studied drama at the Carnegie Institute of Technology while working nights at the steel mills as well as reporting for the Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph. After graduation he became the director of the Jewish Big Brothers Club that helped troubled boys, and Robin had the boys put on plays for local residents in his impoverished neighborhood.

Together with colyricist Clifford Grey and composer Vincent Youmans, Robin found success in 1927 with his first Broadway musical, Hit the Deck, which produced the hit song "Hallelujah!" At Paramount studios, Robin was teamed with composer Richard Whiting, and they wrote songs for movie musicals, including "Louise" (1929), "Beyond the Blue Horizon" (with Whiting and W. Franke Harling, 1930), and "My Ideal" (with Whiting and Newell Chase, 1930).

In 1931 Robin established a long-standing collaboration with Ralph Rainger that was terminated by Rainger's death in an airplane crash in 1942. Robin and Rainger wrote such successful movie songs as "Love in Bloom" (1934), "June in January" (1934), and "Thanks for the Memory" (1938), a witty and poignant "catalogue" song in which a divorced couple list funny memories of their marriage until it becomes clear that they are still in love but are too "sophisticated" to admit their true feelings.

Robin was shattered by Rainger's death but went on to write songs with other composers such as Harold Arlen and Harry Warren. He had a hit Broadway musical, Gentlemen Prefer Blondes (1949), with Jule Styne, which produced the comic gem "Diamonds Are a Girl's Best Friend."

—Philip Furia

Robinson, Edwin Arlington (1869–1935) poet

Edwin Arlington Robinson made literary history when in 1896 he borrowed $52 to print 312 copies of a small book of poetry, The Torrent and the Night Before. With it he began a new tradition in American poetry, and because he was the only major poet to begin his career in the 1890's, he is considered a transition figure between the Romanticism of the nineteenth century and the realism of the twentieth. The date is also important because it marks the beginning of an extraordinarily lengthy and prolific career: forty years of publishing, twenty volumes of poetry, and a Collected Poems (1937), which runs nearly 1,500 pages. In his writing life he rose from obscurity and isolation to almost unbounded critical enthusiasm.

Robert FROST, Robinson's contemporary and nearest rival, once wrote that Robinson, like himself, was "content with the old way to be new." By that he meant that both used traditional verse forms of patterned rhyme or blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter), and both were masters of the sonnet. They also shared a dislike for free verse, the form that Walt Whitman inaugurated and the modernists (see MODERNISM) such as Ezra POUND, T. S. ELIOT, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Wallace STEVENS embraced. Frost wrote that writing in free verse was "like playing tennis without the net," and Robinson once remarked that free verse was part of a "triumvirate from hell," along with movies and PROHIBITION.

What was new in Robinson's poetry was a change in content, word choice, and attitude. Rather than the celebration of nature and the moralistic fervor prominent in the works of such nineteenth-century poets as Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Robinson is known for his psychological portraits of fictional and historical characters who are isolated in some way. Frequently compared to Robert Browning, he has been called realistic, Romantic, naturalistic, and existential. His attitudes range from satire to understatement, from pessimism to compassion.

He is best known for his short poems about individuals who live in Tilbury Town, the name he used for Gardiner, Maine. Most are ordinary folk whose outward appearance belies their inner turmoil. Three of Robinson's most anthologized poems—"MINIVER CHEEVY," "Mr. Flood's Party," and "RICHARD CORY"—are Tilbury ones of this sort. But Robinson has also incorporated comically eccentric characters such as Captain Craig, the titular subject of his third volume (1902) and Fernando Nash, the name of The Man Who Died Twice (1924), who hallucinates a rat symphony in his garret apartment.

Born in Head Tide, Maine, Robinson was the third son of Edward and Mary Palmer Robinson. He was not named until he was six months old and was then given a name he did not like, saying that it sounded like a can being kicked down the stairs. He was called Win by his family, who moved permanently in 1870 to the larger town of Gardiner. In 1888 he graduated from high school and proposed to a woman four years older, Emma Shepherd. However, when he brought her home to meet the family, his brother, Herman, met and married her instead. Robinson never married. Many of his later poems deal with two men in love with the same woman, and some scholars suggest that he paid so much attention to triangular situations because of his own experience.

In a 1930 autobiographical essay, "The First Seven Years," Robinson reports that "it must have been about the year 1889 when I realized finally . . . that I was doomed, or elected, or sentenced for life, to the writing of poetry." Unlike the other poets of his generation, who made a living through a variety of occupations—medicine, business, editing, lecturing—Robinson remained impressively focused on his goal, living by menial jobs and handouts for the first twenty years of his career.

For two years, 1891–1893, he was a special student at Harvard, where he enjoyed his associations with the campus literati and published a few poems in the Harvard Advocate. After his father's death and the family's subsequent bankruptcy, Robinson returned to Gardiner to help his mother with the farm and to work seriously on his poetry. His mother died of diphtheria a few weeks before he received the copies of his first book. "For a Dead Lady" may have been a eulogy to his mother.

In 1897 he moved to New York City, published his second book, The Children of the Night, with a vanity press, and eked out a living through a series of odd jobs, including working as a timekeeper during the construction of the subway. When he read Robinson's book in 1904, President Theodore Roosevelt encouraged Scribners to republish it, and he appointed Robinson to a civil service job that required little work but guaranteed him a living wage. When Scribners published The Children of the Night in 1905, Roosevelt wrote a positive review in The Outlook in which he singled out the poem "LUKE HAVERGAL." Robinson resigned his government post in 1909 and dedicated his 1910 volume, The Town Down the River, to Roosevelt.

From 1911 until his death in 1935, Robinson established a pattern of spending the winters in New York and the summers at the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, New Hampshire, an artists' retreat where he wrote the bulk of his work. With the publication of The Man Against the Sky in 1916, Robinson's reputation was secure. Many of the fifteen subsequent volumes are book-length narratives that are rarely read today. But it is in this period that he won three PULITZER PRIZES: in 1922 with Collected Poems (1921), 1925 with The Man Who Died Twice, and 1928 with Tristram (1927). His achievement well justifies a remark he once made: "I shall have more to say when I am dead."

Sources

Donaldson, Scott. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Poet's Life. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.

Joyner, Nancy Carol. Edwin Arlington Robinson: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1978.

—Nancy Carol Joyner

Rodman, Selden (1909–2002) editor, poet, playwright, critic

A graduate of Yale, Selden Rodman was a cofounding editor of Harness Hoot (1930–1931), an avant-garde literary journal, and editor of Common Sense (1932–1943), a liberal review of contemporary affairs. His poetry includes two long narrative poems—Lawrence: The Last Crusade (1937), the story of the English soldier and writer T. E. Lawrence, and The Airmen (1941), in praise of the human yearning to fly—but he is better known for editing the innovative collection A New Anthology of Modern Poetry (1938; revised edition, 1946), which included light verse and folk songs.

Rodman's long association with Haiti began with a visit to the island nation in 1938 and is evident in his play The Revolutionists (produced 1941), set in revolutionary Haiti of 1791–1804, as well as in his books on its culture, including Renaissance in Haiti: Popular Painters in the Black Republic (1948), Haiti: The Black Republic (1954), and Where Art Is Joy: Forty Years of Haitian Popular Art (1988). The prolific Rodman's other works included Portrait of the Artist as an American: Ben Shahn (1951) and The Insiders: Rejection and Rediscovery of Man in the Arts of Our Time (1960).

Rogers, Will (1879–1935) humorist

Everything is funny as long as it is happening to somebody else.

—The Illiterate Digest (1924)

A self-proclaimed Oklahoma cowboy and one-quarter Cherokee, Will Rogers ran away from military school to travel and work, sailing first to South America and then to South Africa, where he got his start in show business as a trick rider for Texas Jack's Wild West Show. Rogers later toured with a circus in New Zealand and Australia. He eventually made his way to New York and vaudeville, where his act of performing lariat tricks evolved to include a humorous monologue. With the Ziegfeld Follies (1916–1927) he became a star and began using newspaper stories as the basis for his humor. In 1918 he starred in Laughing Bill Hyde, beginning a screen-acting career that included roles in more than fifty movies. The following year he published his first books, The Cowboy Philosopher on the Peace Conference and The Cowboy Philosopher on Prohibition. In 1922 he began writing a syndicated newspaper column, which he collected in The Illiterate Digest (1924). Articles he wrote for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST from Europe were published as Letters of a Self-Made Diplomat to His President (1926) and There's Not a Bathing Suit in Russia (1927). Ether and Me (1929), which was occasioned by Rogers's gallstone operation, shows a more personal side to the humorist. The last book he published in his lifetime was Twelve Radio Talks Delivered by Will Rogers During the Spring of 1930 (1930). He was at the height of his fame and national influence when he died in a plane crash in Alaska. Known for his aphorisms, Rogers was ironic rather than satiric. In the cowboy tradition of the folksy philosopher, he was able to poke fun at the pretensions of public figures and at anyone who took himself too seriously.

Sources

Robinson, Ray. An American Original: A Life of Will Rogers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Yagoda, Ben. Will Rogers: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1993.

Rölvaag, O. E. (1876–1931) novelist

Ole Edvart Rölvaag came to the United States from Norway in 1896 and settled in Minnesota. He graduated from St. Olaf College, where he became a professor of Norwegian in 1906. All of his writing was in his native language. In 1912 he published his first book, the semiautobiographical Amerika-Breve (Letters from America; translated as The Third Life of Per Smevik, 1971) about the adjustment to a new country. His subsequent work includes an admired trilogy, translated and published in the United States as Giants in the Earth (1927), Peder Victorious (1929), and Their Father's God (1929). Rölvaag's work has been praised for its REALISM and its psychological portrayals of Norwegian immigrants on the Northwest frontier.

Sources

Haugen, Einar. Ole Edvart Rölvaag. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Simonson, Harold P. Prairies Within: The Tragic Trilogy of Ole Rölvaag. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1987.

"A Rose for Emily" by William Faulkner (1930) short story

First published in Forum and collected in These 13 (1931), "A Rose for Emily" was William FAULKNER's first short story to be published in a national magazine. Often regarded as the quintessential example of Southern Gothic, the story focuses on an aging Southern spinster, Emily Grierson, whose death sets into motion an achronological recounting of key moments in her life. Narrated by a garrulous storyteller who represents the town of Jefferson in Faulkner's YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, the story presents memories of Emily's adolescence, during which she was sheltered by an overprotective father, and of her being courted following her father's death by a Yankee road-paving contractor named Homer Barron. When Homer disappears, the town assumes he jilted her. Soon thereafter, townspeople began noticing a strong smell surrounding Emily's house. The final scene in the story reveals the cause: Emily had poisoned Homer and placed his corpse in her "bridal" bed, presumably to keep him from deserting her. The last sentence, revealing the presence of "a long strand of iron-gray hair" on the pillow next to his skeleton, suggests a relationship that lasted well into her old age. One major theme in the story concerns the passage of time, with Emily as an unchanging bastion of the "Old South" while the "New South" develops around her.

Sources

Jones, Diane Brown. A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of William Faulkner. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994.

Skei, Hans H. Reading Faulkner's Best Short Stories. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Volpe, Edmund L. A Reader's Guide to William Faulkner: The Short Stories. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2004.

—John B. Padgett

Ross, Harold (1892–1951) magazine founder and editor

Harold Ross dropped out of high school at thirteen to become a newspaperman. He worked on at least seven papers and edited Stars and Stripes in Paris during WORLD WAR I. Moving to New York, Ross founded a magazine intended for a metropolitan, sophisticated audience—not for “the old lady in Dubuque.” The first issue of The New Yorker appeared on February 21, 1925. Ross attracted such talented writers as E. B. WHITE, Dorothy PARKER, James THURBER, John HERSEY, John O’HARA, and Robert Benchley and such brilliant cartoonists as Thurber, Rea Irvin, Peter Arno, Helen Hokinson, Charles Addams, William Steig, and Saul Steinberg. Ross was a meticulous editor whose bible was Fowler’s Modern English Usage.

Source

Kunkel, Thomas. Genius in Disguise: Harold Ross of The New Yorker. New York: Random House, 1995.

—Judith S. Baughman

Rosten, Leo (1908–1997) humorist

Born in Poland, Leo Calvin Rosten was brought to the United States as a child. He was educated in Chicago schools and at the University of Chicago, where he earned a Ph.D. in 1937 and initially worked as a sociologist. He is much better known, however, as the author of popular fiction and nonfiction, including *The Education of H*Y*M*A*N*K*A*P*L*A*N* (1937), comic stories about immigrant night-school students. There were two sequels: *The Return of H*Y*M*A*N K*A*P*L*A*N* (1959) and *O K*A*P*L*A*N! MY K*A*P*L*A*N!* (1976). Rosten also published Captain Newman, M.D. (1961), a popular and highly praised novel about an army psychiatrist.

Roth, Henry (1906–1995) novelist

Henry Roth was born in the Galician region of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and at age one-and-a-half was brought to New York City. He grew up on the LOWER EAST SIDE and Harlem. Roth went to City College, where he began to demonstrate his literary talent by writing for a student magazine. Edna Lou Walton, a New York University professor, encouraged him to write and later became his lover. She helped him find a publisher for Call It Sleep (1934), his searing, semi-autobiographical account of growing up as an immigrant child in New York City.

A classic American novel, Call It Sleep is notable not only for its REALISM and understanding of proletarian life but also for its eloquence that has been compared to the work of James Joyce and other European and American modernists. Unlike many of his contemporaries, who were writing PROLETARIAN LITERATURE, Roth did not concentrate solely on the social and political conditions of the GREAT DEPRESSION. On the contrary, his novel is psychological, presenting the STREAM OF CONSCIOUSNESS of his protagonist, David Schearl. Roth also explores in great depth and intensity the tensions between husband and wife and between father and son as well as the bond between mother and son.

Call It Sleep was recognized as an important achievement when it first appeared, but Roth’s publisher went out of business, and his inability to write another novel for nearly sixty years plunged him and his work into obscurity. Roth’s book began to take its place in the American canon only in the 1960s, when it was rediscovered by critics. Roth was able to successfully return to writing fiction, completing a four-volume autobiographical novel collectively titled Mercy of a Rude Stream: A Star Shines over Mt. Morris Park (1994), A Diving Rock on the Hudson (1995), From Bondage (1996), and Requiem for Harlem (1998). These books take Roth’s protagonist, Ira Stigman, through his college years and to the brink of his major work.

Sources

Lyons, Bonnie. Henry Roth: The Man and His Work. New York: Cooper Square, 1977.

Wirth-Nesher, Hana, ed. New Essays on Call It Sleep. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Rourke, Constance (1885–1941) historian

After graduating from Vassar College, Constance Rourke began writing her influential studies of American life, beginning with Trumpets of Jubilee (1927), which combines history, biography, and literary criticism in a study of nineteenth-century religion and entertainment. Troupers of the Gold Coast (1928) was a vivid study of actresses of the California frontier. Rourke’s best-known book is American Humor: A Study of the National Character (1931).

Sources

Bellman, Samuel I. Constance Rourke. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Rubin, Joan Shelley. Constance Rourke and American Culture. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.

Rukeyser, Muriel (1913–1980) poet

Muriel Rukeyser was educated at Vassar College and Columbia University. At an early age she wanted to be a writer. She also had a keen interest in politics and became a poet-activist, associating herself with Communist Party causes.

Her first book of poetry, Theory of Flight (1935), won the Yale Series of Younger Poets Prize. With her belief that the poet should be a prophet and engaged in the affairs of the world, Rukeyser has been compared to Walt Whitman, who also rejected the vision of the poet as a loner alienated from family and community.

From 1935 to 1976 Rukeyser produced a steady stream of books, including translations and a novel, The Orgy (1966), but her main interest was poetry. American history and political issues often figure importantly in her work, as in The Soul and Body of John Brown (1940). Her One Life (1957) is an unusual mixture of poetry and prose that delves into the career of Wendell Willkie, who ran for the presidency in 1940 and was defeated by Franklin Roosevelt. The Collected Poems of Muriel Rukeyser was published in 1979.

Source

Kertesz, Louise. The Poetic Vision of Muriel Rukeyser. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.

Runyon, Damon (1884–1946) short-story writer, columnist

Alfred Damon Runyon was born in Manhattan, Kansas, and did not arrive in New York, where he made his national reputation, until he was thirty years old. Runyon began his career as a journalist in Colorado, placing his first stories in the Pueblo Evening News when he was thirteen and becoming a full-fledged reporter at fifteen. After serving in the Philippines during the SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, Runyon continued to work for newspapers, mainly in Denver, and began publishing verse and stories in national magazines. He brought a Western sensibility to the East when he got a job as a sportswriter at The New York American in 1911. There he began to develop his racy writing style and glib characterizations of Broadway and New York City types that he collected in Guys and Dolls (1932), which was made into a long-running musical after Runyon's death. The Best of Runyon was published in 1938.

Source

D'Itri, Patricia Ward. Damon Runyon. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Rabbit Angstrom: A Tetralogy by John Updike

(New York: Knopf/Everyman, 1995) novel

Rabbit Angstrom is the title John UPDIKE bestowed upon the single-volume edition of his four novels about Harry “Rabbit” Angstrom, a former high-school basketball star and Toyota salesman who, from 1959 to his death in 1999, served as Updike’s “ticket to the America all around.” Angstrom is a complex character, at once hard-hearted and tender, self-centered and graceful. His name reflects this duality: like a rabbit, he is a reckless sexual adventurer; at the same time, he suffers acutely from existential anxiety, such that his last name can be read to mean “a stream of angst.” Secondary characters alternately refer to him as a “monster” and a “mystic.” High-school educated and overweight, Rabbit possesses a poetic sensibility, regarding the world around him with a lyrical sense of wonder even as he tramples upon loved ones in his quest for personal fulfillment. To the very end, he affirms his status as a “God made one-of-a-kind with an immortal soul breathed in. A vehicle of grace. A battlefield of good and evil. An apprentice angel.”

The complete tetralogy includes the books Rabbit, Run (1960), Rabbit Redux (1971), Rabbit Is Rich (1981), and Rabbit at Rest (1990). Each novel is written in the present tense and set in the final year of the decade preceding the book’s publication. Read together, the four novels comprise a structurally dense meganovel that takes place in real time, with actual events—such as the 1969 moon landing and the 1979 energy crisis—employed as motifs that metaphorically resonate with Rabbit’s private experience. A novella-length sequel to the tetralogy, “Rabbit Remembered,” appeared in 2000 and can be found in the story collection Licks of Love (2000).

Sources

Boswell, Marshall. John Updike’s Rabbit Tetralogy: Mastered Irony in Motion. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2001.

Broer, Lawrence R., ed. Rabbit Tales: Poetry and Politics in John Updike’s Rabbit Novels. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1998.

—Marshall Boswell

Rabe, David (1940– ) playwright

David Rabe was born in Dubuque, Iowa, and educated there in Catholic schools. After graduating from Loras College, he attended the graduate theater program at Villanova University. He completed his M.A. degree in 1968. His studies were interrupted by two years in the army, which included eleven months in Vietnam.

Rabe’s writing for the theater has been greatly affected by his period of service in a hospital unit in Vietnam. He was struck by the way very young, inexperienced men had to deal with an overwhelming situation. His own troubled re-entry into civilian society intensified his understanding of the impact of the VIETNAM WAR on U.S. soldiers.

Bones (produced 1969; revised as Sticks and Bones, produced 1971) and The Basic Training of Pavlo Hummel (produced 1971) were written while Rabe was in graduate school. Both concerned disillusioned veterans confronting their own mortality and the absurdity of war. The second play was produced first and won Rabe an Obie Award and a Drama Desk Award. Sticks and Bones enhanced Rabe’s reputation when it won a Tony Award and an Outer Critics Circle Award in 1972. Rabe later revised his The Bones of Birds (produced 1968) as The Orphan (produced 1973), a play intended to draw parallels between the Trojan War and the Vietnam War. Rabe's In the Boom Boom Room (produced 1974) was a departure in subject matter. It probed the lives of deteriorating nightclub performers. Streamers followed (produced 1976), a success that won Rabe the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for the best play of 1976 and earned praise for Rabe's ability to use an army barracks as a microcosm of the divided America of the 1960s. Hurly Burly (produced 1984), about a society deteriorating in the wake of the Vietnam War, was his next successful play. A Question of Mercy: Based upon the Journal by Richard Selzer (1997) deals with a physician's dilemma in the case of an AIDS patient who wants to commit suicide.

Although Rabe's plays have been interpreted as antiwar dramas, he has resisted that label and has argued that he is exploring an event and presenting public reactions to it—not his interpretation of it. Rabe has written screenplays, including I'm Dancing as Fast as I Can (1982), Streamers (1983), Casualties of War (1989), and The Firm (1993), and he has published two novels, Recital of the Dog (1993) and The Crossing Guard (1995), adapted from the screenplay by Sean Penn.

Sources

Kolin, Philip C. David Rabe: A Stage History and a Primary and Secondary Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1988.

Zinman, Toby Silverman, ed. David Rabe: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1991.

A Rage to Live by John O'Hara (New York: Random House, 1949) novel

A Rage to Live, John O'Hara's fourth novel, is a portrait of the marriage of Sidney and Grace Caldwell Tate, members of the Fort Penn (based on Harrisburg, Pennsylvania) aristocracy. The focus of the novel is on Grace. Married to a devoted and faithful husband, she nonetheless engages in an affair; but not out of love. The title refers to her sexual drive. When Sidney learns about her adultery he decides to leave Grace but dies suddenly of infantile paralysis. She subsequently becomes involved in another affair and leaves Fort Penn. A Rage to Live is a major novel of American social history set before and after World War I, distinguished by O'Hara's accuracy of meaningful detail.

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. The O'Hara Concern. New York: Random House, 1975.

—Morris Colden

Ragtime by E. L. Doctorow (New York: Random House, 1975) novel

E. L. DOCTOROW's third novel, and his most popularly successful, is set in the first two decades of the twentieth century, a period characterized in the book by ragtime music, and follows the interwoven fates of three families whose lives intersect with the most famous figures of the era, including Harry Houdini, Henry Ford, Sigmund Freud, Emma Goldman, and President William Howard Taft.

The novel opens in New Rochelle, New York, in 1902, at the house of a prominent white family whose members are referred to only as Father, Mother, little boy, and Mother's Younger Brother. Ragtime moves from fictional narrative to imaginative reconstructions of historical events, including Harry Houdini's first attempt to pilot an aircraft and Henry Ford's development of the automobile assembly line. The book was adapted into a successful motion picture and, later, a Broadway play.

—Marshall Boswell

A Raisin in the Sun by Lorraine Hansberry (produced 1959) play

LORRAINE HANSBERRY's drama about the African American experience appeared on Broadway in 1959 and won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award. An instant success, the play concentrates on several generations of the Younger family, who live in a small apartment on Chicago's South Side. They are torn over a dispute concerning the deceased Walter Senior's insurance benefit. Mother and son are at odds about how the money should be used, provoking a generational conflict about human values and society's materialistic ethos.

Part of Hansberry's success was the inherent transformation of this African American drama into the story of the American dream—of the aspirations that all Americans have for a better life and the way each generation defines itself by protesting against its predecessor. Hansberry's title comes from Langston Hughes's poem "A Dream Deferred," in which the poet asks, "What happens to a dream deferred? / Does it dry up like a raisin in the sun?" Hansberry's play, which has been translated into more than thirty languages, dramatizes the tensions between different generations as they react to the disappointments brought about by such unfulfilled dreams.

Sources

Carter, Steven R. Hansberry's Drama: Commitment Amid Complexity. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Domina, Lynn, ed. Understanding A Raisin in the Sun: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Hansberry, Lorraine. A Raisin in the Sun. New York: Random House, 1959.

Ramke, Bin (1947– ) poet

Bin Ramke was born in Port Neches, Texas, in 1947. He received his Ph.D. from Ohio University in 1974. Although trained as a mathematician, he has spent his career teaching and writing poetry. His work is frequently driven by tonally dark images and obsessive explorations of the psyche. Ramke won the Yale Series of Younger Poets Award in 1978 for The Difference between Night and Day. His eight volumes of poetry include Airs, Waters, Places (2001) and Matter (2004)—a book that explores epistemological questions in innovative poems that abandon conventions of syntax and lineation. From 1985 to 2007, Ramke was editor of the Contemporary Poetry Series at the University of Georgia Press, which published four volumes of poetry a year. He teaches at the University of Denver, where he edits the Denver Review.

—Tod Marshall

The Recognitions by William Gaddis (New York:

Harcourt, Brace, 1955) novel

More than nine hundred pages in length, Gaddis's first novel is the colossal and complex story of a gifted artist who abandons his talent in order to paint forgeries of famous works by Flemish Old Masters.

Wyatt Gwyon, the novel's main character, first appears as an art student in Paris in the 1930s. When he learns that an imitation he once did of a painting by Flemish painter Hans Memling has just been sold on the market as an original, he abandons his artistic career, moves to Greenwich Village, and begins painting forgeries for a crooked art collector named Recktall Brown. The novel moves between Wyatt's and Otto's narratives, incorporating a huge cast of secondary characters and exploring along the way the history of art, the rise and fall of the cult of Mithra, and numerous other arcane subjects.

The Recognitions is best understood as an "encyclopedic narrative," as described by the critic Edward Mendelson, who argues that such novels provide an extensive account of at least one technology or science, feature an encyclopedia of literary styles, and propose a comprehensive theory of social organization. The Recognitions fulfills these requirements, using the history of art and art forgeries as a metaphor for what Gaddis regards as the hopelessly mediated and often counterfeit quality of twentieth-century urban life.

—Marshall Boswell

Source

Moore, Steven. A Reader's Guide to William Gaddis's The Recognitions. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.

Reed, Ishmael (1938– ) novelist, poet

Born in Chattanooga, Tennessee, Ishmael Reed, an African American, moved with his mother to Buffalo, New York, when he was four. After graduation from high school, he went to night school at the University of Buffalo and worked in the public library. His writing attracted the attention of an English professor, but an early marriage and family responsibilities plunged him into a two-year period in a public housing project, an experience that helped to fuel his intense feelings about race and American history. After five years of active involvement in the Black Power movement in New York City, Reed moved to Berkeley, California, in 1967 and began teaching at the University of California.

Reed's first novel, The Free-Lance Pallbearers (1967), displayed his penchant for outlandish titles and satirical thrusts. The novel parodies the traditional African American confessional memoir, which itself, in Reed's view, hews too closely to American and European models of autobiography. As one commentator put it, the novel turns the Horatio Alger myth inside out—as if it were written by Nathanael West.

In later novels, Reed became a master at poking fun at mainstream conventional fiction. Yellow Back Radio Broke-Down (1969) features the Loop Garoo Kid, a wacky protagonist in a novel that mocks the traditional Western. The novel's villain, Drag Gibson, is a wife-murdering degenerate cattle baron who is called on by the town of Yellow Back Radio to destroy its children's attempts to "create [their] own fictions." Drag Gibson represents the myth of America that stifles every new generation's efforts to define itself through its own myths or fictions. Reed's own fiction presents realism as a reactionary ideology. The realist describes the status quo, the so-called reality which, to Reed, is at war with the human capacity to imagine better worlds.

Mumbo Jumbo (1972) creates a mythology based on voodoo, Egyptian mythology, and jazz. The novel also provides a humorous critique of the Harlem Renaissance, which in Reed's view failed to sustain its own artistic vision. Reed is just as hard on African Americans as he is on the dominant white culture, a point repeatedly made in The Last Days of Louisiana Red (1974).

Flight to Canada (1976) is a re-creation of the Civil War South and a parody of historical novels that claim to portray the past authentically. Reed satirizes the Reagan administration in The Terrible Twos (1982); in Reckless Eyeballing (1986), he excoriates feminists (black and white) and manages to insult Jews as well. In The Terrible Threes (1989) and Japanese by Spring (1993), Reed takes on American capitalism and the academic establishment.

Reed's poetry also is regarded highly. He published Conjure: Selected Poems 1963–1970 in 1972; New and Selected Poems in 1988; and New and Collected Poems, 1964–2006 in 2006. His essays have been collected in Shrovetide in New Orleans (1978), God Made Alaska for the Indians (1982), Writin' Is Fightin' (1988), Airing Dirty Laundry (1993), and Another Day at the Front: Dispatches from the Race War (2003). Blues City: A Walk in Oakland (2003) is a narrative of the history, culture, and politics of Reed's home.

Sources

- Dick, Bruce Allen, ed. The Critical Response to Ishmael Reed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Martin, Reginald. Ishmael Reed and the New Black Aesthetic Criticisms. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- McGee, Patrick. Ishmael Reed and the Ends of Race. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.

Revell, Donald (1954– ) poet

Donald Revell was born in the Bronx, New York. He received a Ph.D. from The State University of New York, Buffalo, in 1980. Drawing from French surrealism, American mysticism, Poststructuralist theory, and various musical conventions, Revell's poetry exhibits both a revolutionary edge and a deep connection to American traditions that extend from Anne Hutchinson to Henry David Thoreau, Emily Dickinson to John Cage. His poetry includes From the Abandoned Cities (1982), New Dark Ages (1990), Arcady (2002), and Pennyweight Windows: New and Selected Poems (2005). He has translated two volumes of poetry by Guillaume Apollinaire from the French. Revell won the PEN West Award in Poetry in 1990, and the Project for Innovative Poetry Gertrude Stein Award in 1995. Revell teaches creative writing at the University of Utah at Salt Lake City.

—Tod Marshall

Revolutionary Road by Richard Yates (Boston: Little, Brown, 1961) novel

This bitter and unforgiving portrait of 1950s suburban life concerns a troubled married couple, Frank and April Wheeler, who feel trapped by their conventional lifestyle but fail to break out of their rut. The title is ironic, suggesting that the revolutionary road has come to an end.

When the Wheelers first meet, they are both aspiring artists living in New York. When a surprise pregnancy forces upon them a hasty marriage, they move to a Connecticut suburb, where April tries to revive her acting ambitions by starring in local community-theater productions and Frank begins commuting to a soul-destroying job in New York as an advertising copywriter. Amid the sterile homogeneity of their surroundings, Frank and April sustain their sense of superiority and feed their dissatisfaction with alcohol. After a failed performance at a local theater, April conceives of a plan to move to Europe. But when April gets pregnant again, the Wheelers must finally confront their own shortcomings and failure of nerve.

Yates tells the Wheelers' story with pitiless detachment. Tinged at times with satire, Revolutionary Road is a brutal and ruthlessly realistic portrait of lives mired in desperation and frustrated hope. Kurt Vonnegut called Revolutionary Road "The Great Gatsby of my time."

Source

- Castronovo, David. Richard Yates. New York: Twayne, 1996.
- Marshall Boswell

Rexroth, Kenneth (1905–1982) poet, critic, translator

Largely self-educated, Kenneth Rexroth settled in San Francisco in 1927 and began submitting his poems to little magazines. Three versions of his poem "Prolegomena to a Theodicy," inspired by Cubist painting, were published in An "Objectivists" Anthology, a special edition of Poetry magazine edited by Louis Zukofsky in 1932. The first of his many collections of poems, In What Hour (1940), included political poems, love lyrics, and elegies, many of which had first appeared in New Masses, The New Republic, and Partisan Review. His reputation as an important poet was made with his second collection, The Phoenix and the Tortoise (1944), which was brought out by James Laughlin's New Directions, thereafter his main publisher. Rexroth, who strongly identified with the land and culture of the West as a region, was an important figure in the San Francisco Renaissance and the BEAT movement. He was also known for his translations of poems from the French, Spanish, Greek, Chinese, and Japanese and for his criticism. His nonfiction work includes Birds in the Bush (1959), The Alternative Society: Essays from the Other World (1970), and American Poetry in the Twentieth Century (1971).

Sources

- Gibson, Morgan. Revolutionary Rexroth: Poet of East-West Wisdom. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1986.
- Hamalian, Linda. A Life of Kenneth Rexroth. New York: Norton, 1991.
- Rexroth, Kenneth. An Autobiographical Novel. Garden City, N.J.: Doubleday, 1966. Revised and enlarged, edited by Hamalian. New York: New Directions, 1991.
- Rexroth. Excerpts from a Life. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Conjunctions Press, 1981.

Reznikoff, Charles (1894–1976) poet, novelist

The son of Russian immigrants, Charles Reznikoff was educated as a lawyer at New York University. In 1918 he published Rhythms, the first of many collections of poems. Associated with the Objectivists, Reznikoff manifested both a Jewish and imagist sensibility in his poetry as well as in his prose. His important work includes the collections Inscriptions (1959), Testimony: The United States 1885–1915 (1965), and Holocaust (1975); the novels By the Waters of Manhattan (1930) and the posthumously published The Manner "Music" (1977); and Family Chronicle (1969), a memoir of ghetto life in the Lower East Side.

Sources

- Fredman, Stephen. A Menorah for Athena: Charles Reznikoff and the Jewish Dilemmas of Objectivist Poetry. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.
- Hindus, Milton. Charles Reznikoff: A Critical Essay. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Black Sparrow Press, 1977.

Rice, Anne (1941– ) novelist

Anne Rice was born Howard Allen Frances O'Brien in New Orleans, Louisiana, the setting for many of her vampire novels. She took the name of Anne, finding her masculine first name unbearable. While in high school, Anne moved with her family to Richardson, Texas, where she met her husband, Stan Rice, a poet. They were married in 1961 and settled in San Francisco, moving in 1988 to New Orleans, where Rice continues to live.

Early on, Rice aspired to be a great writer. She tried different forms of literature but did not find success until Interview with the Vampire (1976), a novel that turned the horror story into the autobiography and contest between Lestat, the vampire, and Louis, the vampire Lestat has created. Much of the story is told from Louis's point of view, detailing his struggle against the clutches of Lestat. The other side of the story is told in The Vampire Lestat (1985). In her twelve-volume vampire chronicles—Rice built a mythic structure that encompasses the struggle to be human and the struggle to be immortal. The corruption of the flesh, which vampires transcend, also leads, unfortunately, to the corrupt behavior of supernatural beings, because there are no physical or moral limits to the fulfillment of their desires. Her vampire tales clearly come out of a sensibility steeped in romantic literature that emphasizes the questing self—at once a noble figure and, taken to extremes, a self-destructive one. Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt (2005) is a novel that reflects Rice's renewed belief in Catholicism.

Rice has written erotic novels under the name of A. N. Roquelaure, including The Claiming of Sleeping Beauty (1983), Beauty's Punishment (1984), and Beauty's Release: The Continued Erotic Adventures of Sleeping Beauty (1985), and romance novels under the pseudonym Anne Rampling—Exit to Eden (1985) and Belinda (1986). She has also written the Mayfair Witches trilogy, beginning with The Witching Hour (1985) and continued with Lasher (1993) and Taltos (1994). These novels are noteworthy for their historical authenticity and Rice's deft employment of Gothic conventions.

Sources

- Hoppenstand, Gary, and Ray B. Browne, eds. The Gothic World of Anne Rice. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Press, 1996.
- Ramslund, Katherine, ed. The Anne Rice Reader. New York: Ballantine, 1997.

- Smith, Jennifer. Anne Rice: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Rich, Adrienne (1929– ) poet

In a time of frontal assaults both on language and on human solidarity, poetry can remind us of all we are in danger of losing. . . .

—Interview (1998)

Adrienne Rich was born in Baltimore, Maryland. Her father, a physician, encouraged her affinity for poetry, guiding her to an understanding of metrical forms. Her mother, a pianist, introduced Rich to the nature of lyrics and the use of rhythm. Adrienne Rich had published two volumes of plays by the age of twelve: Ariadne: A Play in Three Acts and Poems (1939) and Not I, But Death, A Play in One Act (1941). Rich graduated from Radcliffe College in 1951, and that year W. H. Auden chose her book of poetry, A Change of World (1951), for the Yale Series of Younger Poets. This early work reflected the influence of Wallace Stevens, Robert Frost, and other Modernist poets.

In the 1950s Rich married Alfred H. Conrad and had three sons while continuing to publish poetry. The Diamond Cutters and Other Poems (1955) won the Ridgely Torrence Memorial Award of the Poetry Society of America. This volume described many powerful women figures and elaborated an image of the poet as a careful craftsman. In the 1960s Rich taught at several colleges and universities, including Swarthmore and Columbia, while producing poetry that reflected an emerging feminist consciousness. The Will to Change (1971) demonstrated her desire to merge the personal and the political, to change her own life as she began to focus on the oppression of women and question her own choices to marry and have a family.

Rich's poetry collection Diving into the Wreck (1973) won the National Book Award. One of her boldest works, it directly explores the patriarchal nature of society. After deciding to write, for a time, only for other women, she published The Dream of a Common Language (1978). The shift in her poetic consciousness mirrors a change in her personal life, which reflected her lesbian identity and involvement in lesbian, feminist, antiwar, and civil rights causes. Rich has continued to write poetry, including The School among the Ruins: Poems 2000–2004 (2004). Her nonfiction has had an important impact on the women's movement and on the rise of feminist criticism.

Sources

- Cooper, Jane Roberta, ed. Reading Adrienne Rich: Reviews and Re-visions, 1951–81. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1984.
- Gelpi, Barbara Charlesworth, and Albert Gelpi, eds. Adrienne Rich's Poetry and Prose: Poems, Prose, Reviews, and Criticism. New York: Norton, 1993.

Robbins, Tom (1936– ) novelist

A sense of humor, properly developed, is superior to any religion so far devised.

—Jitterbug Perfume (1984)

Tom Robbins was born in Blowing Rock, North Carolina. When he was eleven, Robbins's family moved to Richmond, Virginia, where he attended public schools until he was sent to Hargrave Military Academy. He briefly studied journalism at Washington and Lee University, leaving to become a poet in Greenwich Village in New York City. He enlisted in the U.S. Air Force in 1957 and spent a year stationed in South Korea, where he developed a fascination with Asian culture that influenced his novels and his 1962 decision to attend the School of Far Eastern Studies at the University of Washington. After completing his stint in the air force, Robbins studied art at Richmond Professional Institute, worked at the Seattle Times, hosted a Seattle radio show, organized performance-art events, and worked for the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. In 1969 he began writing fiction full-time.

Robbins has published eight novels and one book of essays, Wild Ducks Flying Backward (2005). His novels are known for their quirky plots and subject matter, which range from the improbable to the magical. His first book, Another Roadside Attraction (1971), about a roadside zoo that supposedly houses the mummified corpse of Jesus Christ, was a flop in hardcover but quickly found its audience in paperback. Some of his other novels include Even Cowgirls Get the Blues (1976), about a beautiful hitchhiker with enormous thumbs, and Jitterbug Perfume (1984), which opens with an ode to the beet. Robbins's books often include psychedelic themes and psychic characters, and hinge on the breaking of both social and literary boundaries.

Part of Robbins's appeal to young readers is his embodiment of the 1960s counterculture, and he has been labeled a beatnik novelist and a psychedelic artist. His books are consistently both political and comedic, and, less typically, Postmodern.

Source

Hoyser, Catherine E., and Lorena Laura Stookey. Tom Robbins: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

—Anna Teekell

Roethke, Theodore (1908–1963) poet

*The whiskey on your breath
Could make a small boy dizzy;
But I hung on like death:
Such waltzing was not easy. . . .*

—"My Papa's Waltz" (1948)

Theodore Roethke was born in Saginaw, Michigan. His nature poetry stems from his early experiences in his father's greenhouse. Roethke graduated magna cum laude from the University of Michigan in 1929. He attended graduate school at Harvard but left for financial reasons. Several years later he completed his M.A. at the University of Michigan. Roethke taught—and coached tennis—at Lafayette College, Pennsylvania State University, and Bennington College, developing along the way a reputation as a hard-drinking tough guy, an eccentric whose demeanor belied his poetic sensibility and his lifelong manic depression. Roethke began publishing his work in magazines in the 1930s but he did not full achieve recognition until his Pulitzer Prize-winning The Waking: Poems 1933–1953 was published in 1954. By that time he had settled in Seattle, where he taught at the University of Washington and mentored what has been called a Western school of poets, including James WRIGHT, David WAGONER, Carolyn KIZER, Richard HUGO, and Tess Gallagher, all of whom were his students. His nine volumes of poetry earned him a place among the most respected of the CONFESSIONAL poets of the period after WORLD WAR II. Roethke's work was characterized by a playful humor, intense introspection, and the quest for spiritual self-realization. The Far Field (1964) received a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD shortly after Roethke died. In 1968 James Dickey called Roethke "the greatest poet this country has yet produced."

Sources

Kalaidjian, Walter B. Understanding Theodore Roethke. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1987.

Seager, Allan. The Glass House: The Life of Theodore Roethke. New York: McGraw Hill, 1968.

Rosten, Leo (1908–1997) humorist

Born in Poland, Leo Rosten was brought to the United States as a child. He was educated at the University of Chicago, where he earned a Ph.D. in 1937 and initially worked as a sociologist. He is better known, however, as the author of popular fiction and nonfiction, including *The Education of H*Y*M*A*N* K*A*P*L*A*N* (1937), comic stories about immigrant night-school students in New York. There were two sequels: *The Return of H*Y*M*A*N K*A*P*L*A*N* (1959) and *O K*A*P*L*A*N! MY K*A*P*L*A*N!* (1976). Rosten also published Captain Newman, M.D. (1961), a novel about an army psychiatrist. A collection of his work, *The Many Worlds of L*E*O R*O*S*T*E*N*, appeared in 1964. Rosten became even more popular with The Joys of Yiddish (1968). Rosten drew on his Yiddish books in detective novels such as Silky (1978) and King Silky (1981). He also has written about travel in The 3:10 to Anywhere (1976). Passions and Prejudices (1978) is a collection of his essays.

Philip Roth

Roth, Philip (1933– ) novelist

Obviously the facts are never just coming at you but are incorporated by an imagination that is formed by your previous experience. Memories of the past are not memories of facts but memories of your imaginings of the facts.

—The Facts (1988)

Over the last forty years, Philip Roth has so thoroughly twisted and transformed the details of his personal life for the sake of his fiction that he perhaps felt compelled to title his one piece of straight autobiography The Facts (1988). Roth was born in Newark, New Jersey, and he grew up with his older brother in the mostly Jewish Weequahic area, attending the local schools there. After graduating from high school at the age of sixteen, Roth spent a year in the Newark branch of Rutgers University before transferring to Bucknell University in Pennsylvania. He received his M.A. from the University of Chicago in the mid 1950s and enlisted in the U.S. Army. When he returned to Chicago to teach and write full-time he met Saul BELLOW, an important mentor, and published his first short stories to immediate acclaim in magazines such as THE PARIS REVIEW and The New Yorker. In 1959 Roth won the Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship, which enabled him to publish his first book, GOODBYE, COLUMBUS AND FIVE SHORT STORIES (1959), a collection that won him the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD when he was twenty-six years old.

From the beginning, Roth's work has not only earned but has sought controversy and outrage. In the title novella to Goodbye, Columbus, Roth painted a parodic portrait of an affluent Jewish couple assimilating to the boorish WASP middle class, while in the accompanying stories Roth, steering clear of what he dismissed as "Yiddish kitsch," depicted

Dust jacket for Roth's 1969 novel, chosen as one of the 100 best novels since 1923 by Time magazine critics, who called it "too funny not to be taken seriously"

Dust jacket for Roth's 1981 novel, the second in his first Zuckerman trilogy. Roth has written nine novels that focus on his fictional alter ego, Nathan Zuckerman.

his Jewish characters as flawed and complex. These stories inspired outrage amid Jewish intellectuals and religious leaders; yet, ten years after the publication of Goodbye, Columbus, Roth chose, rather than to appease his critics, to stoke their ire with his best-selling PORTNOY'S COMPLAINT (1969).

In 1971 Roth published a satire of President Richard Nixon's administration, Our Gang, which he followed with an homage to Franz Kafka, titled The Breast (1972). Roth's My Life as a Man (1974) drew freely upon his own experience while also dramatizing the elusive and deceptive relationship between fiction and reality. My Life as a Man is the story of Peter Tornopol, a successful Jewish writer struggling to recover his artistic identity following an unsuccessful marriage and separation from a woman who, in her words, wanted to "be his Muse, if he'd only let me." The novel includes a pair of short stories allegedly written by Tornopol, in which his alter ego is named Nathan Zuckerman. Confusingly, Roth revived

Nathan Zuckerman for his 1979 novel, The Ghost Writer, another autobiographical novel in which a young Jewish writer in the 1950s goes to meet his artistic idol. The Ghost Writer yielded two more medium-length sequels, Zuckerman Unbound (1981), which traces Nathan's experiences following the unexpected success of a novel that suspiciously resembles Portnoy's Complaint, and The Anatomy Lesson (1983), another Kafkaesque tale about a mysterious illness that halts Nathan's career. In 1985 Roth bound these three novels together, along with a novella titled The Prague Orgy, and published the complete work as Zuckerman Bound.

THE COUNTERLIFE (1987), Roth's fourth Zuckerman novel, stands alone from the preceding trilogy and serves as a transitional work heralding another new period in Roth's oeuvre. The Counterlife consists of five sections, each a revision or a counterversion of the preceding section that creates a kaleidoscopic METAFICTION. After winning the National Book Award for the second time for The Counterlife, Roth published a quartet of books featuring a character named Philip Roth. In Operation Shylock (1993) a writer named Philip Roth discovers that someone claiming to be Philip Roth is traveling throughout the Middle East and urging Jews to leave Israel and return to Eastern Europe to avoid a second Holocaust.

Dust jacket for Roth's 2004 novel, in which Charles Lindbergh wins the 1940 presidential election, defeating the Democrat, Franklin D. Roosevelt

In the 1990s Roth commenced what most critics now see as the major period of his career. After Sabbath's Theater (1995), winner of the National Book Award and a scabrous detour back to the sexualized mode of Portnoy's Complaint, Roth resurrected Nathan Zuckerman again in AMERICAN PASTORAL (1997), which won the Pulitzer Prize and yielded another pair of sequels. Roth has since dubbed this second trilogy "The American Trilogy," as each novel addresses a specific period of postwar political strife, specifically the COLD WAR in I Married a Communist (1998), and the Clinton impeachment in The Human Stain (2000). In Roth's The Plot Against America (2004) he revisits his own war years with a twist: in this "alternative history," Charles Lindbergh, a noted anti-Semite and Nazi sympathizer, defeats Franklin D. Roosevelt in the 1942 presidential election. The ninth Zuckerman novel, Exit Ghost, was published in 2007.

Roth has won more literary awards than any other living American writer and, as well, has inspired a legion of detractors who object to his treatment of female characters, to his obsession with Jewish identity, and to what they regard as a narcissistic preoccupation.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Roth

Goodbye, Columbus and Five Short Stories. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1959.

Letting Go. New York: Random House, 1962.

When She Was Good. New York: Random House, 1967.

Portnoy's Complaint. New York: Random House, 1969.

Our Gang. New York: Random House, 1971.

The Breast. New York: Holt, Rinehart, & Winston, 1972.

The Great American Novel. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1973.

My Life as a Man. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1974.

Reading Myself and Others. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1975.

The Professor of Desire. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1977.

The Ghost Writer. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1979.

A Philip Roth Reader. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1980.

Zuckerman Unbound. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1981.

The Anatomy Lesson. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1983.

The Prague Orgy. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1985.

Zuckerman Bound. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1985.

The Counterlife. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1987.

The Facts: A Novelist's Autobiography. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1988.

Deception. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990.

Patrimony: A True Story. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1991.

Operation Shylock: A Confession. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.

Sabbath's Theater. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1995.

American Pastoral. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

I Married a Communist. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.

The Human Stain. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

The Dying Animal. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.

Shop Talk. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2001.

The Plot against America. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2004.

Everyman. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2006.

Exit Ghost. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2007.

Studying Philip Roth

Most students first encounter Philip Roth via his 1950s short stories "Defender of the Faith" and "Conversion of the Jews," both of which are included in Goodbye, Columbus (1959), now available, with Letting Go (1962), as Novels and Stories 1959–1962 (2005), the first volume of the Library of America edition of Roth's work. Roth's most important novels are the nine books featuring his fictional alter ego, Nathan Zuckerman. The Zuckerman books are arranged into two clusters, the first of which—comprising The Ghost Writer (1979), Zuckerman Unbound (1981), The Anatomy Lesson (1983), and an epilogue, The Prague Orgy (1985)—is also now available in a single Library of American volume titled Zuckerman Bound: A Trilogy and Epilogue 1979–1985 (2007). The second Zuckerman assemblage, subtitled "The American Trilogy," consists of the novels American Pastoral (1997), I Married a Communist (1998), and The Human Stain (2000). THE COUNTERLIFE (1985), a midcareer masterpiece, and Exit Ghost (2007) are the only stand-alone Zuckerman books. Two major novels featuring a fictionalized Philip Roth, Operation Shylock (1993) and The Plot Against America (2004), complement the preoccupation with fiction, autobiography, and self-reflection found in the Zuckerman books. Also of note is Roth's scabrous best-seller of sexual anxiety, PORTNOY'S COMPLAINT (1969), and his first foray into autobiographical metafiction, My Life as a Man (1974). Critics are sharply divided on Sabbath's Theater (1995), which some consider a masterpiece. His essays and nonfiction are collected in Reading Myself and Others (1975) and Shop Talk (2001).

Students interested in the events that inspired Roth's deceptively autobiographical fiction should consult his lone work of autobiography, The Facts (1988). His moving memoir about his father's death, Patrimony (1991), also provides keen insight into Roth's life. In "Philip Roth: A Personal View," collected in Harold BLOOM's Philip Roth: Modern Critical Views (New York: Chelsea House, 1986), literary critic Theodore Solotaroff recounts his early friendship with Roth while both men were graduate students at the University of Chicago in the 1950s. George Searle has compiled a collection of interviews with Roth titled Conversations with Philip Roth (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1992).

Owing perhaps to his tireless productivity, no up-to-date Roth bibliography is currently in print, although Bernard Rodgers's Philip Roth: A Bibliography (1986) covers Roth's career up to the first Zuckerman trilogy. The Philip Roth Society website at <http://orgs.tamu-commerce.edu/rothsoc/> (viewed August 23, 2007) provides the most comprehensive storehouse of Roth information, including a frequently updated bibliography.

The first serious book-length study of Roth's work is Hermione Lee's slim but astute Philip Roth (New York: Metheun, 1982), which organizes Roth's work through the 1970s into four phases. The Pulitzer Prize-winning American Pastoral occasioned a reappraisal of Roth's work that has resulted in over a dozen major works of critical analysis. The best such work is Debra Shostak's Philip Roth—Countertexts, Counterlives (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004). Taking her cue from Roth's novel The Counterlife, Shostak provides a critical tour through Roth's oeuvre up to The Human Stain, demonstrating how successive works provide a counterview of their predecessor. Conversely, Ross Posnock's Philip Roth: The Art of Immaturity (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2006), seeks to situate Roth's work within the tradition of European Modernism/POSTMODERNISM.

There are several notable essay collections of Roth's work. The fourteen essays in Turning Up the Flame: Philip Roth's Later Novels, edited by Jay L. Halio and Ben Siegel (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005), cover Roth's career from Deception (1990) to The Dying Animal (2001), while the seventeen essays compiled by Derek Parker Royal in Philip Roth: New Perspectives on an American Author (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005) cover nearly all of Roth's books, either individually or in groupings. Finally, Timothy Parrish's Cambridge Companion to Philip Roth (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007) features a dozen essays that explore Roth's work in the context of such issues as Jewish identity, Postmodernity, gender, and the like.

Two more-recent additions to the burgeoning Roth critical canon include Steven Milowitz's Philip Roth Considered: The Concentrationary Universe of the American Writer (New York: Garland, 2000), which interprets Roth's corpus in the light of the Holocaust, and Elaine B. Safer's Mocking the Age: The Later Novels of Philip Roth (Albany: State University of New York Press, 2006), which explores how the Zuckerman novels in particular satirize and critique contemporary culture.

—Student Guide by Marshall Boswell

Rubin, Louis (1923– ) editor, novelist, essayist, literary critic, publisher

One of the most influential Southern literature scholars of the postwar period, Louis Rubin was born in Charleston, South Carolina. He received his B.A. from the University of Richmond and his M.A. and Ph.D. from Johns Hopkins University. In 1953, while still at Johns Hopkins, he published his first book, a critical anthology titled The Southern Renaissance: The Literature of the Modern South, which he co-edited with Robert Jacobs. His first major work of criticism, Thomas Wolfe: The Weather of His Youth (1955), followed two years later. The author of more than twenty-five books and the editor of nearly as many—a list that includes novels, criticism, anthologies, and several popular books on baseball—Rubin was also a teacher, counting Clyde EDGERTON, Kaye GIBBONS, John BARTH, and Annie DILLARD among his students. He retired from teaching in 1989 to establish Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill, an independent publishing house devoted to showcasing Southern writers. Algonquin stands today as one of the most successful and admired independent publishing houses in the country.

Sources

Kreyling, Michael. Inventing Southern Literature. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

Rubin, Louis. A Memory of Trains: The Boll Weevil and Others. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

—Marshall Boswell

Rush, Norman (1933– ) novelist

Norman Rush was born in San Francisco in 1933 and graduated from Swarthmore College in 1956. Between 1978 and 1983 he lived and worked in Africa. He was fifty-eight years old when his first novel, Mating (1991), won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. The novel is narrated by an unnamed female anthropologist who travels to Botswana to visit an all-female commune set up and run by a renegade intellectual named Nelson Denoon, who soon becomes her lover. Rush was lavishly praised both for his convincing attempt to write from an intelligent woman's point of view and for his acute handling of the many weighty themes of the novel, including gender, sexuality, global politics, and utopianism. In 2003 he published a sequel of sorts, titled Mortals, which is also set in Botswana. The hero is an American CIA agent who attempts to track down the leader of a fledgling rebel group, during which time he also comes into contact with an American doctor who has traveled to Africa to warn the country of the evils of Christianity.

—Marshall Boswell

Russ, Joanna (1937– ) novelist, critic

Born in New York City, educated at Cornell (B.A., 1957) and Yale (M.F.A., 1960), Russ has worked as a college professor while creating a series of science-fiction novels that explore feminist and gay issues in political and social contexts. Her books include Picnic on Paradise (1968), And Chaos Died (1970), The Female Man (1975), Alyx (1983), and Extraordinary People (1984).

She has also published forceful nonfiction: How to Suppress Women's Writing (1983), To Write Like a Woman: Essays in Feminism and Science Fiction (1995), and What Are We Fighting For?: Sex, Race, Class, and the Future of Feminism (1998).

Sources

Cortiel, Jeanne. Demand My Writing: Joanna Russ, Feminism, Science Fiction. Liverpool, U.K.: Liverpool University Press, 1999.

Freedman, Carl. Critical Theory and Science Fiction. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England, 2000.

Teslenko, Tatiana. Feminist Utopian Novels of the 1970s: Joanna Russ & Dorothy Bryant. New York: Routledge, 2003.

Russo, Richard (1949– ) novelist, short-story writer

Born in Johnston, New York, Richard Russo is known for his novels that have memorialized life in the small towns of America, his fiction chronicling the misadventures and frustrations of his largely blue-collar characters. Russo received his B.A. degree in 1967, his Ph.D. in 1979, and his M.F.A. in 1980, all from the University of Arizona. His first two novels, Mohawk (1986) and The Risk Pool (1988), trace the lives of the inhabitants of the fictional town of Mohawk, New York. In 2002 Russo won the Pulitzer Prize for his fifth novel, Empire Falls (2001); the novel, set in a failing mill town in Maine, centers on middle-aged Miles Roby, who had abandoned his college education years earlier to care for his ailing mother and to run the Empire Grill. Russo's other notable books include Nobody's Fool (1993), a novel set in the fictional town of North Bath, New York; Straight Man (1997), a comic satire of academic life set in the English department of a small Pennsylvania college; and The Whore's Child and Other Short Stories (2002), Russo's first collection of short fiction. In 1994 Nobody's Fool was adapted into a motion picture, and in 2005 Empire Falls was made into movie for HBO.

—Matthew Shipe

Sacagawea (circa 1787–1812 or 1884?) guide, interpreter

Sacagawea (also spelled Sacajawea or Sakakawea), a member of the Lemni Shoshone tribe, was born around 1787 near the western lands, known today as Montana and Idaho. When she was twelve or fourteen, Sacagawea was taken captive by the Hidatsa tribe that lived along the upper Missouri River in the Dakota Territory and adopted into their tribe. In 1804 Sacagawea was married to a French Canadian fur trader named Toussaint Charbonneau, and when the LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION passed through the Dakota Territory, wintering in Mandan, they hired Charbonneau as a guide. Sacagawea, who was called “bird woman,” also joined the expedition as a guide, and her fluency in Shoshone, Siouan, and other dialects proved indispensable. She also became known as “owl woman” and “grass woman,” among other names.

When Meriwether LEWIS and William CLARK’s Corps of Discovery broke camp in April 1805, Sacagawea, Charbonneau, and their infant son, Jean Baptiste, traveled west with the expedition. Sacagawea’s knowledge of the geography and native plants and her skills as a negotiator were invaluable. At one point on the journey, according to Carl Waldman, Sacagawea “had the presence of mind to save the expedition’s records and journals when her husband accidentally capsized one of the boats.”

Sacagawea continued with the expedition to the Pacific Ocean, staying through the winter at Fort Clatsop, and returning to Fort Mandan, North Dakota, in September 1806, a journey of approximately 4,356 miles. In 1806 Sacagawea and Charbonneau traveled to St. Louis in order for the four-year-old Jean-Baptiste to receive an education, during which time he stayed with Clark. Some sources indicate that Sacagawea died six years later, on November 20, 1812, while others suggest that she lived until 1884.

Sources

Clark, Ella Elizabeth. Sacagawea of the Lewis and Clark Expedition. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979.

Howard, Harold P. Sacajawea. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1971.

Saffin, John (1626–1710) poet, diarist

John Saffin was born in England in 1626, the son of Simon Saffin and Grace Garrett Saffin. Following the death of his father and the remarriage of his mother, Saffin immigrated to Massachusetts in 1633 or 1634 in the care of his mother’s family. He completed his preparatory education under the Congregational minister Charles CHAUNCEY and, bypassing college, began his legal career as a trainee in the firm of Foster and Hoar in Scituate, where he also served as a town selectman.

For a few years beginning in 1654, Saffin conducted trade in Virginia. In 1658 he married Martha Willet, daughter of Captain Thomas Willet; the couple had eight children. In 1660 Saffin relocated to Boston, where he served at various levels of the colonial government, in the Governor’s Council, and as speaker of the assembly. Martha Saffin died in 1678.

In 1680 Saffin married his second wife, Elizabeth Lidgett, a widow. Following her death in 1687, Saffin relocated to Bristol, Massachusetts, in what became part of Rhode Island. There he married Rebecca Lee, daughter of the Reverend Samuel Lee. His legal and political career continued to grow in Bristol. He was appointed a judge of common pleas and was elected to the council from 1693 to 1699. During the intervening years, Saffin accumulated significant wealth as a slave trader and a land speculator.

Saffin's early work, a COMMONPLACE BOOK, was unpublished in his lifetime; it was discovered and published in 1928 as John Saffin, His Book. Covering a period of forty-three years (1665–1708), Saffin's book provides information concerning colonial politics, day-to-day life in provincial Massachusetts, notes on the author's reading interests, and Saffin's own poetry. The journal includes fifty-five poems in a variety of styles ranging from epitaphs and love poems to acrostics and SATIRES.

Saffin's poetry also appears in his Brief and Candid Answer to a Late Printed Sheet, Entitled the Selling of Joseph (1701), written as a rebuttal to Samuel SEWALL's The Selling of Joseph (circa 1700). Both works were based on a dispute that Saffin had with his slave Adam. In 1694 Saffin had agreed to grant Adam his freedom in seven years. Adam was subsequently transferred to two other masters. When the appointed date arrived, Adam demanded his freedom. Saffin threatened to remove Adam from Massachusetts, a change that would have nullified the agreement.

Sewall argued that Adam was free not only by the terms of the agreement but also by his condition as a human. According to Sewall, Saffin had no right to sell Adam and therefore no right to keep him in bondage. Sewall's argument included "To John Saffin," a verse description of Saffin's political persona: "Superannuated Squier, wigg'd and powder'd with pretence. / Much beguiles the just Assembly by his lying Impudence."

Saffin's treatise argued that there were different levels of humanity; some men were ordained to be masters, and others (in particular, blacks), servants. Saffin defended slavery by noting that the biblical Abraham owned slaves and "... our Imitation of him in this Moral Action is as warrantable as that of his Faith. . . ." His retort to Sewall included "The Negroes Character," an eight-line poem that begins: "Cowardly and cruel are those Blacks innate / Prone to Revenge, Imp of inveterate hate. . . ." Though he was a successful merchant and lawyer, John Saffin had a hot temper and sharp tongue that led to his political alienation. His poetry offers a more thoughtful, though nonetheless controversial view of this complex figure.

Works

Saffin, John. John Saffin, His Book (1665–1708); A Collection of Various Matters of Divinity, Law, & State Affairs Epitomiz'd both in Verse and Prose. New York: Harbour Press, 1928.

Saffin. "A Brief Candid Answer to The Selling of Joseph." Boston, 1701; reprinted in Against Slavery: An Abolitionist Reader. New York: Penguin, 2000.

Salem Witchcraft Trials (1692)

Legal proceedings in seventeenth-century Salem, Massachusetts, focused on accusations of witchcraft. The trials began after suspicions grew regarding a group of young girls—including Betty Parris, Ann Putnam, and Abigail Williams—who in February 1692 began behaving strangely and having fits following fortune-telling games allegedly directed by Tituba, a West Indian slave in the home of the Reverend Samuel Parris in Salem. Allegations of witchcraft followed when the girls claimed that Sarah Good, Sarah Osborne, and Tituba caused their "afflictions." The accused were subsequently arrested on February 29, 1692, and jailed in Boston. Shortly thereafter, on May 27, 1692, Governor Sir William Phips convened the Court of Oyer and Terminer ("to hear and determine"), during which 185 people were accused of being witches: 24 women and 6 men were convicted, 20 were hanged, and 1 man, Giles Cory, pressed to death. The main accusation was "spectral" evidence, wherein a person's shape was blamed for certain behaviors. This possession was presumed demonic and therefore justified the executions. Governor Phips ended the witchcraft trials on October 29, 1692. Although witch-hunts had been carried out in Europe since the 1450s, witchcraft allegations in colonial America had largely been dismissed or discredited until the "outbreak" in Salem. Subsequent speculation has included theories that general instability, political and religious, fostered a climate of hysteria, or that possibly the villagers had ingested ergot poisoning, caused when rye is improperly stored. The magistrates and religious leaders of Massachusetts were conflicted, with some, such as Cotton MATHER, defending the trials and others, such as his father, Increase MATHER, opposing them. In 1693 Samuel SEWALL, Puritan leader, publicly recanted his role as a judge in the trials. In 1697 the Massachusetts General Court declared a day of atonement, and in 1711 some families and victims were granted financial restitution. The PAMPHLET exchanges between Cotton Mather and Robert CALEF address key issues surrounding the trials: Cotton Mather wrote The Wonders of the Invisible World: Being an Account of the Tryals of Several Witches Lately Executed in New-England (1692); Robert Calef wrote More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700). Another contemporary work is Samuel WILLARD's Some Miscellany Observations on Our Present Debates Respecting Witchcrafts, in a Dialogue between S. & B. (1692).

Sources

Godbeer, Richard. The Devil's Dominion Magic and Religion in Early New England. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Hall, David D., ed. Witch-Hunting in Seventeenth-Century New England: A Documentary History, 1638–1692. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991.

Norton, Mary Beth. In the Devil's Snare: The Salem Witchcraft Crisis of 1692. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Salem Witch Trials: Documentary Archive and Transcription Project, University of Virginia, <jefferson.village.virginia.edu/salem/home.html>

Sampson, Deborah (1760–1827) soldier

Disguised in men's clothing, Deborah Sampson was the first woman to join the Revolutionary Army and to see combat. On May 20, 1782, twenty-one-year-old Deborah Sampson enlisted in the Fourth Massachusetts Regiment of the Continental Army at Bellingham under the assumed name of Robert Shurtleff (also Shirtliff or Shurtleff). Three days later, in Worcester, she was mustered into service and served with honor for seventeen months. When she received a leg wound at Tarrytown, Sampson refused to seek medical attention and tended to the bullet wound herself to keep her gender a disguise, an act repeated two more times while in the army. Sampson remained in the army undetected until she contracted a fever, possibly from the measles or yellow fever, that caused her to be delirious, and thus sent to a hospital. When the attending Dr. Barnabus Binney discovered that she was a woman, he treated her in his home in Philadelphia and made arrangements privately with her commanding officer. Upon her recovery Sampson was ordered to deliver a letter to General WASHINGTON, who reportedly discharged her and provided funds for her return trip home. On October 25, 1783, Sampson was honorably discharged from the army at West Point by General Henry Knox.

Sampson returned home and resumed teaching. A year later, in 1784, she married a farmer, Benjamin Gannet Jr., and they had three children. In 1792, to supplement the family's income, Deborah Sampson Gannet successfully petitioned the Massachusetts General Court to pay her £34 for her war-time service. She then collaborated with schoolteacher, Herman Mann, to write her story, hoping that the sales would improve her family's financial situation. In 1797, The Female Review; or, Memoirs of an American Young Lady . . . was published, and in 1802 through 1803 Deborah Sampson Gannet began lecturing about her life as a soldier throughout NEW ENGLAND and New York. Dressed in military attire, she traveled over one thousand miles, demonstrating her skills with a musket and delivering speeches that Mann had written, often with embellished tales of her soldier's experience. On February 20, 1804, Paul REVERE wrote to Congress on behalf of Deborah Sampson Gannet to request a pension from the government, due to wounds suffered while in the army. Revere concludes his letter: "I was agreeably surprised to find a small, effeminate, and converseable Woman, whose education entitled her to a better situation in life. I have no doubt your humanity will prompt you to do all in Your power to get her some relief, I think her case much more deserving than hundreds to whom Congress have been generous." In 1809, an impoverished and sickly Deborah Sampson Gannet received a retroactive pension of $960.00. She died April 29, 1827 in Sharon, Massachusetts.

Sources

Mann, Herman. The Female Review; or, Memoirs of an American Young Lady, Whose Life and Character Are Peculiarly Distin- guished, Being a Continental Soldier, for Nearly Three Years, in the Late American War. During Which Time She Performed the Duties of Every Department, into Which She Was Called, with Punctual Exactness, Fidelity and Honor, and Preserved Her Chastity Inviolable by the Most Artful Concealment of Her Sex. . . . Dedham, Mass.: Printed by Nathaniel and Benjamin Heaton for the author, 1797. Early American Imprints, 32417.

Young, Alfred F. Masquerade: The Life and Times of Deborah Sampson, Continental Soldier. New York: Knopf, 2004.

Satire

Satire—the use of ridicule, irony, sarcasm, or similar devices to expose or deride vice and folly—was a well-established conversational and literary form in the Anglo-American world, and American authors made extensive use of it to offer both political and social critiques. Satire played an important role in the conversations held in the colony's COFFEEHOUSES, taverns, and social clubs, and in the emerging salons. Intellectual skill was measured by an individual's ability to hold his or her own in an exchange of wit.

American satire was also produced in more formal ways as plays, poems, narratives, and political cartoons. To a large extent, the satirical forms used by American authors borrowed heavily from British influences, particularly from the works of William Shakespeare (1564–1616) and from the literature of the English Restoration (circa 1660–1700). In turn, the English satirists drew significant inspiration from the classical Greek and Roman comedians and the work of the French comic dramatist Molière (1622–1673). American satirists incorporated these influences into their work, borrowing character types from the classic comic writers and adopting the structures of Molière and the English Restoration.

Mercy Otis WARREN adapted classical imagery and the English poet Alexander Pope's (1688–1744) satirical poem The Rape of the Lock (1712–1714) to construct her own satire, The Squabble of the Sea Nymphs (1774), which celebrated the dumping of tea into Boston Harbor. Satire was frequently used to express political opinions. Many of these satirical pieces appeared either as broadsides or in newspapers. An early poem by Samuel SEWALL, "To John Saffin" (circa 1700), lampooned SAFFIN's decision to re-enslave a black man who had been legally emancipated.

Protest and rebellion during the revolutionary era had a significant influence on the development of American satire, which was typified by thinly veiled personal attacks. This trend was exemplified by the poem "Jemmibullero" (1765), a blatant attack on PATRIOT leader James (Jemmy) OTIS Jr. Like many other satirical pieces, the poem appeared in the public press and barely skirted the laws of slander and libel. Among the leading satires of this period were Mercy Otis Warren's The Group (1775) and Jonathan SEWALL's A Cure for the Spleen; or, Amusement for a Winter's Evening (1775).

Sources

- Bier, Jesse. The Rise and Fall of American Humor. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1968.
- Dowling, William C. Poetry and Ideology in Revolutionary Connecticut. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Granger, Bruce Ingham. Political Satire in the American Revolution 1763–1783. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1960.
- Hartman, John Geoffrey. The Development of American Social Comedy from 1787 to 1936. New York: Octagon, 1971.
- Wells, Colin. The Devil and Doctor Dwight: Satire and Theology in the Early American Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.

Seabury, Samuel (1729–1796) pamphleteer

A pamphleteer and Anglican minister, Samuel Seabury was born in Groton, Connecticut, on November 30, 1729, the son of the Reverend Samuel Seabury, a missionary for the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), and Abigail Mumford Seabury. He graduated from Yale in 1748 and went to Scotland to study theology and medicine. Once ordained, he returned to America, settling in New Brunswick, New Jersey, and like his father became a missionary for the SPG. He married Mary Hicks in 1755, and in 1766 he moved to Westchester, New York, where he ran an Anglican church and a school. He remained there until the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Seabury was a LOYALIST who was opposed to controversy; nevertheless, he entered the PAMPHLET war over British colonial taxation policies in 1774. His essays supporting royal policy, signed “A Westchester Farmer,” were so persuasive that New York City radicals feared their political impact. Historian Moses Coit Tyler (1835–1900) concluded that probably no series of pamphlets was “more readable, none more witty and brilliant, none argumentatively more effective” than Seabury’s. Pro-independence leaders in the city organized ceremonial burnings of Seabury’s essays and attempted to prevent their distribution. Only Alexander HAMILTON’s rebuttals softened the blow to the radical cause.

Seabury’s essays include the figures of speech common to a colonial farmer. In his first letter, Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Continental Congress (1774), Seabury plays on rural New York’s distrust of the city. He warns that Congress’s decision to boycott English goods in 1774 will impoverish farmers while making urban craftsmen rich. In his second letter, The Congress Canvassed, Seabury addresses the New York City merchants directly, warning them that revolutionary enforcement committees will hurt them economically. Replying to Hamilton in A View of the Controversy, Seabury proposes a plan for a constitution for the colonies that would be granted by Parliament. He reiterates this proposed compromise in An Alarm to the Legislature of the Province of New-York.

Seabury was forced to seek refuge in British-occupied New York once the war began. Learning of his polemical skills, military commanders sought him out and hired him to write essays in local Loyalist newspapers. In 1782–1783 Seabury directed the Loyalist relocation to Nova Scotia from New York City. He was preparing to go himself, but Connecticut’s Episcopal clergy asked him to serve as their bishop. Seabury, a defender of the high church tradition, traveled thousands of miles to visit churches in Connecticut and Rhode Island. He died in New London, Connecticut, in 1796.

Works

- Seabury, Samuel. Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Continental Congress. New York?: Printed for James Rivington?, 1774; Early American Imprints, 13602.
- Seabury. The Congress Canvassed. New York?: Printed for James Rivington?, 1774; Early American Imprints, 13601.
- Seabury. An Alarm to the Legislature of the Province of New-York, Occasioned by the Present Political Disturbances, in North America: Addressed to the Honourable Representatives in General Assembly Convened. New York: Printed for James Rivington, 1775; Early American Imprints, 14453.
- Seabury. A View of the Controversy between Great-Britain and Her Colonies. New York: Printed for James Rivington, 1775; Early American Imprints, 13603.

Sources

- Marshall, Paul Victor. One, Catholic, and Apostolic: Samuel Seabury and the Early Episcopal Church. New York: Church Publications, 2004.
- Steiner, Bruce E. Samuel Seabury, 1729–1796: A Study in the High Church Tradition. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1972.

Seixas, Gershom Mendez (1745–1816) theologian

Gershom Mendez Seixas, known as the “Patriot Jewish Minister of the American Revolution,” was born in New York City on January 14, 1745, the son of Isaac Mendez Seixas, a merchant from Lisbon, and Rachel Levy Seixas, daughter of a trading family. Seixas showed little interest in commerce; instead, he was absorbed by education and Jewish studies. His precocity was evident to the community, and at the age of twenty-one, despite his lack of formal training as a rabbi, he was chosen to lead the city’s Spanish-Portuguese congregation, Shearith Israel. In 1768 he was formally appointed the congregation’s hazzen (prayer leader).

Seixas published few treatises, homilies, or sermons. In fact, only two of his sermons appeared in print, and these have a stronger historical than literary significance. In his Religious Discourse: Thanksgiving Day Sermon, November 26, 1789 (1977), he challenged the Calvinist notion of “by faith alone,” arguing that “faith alone is insufficient to procure salvation. . . .” God, he continued, would reward the Jews for their right actions, and would give them a political nation of their own someday. Jews would, he predicted, “return to Zion.” But both his assertion that good works are crucial and his Zionism were secondary to the central theme of the sermon: the duty of the citizen. Jews, he wrote, must feel, and show, gratitude for the new nation and its liberties. He urged his congregation to “support the government which is founded upon the strictest principles of equal liberty and justice.”

Seixas’s 1798 sermon A Discourse Delivered . . . the Ninth of May, 1798 is also patriotic. In it, he reminds his congregation that they are fortunate to be citizens of the United States and assures the United States government that Jewish Americans are indeed loyal to their country. His eagerness to assure the authorities that Jews are PATRIOTS is what prompted Seixas to allow these two sermons to be published.

Seixas was the acknowledged authority on Hebrew literature and rabbinical law in New York City. But he was not only a scholar; he was also an activist and a Patriot. He became the first Jewish circuit rider in America, sometimes traveling as far as Philadelphia to conduct services or officiate at religious ceremonies. When the AMERICAN REVOLUTION split his congregation and his own family, Seixas maintained his support of the American cause. He persuaded Shearith Israel to disband rather than operate under British rule during the long occupation of the city. In August 1776 he preached a farewell sermon; took the synagogue’s Torah (Holy Scriptures) and his new wife, Elkahel Cohen Seixas, whom he had married in 1775 (died 1785) and with whom he had four children, to the safety of Stratford, Connecticut. By 1780 members of his disbanded congregation who had moved to Philadelphia persuaded him to join them in founding Congregation Mickve Israel. Seixas soon became an influential member of Philadelphia society, known for his ecumenical orientation and his willingness to invite Christian clergy to his pulpit.

Seixas returned to New York City in 1784. He was one of the first clergymen to acquiesce in President George WASHINGTON’s call for a formal holiday of thanksgiving, and he may have been one of the fourteen clergymen invited to preside at Washington’s inauguration. He was made a trustee of Columbia College immediately upon his return to the city, and he served on the first Board of Regents for the new University of the State of New York. In 1793 Seixas founded a Hebrew School so American Jews would not have to go to Europe to study. Seixas died on July 2, 1816, survived by his second wife, Hannah Manuel Seixas, and their eleven children.

Works

Seixas. A Religious Discourse: Thanksgiving Day Sermon, November 26, 1789. New York: Printed by A. M’Lean, 1789; Early American Imprints, 22134; reprint, New York: Jewish Historical Society of New York, 1977.

Seixas, Gershom Mendes. A Discourse, Delivered in the Synagogue in New-York: on the Ninth of May, 1798, Observed as a Day of Humiliation. New York: Printed by William A. Davis for Naphtali Judah, 1798; Early American Imprints, 34524; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1975.

Sources

Libo, Kenneth, and Abigail Kursheedt Hoffman. The Seixas-Kursheedts and the Rise of Early American Jewry. New York: Bloch in conjunction with the American Jewish Historical Society, 2001.

Rosengarten, Theodore, and Dale Rosengarten. A Portion of the People: Three Hundred Years of Southern Jewish Life. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Sentimental Novel

The sentimental novel employs dramatic, emotional themes and plots as a means to instruct its readers on virtuous behavior. Early American novels were based on eighteenth-century British models provided by Samuel Richardson, Oliver Goldsmith, and Laurence Sterne. The first novel in English and the first novel published by an American in the colonies was a sentimental novel. Samuel Richardson’s Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740), published in the colonies in 1744 by Benjamin FRANKLIN, was written in an epistolary style—that is, as a series of letters—common among sentimental novels. The epistolary style allowed presentation of characters’ emotional responses in the first person, without authorial intrusion. These works drew upon emotion as a key to knowledge and virtue, with stories meant to be instructive and even cautionary. Readers were expected to distinguish the “head” from the “heart,” with the implication that intellectual understanding is less dependable than emotions; and yet most of the hapless victims of these novels were in predicaments that resulted from errors of the heart, making them all the more sympathetic.

Susanna ROWSON addresses these concerns in the preface to her popular novel, CHARLOTTE: A TALE OF TRUTH:

If the following tale should save one hapless fair one from the errors which ruined poor Charlotte, or rescue from impending misery the heart of one anxious parent, I shall feel a much higher gratification in reflecting on this trifling performance, than could possibly result from the applause which might attend the most elegant finished piece of literature whose tendency might deprave the heart or mislead the understanding.

In keeping with this didactic intention, sentimental novels include proclamations and affirmations of virtue and morality, as in Hannah Webster FOSTER’s THE COQUETTE, in which Lucy Sumner writes in a letter to Eliza Wharton: “You have now emerged from that mist of fanciful folly, which, in a measure obscured the brilliance of your youthful days. True, you figured among the first rate coquettes; while your friends, who knew your accomplishments, lamented the misapplication of them; but now they rejoice at the returning empire of reason." By centering education in the heart and emotions, the sentimental novel engaged the readers in a young woman's predicament of seduction and abandonment. In these early novels, a young heroine typically finds herself in a compromised situation attempting to break free from oppressive male authority.

"Eliza Wharton," an illustration from Hannah Webster Foster's The Coquette (1797)

In addition to romantic scenarios, sentimental novels addressed issues of female education and individual rights, and social institutions, such as marriage and family—topics that appealed to both male and female readers and contributed to the novels' popularity. In William Hill Brown's The Power of Sympathy (1789), Mrs. Holmes tells Myra Harrington:

You will observe, my dear friend, that most of the letters I have written to you of late, on female education, are confined to the subject of study. I am sensible of the ridicule sometimes levelled at those who are called learned ladies. Either these ladies must be uncommonly pedantick, or those who ridicule them, uncommonly ignorant—Do not be apprehensive of acquiring that title, or sharing the ridicule, but remember that the knowledge which I wish you to acquire, is necessary to adorn your many virtues and amiable qualifications.

Consistent with a didactic intention, Mrs. Holmes's speech provides for the edification of her readers.

Sentimental novels were widely read. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth was published in over forty editions in the first thirty years after publication. These novels sparked debate and extensive discussion in letters, newspapers, and even in other novels. In her introduction to Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America (2004), Cathy N. Davidson discusses the novel's significant role in shaping American values:

Rereading early American novels, understanding the role the novel played in debates on literary and public education, allows us to see the variety of political and social topics at issue in the early national period. The novels reveal the contest over the shapes the new nation should take, who might be the nation's paradigmatic heroes and heroines, and who was being left out of the picture in the official version of America's new 'representative democracy'.

Frontispiece for the first edition of William Hill Brown's The Power of Sympathy (1789)

The sentimental novel, with its overall theme of vulnerable women being victimized by unscrupulous men, was criticized for its melodramatic renderings of reality and for being ineffective in addressing social injustice. The form was nonetheless a major influence on the sensibilities of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century readers, having its most notable effect with Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852), the best-selling novel of the nineteenth century, which was a significant force in shaping attitudes toward slavery.

Works

- Brown, William Hill. The Power of Sympathy, Or, The Triumph of Nature Founded in Truth. Boston: Printed by Isaiah Thomas, 1789; republished as The Power of Sympathy, edited by Carla Mulford. New York: Penguin, 1996.
- Brown. The Better Sort, or, The Girl of Spirit An Operatical Comical Farce. Boston: Printed by Isaiah Thomas, 1789.
- Brown. Ira and Isabella Or, the Natural Children. . . Boston: Belcher & Armstrong, 1807.
- Foster, Hannah Webster. The Coquette or, The History of Eliza Wharton. Boston: Printed by S. Etheridge for E. Larkin, 1797; republished as The Coquette, edited by Carla Mulford. New York: Penguin, 1996.
- Rowson, Susanna. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth. London: William Lane, 1791; republished as Charlotte Temple. Philadelphia: Matthew Carey, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27649; New York: Oxford University Press, 1986. New York: Modern Library, 2004.
- Rowson. Mentoria, or, The Young Lady's Friend: In Two Volumes. Philadelphia: Printed for Robert Campbell by Samuel Harrison Smith, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27654.
- Rowson. The Fille De Chambre. Philadelphia: Printed for H. & P. Rice, 1794; revised as Rebecca, or, The Fille De Chambre. Boston: Published by R. P. & C. Williams, Printed by J. Belcher, 1814.
- Rowson. Reuben and Rachel: Or, Tales of Old Times. Boston: Printed by Manning & Loring for David West, 1798.
- Tenney, Tabitha. Female Quixoticism. . . Boston: Printed by I. Thomas & E. T. Andrews, 1801; edited by Jean Nienkamp and Andrea Collins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Sources

- Barnes, Elizabeth. States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Davidson, Cathy. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Gould, Philip. Covenant and Republic: Historical Romance and the Politics of Puritanism. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Front cover for a later, retitled edition of Susanna Rowson's popular novel first published in 1791 as Charlotte: A Tale of Truth

- Samuels, Shirley. Romances of the Republic: Women, the Family, and Violence in the Literature of the Early American Nation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Stern, Julia A. The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.

Recommended Writings

- Brown, William Hill. The Power of Sympathy (1789)
- Rowson, Susanna. Charlotte: A Tale of Truth (1791)
- Foster, Hannah Webster. The Coquette (1797)
- Tenney, Tabitha. Female Quixoticism (1801)

Studying the Early American Sentimental Novel

Students interested in learning about the genesis of the early American novel should consult these general studies: Herbert Ross Brown's The Sentimental Novel in America, 1789–1860 (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1940); Lillie Deming Loshe's The Early American Novel, 1789–1830 (New York: F. Ungar, 1958); Leslie A. Fiedler's Love and Death in the American Novel (New York: Stein & Day, 1966); Henri Petter's The Early American Novel (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1971); Emory Elliott's Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic 1725–1810 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982); Cathy Davidson's Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986/2004); and Jane P. Tompkins's Sensational Designs: The Cultural Work of American Fiction, 1790–1860 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985). More-recent studies include Karen Ann Weyler's Intricate Relations: Sexual and Economic Desire in American Fiction, 1789–1814 (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2004); Shirley A. Samuels's Companion to American Fiction, 1780–1865 (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2004); Sarah Florence Wood's Quixotic Fictions of the USA, 1792–1815 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005). For a helpful collection of essays on the early American novel, see A Companion to American Fiction, 1780–1865, edited by Shirley Samuels (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2004). Examples of early American novels outside of the sentimental tradition include Hugh Henry BRACKENRIDGE's Modern Chivalry: Containing the Adventures of Captain John Farrago, and Teague O'Regan, His Servant (Philadelphia: John M'Culloch, 1792–1797) and Gilbert IMLAY's The Emigrants, &C.: Or the History of an Expatriated Family, Being a Delineation of English Manners, Drawn from Real Characters (London: Printed for A. Hamilton, 1793).

For a more specific study of the sentimental novel, see Shirley Samuels's Romances of the Republic: Women, the Family, and Violence in the Literature of the Early American Nation (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996); Elizabeth Barnes's States of Sympathy: Seduction and Democracy in the American Novel (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997); Julia A. Stern's The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997); Donna R. Bontatibus's The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation A Call for Socio-Political Reform (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999); and Earl F. Yarrington's The Portrayal of Woman's Sentimental Power in American Domestic Fiction: The Novels of Mary Jane Holmes, 1825–1907 (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2007). For a print bibliography, see Patricia L. Parker's Early American Fiction: A Reference Guide (Boston, Mass.: G.K. Hall, 1984); Barbara Anne White's American Women's Fiction, 1790–1870: A Reference Guide (New York: Garland, 1990); and Doreen Alvarez Saar and Mary Anne Schofield's Eighteenth-Century Anglo-American Women Novelists: A Critical Reference Guide (New York: G. K. Hall, 1996).

Separatist (Pilgrim)

Puritan dissenters, also known as Separatists, demanded further reform within the ANGLICAN CHURCH, including more congregational autonomy. This demand was considered seditious to the Crown, and so the dissenters separated from the Church of England. To avoid persecution, one group, the members of the Scrooby Congregation, fled to Holland in 1608 under the ministerial leadership of John Robinson.

Concerned for their economic survival and their children's assimilation in Holland, and fearing that the Dutch might soon be engaged in a battle with Spain, the Pilgrims departed on the MAYFLOWER for the New World to establish PLYMOUTH COLONY in 1620, after twelve years in exile. William BRADFORD, a leader of the Plymouth, Massachusetts, colony, was the first to identify this particular group as "Pilgrims." The Separatists, who had broken from the Church of England, had strict requirements for church membership, including renunciation of the Church of England and reasonable, visible evidence of their conversion. Key historical records and literary texts concerning these events include William BRADFORD's HISTORY OF PLYMOUTH PLANTATION, which he wrote between 1630 and 1646, Cotton MATHER's MAGNALIA CHRISTI AMERICANA, John WINTHROP's "Modell of Christian Charity" (1630) and his Journals, written between 1630 and 1649 (1790), and Samuel SEWALL's Diary, recorded between 1674 and 1729 (1878–1882).

Sources

Demos, John. A Little Commonwealth: Family Life in Plymouth Colony, second edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Langdon, George D., Jr. Pilgrim Colony: A History of New Plymouth, 1620–1691. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966.

Miller, Perry. Errand into the Wilderness. New York: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 1956.

Sermon

The sermon was one of the most popular forms of literature in colonial America, in part because of the central role of religion and in part because of the increasing distribution of printed matter. For the Protestant churches, in particular, the sermon provided a model for scriptural study and encouraged interpretation of the Scriptures by the congregation.

The seventeenth-century Puritan sermon followed a three-part structure: text or explication, confirmation or doctrine, and uses or application. The first section provides a close reading of Scripture and an opportunity to demonstrate scriptural interpretation. Section two provides evidence of the lesson from Scripture or from common experience. Section three applies the text in both a general, exemplary manner and in a direct, practical way, leaving the congregation to ponder the overall effects of a particular text and message. On Sundays, when services were held twice a day, the first two components were addressed in the morning service, while the application was delivered in the afternoon. Puritan sermons were written in the “plain style,” which adopted straightforward diction over the more ornate flourishes of contemporary prose. (See also the JEREMIAD, another type of sermon.)

Popular manuals and books on preaching included John Wilkin's (1614–1672) Ecclesiastes, or, A Discourse Concerning the Gifts of Preaching as it Falls under the Rules of Art (1646); William Chappell's (1582–1649) The Preacher, or, The Art and Method of Preaching (1656); John Edwards's (1637–1716) The Preacher (3 volumes, 1705–1707); and Cotton MATHER's Manuductio ad Ministerium (1726). Sermons were delivered orally, and preachers were encouraged to memorize their notes or complete drafts. Church members often took sermon notes, and full transcriptions that were later revised by the minister frequently made their way into print. In fact, sermons were among the most common printed materials in early America. According to Sargent Bush Jr., sermons represented 40 percent of all books published in America between 1639 and 1729. For example, Lewis Bayley's (circa 1565–1633), The Practice of Piety went through twenty-five editions by 1630; Thomas SHEPARD's The Sincere Convert was reprinted twenty-two times (1640–1693); and Thomas HOOKER's The Poore Doubting Christian Drawne to Christ was reprinted seventeen times (1629–1700).

Sermons were written not only for religious meetings, but also for special occasions and as platforms for secular community forums. For example, the “election sermon,” upon the opening of the General Court, reinforced the mission of a community; the “execution sermon” reminded colonists of expected moral and civil behavior; and the “funeral sermon” evoked saints who had passed on before. Sermons were also prepared for fast days, thanksgiving days, ordinations, and dedications.

Sources

- Bercovitch, Sacvan. The American Jeremiad. Madison: University Wisconsin Press, 1978.
- Bercovitch. The Puritan Origins of the American Self. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975.
- Bush, Sargent, Jr. “Sermons and Theological Writings,” in Columbia Literary History of the United States, edited by Emory Elliott. New York: Columbia University Press, 1998, 56–66.
- Cohen, Charles Lloyd. God's Caress: Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Elliott, Emory. Power and the Pulpit in Puritan New England. Princeton University Press, 1975.

Seven Years' War

See FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR

Sewall, Jonathan (1728–1796) playwright, propagandist

Jonathan Sewall is noted for his defense of Crown policy in newspaper essays published in The Boston Evening-Post; The Boston Gazette, or, Country Journal; The Massachusetts Gazette; and The Boston Censor. He often signed his work with the pseudonyms “Philanthrop” and “Philaethes.” Sewall's essays often read like legal briefs, and were peppered with sarcasm. In addition to these newspaper essays he wrote “The Association of the Delegates” (1774), a verse SATIRE on the Nonintercourse or boycott resolutions issued by the First Continental Congress to force Great Britain to repeal the Townshend Acts. The poem parallels the original document, but Sewall uses an obtuse PATRIOT narrator to interject satiric editorial commentary on the congressional policy. A Cure for the Spleen; or, Amusement for a Winter's Evening, being the Substance of a Conversation on the Times, over a Friendly Tankard and Pipe (1775) is a debate, set in a tavern, in which the characters raise or respond to all the American grievances against the Crown. The play's hero, the intelligent Reverend Sharp, voices Sewall's own conviction that the rebels are motivated by self-interest, disappointed ambitions, and a love of demagoguery. During the evening, Sharp rebuts the arguments of Mr. Puff, a representative to the Congress, while a cross section of the Boston community, including a squire and a barber, join in the debate.

Jonathan Sewall was born in Boston on August 24, 1728, to Jonathan and Mary Payne Sewall. He was from a family noted for judges, HARVARD faculty, and political leaders in Massachusetts for almost a century, but his own father was an unsuccessful merchant. Jonathan entered Harvard with financial assistance from his uncle, Samuel SEWALL, and was expelled for pranks played against the well-known minister Jonathan Mayhew (1720–1776). Readmitted after making a public apology, Sewall received his degree in 1748 and taught school in Salem for several years afterward. With further assistance from family and friends, he undertook the study of law and in 1758 began a steadily growing practice in Charleston, Massachusetts.

In the early 1760s Sewall received several key appointments within the royal government of the province. He served first as solicitor-general, then, in 1767, as attorney-general, finally receiving an appointment as a judge of the admiralty. This patronage persuaded Sewall that the Crown was benevolent, a position he continued to maintain as men such as John ADAMS began to denounce the tyrannical tendencies of the royal government.

When Britain's colonial policy changed—signaled by the STAMP ACT—he was satirized in John TRUMBULL's M'Fingal (1776) as “the summit of newspaper wit”; however, Sewall's opponents acknowledged that he was the most dangerous apologist for the Crown in Massachusetts. In September 1774 a mob wrecked Sewall's Cambridge home while he was away; his wife, Esther Quincy Sewall, gave them the contents of the wine cellar to keep them from taking everything else. Sewall, his wife, and their two sons then fled to the safety of British-occupied Boston. In 1775 when the British evacuated Boston, the Sewalls went to England. Sewall's estate was confiscated in 1779, and he was named in the new state's Bill of Attainder, which banished several prominent LOYALISTS, declaring them traitors. He suffered a breakdown while in England, locking himself in his room for almost eighteen months. In 1788 the Sewalls immigrated to St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, where Jonathan Sewall lived as a semirecluse until his death on September 27, 1796.

Work

Sewall, Jonathan. A Cure for the Spleen; or, Amusement for a Winter's Evening; Being the Substance of a Conversation on the Times over a Friendly Tankard and Pipe. Taken in Short Hand by Sir Roger de Coverly. Boston, 1775; Early American Imprints, 14454.

Sources

Berkin, Carol. Jonathan Sewall: Odyssey of an American Loyalist. New York: Columbia University Press, 1974.
 Raphael, Ray. The First American Revolution: Before Lexington and Concord. New York: New Press, 2002.

Sewall, Samuel (1652–1730) diarist

January 6, 1696, . . . Three courts sit tomorrow. . . . I had hoped that seeing God pardoned all Israel's iniquities, He would pardon mine, as being part of Israel.

—The Diary of Samuel Sewall, 1674–1729
 (1878–1882)

Judge Samuel Sewall was born at Bishop Stoke, Hampshire, England, on March 28, 1652. His family settled in Massachusetts when Samuel was nine years old, and at fifteen he was a student at HARVARD. After graduation in 1671, Sewall became a fellow of the college and began his famous diary. In 1675 he married Hannah Hull, daughter of the wealthy merchant John Hull, and joined his father-in-law in business. Samuel had thirteen children with Hannah; she died in 1717. Sewall married Abigail Tilley in October 1719. Following Abigail's death, he married his third wife, Mary Gibbs, in 1722.

Samuel Sewall is best known for his diary, published from 1878 to 1882 as The Diary of Samuel Sewall, 1674–1729. The diary has little stylistic merit, and most of the entries are extremely brief, though on the topic of his courtships he wrote more extensively, especially about his unsuccessful wooing of Katherine Winthrop. The diary reveals much about life in Massachusetts during that colony's transition from a religious experiment to a thriving community, from a Puritan to a more secular Yankee culture. It is not, like many Puritan diaries, a record of a spiritual journey. Instead, it reflects the life of a prosperous and active merchant, banker, landowner, councilman, and judge. It is also filled with news of the day: the death of major local figures, important political elections or legislative and judicial decisions, business dealings, and social events.

Portrait of Samuel Sewall by John Smibert, 1729

Sewall's The Selling of Joseph (1700), the first antislavery tract published in New England, is a major work. In it Sewall mused, "All things considered, it would conduce more to the Welfare of the Province, to have White Servants for a Term of Years, than to have Slaves for Life. Few can endure to hear of a Negro's being made free; and indeed they can seldom use their freedom well; yet their continual aspiring after their forbidden, renders them Unwilling Servants." Sewall insisted that free men could not be made property; that slavery was not necessary for the colonial economy; and that there was no special curse on Africans that permitted their enslavement.

1692. Aug. 19th 1792. This day the Gent Govr
 Major Philips, Mr. Rufel, Capt. Lynde
 & my self went to Watertown. Advise ye inhabitants at yr Town-meeting to settle a minister; and if could not otherwise agree, shoud first have a Town-meeting to decide where ye Meetinghouse shoud be set: many say Whitney's Hill woud be a convenient place.

This day George Burrough, John
 Dolefull, William, Jr Procter, Martha Carrier &
 Witchcraft George Jacobs were executed at Salem a very great number of Spectators being present. Mr. Cotton Mather was there, Mr. Sims, Hale, Noyes, Chievers
 &c. All of y<sup>e</sup> said they were innocent, Carrier & all. Mr. Mather says they all died by a Righteous Sentence. Mr. Burrough by his Speech, Prayer protestation of his Innocence, did much move unthinking persons, wth occasions y<sup>e</sup> speaking loudly concerning his being executed.

Aug<sup>t</sup> 25. Fast at ye old Church respecting ye Witchcraft, Drought &c.

Aug<sup>t</sup> 27. abt 4 y<sup>e</sup> m<sup>o</sup> Cous. Tiffender comes in & tells ye sad News of Simon Gates being dead of ye ~~Small~~ Fever died yesterday & is buried to day. I heard not a word of it, & so neither saw him sick; nor was at his Burial.

Page from Sewall's diary. The entry for August 19, 1692, records the executions of persons convicted in the Salem Witchcraft Trials, for which Sewall was a judge.

He rejected both the slaveholders' defense that the curse of Noah's son Ham condemned Africans to enslavement and that exposure to Christianity was beneficial to blacks even as slaves. Slavery was "atrocious" and criminal, he wrote, and it corrupted the entire society in which it existed. Sewall also tried his hand at poetry, some of which he preserved in the diary. His verse, though witty, does not enhance his literary reputation.

Sewall entered politics in the 1680s, serving as a member of the provincial council between 1784 and 1786. In 1692 he accepted a fateful appointment as one of nine justices on a special court to try the women and men accused of witchcraft in Salem Village. Four years later, Sewall had serious misgivings about the execution of nineteen people and the incarceration of over one hundred more. He publicly acknowledged his responsibility for this tragedy. He continued to serve in the judiciary following the witchcraft trials, eventually becoming chief justice of the Superior Court, a position he held until 1728. Sewall died in his Boston home on January 1, 1730.

Works

Sewall, Samuel. The Selling of Joseph; a Memorial. Boston: Printed by Bartholomew Green and John Allen, 1700; Early American Imprints, 951. Edited by Sidney Kaplan. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1969.

Sewall. The Diary and Life of Samuel Sewall, 1674–1729. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society Collections, 1878–1882, edited by Milton Halsey Thomas. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1973.

Sources

Graham, Judith S. Puritan Family Life: the Diary of Samuel Sewall. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2000.

Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. Samuel Sewall of Boston. New York: Macmillan, 1964.

Recommended Writings

The Diary and Life of Samuel Sewall (1674–1729; published 1878–1882)

The Selling of Joseph (1700)

Studying Samuel Sewall

Samuel Sewall was a judge, merchant, and colonial magistrate who, from 1674 to 1729, kept one of the most detailed diaries of colonial America. Biographical sources that students might consult include Ola Elizabeth Winslow's Samuel Sewall of Boston (New York: Macmillan, 1964) and T. Benson Strandness's Samuel Sewall; A Puritan Portrait (East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1967). For studies of Sewall's diary and for historical context of seventeenth-century Boston, see Harvey Wish's introduction to The Diary of Samuel Sewall, abridged and edited by Wish (New York: Putnam, 1967); Nathan Henry Chamberlain's Samuel Sewall and the World He Lived In (New York: Russell & Russell, 1967); Steven E. Kagle's American Diary Literature, 1620–1799 (Boston: Twayne, 1979); Judith S. Graham's Puritan Family Life: The Diary of Samuel Sewall (Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2000).

For general sources about colonial Boston and NEW ENGLAND, see Charles Lloyd Cohen's God's Caress: The Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986); David D. Hall's Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgment: Popular Religious Belief in Early New England (New York: Knopf, 1989); Francis J. Bremer's Puritanism: Transatlantic Perspectives on a Seventeenth-Century Anglo-American Faith (Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1993); Bremer's Shaping

New Englands: Puritan Clergymen in Seventeenth-Century England and New England (New York: Twayne, 1994); Cedric B. Cowing's The Saving Remnant: Religion and the Settling of New England (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995); and Laura Lunger Knoppers's Puritanism and Its Discontents (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2003).

For an examination of Sewall's role as a judge in the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS and his subsequent apology, see Lawrence W. Towner's "The Sewall-Saffin Dialogue on Slavery" (William and Mary Quarterly, 21 [1964]: 40–52); David S. Lovejoy's "Between Hell and Plum Island: Samuel Sewall and the Legacy of the Witches, 1692–97" (The New England Quarterly, 70 [1997]: 355–368); and Richard Francis's Judge Sewall's Apology: The Salem Witch Trials and the Forming of an American Conscience (New York: Fourth Estate, 2005).

For archival work, see the Samuel Sewall Papers (1672–1815), which are housed at the MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY; for detailed information, see the finding aid (<<http://www.masshist.org/findingaids/doc.cfm?fa=fa0242>> viewed May 2, 2007). For electronic sources on Samuel Sewall and his antislavery tract The Selling of Joseph, students should consult "Samuel Sewall Speaks Out" (<<http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/aia/part1/1p271.html>> viewed May 2, 2007).

Shays's Rebellion (1786–1787)

Instigated by foreclosures and economic hardships following the Revolutionary War, Daniel Shays (1747?–1825), farmer and veteran captain of the Continental army, along with fellow veteran Luke Day, organized and led a group of farmers from Massachusetts in protest against these conditions. To offset the tremendous war debt, the state had raised taxes and imposed deflationary currency policies. In September 1786, Shays's group forced the release of 1,100 farmers from the county of Hampshire, Massachusetts, who, unable to pay the higher taxes, had been sent to debtors' prison. They also held conventions at which they stated their complaints and concerns, namely: "The present expensive mode of collecting debts"; the use of tax proceeds "to discharge the interest of government securities"; the suspension of habeas corpus; the unlimited power to local police officers granted by the Riot Act. The rebellion ultimately rallied more than four thousand like-minded PATRIOTS, whose fierce battles and strong convictions influenced policy so that the ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION were reconsidered. Shays's Rebellion elicited a range of literary responses, from sympathetic references in Royall TYLER's THE CONTRAST to a mock-heroic epic The Anarchiad: A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Substantial Night (1786–1787) from the CONNECTICUT WITS that was directed against Daniel Shays and the general political unrest that followed the war. David HUMPHREYS's poem, "The Monkey Who Shaved Himself and His Friends.

A Fable" (1787) also criticized the rebellion; it reads in part: "Who cannot write, yet handle pens, / Are apt to hurt themselves and friends. / Though others use them well, yet fools / Should never meddle with edge tools." More-supportive works include Isaac BACKUS's "An address to the Inhabitants of New-England, Concerning the Present Bloody Controversy therein" (1787) and George Richards Minot's (1758–1802) The History of the Insurrections, in Massachusetts, in the Year 1786 and the Rebellion Consequent Thereon (1788).

Sources

- Gross, Robert A. In Debt to Shays: The Bicentennial of an Agrarian Rebellion. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993.
- Richard, Leonard L. Shays's Rebellion: The American Revolution's Final Battle. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.

Shepard, Thomas (1605–1649) minister, diarist

Thomas Shepard was born in Towcester, England on November 5, 1605, the day of the Gunpowder Plot (an attempt by Catholic extremists to blow up the Houses of Parliament and assassinate King James I). The son of a grocer's daughter and a grocer's apprentice, Shepard was shuffled from relative to relative from the age of three and was orphaned by age ten. Despite this unsettled childhood, Shepard managed to graduate on scholarship from Emmanuel College, Cambridge, receiving his B.A. in 1623/1624 and his M.A. in 1627. He was ordained a priest in the Church of England, but in 1630 he was silenced for nonconformity by Archbishop William Laud (1573–1645). Unable to preach, Shepard took a post as a tutor and personal chaplain for the family of Sir Richard Darley. He met his wife, Margaret Tauteville, at the Darley estate, and together the two immigrated to Boston in 1634, arriving in 1635. Thomas married twice more after Margaret's death in 1637—Joanna Hooker in 1637 and Margaret Boradel in 1647. Shepard had three sons who survived infancy.

Shepard was called to the pulpit of the church at Newtowne (later Cambridge), Massachusetts, and he played a major role in shaping New England CONGREGATIONALISM. He was a champion of orthodoxy, heading the synod that condemned Anne HUTCHINSON as a religious heretic, and helping to draft the Cambridge Platform in 1649, a document that provided spiritual guidelines and rules of church discipline for all Massachusetts Congregational Churches. Although he was an unimposing figure and was often in poor health, his quiet appeal to the congregation to seek salvation was highly effective. He was, a contemporary declared, a "soul-ravishing" preacher, and Cotton MATHER later called him "Pastor Evangelicus." The colony demonstrated its appreciation and respect for Shepard by locating their new college, HARVARD, in his community.

In his own day, Shepard's sermons were widely read by other ministers who appreciated his lively style. Shepard emphasized Christ's love of humanity, although he occasionally described the horrible fate that awaited sinners, especially hypocrites. His modern reputation, however, is based on his journal, published as Three Valuable Pieces. Viz; Select Cases Resolved; First Principles of the Oracles of God . . . and a Private Diary (1747); and on his autobiography, published long after his death in 1647 as The Autobiography of Thomas Shepard, the Celebrated Minister of Cambridge, N.E. (1832). The journal and the autobiography are concerned with the central issue in a Puritan life: How can I know I am saved? Shepard traces the odyssey of his conversion, declaring that the challenges presented by external fears—of Native Americans, for example—and by internal dangers such as religious heresies, provided opportunities for him to realize that God would deliver him.

Works

- Shepard, Thomas. Three Valuable Pieces. Viz; Select Cases Resolved; First Principles of the Oracles of God . . . and a Private Diary. Boston: Rogers & Fowle, 1747; Early American Imprints, 6067.
- Shepard. The Autobiography of Thomas Shepard, the Celebrated Minister of Cambridge, N.E. Boston: Pierce & Parker, 1832; Boston: Colonial Society of Massachusetts, 1932.

Sources

- Gordis, Lisa M. Opening Scripture: Bible Reading and Interpretive Authority in Puritan New England. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Holifield, E. Brooks. Theology In America: Christian Thought From The Age Of The Puritans to the Civil War. New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003.
- Werge, Thomas. Thomas Shepard. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Slave Narrative

A slave narrative is an autobiographical account of being enslaved. The phrase "written by himself" or "written by herself" often appears on the front cover to signify authenticity, although accounts were often dictated to others and written in the third person. Narratives were recorded after a slave had achieved freedom, either by manumission (formal freedom, granted by the owner or purchased by the slave), or by escape. Published in newspapers or as books, PAMPHLETS, or broadsides, slave narratives usually testified against the slave's captors and included detailed accounts of cruelty and inhumane treatment. Slave narratives were an important political tool of the abolition movement.

Slave narratives are not always reliable. One of the first printed narratives, Olaudah EQUIANO's The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano (1789), describes how he and his sister were kidnapped when he was only eleven years old and sold into slavery. In one passage, Equiano recalls the horrors of the slave ship:

The closeness of the place, and the heat of the climate, added to the number in the ship, which was so crowded that each had scarcely room to turn himself, almost suffocated us. This produced copious perspirations, so that the air soon became unfit for respiration, from a variety of loathsome smells, and brought on a sickness among the slaves, of which many died, thus falling victims to the improvident avarice, as I may call it, of their purchasers. This wretched situation was again aggravated by the galling of the chains, now become insupportable; and the filth of the necessary tubs, into which the children often fell, and were almost suffocated. The shrieks of the women, and the groans of the dying, rendered the whole a scene of horror almost inconceivable.

Recent scholarship has suggested that Equiano was born in South Carolina and fictionalized his passage to America.

Other well-known eighteenth-century slave narratives include James Albert Ukawsaw Gronniosaw's (1712–1775) A Narrative of the Most Remarkable Particulars in the Life of James Albert Ukawsaw Gronniosaw, an African Prince (1770); Ignatius Sancho's (1729–1780) Letters of the Late Ignatius Sancho, An African. In Two Volumes. To Which Are Prefixed, Memoirs of His Life (1782); and Ottobah Cugoano's (b. 1757?) "Narrative of the Enslavement of Ottobah Cugoano, a Native of Africa; Published by Himself on the Year 1787."

Works

Cugoano, Ottobah. Narrative of the Enslavement of Ottobah Cugoano, a Native of Africa; Published by Himself on the Year 1787. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Academic Affairs Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, 1999: <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/cugoano/menu.html>> (viewed May 9, 2007).

Equiano, Olaudah. The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself, 2 volumes. London: Printed and sold by the author, 1789; Early American Imprints, 23353; edited by Werner Sollors, New York: Norton, 2001.

Gronniosaw, James Albert Ukawsaw. A Narrative of the Most Remarkable Particulars in the Life of James Albert Ukawsaw Gronniosaw, an African Prince, As Related by Himself. Bath: Printed and sold by S. Hazard, 1770; Chapel Hill, N.C.: Academic Affairs Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, 2001: <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/gronniosaw/menu.html>> (viewed May 9, 2007).

Hammon, Briton. A Narrative of the Uncommon Sufferings, and Surprising Deliverance of Briton Hammon, a Negro Man. . . . Boston: Printed and sold by Green & Russell, in Queen-Street, 1760; Chapel Hill, N.C.: Academic Affairs Library, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, 2001: <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/hammon/menu.html>> (viewed May 9, 2007).

Marrant, John. A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant A Black. . . . London: Printed by Gilbert & Plummer, 1785; New York: Garland, 1978.

Sources

Andrews, William L., ed. Documenting the American South: North American Slave Narratives: <<http://docsouth.unc.edu/neh/chronautobio.html>> (viewed May 2, 2007).

Andrews. To Tell a Free Story: The First Century of Afro-American Autobiography, 1760–1865. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Andrews, ed. Classic African American Women's Narratives. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Born in Slavery: Slave Narratives from the Federal Writers Project, 1936–1938. Library of Congress: <<http://rs6.loc.gov/ammem/snhtml/snhome.html>> (viewed May 2, 2007).

Carretta, Vincent, and Philip Gould, eds. Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Black Atlantic. Lexington: The University Press of Kentucky, 2001.

Davis, Charles T., and Henry Louis Gates Jr., eds. The Slave's Narrative. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Gates, ed. The Classic Slave Narratives. New York: New American Library, 1987.

Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture: <<http://www.nypl.org/research/sc/sc.html>> (viewed May 2, 2007).

Recommended Writings

Hammon, Briton. A Narrative of the Uncommon Sufferings, and Surprising Deliverance of Briton Hammon. . . . (1760)

Gronniosaw, James Albert Ukawsaw. A Narrative of the Most Remarkable Particulars in the Life of James Albert Ukawsaw Gronniosaw, an African Prince. . . . (1770)

Marrant, John. A Narrative of the Lord's Wonderful Dealings with John Marrant. . . . (1785)

Cugoano, Ottobah. Narrative of the Enslavement of Ottobah Cugoano. . . . (1787)

Equiano, Olaudah. The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano. . . . (1789)

Studying Early American Slave Narratives

To begin a study of the slave narrative in early America, students should consult William L. Andrews's To Tell a Free Story: The First Century of Afro-American Autobiography, 1760–1865 (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986); Marion Wilson Starling's The Slave Narrative: Its Place in American History (Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1988); James Tackach's Slave Narratives (San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2001); and Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Spencer R. Crew's Unchained Memories: Readings from the Slave Narratives (Boston, Mass.: Bulfinch, 2003).

For critical studies of slave narratives in early America, see Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Black Atlantic, edited by Vincent Carretta and Philip Gould (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001); Carver Wendell Waters's Voice in the Slave Narratives of Olaudah Equiano, Frederick Douglass, and Solomon Northrup (Lewiston: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002); Joanna Brooks and John Saillant's "Face Zion Forward": First Writers of the Black Atlantic, 1785–1798 (Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2002); Audrey A. Fisch's The Cambridge Companion to the African American Slave Narrative (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007). For a study of individual authors, see for Olaudah EQUIANO: Carretta's Equiano, the African: Biography of a Self-Made Man (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2005). For Ottobah Cugoana, see Helena Woodard's African-British Writings in the Eighteenth Century: The Politics of Race and Reason (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999). For studies of early American literature that include discussions of slave narratives, see Dana D. Nelson's The Word in Black and White: Reading "Race" in American Literature, 1638–1867 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992); Klaus H. Schmidt and Fritz Fleischmann's Early America Re-Explored: New Readings in Colonial, Early National, and Antebellum Culture (New York: Peter Lang, 2000); Gesa Mackenthun's Fictions of the Black Atlantic in American Foundational Literature (London: Routledge, 2004); and Sharon M. Harris's Executing Race: Early American Women's Narratives of Race, Society, and the Law (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2005).

Websites that provide primary sources for slave narratives include the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill's North American Slave Narratives: Documenting the American South (<<http://docsouth.unc.edu>> viewed May 2, 2007); The Gilder Lehrman Center for the Study of Slavery, Resistance and Abolition (<<http://www.yale.edu/glc>> viewed May 2, 2007); the Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture (<<http://www.nypl.org/research/sc/sc.html>> viewed May 2, 2007); and African American Women On-Line Archival Collections (<<http://scriptorium.lib.duke.edu/collections/african-american-women.html>> viewed May 2, 2007).

Smith, John (circa 1580–1631) travel writer, historian

Heer nature and liberty affords us that freely, which in England we want, or it costeth us dearely. . .

—Description of New England (1616)

Adventurer and mercenary John Smith was born in England around 1580, the son of George and Ann Smith. He apprenticed to Thomas Sendall, a merchant, and following his father's death in 1596 he inherited enough wealth to establish his independence. He served a four-year term as a soldier in the wars against France, and after a brief rest in England he returned to the continent. Smith is noted for his expert navigation, his observations on early life in the colonies, and his crafted, embellished writings.

Engraving of John Smith in 1616 at age thirty-seven

Smith joined the Austrian army in Hungary against the Ottoman Turks. His promotions to captain and major attest to his abilities as a soldier. As told by Smith in his writings, however, this adventure assumes mythical proportions. It also remains squarely within the formulaic framework of his other experiences. En route to Turkey, Smith claims that he was thrown overboard by a group of Catholic pilgrims to quiet the angry gods. As is the case with each of his adventures, this story is a blend of fact and fiction. Smith might have been swept overboard, or he might have abused his company with his anti-Catholic sentiments to the point that they jettisoned him. In any case, he found himself on a deserted island. Smith joined forces with his rescuer, a French merchant, and the two slashed and pirated their way around the Mediterranean, filling both of their purses with gold. This is the second element of Smith's relations: Smith the successful if somewhat unconventional entrepreneur. He made his way to Hungary and achieved his initial goal, to support the Christian army of Archduke Ferdinand of Austria against the Ottoman Turks, outsmarting and outfighting both the enemy and his allies. Smith's prowess as a soldier, one of the main themes of his published adventures, apparently was matched only by his abilities as a lover. In yet another battle, Smith was taken prisoner and sold into slavery. He claimed that his mistress was so taken with his beauty that she helped him escape.

Engraved title page from the work in which John Smith describes how Pocahontas saved his life

The same formula appears in Smith's history of Virginia. In 1605 he joined the expedition to establish a plantation in Virginia and in so doing filled a number of roles. He was an experienced adventurer and explorer and a successful military officer. During the early phase of settlement, Smith scouted the countryside and negotiated with the Indians, at times intimidating them to secure food. Smith published his version of the experience, A True Relation of Such Occurrences and Accidents of Noate . . . in Virginia in London that same year.

As told by Smith, he was captured while outnumbered, but only after he had single-handedly killed many of his captives. Taken to the capital village of Powhatan, the chief warlord of the region, he was condemned to die but was saved from beheading by the chief's favorite daughter, Pocahontas, who was taken by his beauty and nobility. A different interpretation of the story would depict Smith as either a captive or guest of Powhatan, undergoing an adoption ceremony, in which he experienced a ceremonial death in order to be reborn as a member of Powhatan's group. Pocahontas, who had acted as her father's emissary, was his sponsor.

In spite of the boasting, Smith's record of the early days of settlement in Virginia offers important historical information, including insights into the personal and factional infighting among the settlers and the leaders. Smith returned to England in 1609. An advocate of further exploration and settlement, he published an important geographical treatise, A Map of Virginia, with a Description of the Countrey, the Commodities, People . . . (1612).

Smith never returned to Virginia, but he continued to explore America, mapping the coastline of New England in 1614. A second expedition ended in failure. In 1616 he published his findings in A DESCRIPTION OF NEW ENGLAND. Smith's career as an adventurer came to an end, but he continued to write, editing the THE GENERALL HISTORIES OF VIRGINIA, NEW-ENGLAND, AND THE SUMMER ISLES, a history of British settlement to date that included his earlier writings along with writings borrowed from other authors. Composed as six books, the Generall Histories included maps, an engraving of Pocahontas, and poems. In 1626 Smith published a guide for seamen, An Accidence or the Path-way to Experience, that blended practical information with Smith's tales of personal adventure and heroism. Finally, in 1630, the year before his death, he published a history of all his experiences, including his earliest adventures in Europe, The True Travels, Adventures, and Observations of Captaine John Smith.

Works

- Smith, John, and others. The Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles. . . London: Printed by I.D. and I.H. for Michael Sparkes, 1624; Murfreesboro, N.C.: Johnson, 1970?
- Smith. The True Travels, Adventures, and Observations of Captaine John Smith, in Europe, Asia, Affrica, and America, from Anno Domini 1593. to 1629. . . London: Printed by J.H. for Thomas Slater, 1630. Edited by John Gould Fletcher. New York: Rimington & Hooper, 1930.
- Smith. The Complete Works of Captain John Smith (1580–1631), 3 volumes, edited by Philip L. Barbour. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
- Smith. Captain John Smith: A Select Edition of His Writings, edited by Karen Ordahl Kupperman. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.

Sources

- Hayes, Kevin J. Captain John Smith: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991.
- Lemay, J. A. Leo. The American Dream of Captain John Smith. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1991.
- Vaughan, Alden T. American Genesis: Captain John Smith and the Founding of Virginia. Boston: Little, Brown, 1975.

Recommended Writings

- The Generall Historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles* (1624)
- The True Travels, Adventures, and Observations of Captaine John Smith, in Europe, Asia, Affrica, and America, from Anno Domini 1593 to 1629. . . .* (1630)

Studying John Smith

John Smith was an adventurer who founded JAMESTOWN and wrote extensively on the potentials of the Virginia colony. To date, there are over three hundred biographies of John Smith and over two thousand books on the history of the Virginia colony. For an introduction to John Smith, students should consult Philip L. Barbour's introduction to the definitive edition of Smith's writings, The Complete Works of Captain John Smith (1580–1631) (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986). Recent biographies and treatments of Smith's life include J. A. Leo Lemay's The American Dream of Captain John Smith (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1991) and John M. Thompson's The Journals of Captain John Smith: A Jamestown Biography (Washington, D.C.: National Geographic Society, 2007). Notable earlier biographies include A. G. Bradley's Captain John Smith (London: Macmillan, 1905); Bradford Smith's Captain John Smith, His Life & Legend (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1953); Philip L. Barbour's The Three Worlds of Captain John Smith (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1964); Paul Lewis's The Great Rogue; A Biography of Captain John Smith (New York: McKay, 1966); Everett H. Emerson's Captain John Smith (New York: Twayne, 1971); and Alden T. Vaughan's American Genesis: Captain John Smith and the Founding of Virginia (Boston: Little, Brown, 1975).

Students interested in research on the founding of Jamestown should consult Vaughan's American Genesis; Karen Ordahl Kupperman's Roanoke: The Abandoned Colony (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2007). For studies on Smith and Pocahontas, see Lemay's Did Pocahontas Save Captain John Smith? (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992) and David Price's Love and Hate in Jamestown: John Smith, Pocahontas, and the Heart of a New Nation (New York: Knopf, 2003).

A definitive print reference to consult is Kevin J. Hayes's Captain John Smith: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991). Of the many electronic resources available on John Smith and Jamestown, some starting points are: Cultural Readings, from the University of Pennsylvania, which includes Smith's map of the Chesapeake region (<http://www.library.upenn.edu/special/gallery/kislak/promotion/ jsmithvimap.html> viewed May 2, 2007). Jamestown Rediscovery is devoted to an archeological project with "lists of early settlers, a map, a timeline of early colonial history, and biographical information on John Smith and others" (<<http://www.apva.org/jr.html>> viewed May 2, 2007). Virtual Jamestown is another helpful site with particular emphasis on Smith's experiences in Jamestown (<<http://www.iath.virginia.edu/vcdh/jamestown/jsmith.html>> viewed May 3, 2007).

Smith, William (1727–1803) educator, theologian, poet, historian

William Smith wrote on many subjects, including education and history. While he devoted much of his time to the College of Philadelphia and to Pennsylvania politics, Smith was also active in the ANGLICAN CHURCH in America. He served as the rector of Trinity Church in Oxford Township, Philadelphia County, from 1766 to 1777. He maintained close connections with the leadership of the Anglican Church in London, especially the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG).

Smith was born in Scotland in 1727, the son of Thomas Smith and Elizabeth Duncan Smith. In his youth he was educated at the Society for the Education of Parochial Schoolmasters. In 1743 he entered the University of Aberdeen. He departed the university in 1747, but whether or not he completed his degree is unclear. In 1751 Smith left his position as a schoolmaster and immigrated to New York as a tutor for the Martin family of Long Island. He remained with the Martins for the next two years.

Smith became embroiled in the debate over King's College (later renamed Columbia University). He supported the establishment of a college but insisted that it should be Anglican. Smith exercised his views in an anonymous pamphlet, Some Thoughts on Education (1752). He followed this work in 1753 with a second treatise, A General Idea of the College of Mirania. Taken together, Smith's proposals argued in favor of a modern education, divided into two specific curricula. The first, intended for young men preparing for professional careers, offered a liberal education, including history, religion, and language. The second, aimed at mechanics, stressed practical subjects. Smith also had an idealistic vision of the American college—that it would serve as a haven for English culture, offering a safe harbor "When by the sad Vicissitude of Things—The Old had sunk back to its pristine Sloth."

Smith's proposals caught the interest of Benjamin FRANKLIN, a founder and trustee of the Academy of Philadelphia (predecessor to the College of Philadelphia). Encouraged by Franklin and the other trustees, Smith paid a visit to the Academy, recording his impressions in A Poem on Visiting the Academy of Philadelphia, June 1753 (1753). After his visit Smith was hired as an instructor. He delayed his start long enough to return to England, where he was ordained as a priest in the Anglican Church. Returning to Philadelphia in 1754, he became an important member of the Academy's faculty. Under his direction, the Academy was restructured as the College of Philadelphia, with Smith as the first provost.

As a highly visible educator, Smith extended his influence well beyond the walls of the college. A major influence on the city's cultural life, his intellectual circle included Benjamin West (1738–1820), the first major American artist; Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON; Thomas Godfrey (1736–1763); and Francis HOPKINSON. Smith was also active in colonial politics. Although he was a public advocate of proprietary government, he was also an ardent critic of the government's reluctance to support actively the military campaign during the French and Indian War (1754–1763), outlining his position in A Brief State of the Province of Pennsylvania (1755). Smith's PAMPHLET isolated non-English settlers as scapegoats and demanded that all members of the Assembly be required to take an oath of allegiance to the king. It also suggested banning all foreign-language newspapers and suspending suffrage for German settlers until they were fully Anglicized. The nativism inherent in Smith's plan prompted a flurry of angry responses. Smith responded to these in A Brief View of the Conduct of Pennsylvania in 1755 (1756).

In 1757 Smith established his own political organ, The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle, with William Bradford as publisher. Although it was blatantly LOYALIST in its editorial policy, The American Magazine was also a forum for the literati of Philadelphia, including Hopkinson and Godfrey. Early in 1758 Smith was arrested and charged with seditious libel against the Pennsylvania assembly. The magazine folded and several months later Smith was released from jail; however, he was arrested a second time in September. That same year he married Hannah Moore; the couple had seven children. In December, Smith sailed to England to pursue an appeal and arrived to a hero's welcome. On the recommendation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Oxford University awarded him a degree as a doctor of divinity. The Crown exploited a legal technicality to dismiss the case, and Smith sailed for Philadelphia in 1759.

Back in Philadelphia, Smith resumed his academic interests and remained an ardent Anglophile. In 1762 he returned to England, where he spent the next two years raising funds for the College of Philadelphia. In 1765 he published a history celebratory of the English victory in the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, An Historical Account of the Expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764. Smith opposed the STAMP ACT on legal grounds, but he rejected rebellion against the mother country. He was torn between his love of England and his vision of America, as evidenced in his Sermon on the Present Situation of American Affairs (1775), in which he admits to the validity of the American protests but hopes for some form of reconciliation.

Smith's quasi loyalism came at a cost. In 1779 he was removed as provost of the College of Philadelphia. He accepted a parish posting in Maryland and a position as president of Washington College in Chestertown. In 1783 he was appointed bishop of Maryland. In 1789 Smith succeeded in securing reappointment as provost of the College of Philadelphia, but his success was short-lived. He was ousted in 1791 when the college became part of the newly established University of Pennsylvania.

Works

Smith, William. An Historical Expedition against the Ohio Indians. Philadelphia: Printed by William Bradford, 1765; Ann Arbor: University Microfilms, 1966.

Smith. "Account of the College, Academy, and Charitable School of Philadelphia in Pennsylvania," in The Works of William Smith. Philadelphia: Hugh Maxwell & William Fry, 1803; Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Library, 1951; Early American Imprints, 11863.

Sources

Adams, Thomas Randolph. Trial of the Writings of William Smith, First Provost of the University of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Library, 1950.

Fletcher, Charlotte Goldsborough. Cato's Mirania: A Life of Provost Smith. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2002.

Gegenheimer, Albert Frank. William Smith, Educator and Churchman, 1727–1803. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943.

Smith, Horace Wemyss. Life and Correspondence of the Rev. William Smith, D.D. . . . With Copious Extracts from his Writings, 2 volumes. Philadelphia: S. A. George, 1879, 1880; New York: Arno, 1972.

Spiritual Autobiography

A spiritual autobiography is a first-person account of a religious or spiritual journey that culminates with a conversion to a state of divine grace. The various stages of temptation and struggle leading to the conversion are often related dramatically, conveying realism and creating empathy for an audience who may be experiencing similar trials and seeking guidance and inspiration. Owen C. Watkins observes that spiritual autobiographies "were not written because the writers thought their lives were 'exemplary ones.' . . . [T]hey hoped through the record of their own experience to offer experimental proof of some of the eternal truths of Christianity." Charles Lloyd Cohen explains that the conversion itself "begins with the soul's initial conviction of sin, an event that usually took place before an individual reached twenty-five."

Puritan leader Jonathan EDWARDS, in what was later called his Personal Narrative, traced his first "awakening" in his father's congregation as a young boy, followed by "sinful" episodes, until eventually, his doubts were overcome. Written around 1739 and initially included in a 1740 letter to his future son-in-law Aaron Burr, Edwards's account follows the typical pattern of a spiritual autobiography, as he relates an increasing acceptance of divine guidance: "The sense I had of divine things, would often of a sudden as it were, kindle up a sweet burning in my heart; an ardor of my soul, that I know not how to express."

For QUAKERS, a spiritual autobiography was meant to be disclosed posthumously. Following a similar pattern of trials and spiritual awakenings, the Quaker text often includes dreams and other intuitive communication that guides the seeker. In John WOOLMAN's 1774 journal, he relates a dream that occurred when he was nine years old. He was watching a moonrise, when a cloud "lighted on a pleasant green . . . and was immediately turned into a tree." The sun rose, but unfortunately its great heat "wrought so powerfully on the little green tree that the leaves gradually withered; and before noon it appeared dry and dead." Though Woolman offers no further explanation, the dream sequence reveals his sensitivity to images and symbols. As Woolman pursues his spiritual quest, he experiences many struggles: "Now though I had been thus straightened to bear the cross, I still found myself in great danger, having many weaknesses attending me and strong temptations to wrestle with." Woolman, like Edwards, reveals the fluctuating patterns of a spiritual quest.

Another Quaker, Elizabeth ASHBRIDGE, began her 1740s spiritual autobiography with a confession, explaining: "most earnestly I desire that whosoever reads the following lines, may take warning and shun the Evils that I have thro' the Deceitfulness of Satan been drawn into." Throughout the narrative Ashbridge demonstrates her earnest intentions and testifies to the wisdom of divine guidance. As these texts suggest, spiritual autobiographies often reflect the biblical experience of Job, who struggled with trials until he at last surrendered to divine will. Other early American PERSONAL NARRATIVES, such as the CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE and the SLAVE NARRATIVE, follow a similar pattern: each tells of an individual's struggles from a state of restriction to a state of release. In this regard the spiritual autobiography provides a template for other first-person narratives.

Sources

- Caldwell, Patricia. The Puritan Conversion Narrative: The Beginnings of American Expansion. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Cohen, Charles Lloyd. God's Caress: The Psychology of Puritan Religious Experience. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Shea, Daniel B., Jr. Introduction to Some Account of the Fore Part of the Life of Elizabeth Ashbridge. Journeys in New Worlds: Early American Women's Narratives, edited by William L. Andrews. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1990, 119–146.

Shea. Spiritual Autobiography in Early America. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1968.

Watkins, Owen C. The Puritan Experience: Studies in Spiritual Autobiography. New York: Schocken, 1972.

Stamp Act & Non-Importation Agreements

The Stamp Act, passed by the British Parliament on March 22, 1765, to be implemented on November 1, 1765, required an official stamp on legal and commercial agreements to make them legally binding and thus imposed taxes on all ships' papers, licenses, bills of lading, indentures, newspapers, books, dice, and playing cards. In 1763 George Greenville, first lord of the treasury, prompted by staggering debt from the Seven Years' War (see FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, 1754–1763), initiated legislation for the Stamp Act with the stated intention "towards defraying the expences of defending, protecting, and securing, the British colonies and plantations in America." When the Stamp Act was passed two years later, revenue was obtained by requiring that a stamp designating the value of a document be purchased from an official distributor. Otherwise, the document would be considered illegal. The imposition of taxes met with immediate protest from prominent pamphleteers and newspaper journalists, especially since payment was required in the form of gold or silver, commodities that colonists held in limited supply. On August 14, 1765, a group of shopkeepers and artisans who called themselves The Loyal Nine, later known as the Sons of Liberty, hung an effigy of Andrew Oliver (1706–1774), soon to be commissioned as distributor of stamps for Massachusetts. The Stamp Act was repealed in March 1766. Additional sanctions against the colonists included the Townshend Revenue Acts of June 1767, which imposed taxes on paper, tea, glass, lead, and paints. In response to this repeated taxation by the British—the Sugar Act of 1764, the Stamp Act of 1765, and the Tea Act of 1773—American colonists protested, beginning in 1768, with a series of non-importation agreements. Passed on August 1, 1768, the Boston Non-Importation Agreement was one of several embargo acts to protest British taxation. In 1774 The Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress stated, "We have suspended our importation from Great Britain and Ireland; and in less than a year's time, unless our grievances should be redressed, shall discontinue our exports to those kingdoms and the West Indies." These acts agitated the growing unrest and dissatisfaction with British rule in the American colonies.

Sources

- Morgan, Edmund Sears, and Helen M. Morgan. The Stamp Act Crisis: Prologue to Revolution. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1953.
- Thomas, Peter David Garner. British Politics and the Stamp Act Crisis: The First Phase of the American Revolution, 1763–1767. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1975.

Steendam, Jacob (circa 1615–circa 1673) poet

Little is known about the life of poet Jacob Steendam. He was born in a small Dutch town, probably in 1615. Around 1637 he moved to Amsterdam and began a career with the Dutch West India Company. While working for this major trading monopoly, he traveled to the coast of Guinea, remaining in Africa for almost a decade. When he returned to Holland in 1649, he married Sara de Rosschou; he also published his first collection of poems, The Goldfinch (1649–1650). In 1650 Steendam left the company's employ and eventually made his way to the Dutch colony of New Netherlands. Having purchased land on Long Island and houses in New Amsterdam, he became both a merchant and a slave trader. Steendam left the colony when it fell to the English in 1664. He appeared in the East Indies in 1665 and became a resident of Batavia, Java, where he became the governor of the Orphans House.

Steendam was one of the earliest poets in mainland America. Because he wrote only in Dutch and never learned English, his poetry probably was unknown to Americans until it was translated in 1865. His "Complaint of New Netherlands to Her Mother" (1659) was the first poem written in New Netherlands, a Dutch colony. Couched as a child's plea to its mother for protection, the poem was a call to the Dutch government to defend the colony from Indian and English enemies. Steendam's verse described the bounty of the New World: "Milk and butter; fruits to eat / No one can enumerate; / Ev'ry vegetable known / Grain the best that e'er was grown." The Dutch government, Steendam concluded, ought to protect its small portion of such a paradise.

Also written while Steendam was living in New Netherlands, his "Praise of New Netherlands" (1662) is a 300-line poem that repeats the theme of a bountiful new world, and catalogues the pleasures and natural wonders of America. New Netherlands, Steendam declared, was "a very Eden" which provided the colonist with "Whatever does with breadth of life expand / Or comes from out the sea."

Sources

Murphy, Henry Cruse, ed. Anthology of New Netherland: Or, Translations from the Early Dutch Poets of New York, with Memoirs of Their Lives. New York, 1865; New York: Garrett, 1970.

Murphy. Jacob Steendam: noch vaster: A Memoir of the First Poet in New Netherland. The Hague, 1861; New York: Dodd, Mead, 1908.

Stiles, Ezra (1727–1795) minister, diarist

Ezra Stiles, Congregational minister and president of Yale College, was born in North Haven, Connecticut, to the Reverend Isaac Stiles and Kezia Taylor Stiles (daughter of Edward TAYLOR); his mother died a few days after Ezra's birth. After earning an A.B. degree from Yale in 1746, Stiles stayed at the school to study for an advanced degree and to work as a tutor. He received an M.A. degree in 1749 and considered a career in the ministry, but he chose instead to study law. Soon after he was admitted to the New Haven bar, however, his commitment to the ministry returned. In 1755 he accepted a call to Newport's Second Congregational Church. Two years later Stiles married Elizabeth Hubbard, who had eight children during their eighteen years of marriage. Elizabeth Stiles died in 1775, and Stiles married Mary Checkley, a widow, in 1782. By this time he was president of Yale College; he held this seat for seventeen years.

Stiles's Discourse on the Christian Union, preached in Rhode Island to a gathering of Congregationalist ministers in 1760 and published in Boston the following year, resonated with a large New England audience. Based on Philippians 3:16, "Let us walk by the same Rule," his Discourse advocated the reconciliation and reunification of a denomination that had been deeply divided since the GREAT AWAKENING of the 1730s and 1740s. Stiles was the first Old Light, or orthodox minister, to publicly call for an end to the animosity between Old and New Light, or revivalist, congregations. Reconciliation was essential, he insisted, if the church hoped to win back those who had been alienated by the disputes, and if ministers hoped to advance the cause of civil freedom. Such arguments were not new, but they struck a chord in schism-weary New Englanders.

During the tumult that followed the passage of the STAMP ACT, Stiles wrote to Massachusetts lieutenant governor Thomas HUTCHINSON that he had "hoped never to have seen the day when the Colonies should resist the Parent State: nor will I ever take Part in such Resistance." He was, at the time, certain that "In all parliamentary Resolutions respecting the colonies (except on Religion), so long as the Alternatives are Submission or Civil War, I shall not hesitate to choose and declare for the first, till the consequences of the latter are far less tremendous than the Effects of Oppression." Ten years later, however, in the wake of the bloodshed at Lexington and Concord, Stiles supported the PATRIOT cause.

After the Peace of Paris in 1783, which officially ended the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, Stiles published The United States Elevated to Glory and Honor (1783). In this sermon, Stiles argued that America was destined for greatness, for the Lord had provided America with with tremendous natural resources, and as well, with victory over Britain. Stiles also predicted westward expansion and the demographic explosion of the next century, and he spoke confidently of the virtues of democracy. "A well-ordered Democratical Aristocracy," he wrote, "standing upon the annual elections of the people, and revocable at pleasure . . . will approve itself the most equitable, liberal, and perfect." There was, however, little place in his vision of America for African Americans or Native Americans. A slave owner himself, Stiles advocated the removal of all slaves and freed people to Africa.

During the early 1790s Stiles defended the ideals of the French Revolution. In A History of Three of the Judges of King

Charles I (1794), he accused England of being willing to persecute men who opposed tyranny, and praised France as America's partner in liberty and justice. When French revolutionaries guillotined King Louis XVI in 1793, however, Stiles struggled to reconcile the excesses of the French Revolution with his belief in French justice. Declaring that "Rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God!" Stiles embraced the liberal Lockean values of his time. His faith in the American political system and in the voting electorate made him confident that no violent behavior would ever be required in his own country.

In addition to writing sermons, Stiles kept detailed observations in notebooks, diaries, itineraries, and accounts that have value as primary sources on events and developments surrounding the Revolutionary era and the early Republic.

Works

Stiles, Ezra. A Discourse on the Christian Union. Boston: Printed and sold by Edes & Gill, 1761; Early American Imprints, 9018, 9279, 36368.

Stiles. The United States Elevated to Glory and Honor. A Sermon Preached before His Honor Jonathan Trumbull, Esq. L.L.D. Governor and Commander in Chief and the Honorable General Assembly Convened at Hartford, at the Anniversary Election, May 8th, 1783. New Haven, Conn.: Printed by Thomas & Samuel Green, 1783; revised, Worcester, 1785; Early American Imprints, 18198, 19261.

Stiles. A History of Three of the Judges of King Charles I. Major-General Whalley, Major-General Goffe, and Colonel Dixwell. Hartford, Conn.: Printed by Elisha Babcock, 1794; Early American Imprints, 27743.

Source

Morgan, Edmund. The Gentle Puritan: A Life of Ezra Stiles, 1727–1795. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1962.

Stockton, Annis Boudinot (1736–1801) poet

Annis Boudinot was born in Darby, Pennsylvania, on July 1, 1736, the daughter of Elias and Catherine Williams Boudinot. Her father, a descendant of French Huguenot refugees, provided Annis with a better education than was common for a woman of her era. In 1753 the Boudinots moved to Princeton, where Annis met and soon married Richard Stockton, a lawyer, political leader, and scion of one of the oldest landed families of the town.

The Stocktons's home, Morven, reflected Annis Stockton's literary identification: it was named for the imaginary land in Fingal (1762) by James Macpherson (1736–1796). With slaves and servants to care for a household that eventually included six children, Annis Stockton found the time to write poetry. "Sleep, Balmy Sleep," first published in 1758, tells of her sadness during her husband's extended illness. The poem starts, "Sleep, balmy sleep, has clos'd the eyes of all / But me! ah me! no respite can I gain!" Stockton produced hundreds of poems—including odes, hymns, songs, and sonnets—and became one of the most published female poets of her generation. She was part of a literary circle that included Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON, Francis HOPKINSON, John DICKINSON, and Philip FRENEAU. She frequently held literary meetings in her home and invited younger poets whom she encouraged.

Stockton's themes were often domestic and affective, including courtship, marriage, friendship, old age, death of a loved one, grief, and joy. During her courtship, Stockton captured the total absorption two lovers enjoyed with each other: "I find on earth no charms for me / But what's connected with the thought of thee!" Almost thirty years later, as her husband was dying, she observed,

*But vain is prophesy when death's approach
Thro' years of pain, has sap'd a dearer life.
And makes me, coard [coward] like, myself reproach, that e're I knew the tender name of wife.*

During the AMERICAN REVOLUTION, however, Stockton took up political subjects, composing several odes to General George WASHINGTON.

Both Annis and Richard Stockton were PATRIOTS during the Revolutionary War. When the British army invaded New Jersey, their home was occupied by the enemy and then looted. The departing British took not only the silver but also many of Annis's poems, some of which they destroyed. Richard Stockton was taken prisoner and remained behind British lines until 1777. His mistreatment in captivity may have hastened his death in 1781. Ceding Morven to her oldest son upon his marriage, Annis Stockton moved to another house with her youngest daughter, Abigail. Stockton died in 1801 at her daughter's Burlington County home.

Work

Stockton, Annis Boudinot. Only for the Eye of a Friend: The Poems of Annis Boudinot Stockton, edited by Carla Mulford. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1995.

Sources

Bill, Alfred Hoyt. A House Called Morven, its Role in American History, 1701–1954. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1954.

Cowell, Pattie, ed. Women Poets in Pre-Revolutionary America, 1650–1775. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1981.

Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2003.

The Swains (1750s–1760s)

This literary circle, organized in the 1750s by William SMITH, provost of the College of Philadelphia, was modeled after playwright Ben Jonson's (1572–1637) Apollo Club in London. Smith, colonial Philadelphia's leading advocate of politeness and the cultivation of the arts, gathered around him such protégés as painter Benjamin West (1738–1820) and poet Thomas GODFREY (1736–1763). Smith encouraged these young writers and painters, several of whom had their work published in American and English newspapers and showcased in new literary magazines such as The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle. The Swains existed only briefly as an independent gathering; by the 1760s its members had been absorbed into the salon run by Elizabeth Graeme FERGUSON at her home, Graeme Park. Although Smith predicted that these young men would be the vanguard of an American challenge to English domination in the arts, few of the Swains besides West and Francis HOPKINSON established lasting reputations.

Sabin's Dictionary (1868–1936) bibliography

This comprehensive listing of Americana—formally titled A Dictionary of Books Relating to America, from Its Discovery to the Present Time, or Bibliotheca Americana—derives its popular name from its maker, the English-born New York City rare-book dealer Joseph Sabin. Beginning in 1856, Sabin endeavored to list alphabetically every monograph that related to the United States, whether book or pamphlet, written in any language. Before his death he completed fourteen volumes, providing both bibliographical and content information on each entry. Sabin was succeeded in this endeavor by the bibliographer of the New York Public Library, Wilberforce Eames, who completed volumes fifteen through twenty of Sabin's Dictionary. The last nine volumes of the work were produced by a staff supervised by R. W. G. Vailn, with volume twenty-nine appearing in 1936. In 1974 a three-volume Author-Title Index, the work of John E. Molnar, was published, and that same year Lawrence S. Thompson began publishing The New Sabin, a revised and updated version of the original.

Sources

Goff, Frederick R. Joseph Sabin, Bibliographer, 1821–1881. Amsterdam, N.Y.: Israel, 1963.
Molnar, John E. Author-Title Index to Joseph Sabin's Dictionary of Books Relating to America. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

St. Nicholas (1873–1940) periodical

This children's magazine was founded in New York City by Roswell Smith. Known for the high quality of its fiction, St. Nicholas was edited from 1873 to 1905 by Mary Mapes

DODGE, who was also a contributor. Most prominent authors of juvenile fiction published here, including Americans such as Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS), Frank R. STOCKTON, and Louisa May ALCOTT, as well as English authors such as Rudyard Kipling and Robert Louis Stevenson. Juvenile authors were also encouraged to send in contributions.

Source

Shaw, John Mackay, comp. The Poems, Poets & Illustrators of St. Nicholas Magazine 1873–1943: An Index. Tallahassee: Stroz Library, Florida State University, 1965.

Sargent, Epes W. (1813–1880) author, poet, editor, dramatist

Epes W. Sargent, son of Epes Sargent and Hannah Dane Coffin, was born in Gloucester, Massachusetts. He wrote several of the popular “Peter Parley” (see Samuel Griswold GOODRICH) series of books for children in 1827. In the early 1830s he worked on the editorial staffs of the Boston Daily Advertiser and the Boston Daily Atlas. The first major publications to appear with his signature were the plays The Bride of Genoa (1837) and Velasco (1839). Always prolific and resourceful, Sargent published a collection of poetry, two novels, and several books of nonfiction. In New York he did editorial work for the Evening Signal, the New World, and the New York Mirror. He achieved great popularity with his series of textbooks and school readers (Sargent's Standard Series). Sargent devoted much of the energy of his later years to the study and discussion of spiritualism.

—E. N. S.

The Saturday Club

Begun in Boston in 1855 as a literary dinner club, the Saturday Club was inspired by earlier symposia organized by Ralph Waldo EMERSON and Bronson ALCOTT. The moving force behind the founding of the club, however, was the lawyer and publishing agent Horatio Woodman, who combined a social organization with a literary one known as the Magazine Club or the Atlantic Club. The Saturday Club met monthly at the Parker House, and after the founding of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in 1857, the group hosted banquets for magazine contributors. Writers such as Emerson, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, and LOUIS AGASSIZ were members, and Oliver Wendell HOLMES was its leader. In 1884 Holmes published a poetic tribute, “At the Saturday Club.”

Sources

Emerson, Edward W. The Early Years of the Saturday Club, 1855–1879. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1918.

Howe, M. A. DeWolfe, ed. The Later Years of the Saturday Club. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1927.

The Scarlet Letter by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields, 1850) novel

The writer Nathaniel HAWTHORNE counted as an ancestor John Hathorne, one of the judges who presided over the infamous Salem witchcraft trials. The later Hawthorne was haunted by this connection, and his feelings of familial guilt eventually resulted in his most famous novel, The Scarlet Letter, A Romance.

Hawthorne’s novel focuses on the nature of guilt, exploring both the hypocritical impulse in all mankind—an impulse that compels men and women to condemn others while hiding their own mistakes—and the cathartic effects that admitting to and facing shortcomings can have. The novel opens with Hester Prynne standing upon a scaffold, the object of ridicule in the town of Boston. Hester’s sin of adultery is readily apparent in the form of Pearl, the infant daughter she holds, but the townspeople have taken the further step of forcing Hester to wear a large red A upon her chest for the remainder of her life—a continual reminder of her adultery. While her sin may be obvious, Hawthorne in these opening pages encourages the reader to recognize that those in the crowd have sins of their own—sins that, unlike Hester’s, are hidden. From the beginning of the novel, then, hypocrisy is a defining characteristic of the community. And as the novel develops, it becomes evident that the hidden sin is often a far weightier burden than Hester’s letter.

Arthur Dimmesdale, Hester’s secret lover and to all appearances an upright minister in the town, chooses to conceal his crime. He is successful at hiding what he has done, but the guilt he feels, coupled with his knowledge of what Hester must endure for his sake, destroys his mental, and, eventually, his physical health. Meanwhile, Hester’s husband, having at last returned to her, conceals his own relationship to Hester by taking the name Roger Chillingworth. Further, he recognizes Dimmesdale’s crime and preys on the minister’s shame, ultimately helping to drive Dimmesdale to his death. Left without a target for his rage, Chillingworth’s internal frustration festers, and he dies within a year. Hester, in contrast to both men, faces ridicule initially but over time comes to accept her sins and makes a life for herself in the village.

In addition to his central focus on the power of guilt, Hawthorne also examines the prejudices of the Puritan society itself, the obvious injustice of forcing Hester’s sin onto her innocent daughter, and—as Pearl’s name implies—the fact that goodness often springs from what we might initially see as “evil.”

A masterwork of symbolism, The Scarlet Letter embodies Hawthorne’s ROMANTICISM and his deep interest in the relationship between God and man. In true transcendental fashion, Hawthorne makes of the elements of nature messages from God—an A made of stars in the sky, a rose that grows beside the prison door, a woods where Hester and Dimmesdale feel a measure of freedom. In doing so, he ultimately overturns the Puritan conception of God in favor of a God who resides as spirit in all of us and in all of nature and who ultimately sanctifies our lives and actions even when society does not.

Sources

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. The Scarlet Letter: An Authoritative Text, edited by Seymour Gross. New York: Norton, 1988.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Nathaniel Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

— Revised by King Adkins

Schoolcraft, Henry Rowe (1793–1864) ethnologist, nonfiction writer

Born in Watervliet, New York, Henry Rowe Schoolcraft is regarded as a pioneer of modern Native American studies. In 1818 he defected from the family glassmaking business and traveled down the Ohio River to Missouri in order to make a geographical, geological, and mineralogical survey, which he published in 1819 as A View of the Lead Mines of Missouri. These findings led to his inclusion as a geologist in the 1820 expedition to northern Michigan and Lake Superior led by Lewis Cass, a journey Schoolcraft described in A Narrative Journal of the Travels . . . from Detroit through the Great Chain of the American Lakes to the Sources of the Mississippi River (1821).

In 1822 Schoolcraft was appointed Indian agent for northern Michigan, where he married Jane Johnston SCHOOLCRAFT, the granddaughter of an Ojibway chieftain, and began his research in indigenous culture. He was the first white person to publish translations of Indian poetry and among the first to relate Indian legends and religious beliefs. His investigations led to the publication of many influential books, including Algic Researches (1839), concerning the Indians of the Allegheny region. This book in particular had a profound influence on Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, whose poem THE SONG OF HIAWATHA (1855) repeated Schoolcraft's confusion of the Onondaga Hiawatha with an Ojibwa.

In 1841, when the Whig Party came to dominate federal government, Schoolcraft lost his post as Indian agent and moved back east, where he continued writing about American Indians. His work culminated in the six-volume Historical and Statistical Information Respecting . . . the Indian Tribes of the United States (1851–1857).

Source

Bremer, Richard G. Indian Agent and Wilderness Scholar: The Life of Henry Rowe Schoolcraft. Mount Pleasant: Clarke Historical Library, Central Michigan University, 1987.

Schoolcraft, Jane Johnston (1800–1842) poet, translator, nonfiction writer

Born in Sault St. Marie, Jane Johnston (Bamewawagezhikaquay/Woman of the Sound the Stars Make Rushing Through the Sky) was one of eight children of Ozhagusco-daywayquay (Susan Johnston) and Irish-born fur trader John Johnston. Bilingual and homeschooled in both parents' cultures, Jane married Henry Rowe SCHOOLCRAFT, Michigan Territory's first "Indian Agent," in 1823. Jane and her family provided much of the material that made Henry famous as one of America's first ethnographers (see, for example, his Algic Researches [1839]) and that served as a key source for Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW's best-seller THE SONG OF HIAWATHA (1855). Though she did not seek publication, Jane Johnston Schoolcraft is often identified as the first American Indian literary writer. She is thought to be the first to write poems in an indigenous language and the first to record traditional stories; she also wrote nonfiction and translated Ojibway oral tales and songs. Her fifty extant original poems in English and Ojibwa reflect her multicultural ethos. Jane died unexpectedly at age forty-one, survived by her husband and two of their children.

Sources

Brazer, Marjorie Cahn. Harps upon the Willows: The Johnston Family of the Old Northwest. Ann Arbor: Historical Society of Michigan, 1993.

Brehm, Victoria. The Women's Great Lakes Reader. Duluth, Minn.: Holy Cow Press, 1998; Tustin, Mich.: Ladyslipper Press, 2000.

Mumford, Jeremy. "Mixed-Race Identity in a Nineteenth-Century Family: The Schoolcrafts of Sault Ste. Marie, 1824–27," Michigan Historical Review, 25 (Spring 1999): 1–23.

Schoolcraft, Jane Johnston. The Sound the Stars Make Rushing Through the Sky: The Writings of Jane Johnston Schoolcraft, edited by Robert Dale Parker. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2007.

Stone-Gordon, Tammy. "The Other Schoolcraft," Michigan History, 78, no. 2 (1994): 26–29.

—Elizabeth McNeil

Scribner's Monthly (1870–1881) periodical

Founded by the elder Charles Scribner in 1870 as an adjunct to his publishing business, Scribner's Monthly was distinguished by its many departments and its publications of serial fiction, such as Bret HARTE's Gabriel Conroy (1875–1876) and George Washington CABLE's The Grandissimes (1880). Graced by well-executed engravings and fine typography, the magazine's superior quality was maintained after 1881, when some of its founders took it over and renamed it The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine (see THE CENTURY MAGAZINE).

Source

John, Arthur. The Best Years of the Century: Richard Watson Gilder, Scribner's Monthly, and the Century Magazine, 1870–1909. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.

Charles Scribner's Sons (1846–1984) publishing house

The company that later became Charles Scribner's Sons began in 1846 when lawyer Charles Scribner teamed with dry-goods seller Isaac D. Baker. Whereas most other publishers of the time were outgrowths of bookselling and/or printing businesses, Scribner and Baker was a publishing firm exclusively. The company was fortunate to sign, as one of its first authors, historian J. T. Headley, who wrote several popular works for them. Other early successes included Nathaniel Parker WILLIS's Rural Letters (1849) and Donald Grant MITCHELL's Reveries of a Bachelor (1850). The firm also developed several popular textbook series. The firm's name, which changed as partners came and went, finally stabilized in 1878, when Charles Scribner's three sons assumed ownership.

During the last three decades of the century, the Scribners continued to sign popular authors. Among the company's publications during this period are Mary Virginia TERHUNE's Common Sense in the Household (1871), George Washington CABLE's OLD CREOLE DAYS (1879), Henry ADAMS's The History of the United States (1889–1891), and books of poetry and criticism by Sidney LANIER. The firm also became involved in several magazine-publishing ventures: SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY (1870–1881), edited by one of Scribner's best-selling authors, Josiah G. Holland; ST. NICHOLAS (1873–1840); and Scribner's Magazine (1887–1939).

The firm's greatest era as a literary publisher came in the twentieth century, when it published original work by such authors as Edith Wharton, F. Scott Fitzgerald, John P. Marquand, Ring Lardner, Thomas Wolfe, and Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. A series of acquisitions and mergers began in the 1970s, and the company merged with Macmillan in 1984. Charles Scribner's Sons is now an imprint of Simon & Schuster, the publishing arm of media conglomerate Viacom, Inc.

Sources

"Charles Scribner's Sons: The History of a Publishing House, 1846–1894," Scribner's Magazine, 15 (1894).

Delaney, John, ed. The House of Scribner, 1846–1904. Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 17. Detroit: Gale Research, 1995.

—Brett Barney

Sealsfield, Charles (1793–1864) travel writer, journalist, novelist

Born Carl Postl in present-day Popice, Czech Republic, Charles Sealsfield fled the repressive Austrian regime in 1823 and traveled extensively in the United States under his assumed name, describing himself as a "Citizen of the United States, clergyman, native of Pennsylvania." His first book, a nonfiction work based on these travels, appeared in German in 1827. In 1828 Sealsfield brought out an English translation of this work and also an English-language nonfiction book about Austria, followed by a novel written in English, Tokeah; or, The White Rose (1829). Although Sealsfield settled permanently in Switzerland and published later novels in German, the American Southwest remained his setting of choice. In the 1840s Sealsfield gained fleeting fame in his adopted country when unauthorized translations of his novels were published amid extravagant claims for him as the "greatest American author." Edgar Allan Poe and Nathaniel Hawthorne denounced Sealsfield in the debate that ensued, while Henry Wadsworth Longfellow appears to have admired him. Sealsfield published nothing new during the last two decades of his life, and his true identity and origin came to light only upon his death.

Source

Grünzweig, Walter. Charles Sealsfield. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1985.

—Brett Barney

Sedgwick, Catharine Maria (1789–1867) novelist

Born in the Berkshire Hills region of western Massachusetts, Catharine Maria Sedgwick distinguished herself as one of the leading figures of the emerging American literary culture of the early nineteenth century. Her fiction, admired in Europe as well as in America, often drew on Berkshire scenes and concentrated on the domestic and local customs she considered the bedrock of the republic. Early novels such as A New England Tale (1822) and Redwood (1824) had a Unitarian flavor (see UNITARIANISM) that appealed strongly to liberal Protestants of the era—among them many of the prominent writers of her day—and her Stockbridge home became a gathering place for writers from all over the country. She was liberal politically, too, using her novel Clarence (1830) to mock the kind of Federalism espoused by her family, embracing Jacksonian democracy instead. Sedgwick explored female identity in her most famous work, the historical romance HOPE LESLIE (1827); and in her last novel, Married or Single? (1857), which contrasts the lifestyles of a variety of women.

Sources

Damon-Bach, Lucinda L., and Victoria Clements, eds. Catharine Maria Sedgwick: Critical Perspectives. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2002.

Foster, Edward H. Catharine Maria Sedgwick. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Gould, Philip. Covenant and Republic: Historical Romance and the Politics of Puritanism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Sedgwick, Catharine Maria. The Power of Her Sympathy: The Autobiography and Journal of Catharine Maria Sedgwick, edited by Mary Kelly. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society; Distributed by Northeastern University Press, 1993.

"Self-Reliance" by Ralph Waldo Emerson (1841) essay

This essay is in many ways the definitive statement of Ralph Waldo EMERSON's Transcendentalist philosophy (see TRANSCENDENTALISM)—that is, the belief that the individual should be at the center of spiritual, moral, and intellectual life. In "Self-Reliance" Emerson urges every person "to believe your own thought," rather than be bound by the ideas of others, which encouraged conformity. Even a democratic society like the United States, which claimed to value individualism, expected "consistency" from and among its members. Emerson's critique has become one of the most oft-repeated quotes from his essay: "A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines." Emerson was not promoting selfish egotism, but rather believed that the existence of more self-reliant individuals would ultimately benefit society by transforming American thought, religion, and art in new and innovative ways.

Sources

Cayton, Mary Kupiec. Emerson's Emergence: Self and Society in the Transformation of New England, 1800–1845. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo. Essays: First Series. Boston: Munroe, 1841.

Kateb, George. Emerson and Self-Reliance. Thousand Oaks, Calif.: Sage Publications, 1995.

Newfield, Christopher. The Emerson Effect: Individualism and Submission in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Shaw, Henry Wheeler (1818–1885) humorist

A sekret ceases tew be a sekret if it iz once confided — it iz like a dollar bill, once broken, it iz never a dollar agin.

—Affurisms (1865)

Born in Massachusetts, Henry Wheeler Shaw pursued various occupations—explorer, farmer, riverboat captain, real estate agent, auctioneer—until, in middle age, he settled into a literary life. Writing for small newspapers, he adopted many of the idiosyncrasies of his contemporary, Artemus Ward (Charles Farrar BROWNE), including wild misspellings, malapropisms, and unusual syntax, in executing his humorous sketches (ostensibly written by his alter ego, Josh Billings). He finally attracted the attention of Artemus Ward himself, who arranged for the publication of Shaw's first book, Josh Billings, Hiz Sayings (1865). Other Josh Billings books, together with the humorous annual Allminax (1870–1879), made Shaw a much-quoted—and misquoted—CRACKERBARREL philosopher, and enabled him to have a successful second career as a popular lecturer.

Source

Kesterson, David B. Josh Billings (Henry Wheeler Shaw). New York: Twayne, 1973.

Shillaber, B. P. (1814–1890) humorist, editor

One of the pioneers of American regional humor, Benjamin Penhallow Shillaber was born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. Unable to afford college, at fifteen he began an apprenticeship with a local newspaper. In 1833 he moved to Boston, where he worked as a compositor in the printing house of Tuttle and Weeks and later with the Post. It was while at the Post that Shillaber first created Ruth Partington, the character for which he became famous. A good-hearted and unsophisticated widow tending to malapropism, Partington was popular with readers. Shillaber continued to generate humor pieces about Mrs. Partington and her family at THE CARPET-BAG, which he edited between 1851 and 1853. By 1854 he had generated enough short anecdotes and sketches to make up a book, Life and Sayings of Mrs. Partington, And Others of the Family. By the time it was ready for sale, twenty thousand copies had been ordered. The success of the book also boosted sales of Shillaber's first book, Rhymes with Reason and Without, a collection of verse that he had published the year before.

For the remainder of his life Shillaber did editorial work, lectured occasionally, and published books, many of which continued to record the adventures and wisdom of Mrs. Partington and her associates. Though it has since faded from memory, the name "Mrs. Partington" was universally familiar in the second half of the nineteenth century. Humorist George Ade wrote that "all of us who have memories recall Mrs. Partington. . . . For many years she was more quoted than Shakespeare." It is widely believed that Mrs. Partington and her mischievous nephew, Ike, were models for the Tom Sawyer and Widow Douglas characters in Mark Twain's fiction (see Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS).

Source

Reed, John Q. Benjamin Penhallow Shillaber. New York: Twayne, 1972.

—Brett Barney

Sigourney, Lydia Huntley (1791–1865) poet, novelist

Although she is rather obscure today, Lydia Sigourney was one of the most popular American poets of the nineteenth century. Sigourney was widely regarded as the leading woman poet in the United States during a time when women's writing was considered a distinct—and inferior—class of literature. She wrote over sixty books spanning many genres, including poetry, children's literature, and nonfiction. Some of her most enduring poems are "Death of an Infant," "To a Shred of Linen," and "Indian Names."

Sigourney's poetry is sentimental and, like other poetry in the genteel tradition, it fell out of favor as popular tastes changed. However, interest in Sigourney's writings has recently resurged as scholars have studied her as a prominent figure within the neglected women's literary tradition. Many of the thousands of pieces that Sigourney published in periodicals touched upon issues very relevant to her female readers, including motherhood, domestic life, and Christian morality. Sigourney was also widely regarded as a talented elegist, due to her practice of writing poems on the deaths of members of her community. Though her poems were mostly conventional, their inoffensiveness allowed her, as one of the first professional women writers in the United States, to stand as a model for the possibilities then open to women but not to be damaged by involvement in controversial politics.

Source

Haight, Gordon. Mrs. Sigourney, The Sweet Singer of Hartford. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1930.

—Amanda Gailey

Simms, William Gilmore (1806–1870) novelist

... what is the modern romance itself? The reply is instant. Modern romance is the substitute which the people of to-day offer for the ancient epic.

—The Yemassee (1844)

Born in Charleston, South Carolina, to a poor storekeeper, William Gilmore Simms aspired to reach the top of the social and literary hierarchy of his native state. Although he was never fully accepted as a member of the aristocratic class to which he aspired, Simms succeeded in bringing the conventions of the historical ROMANCE, as developed by Sir Walter Scott, to the storytelling of the South.

Simms learned much about southern history and lore from his grandmother, who had lived through the American Revolution. He was a precocious youth and at the age of ten entered the College of Charleston, where he studied to be a druggist. During this time he wrote his first poems. Simms was later admitted to the bar and served in the state legislature. He traveled throughout the South, developing a deep appreciation of the people and culture.

Guy Rivers (1834), the story of Georgia outlaws, was the first Simms novel to blend LOCAL COLOR with the historical romance's evocation of the past and of a culture's manners. Simms extended this formula to what is regarded as his masterpiece, THE YEMASSEE (1835), a stirring account of Indian warfare in South Carolina. That same year he also published The Partisan, set during the American Revolution. He had now found the basic elements of his story: white settlers' clashes with Indians; their clashes with the colonial master; the lawless life of the frontier. These three subjects became the focus of his "Border Romances," which stretched from the colonial period to the mid nineteenth century.

Among Simms's most important titles are Mellichampe (1836); Richard Hurdis (1838); Border Beagles (1840); The Kinsmen (1841); Beauchampe (1842); Helen Halsey: Or, The Swamp State of Conelachita (1845); Katharine Walton (1851); The Sword and the Distaff (1852); The Forayers (1855); Charlemont (1856); and The Cassique of Kiawah (1859). His work helped shaped the bedrock belief in the "Old South," a time of gracious manners and conservative order that southern planters and other patriots evoked when criticized by northerners for the institution of slavery. Simms's novels celebrated an ideal and did not examine closely the realities of the South. They presented stereotyped characters and melodramatic plots. Even so, as the poet and historian of his region he has been compared to James Fenimore Cooper. If Simms did not create memorable characters or evoke the land as graphically as Cooper, he has been praised for being more accurate than Cooper in observing social manners and customs.

Simms perpetuated the legend of the South by editing magazines such as the Southern and Western Monthly Magazine and Review (1845) and the Southern Quarterly Review (1849–1854) and writing essays and biographies that championed slavery. His other writings include The History of South Carolina (1840) and The Geography of South Carolina (1843). Even though his home and library were destroyed by Federal troops near the end of the CIVIL WAR, there was enough material for a five-volume edition of his Letters (1952–1956) to be published.

Sources

- Busick, Sean R. A Sober Desire for History: William Gilmore Simms as Historian. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005.
- Guilds, John Caldwell. Long Years of Neglect: The Work and Reputation of William Gilmore Simms. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1988.
- Guilds, and Caroline Collins, eds. William Gilmore Simms and the American Frontier. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1997.
- Ridgely, J. V. William Gilmore Simms. New York: Twayne, 1962.
- Wimsatt, Mary Ann. The Major Fiction of William Gilmore Simms. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

The Sketch Book by Washington Irving

(1819–1820) story and essay collection

Often cited as the starting point of the American short story, Washington IRVING's The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., was highly successful both in America and abroad. The volume includes sketches in which Irving, through the genial persona Crayon, presents his observations as an American in England, but the most influential pieces in the book feature American scenes. "RIP VAN WINKLE" and "THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW" draw heavily on German folktales, but Irving also made use of American FOLKLORE in constructing the stories. Essays such as "English Writers on America" and "Traits of Indian Character" are decidedly nationalistic in tone. While Irving's previous works had an eighteenth-century flavor, here he moved into the romantic realm carved out by Sir Walter Scott (see ROMANTICISM), marking a path that would be followed by later American romantics such as Nathaniel HAWTHORNE and Herman MELVILLE.

Sources

- Roth, Martin. Comedy and America: The Lost World of Washington Irving. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1976.
- Rubin-Dorsky, Jeffrey. Adrift in the Old World: The Psychological Pilgrimage of Washington Irving. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Slave Narrative

The slave narrative is a genre of literature in which an escaped or freed slave recounts both his or her suffering under slavery and the tribulations of earning freedom. Slave narratives were especially popular in the decades before the CIVIL WAR, when they were frequently promoted by abolitionists to win the sympathies of Northern audiences.

Although as a form of biography each narrative was shaped by the unique life events of the individual, like all literary forms the slave narrative developed a set of characteristic conventions, with those written by men and those written by women following slightly different patterns. Most slave narratives, male or female, begin with a depiction of a happy, innocent childhood that is soon destroyed through the brutality of slavery. For male narrators, suffering usually comes from overwork and torture; for female narrators, it comes most often from sexual abuse. Male narrators usually fight for their freedom through active resistance and escape; female narrators typically win their freedom through patient endurance. The gender differences in these narratives appealed to Northern readers' deeply held beliefs about human dignity: that by physically subjugating a man or sexually abusing a woman, slave owners were violating fundamental human rights.

Slave narratives began appearing in the eighteenth century; early examples include The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano (1798), and History of Mary Prince, a West Indian Slave (1831). Frederick DOUGLASS'S NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS (1845) was perhaps the most influential male slave narrative; it chronicles his failed attempt to escape slavery and his eventual flight to New York. Harriet JACOBS'S INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A SLAVE GIRL (1861), which recounts Jacobs's years of sexual abuse at the hands of her master, was widely effective at stirring Northerners' sympathies at the dawn of the Civil War.

Other published slave narratives of the nineteenth century include Narrative of Henry Watson, a Fugitive Slave (1849); Twelve Years a Slave: Narrative of Solomon Northrup (1853); Experience and Personal Narrative of Uncle Tom Jones, Who Was for Forty Years a Slave (1858); Narrative of the Life of J. D. Green, A Runaway Slave, from Kentucky: Containing an Account of His Three Escapes, in 1839, 1846, and 1848 (1864); Life of James Mars, A Slave Born and Sold in Connecticut, Written by Himself (1866); and Wonderful Eventful Life of Rev. Thomas James by Himself (1887).

Sources

American Slave Narratives: An Online Anthology. <<http://xroads.virginia.edu/~hyper/wpa/wpahome.html>> (viewed August 7, 2007).

"I Will be Heard": Abolitionism in America. <<http://rmc.library.cornell.edu/abolitionism/index.htm>> (viewed August 7, 2007).

Starling, Marion Wilson. The Slave Narrative: Its Place in American Literary History. New York: New York University, 1949.

Tackach, James, ed. Slave Narratives. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2001.

—Revised by Amanda Gailley

Smith, Charles Henry (1826–1903) journalist, humorist

Born in Georgia, Charles Henry Smith practiced law before joining the Confederate Army during the CIVIL WAR. He began his writing career during the first year of the war, contributing to a Georgia newspaper humorous letters addressed to "Mr. Abe Linkhorn" and signed Bill Arp. These letters, which satirized the North through Smith's adoption of a deliberately unschooled, uncouth persona, proved highly popular with readers. Smith continued writing Bill Arp letters to The Atlanta Constitution for the next twenty-five years, evolving over time into a shrewd CRACKERBARREL philosopher, holding forth on such diverse topics as women's suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM), income tax, and equal rights. Although in 1866 Smith dropped the use of comic misspellings, he often employed the dialects of the Georgia "cracker" and the African American in a style said to have influenced Joel Chandler HARRIS. Smith's newspaper pieces were collected in books such as Bill Arp So Called (1866) and Bill Arp: From the Uncivil War to Date (1903).

Sources

Austin, James C. Bill Arp. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Parker, David B. Alias Bill Arp: Charles Henry Smith and the South's "Goodly Heritage". Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991.

Smith, Elizabeth Oakes (1806–1893) poet, novelist, women's rights activist

Elizabeth Oakes Smith was born to David and Sophia Prince in North Yarmouth, Maine. At the insistence of her mother, she married Seba Smith, a Portland journalist who was twice her age. Upon moving to New York in 1839, she immersed herself in the city's literary salons and befriended Edgar Allan POE, the sisters Alice and Phoebe CARY, and Margaret FULLER. Oakes Smith later became a leader in the women's rights movement and took part in the Seneca Falls Convention. Her most notable works include her most successful poem, "The Sinless Child" (1843) and the collection of feminist lectures and essays Woman and Her Needs (1851).

Sources

Bennett, Paula Bernat, ed. Nineteenth Century American Women Poets. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1998.

Gray, Janet, ed. She Wields a Pen. London: Dent, 1997.

Richards, Eliza. Gender and the Poetics of Reception in Poe's Circle. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

—Sarah Elizabeth Klotz

Smith, F. Hopkinson (1838–1915) short-story writer, novelist, illustrator

Born in Baltimore, Francis Hopkinson Smith worked in his brother's iron foundry until after the CIVIL WAR. He moved to New York City and worked as an engineer on many construction projects in the area, including the base for the Statue of Liberty. Painting had long been his avocation, however, and when, at age fifty, he turned to a writing career, he was able to combine his pictorial and literary gifts. He wrote and illustrated two popular books of travel sketches: Well-Worn Roads of Spain, Holland, and Italy (1887) and A White Umbrella in Mexico (1889). His next work, a LOCAL-COLOR novella based on his own after-dinner stories, Colonel Carter of Cartersville (1891), sold so well that Smith was able to retire from engineering altogether. Over the next twenty-three years he published numerous collections of stories and novels, among them the autobiographical The Fortunes of Oliver Horn (1902), a novel concerning the life of a young painter in Baltimore and New York.

Smith, Richard Penn (1799–1854) playwright, novelist

Richard Penn Smith was a Philadelphia lawyer who also edited his hometown newspaper, The Aurora, from 1822 to 1827. In 1825 he began to act on his love of the theater, and over the next decade he produced some twenty plays. Borrowing heavily from foreign works, he introduced the romantic tragedy and historical themes to American drama. Of his works that are based on American history, William Penn; or, The Elm Tree (1829) and The Triumph at Plattsburg (1830), set during the War of 1812, are original creations. Most of Smith's other plays were adaptations, mainly of French works, such as his The Eighth of January (1829), concerning Andrew Jackson's victory at the Battle of New Orleans, which borrows heavily from a French melodrama. Among his best-known adaptations is The Actress of Padua (1836), based on a tragedy by Victor Hugo.

Smith also wrote a collection of tales and The Forsaken (1831), a novel set during the Revolutionary War. His prose works probably include the ghostwritten autobiography of the frontiersman and politician Davy Crockett, (see DAVID CROCKETT) Col. Crockett's Exploits and Adventures in Texas (1836).

Source

McCullough, Bruce C. The Life and Writings of Richard Penn Smith. Menasha, Wis.: George Banta, 1917.

Smith, Seba (1792–1868) humorist

Seba Smith grew up in Maine and graduated from Bowdoin College in 1818. He founded the Portland Courier (1829) and won popularity for his creation of the fictional Major Jack Downing, a rustic Yankee who dispensed down-to-earth advice in a comic, unpretentious style. Major Jack, who commented on local and national politics, became a confidant of Andrew Jackson's and a satirical authority on Jacksonian democracy. Smith wrote, however, as an unaffiliated pundit, speaking simple truths while avoiding partisan politics. He resembles James Russell LOWELL's Hosea Biglow (see THE BIGLOW PAPERS) and Finley Peter Dunne's Mr. Dooley, as well as other twentieth-century homespun political philosophers such as Will Rogers.

Smith collected his newspaper sketches in Letters Written During the President's Tour "Down East," by Myself, Major Jack Downing, of Downingville (1833); Jack Downing's Letters (1845); and 'Way Down East, or Portraits of Yankee Life (1854). These books comment on contemporary affairs and provide LOCAL COLOR portraits of New England.

Sources

Rickels, Milton, and Patricia K. Rickels. Seba Smith. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

Wyman, Mary Alice. Two American Pioneers, Seba Smith and Elizabeth Oakes Smith. New York: Columbia University Press, 1927.

"Snow-Bound" by John Greenleaf Whittier (1866) poem

A narrative poem in rhymed couplets by John Greenleaf WHITTIER, Snow-Bound: A Winter Idyl recalls a blizzard that occurred during the author's youth. The poem begins with a description of the natural world as the storm envelopes the family farm. Taking refuge indoors, the family members pass the week-long isolation reminiscing around the fire, each one taking a turn telling stories. Although a wistful and tender evocation of rural farm life during the first part of the nineteenth century, the poem is nevertheless realistic in its depiction of the hardships such a life entailed. Considered Whittier's finest work, Snow-Bound was an immediate critical and popular success. Often compared favorably with Oliver Goldsmith's "The Deserted Village," the poem earned Whittier $10,000 dollars in its first edition.

Sources

Leary, Lewis. John Greenleaf Whittier. New York: Twayne, 1961.

Whittier, John Greenleaf. Snow-Bound. A Winter Idyl. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1866.

—Brett Barney

The Song of Hiawatha by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1855) poem

Inspired by the Finnish epic poem Kalevala, Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW's long narrative poem is written in unrhymed trochaic tetrameter. Based in part upon the Native American research of Henry Rowe SCHOOLCRAFT, the poem tells the story of Hiawatha, a member of the Ojibway tribe. Raised by his grandmother and estranged from his parents because of wrongs his father has committed against his mother, Hiawatha seeks and achieves vengeance. He serves as the founder and prophet of his people, in part due to his ability to commune with nature.

Hiawatha was immediately and enormously popular: within six months, thirty thousand copies had been sold, and generations of schoolchildren recited its verses. Its memorable rhythm and sentimental tone have also made it widely parodied.

Sources

Calhoun, Charles C. Longfellow: A Rediscovered Life. Boston: Beacon, 2004.

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth. The Song of Hiawatha. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1855.

—Julie M. Cox

“Song of Myself” by Walt Whitman (1855)

poem

After appearing as the untitled opening poem in the first edition of Walt Whitman’s LEAVES OF GRASS, “Song of Myself” was revised for each of the five subsequent editions. Called “Song of Walt Whitman, an American” in 1856, it received its final title only in the last edition, published in 1881. “Song of Myself” is a manifesto in which the poetic persona declares his unity with humanity and the universe—“Walt Whitman, a kosmos”—while he glorifies individuality: “I exist as I am, that is enough.” Early readers found “Song of Myself” unlike conventional poetry in several ways. Whitman’s poem uses plainer diction, more openly deals with sensuality, and has a looser form—characteristics exemplified in this line, describing a group of swimmers: “The young men float on their backs, their white bellies bulge to the sun, they do not ask who seizes them fast.” With more than 1,300 lines, it is Whitman’s longest poem, and amplitude is perhaps its most salient feature. One famous line declares, “I am large, I contain multitudes.” Whitman’s message of inclusion is conveyed by his cataloguing of people and things—one long section consists wholly of one- or two-line caricatures—and by his discussion and unification of opposites: birth is no better than death, goodness no different from wickedness. Even the poem’s irregular form—unrhymed lines of varying length and indeterminate meter—reinforces the poet’s message of expansiveness. Immensely influential, “Song of Myself” has consistently drawn admirers by its frankness, its liberality, and its challenge to poetic conventions.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Walt Whitman’s “Song of Myself”. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.

Greenspan, Ezra, ed. Walt Whitman’s “Song of Myself”: A Sourcebook and Critical Edition. New York: Routledge, 2005.

Miller, Edwin H. Walt Whitman’s “Song of Myself”: A Mosaic of Interpretations. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1989.

“Sonnet—To Science” by Edgar Allan Poe (1829)

poem

First published in Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems, Edgar Allan Poe’s second collection of poetry, this poem takes the form of an English sonnet. Its content establishes a distinction between the “dull realities” of science and the higher, more imaginative realms of poetry. Unlike the rigid, mechanical, and logical laws of science, poetry has its own rules and its own sense of order. “Sonnet—To Science” reflects the rising interest in science that characterized Poe’s time and draws attention to the challenge many of his contemporaries faced in reconciling science and art.

Sources

Poe, Edgar Allan. Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems. Baltimore: Hatch & Dunning, 1829.

Poe. Selected Writings of Edgar Allan Poe, edited by Edward H. Davidson. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1956.

—Chris Lang

The Southern Literary Messenger (1834–1864)

periodical

Founded in Richmond, Virginia, by Thomas W. White, The Southern Literary Messenger is best remembered for its association with Edgar Allan Poe, whose first contribution, the story “Berenice,” appeared in March 1835. That December Poe became the magazine’s editor, and, continuing to contribute his own work, he also succeeded in increasing the circulation of the magazine from 500 to more than 3,500 subscribers. Poe’s ruthless reviews of literature brought the magazine into conflict with numerous authors, and in January 1837, when his drinking problems began to interfere with his work, he was fired. White then took over the editorship, which he held until his death in 1843. Afterward, the magazine lost its literary bent, concentrating instead on military matters until it expired toward the end of the CIVIL WAR.

Sources

Jackson, David K. Poe and the Southern Literary Messenger. Richmond, Va.: Press of Dietz Printing, 1934.

Minor, Benjamin B. The Southern Literary Messenger, 1834–1864. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, Published in Cooperation with the Institute for Southern Studies of the University of South Carolina, 2007.

Southwestern Humor (circa 1830–1865)

The term Southwestern humor is used to describe (somewhat confusingly, for contemporary readers) a class of works written during the decades before the CIVIL WAR and set in the “Old Southwest”—a region only vaguely defined but imagined by some to encompass the present-day states of Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Texas. Like other regional literatures, Southwestern humor relies heavily on the depiction of vernacular speech and lifestyles characteristic of the area (see DIALECT OR VERNACULAR WRITING). Comic effects are often achieved through contrasts between the narrator's educated speech and manners and the dialect and vulgarity of those he encounters (the narrators in this distinctly masculine form are almost invariably male). Much Southwestern humor draws on folktale conventions, especially upon the exaggeration of the TALL TALE. Frequent use is made of stock characters such as the "roarer" (braggart), the backwoodsman, and the confidence man. Narration is often devoted to activities considered peculiarly or particularly regional: camp revivals, cockfights, and gambling, for example.

Augustus Baldwin LONGSTREET's GEORGIA SCENES (1835) and early issues of Davy Crockett's Almanack (see DAVY CROCKETT) contain important early examples of the genre. Other significant works include William T. Thompson's Major Jones's Courtship (1843), Johnson Jones Hooper's Some Adventures of Simon Suggs (1845), T. B. THORPE's The Mysteries of the Backwoods (1846), Joseph Glover BALDWIN's The Flush Times of Alabama and Mississippi (1853), and George Washington HARRIS's Sut Lovingood (1867). Many Southwestern humor pieces were first published in newspapers; William T. Porter's SPIRIT OF THE TIMES played an especially important role in bringing national attention to authors such as Hooper, Thorpe, and Harris. The influences of Southwestern humor conventions are evident in the writings of Samuel L. CLEMENS (Mark Twain), among others, and critics have also seen their influence continuing into the mid-twentieth-century work of Southern writers such as William Faulkner, Flannery O'Connor, and Dorothy Allison.

Sources

- Cohen, Hennig, and William B. Dillingham. Humor of the Old Southwest, third edition. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1994.
- Essid, Joe, and Erin Bartels. Spirit of the Southern Frontier: An Archive of Antebellum Humor, Journalism, and Folkways. <<http://writing2.richmond.edu/spirit/about.html>> (viewed August 7, 2007).
- Griffith, Nancy Snell. Humor of the Old Southwest: An Annotated Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Sources. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1989.
- Inge, M. Thomas, and Edward J. Piacentino, eds. The Humor of the Old South. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001.
- Justus, James H. Fetching the Old Southwest: Humorous Writing from Longstreet to Twain. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2004.

—Brett Barney

Southworth, E. D. E. N. (1819–1899) novelist

Though she became a widely read novelist during the last half of the nineteenth century, Emma Dorothy Eliza Nevitte had a difficult start in life. Her father died when she was three years old, and her mother's second husband, Joshua L. Henshaw, was an unkind stepfather. After Southworth graduated from a school run by Henshaw in 1835, she began a career as a teacher. She married Frederick Southworth in 1840. The marriage was evidently an unhappy one; when in 1844 her husband deserted the family, Southworth moved to Washington, D.C. and attempted to provide for herself and her two young children by resuming teaching. After finding a teacher's salary inadequate for her family's needs, Southworth turned to authorship, contributing fiction to THE NATIONAL ERA, an abolitionist newspaper. Her first full-length novel, Retribution, was originally serialized in fifteen issues of The National Era in 1849 and was later published in book form. Southworth was a prolific writer, authoring more than sixty novels, most of which followed a similar course of serial and then book publication. During the early part of her career, the novels appeared in The National Era; later, her work was printed first in The Saturday Evening Post. One of America's best-paid writers of her time, Southworth signed an exclusive contract in 1856 for the serialization of her novels in Robert Bonner's NEW YORK LEDGER, a newspaper famous for its popular stories. Her serials were credited with increasing the circulations of both The National Era and The Ledger; circulation of the latter doubled after Southworth began writing exclusively for it. In an interview with the Washington Post several years before her death, Southworth stated that of all the people she had met over the course of her life, she never found one who had not read some of her books. She also maintained that all of her stories were true or based on truth, even the ones that seemed the most improbable. Often her stories center on female characters who find themselves abandoned and left to their own resources. Her protagonists meet their situations with passion and ingenuity, and Southworth's extraordinary appeal to her contemporary readership lay in her ability to imagine sensational or melodramatic plots for her characters who nonetheless operated within the norms of expected nineteenth-century feminine behavior. Her most famous novel is The Hidden Hand, first serialized in 1859, then twice again serialized before being published as a book in 1888.

Southworth never officially divorced her husband, nor did she remarry after his death in the early 1860s. An abolitionist and a supporter of social change and women's rights, Southworth had to work hard her entire life to maintain a degree of financial self-sufficiency, despite her literary success. Though well regarded in her lifetime, her novels were often dismissed by later critics, who considered Southworth merely a popular writer. More recently, her writings have been recovered by feminist-minded scholars interested in Southworth's representations of women and gender roles.

Sources

Boyle, Regis Louise. Mrs. E. D. E. N. Southworth, Novelist. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1939.

Southworth. The Hidden Hand or, Capitola the Madcap, edited by Joanne Dobson. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.

—Sabrina Ehmke Sergeant

Spirit of the Times (1831–1902) periodical

Founded in 1831 by William T. Porter, Spirit of the Times is generally considered to have been the first nonspecialized sports journal in the United States. Horace GREELEY worked as a typesetter on early issues. Spirit of the Times covered a wide variety of sports, including horse racing, baseball, fishing, yachting, fox hunting, and (late in the century) football; it also published theater news, nature sketches, and humor pieces. The magazine's eclecticism is indicated by some of its subtitles: A Gazette of the Literary, Fashionable and Sporting World and A Chronicle of the Turf, Field Sports, Literature and the Stage. Thomas B. THORPE and George Washington HARRIS are among several authors who first gained recognition as humor writers for the magazine. "THE BIG BEAR OF ARKANSAS" by Thorpe first appeared in Spirit of the Times in 1841; the periodical also featured some of Harris's "Sut Lovingood" sketches.

Source

Yates, Norris Wilson. William T. Porter and the Spirit of the Times: A Study of the Big Bear School of Humor. Baton Rouge: University of Louisiana Press, 1957.

—Brett Barney

Spofford, Harriet Prescott (1835–1921) short-story writer, novelist, poet

Born in Calais, Maine, Harriet Prescott began her writing career out of financial necessity. She published in Boston newspapers but failed to raise either much money or her profile until, in 1858, she submitted "In a Cellar," a story about jewels and international diplomacy, to THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, where it was published the following year to great acclaim. Over the next sixty years she published hundreds of stories, novels, poems, and essays, most of which clung to romantic (see ROMANCE) and GOTHIC conventions even after these genres went out of style. "The Amber Gods" (1863), the title story of her first collection, remains her best-known work, and with its vain, untrustworthy narrator, perhaps her most modern. In 1865 Harriet Prescott married Richard S. Spofford; they lived in Washington, D.C., whose LOCAL COLOR she captured in Old Washington (1906).

Source

Halbeisen, Elizabeth Kobus. Harriet Prescott Spofford: A Romantic Survival. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1935.

Stanton, Elizabeth Cady (1815–1902) suffragist, editor, autobiographer

There is not one impulse of gratitude in my soul for any of the fragmentary privileges which by slow degrees we have wrung out of our oppressors during the last half century, nor will there be so long as woman is robbed of all the essential rights of citizenship.

—Letter, NWSA Convention (1889)

A native of Johnstown, New York, Elizabeth Cady attended the coed academy in Johnstown until the age of fifteen, when she enrolled in the highly regarded Troy Female Seminary in Troy, New York. Her father was a prominent lawyer whose office adjoined their house; she read law there, and he pointed out to her gender inequities in the law, which she later attacked.

In 1840 Elizabeth Cady married the journalist and abolitionist Henry Stanton. Her career as an activist began on her honeymoon, when the couple attended a World Anti-Slavery Convention in London. Elizabeth Cady Stanton met the Philadelphia abolitionist Lucretia Mott, but because women delegates were excluded from the conference, neither woman was allowed to take the floor. Eight years later they organized the first Women's Rights Convention in Seneca Falls, New York, where Stanton wrote a Declaration of Sentiments calling for higher education and professional opportunities for women, property rights for married women, the right of women to divorce, and a woman's right to vote (see SUFFRAGISM).

Over the next decade, Stanton reared seven children while continuing to attend women's rights conventions. In 1852 she met her lifelong friend and collaborator, Susan B. ANTHONY. Both women made a radical gesture by wearing the clothing popularized by Amelia BLOOMER. Although Stanton said that she "forged the thunderbolts" and Anthony "fired them," Stanton was in truth a successful writer and orator. Her statement may have referred to the difference in the two women's temperaments, which frequently tested, but never dissolved, their working relationship.

During the CIVIL WAR, Stanton and Anthony worked for the Women's Loyal League, which raised money for the Union army. When the war was over they assumed that they, together with African Americans, had been granted the voting franchise by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Constitutional Amendments. Bitterly disappointed by the defeat of the movement for women's suffrage, Stanton and Anthony split off from Lucy STONE's American Woman Suffrage Association, which worked for black-male suffrage, and founded the National Woman Suffrage Association (NWSA). Between 1868 and 1870, the NWSA published a periodical, Revolution, edited by Stanton and Anthony. Stanton's bid for a seat in the U.S. Congress failed in 1868, but the next year she was elected president of the NWSA. In 1890, when the organization reunited with the American Woman Suffrage Association to become the National American Woman Suffrage Association, Stanton became the new group's first president.

In her later years Stanton became increasingly radical. Together with Anthony and fellow suffragist Mathilda Gage, Stanton wrote the first three volumes of History of Woman Suffrage (1881–1886). The 1895 publication of The Woman's Bible, by Stanton and a twenty-five-member "Revising Committee," concluded that "the Bible in its teachings degrades Women from Genesis to Revelation." This evaluation proved incendiary, causing Stanton to be censured not only by organized religion but also by the National American Woman Suffrage Association. Stanton published her autobiography, Eighty Years and More, in 1898.

Sources

Banner, Lois W. Elizabeth Cady Stanton: A Radical for Woman's Rights. Boston: Little, Brown, 1980.

DuBois, Ellen Carol, ed. The Elizabeth Cady Stanton–Susan B. Anthony Reader: Correspondence, Writings, Speeches. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1992.

Gornick, Vivian. The Solitude of Self: Thinking about Elizabeth Cady Stanton. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2005.

Griffith, Elisabeth. In Her Own Right: The Life of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Stedman, Edmund Clarence (1833–1908) poet, critic

Born in Connecticut, Edmund Clarence Stedman studied at Yale for two years before moving to New York City, where he worked as a journalist and a stockbroker. The influence of the latter experience can be seen in his most famous work, the poem "Pan in Wall Street" (1869). An influential critic, Stedman was a supporter of Edgar Allan Poe, whose work he edited with critic George E. Woodberry (1855–1930) and published in ten volumes in 1894–1895. Stedman also was among the first to recognize Walt Whitman as a formidable writer of the nineteenth century. Although Stedman published numerous volumes of poetry, collected in Poetical Works (1873), his criticism—particularly that in Victorian Poets (1875) and Poets of America (1886, revised 1887)—is considered his major achievement. His Library of American Literature from the Earliest Settlement to the Present Time (11 volumes, 1889–1890) and An American Anthology (1900), a collection of 1,740 poems by 573 authors, helped to promote an appreciation of American literature.

Source

Scholnick, Robert J. Edmund Clarence Stedman. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

Stephens, Ann Sophia (1810–1886) editor, novelist

Ann Sophia Stephens was born in Connecticut. She wrote prolifically in multiple genres and edited and co-edited periodicals, including the Ladies' Companion, GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE, Peterson's Magazine, Frank Leslie's Lady's Gazette, and Mrs. Stephens' New Monthly. Stephens became a celebrity author of serialized novels, which kept her name constantly in the view of readers of popular magazines. Fashion and Famine (1854) and The Old Homestead (1855) were best-sellers. She contributed seven works to Erastus BEADLE's series of DIME NOVELS, beginning with MALAESKA (1860). Well known as a writer of historical romances, Stephens chose diverse women protagonists—white, Native American, and multiracial. Alongside Sara Josepha HALE, she is among the most important women editors of nineteenth-century America.

Source

Patricia Okker. Social Stories: The Magazine Novel in Nineteenth-Century America. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2003.

—Amy Cummins

Stockton, Frank R. (1834–1902) short-story writer, novelist

Born in Philadelphia, Frank R. Stockton was by training an engraver and draftsman. He began his literary career writing children's stories, many of which appeared in ST. NICHOLAS magazine, where Stockton was an assistant editor from 1873 to 1881. Early in his career he also worked for various Philadelphia and New York newspapers, contributed humor pieces to magazines such as VANITY FAIR, and joined the staff at Scribner's Monthly. His first novel, Rudder Grange (1879), about a newlywed couple who set up housekeeping aboard a canal boat, made him a celebrity. Due to the popularity of the book, Stockton later produced two sequels: The Rudder Granges Abroad (1891) and Pomona's Travels (1894).

The success of his story "THE LADY OR THE TIGER?" (1882) made it possible for Stockton to devote himself to writing adult fiction that, like his children's fiction, emphasized the fanciful and the absurd. In what is generally considered his best novel, The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine (1886), for example, Stockton used realistic details to underscore absurdity in a plot involving two widows, an overpopulated desert island, and a series of marriages. Two years later he published a sequel, The Dusantes (1888).

Stockton also wrote one of the first science-fiction stories, "A Tale of Gravity," which appeared in the December 1884 issue of THE CENTURY MAGAZINE. Many of his later works, such as The Great War Syndicate (1889), The Great Stone of Sardis (1898), and A Vizier of the Two Horned Alexander (1899), also are concerned with pseudoscientific matters.

Stockton spent the last three years of his life in West Virginia, territory he had explored in the novels The Late Mrs. Null (1886) and Ardis Claverden (1890). In 1902 he published Kate Bonnet, a send-up of romantic pirate tales.

Sources

Golemba, Henry L. Frank R. Stockton. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
Griffin, Martin J. Frank R. Stockton: A Critical Biography. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1939.

Stoddard, Charles Warren (1843–1909) poet, travel writer

Born in Rochester, New York, Charles Warren Stoddard was educated in Oakland, California, and it was in the Golden State that he made the acquaintance of Bret HARTE. Stoddard contributed to Harte's magazine, THE GOLDEN ERA, and Harte edited Stoddard's first book of verse, Poems (1867). Stoddard then commenced a prolonged period of foreign travel that was recommended to improve his health. Two trips to Hawaii and one to Tahiti resulted in his homoerotic South-Sea Idyls (1873), which attracted many readers—Robert Louis Stevenson among them—and started a literary vogue for Polynesian culture. Journeys to Egypt and the Levant resulted in the travel accounts Mashallah! (1881) and A Cruise under the Crescent (1898).

During a prolonged stay in Hawaii (1881–1884) Stoddard wrote The Lepers of Molokai (1886), which attracted public attention to the priests who ministered to the Hawaiian leper colony. During this three-year Hawaiian sojourn, Stoddard also wrote an account of his conversion to Roman Catholicism, A Troubled Heart and How It Was Comforted at Last (1885). Critical attention to Stoddard's work has often been colored by his open homosexuality, which included a series of relationships with young boys, whom he referred to as his "kids." When he returned to the mainland, Stoddard took a position as professor of English at the University of Notre Dame (1885–1886), where he resigned after being reprimanded for liaisons with his students, then at the Catholic University of America (1889–1902).

Sources

Austen, Roger. Genteel Pagan: The Double Life of Charles Warren Stoddard. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1991.
Gale, Robert L. Charles Warren Stoddard. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1977.

Stoddard, Elizabeth Barstow (1823–1902) novelist, short-story writer, poet

Born in Mattapoisett, Massachusetts, Elizabeth Barstow moved in her late twenties to New York City, where she attended literary salons and met her husband, poet Richard Henry STODDARD. Elizabeth published three novels in quick succession: The Morgesons (1861), Two Men (1865), and Temple House (1867). All three novels were well received critically but were condemned for their immorality. Stoddard placed poetry, sketches, and short fiction in periodicals throughout her life and published a children's book, Lolly Dinks' Doings (1874) and a collection of poetry, titled Poems (1895). Much of her writing complicates the traditional distinction between ROMANTICISM and REALISM, as well as typical sentimental representations of womanhood.

Sources

Buell, Lawrence, and Sandra A. Zagarell. Biographical and critical introduction to The Morgesons and Other Writings, Published and Unpublished, by Elizabeth Stoddard. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1984, pp. xi–xxv.
Putzi, Jennifer. Introduction to Two Men, by Elizabeth Stoddard. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2008.
Smith, Robert McClure, and Ellen Weinauer, eds. American Culture, Canons, and the Case of Elizabeth Stoddard. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2003.

—Jennifer Putzi

Stoddard, Richard Henry (1825–1903) poet, editor

Born in Massachusetts, Richard Henry Stoddard was raised in poverty in New York City, where he managed to educate himself while working as an iron molder. He wrote verse influenced by the English Romantic and Victorian poets, and in 1852 he published a collection, Poems. Unable to support his family through literary endeavors, he prevailed upon his friend Nathaniel HAWTHORNE in 1853 to help him obtain a position as an inspector at the New York customhouse (a favor Stoddard later performed for Herman MELVILLE). On the basis of reviews he had written during the previous two decades for the New York World, Stoddard became literary editor of the New York Mail and Express in 1880.

Stoddard's poetry collections, including Songs of Summer (1857), Abraham Lincoln: An Horatian Ode (1865), and The Lion's Cub, and Other Poems (1890), were greatly admired in their day. Starting in 1870 Stoddard and his wife, the novelist and poet Elizabeth Drew STODDARD, hosted a literary salon that was considered the center of New York literary life; the salon was frequented by well-known figures such as Bayard TAYLOR as well as by relative unknowns such as Melville. Stoddard's position as a book reviewer gave him enormous power, which he used to introduce new authors to the reading public and to dictate literary fashions. Stoddard later went completely out of fashion; critics dismissed his verse as too mannered, too sentimental, and too derivative.

Stone, Lucy (circa 1818–1893) novelist, editor

Lucy Stone devoted her life to the causes of ABOLITIONISM and SUFFRAGISM. She began teaching school at age sixteen, and after she entered Oberlin College in 1843 she spent summers teaching at a school for African American adults who had been barred from schooling because of slavery or racial prejudice. She was the first woman to receive a bachelor's degree in the state of Massachusetts. After attending a debate led by Abby Kelley Foster and Stephen S. Foster, Stone resolved to become a public speaker. Her first address came in 1847, when she spoke on the topic of women's rights. Her marriage to Henry Blackwell in 1853 began a forty-year partnership of mutual respect. With Susan B. ANTHONY in 1866 Stone cofounded the American Equal Rights Association, which advocated the extension of suffrage to blacks and women. Parting ways with Anthony and Elizabeth Cady STANTON, Stone insisted on supporting the Fifteenth Amendment, which granted black men the right to vote. She and her husband established the American Woman Suffrage Association (AWSA) in 1870 as a rival to Anthony and Stanton's National Woman's Suffrage Association. Stone edited The Woman's Journal, the magazine of the AWSA. She continued to deliver speeches, always extemporaneous, throughout her life, addressing an audience at the Chicago World's Fair shortly before her death.

Sources

Lesser, Carol, and Marlene Deahl Merrill, eds. Friends and Sisters: Letters between Lucy Stone and Antoinette Brown Blackwell, 1846–1893. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Wheeler, Leslie, ed. Loving Warriors, Selected Letters of Lucy Stone and Henry B. Blackwell, 1853–1893. New York: Dial, 1981.

Stowe, Harriet Beecher (1811–1896) novelist

"So you're the little woman who wrote the book that started this great war!"

—President Abraham Lincoln's greeting of Harriet Beecher Stowe, according to Beecher family lore

Harriet Beecher was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, to Roxana Foote Beecher and Reverend Lyman Beecher, a prominent Calvinist clergyman. After a stint as pupil and instructor at her sister Catherine Beecher's Hartford Female Seminary, Harriet accompanied her father to Cincinnati in 1832. She married widower and biblical scholar Calvin Stowe in 1836. Stowe began her apprenticeship as a professional author in Cincinnati with the Semi-Colon Club, an informal literary and social gathering whose members encouraged her to publish.

Stowe began publishing moral tales and sketches in Cincinnati. Her religious, temperance, and antislavery themes appealed to GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK and to the New-York Evangelist. Cincinnati bordered Kentucky, a slave state, and the city featured an active antislavery movement. In 1850 Stowe settled in New Brunswick, Maine. Outraged over the Fugitive Slave Law, she wrote UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (1851–1852), which was serialized in THE NATIONAL ERA and published by John P. Jewett in 1852. The influence of this best-selling novel on nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century culture is incalculable.

Stowe's next two important works, A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin (1853) and DRED; A TALE OF THE GREAT DISMAL SWAMP (1856), revisit antislavery themes. The Key argues the injustice of slave law in righteous, but controlled, fury while identifying facts upon which Uncle Tom's Cabin was based, according to Stowe, whereas Dred dramatizes corruption and the threat of slave rebellion.

Harriet Beecher Stowe

Though antislavery themes also influence Stowe's THE MINISTER'S WOOING (1859), this later work is usually grouped with her local color works such as THE PEARL OF ORR'S ISLAND (1862) and OLDTOWN FOLKS (1869). Stowe's Lady Byron Vindicated (1870) incited public controversy by detailing poet George Gordon, Lord Byron's rumored incestuous relationship with his half sister. Shortly afterward, Stowe publicly defended her brother, New York clergyman Henry Ward Beecher, against charges of an adulterous affair.

Stowe's society novels include My Wife and I (1871), Pink and White Tyranny (1871), and We and Our Neighbors (1875). Her regional fictions also include Sam Lawson's Oldtown Fireside Stories (1872), Poganuc People (1872), and Palmetto-Leaves (1873). Stowe's remaining output—domestic advice manuals, geographies, travel narratives, sketches of historical and religious personages, moral sketches for the young—are studied, if at all, for insight into her fiction.

—Wesley Raabe

Principal Books by Stowe

Primary Geography for Children, on an Improved Plan, with Catharine Beecher. Cincinnati: Corey & Fairbank, 1833.

Prize Tale: A New England Sketch. Lowell, Mass.: Gilman, 1834.

The Mayflower; or, Sketches of Scenes and Characters among the Descendants of the Pilgrims. New York: Harper, 1843; enlarged as The May Flower, and Miscellaneous Writings. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1855.

Uncle Tom's Cabin; or, Life among the Lowly, 2 volumes. Boston: Jewett / Cleveland: Jewett, Proctor & Worthington, 1852.

Earthly Care, A Heavenly Discipline. Boston: Jewett / Cleveland: Jewett, Proctor & Worthington, 1853 [i.e., 1852].

The Two Altars; or, Two Pictures in One. Boston: Jewett, 1852.

A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin; Presenting the Original Facts and Documents upon Which the Story is Founded. Together with Corroborative Statements Verifying the Truth of the Work. Boston: Jewett / Cleveland: Jewett, Proctor & Worthington, 1853.

Uncle Sam's Emancipation; Earthly Care, A Heavenly Discipline; and Other Sketches. Philadelphia: Hazard, 1853.

Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands, 2 volumes. Boston: Phillips, Sampson / New York: Derby, 1854.

The Christian Slave. A Drama, Founded on a Portion of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1855?

Dred; A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp, 2 volumes. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1856; republished as Nina Gordon: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp, 2 volumes. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1866.

Our Charley, and What to Do with Him. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, 1858.

The Minister's Wooing. New York: Derby & Jackson, 1859.

The Pearl of Orr's Island: A Story of the Coast of Maine. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1862.

Title page for the first edition of Stowe's abolitionist novel said to have sold more than 300,000 copies in its first year of publication

Agnes of Sorrento. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1862.

House and Home Papers, as Christopher Crowfield. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865.

Little Foxes; or, The Insignificant Little Habits which Mar Domestic Happiness, as Crowfield. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1866.

Religious Poems. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1867.

Queer Little People. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1867; enlarged edition, New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert, [1881].

The Chimney-Corner, as Crowfield. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1868.

Not one throb of anguish
 Not one tear of the oppressed
 Is forgotten by the hand
 Sorrow the Lord of Glory.
 In his patient generous bosom
 He bears the anguish of a world,
 Uncle Tom's Cabin
 Chap 12th
 Harriet Beecher Stowe
 Feb 7th 1894.

Men of Our Times; or Leading Patriots of the Day. Being Narratives of the Lives and Deeds of Statesmen, Generals, and Orators. Hartford, Conn.: Hartford Publishing / New York: Denison / Chicago: Stoddard, 1868; enlarged as The Lives and Deeds of Our Self-Made Men. Hartford, Conn.: Worthington, Dustin / Cincinnati: Queen City / Chicago: Parker, 1872.

Oldtown Folks. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1869.

The American Woman's Home: or, Principles of Domestic Science; Being a Guide to the Formation and Maintenance of Economical, Healthful, Beautiful, and Christian Homes, by Stowe and Catharine E. Beecher. New York: Ford / Boston: Brown, 1869.

Lady Byron Vindicated: A History of the Byron Controversy, from Its Beginning in 1816 to the Present Time. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1870.

Little Pussy Willow. Boston: Fields, Osgood, 1870; enlarged edition, New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert, 1880.

Pink and White Tyranny: A Society Novel. Boston: Roberts, 1871.

My Wife and I: or, Harry Henderson's History. New York: Ford, 1871.

Oldtown Fireside Stories. Boston: Osgood, 1872; enlarged as Sam Lawson's Oldtown Fireside Stories. Boston: Osgood, 1872; enlarged again, Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1881.

Palmetto-Leaves. Boston: Osgood, 1873.

Woman in Sacred History: A Series of Sketches Drawn from Scriptural, Historical, and Legendary Sources. New York: Ford, 1874; enlarged edition, New York: Ford, 1874.

We and Our Neighbors: or, The Records of an Unfashionable Street. (Sequel to "My Wife and I.") A Novel. New York: Ford, 1875.

Betty's Bright Idea. Also, Deacon Pitkin's Farm, and the First Christmas of New England. New York: Ford, 1876 [1875].

Footsteps of the Master. New York: Ford, 1877.

Poganuc People: Their Loves and Lives. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert, 1878.

A Dog's Mission; or, The Story of the Old Avery House. And Other Stories. New York: Fords, Howard & Hulbert, 1880.

The Writings of Harriet Beecher Stowe . . . In Sixteen Volumes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1896.

Regional Sketches: New England and Florida, edited by John R. Adams. New Haven, Conn.: College and University Press, 1972.

Letters

Fields, Annie. Life and Letters of Harriet Beecher Stowe. Cambridge: Riverside Press, 1897.

Studying Harriet Beecher Stowe

The critical literature on Harriet Beecher Stowe is dominated by discussions of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN. But if you were to survey the range of opinions, you could be excused for wondering whether critics have read the same book. James Baldwin in "Everybody's Protest Novel" (Partisan Review, 16 [June 1949]: 578–585) calls Uncle Tom's Cabin a "very bad novel," but Jane Tompkins in "Sentimental Power," a chapter from Sensational Designs (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985, pp. 122–146), calls it "dazzling." Both essays have been remarkably influential; both are included in Elizabeth Ammons's reprint of Uncle Tom's Cabin (New York: Norton, 1994), and together they provide essential background for more recent critical literature. While according to today's standards most readers will agree that Stowe's depiction of black characters is racist and that her advocacy of women's influence over society from within the home is outdated, attentive readers of Stowe's seemingly artless novel have discovered that it resists easy dismissal, especially from discussions of gender and ethnicity in American literature and culture.

As the amount of critical discussion is daunting, students may find that the work's publishing history provides useful contexts. Stowe's novel was initially published in THE NATIONAL ERA, an antislavery newspaper, and Barbara Hochman ably discusses it in the context of the paper and its other offerings ("Uncle Tom's Cabin in the National Era: An Essay in Generic Norms and the Contexts of Reading," Book History, 7 [2004]: 143–169). For John P. Jewett's 1852 edition as an unrivaled best-seller, see Michael Winship, "'The Greatest Book of Its Kind': A Publishing History of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin'" (American Antiquarian Society, 109 [2002]: 308–322). Another approach is to consider the work's theatrical adaptations, and Sarah Meer's Uncle Tom Mania (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2006) is an excellent place to begin.

Wider selections from recent Stowe criticism are provided in three essay collections: Transatlantic Stowe: Harriet Beecher Stowe and European Culture, edited by Denise Kohn and others (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2006); The Cambridge Companion to Harriet Beecher Stowe, edited by Cindy Weinstein (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); and Approaches to Teaching Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin, edited by Elizabeth Ammons and Susan Belasco (New York: Modern Language Association, 2000). Robert S. Levine's introduction to DRED (1856) provides a helpful overview of the historical and critical reception of that work (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006, pp. viii–xxxiii). The two book-length bibliographies, Margaret Holbrook Hildreth's Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Bibliography (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1976) and Jean W. Ashton's Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977), are dated, but they provide a record of earlier critical opinion. Comprehensive assessments of recent criticism are provided by survey essays in American Literary Scholarship, edited by David J. Nordloh and others.

Stowe's LOCAL COLOR and society novels are treated in Ann Douglas's The Feminization of American Culture (New York: Knopf, 1977). The local color works include THE MINISTER'S WOOING (1859), THE PEARL OF ORR'S ISLAND (1862), OLDTOWN FOLKS (1869), Sam Lawson's Oldtown Fireside

Stories (1872), Palmetto-Leaves (1873), and Pogonuc People (1878). Lawrence Buell's New England Literary Culture (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986) compares some of Stowe's regional writings to those of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Lisa Watt Macfarlane in "The New England Kitchen Goes Uptown: Domestic Displacements in Harriet Beecher Stowe's New York" (New England Quarterly, 64, no. 2 [1991]: 272–291) analyzes two of Stowe's society novels, My Wife and I (1871) and We and Our Neighbors (1875). Stowe's remaining output—domestic advice manuals, geographies, travel narratives, sketches of historical and religious personages, moral sketches for the young—are less frequently studied.

Joan D. Hedrick's Harriet Beecher Stowe: A Life (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994) is highly recommended. It can be supplemented by biographies of Stowe's noted siblings: Kathryn Kish Sklar, Catharine Beecher: A Study in American Domesticity (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1973); Barbara Anne White, The Beecher Sisters (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003); and Debby Applegate, The Most Famous Man in America: The Biography of Henry Ward Beecher (New York: Doubleday, 2006). The published record of Stowe's letters is woefully inadequate as compared to other literary authors of her stature.

The Uncle Tom's Cabin & American Culture website (<<http://www.iath.virginia.edu/utc/>> viewed August 7, 2007) provides online texts of Uncle Tom's Cabin, as well as sources, reviews, interpretive essays, and exhibits. Chadwyck-Healey's Literature Online (LION), a database available only through library subscription, provides searchable texts of a larger selection of Stowe's writings. Students who do not have access to LION can find a generous selection of Stowe's texts at Wright American Fiction, 1851–1875 (<<http://www.letrs.indiana.edu/web/w/wright2/>> viewed August 7, 2007).

—Wesley Raabe

Suffragism (circa 1848–1920)

The struggle for the right to vote primarily concerned two groups of Americans, blacks and women. Inevitably, the abolitionist movement (see ABOLITIONISM) and the suffragist movement were bound together for much of the second half of the nineteenth century. The public call for suffragism can be traced to the Woman's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, New York, in July 1848, organized by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott. Both active in the antislavery campaign, the two had met eight years earlier at a World Anti-Slavery Convention where women delegates were denied the floor because of their gender. Realizing that women could not fight slavery if they themselves were denied the voting franchise, Stanton and Mott drafted a Declaration of Sentiments, modeled on the Declaration of Independence, in which the most radical demand was for what came to be known as woman suffrage.

During the CIVIL WAR most suffragists turned their attention to the war effort, but immediately afterward many found their hopes dashed when the Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1866, granted the full rights of citizenship to African American men alone. The Fifteenth Amendment, ultimately ratified in 1870 and specifically granting African American men the right to vote, split the suffragist movement in two. While some feminist leaders like Lucy Stone and Julia Ward Howe urged women to set their aspirations aside in order to work for black suffrage, another camp, led by Stanton and Susan B. Anthony refused to subordinate their own demands for the franchise. In the women's rights magazine Revolution, Stanton expressed opposition to the Fifteenth Amendment due to its exclusion of women's voting rights.

Stanton began to lobby for a woman suffrage amendment to the Constitution in 1869. The movement for a Constitutional amendment gained momentum during the Progressive Era, which lasted roughly from 1890 to World War I. During this period the suffragists healed their rift and linked the need for a women's ballot to such causes as labor reform, peace, and temperance. Reformers like Jane Addams, Ida B. Wells-Barnett, and the author Charlotte Perkins Gilman all spoke out in favor of woman suffrage.

Eventually, World War I freed women from many traditional social constraints. With so many men fighting the war in Europe, women flooded into the workplace. President Woodrow Wilson, previously opposed to woman suffrage, now bowed to necessity and, citing the need for national unity in time of war, endorsed the Nineteenth Amendment. When it was ratified in 1920, women were granted full citizenship, including the right to vote.

Sources

Kugler, Israel. From Ladies to Women: The Organized Struggle for Woman's Rights in the Reconstruction Era. New York: Greenwood Press, 1987.

Stalcup, Brenda. Women's Suffrage. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2000.

Terborg-Penn, Rosalyn. African American Women in the Struggle for the Vote, 1850–1920. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1998.

The Sacco-Vanzetti Case (1921–1927)

The case of two Italian immigrants accused of robbery and murder touched off a series of protests. Their 1921 trial and execution on August 22, 1927, inspired novels, verse, and drama by many American writers.

Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were tried and convicted for the murder of a paymaster of a shoe company and his guard in South Braintree, Massachusetts, on April 15, 1920. The two men were anarchists, and many people at the time assumed their execution was a result of prejudice against their political beliefs and their ethnicity. The Russian Revolution of 1917 had provoked a “Red Scare” and hostility against labor unions such as the International Workers of the World. Both men denied any involvement in the murders. In 1961 tests on Sacco’s gun seemed to confirm his complicity in the crime; the case continues to be debated.

Anger and grief over the fate of these two men poured out in works such as Maxwell ANDERSON’s play WINTERSET (produced 1935); John DOS PASSOS’s The Big Money (1938), the final novel of his U.S.A. trilogy; James T. FARRELL’s Bernard Clare (1946) and Katherine Anne PORTER’s The Never-Ending Wrong (1977), an account of her involvement in the case.

Sources

- Avich, Paul. Sacco and Vanzetti: The Anarchist Background. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1991.
- Felix, David. Protest: Sacco-Vanzetti and the Intellectuals. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1965.

Sacco, Nicola. The Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti, edited by Marion Denman Frankfurter and Gardner Jackson. New York: Viking, 1928.

Young, William, and David E. Kaiser. Postmortem: New Evidence in the Case of Sacco and Vanzetti. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

The Sacred Wood by T. S. Eliot (London: Methuen, 1920) criticism

T. S. ELIOT’s first volume of literary criticism, The Sacred Wood, is comprised of his literary journalism (mostly book reviews) of 1917–1920 and several longer essays from the same period. In the most substantial essay, “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” Eliot maintained that the two terms, usually considered opposites, should be thought of as complements, both necessary for a healthy literary culture. He defined “tradition” as an “ideal order of monuments,” a living whole that was continuously being modified by the appearance of new works of art. In essays on Dante, William Blake, and English Renaissance dramatists, including William Shakespeare, Eliot outlined post-Romantic concepts of impersonality and objectivity, arguing that emotion in art should be expressed by finding an “objective correlative”—an object that would be the “formula for that particular emotion.” Poetry, he suggested, need not serve social or moral ends; criticism, on the other hand, should serve poetry by illuminating it. In arguing that critics should treat poetry “primarily as poetry and not another thing,” he anticipated the NEW CRITICISM. Received as a postwar recovery of detachment in criticism, The Sacred Wood has remained a touchstone of literary neoclassicism.

Source

Shusterman, Richard. T. S. Eliot and the Philosophy of Criticism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

—Jewel Spears Brooker

Sanctuary by William Faulkner (New York: Cape & Smith, 1931) novel

William FAULKNER originally wrote Sanctuary—which he called “the most horrific tale I could imagine”—as a money-making venture; however, he heavily revised the galleys of his original draft rather than allow it to be published. The novel tells the story of Temple Drake, a University of Mississippi coed who on a weekend outing with her boyfriend ends up at the Old Frenchman Place, the home of Lee Goodwin, a bootlegger. There, she is raped with a corn cob by Popeye, an impotent mobster working with Goodwin. Popeye, who murders one of Goodwin’s workers, kidnaps Temple and sets her up in a Memphis brothel. Another key character in the novel is lawyer Horace Benbow, who defends Lee Goodwin when he is wrongly accused of the murder. Benbow tracks down Temple in the brothel, but instead of exonerating Goodwin she lies and testifies to his guilt. Shortly thereafter, Goodwin is lynched by townspeople on the courthouse square. Popeye is later hanged for a murder he did not commit. Sanctuary sold better than any of Faulkner’s previous novels and attracted international notice.

Sources

Arnold, Edwin T. Reading Faulkner: Sanctuary. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Modern Critical Interpretations of William Faulkner’s Sanctuary. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.

Canfield, J. Douglas, ed. Twentieth Century Interpretations of Sanctuary. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Spectrum, 1982.

Faulkner, William. Sanctuary: The Original Text, edited by Noel Polk. New York: Random House, 1981.

Rousselle, Melinda McLeod. Annotations to William Faulkner’s Sanctuary. New York: Garland, 1989.

—John B. Padgett

Sandburg, Carl (1878–1967) poet, biographer, children’s author

*My people are gray, pigeon gray, dawn gray, storm gray.
I call them beautiful, and I wonder where they are going.*

—“My People” (1922)

Carl Sandburg, son of poor Swedish immigrant parents, was born and raised in Galesburg, Illinois. As a boy he did many odd jobs to supplement the family income. In 1897, he traveled as a hobo and observed great disparities between the poor and the rich, an experience that instilled in him a distrust of capitalism. After serving in the SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, he returned to his hometown and enrolled at Lombard College, where he studied the classics. He never finished his degree, but his college years contributed to shaping his literary talents and political views.

After leaving Lombard, Sandburg worked as a journalist in Milwaukee and for the Social Democratic Party in Wisconsin, serving briefly as the secretary for the first socialist mayor of Milwaukee. He published his first poems, In Reckless Ecstasy (1904), under the name Charles A. Sandburg because he believed “Carl” revealed his Swedish heritage too plainly. He married and began a family before moving to Chicago, where he again worked as a journalist.

Sandburg remained unknown as a poet until 1914 when a group of his poems were published by Harriet MONROE in POETRY and he was awarded the Levinson Prize. In quick succession, as Carl Sandburg, he published books of poetry that made him a leader of the CHICAGO RENAISSANCE: Chicago Poems (1916), which includes “CHICAGO” and “Fog”; Cornhuskers (1918), a celebration of the life of the plains that includes “PRAIRIE” as well as war poems inspired by his experience as a correspondent during WORLD WAR I; and Smoke and Steel (1920), a collection that mixes poems about human cruelty with lyrical domestic poems. Sandburg showed an abiding interest in the speech of Midwesterners by using the language of the working class, which was a distinctive feature of his poetry.

While he continued to publish poetry, Sandburg also wrote children’s fiction: Rootabaga Stories (1922), Rootabaga Pigeons (1923), and Potato Face (1930). Charming and whimsical, these stories were well received. He became a successful lecturer and wandering troubadour, singing folk songs, reading his poetry, and talking philosophy. He collected ballads and published them in The American Songbag (1927). His main project became his six-volume life of Abraham Lincoln (1926–1939), for which he won a PULITZER PRIZE in history in 1940. As he worked on the Lincoln biography, Sandburg was also writing the prose poem THE PEOPLE, YES (1936), a poem of affirmation that was published during the depths of the GREAT DEPRESSION.

In 1945, Sandburg relocated to Flat Rock, North Carolina, where he lived until his death. His only novel, Remembrance Rock, a family saga ranging from the beginnings of America at Plymouth Rock to the 1940s, was published in 1948. He won a Pulitzer Prize in literature for his Complete Poems (1950) and also published a lively autobiography, Always the Young Strangers, in 1953. Chiefly remembered for his work on Lincoln and for his poetry, Sandburg brought a robust new voice to urban life and is regarded as an important successor to Walt Whitman because of his free-verse technique and because his poems celebrate the American spirit and the common people.

Sources

- Callahan, North. Carl Sandburg, Lincoln of Our Literature: A Biography. New York: New York University Press, 1970.
- Mitgang, Herbert, ed. The Letters of Carl Sandburg. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1968.
- Salwak, Dale. Carl Sandburg: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988.
- Yannella, Philip. The Other Carl Sandburg. Jackson: University of Mississippi, 1996.

—Skye L. Suttie

Sandoz, Mari (1896–1966) historian, biographer, novelist

Mari Sandoz, who grew up in an impoverished farm family in the high plateau of the Niobrara River region of northwestern Nebraska, had an eighth-grade education when she began her teaching career in county schools. She was eventually able to attend the University of Nebraska as a special student. Old Jules (1935)—a biography of the land and the frontier community in which she grew up as well as of her irascible Swiss-immigrant father—is the first of her many books about the trans-Missouri region. In such subsequent nonfiction works such as Crazy Horse: The Strange Man of the Oglalas (1942), Cheyenne Autumn (1953), The Buffalo Hunters: The Story of the Hide Men (1954), The Cattlemen: From the Rio Grande across the Far Marias (1958), and The Beaver Men: Spearheads of Empire (1964), Sandoz evokes the history of the Great Plains region. Her novels include Slogum House (1937), the story of a ruthless woman, an allegorical representative of fascism, who involves her family in theft, prostitution, and murder; Capital City (1939), which concerns political corruption; and The Tom-Walkers (1947), about members of the Stone family who suffer wounds in the Civil War, WORLD WAR I, and WORLD WAR II.

Source

- Stauffer, Helen Winter. Mari Sandoz: Story Catcher of the Plains. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1982.

Santayana, George (1863–1952) philosopher, poet, novelist

Born in Spain, George Santayana was brought to the United States in 1872. His education included studies in Germany and England, and he earned a Ph.D. from Harvard in 1889, where until 1912 he taught philosophy. Santayana's neo-traditionalist poetry, written mainly before he entered his forties, was published in Sonnets and Other Verses (1894; enlarged 1896), the verse play Lucifer: A Theological Trag- edy (1899; revised 1924), and A Hermit of Carmel (1901). He wrote about aesthetics in The Sense of Beauty (1896) and produced a five-volume work of philosophy, The Life of Reason (1905–1906). Much of Santayana's work in philosophy and literature has to do with attempts to reconcile the materialist and idealist views of life—that is, the conflict between those who see the world in terms of matter and motion and those who see it as immaterial or as a projection of the mind.

Although Santayana wrote many other works of philosophy, his standing in American literature is due primarily to his novel The Last Puritan (1935), which explores the decline of Calvinism and the Puritan mentality in American culture. Also important is his memoir, Persons and Place, published as separate volumes: The Backgrounds of My Life (1944), The Middle Span (1945), and My Host the World (1953).

Sources

- Dawidoff, Robert. The Genteel Tradition and the Sacred Rage: High Culture vs. Democracy in Adams, James, and Santayana. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.
- Price, Kenneth M., and Robert C. Letiz III, eds. Critical Essays on George Santayana. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1991.

Saroyan, William (1908–1981) short-story writer, novelist, playwright

William Saroyan was born to Armenak and Takooki Saroyan, Armenian immigrants living in Fresno, California. His father died when Saroyan was three, and he and his siblings were sent to an orphanage in Oakland. In 1915 the children returned to live with their mother. The legacy of his parents' expatriation combined with his childhood experiences instilled in Saroyan a sense of rootlessness that informs his fiction.

Saroyan's first success was his The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze and Other Stories (1934), a collection of stories that, faithful to the book's preface, defy convention and express an almost anarchic individualism. Saroyan began a successful career in theater when a dramatic version of one of his short stories ran on Broadway as My Heart's in the Highlands (produced 1939)—although Saroyan apparently never approved of the play. The production of THE TIME OF YOUR LIFE (produced 1939) failed to impress Saroyan as well, but the published version won the 1940 PULITZER PRIZE. Saroyan refused the $1,000 prize on the grounds that giving awards to artists in effect tells the audience what to think about art.

Saroyan's most notable novels are THE HUMAN COMEDY (1943) and The Laughing Matter (1953). His memoirs and other short prose are collected in My Name is Aram (1940), The Bicycle Rider in Beverly Hills (1952), and Here Comes, There Goes, You Know Who (1961).

Sources

- Keyishian, Harry, ed. Critical Essays on William Saroyan. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.

Lee, Lawrence, and Barry Gifford. Saroyan: A Biography. New York: Harper & Row, 1984.

Saroyan, Aram. William Saroyan. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983.

The Saturday Evening Post (1821–1969) periodical
Originally a local Philadelphia publication, The Saturday Evening Post rose to a circulation of 90,000 in 1855 but declined to such an extent that it was purchased for $1,000 by Cyrus Curtis in 1897. In the twentieth century the weekly became a national magazine under managing editor George Horace Lorimer (1899–1936), reaching the one-million mark in circulation by 1909 and the three-million mark before he retired. With its covers often supplied by Norman Rockwell, who was associated with the magazine from 1919 to 1963, the Post abetted and created middle-class American values and attitudes, from its articles and fiction to its abundant advertising. Although the popular stories published in the magazine were often formulaic and were attacked by critics such as Upton SINCLAIR as being as “standardized as soda crackers,” Lorimer’s magazine also published the work of many distinguished authors, from Frank NORRIS, Stephen CRANE, Jack LONDON, Willa CATHER, and David Graham PHILLIPS to Ring LARDNER, F. Scott FITZGERALD, William FAULKNER, and John P. MARQUAND. The Saturday Evening Post continued to thrive through the 1950s but began to decline in readership in the 1960s. It ceased publication in 1969, but was revived in 1971, appearing less frequently.

Source

Cohn, Jan. Creating America: George Horace Lorimer and “The Saturday Evening Post.” Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1989.

The Saturday Review of Literature (1924–1942) periodical

The Saturday Review of Literature was founded by Yale University professor Henry Seidel Canby, who had been the editor of the weekly “Literary Review” section of the New York Post. When the newspaper was bought by Cyrus Curtis, the publisher of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST and Ladies’ Home Journal, Canby and his staff resigned, which then led to the creation of the new, independent magazine. According to Canby, who was the editor from 1924 to 1936, the weekly “was The Literary Review come of age, more humorous, wiser, more literary, better printed, but with the same will to further the cause of good thinking, good feeling, good writing, and good books.” Although Canby, who was also chairman of the editorial board of the BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB, was sometimes attacked for fostering mediocrity in American letters, his magazine became the most influential literary review in the country. The review became more liberal and active under editor Norman Cousins, who became its guiding force for nearly forty years. In 1942 he shortened the title to The Saturday Review to reflect its inclusion of world events, recordings, drama, radio, television, and travel.

Schulberg, Budd (1914– ) novelist, screenwriter

Budd Wilson Schulberg’s childhood and first employment in Hollywood influenced much of his writings, including WHAT MAKES SAMMY RUN? (1941), The Disenchanted (1950), and Moving Pictures: Memoirs of a Hollywood Prince (1981). Another interest that shaped Schulberg’s career is boxing, a passion since his childhood. His knowledge of the ring is evident in his novel The Harder They Fall (1947), his screenplay for the movie On the Waterfront (1954), and the nonfiction Loser and Still Champion: Muhammad Ali (1972).

Schulberg’s father, B. P. Schulberg, was a major Hollywood figure of the 1920s and 1930s when he ran Paramount Studios. After graduating from Dartmouth College in 1936, Schulberg began his screenwriting career, joined the Communist Party, and had short stories published in mass-circulating magazines. In his first novel, What Makes Sammy Run?, Smelka Glickstein of New York’s LOWER EAST SIDE ghetto metamorphoses into slick Sammy Glick, the archetypal heel who stops at nothing to achieve movie-mogul status. With its caustic depiction of the movie industry’s inner workings and personalities, the book outraged movie people and won the National Critics’ selection as Best First Novel of the Year.

During WORLD WAR II, Schulberg served as a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy (1943–1946) and participated in gathering photographic evidence of war crimes for The Nazi Plan, a four-hour cinematic indictment that opened the Nuremberg Trials. He resumed his literary career with The Harder They Fall, an exposé of the greed that turned a “fine sport into a dirty business.” Through the brutal exploitation of an Argentine peasant billed as El Toro Molina, a character loosely based on Italian heavyweight Primo Carnera, Schulberg shows how the corruption of boxing degrades all who are involved.

Schulberg based his penetrating novel The Disenchanted in part upon his collaboration with F. Scott FITZGERALD on the movie Winter Carnival (1939). One-time brilliant novelist Manly Halliday is teamed with writer Shep Stearns to write the screenplay for Love on Ice, a romantic comedy shot on location at a New England college based on Dartmouth. Their trip to the campus starts with celebratory champagne that triggers Halliday’s bender. His comeback and Stearns’s opportunity at a bright writing future crash as Halliday succumbs to the ghosts of his past. The 1959 play adaptation was written by Schulberg and Harvey Breit.

In May 1951 amid the “red scare,” Schulberg testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) about Hollywood communists. “What’s painful,” Schulberg later explained, “is to have believed in something that sounded so right, and that turned out the way the Soviet Union turned out.”

On the Waterfront, a movie about mob control of the docks, was directed by Elia Kazan and won eight Oscars, including best screenplay for Schulberg. Kazan and Schulberg collaborated again on A Face in the Crowd (1957), drawn from his story "Your Arkansas Traveller," in which a singing hobo becomes a television sensation whose belief in his fame and power leads to his downfall. Schulberg's next movie, Wind Across the Everglades (1958), is set in the early twentieth century and deals with an alcoholic conservationist's efforts at protecting the Florida Everglades from real-estate developers and poachers. In response to the destruction of the 1965 Los Angeles riots, Schulberg created the Watts Writers' Workshop, producing From the Ashes (1967), a collection drawn from these first writing efforts.

Sources

Beck, Nicholas. Budd Schulberg: A Bio-Bibliography. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 2001.

Schulberg, Budd. "Two Conversations," interviews by Kurt Vonnegut and Matthew J. Brucoli, Paris Review, no. 160 (Winter 2001): 87–137.

—Michael Edelson

Schwartz, Delmore (1913–1966) poet, editor, short-story writer

A native of Brooklyn, Delmore Schwartz is often included in histories of the New York Intellectuals. He studied philosophy at Washington Square College of New York. His varied first book, In Dreams Begin Responsibilities (1938), which included a title story as well as a play and poems, was published by NEW DIRECTIONS. His early success and his publication of critical essays on poetry in periodicals led to his becoming the poetry editor at PARTISAN REVIEW in 1943. His short stories, many of which deal with urban Jewish life, are collected in The World Is a Wedding (1948).

Schwartz has been praised for the lyrical quality of his poetry and prose. In both forms he was a poet of alienation, evoking his characters' sense of isolation and defeat in poignant terms. His life was the stuff of legend—in part because he made such witty and biting remarks about his fellow writers. In Saul Bellow's novel Humboldt's Gift (1975), he figures as the character Von Humboldt Fleisher. Schwartz's Last and Lost Poems appeared in 1979.

Source

Atlas, James. Delmore Schwartz: The Life of an American Poet. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1977.

Science Fiction

"Science fiction," so named in June 1929 by editor Hugo Gernsback in the first issue of Science Wonder Stories, flourished in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in books and popular magazines. Before 1895 most American science fiction described technological marvels, utopias, or time travel; after 1895 H. G. Wells's scientific romances became the dominant influence on science-fiction writers, among them Jack LONDON.

The most significant development was the success of the PULP MAGAZINES. Much American science fiction before the 1920s was published in general pulp magazines such as Argosy and All-Story. Edgar Rice BURROUGHS began his John Carter of Mars stories in All-Story in 1912; A. Merritt published The Moon Pool there in 1918 and 1919; and Ray Cummings's The Girl in the Golden Atom first appeared there in 1919 and 1920. Such works were typically romantic adventures on other planets, in hollow earths, in microscopic worlds, or in other dimensions. While some were collected into books, most remained in the magazines.

Gernsback first published his futuristic novel Ralph 124C41+ in his magazine Modern Electrics in 1911 and 1912, but he was more influential as an editor, creating the first pulp magazine devoted to what he then called "scientifiction," Amazing Stories, in 1926. There he published writers such as E. E. "Doc" Smith, whose The Skylark of Space (1928) helped to create the space opera, and Philip Francis Nowlin, the creator of Buck Rogers. After losing control of Amazing Stories, Gernsback created other magazines but found it difficult to compete with Astounding Stories of Super-Science, created in 1930. In its early years Astounding Stories published writers such as Edmond Hamilton, Clifford D. Simak, Stanley G. Weinbaum, and Jack Williamson. The "cosmic horror" of H. P. LOVECRAFT also appeared in Astounding Stories but more frequently in Weird Tales, founded in 1923.

John W. Campbell Jr. became editor of Astounding Stories in 1937, renaming it Astounding Science-Fiction in 1938. Encouraging authors to focus on ideas instead of action and adventure and to write stories that could be read as realistic fiction centuries in the future and thus moving away from pulp science fiction's weaknesses, Campbell helped to initiate the Golden Age of Science Fiction. Writers associated with this period include Isaac Asimov, L. Sprague de Camp, Lester del Rey, Robert A. Heinlein, and Theodore Sturgeon; later writers who also serve as examples of science-fiction fans becoming authors include Ray Bradbury and Frederik Pohl.

Science fiction also appeared between 1895 and 1945 in comic books and strips, in movies, and on the radio. Buck Rogers in the 25th Century (1929–1967) and Flash Gordon (1934–2003) were two popular comic strips, and both characters also appeared in motion pictures. Many superhero comic books, beginning in 1938 with the creation of Superman, were also influenced by science fiction. Most science-fiction movies and radio shows tended to adapt earlier literary works, such as Frankenstein (1930), Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1932), The Invisible Man (1933), Lost Horizon (1936), and Orson Welles's famous radio broadcast of The War of the Worlds (1938).

Sources

- Aldiss, Brian W., and David Wingrove. Trillion Year Spree: The History of Science Fiction. New York: Atheneum, 1986.
- Carter, Paul A. The Creation of Tomorrow: Fifty Years of Magazine Science Fiction. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.
- Clareson, Thomas D. Understanding Contemporary American Science Fiction: The Formative Period (1926–1970). Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990.
- James, Edward. Science Fiction in the Twentieth Century. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.

—Darren Harris-Fain

Scott, Evelyn (1893–1963) novelist

Born as Elsie Dunn in Tennessee, Evelyn Scott was raised in small towns in her native state and in New Orleans, where she attended Sophie Newcomb College. In 1913 she changed her name and moved to Brazil, beginning a period of nearly forty years in which she lived mostly as an expatriate in South America, Europe, and Canada. The author of twenty books, Scott in her first three novels—The Narrow House (1921), Narcissus (1922), and The Golden Door (1925)—explores the problems she sees in conventional marriages through an examination of three generations of the Farley family. She continued to write about characters in search of significant lives in her historical trilogy—Migrations: An Arabesque in Histories (1927), the Civil War novel The Wave (1929), and the generational saga A Calendar of Sin (1935)—covering the years from 1850 to 1914. Scott's other works include the autobiographical novel Eva Gay (1933) and two autobiographical accounts, Escapade (1923) and Background in Tennessee (1937).

Sources

- Callard, D. A. Pretty Good for a Woman: The Enigmas of Evelyn Scott. London: Cape, 1985.
- White, Mary Wheeling. Fighting the Current: The Life and Work of Evelyn Scott. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998.

Scott, Winfield Townley (1910–1968) journalist, novelist

Born in Massachusetts and educated at Brown University, from which he graduated in 1931, Winfield Townley Scott worked on the staff of The Providence Journal and began writing poetry of a distinctly regionalist flavor (see REGIONALISM), influenced by Edwin Arlington ROBINSON and Robert FROST. Scott's poetry collections include Elegy for Robinson (1936), Wind the Clock (1941), Mr. Whittier (1948), and Collected Poems, 1937–1962 (1962). After his death his notebooks were published as A Dirty Hand (1969).

Source

- Donaldson, Scott. Poet in America: Winfield Townley Scott. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1972.

The Scottsboro Boys Case (1931–1937)

The trials of nine young African American men charged with the rape of two white women galvanized the protests of the literary community and became the subject of protests by many writers, including Langston HUGHES and Lincoln STEFFENS.

The “Scottsboro boys” ranged in age from thirteen to nineteen, and only one of them was not sentenced to death. All served prison sentences. The cases were brought to the U.S. Supreme Court twice. The court found that the defendants had not received fair trials because African Americans had been excluded from serving on the juries. The case became a cause célèbre for the Communist Party and for other groups and individuals protesting American racism and injustice.

Sources

- Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South, revised edition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979.
- “Famous American Trials: ‘The Scottsboro Boys’ Trials 1931–1937.” <<http://www.law.umkc.edu/faculty/projects/ftrials/scottsboro/scottsb.htm>> (viewed February 1, 2007).
- Goodman, James E. Stories of Scottsboro. New York: Pantheon, 1994.

Scribner's Magazine (1887–1938) periodical

Founded by Charles Scribner II (1854–1930), this magazine emphasized literary fiction, biography, and cultural criticism. Beginning in 1914 under the editorship of critic Robert Bridges, Scribner's featured Edith WHARTON and Theodore Roosevelt as its important contributors. In the 1920s and 1930s it published such writers as F. Scott FITZGERALD, Ernest HEMINGWAY, Thomas WOLFE, and William FAULKNER. The magazine serialized Hemingway's A FAREWELL TO ARMS (1929) and Green Hills of Africa (1935) and Fitzgerald's TENDER IS THE NIGHT (1934).

Source

- Allen, Frederick Lewis. “Fifty Years of Scribner's Magazine,” Scribner's Magazine, 101 (January 1937): 19–24.

Charles Scribner's Sons (1846–1984) publishing house

Based in New York, the house of Scribner enjoyed financial success and literary standing under Charles Scribner II (1854–1930). Its authors during the nineteenth century included George Washington Cable, Thomas Nelson Page, Edith WHARTON, and Henry James. The imprint achieved literary glory in the 1920s and 1930s under the editorial direction of Maxwell PERKINS (1884–1947) when it changed from a conservative house to the publisher of F. Scott FITZGERALD, Ernest HEMINGWAY, and Thomas WOLFE. After the death of Perkins, the house was unable to maintain its list of important young American writers. Charles Scribner's Sons merged with Macmillan in 1984; the Scribner imprint is now used by Simon & Schuster.

Sources

Delaney, John, ed. The House of Scribner, 1846–1905: An Illustrated Chronicle, Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 13. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1997.

Delaney, ed. The House of Scribner, 1905–1930: An Illustrated Chronicle, Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 16. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1997.

Delaney, ed. The House of Scribner, 1931–1984, Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 17. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1998.

—Morris Colden

The Sea-Wolf by Jack London (New York: Macmillan, 1904) novel

The Sea-Wolf, Jack LONDON's third novel, was published in the year following the enormous success of THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903), the book that established his reputation. First published in serial form in Century Magazine from January through November of 1904, The Sea-Wolf has remained one of London's most popular and critically acclaimed novels. A naturalistic work (see NATURALISM), The Sea-Wolf focuses on the struggle of the effete gentleman narrator, Humphrey Van Weyden, who is forced to adapt to the demanding, primitive environment aboard the sealing schooner Ghost. The story is most memorable for London's depiction of the ship's vicious captain, Wolf Larsen, a man who believes "Might is right, and that is all there is to it. Weakness is wrong." London claimed the novel "was an attack upon the superman philosophy" of Friedrich Nietzsche, which he intended for Larsen to epitomize.

Source

Watson, Charles N., Jr. The Novels of Jack London: A Reappraisal. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1983.

—John Cusatis

"The Secret Life of Walter Mitty" by James Thurber (1939) short story

James THURBER's comic masterpiece "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty," originally published in THE NEW YORKER, employs characters and subjects recurrent in his work: the "little man" bedeviled by a domineering wife and other aggressive figures (in this case, an irritated traffic policeman, an insolent parking attendant, mocking female passers-by), by uncooperative machinery (here, automobiles, tire chains, "derisive" revolving doors), and by humdrum, aggravating life in general. Mitty combats these irritations by daydreaming, by casting himself as heroic figures drawn from Hollywood movies and popular fiction. Commander Mitty pilots a Navy hydroplane through a ferocious storm; Dr. Mitty repairs an "anesthetizer" with a fountain pen as he begins emergency surgery on a "millionaire banker and close personal friend of Roosevelt"; sportsman Walter Mitty reveals at his murder trial the prowess to have committed the crime; brandy-drinking Captain Mitty takes off alone on a suicide mission to blow up a German ammunition dump; and "Walter Mitty the Undefeated" disdainfully flips away his cigarette as he stands before a firing squad. The name Walter Mitty has become synonymous with a person who uses daydreams to escape reality. But the central critical question about the character is whether his daydreaming should be regarded as triumphant or pathetic. The story was collected in My World—and Welcome to It (1942).

Source

Long, Robert Emmet. James Thurber. New York: Continuum/Ungar, 1988.

—Judith S. Baughman

Sedgwick, Anne Douglas (1873–1935) novelist

When she was nine, Anne Douglas Sedgwick was taken from her native New Jersey to London, where she lived most of her life, marrying the English author Basil de Sélincourt in 1908. Sedgwick in her work took up Henry James's international theme, the relationship between Americans and old-world Europeans. Franklin Winslow Kane (1910), for example, hinges on the contrast between an American and an English couple. Adrienne Toner (1922) portrays a young American woman who fascinates her English friends. Sedgwick's stories are collected in The Nest (1913) and Christmas Roses (1920).

Source

Anne Douglas Sedgwick: A Portrait in Letters, edited by Basil de Sélincourt. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1936.

Seeger, Alan (1888–1916) poet

Alan Seeger graduated from Harvard and was living in Paris at the start of WORLD WAR I. A romantic and a fatalist, he enlisted in the French Foreign Legion in a spirit of adventure. Seeger sometimes wrote of the ugliness of war in his prose, published as Letters and Diary of Alan Seeger (1917), but does so rarely in his verse, which was collected as Poems (1916) before he was killed in an attack on Belloy-en-Santerre. His most famous poem was "I Have a Rendezvous with Death," in which a soldier imagines his meeting with Death will occur "On some scarred slope of battered hill, / When Spring comes round again this year / And the first meadow-flowers appear." Seeger, who died on the Fourth of July, was posthumously awarded the Croix de Guerre and the Médaille Militaire.

Source

Werstein, Irving. Sound No Trumpet: The Life and Death of Alan Seeger. New York: Crowell, 1967.

The Seven Arts (1916–1917) periodical

This LITTLE MAGAZINE, published monthly, promoted American talent and printed works considered too radical for conventional literary magazines. It had distinguished editors, including Waldo FRANK and Van Wyck Brooks. Among its contributors were Vachel LINDSAY, Sherwood ANDERSON, John REED, John DOS PASSOS, Theodore DREISER, and Robert FROST. The magazine's pacifist stance led to its demise during WORLD WAR I.

Sewanee Review (1892– ) periodical

Established at the University of the South, the Sewanee Review is the nation's oldest literary quarterly. Under the editorship of Andrew LYTTLE (1942–1944; 1961–1973) and Allen TATE (1944–1946), the journal in the 1940s attained widespread influence in the literary community. A succession of academic editors have maintained the journal's high quality. It is respected for its publication of Southern literature and its promulgation of the NEW CRITICISM.

Shapiro, Karl (1913–2000) poet, critic, novelist

Karl Shapiro attended the University of Virginia and Johns Hopkins University but did not earn a degree. He began to publish poetry in the 1930s, but his most intense period of writing occurred after he was drafted into the army and served in the Medical Corps in the South Pacific. Born in Baltimore, Shapiro in his poetry was conscious of his identity both as a southerner and as a Jew. His first significant collection, Person, Place and Thing (1942), was followed by V-Letter and Other Poems (1944), which won the PULITZER PRIZE, and the long poem Essay on Rime (1945), in which he attacked modern poetry. Influenced by W. H. AUDEN and William Carlos WILLIAMS, Shapiro was against what he regarded as the overly intellectualized verse of T. S. ELIOT, Ezra POUND, and the practice of poetry as approved by the New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM). He wrote intense love lyrics as well as satirical verse, often engaging with political, social, and ethnic issues as well as the nature of war. His later collections include Trial of a Poet (1947), Poems of a Jew (1958), The Bourgeois Poet (1964), White-Haired Lover (1968), Adult Bookstore (1976), and The Wild Card: Selected Poems, Early and Late (1998).

Shapiro edited POETRY (1950–1956) and taught at the University of Nebraska and the University of California at Davis. His prose includes provocative literary criticism such as Beyond Criticism (1953), a study of poetry, and In Defense of Ignorance (1960), an argument against excessive intellectualism in art. He also published a novel, Edsel (1971), about a poet-professor at a midwestern university, and his autobiography in two volumes, Poet (1988) and Reports of My Death (1990).

Sources

Bartlett, Lee. Karl Shapiro: A Descriptive Bibliography 1933–1977. New York: Garland, 1979.

Reino, Joseph. Karl Shapiro. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Sherwood, Robert E. (1896–1955) playwright, biographer

Robert Emmet Sherwood was educated at Harvard and served in WORLD WAR I. In 1919 he became a critic for VANITY FAIR, moving the next year to Life magazine, where he reviewed movies seriously, applying to this new art standards then reserved for the theater. He began having his own plays produced in the 1920s and achieved notable success with THE PETRIFIED FOREST (produced 1935) and two PULITZER PRIZE-winning dramas: Idiot's Delight (produced 1936) and Abe Lincoln in Illinois (produced 1938). His work, which directly and realistically presents important public figures and issues, has been criticized for being too didactic.

Sherwood also achieved success in Hollywood, working on more than twenty movies from the 1920s to the 1950s. He collaborated with others on the screenplay for Rebecca (1940), Alfred Hitchcock's classic movie based on the Daphne du Maurier novel. He won an Academy Award for his script for The Best Years of Our Lives (1946), an ambitious movie about American soldiers returning home, which he adapted from MacKinlay Kantor's novel.

Sherwood served in the Franklin Delano Roosevelt administration during WORLD WAR II. In Roosevelt and Hopkins: An Intimate History (1948), he wrote about his experience in the Office of War Information and earned another Pulitzer Prize.

Sources

Brown, John Mason. The Worlds of Robert E. Sherwood: Mirror to His Times, 1896–1939. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.

Shuman, R. Baird. Robert E. Sherwood. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Sholem Aleichem (1859–1916) short-story writer, critic, poet, dramatist

Born near Kiev as Sholem Yankov Rabinowitz, the writer who came to be known as his narrative persona Sholem Aleichem (“Peace be with you” in Hebrew) began his literary career in Ukraine. Forced to leave his homeland because of anti-Semitic pogroms, he came to the United States in 1906. He settled briefly in New York City, where he contributed short stories about Jewish village life to Yiddish periodicals published in the LOWER EAST SIDE, a primarily Jewish immigrant neighborhood at the time. He returned to Europe in 1907 and remained there until the outbreak of WORLD WAR I forced him to flee once more to America.

Sholem Aleichem wrote in Hebrew, Russian, and Yiddish, but he favored the last as a literary medium. Ale verk fun Sholem Aleykhem (Complete Works of Sholem Aleichem) was published in twenty-eight volumes in New York (1917–1923). He is regarded as a classic Yiddish writer, and his works have been translated into English and major European languages. In 1964 his tales of Tevye the dairyman were adapted as the Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof, which played for 3,242 performances, setting a record at the time for Broadway’s longest-running musical production.

Sources

Falstein, Louis. The Man Who Loved Laughter: The Story of Sholom Aleichem. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1968.

Frieden, Ken. Classic Yiddish Fiction: Abramovitsh, Sholem Aleichem, and Peretz. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Gittleman, Sol. Sholom Aleichem: A Non-Critical Introduction. The Hague, Netherlands: Mouton, 1974.

The Short Story

The American short story was shaped by the evolution of the periodical and literary marketplace in the first half of the twentieth century. As was shown by the successful career of William Sydney PORTER, better known by his pen name O. Henry, short stories appealed to a busy public. Writing for the New York Sunday World (1903–1906), O. Henry entertained an audience of perhaps a million New Yorkers weekly with his stories full of colorful language that favored the underdog and often had a surprise ending. From O. Henry can be traced the rise of the short story as a commodity, particularly in popular magazines such as Collier’s Weekly, Cosmopolitan, Ladies’ Home Journal, Redbook Magazine, Woman’s Home Companion, and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, which paid writers well and published hundreds of stories every year by established writers as well as by newcomers. In opposition to the more-formulaic fiction of the mass-market magazines, serious literary magazines such as THE AMERICAN MERCURY, Harper’s, SCRIBNER’S MAGAZINE, and THE SMART SET along with LITTLE MAGAZINES—important expatriate journals such as THE LITTLE REVIEW, The Transatlantic Review, This Quarter, and transition and stateside journals such as THE DIAL, The Double Dealer, PARTISAN REVIEW, THE SOUTHERN REVIEW, and STORY—provided opportunities for writers to experiment with form and to explore more-daring themes. In New York, THE CRISIS and other African American periodicals provided outlets for the story writers of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. And more chances to publish were provided by PULP MAGAZINES, so called because they were printed on cheap paper. While these magazines paid authors little, they provided forums for the development of genre fiction, including DETECTIVE FICTION, SCIENCE FICTION, and WEST-ERNS. Notable pulps included BLACK MASK, Amazing Stories, and Weird Tales.

At the turn of the century one of the most significant practitioners of the literary story was Stephen CRANE, an influential realistic-naturalistic writer whose work included “THE OPEN BOAT” (1897), “The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky” (1898), and “The Blue Hotel” (1898). A distinctive stylist who made striking use of color imagery and irony, Crane often examined the limited perspectives of his characters. Exploring the same naturalistic themes as Crane, Jack LONDON characterized his own style as “impassioned realism,” dramatizing the relentless control of nature over humans in stories such as “To Build a Fire” (1908).

In the 1910s Ring Lardner, a sportswriter by background, brought a mastery of vernacular speech and writing to his stories about Jack Keefe, a boorish baseball player who reveals himself through his letters to his friend in YOU KNOW ME AL (1916). Lardner, whose collections included HOW TO WRITE SHORT STORIES [WITH SAMPLES] (1924), specialized in humorous—mostly sardonic—monologues. “CHAMPION” (1916), “HAIRCUT” (1925), and “The Love Nest” (1925) are among his best-known stories.

Sherwood ANDERSON’s short-story cycle WINESBURG, OHIO (1919) moved fiction into a greater psychological exploration of the consciousness of isolated souls who suffer without ever discovering the deepest roots of their unexplored yearnings. Anderson probed the psychological split between the natural environment and his characters’ sense of isolated desperation. His alienated characters are regarded by their contemporaries as grotesques, a point Anderson emphasizes in titling a chapter of Winesburg “The Book of the Grotesque.”

In Anderson’s sensitive and probing exploration of misfits can be found the origins of William FAULKNER’s Gothic and eccentric characters in stories such as “A Rose for Emily” (1931). Faulkner paid tribute to Anderson as his mentor, pointing out that it was Anderson who provided the model for both the themes and techniques of modern short fiction. Anderson’s sense of place and his re-creation of small-town life, for example, clearly inspired Faulkner to explore—as he put it—his “postage stamp of native soil.”

In his first short-story collection, IN OUR TIME (1925), Ernest HEMINGWAY in Nick Adams creates a central character whose view of existence is bleaker than is George Willard's in Winesburg, Ohio. His collection is also like Anderson's in presenting short stories so interrelated in terms of theme, technique, and character that they were virtually an episodic novel. Faulkner created this kind of integrated short story collection in Go Down, Moses (1942).

Both Hemingway and Faulkner perceived that Anderson had invented a supple form of short-story collection that elevated fiction to the heights of the most sophisticated music, employing contrapuntal effects akin to the work of European masters like James Joyce and D. H. Lawrence. In Winesburg, Ohio, for example, each story examines a character's life in the town, a story that implicitly comments on and sometimes provides a counterpoint to the protagonist George Willard's aspirations and beliefs.

No major writer was more successful in the short-story market of the 1920s than was F. Scott FITZGERALD, the writer who gave a name to the decade with his collection TALES OF THE JAZZ AGE (1922). Fitzgerald was able to place stories that were too strong for the mass-market magazines in "literary" magazines—the naturalistic "MAY DAY" (1920) and the satiric "THE DIAMOND AS BIG AS THE RITZ" (1922) in The Smart Set, the controversial "Absolution" (1924) in The American Mercury—while publishing most of his best stories in The Saturday Evening Post, including "WINTER DREAMS" (1922), "ONE TRIP ABROAD" (1930), and "BABYLON REVISITED" (1931).

THE NEW YORKER, which began publishing in 1925, developed into a major force in American letters and affected the evolution of the short story. Authors associated with the magazine included the witty writers James THURBER, S. J. PERELMAN, Dorothy PARKER, and E. B. White. John O'HARA, who published more stories in The New Yorker than any other writer, became identified with the magazine as the most prominent practitioner of what came to be known as "the New Yorker story." Some of his notable early stories are "It Must Have Been Spring" (1934), "Over the River and Through the Wood" (1934), "THE DOCTOR'S SON" (1935), and "Do You Like It Here?" (1939). Another influential writer for the magazine was Irwin Shaw, whose New Yorker stories included "The Girls in Their Summer Dresses" (1939) and "Walking Wounded" (1944). Philip Stevick characterizes the stories published in the magazine as "knowing, arch, indirect, and very well written, a body of fiction . . . that has profoundly altered our sense of what a story can be." The New Yorker story gained a reputation of being a "relatively plot-free, mood-intense, character-driven story."

Fitzgerald, Hemingway, and Faulkner all used the short-story form in the 1920s and early 1930s to portray post-WORLD WAR I disillusionment. Parker used the life of a party girl to explore similar themes in "Big Blonde" (1929). Hazel Morse, for all her good times, suffers from despair. Like other modern masters of the short story, Parker dramatizes the telling moments in her characters' lives, avoiding both melodrama and sentimentality. Hazel, for example, does not succeed in her suicide attempt; she does not die of drink; instead she persists, coping as best she can with the shambles of her life.

In stories such as "Flowering Judas" (1930), Katherine Anne PORTER exhibited a command of the intricate detail of short fiction. Porter went beyond Parker, however, in exploring not only the fate and the psychology of individuals but also how their plight reflected the nature of existence itself. Thus, in "Flowering Judas" the main character, Laura, confronts her realization that the Mexican Revolution will not fulfill her political ideals. What is more, she sees that there is something inherent in idealism itself that dooms it to destruction.

In "Petrified Man" (1941), Eudora WELTY explores the environs of a beauty shop, in which each character's cruelty is revealed almost exclusively through dialogue. Like Parker, Welty is a master of irony, describing the run-down shop in which these women seek to beautify themselves. But there is a good deal of comedy in the way the characters speak, which is itself a mark of what Welty has contributed to the short-story genre: the use of satire for purposes of both social criticism and good-natured celebration of an infinite variety of human types.

In the 1930s and early 1940s such writers as Richard WRIGHT and Ralph Ellison explored racial themes in compelling short stories. In "Big Boy Leaves Home" (1938), Wright takes "Big Boy" through a 24-hour period, re-creating African American speech patterns and adapting his theme—white hostility to blacks—to the mainstream American short story's probing of a youth's initiation into life, as exemplified by Anderson's George Willard and Hemingway's Nick Adams. In "King of the Bingo Game" (1944) Ellison showed how he had absorbed Wright's social criticism and applied it to a somewhat broader, more universal study of the alienated or underground man. The protagonist of Ellison's story, a southerner confronting the alien environment of the North, has trouble as much with other African Americans as with whites as he searches for a fulfilling identity.

In every generation major American writers have contributed to the evolution of the short story. Among the classics are Zora Neale HURSTON's "Sweat" (1926), Erskine CALDWELL's "Saturday Afternoon" (1931), Willa CATHER's "Neighbour Rosicky" (1932), Langston HUGHES's "The Blues I'm Playing" (1934), William SAROYAN's "The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze" (1934), Conrad AIKEN's "Silent Snow, Secret Snow" (1934), Kay BOYLE's "Astronomer's Wife" (1936), William Carlos WILLIAMS's "The Use of Force" (1938), John STEINBECK's "The Chrysanthemums" (1938), and Irwin Shaw's "The Eighty-Yard Run" (1941).

Sources

Gelfant, Blanche H., and Lawrence Graver, eds. The Columbia Companion to the Twentieth-Century American Short Story. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.

Gerlach, John. Toward the End: Closure and Structure in the American Short Story. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1985.

Lohafer, Susan. Coming to Terms with the Short Story. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.

May, Charles. The Short Story: The Reality of Artifice. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Stevick, Philip, ed. The American Short Story: 1900–1945: A Critical History. New York: Twayne, 1984.

Voss, Arthur. The American Short Story: A Critical Survey. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.

Werlock, Abby H. P. The Facts On File Companion to the American Short Story. New York: Facts On File, 2000.

—Patrick Meanor

Show Boat by Oscar Hammerstein II (produced 1927) musical play

Edna FERBER's popular novel Show Boat (1926) was the source of a landmark American musical of the same title that opened December 27, 1927, on Broadway for 572 performances. The success as a musical of Ferber's epic story of life on the Cotton Blossom, a Mississippi River showboat, results from Oscar HAMMERSTEIN II's skillful focusing of the sweeping tale on the forty-year travails of Magnolia Hawks, daughter of bighearted showboat owner Captain Andy, and her husband, gambler Gaylord Ravenal. Hammerstein sets the couple's bittersweet marriage against both the humor of Captain Andy's relationship with his domineering wife and a tragic subplot involving Julie La Verne, mulatto star of his showboat. Although Magnolia ultimately finds stage success and personal fulfillment, Hammerstein makes it clear that her happiness comes at the expense of people such as Julie.

Hammerstein's libretto and lyrics, set to the melodies of composer Jerome Kern, include new songs such as "Make Believe," "You Are Love," "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man," "Life Upon the Wicked Stage," "Why Do I Love You," and "Ol' Man River" as well as period music from the 1880s to the 1920s. The seamless integration of song and story in Show Boat contributed to establishing a new model for the musical in the twentieth century.

Source

Krueger, Miles. Show Boat: The Story of a Classic American Musical. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.

—James Fisher

Simon and Schuster (1924– ) publishing house

Richard Simon and M. Lincoln Schuster launched their publishing company in 1924, which began with the world's first crossword puzzle book. The firm published literary fiction and serious nonfiction; and it became widely known for its Inner Sanctum Mysteries and Little Golden Books for children. Simon and Schuster was one of the Pocket Books original partners in 1938.

—Morris Colden

Sinclair, Upton (1875–1968) journalist, novelist

Upton Sinclair, most famous for his 1906 muckraking novel THE JUNGLE (see MUCKRAKING MOVEMENT), focused his work on politics and economics throughout his career. Sinclair's writing depicts his dreams of social justice and his belief in socialism. He believed that the purpose of literature was to improve the human condition, and his writing often made a difference in the lives of Americans.

Upton Beall Sinclair Jr. grew up in Baltimore and New York City; his father was an unsuccessful salesman and alcoholic, and his mother was from a wealthy Baltimore family. Sinclair began his writing career while attending the City College of New York by writing boys' adventure stories under pseudonyms, but after attending Columbia University, he began to turn his talent toward socially significant causes.

Several of Sinclair's early novels showed socialist tendencies, but with Manassas (1904), a novel about the son of a plantation owner who becomes an abolitionist, he began to write fiction in which the evident purpose is the revelation of the injustices of society. A turning point of his career occurred when the editor of Appeal to Reason, a socialist publication, sent Sinclair to research the "wage slaves" of the meatpacking plants and stockyards in Chicago. Disguised as a worker, Sinclair witnessed the filth, poverty, and corruption that he depicts in The Jungle. When The Jungle was published, the nation was outraged but not primarily at the plight of the workers. President Theodore Roosevelt read the novel and ordered an immediate investigation into the meat industry. The furor over Sinclair's work led to the Pure Food and Drug Act and the Meat Inspection Act, both signed into legislation on June 30, 1906. "I aimed at the public's heart," Sinclair said, "and by accident I hit it in the stomach."

Sinclair continued to work toward and write about social change throughout his life. In the wake of his great success, he established HELICON HOME COLONY, a short-lived experiment in communal living. Although his later work never approached the impact of The Jungle, Sinclair produced many books that addressed significant problems. He took up the cause of workers again in King Cole (1917), a novel that was inspired by the 1914 massacre of striking coal miners in Ludlow, Colorado. Beginning in 1918 with The Profits of Religion (1918), he wrote a series of nonfiction works in which he discussed the damaging effects of capitalism on American institutions, including journalism in The Brass Check (1920) and art and literature in Mammonart (1925). His long novel Oil! (1927) is based on the oil scandals during President Warren G. Harding's administration. In the novel Boston (1928) Sinclair presents a sympathetic portrayal of the anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (see SACCO-VANZETTI CASE), who may have been wrongly convicted of murder.

Sinclair, who had moved permanently to California around 1914, became heavily involved in politics in the 1930s. After publishing an economic plan for ending poverty titled I, Governor of California, and How I Ended Poverty (1933), he became the Democratic candidate for the position he had written about. Although he lost his bid for the governorship, his campaign is believed to have influenced President Franklin D. Roosevelt to pay more heed to the left wing of his party. Sinclair later revised and published his plan as We, People of America and How We Ended Poverty: A Story of the Future (1936).

In 1940 Sinclair published World's End, the first in a series of eleven historical novels featuring Lanny Budd, the son of an American munitions manufacturer, covering the years from 1913 to 1950. The third novel in the series, Dragon's Teeth (1942), which treats Adolf Hitler's rise to power, won a PULITZER PRIZE. Sinclair wrote about his own life in American Outpost (1932) and The Autobiography of Upton Sinclair (1962).

Sources

- Bloodworth, William A. Upton Sinclair. Boston: Twayne, 1977.
 Gottesman, Ronald. Upton Sinclair: An Annotated Checklist. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1973.
 Heims, Dieter, ed. Upton Sinclair: Literature and Social Reform. New York: Peter Lang, 1990.
 Scott, Ivan. Upton Sinclair: The Forgotten Socialist. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1996.

—Crystal McCage

Singer, Isaac Bashevis (1904–1991) novelist, short-story writer

The recipient of the Nobel Prize in literature (1978), Isaac Bashevis Singer was born in Leoncin, Poland, and spent most of his boyhood in Warsaw. Although he trained as a rabbi, Singer was attracted to literature and was mentored by his older brother, Israel Joshua, also a writer. Isaac began publishing his work in 1925. By 1935 he had settled in America.

Singer's work in America was published in Der forverts (Jewish Daily Forward) in Yiddish. His first work to be translated into English was the novel The Family Moskat (1950), which had been originally published as Di familye Mushkat earlier that year, but it was not until 1953, with Saul Bellow's translation of "Gimpel the Fool" in the PARTISAN REVIEW, that Singer attracted the attention of critics and general readers. Thereafter, his stories appeared in Commentary, THE NEW YORKER, Harper's, and Esquire.

A sentence from "Gimpel the Fool" has often been cited to explain Singer's approach to fiction: "No doubt the world is entirely an imaginary world, but is only once removed from the real world." Singer has been praised for his ability to combine fantasy and reality, the imaginative world and the world of reason, in his stories and novels. Although he was not a devout believer, he draws on Jewish faith to challenge the rationalistic view of the world. Satan in Goray, Singer's first novel, published in Yiddish in 1935 and translated into English in 1955, typifies his use of the Gothic, historical, and mystical elements of the Jewish tradition. This work also reflects the influence of Edgar Allan Poe and Fyodor Dostoevsky, for Singer was deeply read in European and American literature. The novel centers on two historical events: the Cossack rebellion of 1648–1649, which resulted in the deaths of one hundred thousand Jews, and the messianic movement called Shabbeteanism, named after the self-proclaimed messiah Shabbetai Zevi of the same period. The novel traces the fate of the Jewish survivors of the Cossack pogrom.

The Magician of Lublin (1960) is a more symbolic novel but also a more psychological study, focusing on a single individual, Yasha Mazur, who becomes, like every individual, a magician in the sense that he walks a "tightrope merely inches from disaster." In spite of this sense of impending doom, Mazur is an exuberant character, battling the evil within himself. He says "everything is fate," yet he is constantly making choices and exercising his will.

These two novels, like Singer's other major works—The Slave (1962), The Manor (1967), The Estate (1969), and Enemies: A Love Story (1972)—express the sensibility of a man fully engaged in twentieth-century history. But Singer also offers an alternative perspective on that history by searching a more remote past and calling on the forces of the supernatural to define the limitations of the modern world found in the Enlightenment values of reason and humanistic standards. The demonic imagery of his stories and novels is a constant reminder of how difficult it is for human beings to control their irrational impulses. At the same time, the sheer charm, humor, and ironies of Singer's stories make them entertainment of the highest order.

Singer collected his stories in several volumes, including Gimpel the Fool and Other Stories (1957), The Spinoza of Market Street and Other Stories (1961), and A Friend of Kafka and Other Stories (1970). His Collected Stories was published in 1982. He also published several volumes of fiction for children and wrote a memoir about his life in Poland, In My Father's Court (1966).

Sources

- Farrell, Grace, ed. Critical Essays on Isaac Bashevis Singer. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996.
 Hadda, Janet. Isaac Bashevis Singer: A Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Singer, Israel Joshua (1893–1944) novelist

Like his younger brother Isaac, Israel Joshua Singer was born in Poland, where he began his career as a Yiddish novelist. He came to the United States in 1933. Although Israel and his brother continued to write about Poland in Yiddish, translations of their work have a significant impact on American literature. Israel's The Brothers Ashkenazi (1936) is a saga of Polish Jews that merits comparison with Fyodor Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamozov (translated 1912). Singer also published The Carnovsky Family (1943), the story of a Jewish family wandering across Europe.

Sources

Norich, Anita. The Homeless Imagination in the Fiction of Israel Joshua Singer. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.
Sinclair, Clive. The Brothers Singer. New York: Schocken Books, 1983.

Sister Carrie by Theodore Dreiser (New York: Doubleday, Page, 1900) novel

Theodore DREISER's first novel contrasts the fates of its two main characters: Carrie Meeber, a poor country girl who eventually becomes a Broadway star; and George Hurstwood, the prosperous manager of a Chicago bar who loses home, family, self-respect, and his life after taking up with Carrie and committing a robbery.

The title of Dreiser's novel makes oblique allusion to the personal motivation behind the story. Carrie, from Wisconsin, is based on the author's sister Emma; but into Carrie's story Dreiser wove many of his own hard experiences in a society on the make: the poverty of city life, as reflected in Carrie's sister's apartment in Chicago; the slick, glittering feel of classy bars, as reflected in Fitzgerald and Moy's, which Hurstwood manages; the attitudes of the shallow, flashy Drouet, Carrie's original seducer; the cruel manipulations of cold women, as in Hurstwood's wife and daughter; the rise in fortune of a show-business personality in Carrie's acting career; and the complex of opportunism, self-defeat, and despair in the fall of Hurstwood.

Beginning in Chicago and moving at its almost exact center to the faster-paced, more ruthless New York, the novel traces the fulfillment of the impoverished Carrie's wants. In the third chapter, Carrie "could not help feeling the claim of each trinket and valuable upon her personally." Shortly after, she becomes the mistress of Drouet, a "drummer" (salesman) whom she met on a train; she has an apartment and is a kept woman. Her finer nature realizes Drouet's superficiality, and half against her will she lets herself be carried away by the more polished Hurstwood. His fortunes decline at the same measure as Carrie's improve. By the end of the novel she is a well-off and successful actress and Hurstwood a failure and suicide. However, Carrie's luxurious rooms and money bring her no profound satisfaction.

Human actions in this classic work of NATURALISM happen almost in spite of intention. Carrie's sister and Drouet are locked into lives limited by their understandings and personalities. Carrie, who is more complex, triumphs on the stage only because she chances to ad lib a line that makes her noticed. When Hurstwood steals, it is almost as though the event happens to him: "While the money was in his hand the lock clicked. . . . Did he do it?" The sweep of circumstances pushes these characters. They lack free will. No blame or praise can rightly be attributed to their actions; and as a result no satisfaction is possible for them. When a friend asks Carrie about her success, "How in the world did this happen?" Carrie answers, "I don't know."

Dreiser's style can be awkward: "The, to Carrie, very important theatrical performance was to take place at the Avery on conditions which were to make it more noteworthy than was at first anticipated." His sentimental diction has some of the gaudiness of Drouet's flashy clothes. However, his deep understanding of his characters, his profound sympathy for each, his steadfast refusal to dismiss any of them, and his exact observation of the world they inhabit makes Sister Carrie a work of impact and authority.

Sources

Dreiser, Theodore. Sister Carrie, edited by Neda M. Westlake and others. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.
Dreiser. Sister Carrie: An Authoritative Text, Backgrounds, and Sources Criticism, third edition, edited by Donald Pizer. New York: Norton, 2006.
Pizer, Donald, ed. New Essays on Sister Carrie. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

—Roger Lathbury

The Skin of Our Teeth by Thornton Wilder (produced 1942) play

The Skin of Our Teeth, Thornton WILDER's second play to win the PULITZER PRIZE in drama, is best described by the oxymoron "philosophical farce." An example of metatheatricality, it is an allegorical play within a play, with both lines of action dramatizing humanity's struggle to survive. In the interior play, the Antrobus family represents Every Family as they face the threat of extinction from within (Oedipal conflict, adultery) and without (war, a harsh environment, even divine judgment). In the first two acts, taking place simultaneously in present-day New Jersey and in the Ice Age and biblical times, inventor George Antrobus, his wife Maggie, and their children Henry and Gladys face daunting obstacles to their survival (advancing glaciers, Noah's flood). In the outer play, the performance is periodically interrupted, for example when the Antrobuses's maid Sabina stops the action to address the audience as an actress named Miss Somerset, making the completion of the play very much in doubt. Critics found Tallulah Bankhead, the originator of the role of Sabina, hilarious in her breaking the fourth wall to complain tongue in cheek about the author. Although some scholars read The Skin of Our Teeth as dramatizing a cyclical or even entropic view of history, the conclusion seems to affirm progress. In the third act Mr. Antrobus returns from war ready to give in to weariness and disillusionment, but ultimately he regains the desire to begin again: "All I ask is the chance to build new worlds and God has always given us that. And has given us [opening the book] voices to guide us; and the memory of our mistakes to warn us. . . . We've come a long ways. We've learned. We're learning. And the steps of our journey are marked for us here." In short, the show must go on.

—Lincoln Konkle

The Smart Set* (1900–1930) periodical

The Smart Set: A Magazine of Cleverness was founded in March 1900 by publisher William D'Alton Mann. It is remembered because of its association with H. L. MENCKEN, who became book reviewer in 1908 and was co-editor, with George Jean NATHAN, from 1914 through 1923, after which they left to found THE AMERICAN MERCURY. The two editors were also part owners. Their influential criticism promoted the new realism in fiction and drama that had been developing since the end of the nineteenth century. Works by Eugene O'NEILL, Dorothy PARKER, Theodore DREISER, Willa CATHER, and Aldous Huxley appeared in the magazine, as well as the first commercially published story by F. Scott FITZGERALD and the first publication in America by James Joyce. The Smart Set survived until June 1930.

Sources

Curtiss, Thomas Q. The Smart Set: George Jean Nathan & H. L. Mencken. New York & London: Applause, 1998.

Dolmetsch, Carl R., ed. The Smart Set: A History and an Anthology. New York: Dial, 1966.

—Richard Schrader

Smith, Betty (1904–1972) novelist

Betty Smith is best known for her novel A Tree Grows in Brooklyn (1943). The novel evokes the early-twentieth-century borough and the life of Frances Nolan, who overcomes poverty and other hardships to become as stalwart as the tree that grows through cracks in the sidewalk. Smith's other novels include Tomorrow Will Be Better (1948) and Maggie-Now (1958), stories of slum girls growing up in the city.

Smith, Lillian (1897–1966) novelist, memoirist, essayist

When Southern writers are discussed, I am not mentioned; when women writers are mentioned, I am not among them.

—The Winner Names the Age (1978)

Lillian Smith was born in Jasper, Florida, and attended Piedmont College in North Georgia and Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore. In 1922 she traveled to China to give musical instruction at a missionary school, but she returned to Georgia in 1925 and eventually took over Laurel Falls Girls Camp, the summer camp her family had established in Clayton, Georgia.

In 1936 Smith and her life partner Paula Snelling started Pseudopodia, a magazine designed to give liberal-minded southerners an outlet to voice their opinions, particularly those that attacked racial segregation. She achieved national notoriety for her first novel, Strange Fruit (1944), the story of a tragic interracial love affair in the South. The target of many indecency charges, the novel was the number-one fiction best-seller of 1944; it eventually sold more than three million copies and was translated into more than a dozen languages. In 1949 Smith published Killers of the Dream, a memoir that sought to systematically debunk the notion of white racial superiority. It was roundly attacked by critics on the Right and Left. Fellow southerners labeled the memoir as extremist, and leftist critics attacked her strident anticommunism as shortsighted and chauvinistic. Smith defended the book as both a necessary exposé of southern bigotry and a warning against totalitarianism of any kind.

When the Civil Rights Movement exploded on the heels of the Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court decision in 1954, Smith emerged as a leading Southern activist for integration. In nonfiction works such as Now Is the Time (1955), her revised and expanded version of Killers of the Dream (1961), and Our Faces, Our Words (1964), Smith continued to urge southern support for the changes brought on by the black freedom struggle. She also published The Journey (1954), a book on her struggle with breast cancer, and one other novel, One Hour (1959), an attack on McCarthyism. Three important collections have been posthumously published: From the Mountain (1972), an anthology of early magazine pieces; the essay collection, The Winner Names the Age (1978); and How Am I to Be Heard?: Letters of Lillian Smith (1993).

Although some critics have tried to give Smith's literary works their due, Smith the activist continues to be regarded as more important than Smith the writer. In one of her letters, Smith surveyed the literary landscape and, despite her best-selling status, bemoaned, "How I am to be heard?" Although none of her works have entered the canons of either southern or women's literature, she remains an important figure in literary history.

Sources

Belton, Don. "Lillian Smith: Walking a Trembling Earth," Hollins Critic, 20.3 (June 1983): 1–12.

Brantley, Will. Feminine Sense in Southern Memoir: Smith, Glasgow, Welty, Hellman, Porter and Hurston. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1995.

Hobson, Fred. But Now I See: The White Southern Racial Conversion Narrative. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999.

Loveland, Anne C. Lillian Smith: A Southerner Confronting the South. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1986.
 Sosna, Morton Philip. In Search of the Silent South: Southern Liberals and the Race Issue. New York: Columbia University Press, 1977.

—Christopher Metress

Smith, Thorne (1892–1934) humorist

Thorne Smith made his name writing about his navy experiences in WORLD WAR I in Biltmore Oswald: The Diary of a Hapless Recruit (1918) and Out O'Luck: Biltmore Oswald Very Much at Sea (1919). His comic novels often combine rampant alcohol consumption, sexual innuendo, and elements of fantasy, including statues of Greek gods that come alive in The Night Life of the Gods (1931), a married couple who switch souls in Turnabout (1931), and the fountain of youth in The Glorious Pool (1934). Smith's most popular book was Topper (1926), the fantasy tale of a whimsical couple who return from death to haunt the straitlaced banker Cosmo Topper. He wrote a sequel, Topper Takes a Trip (1932).

The Snopes Trilogy by William Faulkner: The Hamlet (New York: Random House, 1940), The Town (New York: Random House, 1957), and The Mansion (New York: Random House, 1959) novels

William FAULKNER wrote about the large, diverse Snopes family in novels and stories throughout his career, mentioning the family in his first novel about YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY, Sartoris (1929). The Snopes trilogy charts the rise of Flem Snopes from being the white-trash son of Ab, a sharecropper known for burning the barns of his employers, to his eventual position as owner of a bank and his murder by a vengeful cousin. The Hamlet (1940) is set largely in the community of Frenchman's Bend (the hamlet of the title) and follows Flem as he breaks free from his family's dependence on sharecropping by taking a job in a store owned by Will Varner, the principal landowner in the area. He then marries Varner's daughter, Eula, who is pregnant with another man's child. The book ends with Flem and his new family moving to town—thus leading to the next novel, The Town (1957), in which Flem continues his rise in economic and social prominence even as his wife has an affair and eventually commits suicide. The final book in the trilogy, The Mansion (1959), sees the return of Mink Snopes, who in The Hamlet had been imprisoned for murder, for which he blames his cousin Flem. The books are notable for the seemingly endless stream of colorful Snopeses—among them Isaac (Ike); Lancelot (Lump); the twins, Bilbo and Vardaman; Wallstreet Panic; Admiral Dewey; and Byron and Virgil—who some critics say represent the rise of the redneck class in the rural South, replacing the older aristocratic and patriarchal tradition that had ruled the South from the antebellum era.

Sources

Brooks, Cleanth. William Faulkner: The Yoknapatawpha Country. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1963.
 Urgo, Joseph. Faulkner's Apocrypha: A Fable, Snopes, and the Spirit of Human Rebellion. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989.

—John B. Padgett

"The Snows of Kilimanjaro" by Ernest Hemingway (1936) story

Originally published in Esquire and collected in The Fifth Column and the First Forty-Nine Stories (1938), "The Snows of Kilimanjaro" conveys a recurring theme in Ernest HEMINGWAY's writing: the artist's betrayal of himself and his talent for money and celebrity. Harry Walden, a writer on safari in East Africa, where he lies on a cot dying of gangrene, is remorseful because he has failed to use his talent, leaving good stories from "his old life" (revealed in flashbacks) unwritten because he chose "security" and "comfort" over his work. He wants to write again but never will. Delusional during the night, Harry imagines himself in an airplane that has been sent to take him to a hospital but that takes him instead to Mount Kilimanjaro (a symbol of aspiration in the story), called "House of God" by the Masai. The next morning Harry's wife finds him dead.

Source

Howell, John M., ed. Hemingway's African Stories: The Stories, Their Sources, The Critics. New York: Scribners, 1969.

—John C. Unrue

Sorensen, Virginia (1912–1991) novelist

A graduate of Brigham Young University, Virginia Sorensen is best known for her fiction about life in the West and the Mormon experience, including A Little Lower Than the Angels (1942), On This Star (1946), The Neighbors (1947), The Evening and the Morning (1949), The Proper Gods (1951), and Many Heavens (1954). Sorensen has also written acclaimed books for children, including Miracles on Maple Hill (1956), the story of a Pittsburgh family that moves to the country, which won a John Newbery Medal. Where Nothing Is Long Ago (1963) is a memoir of her Mormon childhood.

Source

Lee, Lawrence L., and Sylvia B. Lee. Virginia Sorensen. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1978.

The Souls of Black Folk by W. E. B. Du Bois (Chicago: McClurg, 1903) essays and sketches

W. E. B. Du Bois had published nine of the fourteen pieces in this collection earlier, most in The Atlantic Monthly. With the addition of five new pieces, he intended the volume to trace the history of African Americans from slavery to segregation, and to outline their dilemma.

Du Bois states forthrightly that “the problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color line” and finds fault with the most powerful black man of his day, Booker T. WASHINGTON, whom Du Bois finds too accommodating of white society. The Souls of Black Folk, with its sympathetic studies of black sharecroppers and appreciation of African American religious music, split black Americans into two camps—one that sought peaceful coexistence with the whites and one which, like Du Bois himself, could not reconcile itself to life amidst a hostile majority. Thirty years later the novelist and critic James Weldon JOHNSON declared that The Souls of Black Folk “had a greater effect upon and within the Negro race in America” than any book after Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin (1852).

Sources

- Rampersad, Arnold. The Art and Imagination of W. E. B. Du Bois. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.
 Zamir, Shamoan. Dark Voices: W. E. B. Du Bois and American Thought, 1888–1903. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

The Sound and the Fury by William Faulkner (New York: Cape & Smith, 1929) novel

The Sound and the Fury (1929), William FAULKNER’s fourth novel, is regarded by many critics as his greatest work and one of the most important novels of twentieth-century MODERNISM. Highly experimental at the time, relying heavily on stream-of-consciousness narrative, the novel documents the tragic downfall of the Compson family, a once-prominent family in YOKNAPATAWPHA COUNTY.

The novel is divided into four sections, each set upon a specific date and narrated by a different voice, the first three by the Compson brothers, the fourth by the omniscient author. At the center of the novel but lacking a voice of her own is the brothers’ sister, Caddy, who represents something different to each of her brothers. According to Faulkner, he was inspired to write the novel because of the image of Caddy as a little girl with muddy drawers climbing a pear tree to look on at death—the funeral wake for her grandmother—while her brothers watched from below, too frightened to do so themselves.

The first section, “April Seventh, 1928,” is narrated by Benjy Compson, the youngest of the four Compson children. Benjy is, in Faulkner’s words, an “idiot,” and as a result, his narrative lacks understanding of even the most basic processes happening around him; the section consists mainly of flashbacks to key moments in his past, most involving Caddy, a nurturing, maternal figure who “smelled like trees.” In the present-day, it is his thirty-third birthday, but he clearly misses Caddy; her illegitimate daughter, Miss Quentin, is a poor substitute for the comfort Caddy had provided.

The second section, narrated by the oldest brother, Quentin, is set primarily in Cambridge, Massachusetts, on “June Second, 1910,” the day on which Quentin, a student at Harvard, commits suicide by jumping into the Charles River. Quentin’s section, like Benjy’s, is stream of consciousness with frequent flashbacks. Quentin focuses largely on how unnerving Caddy’s sexual blossoming has been for him, particularly her passion for a boy named Dalton Ames, since Quentin is expected to defend his sister’s honor but is ineffectual in doing so. His guilt and frustration over his sister’s burgeoning sexuality leads Quentin to suggest a suicide pact with her, but he is unable to go through with it. These flashbacks parallel his present-day narrative, in which he is accused of kidnapping a young girl whom he has befriended.

The third section, “April Sixth, 1928,” is set on Good Friday. Narrated by the third Compson child, Jason, this more-conventional narrative is set mostly in the present day, but the vitriol in his section is everywhere present: Jason blames Caddy for the family’s decline and his unrewarding job, even though for years he has been stealing the money that she sends him for raising her daughter. Jason spends much of this section trying to track Miss Quentin as she keeps company with a man with a red tie, a performer with a traveling show.

The final section, “April Eighth, 1928,” is set on Easter Sunday and focuses largely on Dilsey, the black family servant, as she attends a church service. The sermon affords her an epiphany of the family’s downfall—a fate hinted at earlier that morning when they discover Miss Quentin has stolen her money from Jason’s room and run away with her new beau. The narrative splits between Dilsey and Jason, who tracks his niece to a neighboring town but fails to capture her.

Because of the richness of both the story and the manner in which it is told, the novel can easily be approached from different critical perspectives, such as historical, psychoanalytic, Marxist, feminist, formalist, and deconstructionist theories. Key to most readings of the novel is the character of Caddy Compson, whose rise and fall and then systematic removal from the lives of the Compson family is tragic and disturbing to contemplate.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Major Literary Characters: Caddy Compson. New York: Chelsea House, 1990.
 Bloom, ed. Modern Critical Interpretations: William Faulkner’s The Sound and the Fury. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.
 Hahn, Stephen, and Arthur F. Kinney, eds. Approaches to Teaching Faulkner’s The Sound and the Fury. New York: MLA, 1996.
 Kinney, Arthur, ed. Critical Essays on Faulkner: The Compson Family. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.
 Ross, Stephen M. Reading Faulkner: The Sound and the Fury. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

—John B. Padgett

The South Atlantic Quarterly (1902– ) periodical Founded by John S. Bassett, a professor of history at what was then Trinity College (now Duke University) in Durham, North Carolina, the focus of The South Atlantic Quarterly was—and continues to be—the South and its history, culture, and economy. In recent years it has reflected changes in the Duke English department, which has used the journal as a way to promote more-innovative and controversial theories of literary criticism.

Source

Hamilton, William B., comp. Fifty Years of the South Atlantic Quarterly. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1952.

The Southern Renaissance

The “Southern Renaissance” refers to a prolific period in Southern literary history, generally taken as spanning the years between 1920 and 1960, during which Southern writers produced some of the most influential literary and critical texts in the United States. Although the 1920s marked the beginning of the Renaissance proper, works produced in the 1910s by writers such as James Branch CABELL, Ellen GLASGOW, and James Weldon JOHNSON contributed to its advent. In The Mind of the South (1941), an analysis of Southern temperament and culture, W. J. Cash observes the remarkable influence of Southern literature since the beginning of the Reconstruction era. Specifically, he traces the development not simply of writing designed to propagandize the Old South destroyed in the Civil War but also a Southern literature used “more or less purely for itself.” By 1900, Cash notes, Southern writers had begun to produce literature for its own sake, and by 1939 “the South had actually produced more books of measurable importance than any other section of the country.” Although the 1920s marked the beginning of the Renaissance “proper,” works produced in the 1910s by writers such as James Weldon JOHNSON, Ellen GLASGOW, and James Branch CABELL contributed to its advent.

The most important figures of the Southern Renaissance were fiction writers, poets, and playwrights—including James AGEE, Cabell, Erskine CALDWELL, Truman Capote, Donald DAVIDSON, William FAULKNER, Glasgow, Isa Glenn, Caroline GORDON, DuBose HEYWARD, Johnson, Harper Lee, Carson McCULLERS, Flannery O'Connor, William Alexander Percy, Katherine Anne PORTER, Allen TATE, Robert Penn WARREN, Eudora WELTY, Tennessee WILLIAMS, Thomas WOLFE, Richard WRIGHT, and Stark YOUNG. Journals and LITTLE MAGAZINES, including The Double Dealer (1921–1926), The Reviewer (1921–1925), THE VIRGINIA QUARTERLY REVIEW (1925– ), THE SOUTHERN REVIEW (1935–1942), and THE KENYON REVIEW (1939–1969, 1979– ), helped to define and extend the influence of Southern writing. Of particular importance was The Fugitive (1922–1925), the journal published in Nashville by the literary group known as THE FUGITIVES.

In the first half of the twentieth century, the South was still in a state of recovery from the aftereffects of the Civil War and Reconstruction. Industrialism and the idea of racial equality were seen as threats to Southern culture by many traditional Southerners, and the work of Southern Renaissance writers often represented the tensions and paradoxes that resulted from the collision of Northern and Southern ideologies. A notable defense of Southern culture was offered by twelve authors in the essay collection I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition (1930). In this social and political manifesto, the authors—the so-called AGRARIANS, a group closely linked to the Fugitives—decried the encroachment of Northern industrialism, which they believed was threatening to destroy the remnants of agrarian culture that were worth preserving. The Agrarians maintained that the Southern farmer's connection to his land and kin was superior to the Northern industrialist's commitment to capitalism at the expense of humanity. The values of agrarian culture in the South became a defining aspect of Southern Renaissance writers' work. While the virtues of the South did not pass unnoted, many, if not most, Southern writers characterized their region in terms of failure and marginalization, contrasting it with, and maintaining its distinctiveness from, other regions of the country.

The most dominant figure of the Southern Renaissance was William Faulkner, whose scathing representations of the South were a product of his unfaltering personal devotion to the region. Faulkner's fiction confronts the legacy of slavery and the Civil War in both tragic and comic terms. His major works portray a South in the midst of inevitable, sometimes regrettable, changes. Faulkner conveys the moral concerns of his fiction through an ingenious, poetic use of language and an original handling of the novel and short-story forms. He set the standard for writers from his region and, indeed, all American writers. Further, his complex style, rapid shifts in time and place, cryptic points of view, interior monologues, and other challenges to realist models helped to define literary MODERNISM in the United States.

The critics and writers of the Southern Renaissance were also notable for their contributions to literary criticism, especially the NEW CRITICISM, which became the leading approach to the teaching of literature in the United States in the 1950s and 1960s. Cleanth Brooks, John Crowe Ransom, Robert Penn Warren, and Allen Tate were key figures in the development and dissemination of New Critical methodologies that focused on the formal structure and rhetorical organization of the work of literature.

Sources

Bradbury, John M. The Fugitives. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1958.

Bradbury. Renaissance in the South: A Critical History of the Literature, 1920–1960. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1963.

Cash, W. J. The Mind of the South. New York: Knopf, 1941.

Graff, Gerald. Professing Literature: An Institutional History. Chicago & London: Chicago University Press, 1987.

Gray, Richard, and Owen Robinson, eds. The Literature and Culture of the American South. Malden, Mass. & Oxford: Blackwell, 2004.

Rubin, Louis D. The History of Southern Literature. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1991.

—Lindsay Holmgren

The Southern Review (1935–1942) periodical

Founded at Louisiana State University by Charles W. Pipkin, Cleanth Brooks and Robert Penn WARREN, who were aided in their editorial work by Albert Erskine, this journal featured writing by Caroline GORDON, Eudora WELTY, and Katherine Anne PORTER. It also championed the NEW CRITICISM and printed essays by notable critics such as F. O. MATTHIESSEN, Yvor WINTERS, and Randall Jarrell. Brooks and Warren published Stories from the Southern Review in 1953.

Spanish–American War (1898)

The Spanish–American War was the result of years of tension over Cuba. With the Monroe Doctrine (1823) the United States had warned European powers to stay out of those parts of the western hemisphere that seemed natural areas of its interests. The Monroe Doctrine gave rise to the doctrine of manifest destiny, which sanctioned the spread of American civilization across the North American continent and to neighboring lands. U.S. business and military interests viewed Spain as a particularly corrupt, decadent, and despotic nation intent on crushing Cuba. Newspaper chains, especially the one owned by William Randolph HEARST, were also eager to report on a war that would portray the United States as both a mighty power and a liberator.

The war began after the publication of an offensive letter written by the Spanish ambassador about President William McKinley and an explosion of mysterious origin sunk the U.S. battleship Maine in the Havana harbor. The United States destroyed the Spanish fleet at Santiago and conducted a highly publicized invasion of Cuba. Theodore Roosevelt made his national reputation by organizing his own group of Rough Riders and taking San Juan Hill in Cuba with much exuberance and publicity. The Spanish made peace and relinquished Cuba, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Philippines to the United States for $20 million.

The Spanish–American War marked the entry of the United States into world politics as a major power. American writers such as Richard Harding Davis and Stephen CRANE enhanced their literary reputations by reporting on the war. Other writers such as Samuel Langhorne Clemens (Mark Twain) and later John DOS PASSOS in his U.S.A. trilogy bitterly criticized the war and saw it as a sign that the country was changing from a democratic republic to a menacing imperial nation.

Sources

Brands, H. W. The Reckless Decade: America in the 1890s. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Keller, Gary D., and Cordelia Candelaria, eds. The Legacy of the Mexican and Spanish–American Wars: Legal, Literary, and Historical Perspectives. Tempe, Ariz.: Bilingual Review/Press, 2000.

Traxel, David. 1898: The Birth of the American Century. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Spanish Civil War (1936–1939)

In 1936 the Spanish Republic was attacked by the Nationalist forces of General Francisco Franco. Franco was supported by the Roman Catholic Church and the fascist dictators Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini. The Republicans, also known as Loyalists, a diverse group that included liberals, Socialists, Communists, anarchists, and Catalan and Basque regionalists, put up a fierce resistance aided by the Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin. The conflict was widely viewed as a prelude to WORLD WAR II.

American volunteers—mostly committed leftists—went to fight on behalf of the Republic. They regarded the war as a noble cause, a fight for freedom and an effort to stop fascism before it took over Europe. Other European powers kept out of the conflict, and in the United States President Franklin D. Roosevelt kept his distance from the conflict—in part because of the American public's sentiment that it should not get involved in foreign wars, in part because of the influence of the Catholic Church. By autumn 1936 Franco had seized most of the northwest part of Spain and part of the southwest, but his forces could not capture Madrid until March 1939, by which time the Republic was cut in two and the war was ended. John DOS PASSOS, Martha GELLHORN, Ernest HEMINGWAY, and other Americans wrote anti-Franco books. Hemingway's novel FOR WHOM THE BELL TOLLS (1940) centers on Robert Jordan, an idealistic American who dies fighting for the Republic.

Sources

Benson, Frederick R. Writers in Arms: The Literary Impact of the Spanish Civil War. New York: New York University Press, 1967.

Pérez, Janet, and Wendell Aycock, eds. The Spanish Civil War in Literature. Lubbock: Texas Tech University Press, 1990.

Spencer, Anne (1882–1975) poet

Anne Spencer was educated at Virginia Seminary in Lynchburg, where she settled to raise a family after her marriage to Edward Spencer. She wrote poetry as a private avocation before her poems were discovered by James Weldon JOHNSON, who was staying with the Spencers while visiting the city on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. With Johnson's encouragement, the thirty-eight-year-old placed her first poem in THE CRISIS in 1920; she subsequently published work in Opportunity and anthologies of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE as well as THE CRISIS. She was befriended by such important figures as Georgia Douglas Johnson and W. E. B. DU BOIS. Spencer's poetry has been described as romantic, lyrical, religious, and traditional. She never published a book of her poetry, leaving poems and a novel unpublished at her death.

Source

Greene, J. Lee. Time's Unfading Garden: Anne Spencer's Life and Poetry. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1977.

—KaaVonia Hinton

Speyer, Leonora (1872–1956) poet

The daughter of a former Prussian count who served in the Union army during the Civil War, Leonora von Stosch was trained as a musician at the Royal Brussels Conservatory of Music and had a career as a concert violinist before marrying Egar Speyer, a British banker. She turned to writing when the couple moved to New York City in 1915. Speyer was highly praised for her lyrics in A Canopic Jar (1921). Her themes often center on the nature of a woman's consciousness. Fiddler's Farewell (1926) won a PULITZER PRIZE and was lauded for its insight into the female psyche. Subsequent volumes such as Naked Heel (1931) and Slow Wall (1939, expanded in 1946), were less well received, with some critics suggesting that her sense of form had become rigid and sapped the intensity of her verse.

Spoon River Anthology by Edgar Lee Masters (New York: Macmillan, 1915; enlarged edition, 1916) poetry collection

Edgar Lee MASTERS's collection of more than 240 free-verse poems offers the poetic monologues, or epitaphs, of those buried in the graveyard of the fictional Midwestern small town of Spoon River. The first stanza of the opening poem, "The Hill," suggests the conceit for the poems that follow: "Where are Elmer, Herman, Bert, Tom and Charley, / The weak of will, the strong of arm, the clown, the boozier, the fighter? / All, all are sleeping on the hill." One by one the townspeople "sleeping on the hill," among them scoundrels, lechers, idealists, scientists, politicians, atheists, and believers, tell their individual stories. But the sum of the whole is greater than the parts, for Masters through the connections he builds into his poems presents the histories of nineteen families and thus a multifaceted view of the larger community over time.

A major inspiration for Spoon River Anthology was Epigrams from the Greek Anthology, a work to which Masters was introduced by William Marion Reedy, editor of the St. Louis magazine Reedy's Mirror that first published many of his poems. A successful Chicago lawyer, MASTERS wrote much of Spoon River Anthology on the weekends, garnering the poems from notes written in spare moments. He claimed the poems almost wrote themselves, the characters springing to life in his mind like scenes from his childhood. Many of the character studies were the result of conversations with his mother, reminiscing with Masters about the days of his youth in Illinois.

Sources

Masters, Edgar Lee. "The Genesis of Spoon River," American Mercury, 28 (January 1933): 38–55.

"On Spoon River Anthology." Modern American Poetry Site: An Online Journal and Multimedia Companion to Anthology of Modern American Poetry, edited by Cary Nelson. <http://www.english.uiuc.edu/maps/poets/m\_r/masters/spoon.htm> (viewed March 5, 2007).

—Geraldine Cannon Becker

S.S. San Pedro by James Gould Cozzens (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1931) novel

James Gould COZZENS's short novel covers the three days, June 7–9, during which the vessel sails from Hoboken, New Jersey, and sinks during a storm. Captain Clendening is unwell and unable to act; the point-of-view character, senior second officer Anthony Bradell, and the other officers are unwilling to usurp the captain's authority. There is the suggestion through the symbolic use of Dr. Percival that the San Pedro is doomed before the ship leaves port.

—Morris Colden

Stallings, Laurence (1894–1968) playwright, screenwriter, novelist

Laurence Stallings, a graduate of Wake Forest University, served in the United States Marines during WORLD WAR I and was badly wounded at Belleau Wood in 1917. He wrote about war in his novel Plumes (1924) and the play that made his reputation, WHAT PRICE GLORY (produced 1924). Written in collaboration with Maxwell ANDERSON, this drama was part of the wave of revulsion against modern war. The other plays collected in Three American Plays (1926) were less successful. In 1930 Stallings's dramatization of Ernest HEMINGWAY's novel A Farewell to Arms (1929) had a brief run on Broadway. He was also a successful screenwriter in Hollywood.

Sources

Brittain, Joan T. Laurence Stallings. New York: Twayne, 1975.

Stallings, Laurence. Plumes. Introduction by George Garrett. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2006.

Stearns, Harold E. (1891–1943) critic, journalist

A graduate of Harvard, Harold E. Stearns began his long career in journalism by writing book reviews for the Boston Evening Transcript before he even entered college. He was the editor for THE DIAL (1917–1918) and helped to articulate the attitude of the post-WORLD WAR I generation in America and the Young Intellectual (1921) and the collection of essays he edited, Civilization in the United States: An Inquiry by Thirty Americans (1922), which included essays by Conrad AIKEN, H. L. MENCKEN, Lewis MUMFORD, George Jean NATHAN, and Ring LARDNER. These books expressed a profound dissatisfaction with the culture and politics in the country and inspired many young Americans to travel abroad. Stearns experienced some difficult years in Paris and was portrayed by Ernest HEMINGWAY as the indigent Harry Stone in THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926). His later work includes his autobiography The Street I Know (1935) and America: A Re-Appraisal (1937), in which he defends the country against Marxist critics.

Source

Ford, Hugh. Four Lives in Paris. San Francisco: North Point Press, 1987.

Steffens, Lincoln (1866–1936) writer, editor

Lincoln Steffens was born in San Francisco and graduated from the University of California in 1889, after which he studied for several years in Germany and France. He began working as a reporter at the New York Evening Post in 1892, and from 1897 to 1911 served as an editor at the New York Commercial Advertiser, McClure's Magazine, The American Magazine (which he cofounded with Ida M. TARBELL, Ray Stannard Baker, and others in 1906), and Everybody's Magazine. Steffens's progressive political beliefs led him to focus on exposing corruption in government and industry, for which Theodore Roosevelt labeled him and like-minded writers "muckrakers" (see MUCKRAKING MOVEMENT). Steffens's books include The Shame of the Cities (1904), The Struggle for Self-Government (1906), Upbuilders (1909), and The Autobiography of Lincoln Steffens (1931).

Source

Kaplan, Justin. Lincoln Steffens: A Biography. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1974.

—Alex Feerst

Stegner, Wallace (1909–1993) novelist, short-story writer, historian, biographer

The Iowa-born Wallace Stegner experienced an often unsettled childhood as his father, a restless spirit whose activities included wheat farming and bootlegging, moved his wife and two sons across the Midwest and the West. The Stegners lived for six years in East End, Saskatchewan, and for eleven years in Salt Lake City, Utah—settings that became important in his writing career. Stegner graduated from the University of Utah, where he studied with Vardis FISHER, and earned graduate degrees from the University of Iowa. In 1935 he began his distinguished teaching career, which in 1945 led him to Stanford University, where he directed the writing program until his retirement in 1971.

Stegner has often been called a regional writer (see REGIONALISM) because of his close identification with the Rocky Mountain region of the West. His work is frequently concerned with the way place and culture shape human character. His first book of fiction, the novelette Remembering Laughter (1937), examines a love triangle and bitter rivalry involving two sisters on an isolated Iowa farm. Stegner set his first full-length novel, On a Darkling Plain (1940), on the Saskatchewan prairie, where a WORLD WAR I veteran unwillingly becomes involved with the concerns of his fellow human beings in the flu epidemic of 1918. One of his most memorable novels, The Big Rock Candy Mountain (1943), is in part based on his family experience. Like Stegner's father, Bo Mason, the tyrannical head of his family, is inspired by the myth of the West and searches for a pot of gold that forever eludes him.

In addition to his work as a novelist, Stegner is also respected for his nonfiction and short stories. He has written of the culture of the Mormons in Mormon Country (1942) and The Gathering of Zion (1964). His biographies are about a great naturalist, Beyond the Hundredth Meridian: John Wesley Powell and the Second Opening of the West (1954), and a literary critic, The Uneasy Chair: A Biography of Bernard DeVoto (1974). He published two collections of short fiction—The Women on the Wall (1950) and The City of the Living and Other Stories (1956)—and collected the most important of his essays and articles in The Sound of Mountain Water (1969). Stegner received critical acclaim in the 1970s, winning the PULITZER PRIZE for his Angle of Repose (1971), which concerns a retired University of California history professor who must cope with a degenerative disease and his wife's abandonment, and a 1977 National Book Award for The Spectator Bird (1976), about a New York literary agent who retires to the West Coast.

Sources

Benson, Jackson J. Wallace Stegner: His Life and Work. New York: Viking, 1996.

Colberg, Nancy. Wallace Stegner: A Descriptive Bibliography. Lewiston, Idaho: Confluence Press, 1990.

Stein, Gertrude (1874–1946) fiction writer, poet, playwright, critic

Think of the Bible and Homer think of Shakespeare and think of me.

—The Geographical History of America (1936)

Gertrude Stein always thought of herself as an American, despite the relatively short portion of her adult life that she lived in the United States. She was the youngest child born to prosperous German Jewish parents in Allegheny, Pennsylvania. Her family settled in Oakland, California, when she was five. Stein attended Radcliffe College, where she studied with William James. In 1903, just short of the coursework required for a medical degree from Johns Hopkins, Stein left for Paris. She did not return to the United States for a visit for more than thirty years and never lived there again.

In Paris, Stein at first lived with her brother Leo, who introduced her to modern art, one of the inspirations for her writing (see MODERNISM). In 1907 she met Alice B. Toklas (1877–1967), who traveled abroad after the earthquake in her native San Francisco. By 1910, Toklas had moved into the Steins's residence at 27, rue de Fleurus, which the two women then shared after Stein and her brother had a falling-out. Toklas encouraged Stein's writing and became her life partner, or "wife," assisting her with the typing and preparation of her manuscripts for the next forty years until Stein's death. Stein became a central figure in an avant-garde literary and artistic community that included Cubism pioneers Pablo Picasso, Henri Matisse, and Juan Gris, along with American expatriates. Her residence evolved into a gathering place for the literary and artistic set, as she described in THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ALICE B. TOKLAS (1933).

Stein's work crossed genres and frequently defied categorization, encompassing poetry, fiction, drama, essays, speeches, and even an opera libretto. Critics generally divide her work into narrative and experimental writing based on the extent to which a text has or lacks an easily discernible and coherent plot. Some suggest three phases for Stein's work: early writings that focused on consciousness, perception, and the representation of the perception of the present; 1920s radical avant-garde experimentalism; and 1930s audience-friendly memoirs and narratives. But such divisions fail to effectively trace Stein's literary trajectory, since her preoccupations and techniques transcended time periods and her works were not always published when they were written. (THE MAKING OF AMERICANS, for example, was written by 1908 but not published until 1925.) Stein did not find a publisher for her work until 1909 with THREE LIVES, a collection of three novellas that explore the nature of human consciousness. While her work could be philosophical, it could also be playful, as seen, for example, in the poems of Tender Buttons (1914).

Stein went on the lecture circuit in England in 1926; her Oxford and Cambridge lectures were collected in Composition as Explanation (1926). Popular success eluded her until the publication of The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, a Book-of-the-Month Club selection, which led to her return to the United States in 1934 for a highly successful nine-month tour. Readers responded favorably, as well, to the other two texts of her memoir trilogy, Everybody's Autobiography (1937) and Wars I Have Seen (1945).

Always striving to create a "continuous present," Stein experienced a tension between narrating and creating, between writing for an audience and writing self-reflexively for its own sake. Stein's more experimental texts sought to deploy language in unconventional and nonrepresentational ways, and her use of time tended to be circular and repetitive rather than chronological. Although she appreciated the money and popularity that her autobiographies garnered, she was not interested in writing additional best-sellers in the same mode. Throughout her career she remained as interested in sound as sense, and she never stopped experimenting and playing with words.

Before the success of The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, Stein was better known for her personality, lifestyle, artistic milieu, and for her influence on other writers than for her own work. She coined the term "Lost Generation" in reference to the Paris expatriate community in a conversation with Ernest HEMINGWAY, which he used as an epigraph for his novel THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926). She was prescient in her tastes and groundbreaking in her refusal to accept contemporary bounds on gender and sexuality, but more and more her work is gaining acclaim on its own terms as readers are more willing to engage with her texts even as they must struggle with her use of language. History seems to have at least in some measure confirmed Stein's prediction that she would "some day . . . be the acknowledged grandmother of the modern movement"—and perhaps the postmodern movement as well.

Sources

- Gallup, Donald, ed. The Flowers of Friendship: Letters Written to Gertrude Stein. New York: Knopf, 1953.
- Wagner-Martin, Linda. "Favored Strangers": Gertrude Stein and Her Family. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1995.

—Jessica G. Rabin

Steinbeck, John (1902–1968) novelist, short-story writer

A book is like a man—clever and dull, brave and cowardly, beautiful and ugly. For every flowering thought there will be a page like a wet and mangy mongrel, and for every looping flight a tap on the wing and a reminder that wax cannot hold the feathers firm too near the sun.

—"On Publishing" (1977)

John Steinbeck wrote more than thirty books from 1929 to 1966, ranging from social criticism in his PULITZER PRIZE-winning novel THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939) to witty comedy in Tortilla Flat (1935) and Cannery Row (1945). One of the few modernists (see MODERNISM) who was comfortable writing in multiple genres, including nonfiction and journalism, Steinbeck was an experimenter in fictional form who expanded the possibilities of the novel, composing narratives that could be transformed into plays, as in OF MICE AND MEN (1937); metafiction that incorporates his own personal background, as in East of Eden (1952); and commentaries that offer jeremiads to modern Americans, as in The Winter of Our Discontent (1961) and Travels With Charley (1962). Always controversial, Steinbeck was never the darling of the Eastern cultural elite who preferred Ernest HEMINGWAY, William FAULKNER, and F. Scott FITZGERALD to an author they considered a decidedly middlebrow Californian.

John Steinbeck, circa 1947

While Steinbeck's early work was unremarkable, after the popular success of Tortilla Flat he became the darling of American readers, producing best-sellers in Of Mice and Men, The Grapes of Wrath, and THE RED PONY (1945). Although critics upbraided him for not returning to the social consciousness exhibited in Of Mice and Men and The Grapes of Wrath, Steinbeck refused to merely reproduce his master-works, moving from realism to creating more and more symbolic, even fabular, works that probed the American tendency to value material goods over moral action.

John Ernst Steinbeck was born on February 27, 1902, in Salinas, California—a town positioned at the mouth of one of the great agricultural valleys of the state—which became the setting for much of his writing. His mother was a former schoolteacher, and his father was the manager of a flour mill and later the treasurer of Monterey County. Steinbeck recalled, “We were poor people with a hell of a lot of land which made us think we were rich people, even when we couldn’t buy food and were patched.” An avid reader and storyteller in his childhood, Steinbeck was fascinated by tales of fantasy and was especially interested in the Arthurian legend, which led him later in life to work on adapting Sir Thomas Malory’s Morte D’Arthur (1485) into modern English.

In 1919 he followed his two older sisters to Stanford University, but he attended the school intermittently, dropping out to earn money as a clerk, a surveyor in Big Sur, and as a hand on ranches in the Salinas Valley while forming the ambition to become a writer. His employment with the Spreckels Sugar Company during the early 1920s gave him experience with labor problems, which he later explored in his fiction. In 1925 he left Stanford without a degree and set out for New York City, finding employment as a journalist and freelance writer. But he found it hard to support himself and returned to California, where he began to have some success publishing short fiction. Not until his fourth book, Tortilla Flat, the episodic, comic novel about the paisanos of Monterey, did he begin to attract both a large audience and critical praise.

Steinbeck's next novel, In Dubious Battle (1936), which portrayed a violent agriculture strike in the fictional Torgas Valley, established his credentials as a progressive, even radical writer, who had contributed a key text to the PROLETARIAN LITERATURE of the 1930s. Steinbeck revealed compassion and dedication to the downtrodden and featured characters who are Communist agitators. The novel is hardly straightforward propaganda, however, for it approaches the strike in documentary fashion as a case study of a labor dispute, and portrays a conflict in which both sides are flawed.

Of Mice and Men shows not only Steinbeck's compassion for his farm-laborer characters George and Lenny but also his deep feeling for nature and for connections between man and nature, a feeling so intense that it amounts to a kind of biological determinism. The following year Steinbeck published his only collection of short stories, The Long Valley (1938), which explores the lives of American and Mexican characters in the Salinas Valley. The collection includes “The Chrysanthemums” and “The White Quail” as well as four linked stories that were included in the separately published coming-of-age novella The Red Pony (1945).

The Grapes of Wrath, the novel that defined Steinbeck in the minds of many critics, tells the story of a family of hard-working “Okies” who leave the Oklahoma “dust bowl” to trek across the country in dilapidated automobiles in search of

Dust jacket for the 1937 novel that Steinbeck also wrote as a play, which won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for the best play of the 1937–1938 season

Sweet Thursday. New York: Viking, 1954.

The Short Reign of Pippin IV: A Fabrication. New York: Viking, 1957.

Once There Was a War. New York: Viking, 1958.

The Winter of Our Discontent. New York: Viking, 1961.

Speech Accepting the Nobel Peace Prize for Literature. New York: Viking, 1962.

Travels with Charley: In Search of America. New York: Viking, 1962.

America and Americans. New York: Viking, 1966.

The Acts of King Arthur and His Noble Knights: From the Winchester Manuscript and Other Sources, edited by Chase Horton. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1976.

The Uncollected Stories of John Steinbeck, edited by Kiyoshi Nakayama. Tokyo: Nan'un-do, 1986.

John Steinbeck on Writing, edited by Tetsumaro Hayashi, Steinbeck Essay Series, no. 2. Muncie, Ind.: Steinbeck Research Institute, Ball State University, 1988.

Working Days: The Journals of The Grapes of Wrath, 1938–1941, edited by Robert DeMott. New York: Viking, 1989.

Studying John Steinbeck

The most important novels by John Steinbeck are THE GRAPES OF WRATH (1939), OF MICE AND MEN (1937), and East of Eden (1952). Also significant are the comic TORTILLA FLAT (1935) and Cannery Row (1945) and the nonfictional Travels with Charley (1962) and America and Americans (1966). Other frequently read Steinbeck novels include The Pearl (1947), The Pastures of Heaven (1932), and The Winter of Our Discontent (1961). Since Steinbeck was also a writer of short fiction, serious students of his work should also examine his collection The Long Valley (1938), which contains the frequently anthologized and popular stories “The Snake,” “The Chrysanthemums” and “Flight.”

Important critical studies of the Steinbeck canon include John Timmerman’s John Steinbeck: The Aesthetics of the Road Taken (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1986) and Louis Owens’s John Steinbeck’s Revision of America (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985). The best studies of the short fiction are Robert Hughes’s Beyond the Red Pony: A Reader’s Guide to Steinbeck’s Complete Short Stories (Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1987) and John Steinbeck: A Study of the Short Fiction (Boston: Twayne, 1986). Also valuable are Charlotte Cook Hadella’s Of Mice and Men: A Kinship of Powerlessness (New York: Twayne, 1995), Jackson J. Benson’s The Short Novels of John Steinbeck (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990) and Timmerman’s The Dramatic Landscape of Steinbeck’s Short Stories (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1990).

Students concentrating on The Grapes of Wrath should consult the critical edition of the novel edited by Peter Lisca and Kevin Hearle (New York: Viking, 1997) and Owens’s The Grapes of Wrath: Trouble in The Promised Land (Boston: Twayne, 1989). In addition, Critical Essays on Steinbeck’s The Grapes of Wrath, edited by John Ditsky (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989), and New Essays on The Grapes of Wrath (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990), edited by David Wyatt, are valuable resources. Studies of East of Eden include Michael J. Meyer’s The Betrayal of Brotherhood in the Work of John Steinbeck: Cain Sign (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2000) and Ditsky’s Essays on East of Eden, a monograph published by Ball State University in Muncie, Indiana, in 1977.

Bibliographical studies of Steinbeck appeared frequently under the imprint Scarecrow Press, including three compilations by Tetsumaro Hayashi published in 1967, 1973, and 1983, and more recently in the volumes edited by Meyer and published in 1998 and 2007.

A delineation of the philosophical musings that shaped Steinbeck’s writing can be found in The Log From the Sea of Dust jacket for Steinbeck's 1939 novel, his most acclaimed work. It was the third novel he published during the Great Depression that depicted the plight of migrant workers, following In Dubious Battle (1936) and Of Mice and Men (1937).

Cortez (1957), a journal that traces the collecting trip Steinbeck made with his good friend Edward Flanders Ricketts (often called Doc) and records their speculation and discussion about the interaction of all life forms. Additional insight into the author is provided in John Steinbeck: A Life in Letters, edited by Elaine Steinbeck and Robert Wallsten (New York: Viking, 1974) and Conversations with John Steinbeck, edited by Thomas Fensch (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1988). The authorized biography is Benson's The True Adventures of John Steinbeck, Writer (New York: Viking, 1984). Additional supplemental information on the author can be found in Jay Parini's John Steinbeck: A Biography (New York: Holt, 1995).

The major archival holdings of Steinbeck manuscripts are at the following locations: the Wells Fargo Collection at Stanford University's Cecil H. Green Library, the Martha Heasley Cox Center at San Jose State's Martin Luther King Library, the Collection of Pascal Covici at the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas at Austin, the Preston Beyer collection at Princeton University, the Bancroft Library at the University of California at Berkeley, and the Bracken Library at Ball State University in Muncie, Indiana. The Pierpont Morgan Library and the Butler Library at Columbia University, both in New York City, also have significant holdings. Recommended websites are The Martha Heasley Cox Center for Steinbeck Studies (<<http://www.steinbeck.sjsu.edu>>) and the National Steinbeck Center (<<http://www.steinbeck.org/MainFrame.html>>).

—Michael J. Meyer

Sterling, George (1869–1926) poet

Born and educated in the East, where he attended St. Charles College in Maryland and was influenced by the teaching of the poet Father John Bannister Tabb, George Sterling is best known as a poet of California, particularly San Francisco. When he arrived in the city in 1890, he quickly became involved in its bohemian literary culture. He was prolific as a poet, and was praised by such writers as Ambrose Bierce, his mentor and greatest influence, as well as by Jack LONDON, Upton SINCLAIR, and Theodore DREISER, but he was a traditional poet whose use of archaic, formal diction led to the eclipse of his reputation in the 1920s. His most famous works include the title poem of The Testimony of the Suns and Other Poems (1903), in which he depicted the cycle of life in the universe, the phantasmagoric title poem of A Wine of Wizardry and Other Poems (1909), and the dramatic poem Lilith (1919; revised, 1926). London used Sterling as the model for the poet Russ Brissenden in MARTIN EDEN (1909).

Sources

Benediktsson, Thomas E. George Sterling. Boston: Twayne, 1980.

Johnson, Cecil. A Bibliography of the Writings of George Sterling. San Francisco: Windsor Press, 1931.

Stevens, Wallace (1879–1955) poet

After one has abandoned a belief in God, poetry is that essence which takes its place as life's redemption.

—Opus Posthumous (1957)

Wallace Stevens was born in Reading, Pennsylvania, October 2, 1879. In 1897 he enrolled in Harvard as a special student with the hope of eventually becoming a writer. At Harvard he met the philosopher and poet George SANTA-

Wallace Stevens, circa 1925

YANA, whose belief that poetry must become a replacement for traditional religious faith became central in Stevens's work. After leaving Harvard, Stevens worked as a journalist for the NEW YORK TRIBUNE and then entered New York Law School, graduating in 1903. He pursued a career in law, married in 1909, and was hired in 1916 by the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company, where he remained for the rest of his life.

In the second decade of the twentieth century and continuing until his death on August 2, 1955, he led a double life, a businessman during the regular workweek and an avant-garde poet at night and on the weekends. Unlike other poets such as Ezra POUND and T. S. ELIOT, he had little contact with other writers. His life revolved around his work at the insurance company, his family, and his interests in travel, classical music, gardening, and poetry. In 1923 he published his first volume, Harmonium, which did not attract much attention. He published little the next ten years. After the insurance company promoted him to vice president in 1934, he began to publish again on a regular basis. Ideas of Order (1935), The Man with the Blue Guitar & Other Poems (1937), Parts of a World (1942), and Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction (1942) gradually built a respectful and then a devoted audience. The Auroras of Autumn (1950) won the National Book Award and The Collected

Poems of Wallace Stevens (1954) won another National Book Award and a PULITZER PRIZE.

Stevens's best poems are notable for unusual points of view, colorful imagery, humor, rhetorical virtuosity, and a probing philosophical spirit. His most admired poems include "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird," "A Rabbit as King of the Ghosts," "THE EMPEROR OF ICE-CREAM," "Disillusionment of Ten O'Clock," "Bantams in Pine-Woods," "Peter Quince at the Clavier," "A High-Toned Old Christian Woman," "THE IDEA OF ORDER AT KEY WEST," "The Snow Man," "A Postcard from the Volcano," and "Sunday Morning." While critics have noted a variety of modern influences on Stevens's work—such artists and thinkers as Santayana, Pablo Picasso, and Henri Bergson and such movements as IMAGISM, Cubism, and impressionism—the most important influences on his poetry are the major English Romantic poets of the first half of the nineteenth century, especially William Wordsworth and John Keats. Stevens's writings reveal his preoccupation with the interaction of the imagination and reality. In the tradition of the English Romantics, he explores the problem of the separation between human consciousness and objective reality and whether the gulf between the two can be surmounted.

In the poem "Of Modern Poetry," Stevens describes the project that defines his career and the assumptions at the core of his aesthetic. His goal is to explore human consciousness in "the poem of the mind in the act of finding / What will suffice." Keenly aware of the modern feelings of alienation and profound loss as a consequence of what Friedrich Nietzsche described as the "death of God," Stevens feels compelled to search for some compensation, for what will "suffice" to affirm everyday existence in lieu of traditional religious faith. This theme is evident in "Sunday Morning," which was included in his first volume of verse. The issues that this philosophical meditation explores are the heart of Stevens work: How does one find meaning and purpose in a world where the gods have vanished? How does one cope with death if there is no afterlife?

Throughout his career in "acts of the mind" Stevens struggles to affirm reality, as the imagination seeks to order, transform, and redeem the external world. At times, as for example in "The Poems of Our Climate," the gulf between human consciousness and reality is overcome in a moment of stasis, but at other times, as in "Domination of Black" or "No Possum, No Sop, No Taters," the attempt by the imagination to order and affirm the world fails. Throughout Stevens's oeuvre, the reader observes the "never-resting mind" continually meditating upon reality as it seeks to understand and redeem it. The preoccupations of the earlier work are evident in the long philosophical poems in the latter part of his career, as for example Notes Toward a Supreme Fiction and The Auroras of Autumn. Early and late, Stevens believes "the great poems of heaven and hell have been written and the great poem of the earth remains to be written."

By the end of his career, Stevens was being recognized as an important poet, but his reputation did not soar until after his death. Scholars and critics of American literature now consider Wallace Stevens to be among the handful of major American poets of the twentieth century.

—Allan Chavkin

Principal Books by Stevens

- Harmonium*. New York: Knopf, 1923; revised and enlarged, 1931.
Ideas of Order. New York: Alcestis Press, 1935; enlarged edition, New York & London: Knopf, 1936.
Owl's Clover. New York: Alcestis Press, 1936.
The Man with the Blue Guitar & Other Poems. New York & London: Knopf, 1937.
Parts of a World. New York: Knopf, 1942.
Notes toward a Supreme Fiction. Cummington, Mass.: Cummington Press, 1942.
Esthétique du Mal. Cummington, Mass.: Cummington Press, 1945.
Transport to Summer. New York: Knopf, 1947.
Three Academic Pieces: The Realm of Resemblance, Someone Puts a Pineapple Together, Of Ideal Time and Choice. Cummington, Mass.: Cummington Press, 1947.
A Primitive like an Orb. New York: Gotham Book Mart, 1948.
The Auroras of Autumn. New York: Knopf, 1950.
The Relations between Poetry and Painting. New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1951.
The Necessary Angel: Essays on Reality and the Imagination. New York: Knopf, 1951.
Raoul Dufy: A Note. New York: Pierre Berès, 1953.
Mattino Domenicale, English and Italian, with Italian translations by Renato Poggioli. Turin: Giulio Einaudi, 1954.
Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird. New York: Knopf, 1954.
The Collected Poems of Wallace Stevens. New York: Knopf, 1954.
Opus Posthumous, edited by Samuel French Morse. New York: Knopf, 1957.
Poems by Wallace Stevens, edited by Morse. New York: Vintage, 1959.
The Palm at the End of the Mind: Selected Poems and a Play by Wallace Stevens, edited by Holly Stevens. New York: Knopf, 1971.

Studying Wallace Stevens

Although Wallace Stevens's poetry reveals a relative consistency in theme and style from the start of his writing career until its end, his poems tended to be more subdued and meditative after the publication of the enlarged edition of Harmonium (1931), which includes such striking poems as "THE EMPEROR OF ICE-CREAM," "Bantams in Pine Woods," and "A High-Toned Old Christian Woman." The Palm at the End of the Mind: Selected Poems and a Play, edited by the poet's daughter Holly Stevens (1971), is an excellent introduction to Stevens's canon, revealing the range of his poetic imagination

Poetry

A Magazine of Verse

VOL. VIII
No. IV

JULY, 1916

THREE TRAVELERS WATCH A SUNRISE.*

THE characters are three Chinese, two negroes and a girl.

The scene represents a forest of heavy trees on a hilltop in eastern Pennsylvania. To the right is a road, obscured by bushes. It is about four o'clock of a morning in August, at the present time.

When the curtain rises, the stage is dark. The limb of a tree creaks. A negro carrying a lantern passes along the road. The sound is repeated. The negro comes through the bushes, raises his lantern and looks through the trees. Discerning a dark object among the branches, he shrinks back, crosses stage, and goes out through the wood to the left.

A second negro comes through the bushes to the right. He carries two large baskets, which he places on the ground just inside of the bushes. Enter three Chinese, one of whom carries a lantern. They pause on the road.

*Copyright, 1916, by Wallace Stevens: dramatic rights reserved.

[163]

Opening of the initial publication of Stevens's first play, which won the 1916 Poetry Magazine prize for verse drama

over the course of his career. To gain a more comprehensive understanding of Stevens's work, students should read Wallace Stevens: Collected Poetry and Prose, edited by Frank Kermode and Joan Richardson (New York: Library of America, 1997), which includes selections from his notebooks, journals, and letters as well as his writing for publication.

Worthwhile studies of Stevens include Robert Buttel's Wallace Stevens: The Making of Harmonium (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1967), a thoughtful examination of the poet's style in his first book. Harold Bloom's Wallace Stevens: The Poems of Our Climate (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1977) is particularly useful for Bloom's emphasis on the long poems and sequences and their "complex relations both with one another" and Stevens's nineteenth-century British Romantic precursors such as William Wordsworth and John Keats. Daniel Fuchs's The Comic Spirit of Wallace Stevens (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1963) helps the reader understand the subtleties of Stevens's irony and unusual humor that are central to his poetry. Charles Berger's Forms of Farewell, The Late Poetry of Wallace Stevens (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985) explores the poems of Stevens's last decade. Also recommended are Helen Vendler's On Extended Wings: Wallace Stevens' Longer Poems (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1969), which is especially good on "Sunday Morning," and Words Chosen Out Of Desire (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1986), which includes discussions of his very late poems.

Front cover for the collection published in 1957, two years after Stevens's death

The best books for biographical information about Stevens are Joan Richardson's Wallace Stevens: The Early Years, 1879–1923 (New York: Beech Tree Books, 1986) and her Wallace Stevens: The Later Years, 1923–1955 (New York: Beech Tree Books, 1988). Also useful are Peter Brazeau's Parts of a World: Wallace Stevens Remembered, An Oral Biography (New York: Random House, 1983) and Holly Stevens's Souvenirs and Prophecies: The Young Wallace Stevens

(New York: Knopf, 1977), the latter consisting primarily of excerpts from the poet's letters and journals.

J. M. Edelstein's Wallace Stevens: A Descriptive Bibliography (Pittsburgh, Pa.: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1973) is a primary bibliography that also lists other material such as scholarly criticism, recordings made of Stevens's poetry, poems set to music, poems referring to Stevens, and dedicatory poems. Abbie F. Willard's Wallace Stevens, The Poet and His Critics (Chicago: American Library Association, 1978) provides a helpful overview of the scholarly and critical studies of Stevens's poetry. Both books must be supplemented by consulting the annual bibliographies of the Modern Language Association and American Literary Scholarship (published by Duke University Press). For the most recent approaches to Stevens's work, one should consult The Wallace Stevens Journal, which is published by the Wallace Stevens Society; its website (<www.wallacestevens.com>) has a link for the list of all the articles published in the journal since its inception in 1977 and provides links to other useful sites. The archive for Wallace Stevens's papers is at the Henry E. Huntington Library, San Marino, California.

—Allan Chavkin

Stewart, Donald Ogden (1894–1980) humorist, screenwriter

Stewart was a popular writer of parodies and nonsense fiction during the 1920s, the last great decade of American wit and humor. His best-known works included A Parody Outline of History (1921), Perfect Behavior (1922), and Aunt Polly's Story of Mankind (1923). During the 1930s while he was commencing his successful career as a screenwriter in Hollywood, Stewart became active in radical politics. His screenplay for The Philadelphia Story (1940) won the Academy Award.

Source

Stewart, Donald Ogden. By a Stroke of Luck! An Autobiography. New York: Paddington Press/Two Continents, 1975.

—Morris Colden

Stewart, George R. (1895–1980) historian, novelist, critic

George R. Stewart, who attended Princeton and did graduate work at the University of California and Columbia University, was a professor of English at the University of California, Berkeley, for nearly forty years. He also pursued a prolific and versatile publishing career. His historical works include Ordeal by Hunger (1936), an account of the ill-fated Donner Party; Pickett's Charge (1959), an account of the last attack at Gettysburg; and The California Trail (1962), a study of the pioneering treks in the 1840s and 1850s. His novels include East of the Giants (1938), set in California just before the gold rush; two novels about natural disasters, Storm (1941) and Fire (1948); and the science-fiction classic Earth Abides (1949), which concerns a man's efforts to preserve civilization after disease decimates humanity.

Source

Caldwell, John. George R. Stewart. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1981.

Stone, Irving (1903–1989) novelist

Educated at the University of California and the University of Southern California, Irving Stone wrote popular biographical fiction, including Lust for Life (1934), on Vincent van Gogh; Sailor on Horseback (1938), on Jack LONDON; The President's Lady (1951), on Andrew and Rachel Jackson; Love Is Eternal (1954), on Abraham and Mary Todd Lincoln; The Agony and the Ecstasy (1961), on Michelangelo; Passions of the Mind (1971), on Sigmund Freud; The Origin (1980), on Charles Darwin; and Depths of Glory (1985) on Camille Pissarro.

Source

Stieg, Lewis F. Irving Stone: A Bibliography. Los Angeles: Friends of the Libraries, University of Southern California, 1973.

"Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening"

by Robert Frost (1923) poem

Collected in New Hampshire (1923), the first book by Robert FROST to win a PULITZER PRIZE, this haunting poem evokes the tensions between the individual and civilization. On the face of it, this famous work is exceedingly simple. The speaker stops to watch snow falling in the woods. He mentions that this property is owned by a man in the village. It is a deserted place, and the speaker imagines that his horse thinks it is a strange place to stop. It is the "darkest evening of the year." The speaker wishes to linger, but he has "promises to keep" and, as he repeats in the poem's closing lines, "miles to go before I sleep."

The poem expresses not only the human sense of duty but also the desire to relinquish that duty. The "lovely, dark and deep" woods evoke a feeling of prehistoric or primitive rootedness in nature itself. The speaker is tempted to rest in this soft ("downy") scene. The emphasis on the darkness suggests death or the cessation of consciousness, a merging with nature, an ultimate rest.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Robert Frost. Broomall, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999.

Poirier, Richard. Robert Frost: The Work of Knowing. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1990.

Story (1931–1953) periodical

Founded by Whit Burnett and his first wife Martha Foley, Story was the only magazine of its time devoted solely to the publication of short stories. It published classic American writers, including William FAULKNER and Eudora WELTY. Burnett and Foley divorced, but with his second wife, Hallie, Burnett continued to edit the magazine and produced a collection, Story: The Fiction of the Forties (1949). He also published a memoir, The Story of Story Magazine (1980).

The Story of a Novel by Thomas Wolfe (New York & London: Scribners, 1936) nonfiction

Based on the lecture that Thomas WOLFE gave at the Colorado Writers' Conference in 1935, The Story of a Novel recounts the composition of OF TIME AND THE RIVER. His generous acknowledgment of the advice and encouragement provided by editor Maxwell PERKINS fueled the gossip that Wolfe could not write a novel without editorial collaboration and contributed to his break with Perkins.

—Morris Colden

Stout, Rex (1886–1975) novelist

Rex Todhunter Stout is best known for the creation of Nero Wolfe, a huge (nearly three-hundred-pound) detective who solves crimes mainly by dint of his wits and logic. Wolfe employs the engaging legman, Archie Goodwin, to check on various details and to run errands. Stout turned to detective fiction after his first three novels were praised by critics but failed to attract an audience. Nero Wolfe appeared in forty-six novels, beginning with Fer-de-Lance (1934) and ending with A Family Affair (1975).

Sources

McAleer, John. Rex Stout: A Biography. Boston: Little, Brown, 1977.

Townsend, Guy M., and others. Rex Stout: An Annotated Primary and Secondary Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1980.

Stover at Yale by Owen Johnson (New York: Stokes, 1912) novel

The first widely influential American college novel, Stover at Yale was popular for providing the "inside" story of a major university; it examines the social system at Yale—not the academic life—through the undergraduate career of Dink Stover. As a sophomore, Stover leads a campaign against the school's secret societies, epitomized by Skull and Bones, in which American universities are criticized as "admirably organized instruments for the prevention of learning." Despite his nonconformity, Stover, a football star, is tapped for and joins the elite society. Owen Johnson also wrote three realistic novels about boys, including Dink Stover, at the Lawrenceville School, a New Jersey prep school that he attended before entering Yale: The Eternal Boy: Being the Story of the Prodigious Hickey (1909), The Varmint (1910), and The Tennessee Shad (1911).

Source

Lyons, John O. The College Novel in America. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1962.

Strange Interlude by Eugene O'Neill (produced 1928) play

Eugene O'NEILL wrote Strange Interlude as an attempt to replicate the narrative expanse and psychological complexity of a novel in dramatic form. Consisting of nine acts and in its original production lasting for more than five hours, the play opened on January 30, 1928, for a successful Broadway run of 426 performances.

In Strange Interlude O'Neill dramatizes the entire life of the protagonist Nina Leeds through her sexual relationships with three men. She loses a young lover in WORLD WAR I, settles into a loveless marriage to Sam Evans that results in an abortion, and ultimately mothers a child with another man while still married to Evans. The play's major contribution to American stagecraft comes from O'Neill's use of the interior monologue (similar to the Elizabethan aside) in which a character in mid scene moves downstage to deliver an intimate "interlude" of private thoughts to the audience. In a letter to his wife, O'Neill describes the play as "so strange to me at times that I feel as if something inside of me were writing about something inside the lives of people that gets beyond any of the usual psychological evaluations. I seem to hit on things that, dramatically at least, have never been touched before." The play received mixed reviews but attracted great public attention and won O'Neill his third PULITZER PRIZE for drama.

—Park Bucker

Stratemeyer, Edward (1862–1930) children's author, creator of the Stratemeyer Syndicate

Although the Hardy Boys, Nancy Drew, Tom Swift, the Bobbsey Twins, and many of his other juvenile characters are familiar to generations of readers, Edward Stratemeyer is relatively unknown in the literary world. A private, family man who could produce a book every three weeks, he created the Stratemeyer Syndicate, a literary business so successful that his pseudonyms and characters have far exceeded his own fame.

Born in Elizabeth, New Jersey, Stratemeyer grew up in the middle class and had ready access to a large family library. He loved the Horatio Alger stories and wanted to write such books himself. He sold his first story, "Victor Horton's Idea," for $75 in 1889 and started writing juvenile literature in earnest.

Around 1890 Stratemeyer moved to Newark, where he operated a stationery store. In 1893 Street & Smith, a publisher of dime novels and popular fiction, hired Stratemeyer as editor and writer for Good News, one of the inexpensive magazines filled with fiction and jokes for children that were known as story papers. Street & Smith also published Stratemeyer's dime novels. At Street & Smith, Stratemeyer gathered ideas that he later implemented in his own syndicate. Street & Smith employed house writers who worked under pseudonyms and wrote about characters owned by the syndicate. The dime novel followed a strict format, and the syndicate paid a flat fee with no royalties.

Stratemeyer left Street & Smith in 1895 and became editor of Frank J. Earll's story paper Young People of America. Then Stratemeyer started his own story paper, Bright Days, in April 1896. It was not successful. He returned to writing juvenile literature and had tremendous success in 1898 with Under Dewey at Manilla. He continued to write historical boys' novels under the pseudonym of Captain Ralph Bonehill. Although these were successful, Stratemeyer perfected his formula when, as Arthur M. Winfield, he created the Rover Boys series (1899–1926) featuring young, adventurous upper-middle-class protagonists who traveled extensively.

Stratemeyer launched his own syndicate in 1906 (incorporated in 1910), and it became a factory for series books, starting with the Bobbsey Twins, written under the pseudonym of Laura Lee Hope. He recruited writers and assigned volumes. Then he farmed the books out to different publishers. More series followed, employing the same techniques. Stratemeyer provided his writers with two-page outlines that included plot particulars and detailed characterizations. The protagonists, such as Tom Swift, the Rover Boys, and Jack Ranger, were always highly skilled and used modern inventions such as cars and movie cameras. He paid the writers a flat fee ranging from $75 to $125 per book and made them sign a contract agreeing not to use or even claim connection to the pseudonyms. Stratemeyer even maintained ownership of the copyright. When launching a new series, Stratemeyer released the first three titles simultaneously, a tactic that allowed readers to become involved with the continuing adventures of the characters immediately. In another innovative move, he had one of his publishers lower the price per copy from $1.25 to 50¢. The fifty-center was born, and sales boomed.

From 1910 to 1930 Stratemeyer created eighty-two series and averaged thirty new titles a year. Other successful Stratemeyer series were Tom Swift (1910–1941), Jack Ranger (1907–1911), and Baseball Joe (1912–1928). Stratemeyer also recognized the need for girls' series and in 1908 launched the Dorothy Dale series, providing the same independent, modern protagonist for girls as he did for boys. Ruth Fielding (1913–1934), a scriptwriter and movie producer, was followed by the Motor Girls (1910–1917), Outdoor Girls (1913–1933), Girls of Central High (1914–1919), and Blythe

Girls (1925–1932). Building on the success of the Bobbsey Twins for younger children, he introduced Bunny Brown and His Sister Sue (1916–1931), Bomba the Jungle Boy (1926–1938), and Six Little Bunkers (1918–1930).

In response to the popularity of adult mysteries, Stratemeyer created his two most successful series. Stratemeyer hired Leslie McFarlane to write the Hardy Boys mystery stories under the pseudonym Franklin W. Dixon in 1927. Then he hired Mildred Wirt (Benson) to write a girls' mystery series as Carolyn Keene. The first three Nancy Drew titles were published in 1930. With these two series, Stratemeyer formalized his product: each book had twenty-five chapters and ran about 115 pages; each chapter ended with a cliff-hanger; the protagonists did not age; the books were full of action verbs; and there was no romantic distraction.

Stratemeyer did not live to witness the tremendous success and influence of the Hardy Boys and Nancy Drew. When he died in 1930, his daughters took over the Stratemeyer Syndicate, with Harriet Stratemeyer Adams becoming the primary decision maker when Edna moved to Florida in 1942. The syndicate reduced the production from twenty-seven series in 1930 to seven in 1942 and concentrated on the more successful series—Nancy Drew, Hardy Boys, Dana Girls (1934–1979), and Happy Hollisters (1953–1970). SIMON & SCHUSTER bought the Stratemeyer Syndicate in 1982 after the death of Harriet Adams.

Edward Stratemeyer wrote 150 books, outlined 600 others, and launched 125 original series. New titles are still being published in some of the series he created.

Sources

- Billman, Carol. The Secret of the Stratemeyer Syndicate: Nancy Drew, The Hardy Boys, and the Million Dollar Fiction Factory. New York: Ungar, 1986.
- Greenwald, Marilyn. The Secret of the Hardy Boys: Leslie McFarlane and the Stratemeyer Syndicate. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2004.
- Johnson, Deidre. Edward Stratemeyer and the Stratemeyer Syndicate. New York: Twayne, 1993.
- Kismaric, Carole, and Heiferman, Marvin. The Mysterious Case of Nancy Drew and the Hardy Boys. New York: Simon & Schuster, Inc.: 1998.

—Josephine B. Owens

Stream of Consciousness

Stream of consciousness as a literary technique is intended to give the illusion of expressing the uncensored thoughts of the narrator, as in the concluding Molly Bloom section of James Joyce's influential Ulysses (1922). This technique was first used toward the end of the nineteenth century as novelists took an interest in the psychic life of their characters. The term itself was first used by William James in The Principles of Psychology (1892). James and, later, Sigmund Freud emphasized the idea of human identity not as simply a product of "character" (the sum total of an individual's actions) but as a constantly shifting consciousness. Writers use stream of consciousness to directly reveal a character's thoughts without mediation. The technique is also often referred to as "interior monologue," although that phrase suggests a higher degree of articulation and order than the spontaneous flow, or stream, of consciousness. The first two sections of William FAULKNER's THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929) have the fragmentary quality of stream of consciousness, whereas the third section is closer to a soliloquy or interior monologue—as are many of the sections in Faulkner's AS I LAY DYING (1930). John DOS PASSOS provides a good example of stream of consciousness in his "Camera Eye" sections of U.S.A.

Sources

- Humphrey, Robert. Stream of Consciousness in the Modern Novel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1954.
- Steinberg, Erwin R., ed. The Stream-of-Consciousness Technique in the Modern Novel. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1979.

Stuart, Jesse (1907–1984) novelist, poet, short-story writer, autobiographer

Born to a Kentucky sharecropping family, Jesse Stuart attended Lincoln Memorial University in Tennessee and did graduate work at Vanderbilt University, where he was encouraged in his writing by Robert Penn WARREN and Donald DAVIDSON, who advised Stuart to "go back to your country . . . and write of your people." A writer in several genres who published more than fifty books in his long career, Stuart became an admired regionalist (see REGIONALISM), creating a mythical Appalachia that was inspired by his upbringing in W-Hollow in Greenup County. His first important book was the collection of some seven hundred sonnets, Man with a Bull-Tongue Plow (1934; revised 1959), which was followed by his first story collection, Head O'W-Hollow (1936), his first autobiographical work, Beyond Dark Hills (1938), and his first novel, Trees of Heaven (1940). Stuart's most commercially successful novel was Taps for Private Tussie (1943), a Book-of-the-Month-Club selection. The comic novel treats a poor Kentucky family that moves into a mansion for a time when they receive $10,000 in insurance money following the supposed death of Private Kim Tussie.

Sources

- LeMaster, J. R., Jesse Stuart: A Reference Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979.
- LeMaster, Jesse Stuart, Kentucky's Chronicler-Poet. Memphis, Tenn.: Memphis State University Press, 1980.

Richardson, H. Edward. Jesse: The Biography of an American Writer, Jesse Hilton Stuart. New York, St. Louis, San Francisco, Toronto, Hamburg & Mexico: McGraw-Hill, 1984.

Suckow, Ruth (1892–1960) novelist, short-story writer
An Iowa regionalist (see REGIONALISM), Ruth Suckow is known for Country People (1924), a novel detailing three generations of a German-American family. The Odyssey of a Nice Girl (1925) shifts focus to the life of a single young girl confronting the provinciality of Iowa life. Iowa Interiors (1926) and Children and Older People (1931) collect Suckow's short stories. Some Others and Myself (1952) includes stories and memoirs.

Sources

Hamblen, Abigail Ann. Ruth Suckow. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1978.

Kissane, Leedice McAnelly. Ruth Suckow. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Sui Sin Far

See Edith Maude EATON.

The Sun Also Rises by Ernest Hemingway (New York: Scribners, 1926)

The novel that launched Ernest HEMINGWAY's literary career, The Sun Also Rises depicts post-WORLD WAR I characters who bear physical and psychological scars of the war. It is narrated by Jake Barnes, an American journalist living in Paris whose war wound left him sexually impotent. Jake leads friends Robert Cohn, Bill Gorton, Lady Brett Ashley, and her fiancé, Mike Campbell, both alcoholics, to Spain to trout fish and attend the Festival of St. Fermín in Pamplona. In Pamplona tension develops between Barnes and Cohn, who both love Brett, and also between Campbell and Cohn. The contentiousness reaches a peak when thirty-four-year-old Brett falls in love with nineteen-year-old bullfighter Pedro Romero, "a real one" as "there had not been for a long time." This relationship destroys Jake's friendship with fellow bullfighting aficianado and hotel owner Juanito Montoya, who fears that Romero will be corrupted. Nearly hysterical over the Brett-Romero affair, Cohn physically attacks Jake, Mike, and Romero, disgracing himself before he departs abruptly. The festival concluded, Jake goes to San Sebastian but soon rejoins Brett, who telegraphs from Madrid for help. In a telling reply to Brett's observation that she and Jake could have had "a damned good time together," Jake says, "Yes . . . isn't it pretty to think so." Although one of the two epigraphs of the novel is a quote from Gertrude Stein labeling postwar youth "a lost generation" (the second, from Ecclesiastes, concerns the abiding earth), Hemingway rejected Stein's view.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Ernest Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises. New York: Chelsea House, 1996.

Nagel, James, ed. Critical Essays on The Sun Also Rises. New York: G. K. Hall, 1995.

Stoneback, H. R. Reading Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 2007.

—John C. Unrue

Sackler, Howard (1929–1982) playwright

A New York native, Sackler earned a B.A. from Brooklyn College in 1950 and spent his career writing and directing movies and plays. His play The Great White Hope (produced 1967), about Jack Johnson, the first African American heavy-weight boxing champion, won Sackler the 1969 Pulitzer Prize and other awards. His screenplay for The Great White Hope was made into a motion picture in 1970. Sackler's other dramas include Mr. Welk and Jersey Jim (produced 1960) and a collection of one-act plays—The Nine O'Clock Mail (1965) among them—published under the title A Few Enquiries (1970).

Salinger, J. D. (1919– ) novelist, short-story writer

I pay for this kind of attitude. I'm known as a strange, aloof kind of man. But all I'm doing is trying to protect myself and my work.

—quoted in “J.D. Salinger Speaks about His Silence” (1974)

Jerome David Salinger was born into an upper-middle-class family in New York City. He graduated from Valley Forge Military Academy in 1936, determined to be a writer. After a disappointing semester at New York University he traveled to Europe at his father's urging to learn the meat-importing business. Returning in 1938 he failed to complete a semester at Ursinus College, and the following year he enrolled in a short-story-writing class at Columbia University taught by Whit Burnett, editor of Story magazine. Burnett recognized Salinger's potential and published his first piece of fiction,

J. D. Salinger

“The Young Folks” (1940), in Story, marking the start of a prolific decade for Salinger.

Title illustration for a short story by Salinger in Collier's magazine, December 12, 1942

Salinger continued to publish in such periodicals as The Saturday Evening Post, Cosmopolitan, and Esquire, even while serving in the army for nearly three years during WORLD WAR II. The publication of "A Perfect Day for Bananafish" in The New Yorker in 1948 proved significant in three ways: it marked a departure from his earlier less-refined stories; it introduced the first member of the Glass family, who occupied most of his later work; and it triggered what became an exclusive association with The New Yorker. After his short story "Uncle Wiggly in Connecticut" was released as a movie titled My Foolish Heart in 1950, Salinger became disenchanted with the motion-picture industry. In 1951 the appearance of The Catcher in the Rye brought unwelcome celebrity, and Salinger became disdainful of book publishers as well, demanding that his book jackets contain no promotional material—author photos, lurid drawings or descriptions, or blurbs—and that there be no more book-club editions or prepublication advertising campaigns. In 1953 Salinger withdrew to a secluded home in Cornish, New Hampshire, where he continues to live and, allegedly, write, although he has not published anything since 1965. He surfaced briefly in 1974 to stop distribution of a pirated collection of his early stories and again in 1986 to prevent publication of a biography that had made use of his unpublished letters.

Salinger published twenty-eight short stories before publishing a book. Referring to himself as "a dash man not a miler," he claimed in 1945, "It is probable that I will never write a novel." Yet, the publication of his first book and only novel, The Catcher in the Rye, won him an immense readership, allowing the three books of short fiction that followed it to be instant best-sellers that have remained in print. In a rare comment on his own work in Mademoiselle in 1947, Salinger was said to have claimed that "he almost always writes about young people." As a result of this preoccupation with the young, Salinger's work has been particularly appealing to high-school- and college-age readers, who often identify with his alienated heroes' struggles to fit into a society they view as insensitive, superficial, and vulgar. For Holden Caulfield, the protagonist of The Catcher in the Rye, growing up is not an ascent, but a fall. The adult world is composed of "phonies" who "always clap for the wrong things." "Certain things they should stay the way they are," Holden muses. His younger sister, Phoebe, symbolizes authenticity, spontaneity, and imagination, and he laments that these traits will diminish as she matures.

Salinger's second book, Nine Stories (1953), introduces Seymour Glass, the protagonist of "A Perfect Day for Bananafish," whose name signifies not only his ability to "see more" beauty in the world than others do, but also the fragility and vulnerability that accompany this heightened sensitivity. In "For Esme, with Love and Squalor," which many critics consider Salinger's finest story, a young girl revives the spirits of an emotionally scarred soldier. The last story in the collection, "Teddy," with its sagacious child protagonist, reflects Salinger's immersion into Eastern religion, a concern that colored the rest of his fiction and most certainly contributed to his rejection of fame and the potential material rewards that it promised.

Franny and Zooey (1961), which explores a major Salinger theme—the distinction between knowledge and enlightenment—occupied the number-one position on The New York Times Book Review best-seller list for six months. Like Holden and Seymour, Franny Glass's inability to live among unimaginative, self-centered people plunges her into a state of despair. Her older brother Zooey speaks for the majority of Salinger's protagonists when he chides his mother: "don't tell me I'm not sensitive to beauty. That's my Achilles' heel, and don't you forget it. To me everything is beautiful." The ghost of the deceased, saint-like Seymour, whose wisdom Zooey uses to comfort Franny, pervades the pages of Franny and Zooey and is fleshed out in Salinger's final book Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters and Seymour: An Introduction (1963), narrated by the second Glass child, Buddy, Salinger's fictional alter ego. In the June 19, 1965, issue of The New Yorker, Salinger published his final story, titled "Hapworth 23, 1914," which features a lengthy letter written by the erudite seven-year-old Seymour to his family from summer camp.

Critics accused Salinger of becoming self-indulgent regarding his effusive Glass family tales, yet in 1963 when his final book appeared, he was receiving more critical attention and enjoying a larger readership than most, if not all, of his contemporaries. While scholarly commentary has slackened, volumes of tributes from writers and readers he has influenced continue to appear, and his long silence has created a mystique that has only magnified the attention he sought to escape. As Salinger approaches the age of ninety, The Catcher in the Rye, published when he was thirty-two, continues to sell approximately 250,000 copies per year and is a mainstay on high-school and college syllabi.

—John Cusatis

Principal Books by Salinger

The Catcher in the Rye. Boston: Little, Brown, 1951.

Nine Stories. Boston: Little, Brown, 1953.

Franny and Zooey. Boston: Little, Brown, 1961.

Raise High the Roof Beam, Carpenters and Seymour: An Introduction. Boston: Little, Brown, 1963

Studying J. D. Salinger

Study of Salinger's work falls into four categories: The Catcher in the Rye, Nine Stories, the two volumes of Glass family stories, and the unpublished stories—in that order of importance. The Catcher in the Rye was painstakingly crafted over the course of ten years, and students should avoid the temptation to read it quickly and instead pay careful attention to its use of symbols and motifs. Of the nine stories the three most important are "A Perfect Day for Bananafish," "For Esme With Love and Squalor," and "Teddy." The collections of Glass family stories should be read in the order in which they were published in book form. Students will benefit from reading some of Salinger's uncollected stories, which can be located—with the help of a complete primary bibliography—either in bound periodicals or on microfilm. Of particular interest is "Slight Rebellion Off Madison," which appeared in The New Yorker on December 21, 1946, a story that became part of The Catcher in the Rye but which lacks the memorable voice that characterizes the novel because it is told from the third-person point of view.

Despite Salinger's refusal to discuss his own work, many excellent critical studies are available. Warren French's J. D. Salinger, Revised Edition (Boston: Twayne, 1976) and James Lundquist's J. D. Salinger (New York: Ungar, 1979) provide biographical information, detailed analysis of Salinger's work, and primary and secondary bibliographies. J. D. Salinger by James E. Miller Jr. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1965) is a more concise overview. J. D. Salinger, by John Unrue (Detroit: Gale, 2001) and A Reader's Guide to J. D. Salinger by Eberhard Allen (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002) are in-depth study guides, the latter providing a Glass family chronology. If You Really Want to Know: A Catcher Casebook by Michael M. Marsden (Chicago: Scott Foresman, 1963) and The Catcher in the Rye by John Unrue (Detroit: Gale, 2001) devote their attention to Salinger's novel, while Holden Caulfield, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1990) focuses on the protagonist. New Essays on The Catcher in the Rye, edited by Jack Salzman (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991) provides a variety of perspectives. Regarding the short stories, J. D. Salinger: A Study of the Short Fiction by John Wenke (Boston: Twayne, 1991) is an essential study that includes analysis of collected and uncollected stories. J. D. Salinger, edited by Harold Bloom, (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1999) is another study guide that focuses on the short stories.

Two bibliographies and two biographies are available. J. D. Salinger: An Annotated Bibliography, 1938–1981 by Jack R. Sublette (New York: Garland, 1984) includes a primary and secondary bibliography and An Annotated Bibliography (1982–2002) of J. D. Salinger by Brett E. Weaver (Lewistown, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2002) updates the secondary bibliography. Salinger's desire for privacy has made a biographer's job nearly impossible; however, two attempts have been made: Ian Hamilton's In Search of J. D. Salinger (New York: Random House, 1988) and

The earliest dust jacket for Salinger's first novel, 1951. The reclusive author insisted that the jacket be reprinted without his photo.

Paul Alexander's Salinger: A Biography (Los Angeles: Renaissance Books, 1999). While Alexander's book is well researched, Hamilton provides a more scholarly, objective account of Salinger's life and a more credible critique of his work.

—Student Guide by John Cusatis

Salter, James (1925– ) novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter, memoirist

James Salter has been called, by critic Michael Dirda, in The Washington Post Book World, “the contemporary writer most admired and envied by other writers.” He was born in New York City. An artist and poet early in life, he suspended his literary inclinations at his father's request to attend West Point. He served as an air force fighter pilot for twelve years, including tours in Korea, an experience he writes about in his memoir Burning the Days (1997) and his diaries, Gods of Tin: The Flying Years (2004), which informs his first novel, The Hunters (1956). He is best known for his novel A Sport and a Pastime (1967), which is widely regarded as a modern masterpiece, and for his portrait of a dissolving marriage, Light Years (1975). His Dusk and

Other Stories (1988) was the winner of the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. His second collection, Last Night, ten stories about young people searching for love in New York City, was published in 2005.

Sources

Dowie, William. James Salter. New York: Twayne, 1998.

Vernon, Alex. Soldiers Once and Still: Ernest Hemingway, James Salter & Tim O'Brien. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2004.

—Marshall Boswell

Sarton, May (1912–1995) poet, novelist, memoirist

... to write down these perishable songs for one,
For one alone, and out of love, is not to grieve
But to build on the quicksand of despair. . . .

—“A Letter to James Stephens” (1939)

May Sarton was born in Wondelgem, Belgium, where her mother was a designer and her father worked as an historian of science. Having fled to England during World War I, the family moved in 1916 to Cambridge, Massachusetts, where Sarton began writing poetry and where she attended the Cambridge Latin High School. She saw her first poems published in Poetry magazine when she was seventeen. Although she had received a scholarship to Vassar College, she instead chose to become an apprentice in a theater group. Sarton published her first book of poems, Encounter in April, in 1937.

Sarton's first novel, The Single Hound (1938), was a fictionalized account of her love affair with the English writer Elizabeth Bowen. (Lesbianism became prominent in Sarton's work when she was in her forties.) Sarton published a second poetry collection, Inner Landscape, in 1939. While she preferred to be known as a poet, Sarton seems to have hit her stride as a writer with her second novel, The Bridge of Years (1946). Based on her family's history, the novel focuses on a Belgian family experiencing the changing phases of Europe, from World War I and the postwar period to the subsequent Depression, the rise of fascism, and the outbreak of WORLD WAR II.

Her novel The Birth of a Grandfather (1957) drew on Sarton's experiences in Cambridge and explored the issues of generational change. In novels such as Mrs. Stevens Hears the Mermaids Singing (1965), Crucial Conversations (1975), and A Reckoning (1978) Sarton continued to address issues regarding the artistic development of women.

"It takes time to grow into honesty," Sarton once explained, of her journal writing, which appeared in print under titles such as Plant Dreaming Deep (1968), Journal of a Solitude (1973), and The House by the Sea (1977). Her memoirs, which spanned more than thirty years, concluded with At Eighty-Two: A Journal, posthumously published in 1996.

Sources

- Evans, Elizabeth. May Sarton Revisited. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
 Fulk, Mark K. Understanding May Sarton. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.
 Peters, Margot. May Sarton: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1997.

Schaefer, Jack (1907–1991) novelist

A Cleveland native and a graduate of Oberlin College, Schaefer studied English at Columbia University before becoming a journalist and novelist. His first novel, Shane (1949), was his most important. A classic Western that features a hero enmeshed in a battle between homesteaders and cattlemen, the novel was translated into more than thirty languages and became a classic motion picture, with a screenplay by A. B. GUTHRIE. Schaefer's later fiction includes The Canyon (1953), the story of the Cheyenne. Popular later novels include Monte Walsh (1963) and Mavericks (1967). The Collected Stories of Jack Schaefer was published in 1966.

Sources

- Haslam, Gerald. Jack Schaefer. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1975.
 Work, James C., ed. Shane: A Critical Edition. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1984.

Schuyler, James (1923–1991) poet, playwright, novelist

Born in Chicago, James Schuyler attended Bethany College in West Virginia. Later, explaining his lack of progress in school he remarked: "I didn't have anything academic to be loyal to." After serving in the navy during WORLD WAR II, Schuyler moved to New York City, where he befriended W. H. Auden. Schuyler moved to Italy to write, and he studied at the University of Florence during 1947–1948. Upon his return to New York he met Frank O'HARA and John ASHBERRY, among other New York School poets. Like these poets Schuyler also came under the influence of abstract-expressionist painters (see ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM).

A limited edition of his first collection of poetry, Salute, was published in 1960. Freely Espousing (1969) was his first major collection, followed by The Crystal Lithium (1972) and Hymn to Life (1974). Several years later his poetry collection The Morning of the Poem (1980) won the 1981 Pulitzer Prize.

Schuyler's experimental plays and prose are collected in The Home Book (1977). He also wrote three novels: Alfred and Guinevere (1958), A Nest of Ninnies (1969), and What's For Dinner (1978). The subjects of these works range from a brother and sister on a summer holiday to comic stories of suburbanites, both sane and unbalanced. The Diary of James Schuyler appeared in 1996.

Source

- Ward, Geoff. Statutes of Liberty: The New York School of Poets. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

Science Fiction and Fantasy

Although science fiction dates back to the late nineteenth century, work of such European writers as Jules Verne (Twenty-Thousand Leagues under the Sea; The Mysterious Island) and H. G. Wells (The Time Machine; War of the Worlds), American science fiction did not come into its own until after WORLD WAR II. As the COLD WAR standoff between the United States and the U.S.S.R. heated up and technological advances increased at a rapid rate, the appetite for imaginative speculation about the future found a new and widespread audience. One of the most significant pioneers of the Cold War science-fiction boom was Robert HEINLEIN, whose first major novel, Rocketship Galileo (1950), anticipated the successful 1960s moon landing by nineteen years, and whose popular fantasy Starship Troopers (1959) was widely read as a critique of the nuclear arms race. His 1961 novel, Stranger in a Strange Land, the tale of a man raised by Martians, became a key text of the 1960s counterculture.

Another major figure of this era is Isaac ASIMOV, the author of more than five hundred books, who is perhaps best regarded for his “Foundation” series, novels that deal with the apocalyptic collapse and re-creation of a vast galactic empire. Also highly regarded are his “Robot” novels, including the classic short story “I, Robot,” which warn of the dangers of technological takeover, and his novelization of the screenplay for the science-fiction movie Fantastic Voyage—in which a group of scientists travel through the human body—which has become nearly as famous as the movie itself.

Equally popular, though not quite as prolific, is the short-story master Ray BRADBURY, the author of such classic collections as The Illustrated Man (1951) and I Sing the Body Electric (1969), as well as the novels The Martian Chronicles (1950) and, his most enduring work, FAHRENHEIT 451 (1953), a Cold War dystopian fiction about a futuristic world gripped by fanatical censorship.

The phenomenal, if also belated, success in the 1960s and 1970s of J. R. R. Tolkien’s The Lord of the Rings (1954–1955) helped inspire a new interest in fantasy, and no American writer benefited more from this new audience than Frank HERBERT. His 1965 novel, Dune, was the first of five novels in the hugely popular “Dune” series—books that map out with great complexity the entire history of a vast, futuristic interstellar empire. Like Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings and C. S. Lewis’s Chronicles of Narnia (1950–1956), the Dune novels present readers with a fully imagined alternative world—all the while mixing fantasy with mythic, political, and religious themes. The Dune works also exerted a strong influence on George Lucas, whose Star Wars movies replicated many of Herbert’s themes and techniques.

The 1970s also marked the emergence of science fiction as a mode of literary art. Ursula LE GUIN’s 1969 novel The Left Hand of Darkness has been hailed not only as a masterpiece of the science-fiction genre but also as a major contribution to feminist literature writ large, while Samuel DELANY’s complex, theory-driven novels have earned the close and admiring attention of literary critics more generally disposed to the work of such erudite and technically proficient novelists as Vladimir NABOKOV and Thomas PYNCHON, to both of whom Delany has been compared.

Since the 1980s the most important new development in science fiction has been the rise of the cyberpunk genre. First coined by science-fiction short-story writer Bruce Bethke in 1980, the term refers to a new brand of futuristic, highly stylized work that addresses issues of cybernetics and information theory. The most prominent figure of this new genre is William GIBSON, whose novels Neuromancer (1984) and Mona Lisa Overdrive (1988) depict with the cool élan of film noir a completely urbanized, and technologically berserk, futuristic world. Gibson’s innovative mixture of high-tech theorizing and new-wave futurism directly influenced the look and feel of such popular science-fiction movies as Blade Runner and The Matrix. The cyberpunk style and ethos has also indelibly shaped the videogame industry.

Sources

Banks, Michael A. Understanding Science Fiction. Morristown, N.J.: Silver Burdett, 1982.

Blieler, Richard, ed. Science Fiction Writers: Critical Studies of the Major Authors from the Early Nineteenth Century to the Present Day. New York: Scribners/Macmillan, 1999.

James, Edward. Science Fiction in the 20th Century. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

The Ultimate Science Fiction Web Guide <www.magicdragon.com/UltimateSF/SF-Index.html> (viewed May 20, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Sebold, Alice (1963– ) novelist, memoirist

Alice Sebold was born in suburban Philadelphia. She earned her B.A. at the University of Syracuse circa 1984 and her M.F.A. from the University of California, Irvine in 1998. She is the author of two books about young women who are raped and brutalized. Lucky, a memoir published in 1999, tells in grueling detail the experience of Sebold’s own rape as a freshman at Syracuse University. Her novel The Lovely Bones (2002) concerns another rape victim; the tragedy is narrated from heaven by a fourteen-year-old rape victim. Although many critics prefer the memoir for its more honest, less fantastical qualities, it was Sebold’s debut novel, The Lovely Bones, that earned her widespread critical acclaim. Sebold won both the Bram Stoker Award for best first novel and the American Booksellers Association’s Book of the Year Award. The Almost Moon (2007) is a novel about a woman who kills her demented mother.

—Marshall Boswell

Seize the Day by Saul Bellow (New York: Viking, 1956) novella

Saul BELLOW’s terse follow-up to his expansive breakthrough novel, THE ADVENTURES OF AUGIE MARCH (1953), Seize the Day delves deeply into issues of selfhood, freedom, and responsibility. Bellow’s account of one chaotic but hopeful day in the life of Tommy Wilhelm, a failed husband, son, and father, is dense with emotional energy. Set almost entirely in a hotel in the Upper West Side of Manhattan, the novella never leaves Tommy’s hectic interior as he faces not only his responsibility but also the burden of the “inescapable self.” Tommy pleads for help from his aloof father and watches helplessly as his prospects for success dwindle and then disappear. Placing all of his hope and the last of his money into the hands of a charismatic quack named Dr. Tampkin, Tommy ends the novella utterly broke and crying before the corpse at a funeral he accidentally crashes.

—Marshall Boswell

Selby, Hubert, Jr. (1928–2004) novelist

Hubert Selby Jr. was born in Brooklyn, New York. He left high school in 1944 to join the merchant marines. He contracted tuberculosis in 1946 and spent the next four years in and out of the hospital. He returned to Brooklyn, physically frail, and in 1950 Selby began gathering material for his first novel, Last Exit to Brooklyn (1964), a look at the seamy urban life of gays, prostitutes, and criminals often involved in violence. The controversial novel was the subject of an obscenity trial in England; it was banned in Italy; and the editor of The Provincetown Review was charged in Massachusetts with selling pornography for publishing one section of the novel. Despite its notoriety, Last Exit to Brooklyn was praised for its unblinking portrayal of the depths of urban despair, which Selby experienced firsthand. His other novels, all dealing graphically with the underside of American society, are The Room (1971), The Demon (1976), Requiem for a Dream (1978), The Willow Tree (1998), and Waiting Game (2004).

Source

Giles, James R. Understanding Hubert Selby, Jr. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror by John Ashbery
(New York: Viking, 1975) poetry collection

Loosely categorized as a “New York School” poet, John ASHBERY is one of the most praised poets of the latter part of the twentieth century, and his Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror is the most praised of all of his works. Winner of the Pulitzer Prize, the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, the collection is the only book to date to receive all three honors. The title poem is recognized as a contemporary masterpiece.

The title of the poem alludes to a painting by the sixteenth-century Italian painter Francesco Parmigianino in which the artist created a distorted version of himself, apparently from his reflection in a mirror. Divided into six stanzas, this free verse ekphrastic poem (a poem responding to a work of art in another medium) meditates on the difficulties of representation, questions of identity and portraiture, the effects of distortion on mimesis, and the interplay of description and embellishment in any art form (but especially in the art of self-portraiture).

Influenced by ABSTRACT EXPRESSIONISM and recognized as one of the first poets to attempt to render the literary equivalent of that aesthetic, Ashbery creates in Self-Portrait a poem that follows a discursive narrative thread.

A practicing art critic, Ashbery interweaves the history of the creation and reception of the painting with observations on aesthetics, epistemology, and identity. The lack of a thematic center to the poem—each observation is accorded the same rhetorical weight—suggests, perhaps, that the processes of meditation and creation are as important as any supposed conclusion.

Source

Herd, David. John Ashbery and American Poetry. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 2000.

—Tod Marshall

A Separate Peace by John Knowles (New York: Macmillan, 1960) novel

Set in a New England prep school in the early 1940s, John KNOWLES's A Separate Peace provides an indelible portrait of a generation shaped by the trauma of WORLD WAR II. The novel is narrated fifteen years after the fact by Gene Forrester, who recalls the summer of 1942, when several of his classmates shipped out for the war. Gene and his best friend, whose nickname is Finny, spend the summer jumping from a tree into the river—the same exercise used by the school to help train seniors who have enlisted in the military. When Finny falls from the tree and breaks his leg, the complicated circumstances surrounding the boys' loss of innocence parallels the emotional damage suffered by their cohorts who are returning from the war. The students of Devon Prep enter the adult realm, a fallen world that Knowles ties through symbolism to the larger, global tragedy of World War II. Rich in symbolism and constructed with archetypal simplicity, A Separate Peace also updates the biblical story of the Fall of Man, as found in the early chapters of Genesis.

Sources

Bryant, Hallman Bell, ed. Understanding A Separate Peace: A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Karson, Jill, ed. Readings on A Separate Peace. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 1999.

—Marshall Boswell

Settle, Mary Lee (1918–2005) novelist, essayist

Born in Charleston, West Virginia, Mary Lee Settle attended Sweet Briar College (the model for her 1971 novel The Clam Shell) before moving to New York to pursue a career as an actress and model. When WORLD WAR II was declared, she went to London to join the Women's Auxiliary Air Force and later the Office of War Information, where she was a writer. She is best known for her “Beulah Quintet” of novels—O Beulah Land (1956), Know Nothing (1960), Prisons (1973), The Scapegoat (1980), and The Killing Ground (1982)—which covers three hundred years of American history, beginning in 1642. She won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for Blood Tie (1977), her eighth novel, about a group of American expatriates in Turkey, where Settle lived from 1972 to 1974. Her last book was Spanish Recognitions: The Roads to the Present (2004), a meditative account of her solo car trip through Spain at the age of eighty-two.

Source

Garrett, George. Understanding Mary Lee Settle. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

—Marshall Boswell

Sexton, Anne (1928–1974) poet

Sylvia and I . . . talked death with burned-up intensity, both of us drawn to it like moths to an electric lightbulb. Sucking on it! . . . as if death made each of us a little more real at the moment.

—“The Bar Fly Ought to Sing” (1966)

Born in Newton, Massachusetts, to upper-middle-class parents, Anne Sexton had an abusive childhood that later became a subject of her poetry. After an early marriage and the birth of a daughter, Sexton tried to commit suicide. Her psychiatrist suggested she try writing as a means of dealing with her depression. She was frequently hospitalized in the late 1950s, but she entered night school, where she met Maxine KUMIN and other poets. In 1958, upon the recommendation of W. D. Snodgrass, whom she had met at the Antioch Writers Conference, she was admitted to the creative-writing seminar taught at Boston College by Robert LOWELL, where she met fellow student Sylvia PLATH. Under Lowell's influence she began to write CONFESSIONAL POETRY, drawing deeply on her own experiences, particularly on her suicidal impulses. Her second poetry collection, All My Pretty Ones (1962), was nominated for a National Book Award and her third collection, Live or Die (1966), won the 1967 Pulitzer Prize.

When Sexton's psychiatrist encouraged her to take notes on their sessions, Sexton began using them for artistic purposes. Specifically, she wrote a one-act play, revised several times over the period of years between 1962 and 1969, that was titled, in its last incarnation, Mercy Street (produced 1969). The play regarded a potentially incestuous event between a father and his daughter.

Sexton continued to suffer from depression, and she committed suicide in 1974. Twenty years later the release of her therapy tapes to her biographer led to an ethical dispute regarding the right of Sexton's family to confidentiality.

As a daring, experimental poet, Sexton became a leading figure in contemporary poetry and in women's studies. She was hailed for her candor, not only about her own experiences, but also regarding the issues women confront in marriage and in modern society. Posthumously published collections include Sexton's Complete Poems (1981) and No Evil Star: Selected Essays, Interviews, and Prose (1985).

Sources

Furst, Arthur. Anne Sexton: The Last Summer. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Middlebrook, Diane Wood. Anne Sexton: A Biography. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1991.

Wagner-Martin, Linda, ed. Critical Essays on Anne Sexton. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.

Shange, Ntozake (1948– ) novelist, poet, playwright
An African American writer committed to documenting the struggle of women and African Americans, Ntozake Shange (born Paulette Linda Williams) grew up in a middle-class family in Trenton, New Jersey. When her family moved to St. Louis, Missouri, eight-year-old Williams was one of the first black children to integrate the public-school system. She began to write when her family moved back to New Jersey, where she attended high school. Williams received her B.A. from Barnard College in 1970 and an M.F.A. from the University of Southern California in 1973. She changed her name in 1971; Ntozake means “she who brings her own things” and Shange “one who walks with lions.” Her first play, for colored girls who have considered suicide/when the rainbow is enuf (produced 1975), a depiction of seven black women who confront their lives and articulate their need for self-definition, received an Obie Award and was later produced on Broadway. She regards her work as being about the lives of all women who have to struggle to maintain their independence and integrity. Like her later work, her first play features unusual punctuation, dialect, slang, and rhythms that come close to everyday speech.

Shange's other plays include From Okra to Greens (produced 1978), boogie woogie landscapes (produced 1978), and Three Views of Mt. Fuji (produced 1987). She received her second Obie in 1980 for her adaptation of Bertolt Brecht's Mother Courage and Her Children.

She has published several books of poetry, including Nappy Edges (1978); Ridin' the Moon in Texas (1989); El-lington Was Not a Street (2004), poems for children; and The Sweet Breath of Life: A Poetic Narrative of the African-American Family (2005). Like her plays, her poems emphasize an active engagement with society and an assertion of the individual's worth. Critics have sometimes referred to her as a warrior-writer. Her novel Sassafras, Cypress and Indigo (1982) reflects her musical style and the importance of music itself in her writing. It is the story of three women in search of the sources of creativity. She has published four other novels, a novelization of for colored girls who have considered suicide/when the rainbow is enuf (1976), Betsey Brown (1985),

Liliane: Resurrection of the Daughter (1994), and If I Can Cook You Know God Can (1998). She has also published a novel for children, Whitewash (1997), based on the true story of a young African American girl who was terrorized by a gang that attacked her and spray-painted her face white, and other children's books. Shange's collections of essays include A Daughter's Geography (1983) and See No Evil: Prefaces, Essays, and Accounts, 1976–1983 (1984). Her emphasis on black women's search for wholeness is comparable to that of Alice Walker's essays and novels.

Source

Lester, Neal A. Ntozake Shange: A Critical Study of the Plays. New York: Garland, 1995.

Irwin Shaw (1913–1984) short-story writer, novelist, playwright

In a novel or a play you must be a whole man. In a collection of stories you can be all the men or fragments of men, worthy and unworthy, who in different seasons abound in you.

—Introduction, Short Stories: Five Decades (1978)

Irwin Shaw was born in New York City and grew up primarily in Brooklyn during a time of considerable anti-Semitism and economic hardship. The Shaw family, originally Shamforoff, had emigrated from Russia in the late nineteenth century. Shaw attended Brooklyn College, where he played football and wrote for the college literary magazine and for the college newspaper. He received his B.A. in 1934.

At the age of twenty-three, Shaw wrote his first play, Bury the Dead (produced 1936), an antiwar drama that was successful on Broadway. Three years later he wrote a second play, The Gentle People (produced 1939). Shaw's next play, The Assassin (produced 1945), failed, and Shaw wrote a bitter attack on the critics in its published edition. Although he wrote two more plays, he had begun writing stories and had success with this form. Beginning in 1939 Shaw produced six story collections, publishing more than eighty stories during a period of almost fifty years of writing. In 1948 he began his career as a novelist with THE YOUNG LIONS.

Shaw's best-known short stories are "The Girls in Their Summer Dresses," "The Eighty-Yard Run," and "Act of Faith"; his favorite was "Main Currents of American Thought." Shaw enjoyed a long connection with The New Yorker.

Shaw's success as a novelist seemed assured with The Young Lions, which along with James Jones's FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (1951) and Norman Mailer's THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1948) was one of the three big postwar novels. Shaw's The Troubled Air (1951) explores the Red-baiting years of the 1940s. His move to Europe in 1951 brought about a change in his writing; the expatriate experience became a defining theme in his work, particularly in Lucy Crown (1956), Two Weeks in Another Town (1960), Evening in Byzantium (1973), and Nightwork (1975). American critics dismissed Shaw's Rich Man, Poor Man (1970) and Beggarmen, Thief (1977) for having characteristics of so-called commercial fiction, but their television adaptations brought him popular acclaim. Voices of a Summer Day (1965) and The Top of the Hill (1979) were followed by Bread Upon the Waters (1981) and Acceptable Losses (1982), his last novels, and ones in which Shaw explored the theme of his own mortality.

Shaw's literary reputation is always stronger in the short story than in the novel. His stories, along with The Young Lions, distinguish him as a major writer of American fiction of the twentieth century.

Sources

Giles, James. Irwin Shaw. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Giles. Irwin Shaw: A Study of the Short Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Shnayerson, Michael. Irwin Shaw: A Biography. New York: Putnam, 1989.

—Wanda H. Giles

Sheed, Wilfrid (1930– ) critic, novelist

Wilfrid Sheed was born in England to Maisie Ward and Francis Joseph Sheed, the founders of Sheed and Ward, a publishing house that became known for its religious publications, particularly for its association with the Catholic intellectual movement in America. Wilfrid Sheed moved with his family to Pennsylvania in 1939. He later attended Lincoln College at Oxford, where he received his B.A. in 1954. Sheed has been much admired for his satirical novels, particularly A Middle-Class Education (1960), the story of a student at Oxford; The Hack (1963), the life of a writer who confects inspirational verse and fiction for American Catholic magazines; Max Jamison (1970), a novel about critics; and People Will Always Be Kind (1973), an account of an Irish American politician's successes.

A prolific essayist, Sheed has collected his work in Essays in Disguise (1990). He has also written biographical profiles: Muhammad Ali (1975) and Clare Boothe Luce (1982). Frank and Maisie (1985) is a memoir of Sheed's parents. In Love with Daylight: A Memoir of Recovery (1995) is a humorous account of how Sheed has recovered from polio, depression, and cancer.

Shenandoah (1950– ) periodical

Shenandoah is a literary journal published at Washington and Lee University. Founded in 1950 by students and faculty, including fiction writer Tom Wolfe, the journal has established a long-standing reputation as a literary journal of high standards. The current editor, R. T. Smith, a poet, has published recent work by Mary Oliver, Stephen Dunn, and Chris Offut.

—Tod Marshall

Shepard, Sam (1943– ) playwright, screenwriter

*"Even in the midst of the most horrible devastation.
Under the most terrible kind of duress. Torture.
Barbarism of all sorts. Starvation. Chemical warfare.
Public hangings. . . . Amputation of private organs.
Decapitation. Disembowelment. Dismemberment.
Disinturnment. Eradication of wildlife. You name it. We can't forget that we were generated from the bravest stock. The Pioneer. The Mountain Man. The Plainsman. The Texas Ranger. The Lone Ranger. My son. . . . We have a legacy to continue, Stubbs."*

—The Colonel in States of Shock
(produced 1991)

Born in Fort Sheridan, Illinois, Sam Shepard moved frequently from base to base as the son of an air force bomber pilot. The family finally established a home on a ranch in Duarte, California. By the early 1960s Shepard had situated himself in New York City's East Village as an Off-Off-Broadway playwright. A prolific writer, he won eight Obie Awards between 1967 and 1984. His early plays, Cowboys (produced 1964) and The Rock Garden (produced 1964), focus on tensions between father and son and on Western settings that derived from his own background. The stripped-down—virtually bare—stages of these early plays suggest place as a state of mind, a work of the imagination. Shepard's characters in these plays are disruptive and explosive, fiercely defending their individuality in terms reminiscent of the BEAT poets, though in a violent fashion. Later plays such as La Turista (produced 1967) and Mad Dog Blues (produced 1971) present an apocalyptic America from which Shepard's characters seek escape through their own destructive acts. In La Turista a character swings from a rope and crashes through the stage set—an example of Shepard's effort to shake up his audience and to make the stage itself an extension of his characters' anarchism.

In The Tooth of Crime (produced 1972), a drama about a rock star, the effort to escape societal definition of the self is shown to be illusory: the rock star kills himself, realizing he cannot escape the role of star except as he is replaced by other stars. Curse of the Starving Class (produced 1977) suggests it is not society but the self that should be criticized; that is, there is a shift in political consciousness that demands more from Shepard's characters and makes them more responsible for their own actions. As Shepard's politics shifted, his plays became more accessible, including the Pulitzer Prize-winning Buried Child (produced 1978), a drama about a family that must come to terms with its secrets. Shepard's ability to create complex characters in such plays as True West (produced 1980), Fool for Love (produced 1983), and A Lie of the Mind (produced 1985) make his earlier work seem cartoonish and dated, the work of a clever young writer determined to shock and outrage. The later plays continue to deal with physical and psychological violence, but with more sophistication.

Critics also have noted that in Shepard's later plays the female characters are more fully realized. Even as Shepard continues to probe the male need to dominate, women are stronger and simply more present on the stage. Shepard is an uneven playwright but relentlessly experimental. Since A Lie of the Mind his output has slowed. His major later works include States of Shock (produced 1991), Simpatico (produced 1994), and The Late Henry Ross (2001).

Shepard has also had a successful career as a movie actor, beginning with a performance in Days of Heaven (1978). He often plays the kind of laconic Westerner presented in his plays. He has also made notable appearances in Resurrection (1980), Frances (1982), Country (1984), Fool for Love (1985), Crimes of the Heart (1986), and The Right Stuff (1983), which earned him an Academy Award as best supporting actor. As a screenwriter Shepard won a Golden Palm Award at the Cannes Film Festival for Paris, Texas (1984). He has also written screenplays for Me and My Brother (1967), Zabriskie Point (1969), Ringaleevio (1971), and Far North (1988).

Shepard's short fiction and poetry have been collected in Hawk Moon: A Book of Short Stories, Poems, and Monologues (1973), Motel Chronicles (1982), and Cruising Paradise (1996).

Sources

- Bottoms, Stephen J. The Theatre of Sam Shepard: States of Crisis. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Rosen, Carl. Sam Shepard: A Poetic Rodeo. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Roudané, Matthew, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Sam Shepard. New York: Cambridge, 2002.
- Wade, Leslie A. Sam Shepard and the American Theatre. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
- Wilcox, Leonard, ed. Rereading Shepard: Contemporary Critical Essays on the Plays of Sam Shepard. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

Shields, Carol (1935–2003) novelist, short-story writer, poet

A dual citizen of Canada and the United States, Carol Warner was born in Oak Park, Illinois. After graduating with a B.A. from Hanover College in Indiana in 1957, she married Donald Shields and moved to Canada, where she lived for the rest of her life. She received an M.A. from the University of Ottawa in 1975 and taught at the Universities of Ottawa and Manitoba. Her first book of poetry, Others (1972), and her first novel, Small Ceremonies (1976), launched a career that spanned over thirty years and produced three books of poetry; ten novels; three volumes of short stories, not including her Collected Stories (2005); two plays; and three volumes of nonfiction, including her acclaimed biography, Jane Austen (2001). She is best known for her fictional biography, The Stone Diaries (1993), which won the 1995 Pulitzer Prize, the 1994 NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD, and Canada's Governor General's Award. Most of Shields's work addresses daily life and domesticity; through these themes she explored the tenuous relationship between biography and fiction. Larry's Party (1997), which traces the mundane life of a floral designer, won the Orange Prize. Shields's final novel, Unless (2002), about an acclaimed author whose daughter lives on the streets, was published shortly before her death from cancer in 2003.

Sources

Dvorák, Marta, and Manina Jones, eds. Carol Shields and the Extra-Ordinary. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press, 2007.

Eden, Edward, ed. Carol Shields, Narrative Hunger, and the Possibilities of Fiction. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.

Hollenberg, Donna Krolak. "An Interview with Carol Shields," Contemporary Literature, 39 (Fall 1998): 339–355.

—Amber Shaw

The Shipping News by Annie Proulx (1993) novel

Inspired by a 1944 book called The Ashley Book of Knots by Clifford W. Ashley, Annie PROULX's The Shipping News is a novel about a spiritually adrift journalist's attempt to come to terms both with his past and with the harsh but beautiful landscape of his ancestral home, Newfoundland. Both the chapter titles and the name of the main character, Quoye—which means "a coil of rope"—derive directly from Ashley's book.

The novel begins with a series of disasters in Quoye's life: his parents die, and his wife kidnaps their children to enlist them in a child pornography ring, only to die in a car crash before she can escape town. Quoye and his daughters move to Newfoundland at the urging of an aunt, where Quoye finds easy work as a car-accident reporter for a local newspaper. As Quoye immerses himself in the town, he gradually learns about his family's violent past. The novel earned Proulx both the Pulitzer Prize and the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD.

Source

Varvogli, Alik. Annie Proulx's The Shipping News: A Reader's Guide. New York: Continuum, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

Shirer, William (1904–1993) journalist

Born in Illinois, William Shirer graduated from Coe College in 1925 and spent much of his life as a war correspondent. He was able to maintain possession of his journals from his years in Berlin before WORLD WAR II; his Berlin Diary: The Journal of a Foreign Correspondent, 1934–1941 (1941) became a best-seller. Shirer's The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich (1960) won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, a success he followed with another best-seller, about events in France, The Collapse of the Third Republic (1969). One of the most important American journalists of the twentieth century, Shirer wrote three volumes of memoirs: 20th Century Journey (1976), Nightmare Years (1984), and 20th Century Journey: A Memoir of a Life and Times (1990).

—Marshall Boswell

Short Story

Prior to WORLD WAR II the American short story encompassed works of high literary Modernism, typified most famously by Ernest Hemingway, as well as the mass proliferation of popular short stories, or "slick fiction," so called because of the glossy page stock of the mass-circulation magazines that carried such work. Of all the American writers of the first half of the century, none was as adept at both forms as F. Scott Fitzgerald, who produced both literary classics such as "Babylon Revisited" as well as dozens of less substantial "slick" pieces that he frankly admitted "paid the rent" and, more important, funded his novels. Conversely, after the war, television increasingly satisfied the popular appetite for entertaining storytelling. In response, large-circulation magazines began to publish less and less popular short fiction, such that, by the 1980s, only a small handful of "slick" mass-market magazines—chiefly The New Yorker, Esquire, Playboy, and Gentleman's Quarterly—ran any fiction at all. Concurrently, the number of graduate fiction-writing programs expanded exponentially nationwide, creating, paradoxically, a marked increase in the amount of literary short fiction being produced at the very moment that the market for such fiction was drying up. This curious gap between productivity and market demand has been filled, for the most part, by literary quarterlies, most of which are underwritten by universities and hence under little pressure to turn a profit. As a result, the contemporary American short story has continued to free itself from its original affiliation with popular fiction and thus occupy a much more prominent place in the literature classroom.

By the 1950s The New Yorker had not only established itself as the primary venue for high-quality short fiction but had also become associated with a certain "type" of story—namely, stories of contemporary domestic life depicted with urbane sophistication and grounded in careful and meticulous observation. Writers whose work became roughly synonymous with the magazine, both in name and in style, include John Cheever, J. D. SALINGER, Mary MCCARTHY, John UPDIKE, and Vladimir NABOKOV. Salinger and Cheever in particular helped shape both The New Yorker's identity as well as the dominant fictional ethos of the decade. Salinger's New Yorker stories, including such now-famous pieces as "A Perfect Day for Bananafish" and "For Esmé—with Love and Squalor," quickly heralded a new sensibility that combined acute observation and crisp dialogue with wry ironic humor and a trace, even, of surreal absurdity. During this same period, Cheever found his voice with his elegant, gin-soaked stories about commuting husbands and dissatisfied suburban housewives.

Meanwhile, the great renaissance of the Southern short story launched in the 1930s by William Faulkner, Thomas Wolfe, and Katherine Anne Porter continued through to the postwar period thanks to the work of Eudora Welty, Flannery O'Connor, and Carson McCullers. Welty's 1949 story cycle, THE GOLDEN APPLES, remains one of the signature achievements in postwar short fiction, as the book's seven linked pieces, several of them novella length, depict with lyrical intensity and mythic grandeur the lives of a group of intertwined small-town Southerners. O'Connor's famous stories from the decade, including such classics as "Good Country People" and "A GOOD MAN IS HARD TO FIND" combine the dust-caked rural desolation of Faulkner's fiction with a fresh element of religious and philosophical sophistication. O'Connor and McCullers also revived and updated the Gothic strain of Southern literature, as both populated their work with cripples, amputees, dwarves, hunchbacks, female giants, and the mentally handicapped.

Jewish writers in the postwar period also made their mark on the short-story form. Bernard Malamud's fable-like stories—including such classics as "The Magic Barrel" and "The Jewbird"—address the Jewish immigrant experience in a manner that mixes realism and magic with comic and redemptive results. Conversely, his younger counterpart, Philip Roth, depicted newly assimilated Jews with savage irony and outlandish humor. Although known primarily as a novelist, Saul Bellow has also produced lasting short fiction, most notably his classic novella SEIZE THE DAY, in which Bellow captures the desperation and humanity of an American failure on his day of reckoning.

In the 1960s Donald Barthelme and John Barth emerged as the leading practitioners of the Postmodern short story. Barthelme's concise self-conscious stories, most of which first appeared in the otherwise staid New Yorker, reject plot and character in favor of collage, jarring juxtaposition, verbal play, and parody. Barth's 1968 story collection, LOST IN THE FUNHOUSE, features an interlocked series of experimental pieces that address their own fictionality while exploring the possible futility of writing fiction at all.

In the 1970s African American writers such as Toni Cade Bambara and Alice Walker put their stamp on the short-story tradition. In addition to publishing two well-received story collections, Gorilla, My Love (1972) and The Sea Birds Are Still Alive (1977), Bambara also produced the groundbreaking anthology The Black Woman (1970), which helped introduce readers to both Paule Marshall and Walker, whose collection, In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1973), includes the classic anthology staple, "Everyday Use." Around the same time, Native American writers Leslie Mar-mon Silko and Louise Erdrich published such important depictions of Native American life as Silko's "The Man to Send Rain Clouds" (1969) and Erdrich's "The Red Convertible" (1974).

The 1980s witnessed a revival of sorts in the American short story, not so much in its commercial popularity as in its visibility and centrality. Newly emergent writers such as Ann Beattie, Richard Ford, Raymond Carver, and Andre Dubus reintroduced a strain of stark, minimalist realism to the short story that became the decade's signature sensibility. Carver and his Southern counterpart Bobbie Ann Mason became known as the leading representatives of the so-called dirty realist school, in which the lives of inarticulate, down-on-their-luck, working-class Americans are depicted with a minimalist detachment reminiscent of the early work of Hemingway.

In more-recent years, younger writers such as David Foster Wallace, George Saunders, Lorrie Moore, and Rick Moody have rejected the sparseness of 1980s "truck-stop minimalism" in order to revive Barthelme and Barth's playful spirit of formal self-consciousness. In the stories of these intrepid young practitioners, real-world public figures such as John F. Kennedy (in Robert Olen Butler's "JFK Secretly Attends Jackie Auction") and television talk-show host David Letterman (in Wallace's "My Appearance") rub shoulders with more traditionally "fictional characters." Meanwhile, contemporary short stories are likely to take many forms, from e-mail exchanges to term papers, from interview transcripts to customer-complaint letters. Although the audience for short fiction remains small, the desire on the part of the country's top writers to produce innovative short fiction shows no sign of abating.

Sources

- Gelfant, Blanche H., and Lawrence Graver, eds. The Columbia Companion to the Twentieth-Century American Short Story. New York: Columbia University Press, 2001.
- Peden, William Harwood. The American Short Story: Continuity and Change, 1940–1975. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1975.
- Winther, Per, Jakob Lothe, and Hans H. Skei, eds. The Art of Brevity: Excursions in Short Fiction Theory and Analysis. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.

—Tod Marshall

Silko, Leslie Marmon (1948– ) novelist, poet, playwright, critic

You feel so loved and secure when you're surrounded with the voice of the storyteller telling you a story. . . . It's what's always kept me going all these years.

—Interview in Short Story, 1992

Born in Albuquerque, New Mexico, Leslie Marmon Silko grew up in a mixed-heritage family (Laguna, Mexican, and white). She absorbed her family's rich tradition of storytelling and tribal leadership. She attended the University of New Mexico, where she became interested in writing. She received her B.A. in 1969 and entered law school, but abandoned it for graduate study in English. After an early marriage and divorce, she lived in Alaska and wrote poetry and short fiction. Laguna Woman, her first book of poetry, established her as a major voice in Native American writing. Storyteller (1981), with its innovative amalgam of short fiction, poetry, family photographs, commentary, and autobiography, so enhanced her reputation that she won a MacArthur Fellowship "genius" grant in 1981. Her stories and poems are frequently anthologized.

Silko's first novel, Ceremony (1977), winner of the AMERICAN BOOK AWARD, explores the life of a young veteran, part Laguna and part white, who returns home from Vietnam and tries to adjust to pueblo life. Almanac of the Dead (1991) is an epic novel with multiple subplots concerning the uprising of America's deracinated indigenous peoples. Gardens in the Dunes (1999), set in the 1890s, follows the lives of two sisters who are separated and then reunited, seeking some way to still live on the land while coping with the encroachment of the capitalist world. Silko has written several volumes of non-fiction: The Delicacy and Strength of Lace: Letters Between Leslie Marmon Silko and James Wright (1986); Sacred Water: Narratives and Pictures (1993); and Yellow Woman and a Beauty of the Spirit: Essays on Native American Life Today (1996).

Sources

- Chavkin, Allan. Leslie Marmon Silko's Ceremony: A Casebook. Oxford & New York: Oxford University Press, 2002.
 Fitz, Brewster E. Silko: Writing Storyteller and Medicine Woman. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 2004.
 Salyer, Greg. Leslie Marmon Silko. New York: Twayne, 1997.

Simic, Charles (1938– ) poet

Born in Yugoslavia of Serb parents, Charles Simic was brought to Chicago in 1949. He began writing poetry in high school. He served in the U.S. Army from 1961 to 1963, and in 1966 he received a B.A. from New York University. Simic's poems are brief, concentrated mixtures of realism, myth, and occasionally surrealism. He published his Selected Poems 1963–1983 in 1985 and won the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for The World Doesn't End: Prose and Poems (1989). In addition to producing twenty-five volumes of poetry during his career, Simic has also been a prolific translator, specializing in Slavic writers. A Fly in the Soup, his memoirs, was published in 2000.

Sources

- Stitt, Peter. Uncertainty & Plenitude: Five Contemporary Poets. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1997.

Weigl, Bruce, ed. Charles Simic: Essays on the Poetry. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Simon, Kate (1912–1990) memoirist, travel writer

Born Kaila Grobsmith in Warsaw, Poland, Kate Simon immigrated in 1917 to the United States, where she became a naturalized citizen and married Robert Simon. She received her B.A. from Hunter College in 1935 and went to work for the Book-of-the-Month Club while contributing regularly to major publications, such as The New York Times, National Geographic, Harper's, Vogue, New Republic, and The Nation. Simon was known throughout her life primarily as a travel and memoir writer. Her first book, New York Places and Pleasures (1959), became a best-seller, and similar guides to Italy, Mexico, London, and Paris followed. Her travel books have been characterized as intensely detailed in their prose and highly entertaining in their wit and sophistication. Toward the end of her life, Simon turned her attention inward, writing a critically acclaimed three-volume autobiography: Bronx Primitive: Portraits in a Childhood (1982), A Wider World: Portraits in an Adolescence (1986), and Etchings in an Hourglass (1990). As with her travel guides, Simon was praised for her descriptions and straightforwardness.

—Marshall Boswell

Simon, Neil (1927– ) playwright, screenwriter, television writer

Neil Simon was born in the Bronx and was educated at New York University, where he participated in the Army Air Force reserve training program. He served in the army during WORLD WAR II and attended the University of Denver while he was stationed in Colorado in 1945. In 1946 he began working as a comedy writer, and for the next fifteen years Simon wrote television scripts for CBS. One of his later plays, Laughter on the 23rd Floor (produced 1993), is based on his television career.

In 1960 Simon began writing comedies for the stage and produced a series of commercial successes, including Come Blow Your Horn (produced 1960), Barefoot in the Park (produced 1963; originally produced in 1962 as Nobody Loves Me), and The Odd Couple (produced 1965). Beginning with Plaza Suite (produced 1968), Simon's comedies grew darker, more poignant, and not so easily resolved as the comedic plots of his earlier work. The Sunshine Boys (produced 1972), about a vaudeville team of two aging comedians attempting a reunion, drew on both Simon's understanding of show business and on his strength in dramatizing human conflict that is not easily camouflaged by comedy. Simon is respected for his examination of the world of show business and for his observations of the role of Jews in the entertainment industry.

Simon has also written the screenplays for the movie adaptations of many of his Broadway plays, and has written original screenplays that include The Out-of-Towners (1970) and The Goodbye Girl (1977). He directly drew on his own life in his trilogy, Brighton Beach Memoirs (produced 1983), Biloxi Blues (produced 1985), and Broadway Bound (produced 1986). The plays shift from scenes reminiscent of Simon's childhood and family relationships to basic training in Florida to Broadway. With the release of these plays, critics began to treat Simon as a serious artist. Five years later his Lost in Yonkers (produced 1991) won a Pulitzer Prize. He has published two volumes of memoirs, Rewrites (1996) and The Play Goes On (1999).

Sources

Johnson, Robert K. Neil Simon. Boston: Twayne, 1983.

Konas, Gary, ed. A Neil Simon Casebook. New York: Garland, 1997.

Koprince, Susan. Understanding Neil Simon. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Simpson, Louis (1923– ) poet, critic, playwright, novelist

Louis Simpson was born in Jamaica to European parents and came to the United States to attend Columbia University. He served a tour in the army during WORLD WAR II, receiving two Purple Hearts and a Bronze Star, and then returned to Columbia, where he earned his B.S. in 1948, his M.A. in 1950, and his Ph.D. in 1959. Simpson privately published his first book, The Arrivistes: Poems 1940–1949, in 1949. Traditional in form and content, this early collection included the war ballad "Carentan O Carentan," which speaks to the innocence of a soldier and the alienation he experiences when he finds that, like others in his platoon, his lieutenant "... too's a sleepin' beauty / Charmed by that strange tune."

Simpson's At the End of the Open Road (1963) won a Pulitzer Prize. Signaling a new approach to poetry, it featured a concrete, spare, and open style. One of his later major collections, People Live Here: Selected Poems, 1949–1983 (1983), delves into his World War II experiences, his explorations of America and Russia (the home of his maternal ancestors), and the contrasts between his down-to-earth father and his romantic mother. The collection also includes nature poems such as "As Birds Are Fitted to the Boughs."

Simpson's later work includes In the Room We Share (1990) and There You Are (1995). He has published two novels, several acclaimed volumes of criticism, translations, and an autobiography, The King My Father's Wreck (1995). His The Owner of the House: New and Collected Poems appeared in 2003.

Sources

Lazer, Hank, ed. On Louis Simpson: Depths Beyond Happiness.

Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1988.

Moran, Ronald. Louis Simpson. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Simpson, Mona (1957– ) novelist

Like Ann August, the reflective narrator of her first novel, Anywhere but Here (1986), Mona Simpson was born in Green Bay, Wisconsin, her mother's second child. Stephen, born two years earlier, was put up for adoption at birth; he was adopted by the Jobs family and went on to found Apple computers. When her Middle Eastern father left Simpson's mother, the two moved to California and, despite their modest financial situation, settled in Beverly Hills. Simpson later attended the University of California, Berkeley, graduating in 1979. In 1981 she entered the graduate writing program at Columbia University, where she wrote the first draft of her debut novel and from which she received an M.F.A. in 1983. The book tells the story of Ann and her difficult, endearing, sometimes deluded but never defeated, mother as the two Midwesterners navigate their way through the social strata of 1970s Beverly Hills. The Lost Father (1991) resumes Ann's story into her adulthood, and specifically concerns her obsessive nationwide search for her father. Late in the novel, Ann memorably declares, "Disappearing was all you had to do to become somebody's god." Simpson is also the author of Regular Guy (1996) and Off Keck Road (2000), a taut novella set in her native Wisconsin.

—Marshall Boswell

Slaughterhouse-Five by Kurt Vonnegut (New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacourt, 1969) novel

Kurt VONNEGUT's sixth novel is a darkly comedic meditation on the horrors of war and the risks of unchecked technology, yet it is also a passionate call for human solidarity amid the immensity of global catastrophe. The event that gives Slaughterhouse-Five its peculiar energy is the Allied firebombing of Dresden, Germany, which Vonnegut experienced firsthand when he was a prisoner there during WORLD WAR II. Vonnegut, speaking directly to the reader in the opening and closing chapters, creates a fictional character named Billy Pilgrim, a quiet, unassuming man who finds himself "unstuck from time." As Billy moves randomly through his life, past and future, he recounts events such as his wartime experience in Dresden—and being kidnapped by aliens. The resulting mix of science fiction, personal narrative, historical witness, and cartoon illustrations made Vonnegut's career take off when the book first appeared in 1969 at the height of the antiwar movement and the POP ART explosion.

Source

Bloom, Harold, ed. Kurt Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse-Five. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2001.

—Marshall Boswell

Smiley, Jane (1949– ) novelist, essayist

The student writer's responsibility is not to fulfill the reader's expectations, but to understand them, and to use that understanding to manipulate them.

—Conversations on Writing Fiction (1994)

Jane Smiley was born in Los Angeles, California. She graduated from Vassar College in 1971, and by 1978 she had completed her M.A., M.F.A., and Ph.D. at the University of Iowa. Her career took her through several professorships and scholarly work, both at the University of Iowa and at Iowa State in Ames. Smiley is best known for her fiction. Much of her work—Barn Blind (1980), At Paradise Gate (1981), The Age of Grief (1987), and A THOUSAND ACRES (1991)—focuses on the ebb and flow of family relationships.

A Thousand Acres was awarded the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD and the 1991 Pulitzer Prize; it was adapted as a movie in 1997. In this feminist reinvention of Shakespeare's King Lear, Smiley chronicles—through the eyes of Ginny (Goneril in Lear)—the waves of anxiety and betrayal that follow the patriarch's division of the multimillion-dollar family farm among his three daughters. Critics lauded the novel as both brutally honest and socially concerned: it confronts incest, infidelity, and abuse.

Source

Nakadate, Neil. Understanding Jane Smiley. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

—Marshall Boswell

Smith, Dave (1942– ) poet

Born in Portsmouth, Virginia, Dave Smith was educated at the University of Virginia (B.A., 1965), Southern Illinois University (M.A., 1969) and Ohio University (Ph.D., 1976). He established a poetry magazine, Back Door, in 1969 and became co-editor of The Southern Review in 1990, when he was appointed professor of English at Louisiana State University. He is an inventive, experimental poet, often probing the raw limits of human experience in such books as The Fisherman's Whore (1974) and Drunks (1975). He published The Roundhouse Voices: Selected and New Poems in 1985. His later work includes Cuba Night: Poems (1990), Fate's Kite: Poems, 1991–1995 (1995), and Floating on Solitude: Three Volumes of Poetry (1996). The Wake of Memory: New and Selected Poems, 1970–2000, which includes more than one hundred poems, was published in 2000, and Little Boats, Poems 1992–2004 followed in 2005. Hunting Men: Essays on a Life in American Poetry (2006) includes essays on poets and their work and interviews.

Source

DeMott, Robert J. Dave Smith: A Literary Archive. Athens: Ohio University Libraries, 2000.

Smith, Lee (1944– ) novelist, short-story writer

I wrote my first novel on my mother's stationery when I was eight. It featured as main characters my two favorite people at that time: Adlai Stevenson and Jane Russell. In my novel, they fell in love and then went west together in a covered wagon. Once there, they became—inexplicably—Mormons! Even at that age, I was fixed upon glamour and flight. . . .

—“In Her Own Words” (2006)

Lee Smith is one of the leading Southern novelists of the post-WORLD WAR II generation. She was born in Grundy, Virginia, to a dime-store owner and his wife. She attended Saint Catherine's School in Richmond and earned her M.F.A. from Hollins College in Roanoke in 1967. Her teacher there was Louis RUBIN, who oversaw the drafting of her first novel, The Last Day the Dogbushes Bloomed (1968); the book earned Smith a Book-of-the-Month Club Writing Fellowship. Compared by critics to Carson McCULLERS's The Member of the Wedding (1946), the book concerns a memorable summer in the life of nine-year-old Susan Tobey.

In 1983 Smith published her fourth novel, Oral History. A multigenerational family saga told by many first- and third-person narrators, the novel displays Smith's skill in capturing distinctive narrative voices as well as her deep and abiding interest in family, folklore, and Southern traditions. Her next two novels, Family Linen (1985) and Fair and Tender Ladies (1988), were similarly well received; the latter is an epistolary novel about a female writer grappling with change in rural Virginia. Smith's other popular works about strong Southern women include The Devil's Dream (1992), Saving Grace (1995), and The Last Girls (2002). Her On Agate Hill (2006), an historical novel set in the South of the Reconstruction, uses letters, recipes, journals, and court records to tell its story.

Sources

Kearns, Katherine. “From Shadow to Substance: The Empowerment of the Artist Figure in Lee Smith's Fiction,” in Writing the Woman Artist: Essays on Poetics, Politics and Portraiture, edited by Suzanne W. Jones. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991, pp. 175–195.

Buchanan, Harriette C. “Lee Smith: The Storyteller's Voice,” in Southern Women Writers: The New Generation, edited by Tonette Bond Inge. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1990, pp. 324–345.

—Marshall Boswell

Snodgrass, W. D. (1926– ) poet, translator

Born in Wilkesburg, Pennsylvania, W. D. Snodgrass grew up in Beaver Falls, where he attended Geneva College before serving in the navy during WORLD WAR II. Upon his return to the United States he earned his B.A., M.A., and M.F.A. degrees from the University of Iowa; there he studied with Robert LOWELL, who became one of his greatest influences. Snodgrass's debut collection of poems, Heart's Needle (1959), won a Pulitzer Prize in 1960. His poetry reflected the anguish he experienced following his divorce and subsequent separation from his daughter in a style that influenced CONFESIONAL poets, particularly Anne SEXTON.

By the time of his next major collection, After Experience (1968), Snodgrass had published several poems under the pseudonym S. S. Gardons, and had collaborated on the first of his translations, Gallows Songs (1967; from the German). Snodgrass's third book of poetry, Führer Bunker (1977), is a collection of dramatic monologues that attempt to capture the conversations in Hitler's bunker during his final days. Snodgrass adapted this controversial book for the stage (produced 1978), and followed it with Führer Bunker: The Complete Cycle in 1995. Snodgrass's Selected Poems, 1957–1987 appeared in 1987. He has continued to translate poems and songs, and he published After-Images: Autobiographical Sketches in 1999. In 2001 he published De/Compositions: 101 Good Poems Gone Wrong. To Sound Like Yourself: Essays on Poetry was published in 2002. To commemorate his eightieth birthday, he published Not for Specialists (2006).

Sources

Haven, Stephen, ed. The Poetry of W. D. Snodgrass: Everything Human. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.

Raisor, Philip, ed. Tuned and Under Tension: The Recent Poetry of W. D. Snodgrass. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1998.

—Marshall Boswell

Snyder, Gary (1930– ) poet, essayist

Born in San Francisco, Gary Snyder received his B.A. in anthropology and literature from Reed College in 1951 and later studied Oriental languages at the University of California, Berkeley. While at Berkeley, Snyder became friends with Allen GINSBERG and Jack KEROUAC. His early poetry and prose reflected the influence of the BEAT movement. His first book, Riprap (1959), is a volume of poetry that takes its name from the cobble of stone laid to make a path for horses in the mountains, and it announces his interest in the environment. Snyder was a devoted Zen Buddhist; he translated the work of Zen masters. His Turtle Island (1974), which lays out a pathway for environmental protection, won a Pulitzer Prize in poetry. Axe Handles (1983), a collection of seventy-one poems in three sections about teaching, parental relationships, and ecology, won an AMERICAN BOOK AWARD.

Snyder's autobiography, Passage through India, was published in 1983.

Sources

Gray, Timothy. Gary Snyder and the Pacific Rim: Creating Countercultural Unity. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2006.

Suiter, John. Poets on the Peaks: Gary Snyder, Philip Whalen & Jack Kerouac in the North Cascades. Washington: Counterpoint, 2002.

—Marshall Boswell

Song of Solomon by Toni Morrison (New York:

Knopf, 1977) novel

Song of Solomon, Toni MORRISON's third novel, uses biblical, Greek, and African mythic archetypes to illuminate the plight of Milkman Dead, an affluent African American male growing up in Akron, Ohio, between the years of the Depression and the Civil Rights Movement.

Self-absorbed and directionless, Milkman lives at home with his domineering father, Macon Dead; his mother, Ruth Foster, the frigid daughter of the only black doctor in Ohio; and his two college-educated and unmarried sisters, Lena and First Corinthians. Milkman drifts aimlessly through his life, working for his father; drinking with his friend Guitar, a budding black radical; and sleeping with his cousin, Hagar, the pampered daughter of Milkman's powerful and mysterious aunt, Pilate. When Milkman becomes bored in Ohio, he embarks on a quest to learn the full history of his heritage, a journey of discovery that follows the archetypal pattern of the hero quest, while also blending biblical and Western mythic allusions with references to African folktales and myths. The most significant conjoining of traditions can be found in the book's title, which ostensibly refers to the biblical "Song of Solomon" but which more specifically invokes the myth of the flying African, a story told by slaves about a miraculous man named Solomon who flew back to Africa and escaped slavery. The latter image also calls to mind the myth of Icarus, one of the archetypes in Greek mythology.

Source

Furman, Jan. ed. Toni Morrison's Song of Solomon: A Casebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Sontag, Susan (1933–2004) essayist, novelist, dramatist, moviemaker

The function of criticism should be to show how it is what it is, even that it is what it is, rather than to show what it means.

—"Against Interpretation" (1963)

Born in New York City, Susan Sontag grew up in Arizona and California. She earned a B.A. degree from the University of Chicago and M.A. degrees in English (1954) and in philosophy (1955) from Harvard. After continuing graduate work at Harvard for two years, she attended St. Anne's College at Oxford and then studied at the Sorbonne. Sontag became a national intellectual figure with the publication of her essay "Notes on 'Camp,'" a report on the aesthetic that is created, often unintentionally, when an artist fails to succeed at seriousness. Sontag's first two books of criticism, Against Interpretation (1966) and Styles of Radical Will (1969), established her reputation as an outspoken and controversial critic. These works exhibited both the influence of European literature and a familiarity with a wide range of subjects, including literature, art, music, film, theater, and politics. Her early novels, The Benefactor (1963) and Death Kit (1967), were regarded as derivative of the French New Novel and were not as highly regarded as her essays.

Sontag's best-known nonfiction works are On Photography (1977) and Illness as Metaphor (1978). The former work is about photography's relationship to realism and the documentary. The latter regards the way cancer has been represented in American culture and literature—and the way in which its metaphors dishearten sufferers of the disease. Sontag's works also include the essay collection The Sign of Saturn (1980), and AIDS and Its Metaphors (1989), in which she again attempts to demystify disease. Sontag has written plays and screenplays, and in 1992 she resurrected her career as a novelist with The Volcano Lover, a romance about the relationships between Horatio Nelson, Emma Hamilton, and William Hamilton. Her next historical novel, In America (2000), won the National Book Award. Sontag's writing career spanned almost four decades and included the essay collections Where the Stress Falls (2001) and Regarding the Pain of Others (2003). At the Same Time: Essays and Speeches (2007), her last planned collection, was published posthumously.

Sources

- Poague, Leland, ed. Conversations with Susan Sontag. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.
- Rollyson, Carl E. Reading Susan Sontag: A Critical Introduction to Her Work. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2001.
- Rollyson and Lisa Paddock. Susan Sontag: The Making of an Icon. New York: Norton, 2000.

Sophie's Choice by William Styron (Franklin Center, Pa.: Franklin Library, 1979) novel

William STYRON's Sophie's Choice is about a well-to-do Southerner's relationship with a couple who live upstairs from him, one of whom, a Polish Catholic named Sophie Zawistowska, is an Auschwitz survivor.

Stingo, the narrator, has moved to New York to make his name as a novelist, but he has only found work as a manuscript reader for a publishing house. When he befriends Sophie and her husband, a Jewish man named Nathan Landau, Stingo slowly pieces together Sophie's troubled past, learning of the death of her husband and father and of her arrest by the Nazis. And he learns that, after she is forced to sleep with a Nazi doctor before being sent to the camps, the doctor demands that she pick which of her two children she will send to the gas chamber—the "Sophie's choice" of the title. Styron's novel examines the nature of evil and the Holocaust—comparing the institution of American slavery to Hitler's Final Solution. Sophie's Choice was later made into an award-winning motion picture.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold. William Styron's Sophie's Choice. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.
- Crane, John Kenny. The Root of All Evil: The Thematic Unity of William Styron's Fiction. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1984.

—Marshall Boswell

Sorrentino, Gilbert (1929–2006) poet, novelist

Born in Brooklyn, Gilbert Sorrentino attended Brooklyn College. His first volume of poetry was published when he was thirty-one, by which time he had edited the little magazine Neon, publishing writers in the BEAT tradition, and served as book editor at Kulcher magazine. Sorrentino is known as an experimental writer. His books rarely have plots, and they often parody literary genres. Steelwork (1970) is set in Brooklyn from the 1930s to WORLD WAR II. Imaginary Qualities of Actual Things (1971) is a savage send-up of New York literary life, which he knew well from his experience as an editor at Grove Press from 1965 to 1970. Mulligan Stew (1979), Sorrentino's most notable work, is a comic novel about a novelist. Sorrentino experiments with four different points of view in a novel set in a New Jersey boardinghouse, Aberration of Starlight (1980).

His poetry collections—The Darkness Surrounds Us (1960), Black and White (1964), The Perfect Fiction (1968), Corrosive Sublimate (1971), and The Orangery (1978)—demonstrate the influences of Ezra Pound, William Carlos Williams, and Robert CREELEY. Like them, his work treats the poem as an object in itself, a form. As he has stated, "form not only determines content but form invents content." Sorrentino's Selected Poems, 1958–1980 appeared in 1981. He has also written a book about the nature of the poet, Splendide-Hotel (1973).

Sorrentino's essays have been collected in Something Said (1984). His later work includes Blue Pastoral (1983); Odd Number (1985); A Beehive Arranged on Humane Principles (1986), a text based on the poems of Wallace Stevens; Rose Theatre (1987); Misterioso (1989), a Postmodern mystery story; Under the Shadow (1991); Red the Fiend (1995), about a child abuser; Pack of Lies (1997); and The Sky Changes (1998), a psychological novel. Gold Fools (2001) is a burlesque of a boys' adventure story; A Little Casino (2002) combines fifty-two narratives about people in post-World War II Brooklyn; and A Strange Commonplace (2006) is an oddly interconnected novel in two parts. Sorrentino wrote seventeen novels between 1986 and 2006, in addition to collections of essays and short fiction.

Sources

Mackey, Louis. Fact, Fiction, and Representation: Four Novels by Gilbert Sorrentino. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1997.

McPherson, William. Gilbert Sorrentino: A Descriptive Bibliography. Elmwood Park, Ill.: Dalkey Archive Press, 1991.

Soto, Gary (1952– ) poet, critic, short-story writer

A Chicano and native Californian, Soto earned his B.A. from California State University, Fresno (1974), and his M.F.A. from University of California, Irvine (1976). He has taught at the University of California, Berkeley, and has produced some seventy volumes of Chicano fiction, poetry, nonfiction, and children's literature, including The Elements of San Joaquin (1977), Black Hair (1985), Who Will Know Us? (1990), New and Selected Poems (1995), A Natural Man (1999), and Nickel and Dime (2000). Lesser Evils (1988) is a collection of essays, and A Summer Life (1990) recounts his early years. His stories for young Chicanos are collected in Baseball in April (1990). For children he has also written The Cat's Meow (1987), the story of a cat who speaks Spanish; Pacific Crossing (1992), about a Chicano boy who spends a summer in Japan with a Japanese family; and Snapshots From the Wedding (1997), the story of a Chicana flower girl at a wedding. Soto has also edited California Childhood: Recollections and Stories of the Golden State (1988) and Pieces of the Heart: New Chicano Fiction (1993). His later works include three young-adult novels, Jesse (2006), Accidental Love (2006), and Mercy on These Accidental Chimps (2007).

The Sot-Weed Factor by John Barth (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1960) novel

Written in a pastiche of seventeenth-century prose styles, John BARTH's third novel, The Sot-Weed Factor, is both a parody of Henry Fielding's picaresque classic Tom Jones and a comic indictment of American "innocence." Set primarily in the Maryland Tidewater area during the late seventeenth century, Barth's eight-hundred-page epic relates the story of Ebenezer Cooke, a virgin and aspiring poet who, after a childhood spent in London, moves to Maryland to be the proprietor of his father's tobacco plantation. ("Sot-weed" is seventeenth-century slang for tobacco.)

From this basic premise Barth spins a playful tale out of intrigue, counterintrigue, concealed identities, unbelievable coincidences, and episodes of bawdy sex. Yet, even as he satirizes the style and substance of his many source texts—including Henry Fielding, Daniel Defoe, and Lawrence Sterne—he also stages a serious epistemological inquiry into the mutability of identity, the myth of American exceptionalism, and the dangers of innocence (and experience).

—Marshall Boswell

Southern, Terry (1924–1995) fiction writer, screenwriter

Born in Alvarado, Texas, Terry Southern received his B.A. from Northwestern after studying at four different colleges. His second novel, Candy (1958), written with Mason Hoffenberg, is a sexual satire about a young woman who was unfailingly generous with her favors. It was banned in France but became a cult classic. Blue Movie (1970) is also a lurid satire on the pornography industry. The Magic Christian (1959) ridicules the rich and unscrupulously materialistic. Southern was best known for his screenplays, including Dr. Strangelove; or, How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb (1964) cowritten with Stanley Kubrick and Peter George; The Cincinnati Kid (1965), co-written with Ring Lardner Jr.; and Easy Rider (1969) cowritten with Dennis Hopper and Peter Fonda, both of whom starred in the movie. His Red Dirt Marijuana and Other Tastes (1967) is a collection of twenty-two stories and vignettes that focus on counterculture subjects that, like his other books, attracted a devoted underground readership.

Source

Hill, Lee. A Grand Guy: The Art and Life of Terry Southern. New York: HarperCollins, 2001.

Spencer, Elizabeth (1921– ) novelist, short-story writer, playwright

Born in Mississippi, Elizabeth Spencer earned her B.A. from Belhaven College in 1942 and her M.A. from Vanderbilt University in 1943. In her early novels, Fire in the Morning (1948), The Crooked Way (1952), and The Voice at the Back Door (1956), Spencer explored the contrast between the "Old South" and the "New South." After moving to Italy with her husband in 1958 she began using Italy as a setting for her fiction, including the novels The Light in the Piazza (1960) and Knights and Dragons (1965). The Stories of Elizabeth Spencer appeared in 1981. Her later work includes Jack of Diamonds and Other Stories (1988) and The Night Travellers (1991). She has also published Landscapes of the Heart: A Memoir (1998), and her The Southern Woman: New and Selected Fiction appeared in 2001.

Sources

Prenshaw, Peggy Whitman. Elizabeth Spencer. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Roberts, Terry. Self and Community in the Fiction of Elizabeth Spencer. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

Spencer, Scott (1945– ) novelist, screenwriter

Scott Spencer was born in Washington, D.C., to working-class parents. He received his B.A. from the University of Minnesota in 1969. Spencer is best known for his third novel, Endless Love (1979), which chronicles with lyric intensity the erotic relationship between two sixteen-year-olds in the heady atmosphere of the 1960s. The novel was adapted for a controversial motion picture starring Brooke Shields. The author of nine well-received novels, Spencer matched the success of Endless Love with his 2003 novel, A Ship Made of Paper, another tale of love and erotic obsession, this time featuring a successful lawyer and a married graduate student.

—Marshall Boswell

Spicer, Jack (1925–1965) poet

Born in Los Angeles and educated at the University of California at Berkeley, where he befriended Robert DUNCAN, Jack Spicer was associated with the San Francisco Renaissance during his brief career as a poet. His first book, After Lorca (1957), includes translations of Federico Garcia Lorca's poems, imaginary letters from Spicer to Lorca, and original poems by Spicer. His Billy the Kid (1959) celebrates the Western hero. The Heads of the Town Up to Aether (1962) includes poetry about literature and writers. A supporter of "Blabbermouth Night"—a gathering of BEAT poets who delivered spontaneous poetry readings at The Place—Spicer once remarked: "Poetry demands a human voice to sing it and an audience to hear it." The Collected Books of Jack Spicer, edited and with a commentary by Robin Blaser, was published in 1975. The House that Jack Built: The Collected Lectures of Jack Spicer appeared in 1998.

Sources

Ellingham, Lewis, and Kevin Killian. Poet Be Like God: Jack Spicer and the San Francisco Renaissance. Hanover, N.H.: Wesleyan University Press, 1998.

Foster, Edward Halsey. Jack Spicer. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1991.

Spillane, Mickey (1918–2006) novelist

Beautiful as you are, as much as I almost loved you, I sentence you to death.

—I, The Jury (1947)

Mickey Spillane was born in Brooklyn and attended Fort Hays State University, where he had planned to become a lawyer. Instead, he began writing Captain Marvel comic books in 1940. When he needed money in the late 1940s, he decided to write a novel; his comic-book writing style mixed with extraordinary violence and sex scenes that bordered on obscene helped to make Spillane's first novel, I, The Jury (1947), a best-seller. He followed this success with Vengeance Is Mine! (1950), My Gun Is Quick (1950), and The Big Kill (1951).

Spillane continued to write books through the 1950s and 1960s but stopped publishing in the 1970s. He resumed his work with Tomorrow I Die (1984), The Killing Man (1989), and Black Alley (1996). His last novel, Something's Down There, appeared in 2003. In an interview in 2005 Spillane commented on his writing career: "I'm not an author; it's a business." He wrote almost thirty books, with sales totaling some two hundred million copies, translated worldwide.

Sources

Collins, Max Allan, and James L. Traylor. One Lonely Knight: Mickey Spillane's Mike Hammer. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1984.

Gale, Robert L. A Mickey Spillane Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003.

The Sportswriter by Richard Ford (New York: Vintage, 1986) novel

The Sportswriter, Richard FORD's mid-1980s novel, introduced Frank Bascombe, the narrator and protagonist of two subsequent novels, Independence Day (1996) and The Lay of the Land (2006). Like John UPDIKE's Rabbit Angstrom, Bascombe emerges as a contemporary everyman with a special gift for disclosing the discontents of modern life. In this first novel Bascombe is living alone in Haddam, New Jersey, as he comes to terms with both the death of his son, Ralph, and a recent divorce from a woman whom he refers to only as X. (Subsequent novels in the series identify her as Ann.) While in his twenties, Bascombe published a well-received book of short stories but has since given up fiction to become a sportswriter for a glossy magazine. The novel traces the events of an Easter Weekend, beginning with a Good Friday visit by Bascombe and X to their son's grave and continuing through to Easter Sunday. The events of the novel are less important than the sweep of Bascombe's narrative voice and his wry and sometimes profound meditations on the mysterious tangle of existence. Reminiscent of Walker PERCY's early novels, THE MOVIEGOER (1961) and The Last Gentleman (1966), The Sportswriter established Ford as a major American novelist, a position he consolidated with the two subsequent Bascombe novels, one of which—Independence Day—won both the 1996 Pulitzer Prize and the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD.

Sources

Guagliardo, Huey, ed. Perspectives on Richard Ford. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2000.
Walker, Elinor Ann. Richard Ford. New York: Twayne, 2000.
—Marshall Boswell

Stafford, Jean (1915–1979) short-story writer, novelist

Jean Stafford was born in Covina, California, and grew up in San Diego and in Boulder, Colorado. She started writing poems and stories at the age of six and began a novel at the age of eleven. In 1936 and 1937 she earned B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Colorado and then studied philosophy for a year at the University of Heidelberg. By the late 1930s Stafford had met the poet Robert LOWELL. Their eight-year marriage began in 1940.

Stafford's first success was her Boston Adventure (1944), a study of a woman who becomes independent by rejecting the dictates of society. In 1947 Stafford published her best-known work, The Mountain Lion, which explores the Western environment of her childhood. With her third novel, The Catherine Wheel (1952), Stafford again delved into the peculiar problems of women of ambition who come into conflict with patriarchal society. Repeatedly indicting a society that limited the possible roles of women, Stafford nonetheless resisted the label of feminist. She suffered from alcoholism during her adult life, and by the mid 1950s her output had slowed. She continued to write stories, however, and she won a Pulitzer Prize in 1970 for her The Collected Stories of Jean Stafford (1969).

Sources

Walsh, Mary Ellen Williams. Jean Stafford. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
Wilson, Mary Ann. Jean Stafford: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Stafford, William (1914–1993) poet, memoirist

Born in Hutchinson, Kansas, William Stafford earned his B.A. from the University of Kansas in 1937. He was stationed in four different camps for conscientious objectors during WORLD WAR II, an experience he recounted in his master's thesis for his 1946 degree from the University of Kansas, which became his first published book, Down in My Heart (1947). Stafford earned his Ph.D. from the University of Iowa in 1954. His first book of poetry, West of Your City, appeared in 1960. His second book of poems, Traveling through the Dark (1962), won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. Stafford believed that significant works were discovered by an author through the process of composition, not revision; writing, he said, led him "wildly and originally into new territory." Stafford wrote more than fifty books, including almost forty books of poetry.

Sources

Andrews, Tom, ed. On William Stafford: The Worth of Local Things. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1993.
Kitchen, Judith. Writing the World: Understanding William Stafford. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1989.

Steel, Danielle (1947– ) novelist

Born in New York, Danielle Steel has lived much of her life in San Francisco. She spent her early career in journalism and public relations. Her fast-paced novels with contemporary settings and bold characters have made her a popular mass-market author whose work has often been adapted for television and movies. She has written about many professions—from jewelers to women journalists and aviators to scientists. She has dealt with the detention of Japanese Americans in WORLD WAR II, the VIETNAM WAR, politics, sexual abuse, marriage, and cloning. Her novels have been published since 1973 at the rate of two a year. In addition she wrote fifteen children's books between 1985 and 1992. In 2002 she was decorated as a chevalier of the Order of Arts and Letters by the French government.

Source

Bane, Vickie L., and Lorenzo Benet. The Lives of Danielle Steel: The Unauthorized Biography of America's #1 Best-Selling Author. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

Stegner, Wallace (1909–1993) fiction writer, essayist

Born in Iowa, Stegner received his B.A. at the University of Utah in 1930 and his M.A. and Ph.D. from Iowa State University in 1932 and 1935, respectively. A prolific writer, he published thirteen novels, three collections of stories, two collections of essays, and more than twenty edited volumes. Big Rock Candy Mountain (1943) is an autobiographical novel about his peripatetic childhood. His Angle of Repose (1971), about a curmudgeonly retired history professor who achieves a sense of community while working with a young research assistant on his grandmother's papers, won the Pulitzer Prize in fiction. He won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD for The Spectator Bird (1976), a novel about a man who must come to terms with his feeling of estrangement as he ages and who through reading a journal comes to a new understanding of his own life by reassessing Old World culture. Despite his considerable achievement as a fiction writer, Stegner is best remembered as the director of the creative-writing program at Stanford University from 1946 to 1971, where his students included Ken KESEY, Larry MCMURTRY, Wendell BERRY, Ernest J. GAINES, and Raymond CARVER, among many others.

Sources

Arthur, Anthony, ed. Critical Essays on Wallace Stegner. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.

Benson, Jackson J. Wallace Stegner: His Life and Work. New York: Viking, 1996.

Steinem, Gloria (1934– ) journalist

A feminist writer, Gloria Steinem is one of the key figures in the women's liberation movement of the 1970s. Born in Toledo, Ohio, Steinem graduated from Smith College in 1956 and later moved to New York City, where she published articles in the 1960s in such magazines as Esquire, Vogue, Glamour, McCall's, and Cosmopolitan. She attracted much notice, especially when she posed as a Playboy bunny and wrote about the experience. In 1968 she demonstrated her savvy understanding of politics in a column for a newly established magazine, New York. At this time she also allied herself with the expanding women's movement. In 1972 she founded a new magazine, Ms., which became part of the highly successful organizing movement for women's rights.

Steinem's most important publication is her collection of essays Outrageous Acts and Everyday Rebellions (1983). She turned to less-political and more-personal writing in Revolution from Within: A Book of Self-Esteem (1992). She also published Marilyn (1986), a biography of Marilyn Monroe that speculated on how the actress might have benefited from the women's movement of the 1970s. Later books, such as Moving beyond Words (1994), have demonstrated Steinem's continuing interest in politics.

Sources

Heilbrun, Carolyn. The Education of a Woman: The Life of Gloria Steinem. New York: Dial, 1995.

Stern, Sydney Ladenson. Gloria Steinem: Her Passions, Politics, and Mystique. New York: Birch Lane Press, 1997.

Stern, Richard (1928– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Born in New York City, Richard Stern attended the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he received his B.A. in 1947. He earned his M.A. from Harvard in 1949 and went on to teach at a college in Versailles. Stern returned to the United States and in 1954 completed his Ph.D. at the University of Iowa. He began a forty-six-year teaching career at the University of Chicago in 1955.

Stern's novels cover a range of subjects: television, in Golk (1960); post-WORLD WAR II Germany, in Europe; or Up and Down with Baggish and Shreiber (1961); treason, in Any Case (1962); expatriates, in Stitch (1965); college professors, in Other Men's Daughters (1973); and journalists, in Natural Shocks (1978). His stories appear in collections such as Teeth, Dying and Other Matters (1964) and Noble Rot (1989). Shorter essays have been collected in The Books in Fred Hampton's Apartment (1973) and The Position of the Body (1986). Pacific Tremors, a novel, was published in 2001. Almonds to Zooof: Collected Stories appeared in 2005.

Sources

Izzo, David Garrett. The Writings of Richard Stern: The Education of an Intellectual Everyman. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003.

Schiffer, James. Richard Stern. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Stone, Robert (1937– ) novelist, screenwriter

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Robert Stone grew up in a fatherless home and became a rebellious student in the Catholic schools he attended. He joined the navy and then attended New York University from 1958 to 1960. He worked odd jobs, began to frequent beatnik hangouts, made friends with Jack KEROUAC and Ken KESEY, and by the late 1960s was a freelance writer. A Hall of Mirrors (1967), his first novel, won the William Faulkner Foundation Award. The book is an incisive exposure of the racism and right-wing extremism of the 1960s. Dog Soldiers (1974), which won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and A Flag for Sunrise, which won the John Dos Passos Prize for literature (1981), solidified Stone's reputation as a political and social novelist who has been compared to Dos Passos and Nathanael West. Both novels deal with the consequences of the VIETNAM WAR and the disaffection among radicals in the 1970s. For Stone, the war corrupted American values and led to a drug culture and cynicism that are a betrayal of the American dream. A later novel, Children of Light (1986), takes up the crass commercial world of the 1980s, drawing on Stone's own experience in Hollywood. Damascus Gate (1996) shifts attention to the Middle East, focusing on an American journalist, Christopher Lucas, who explores the lives of people who come to Jerusalem in the belief that God has sent them on a mission. Some critics praised Stone's taut plotting, while others dismissed this novel as a superficial thriller. Bay of Souls (2003) is a compact novel about a professor who leaves his wife and son for an intense affair with a colleague.

Stone has written two important screenplays based on his novels: WUSA (1970) and Who'll Stop the Rain (1978). He collected his short stories in Bear and His Daughter (1997). His memoir, Prime Green: Remembering the Sixties (2007), was a well-received account of the culture wars of the period.

Sources

Solotaroff, Robert. Robert Stone. New York: Twayne, 1994.

Stephenson, Gregory. Understanding Robert Stone. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Strand, Mark (1934– ) poet

Mark Strand was born on Prince Edward Island in Canada and moved to the United States with his family when he was four. After earning a B.A. at Antioch College, Strand studied painting at Yale, where he received a B.F.A. in 1959. Following a year at the University of Florence he attended the University of Iowa, where he earned his M.A. in 1962.

Strand writes using a spare style. His first book, Sleeping with One Eye Open (1964), exhibits the surrealist imagery of dreams and metaphors that evoke the somewhat morbid philosophies of Edgar Allan Poe. Many of Strand's poems are pictorial and express his affinity for painting. His second book of poems, Reasons for Moving (1968), includes a poem called "Eating Poetry":

*Ink runs from the corners of my mouth.
There is no happiness like mine.
I have been eating poetry.*

Strand published a novel in 1978 titled The Monument, and a collection of short fiction, Mr. and Mrs. Baby and Other Stories, in 1985. He has written children's literature and has translated poetry. His critical books on artists include Hopper (1994).

From 1990 to 1991 Strand served as the POET LAUREATE Consultant in Poetry to the Library of Congress. His Blizzard of One: Poems (1998) won the 1999 Pulitzer Prize.

Source

Kirby, David. Mark Strand and the Poet's Place in Contemporary Culture. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1990.

A Streetcar Named Desire (produced 1947) play

Written by Tennessee Williams, A Streetcar Named Desire opened on December 3, 1947, and ran for 855 performances. The winner of the 1948 Pulitzer Prize in drama, the play brought to the stage two of the most famous characters in American drama, Stanley Kowalski and Blanche DuBois. It was Williams's second major success following his The Glass Menagerie in 1944.

The result of several years of revisions, Williams's play juxtaposes the lives of DuBois, a once-wealthy Southern belle whose understanding of reality is illusory, and Kowalski, a working-class man who views the world concretely. DuBois lives in the past and puts on airs; she is both repulsed by and attracted to Kowalski's ordinariness and brute strength. Stella, DuBois's sister and Kowalski's wife, bridges the two sensibilities.

The play can be read as a comment on the decline of the South and of an American past giving way to a cruder and more dynamic time. But Williams does not sentimentalize his characters nor turn them into symbols of history; rather, he allows their intensely individual natures to embody clashing ideas of masculinity and femininity and to provide context for an array of critical interpretations.

Williams published A Streetcar Named Desire in 1947. The play was made into a motion picture in 1951.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire. New York: Chelsea House, 1988.

Kolin, Philip C., ed. Confronting Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire: Essays in Critical Pluralism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.

Staggs, Sam. When Blanche met Brando: The Scandalous Story of "A Streetcar Named Desire." New York: St. Martin's Press, 2005.

Structuralism

Structuralism refers to an intellectual movement in the human sciences that looks at cultural phenomena as a series of interlocking signs or sign-systems. The practice of Structuralism is deeply wedded to "semiotics," or the systematic study of signs. Whereas semioticians focus on systems of communication that consist overtly of signs—such as language—Structuralist critics apply the analytical techniques associated with semiotics to a wide range of phenomena, from literature to social mores, from religious practices to dietary patterns—and everything in between. Structuralism takes its primary cue from French linguist Ferdinand de Saussure's theory of language laid out in his Course in General Linguistics (1916). Saussure regarded language as a system of signs in which each sign is made up of a signifier (the word itself) and a signified (the concept or meaning). Saussure went on to argue that the relationship between signifier and signified was wholly arbitrary, so that the word's meaning had no direct relation to the concept it "signified." Rather, the sign achieved its meaning via its difference from other signs in the linguistic system. Structuralists apply this same model to cultural activities and phenomena under the assumption that one cannot understand a ritual or event within a culture as possessing meaning in and of itself but rather must analyze and describe its relative function within the larger cultural system of signs of which it is a part. In literature, Structuralist practice regards a literary text as a system of signs that is intricately tied to the larger cultural codes of which it is a part. As such, Structuralists reject the notion of literature as the coherent expression of a single author. French theorist Roland Barthes crystallized this Structuralist ethos in his 1968 essay, "The Death of the Author."

Sources

Culler, Jonathan. Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics, and the Study of Literature. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1975.

Greaney, Michael. Contemporary Fiction and the Uses of Theory: The Novel from Structuralism to Postmodernism. Basingstoke, U.K. & New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.

Scholes, Robert. Semiotics and Interpretation. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1982.

—Marshall Boswell

Sturgeon, Theodore (1918–1985) novelist, short-story writer

The author of more than thirty books, Theodore Sturgeon spent his childhood living on Staten Island and moved with his family to Philadelphia when he was an adolescent. A gymnast, Sturgeon had plans to attend Temple University on an athletic scholarship until he became ill at the age of fifteen; he attended Penn State Nautical School for a semester before shipping off to work as an engine-room laborer on a freighter.

While onboard, Sturgeon began writing. Upon his return to New York he began publishing stories in McClure's magazine. His first book, Without Sorcery, appeared in 1948. His third book, More Than Human (1953), is his best-known novel. Characteristic of Sturgeon's style, it is noteworthy for its psychological sophistication and speculative forays into the transcendence of the individual and the nature of the consciousness of the universe. Sturgeon's stories, which are generally considered to be his most popular works, appear in twenty-two collections published during his lifetime, including A Touch of Strange (1958), Sturgeon in Orbit (1964), Sturgeon Is Alive and Well (1971), Visions and Venturers (1978), and The Stars Are the Styx (1979).

Sources

Diskin, Lahna. Theodore Sturgeon. Mercer Island, Wash.: Star-mont House, 1981.
Menger, Lucy. Theodore Sturgeon. New York: Ungar, 1981

Styron, William (1925–2006) novelist

"Confess, that all nations may know," he repeated beneath his breath, the pen scratching away. "And what else?" he said, looking up.

"Then the Lord told me: Confess, that thy acts may be known to all men."

—The Confessions of Nat Turner (1967)

William Styron was born in Newport News, Virginia. He dropped out of college during WORLD WAR II to enlist in the marines. While in Officer Candidate School he took a creative-writing course at Duke University; after the war he resumed his education and graduated from Duke in 1947. He then moved to New York, where he worked as an editor and began writing a novel. Styron's debut, Lie Down in Darkness (1951), concerned a decadent Southern family that drives its sensitive daughter to suicide. Styron's work was hailed by critics, and the novel won a Prix de Rome in 1952. His next success was a novella titled The Long March (1956), based on his experience in the marines. In 1960 Styron published Set This House on Fire, an experimental novel in which two narrators attempt to reconcile the events surrounding the death of their mutual friend. When Styron returned to the milieu of the South with his THE CONFESSIONS OF NAT TURNER (1967), he was awarded the 1968 Pulitzer Prize.

Styron's next major work, SOPHIE'S CHOICE (1979), examines the Holocaust from the point of view of a Polish Catholic survivor of Auschwitz who is lamenting her inability to save both her children from the gas chamber. Once again writing his way into controversy, Styron was criticized for telling a Holocaust story about a non-Jew; he defended this decision by explaining that it was an attempt to universalize the horrors of the Holocaust—an event Styron considered ultimately to be "antihuman."

Beginning in 1985, Styron suffered from a severe clinical depression. He catalogued his experiences and suicidal tendencies in his Darkness Visible: A Memoir (1990). Styron died of pneumonia in 2006.

Sources

Casciato, Arthur D., and James L. W. West III, eds. Critical Essays on William Styron. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.
Cologne-Brookes, Gavin. The Novels of William Styron: From Harmony to History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995.
West, James L. W., III. William Styron: A Life. New York: Random House, 1998.

Sukenick, Ronald (1932–2004) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Born in Brooklyn, New York, Ronald Sukenick was educated at Cornell, where he received his B.A. in 1955. He completed graduate work at Brandeis University, earning his M.A. in 1957 and his Ph.D. in 1962; he published his dissertation as Wallace Stevens: Musing the Obscure (1967). While he was in college, he began writing stories that later appeared in The Death of the Novel and Other Stories (1969).

His novels include his debut, UP (1968), a comic novel about a young man's attempts to write a first novel. Out (1973) explores New Yorkers in the 1960s who move to California in search of a better life. 98.6 (1975) is set in a commune in the West. Blown Away (1986) deals with Hollywood. Highly praised for his innovative style and structure, Sukenick exhibits a self-consciousness about writing fiction (associated with METAFICTION) that often makes the writing itself the subject of his books. His later stories are collected in The Endless Short Story (1986). He has also published novels that deal with politics and Jewish identity, Doggy Bag (1994) and Mosaic Man (1999).

Sources

Kutnik, Jerzy. The Novel as Performance: The Fiction of Ronald Sukenick and Raymond Federman. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1986.
Roberson, Matthew, ed. Musing the Mosaic: Approaches to Ronald Sukenick. Albany: State University of New York, 2003.

Swados, Harvey (1920–1972) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

Harvey Swados was born in Buffalo, New York, and was educated at the University of Michigan, where he earned his B.A. in 1940. His novels strongly reflect a socialist point of view that has much in common with the proletarian literature of the 1930s, although Swados's characters include artists and industrialists as well as members of the laboring lower classes. In False Coin (1959) the artist struggles to maintain his principles in a consumer society. Standing Fast (1970) focuses on a small group of dedicated Marxists. On the Line (1957) is a short-story collection that details the lives of auto-assembly workers. Swados's essays are collected in A Radical's America (1962).

Taylor, Edward (circa 1642–1729) poet

Make mee, O Lord, thy Spinning Wheele compleat.
—“Huswifery” (circa 1682)

Edward Taylor was born in Leicestershire, England, around 1642 to Margaret and William Taylor, a yeoman farmer. His literary reputation rests on his poems rather than his sermons, and that reputation was not established until the 1930s and early 1940s when those poems were first published. As a young boy, he lived through the instability of the English Civil War; as a young man, he refused to sign the Act of Uniformity of 1662, and thus he was banned from teaching school and from nonconformist worship. He decided to seek refuge in Boston. The Atlantic crossing was long and difficult, and Taylor kept a diary of the seventy-day journey. Arriving in Massachusetts, he entered HARVARD COLLEGE on July 23, 1668, rooming for two years with Samuel SEWALL. He received his degree in 1671 and chose to take a post as pastor and physician in the frontier town of Westfield, where he remained for fifty years.

Taylor married twice. His first wife, Elizabeth Fitch of Norwich, Connecticut, died in 1686, leaving Taylor with three surviving children (out of their eight together); with his second wife, Ruth Wyllys of Hartford, Connecticut, Taylor had six children. Taylor was a man of quick passions and considerable wit. He was also a devout Puritan, who opposed the radical decision by the Reverend Samuel Stoddard to allow all congregants to receive communion. He wrote eloquent sermons in support of this and other conservative religious views and practices. Taylor’s most powerful work—making him, in the opinion of many critics, the author of the finest seventeenth-century American verse—was his PREPARATORY MEDITATIONS, a private spiritual diary of more than two hundred poems composed between 1682 and 1725, in preparation for the administering of communion.

In God’s Determinations Touching His Elect (circa 1682), Taylor depicted the spiritual combat between God and the devil, a familiar theme to readers of John Milton’s (1608–1674) Paradise Lost (1667) or Michael Wigglesworth’s The Day of Doom (1662). But Taylor’s style is distinctive—homey, colloquial, and more poetic than Wigglesworth’s. The poem touches on all the central issues and tenets of Taylor’s Calvinistic commitments—predestination, God’s nature, creation, original sin, grace, the separation of the elect from the damned, and the joy of knowing salvation; yet, it explores these through a dramatic tale of the devil’s use of psychological ploys to produce despair and doubt in humans and turn them away from God. The devil argues that God does not even exist, but Christ’s reassurances are more powerful: “I am a Captain to your Will / You found me gracious, so shall still / Whilst that my Will is your Design.” Although the poem is written in various meters and styles, the theme of the joys of salvation unite the segments.

Works

Taylor, Edward. The Poetical Works of Edward Taylor, edited by Thomas H. Johnson. New York: Rockland Editions, 1939.
Taylor. Edward Taylor’s Christographia, edited by Norman S. Grabo. New Haven & London: Yale University Press, 1962.
Taylor. A Transcript of Edward Taylor’s Metrical History of Christianity, edited by Donald E. Stanford. Cleveland: Micro Photo, 1962; Ann Arbor: Books on Demand University Microfilms International, 1977.

29: 6<sup>m</sup> 1708 § 83. Meditation. Can. s. 1. I am torned out
 A Garden, you a Garden, indeed.
 Of all Delightfull & Beautifull flowers & sweet
 A Cloud of rich perfum'd flowers did grow
 From sweet & fragrant plants, for which was
 Your singing birds from this garden wild.
 And the Harp, Lord, thou comest to, is a Garden Sign
 A Garden: Church, & with choiced Herbs & flowers.
 Here sign: Bless. of the seed of life.
 Here trees of Frankincense & Myrrour of borders.
 Here's Sharon's Rose & Lilies: Beauties Strife.
 Here's Cassia, & cinnamon, flowers, that Mays, & weaves
 Sweet Salomon's: & all Heavens herbs of Grace.
 Here's Order choiced, & all, all in print.
 And sweet & blushing of some, sparkling
 In white, Red, & purple flowers, & singing
 Making of glory, & their choiced smiles have
 Of Anomalous Vapors: Spiritual Drops.
 This garden, is, the Church, this Paradise
 Thou comest into, with thy choiced spirits guide
 Weaving all Plants of Grace gust out life & spirit.
 Their sweet perfume'd breath that's in the air
 And singing their spirits sweet upon
 Their beauties alter to thee, Holy One.
 This garden too is of souls of thy Redeemed.
 When thou thy spirits plants therein hast set
 In their composition, now, & choicedly adorned Substantified with Grace & grace
 That my soul thy Paradise once be
 Shall be my paradise it is with thee.
 Wee see thee the garden, Lord, thy Grace my plant:
 Wee see thee the vineyard, & my plants thy Vine:
 Then come into the garden: water with rain
 And make my days bleed in the deep red wine
 When thou comest in, my garden flowers will perfume
 And Psalm choicest Praise thou wilt

- Taylor. The Diary of Edward Taylor, edited by Francis Murphy. Springfield, Mass.: Connecticut Valley Historical Museum, 1964.
- Taylor. Edward Taylor's Treatise Concerning the Lord's Supper, edited by Grabo. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1966.
- Taylor. The Unpublished Writings of Edward Taylor: volume 1, Edward Taylor's "Church Records" and Related Sermons; volume 2, Edward Taylor vs. Solomon Stoddard: The Nature of the Lord's Supper; volume 3, Edward Taylor's Minor Poetry, edited by Thomas M. and Virginia L. Davis. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
- Taylor. The Poems of Edward Taylor, edited by Donald E. Stanford. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.

Sources

- Grabo, Norman S. Edward Taylor. Boston: Twayne, 1988.
- Guruswamy, Rosemary Fithian. The Poems of Edward Taylor: A Reference Guide. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003.
- Hammond, Jeffrey. Edward Taylor: Fifty Years of Scholarship and Criticism. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1993.

Recommended Writings

- Occasional Poems* (1680–1683)
- Gods Determinations Touching His Elect: and the Elects Combat in Their Conversion, and Coming up to God in Christ together with the Comfortable Effects Thereof* (circa 1682)
- Preparatory Meditations before My Approach to the Lord's Supper* (1682–1725)
- Christographia* (1692)

Studying Edward Taylor

Edward Taylor served as minister of the Congregational church at Westfield, Massachusetts, and during this fifty-year tenure he wrote poems about ministerial preparations and meditations on faith. The poems remained in manuscript and out of public view until the mid twentieth century. Upon the discovery of his poems Taylor began to attract the interest of scholars. His collections include God's Determinations Touching His Elect (circa 1682), thirty-five poems that trace a path from Genesis to the Resurrection; Preparatory Meditations (1682–1725), more than two hundred poems; and Occasional Poems (1680–1683), which includes "Huswifery" and "Upon Wedlock, & Death of Children."

Scholarly biographical information appears in volume three of the Unpublished Writings, edited by Thomas Marion Davis and Virginia L. Davis and in The Poems of Edward Taylor, edited by Donald E. Stanford. Additional biographical studies include Stanford's Edward Taylor (University of Minnesota Pamphlets on American Writers, no. 52, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1965); Stanford's "Edward Taylor" in Major Writers of Early American Literature, edited by Everett Emerson (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1972, 59–91); and Norman S. Grabo's Edward Taylor (Boston: Twayne, 1988).

Students interested in scholarly studies of Edward Taylor's POETRY should consult Michael J. Colacurcio's "God's Determinations Touching Half-Way Membership: Occasion and Audience in Edward Taylor" (American Literature, 39 [1967]: 298–314); William J. Scheick's The Will and the Word: The Poetry of Edward Taylor (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1974); Albert Gelpi's The Tenth Muse: The Psyche of the American Poet (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1975); Karl Keller's The Example of Edward Taylor (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1975); Michael Clark's "The Honeyed Knot of Puritan Aesthetics," in Puritan Poets and Poetics: Seventeenth-Century American Poetry in Theory and Practice, edited by Peter White and Harrison T. Mesersole (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985, 67–83,); Karen E. Rowe's Saint and Singer: Edward Taylor's Typology and the Poetics of Meditation (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); Jeffrey Hammond's "Who is Edward Taylor?: Voice and Reader in the Preparatory Meditations" (American Poetry, 7, no. 3 [1990]: 2–19); Hammond's Sinful Self, Sainly Self: The Puritan Experience of Poetry (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993); Linda Munk's The Devil's Mousetrap: Redemption and Colonial American Literature (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997); and The Tayloring Shop: Essays on the Poetry of Edward Taylor in Honor of Thomas M. and Virginia L. Davis, edited by Michael Schuldiner (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1997).

Bibliographical and reference guides for Edward Taylor include Constance J. Gefvert's Edward Taylor; an Annotated Bibliography, 1668–1970 (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1971); William J. Scheick and JoElla Doggett's Seventeenth-Century American Poetry: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977); Raymond A. Craig's A Concordance to the Minor Poetry of Edward Taylor (1642?–1729), American Colonial Poet (Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1992); Hammond's Edward Taylor: Fifty Years of Scholarship and Criticism (Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1993); and Rosemary Fithian Guruswamy's Poems of Edward Taylor: A Reference Guide (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003).

Major Edward Taylor collections are located in the MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY; the Redwood Library and Athenaeum in Newport, Rhode Island; Yale University Library, Beinecke Rare Book and Manuscript Library; and the Westfield Athenaeum in Westfield, Massachusetts.

Tennent, Gilbert (1703–1764) clergyman

Gilbert Tennent, one of the leaders of the GREAT AWAKENING, was born February 5, 1703, in Vinnecash, Ireland. He was the son of Katherine Kennedy Tennent and William Tennent Sr., a clergyman. In 1718 Gilbert Tennent immigrated to Philadelphia with his family after his father renounced his ordination in the Church of Ireland and returned to Presbyterianism. Tennent experienced conversion himself in 1723 under the spiritual guidance of his father.

Tennent acquired an M.A. degree from Yale College in 1725. That same year he obtained a license from the Philadelphia Presbytery, and in 1726 he was ordained in New Brunswick, New Jersey. He remained a pastor there until 1743. Shortly after his ordination, he became acquainted with the Dutch Reformed pastor Jacobus Frelinghuysen (1691–1748), whose piety greatly influenced Tennent.

In 1739 Tennent accompanied George WHITEFIELD, a traveling Methodist preacher and the most charismatic of the “Awakeners,” or revivalist ministers, on a preaching tour through the middle colonies, Tennent introducing Whitefield to important clergy along the way. This tour had the effect of binding together the heretofore scattered revival efforts in NEW ENGLAND and New Jersey into the First Great Awakening. As a result of his tour with Whitefield, Tennent published THE DANGER OF AN UNCONVERTED MINISTRY (1740), asserting that those ministers who stressed theological orthodoxy over practical piety were leading their pastorate astray.

In 1741 supporters of the Presbyterian Awakening were expelled from the Synod of Philadelphia. Tennent was crucial in convincing the New York Presbytery to separate from the Philadelphia Synod in 1745 and form a rival synod composed of these expelled pastors. The New York Synod was thus the institutional bastion of the Awakening faith.

Tennent left New Brunswick in 1743 to pastor in Philadelphia, where he preached more-traditional Calvinist doctrines and called for a unification of the Philadelphia and New York synods, which he achieved in 1758. He was named the first moderator of the new synod at their first full meeting, thus burying the tensions produced during the Awakening. Tennent died in Philadelphia on July 23, 1764.

Works

Tennent, Gilbert. A Solemn Warning to the Secure World. Boston: S. Kneeland & T. Green for D. Henchman, 1735; Early American Imprints, 3967.

Tennent. The Danger of an Unconverted Ministry, Considered in a Sermon on Mark VI. 34. Philadelphia: Printed by Benjamin Franklin, 1740; Early American Imprints, 4609, 4610.

Tennent. Sermons on Important Subjects; Adapted to the Perilous State of the British Nation. Philadelphia: Printed by James Chattin, 1758; Early American Imprints, 8266.

Sources

Coalter, Milton J., Jr. Gilbert Tennent, Son of Thunder: A Case Study of Continental Pietism's Impact on the First Great Awakening in the Middle Colonies. Baltimore, Md.: Greenwood Press, 1986.

Lambert, Frank. Inventing the “Great Awakening.” Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Lambert. Pedlar in Divinity: George Whitefield and the Transatlantic Revivals, 1737–1770. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1994.

Tenney, Tabitha Gilman (1762–1837) novelist

Tabitha Gilman was born April 7, 1762, in Exeter, New Hampshire, the daughter and oldest child of the socially prominent Samuel and Lydia Robinson Giddings Gilman. She had little, if any, formal education—except for training in fashion and household management. She remained at home to care for her mother for several years after her father's death. In 1785, Tabitha Gilman began a courtship with Samuel Tenney, a doctor and a PATRIOT who served in the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. When they married in 1788, he was forty, and she was twenty-six, which was considered quite late for a woman of the eighteenth century. The Tenneys had no children. They spent much of their time in Washington, D.C., where he served in Congress from 1800 through 1807.

Tenney wrote one novel, Female Quixotism: Exhibited in the Romantic Opinions and Extravagant Adventures of Dorcasina Sheldon (1801). It was dedicated “to all Columbian Young Ladies, who Read Novels & Romances.” Female Quixotism was intended to educate; it satirized sentimentality and sentimental fiction. Dorcasina, heroine of the novel, is a victim of her sentimental education, blind to the vast differences between her real life and the life of her fantasies. As a result, she turns down her only suitor when he does not live up to her image of a romantic beau. Not until her old age does she realize her mistake. She discovers then that a charming but unscrupulous suitor is plotting to marry her for her money and have her committed to a mental institution.

Samuel Tenney appears to have encouraged his wife's literary interest, but after his death on February 6, 1816, she abandoned writing and devoted her days to needlepoint. She died in Exeter on May 2, 1837, at the peak of her popularity.

Work

Tenney, Tabitha Gilman. Female Quixotism: Exhibited in the Romantic Opinions and Extravagant Adventures of Dorcasina Sheldon. Boston: Printed by I. Thomas and E. T. Andrews, 1801; edited by Jean Nienkamp and Andrea Collins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992; Early American Imprints, second series, 1396.

Source

Bontatibus, Donna R. The Seduction Novel of the Early Nation: A Call for Socio-Political Reform. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1999.

Thomas, Gabriel (1661–1714) historian

Historian and geographer Gabriel Thomas was born in Wales, the son of QUAKER parents. At the age of twenty, he joined a group of William PENN's colonists in crossing the Atlantic to settle in Philadelphia. He returned to England in 1697 to oversee the publication of his Historical and Geographical Account of Pennsylvania and of West-New-Jersey (1698), a book that described the plant and animal life of the region. Thomas remained in England until 1702.

The book was a PROMOTIONAL TRACT that painted a positive picture of Pennsylvania—stressing, and perhaps exaggerating, the colony's excellent climate and economic opportunities. Thomas apparently believed that his well-written and persuasive book, which he dedicated to Penn, was responsible for much of the prosperity the colony enjoyed after its publication. He insisted that Penn therefore owed him an appointive post in New Castle County. When Penn refused to give Thomas an appointment, Thomas attacked Penn as “beggarly” and brought the case to the Board of Trade in England. Whether the board entertained the complaint or handed down a decision is unknown, but when Thomas at last returned to America, he settled in a part of Pennsylvania that became Delaware and did not return to Philadelphia until 1712. He died two years later.

Work

Thomas, Gabriel. An Historical and Geographical Account of the Province and Country of Pennsylvania, and of the West-New-Jersey in America. London: Printed by Auran for A. Baldwin, 1698; Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms, 1973.

Source

Klepp, Susan E. “Demography in Early Philadelphia, 1690–1860,” Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, 133, 2 (1989): 85–111. Symposium on the Demographic History of the Philadelphia Region, 1600–1860.

Thomas, Isaiah (1749–1831) journalist, editor

Isaiah Thomas was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on January 19, 1749, the youngest son of Moses and Fidelity Grant Thomas. Moses Thomas was a sailor who died by the time Isaiah was three years old. His mother set up a small shop to support her five children. By the time he was eight, Isaiah was apprenticed to a local printer. He and his master, Zachariah Fowle, did not get along, however, and after a serious disagreement the young apprentice fled to Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he took a job at The Halifax Gazette or Weekly Advertiser.

Thomas became a central figure at the Gazette. He provoked controversy when he published a protest against the STAMP ACT of 1765. The public response led him to leave Nova Scotia, and relocate briefly in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. He attempted to return to his position with his former Boston master, but the two men were unable to work together. Thomas departed, this time for South Carolina, where he found a job at Charleston's pro-British newspaper, The South Carolina and American General Gazette. During his two-year stay in Charleston, Thomas met and married Mary Dill, but he divorced her in 1777, claiming she had committed adultery.

In 1770 Thomas returned once again to Boston and renewed his relationship with Fowle. This time working as partners, the two printers established a new paper, The Massachusetts Spy. Although the editors insisted that the paper was politically neutral, it soon earned a reputation as a pro-Whig, or revolutionary, news organ. LOYALISTS first tried to pressure Thomas into closing down the paper. Failing that, they attempted unsuccessfully to buy it from him. His reputation soon spread beyond Massachusetts, and he was burned in effigy by Loyalists in several colonies.

Undaunted, Thomas allowed the Sons of Liberty to attack Governor Thomas HUTCHINSON in the pages of the Spy. He was outspoken in denouncing those who tried to suppress his paper. Americans faced a choice, he wrote: “we may next have padlocks on our lips and fetters on our legs, or FIGHT OUR WAY TO CONSTITUTIONAL FREEDOM.”

In April 1775 Thomas was forced to flee British-occupied Boston. Before he left, he managed to have his presses and type secretly shipped to Worcester, Massachusetts, and by early May his newspaper had resurfaced as The Massachusetts Spy, or, American Oracle of Liberty. Although financial contributions to the Spy dried up as revolutionaries devoted their resources to the war effort, Thomas was rewarded with an appointment from the Continental Congress as the local postmaster in Worcester. By 1778 the Spy had been revitalized as Thomas's Massachusetts Spy, or, American Oracle of Liberty. Opponents condemned it as a “sedition factory,” but such notable patriots as James OTIS, Joseph Warren (1741–1775), Paul REVERE, and John Hancock (1737–1793) published in it anonymously. The paper's partisanship won it a wide readership, reaching more than three thousand subscribers by 1775, and Thomas's financial situation improved steadily.

By 1793 Thomas owned as many as sixteen presses, a paper mill, and a bindery as well as bookstores from Massachusetts to Maryland. He ran one of the largest printing companies in the English-speaking world, publishing Bibles, novels, textbooks, lyric books, ALMANACS, and dictionaries. In 1802 Thomas turned this empire over to Isaiah Thomas Jr., his son with Mary Fowle, whom he had married in 1779. He then began work on his History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers, which he published in 1810. He also organized the AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY in 1812. In 1819, at the age of seventy, he married for a third time, to Rebecca Armstrong, but they separated in 1822.

Although Thomas published several magazines, most notably The Royal American Magazine, which encouraged a popular interest in the short story, he is mostly remembered for his newspaper work. He died in April 1831.

Work

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers . . ., 2 volumes. Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1810; second edition, Albany, N.Y.: Printed by J. Munsell, 1874; reprinted and edited by Marcus A. McCorison, New York: Weathervane, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 21483.

Sources

Amory, Hugh. Bibliography and the Book Trades: Studies in the Print Culture of Early New England, edited by David D. Hall. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.

Amory and David D. Hall, eds. A History of the Book in America, Volume One: The Colonial Book in the Atlantic World. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

Marble, Annie Russell. From 'Prentice to Patron: The Life Story of Isaiah Thomas. New York: Appleton-Century, 1935.

Nichols, Charles Lemuel. Isaiah Thomas, Printer, Writer and Collector: A Paper Read April 12, 1911, before the Club of Odd Volumes. New York: Burt Franklin, 1971.

Torrey, Samuel (1632–1707) minister

Born in England in 1632, Samuel Torrey was the son of Captain William and Jane Havilano Torrey. In 1640 Torrey and his father immigrated to Massachusetts, settling in the town of Weymouth. Samuel entered HARVARD at the age of twenty-one but did not receive his degree. Despite his failure to graduate, Torrey pursued a career as a minister, and by 1666 the church in Weymouth had called him to preach.

Torrey played an increasingly important role in the spiritual and political life of the colony. A contemporary, Thomas Prince, spoke admiringly of the “singular Esteem and Intimacy” Torrey enjoyed with such powerful men as Lieutenant Governor William Stoughton (1631–1701) and Chief Justice Samuel Sewall. Torrey was invited to give a record number of four election sermons between 1667 and 1795. Perhaps his most satisfying moment came, however, when Harvard invited their most distinguished dropout to serve as president of the college—he declined.

Only four pieces of writing by Samuel Torrey have survived: a memorial to his friend William Thompson and three election sermons. In these sermons Torrey elaborates on a familiar theme in Puritan society—the decline of spiritual rigor among the Massachusetts colonists and the abandonment of the original settlers’ holy mission by the second and third generations. In his JEREMIAD A Plea for the Life of a Dying Religion (1683), Torrey laments the deterioration of the colonists’ commitment to the “city upon a Hill,” and calls for a renewal of spiritual energies.

Torrey married Mary Rawson in 1657, and following her death he married Mary Symmes. Neither marriage produced children. He died on April 27, 1707.

Works

Torrey, Samuel. An Exhortation unto Reformation, Amplified, by a Discourse Concerning the Parts and Progress of that Work, According to the Word of God. Cambridge, Mass.:

Printed by Marmaduke Johnson, 1674; Early American Imprints, 197.

Torrey. A Plea for the Life of Dying Religion from the Word of the Lord. Boston: Printed by Samuel Green for Samuel Sewall, 1683; Early American Imprints, 353.

Torrey. Mans Extremity, Gods Opportunity. Or, A Display of Gods Sovereign Grace, in Saving a People Whose Recovery, as to Men and Means is Next to Desperate. Boston: Printed by Bartholomew Green for Michael Perry, 1695; Early American Imprints, 739.

Sources

Bozeman, Theodore Dwight. To Live Ancient Lives: The Primitivist Dimension in Puritanism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1988.

Murdock, Kenneth B., ed. Handkerchiefs from Paul: Being Pious and Consolatory Verses of Puritan Massachusetts. . . . Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1927.

Towne, Benjamin (circa 1740–1793) journalist, printer

Benjamin Towne, born in Lincolnshire, England, around 1740, arrived in Pennsylvania in the 1760s with some training as a printer. William GODDARD, publisher of the Pennsylvania Chronicle, hired Towne as a journeyman in 1769. Towne made a quick transition from journeyman to printer by purchasing a partnership in Goddard’s business using funds loaned to him by Goddard’s backers, Joseph GALLOWAY and Thomas Wharton (1735–1778). The partnership was dissolved in early 1770, returning Towne to the status of journeyman.

After five years of hired employment, Towne opened his own printing shop in 1774, and by January 1775 he was publishing his own newspaper, The Pennsylvania Evening Post. Towne positioned his paper in a crowded market—five other weekly newspapers were available in Philadelphia—by publishing the Post triweekly.

The Post became a leading voice for the PATRIOT cause, but it made a quick transition to the Tory, or LOYALIST, position during the British occupation of the city. Towne’s printing business flourished temporarily following the evacuation of the British. As the sole remaining printer in the city, he secured the printing contracts for the Continental Congress and the state government. However, his situation was quickly reversed when he was included among a list of traitors that was made public in his own paper. He also became the subject of severe public criticism for his pro-British sentiments.

Towne attempted to remedy his situation by publishing anti-Tory articles and by allying himself with the conservative faction. However, he published several pseudonymous editorials that were highly critical of Thomas PAINE, Paine’s supporters, and the liberal state constitution of 1776. One of these editorials depicted Paine, the author of the popular and influential Common Sense (1776), as a political mercenary for the British. Towne was apprehended by Paine's supporters and forced to reveal the identity of the author, Whitehead Humphreys (1734–1786). Humphreys successfully resisted the mob, but the experience frightened Towne into changing his editorial stance. It also contributed to the demise of the Post. Beginning in 1780, the paper declined in importance. Towne employed several innovative strategies to increase sales, including street sales and daily publication. Every attempt to revive the paper failed, however, and the Post ceased in 1784. Towne continued to operate his printing business until his death in 1793.

Works

Towne, Benjamin. A Defence of Messrs. Galloway and Whar-ton, Late Printers of the Pennsylvania Chronicle Humbly Offered. . . . Philadelphia: N.p., 1770.

Towne. To the Public, and Particularly the Kind Customers of the Pennsylvania Chronicle, &c.: As the Hot Temper and Cholerick Disposition of My Unhappy Partner, William Goddard, Incapacitate Him from Reasoning, with Coolness and Decency, on the Subject of Dispute between Us, No Motive Could Have Induced Me to Reply to His Unmannerly Publication, But That of Defending My Character. Philadelphia: N.p., 1770; Early American Imprints, 11896.

The Pennsylvania Evening Post. Philadelphia: Printed and edited by Benjamin Towne, 1775–1781; Early American Imprints.

Source

Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America, with a Biography of Printers, and an Account of Newspapers . . . , 2 volumes. Worcester, Mass.: Isaiah Thomas, 1810; second edition, Albany, N.Y.: Printed by J. Munsell, 1874; reprinted and edited by Marcus A. McCorison, New York: Weathervane, 1970; Early American Imprints, second series, 21483.

Trumbull, John (1750–1831) poet, writer

Born in Waterbury, Connecticut, on April 24, 1750, John is best known for his humorous and often scathing SATIRE. The son of the Reverend John Trumbull, a trustee of Yale College, and Sarah Whitman Trumbull, the daughter of a noted clergyman, Trumbull was a child prodigy. He learned to read at age two and passed the entrance exam to Yale at seven. He entered Yale when he was thirteen, received a B.A. degree and prestigious fellowship in 1767 and stayed on to receive his M.A. degree in 1770. Trumbull then left Yale, studied law for two years, and passed the bar in 1773. By the age of twenty-six, he had a law practice in New Haven and had married Sarah Hubbard.

In 1789 Trumbull began his formal political career, serving as state attorney for the county of Hartford. In 1792 he was elected to represent the township of Hartford in the state legislature, and in 1801 he was appointed Judge of the Supreme Court of Connecticut. He became Judge of the Supreme Court of Errors in 1808.

During his years at Yale, Trumbull began to write poetry. Influenced by English poets Alexander Pope (1688–1744), Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), and Samuel Butler (1613–1680), he worked with Timothy Dwight on The Meddler, a series of essays published from September 1769 to January 1770 in The Boston Chronicle. Trumbull probably wrote most of the essays, which address such subjects as humor, flirting, language, sin, and religion. The two collaborated again on a group of essays titled The Correspondent, some of which were published in 1770 and the rest in 1773. Once again, Trumbull wrote the majority of the essays. His tone in The Correspondent is more earnest than in The Meddler, but both collections are marked by his characteristically witty ruminations and criticisms.

Trumbull's most popular work, The Progress of Dulness, is a verse satire published in three parts in 1772 and 1773 that mocks Yale's educational techniques as well as its methods of preparing ministers. Through his main characters, Tom Brainless, Dick Hairbrain, and Harriet Simper, Trumbull demonstrates the disastrous, if comical, consequences of Yale pedagogy. Tom Brainless, described as "a fellow, without any share of genius, or application of study," can still make his way through a college "where ignorance wanders unmolested . . . and examinations are dwindled to mere form and ceremony." Tom's stint at Yale is little more than "Four years at college dozed away / In sleep, slothfulness, and play." As he prepares for the ministry, Tom "settles down with earnest zeal / Sermons to study, and to steal."

In part two of The Progress of Dulness, Trumbull introduces Dick Hairbrain, a student of provincial background, who gambles in college, mimics foreign habits as a young adult, becomes a fop, gets into debt, and finally, as an older man, is pushed aside by younger dandies. In part three Trumbull introduces Harriet Simper, a foolish and conniving woman obsessed with fashion who is the product of the indifference toward women's education. As Harriet's aunt remarks: "And why should girls be learned or wise? / Books only serve to spoil their eyes." Harriet, her brief moment of glory cut short by other coquettish women, has few options other than to marry the Reverend Tom Brainless after Dick Hairbrain refuses her advances.

Trumbull's other popular satire, M'Fingal, was written during the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. This epic poem, the first part of which was published in 1772 (the second and third, in 1773), was meant to arouse support for the PATRIOT cause and to deride the British and the LOYALISTS. It was also designed to illustrate the pomposity of polemical figures on both sides. As Trumbull explained in a letter to John ADAMS in 1775, his goal was nothing less than "to Expose a number of the principal Villains of the day, to ridicule the high blustering menaces & great expectations of the Tory party, & to burlesque the achievements of our ministerial Heroes, civil, ecclesiastical & military.”

In the first canto, Trumbull mocks the speeches of both M’Fingal, a Loyalist from Scotland and justice of the peace in a town outside Boston, and his opponent Honorius, a Whig Patriot, possibly John Adams. The second canto continues this conflict as M’Fingal makes speeches supporting the Loyalist stance. In the third canto, Whigs interrupt arguments between M’Fingal and Honorius by trying to erect a liberty pole. When M’Fingal tries to intercede, he is tarred and feathered. In the fourth canto, M’Fingal is forced to flee Boston after reciting a verse about the demise of the English during a secret Tory meeting.

Trumbull was generally regarded as the most talented of the CONNECTICUT WITS, America’s first literary group. His work, especially M’Fingal, was lauded by critics before he died in 1831.

Works

Trumbull, John. The Progress of Dulness, Part First; or, the Rare Adventures of Tom Brainless. New Haven, Conn.: Printed by Thomas & Samuel Green, 1772; Early American Imprints, 12585; corrected, 1773; Early American Imprints, 13050.

Trumbull. The Progress of Dulness, Part Second; or, an Essay on the Life and Character of Dick Hairbrain of Finical Memory. New Haven, Conn.: Printed by Thomas & Samuel Green, 1773; Early American Imprints, 13051.

Trumbull. The Progress of Dulness, Part Third, and Last: Sometimes Called, The Progress of Coquetry, or the Adventures of Miss Harriet Simper. New Haven, Conn.: Printed by Thomas & Samuel Green, 1773; Early American Imprints, 13052.

Trumbull. M’Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem. Canto First, or The Town-Meeting. Philadelphia: Printed and sold by William & Thomas Bradford, 1775; Early American Imprints, 14528; revised and enlarged as M’Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem, in Four Cantos, Hartford: Hudson & Goodwin, 1782; Early American Imprints, 17750–17752.

Sources

Cooper, Helen A. John Trumbull: The Hand and Spirit of a Painter. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1982.

Cowie, Alexander. John Trumbull: Connecticut Wit. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1972.

Giles, Paul. Transatlantic Insurrections: British Culture and the Formation of American Literature, 1730-1860. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.

Tuesday Club of Annapolis (1745–1756)

The Tuesday Club of Annapolis, a social club, was established on May 14, 1745, and met every other Tuesday for eleven years for dining and entertainment, reciting of poetry, and exchanges of wit. Principal members included

Dr. Alexander HAMILTON, a Scottish physician, and other prominent merchants and public servants, such as John Bullen (d. 1764), William Cumming (circa 1696–1752), John Gordon (1717–1790), Robert Gordon (circa 1676–1753), John Lomas (d. 1757), Witham Marshe (d. 1765), and William Rogers (1699–1749). Known for its mock trials, playful songs, and lively literary and political exchanges, the Tuesday Club also attracted honorary members such as Thomas Bacon (circa 1700–1768), Thomas Cradock (circa 1718–1770), and Jonas Green (1712–1767), as well as distinguished visitors such as Benjamin FRANKLIN. Hamilton’s The History of the Ancient and Honorable Tuesday Club, a three-volume, 1,900–page fictionalized account of the club’s proceedings written under the pseudonym of Loquacious Scribble, Esq., recounts the club’s antics and playful activities. Members were expected to follow fifty-two laws of conduct; the most pervasive one was the “gelastic law,” directing its members “to laugh.” As Loquacious Scribble explains: “let your Laughing or Gelastication, be accompanied with good humour, a pleasant open, and Candid Countenance quite stript of Satyr, Sarcasm or Sneer.” Another of their maxims was to avoid the discussion of politics in such playful discourse. The Tuesday Club disbanded in 1756, just before Hamilton’s death.

Work

Hamilton, Alexander. The History of the Ancient and Honorable Tuesday Club, 3 volumes, edited by Robert Micklus. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990.

Sources

Micklus, Robert. The Comic Genius of Dr. Alexander Hamilton. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1990.

Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.

Turell, Jane Colman (1708–1735) poet

Jane Colman was born on February 25, 1708, the daughter of the Congregationalist minister Benjamin Colman and his wife, Jane. Delighted with an intellectually precocious child, the Reverend Colman devoted himself to her education, helping her develop epistolary skills by carrying on an extended correspondence with her while they lived in the same home. Although her father worried about Jane’s shyness and urged her to “look People in the Face,” he simultaneously reinforced the gender expectations of the era, calling on Jane to be modest and humble. This tension between propriety and potential could also be seen in his advice on her ambitions to be a writer. He encouraged Jane to perfect her skills but warned her to stay within the boundaries of proper female topics and audiences. Verse should be a pastime.

Apparently heeding her father's warnings regarding propriety, Colman continued to write POETRY, but did not publish any of her poems. Sending a recently composed verse to her father, Jane enclosed an apology. "I find," she wrote, "my Inclinations to Poetry still continue, tho' I hope I do not follow them to the omitting more necessary Things. It is my Study & Endeavor to be a Blessing." Among the "necessary Things" were marriage and motherhood. At the age of eighteen, Colman married Ebenezer Turell and bore four children, only one of whom survived infancy.

All that remains of Turell's poetry is what her husband and father chose to preserve. These works show her preference for the couplet form and her skill at biblical paraphrasing, Horatian imitation, and humor. Her style is exemplified in her "An Invitation into the Country, in Imitation of Horace":

*No stately beds my humble roofs adorn
Of costly purple, by carved panthers borne;
Nor can I boast Arabia's rich perfumes,
Diffusing odors through our stately rooms. . . .
Though I no down or tapestry can spread
A Clean soft pillow shall support your head,
Filled with the wool from off my tender sheep,
On which with ease and safety you may sleep,
The nightingale shall lull you to your rest,
And be all calm and still as is your breast.*

Turell's most powerful poetry was perhaps written during her pregnancies. While carrying her third child, she recalled the tragedy of her first child, stillborn, and of her second, who died after ten days. The deaths of her children may have reinforced her melancholy and her anxiety about salvation. Turell died at age twenty-seven on March 26, 1735.

Work

Turell, Jane. Poems of Jane Turell and Martha Brewster. Delmar: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1979.

Sources

Henigman, Laura. Coming Into Communion: Pastoral Dialogues in Colonial New England. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1999.

Scheick, William J. Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Tyler, Royall (1757–1826) playwright

Born in Boston, Massachusetts, William Clark Tyler changed his name following the death of his father, Royall Tyler, who was a member of the Long Room Club, a group that included many of Boston's leading PATRIOTS. The younger Tyler attended primary school in Boston during the early period of the colonies' rebellion. He received his bachelor's degree at HARVARD and then studied law under several prominent attorneys, including Francis Dana (1743–1811).

Tyler was heavily influenced by the events of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and by the nationalism of the Early Republic. In 1777 he temporarily suspended his legal career to enlist in John Hancock's regiment. After serving in the Battle of Rhode Island in 1778, Tyler returned to his legal career, settling in Braintree, Massachusetts, where he became a member of an intellectual and literary circle that met in the rooms of artist John Trumbull (1756–1843). During this period Tyler courted Abigail (Nabby) Adams, the daughter of John and Abigail ADAMS. The relationship ended after Adams joined her father in Europe while he was serving as an ambassador for the United States. In 1786 Tyler joined General Benjamin Lincoln's (1733–1810) campaign against SHAYS'S REBELLION, a revolt in western Massachusetts protesting a farmers' tax.

In 1787 Tyler moved to New York City, where he became friendly with people involved in the city's thriving theater. With no previous experience as a playwright, Tyler wrote two plays in 1787, The Contrast and May Day in Town; or, New York in an Uproar. Both of these plays were produced, but The Contrast appears to have been the more accomplished of the two works, since it was subsequently published. It was also the first DRAMA written by an American playwright to be staged professionally. Employing the style of the comedy of manners, Tyler used this play to examine the differences in American versus European values. Not surprisingly, Tyler found American values far superior to those of Britain and continental Europe. In developing his play, Tyler drew on the style developed by Molière, the master of French social comedy, and on the work of the English Restoration dramatists. This style, known as SATIRE, was also used by Mercy Otis WARREN, an American author who undoubtedly influenced Tyler.

Tyler eventually returned to Boston, resumed his legal practice, became a prominent judge in Vermont, and in 1794 married Mary Hunt Palmer, with whom he had eleven children. He continued to write, producing an additional play, The Georgia Spec; or, Land in the Moon (1797) and several fictional pieces, including The Algerine Captive (1797), The Yankey in London (1809), and The Chestnut Trees (1824).

Works

Tyler, Royall. The Contrast: A Comedy; in Five Acts: Written by a Citizen of the United States. Philadelphia: Printed by Prichard & Hall, 1790; Early American Imprints, 22948.

Tyler. The Algerine Captive. Walpole, N.H.: Printed and sold by David Carlisle, 1797; Early American Imprints, 32945.

Tyler. Four Plays. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1941.

Tyler. The Prose of Royall Tyler, edited by Marius B. Péladeau. Montpelier: Vermont Historical Society, 1972.

Sources

- Brown, Jared. The Theatre in America During the Revolution. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Carson, Ada Lou. Royall Tyler. Boston: Twayne, 1979.
- Richards, Jeffrey H. Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Richardson, Gary A. American Drama from the Colonial Period through World War I: A Critical History. New York: Twayne, 1993.
- Tanselle, G. Thomas. Royall Tyler. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Wilmer, Steve E. Theatre, Society and the Nation: Staging American Identities. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Tall Tale

This type of satirical fiction, characterized by exaggeration or by understatement, is associated with FOLKLORE. In America it probably made its first published appearance in Reverend Samuel A. Peters's General History of Connecticut (1781). The form was further refined by Washington IRVING in his History of New York by Diedrich Knickerbocker (1809). In part because its effectiveness often depended upon having an outsider as its audience, the tall tale is usually associated with the frontier, about which most readers knew little but were willing to believe much (see FRONTIER FICTION).

Frontier tall tales were originally oral rather than written, and it was in this mode that such mythic characters as Paul Bunyan, John Henry, and Mike Fink were invented. The reported exploits of such historic figures as Daniel Boone and Davy CROCKETT were only one step removed from pure invention. The Crockett Almanacs (some fifty of which appeared between 1835 and 1856), were filled with aggrandizing stories about the author and other real and imaginary characters.

The tall tale was a specialty of frontier journalists in newspapers such as THE SPIRIT OF THE TIMES. Among the well-known works by professional writers that make use of the form are Augustus Baldwin LONGSTREET'S GEORGIA SCENES (1835), Thomas Bangs THORPE'S "THE BIG BEAR OF ARKANSAS" (1839), and George Washington HARRIS'S "Sut Lovingood" yarns (1867). The literary tall tale reached its apogee with Mark Twain's (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) autobiographical travel book, LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI (1883), which recounts the author's apprenticeship as a steamboat captain.

Sources

- Brown, Carolyn S. The Tall Tale in American Folklore and Literature. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1987.
- Dorson, Richard M. Man and Beast in American Comic Legend. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1982.
- Wonham, Henry B. Mark Twain and the Art of the Tall Tale. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Taylor, Bayard (1825–1878) poet, travel writer, novelist
A Quaker from Pennsylvania, Bayard Taylor began to write poetry at an early age. He published his first book of romantic poetry, Ximena; or, The Battle of the Sierra Morena, and Other Poems (1844), before he was twenty. Taylor funded a trip to Europe by sending letters to the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE describing details of his impressions there; the letters were later collected in Views A-Foot; or, Europe Seen with Knapsack and Staff (1846). When the newspaper sent him to California to report on the 1849 gold rush, he portrayed himself as an adventurer in his two-volume Eldorado (1850).

By 1851 Taylor was off to Egypt, Abyssinia (Ethiopia), Turkey, India, China, and (with Commodore Matthew Perry) Japan. Taylor's forte was exotic detail, a feature that abounds in his published accounts of these trips: A Journey to Central Africa (1854), The Lands of the Saracen (1855), and A Visit to India, China, and Japan, in the Year 1853 (1855). Taylor's enormously popular lyceum lectures (see LYCEUM MOVEMENT) helped to invent the author tour and to transform the role of the author into a public celebrity.

After marrying Marie Hansen, a German woman, during a European trip, Taylor published Northern Travel (1857), Travels in Greece and Russia (1859), and At Home and Abroad (1859). During these years of foreign tours, lecturing, and travel writing, Bayard also produced three books of poetry: Rhymes of Travel, Ballads and Poems (1849), A Book of Romances, Lyrics, and Songs (1852), and Poems of the Orient (1855). In the 1860s Taylor turned to writing novels. Hannah Thurston (1863) is a love story set in upstate New York; John Godfrey (1864) is a vivid portrait of New York literary life. He wrote about small-town and rural life in The Story of Kennett (1866) and Joseph and His Friend (1870), both set in Pennsylvania where he grew up. A collection of Taylor's short stories appeared in Beauty and the Beast and Tales of Home (1872). He complemented his prose with Home Pastorals, Ballads, and Lyrics (1875) and The Echo Club and Other Literary Diversions (1876), which contains lampoons of Walt WHITMAN and other poets of the day.

Taylor's two-volume translation of Goethe's Faust (1870–1871) took him eight years to complete and earned him the position of professor of German at Cornell in 1870.

Sources

- Cary, Richard. The Genteel Circle: Bayard Taylor and his New York Friends. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1952.
- Croom, Richmond Beatty. Bayard Taylor: Laureate of the Gilded Age. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1936.
- Wermuth, Paul C. Bayard Taylor. New York: Twayne, 1973.

"The Tell-Tale Heart" by Edgar Allan Poe (1843) short story

After a successful run in the short-lived but popular literary journal The Pioneer in January 1843, Edgar Allan Poe's "The Tell-Tale Heart" was reprinted in The Broadway Journal (edited and co-owned by Poe) on August 23, 1845. The story's most arresting feature is its use of a mentally unstable first-person narrator—a technique that makes Poe's tale a forerunner of modern fictional treatments of the subconscious. Much of the horror effect of "The Tell-Tale Heart" derives from the reader's being privy to the madman's thoughts as he is driven to kill an innocent man.

Sources

- Burdock, Michael L. Grim Phantasms: Fear in Poe's Short Fiction. New York: Garland, 1992.
- Smith, Andrew. Gothic Radicalism: Literature, Philosophy, and Psychoanalysis in the Nineteenth Century. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Temperance Movement (circa 1808–1919)

Although efforts to ban production and consumption of alcoholic beverages existed in the United States even before the Revolutionary War, the movement gained momentum throughout the nineteenth century as one of several social reform movements (see SUFFRAGISM and ABOLITIONISM). In 1808 a group in Saratoga, New York, took a public pledge not to drink intoxicating beverages. The American Temperance Society formed in Boston in 1826 and by the mid 1830s had 1.5 million members in over eight thousand chapters. Other formal organizations—many of them church sponsored—sprang up, inspired by the success of such tracts as Walt WHITMAN's Franklin Evans; or The Inebriate (1842) and T. S. ARTHUR's TEN NIGHTS IN A BAR-ROOM (1854).

During the CIVIL WAR the temperance movement took a backseat to the war effort, in both the North and the South. Afterward, however, the movement was reborn, this time trading its religious orientation for one more directly political. The movement maintained the air of a moral crusade, and its leaders began to appeal to voters in an effort to turn morality into legislation. Women, whose involvement in the movement had been a source of both strength and tension, exerted ever greater influence. Many suffragists, including Susan B. ANTHONY, Elizabeth Cady STANTON, and Lucy STONE, also spoke out for temperance. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU) was founded in 1874 and by 1890 claimed nearly 150,000 members. The WCTU took on other causes, such as prison reform and world peace, but they were most successful at linking temperance with women's suffrage.

The temperance movement gained considerable political power, culminating in the ratification, in 1919, of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, which made Prohibition the law of the land. The Eighteenth Amendment was repealed in 1933, and in the meantime women's suffrage, which had been delayed by liquor industry lobbying, became law.

Sources

- Bordin, Ruth Birgitta Anderson. Woman and Temperance: The Quest for Power and Liberty, 1873–1900. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1981.
- Epstein, Barbara L. The Politics of Domesticity: Women, Evangelism, and Temperance in Nineteenth-Century America. Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1981.

Ten Nights in a Bar-Room by Timothy Shay Arthur (Boston: L. P. Crown, 1854) novel

Written in the style of an eye-witness account, Ten Nights in a Bar-Room, and What I Saw There is a quintessential and best-selling example of antebellum TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT writing. While giving a detailed account of the workings of nineteenth-century taverns, T. S. ARTHUR dramatically represents alcohol as leading to a host of personal and societal calamities. The novel is set in the American village of Cedarville. Beset by a plague of alcohol, the village is pulled into depravity, drunkenness, gambling, and murder. The lurid and tearful events of each chapter contribute to the narrative's central theme: the only reasonable path for society is total abstinence from alcohol, enforceable by temperance law. The novel has been called "the Uncle Tom's Cabin of the antebellum temperance movement" (see UNCLE TOM'S CABIN). With a sensationalist plot that moves quickly along to track both the decline of poor inebriates and the sanctimonious piety of the innocents, Arthur's novel was a sensation, selling more than four hundred thousand copies and spawning an even more successful play.

Source

Arthur, Timothy Shay. Ten Nights in a Bar-Room, and What I Saw There, edited by Donald A. Koch. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1964.

—E. N. S.

Terhune, Mary Virginia (1830–1922) novelist, nonfiction writer

Known to her contemporaries as Marion Harland, Mary Virginia Terhune (born Mary Virginia Hawes) started her prolific writing career as an acclaimed author of domestic fiction, much of which offered romantic depictions of Virginia, where she was born. In her mid teens Hawes began contributing a series of moralistic stories to the Richmond Weekly Presbyterian Press. Her first novel, Alone, appeared under the name Marion Harland in 1854 and was followed in rapid succession by other novels and stories for such periodicals as GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK and GRAHAM'S MAGAZINE. In 1856 she married Edward Terhune, a Presbyterian minister. After moving to New Jersey in 1859, she remained in the North. Three of her six children survived to adulthood, and all became professional writers.

Terhune began her second career, as a writer of domestic advice, with Common Sense in the Household (1871). Extremely successful, this book of household hints and recipes went through many editions and was followed by additional books in the same vein. Beginning in the 1880s Terhune also did editorial work and continued to produce fiction and nonfiction pieces for magazines. In the 1890s she added lecturing to her activities and wrote several travel books and biographies. Between 1899 and 1917 Terhune wrote a syndicated column on domestic advice. At her death Terhune's seventy-year career led one journalist to write, "There was no American city so great, no cross-roads village so remote but the name of Marion Harland was as familiar there as if she had been a president of the United States."

—Brett Barney

"Thanatopsis" by William Cullen Bryant (1817) poem

William Cullen BRYANT first wrote this blank-verse poem—whose title translates from the Greek as "view of death"—when he was still studying law and under the influence of such meditations on mortality as Robert Blair's The Grave (1743) and William Cowper's The Task (1785). The poem was further revised before it first appeared in the September 1817 issue of the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW, and by the time "Thanatopsis" was published in Bryant's first collection of poems in 1821, it had new opening and concluding stanzas. These stanzas entirely recast the poem, removing it from the philosophical influence of the English "graveyard school" of poets.

In the poem, a personified Nature counters "thoughts of the last bitter hour" with a pantheistic faith in the unity of life, for the dying person joins all people in all ages "in one mighty sepulchre,"—that is, in the natural world. The added closing stanza provides an explicit moral: Live in such a way that the grave will seem a rest rather than a punishment.

Sources

Brown, Charles H. William Cullen Bryant. New York: Scribner, 1971.

McLean, Albert F. William Cullen Bryant. Boston: Twayne, 1964.

Thaxter, Celia (1835–1894) nature writer, poet, children's writer

Born in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Celia Thaxter moved with her family when she was four years old to the Isles of Shoals, a desolate group of islands off the Maine and New Hampshire coasts. She remained at the Shoals for most of her life, and the islands were often the subject of her writing. In recent years Thaxter has gained renewed attention as an important nature writer of the nineteenth century.

Thaxter's first published work was the poem "Land-Locked," printed in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY in 1861. This publication marked the beginning of a long relationship with the magazine, during which time Thaxter became close friends with James T. FIELDS and his wife Annie FIELDS. The famous summer salon that Thaxter hosted attracted influential writers and artists, and her circle grew to include the New England literary elite, among them John Greenleaf WHITTIER, James Russell LOWELL, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, and Sarah Orne JEWETT.

Thaxter's body of work includes the nature essays of Among the Isles of Shoals (1869–1873), more than 150 poems, dozens of stories for children, and the nonfiction An Island Garden (1894). Nearly all of her works appeared initially in periodicals such as The Atlantic, the INDEPENDENT, Our Young Folks, and ST. NICHOLAS.

Source

Mandel, Norma H. Beyond the Garden Gate: The Life of Celia Laighton Thaxter. Hanover: University Press of New England, 2004.

—Elizabeth Lorange

Thompson, Daniel Pierce (1795–1868) novelist, historian

Reared in rural Vermont and educated at Middlebury College, Daniel Pierce Thompson first distinguished himself as a lawyer and judge, compiling the state code, Laws of Vermont, in 1835. His literary career began that same year with the publication of The Adventures of Timothy Peacock, Esq. (1835), a satire about the Masons in Vermont. His Green Mountain Boys (1839), an historical ROMANCE about Ethan Allen and the New Hampshire land grants, proved to be a popular success. In 1847 Thompson published Locke Amsden; or, The Schoolmaster, which described the experiences of a self-educated Vermont boy who becomes a schoolteacher. In the novel Thompson critiqued popular educational philosophies of the period.

From 1849 until after the CIVIL WAR, Thompson published the abolitionist journal Green Mountain Freeman and wrote fiction based on the history and customs of his native region. He also wrote nonfiction such as his History of Vermont and the Northern Campaign of 1777 (1851) and a History of the Town of Montpelier (1860).

Source

Flitcroft, John E. The Novelist of Vermont: A Biographical and Critical Study of Daniel Pierce Thompson. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1929.

Thomson, Mortimer Neal (1831–1875) journalist, humorist

One of America's first professional humorists, Mortimer Neal Thomson (or Thompson) adopted the pen name Q. K. ("Queer Kitter") Philander Doesticks, P. B. in 1854 and began publishing parodies in periodicals such as SPIRIT OF THE TIMES. His first collection of sketches was published as Doesticks, What He Says (1855). Thomson went on to publish Plu-ri-bus-tah, a Song That's by No Author (1856), a lengthy parody of Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW's THE SONG OF HIAWATHA that targets feminism, P. T. BARNUM, the violent slavery conflict in Kansas, the Know-Nothing political movement, spiritualism, free love, and greed. In addition to other parodies, Thomson also wrote serious journalism, serving as a Southern correspondent for the NEW-YORK TRIBUNE during the CIVIL WAR. He published his collected Tribune pieces on criminals as The History and Records of the Elephant Club (1856) and his pieces on fortune-tellers as The Witches, Prophets, and Planet Readers of New York (1858).

Thoreau, Henry David (1817–1862) nonfiction writer, poet

I went to the woods because I wished to live deliberately . . . and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not lived.

—Walden (1854)

Henry David Thoreau was born in Concord, Massachusetts, of French and Scottish ancestry. He attended Harvard, graduating in 1837. Thoreau was particularly influenced by Ralph Waldo EMERSON and seems to have taken to heart the older writer's belief that men must immerse themselves in the natural environment in order to come to grips with universal principles. Unlike other transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), Thoreau was not attracted to utopian communities like FRUITLANDS and BROOK FARM, but instead wished to study the natural world and human character on an individual level. He wrote about a seven-day journey with his brother in his A WEEK ON THE CONCORD AND MERRIMACK RIVERS (1849). His two-year stay in a handmade cabin

Daguerreotype of Henry David Thoreau, 1856

Walden,
or Life in 'The Woods'.

Addressed to my Townsmen.

By Henry J Thoreau.

At the time the following pages were written I lived alone, in the woods, a mile from any neighbor, in 'a house of my own building', on the shore of Walden pond, in Concord Massachusetts, and earned my living by the labor of my hands exclusively. I lived there two years and two months. At present I am a sojourner in 'civilized life' again.

I should not obtrude myself and my affairs so much on

WALDEN; OR, LIFE IN THE WOODS.

BY HENRY D. THOREAU,
AUTHOR OF "A WEEK ON THE CONCORD AND MERRIMACK RIVERS."

I do not propose to write an ode to dejection, but to brag as lustily as chanticleer in the morning, standing on his roost, if only to wake my neighbors up. — Page 92.

BOSTON:
TICKNOR AND FIELDS.
M DCCC LIV.

Title page for the first edition of Thoreau's second book at Walden Pond is well known through his transformation of the experience in WALDEN (1854).

In the book Thoreau's years at Walden are depicted as one man's desire to confront his talents and come to an understanding of his convictions. Thoreau made it plain, however, that he was not setting himself up as a representative or recommending a particular way of life. Rather, his experience at Walden was his way of finding out about himself and the world around him.

Like other transcendentalists, Thoreau supported ABOLITIONISM. He considered the Mexican War a pretense designed to mask America's greed for territory and the South's desire to expand slaveholding in the West. When, during his stay at Walden, Thoreau was imprisoned for refusing to pay the poll tax that supported the Mexican War, he responded with his classic essay "CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE" (1849), in which he argued for the primacy of the individual conscience over government dictates.

Thoreau approached nature with both scientific and mystical sensibilities; indeed it is this dualism that makes his prose both a record of precise observation and an evocation of values that transcend the material world. Thoreau's friend William Ellery CHANNING called him a "poet-naturalist."

Thoreau's written accounts of his extensive travels in New England were published after his death as Excursions (1863), The Maine Woods (1864), Cape Cod (1865), and A Yankee in Canada (1866). He continued his travels and his abolitionist activities in spite of the tuberculosis that finally killed him. Before his death Thoreau planned to write an extensive study of the American Indians, for which he gathered material on a trip to Minnesota in 1861, but he could not recover his health and realized that he would soon die. He spent his remaining days putting his journals in order.

Principal Books by Thoreau

A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers. Boston & Cambridge, Mass.: Munroe, 1849.

Walden; or, Life in the Woods. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1854; republished as Walden. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1862.

Excursions. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1863.

The Maine Woods. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1864.

Cape Cod. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1865.

A Yankee in Canada, with Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers. Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1866.

Faith in a Seed: The Dispersion of Seeds and Other Late Natural History Writings, edited by Bradley P. Dean. Washington, D.C.: Island Press, 1993.

Wild Fruits: Thoreau's Rediscovered Last Manuscript, edited by Dean. New York: Norton, 1999.

The definitive editions of Thoreau's works are included in the Princeton Edition:

Cape Cod, edited by Joseph J. Moldenhauer. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988.

Early Essays and Miscellanies, edited by Moldenhauer and Edwin Moser, with Alexander C. Kern. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.

The Higher Law: Thoreau on Civil Disobedience and Reform, edited by Wendell Glick. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2004.

Journal 1: 1837–1844, edited by Elizabeth Witherell and others. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.

Thoreau's survey of A. Bronson Alcott's estate, 1860

- Journal 2: 1842–1848*, edited by Robert Sattelmeyer. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Journal 3: 1848–1851*, edited by Sattelmeyer, Mark R. Patterson, and William Rossi. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.
- Journal 4: 1851–1852*, edited by Leonard N. Neufeldt and Nancy Craig Simmons. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1992.
- Journal 5: 1852–1853*, edited by Patrick F. O’Connell. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- Journal 6: 1853*, edited by Rossi and Heather Kirk Thomas. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2000.
- Journal 8: 1854*, edited by Sandra Harbert Petrulionis. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2002.
- The Maine Woods*, edited by Moldenhauer. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1972.
- Reform Papers*, edited by Glick. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1973.
- Translations*, edited by K. P. Van Anglen. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.
- Walden*, edited by J. Lyndon Shanley. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1971.
- A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers*, edited by Carl F. Hovde, William L. Howarth, and Witherell. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1980.

Studying Henry David Thoreau

Henry David Thoreau published only two books during his short life, A WEEK ON THE CONCORD AND MERRIMACK RIVERS (1849) and WALDEN (1854), both of which continue to inspire students of self-reliant philosophy and environmentalism. He also published his most important essays on politics, reform, and antislavery, with “CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE” (also known as “Resistance to Civil Government”; 1849), “Slavery in Massachusetts” (1854), and “A Plea for Captain John Brown” (1860), all of which are easily accessible in anthologies of Thoreau’s work. At the time of his death he had prepared several other essays for publication, most of which subsequently appeared in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. Among them were important works such as “Autumnal Tints,” “Walking,” and “Wild Apples,” all published in 1862 within months of his death, and “Life without Principle,” which appeared in 1863. In the following years several more of his previously unpublished nature essays, journals, letters, and poems were collected, edited, and published by close friends, colleagues, and followers.

Numerous editions of Thoreau’s major works, especially Walden, are readily available in recent critical and annotated editions. The most comprehensive collection of Thoreau’s writings—including his major published works as well as previously unpublished essays, papers, translations, and journals—is the fourteen-volume (as of 2002) The Writings of Henry David Thoreau, edited by Walter Harding and Elizabeth Witherell and others (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1971–2002). Princeton also rereleased a series of five works with new introductions in honor of the 150th anniversary of the publication of Walden in 2004. The discovery of previously unpublished writings has resulted in two edited volumes by scholar Bradley Dean, Faith in a Seed: The Dispersion of Seeds and Other Late Natural History Writings (Washington, D.C.: Island Press, 1993) and Wild Fruits: Thoreau’s Rediscovered Last Manuscript (New York: Norton, 1999). The publication of these volumes speaks to the continued interest in Thoreau’s legacy as an environmentalist and naturalist.

Thoreau is considered one of the primary figures of the New England transcendentalist movement of the mid nineteenth century. To understand his place within this context, see Joel Myerson’s Transcendentalism: A Reader (New York: Oxford University Press, 2000), which includes several important essays, a good selection of Thoreau’s poems, and an early essay that appeared in the Transcendentalist literary journal, THE DIAL, for which Thoreau served briefly as guest editor. Thoreau’s place within TRANSCENDENTALISM is further explored in the joint biography, My Friend, My Friend: The Story of Thoreau’s Relationship with Emerson by Harmon Smith (Amherst: University of Massachusetts, 1999).

Interest in Thoreau’s life has never subsided, and regular biographies and scholarly criticism have appeared since the late 1800s. Important early biographies include Henry S. Salt’s The Life of Henry David Thoreau (London: Bentley, 1890) and Walter Harding’s The Days of Henry David Thoreau (New York: Knopf, 1965). The definitive modern intellectual biography is Robert D. Richardson Jr.’s Henry Thoreau: A Life of the Mind (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986). Students may also be interested in W. Barksdale Maynard’s Walden Pond: A History (New York: Oxford University Press, 2004), which pays tribute to Thoreau’s role in preserving this wilderness area.

—Student Guide by Tiffany Wayne

Thorpe, T. B. (1815–1878) short-story writer, editor

A humorist of the Old Southwest (see SOUTHWESTERN HUMOR), Thomas Bangs Thorpe was in fact born in Massachusetts. He did, however, live in Louisiana from 1837 to 1853, during which time he owned and edited several newspapers and wrote his most famous work, “THE BIG BEAR OF ARKANSAS,” often called the most famous TALL TALE of the Southwest. This tale was published in 1841 in the New York journal SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, which Thorpe also edited. Thorpe’s other regionalist sketches were collected in The Mysteries of the Backwoods (1846), The Hive of the Bee Hunter (1854), and Colonel Thorpe’s Scenes of Arkansas (1858). Thorpe served in the MEXICAN WAR and turned this experience into literature in Our Army on the Rio Grande (1846), Our Army at Monterey (1847), and The Taylor Anecdote Book (1848), this last based on General Zachary Taylor’s exploits. Thorpe served as a colonel during the CIVIL WAR, and from 1869 until his death he held a civil service position in the New York customhouse.

Sources

Estes, David C., ed. A New Collection of Thomas Bangs Thorpe's Sketches of the Old Southwest. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.

Rickels, Milton. Thomas Bangs Thorpe: Humorist of the Old Southwest. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1962.

Ticknor, William D. (1810–1864) publisher

William Davis Ticknor grew up on a farm in Lebanon, New Hampshire. He began in the publishing business through his ownership, with partner John Allen, of the Old Corner Bookstore in Boston, which the two purchased in 1832. With Allen's retirement from the firm a few years later, Ticknor became the sole owner. He continued to expand the publishing operation and eventually promoted bookstore worker James T. Fields to partner in the firm. Ticknor retained primary responsibility for the firm's finances and relied on Fields, a charismatic and energetic man, to handle most of the negotiations with authors. Through their publishing relationship, Ticknor became close friends with Nathaniel Hawthorne after Ticknor and Fields negotiated to publish THE SCARLET LETTER (1850).

Source

Ticknor, Caroline. Hawthorne and His Publisher. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1913.

Ticknor and Fields (1854–1868) publishing house

The firm eventually known as Ticknor & Fields began modestly, with the purchase by William D. Ticknor and John Allen of the Old Corner Bookstore, a Boston institution that, like many other bookshops of the time, did occasional publishing jobs. Allen left the firm in 1834, and the firm went through a series of restructurings while at the same time increasing its publishing operations. After James T. Fields was added as partner and a third partner, John Reed Jr., withdrew, the firm was rechristened Ticknor & Fields in 1854. The firm became the most prestigious literary publisher in the country, publishing the work of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Lydia Maria Child, Henry David Thoreau, James Russell Lowell, Harriet Beecher Stowe, John Greenleaf Whittier, and Oliver Wendell Holmes. In addition, Ticknor & Fields published two eminent journals, THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY and the NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

Timrod, Henry (1828–1867) poet, essayist, journalist

Henry Timrod was the son of a Charleston, South Carolina, bookbinder whose shop was frequented by scholars, writers, editors, lawyers, and politicians. Timrod attended Franklin College (present-day University of Georgia), but when illness and financial strain forced him to leave school, he returned to his native city. There he joined a group of poets and literary figures that usually met at John Russell's bookshop or William Gilmore Simms's home. Timrod studied the classics on his own and before the Civil War he worked as a private tutor on several Carolina plantations. During the decade leading up to the war he published several important essays, including "What Is Poetry?" (1857) and "Literature in the South" (1859) in Russell's Magazine. In 1860 he published the only volume of his poetry that appeared during his lifetime.

Timrod's reputation arose primarily from the poems he wrote during the war, such as "THE COTTON BOLL" (1861) and "ETHNOGENESIS" (1861). Known as "the laureate of the Confederacy," the tubercular poet served for ten months in 1862 as a clerk in a Confederate regiment; afterward he reported on the war for the Charleston Mercury. In 1864 Timrod became editor of the Columbia Daily South Carolinian. In February 1864 he married Katie S. Goodwin, for whom he wrote the long, posthumously published love poem Katie (1884). After Union forces sacked Columbia in 1865, Timrod lost his livelihood, and his last years were plagued by poverty, chronic ill health, and the death of his only child. During this time he composed his best-known poem, "Ode Sung on the Occasion of Decorating the Graves of the Confederate Dead, at Magnolia Cemetery, Charleston, S.C." (1866). His lifelong friend Paul Hamilton Hayne edited The Poems of Henry Timrod in 1873.

Sources

Cisco, Walter Brian. Henry Timrod: A Biography. Madison: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2004.

Parks, Edd Winfield. Henry Timrod. New York: Twayne, 1964.

Timrod, Henry. Collected Poems, edited by Edd Winfield Parks and Aileen Wells Parks. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1965.

"To a Waterfowl" by William Cullen Bryant (1818)

poem

One of William Cullen Bryant's earliest works, "To a Waterfowl" is a poem of eight quatrains with lines of varying metrical length. As the speaker tracks a waterfowl's movement overhead, he contemplates his own faith and mortality. Just as the bird in its migration is guided by an instinct of which it is not aware, he realizes that his life too is guided by an unknown force. "To a Waterfowl" represented a distinct change from Bryant's widely celebrated poem "THANATOPSIS." Whereas that earlier poem adopted a stoic and faithless view of death, "To a Waterfowl" revealed Bryant's discovery of a mysterious, benevolent God who would lead his "steps aright" from life to death.

Source

Bryant, William Cullen. Poems. Cambridge, Mass.: Printed by Hilliard & Metcalf, 1821.

—Matt Miller

"To the Fringed Gentian" by William Cullen Bryant (1829) poem

This poem by William Cullen BRYANT constitutes, in five quatrains of iambic tetrameter, an extended apostrophe to the genus of a plant that blooms in autumn, when "the aged year is near his end." Though Bryant uses the fringed gentian as a symbol of "hope," he avoids doing so at the expense of verisimilitude. Bryant does not display the microscopic eye characteristic of Emily DICKINSON, but he does represent the gentian realistically. Although the poem is clearly influenced by English ROMANTICISM, Bryant's choice of the fringed gentian, which is native to the eastern United States, reflects his interest in portraying the American experience.

Source

Bryant, William Cullen. Poems. New York: Burt, 1832.

—C. Love

Todd, Mabel Loomis (1856–1932) editor

A native of Cambridge, Massachusetts, Mabel Loomis Todd moved to Amherst in 1879 when her husband became a professor at Amherst College. While in Amherst, Todd taught music and painting at two girls' schools and founded the Amherst Historical Society. A writer herself, Todd came to know Emily DICKINSON through her relationship with Dickinson's brother, and after Dickinson's death the poet's family asked Todd to prepare some of Dickinson's nearly two thousand manuscript works for publication. Together with Thomas Wentworth HIGGINSON, Todd edited two series of Dickinson's poems, which were published in 1890 and 1891. A third series, which appeared in 1894, was edited solely by Todd, who also edited Letters of Emily Dickinson (1894). Todd's daughter, Millicent Todd Bingham, used her mother's transcriptions of other Dickinson poems to publish Bolts of Melody: New Poems by Emily Dickinson in 1945, after Todd's death.

Source

Walsh, John Evangelist. This Brief Tragedy: Unraveling the Todd-Dickinson Affair. New York: George Weidenfeld, 1991.

Tourgée, Albion W. (1838–1905) novelist

Born in Williamsfield, Ohio, Albion W. Tourgée attended the University of Rochester before he left school to join the Union army as an officer during the CIVIL WAR. He sustained a spinal injury during the war that plagued him throughout his life. During one period of recuperation he began studying law; he was admitted to the bar in 1864. When the war ended in 1865, Tourgée sought work in North Carolina as a northerner attempting to reform the political and social institutions of the South during Reconstruction.

Working first as a lawyer and then as a North Carolina superior court judge, Tourgée's outside status and his Republican politics made him unpopular as a carpetbagger among locals. He accepted African American clients in his law practice, employed them in his nursery, and was an early supporter of their education. As a judge Tourgée took his job of opposing the activities of the newly formed Ku Klux Klan seriously, and later, as a writer, he was one of the first to provide an account of the Klan's activities. Tourgée also founded and edited several journals that advocated radical measures for the reconstruction of the former Confederacy.

Tourgée's first novel, Toinette, appeared in 1874. When he returned north to New York in 1879, Tourgée published Figs and Thistles. Mostly ROMANCES tempered by realistic detail, his books deal almost exclusively with the post-Civil War South. A Fool's Errand (1879), considered his best work, draws heavily on his own biography and describes the challenges that he and other northerners faced in the South during Reconstruction. A sequel, Bricks without Straw (1880), addresses the difficulty of making former slaves truly free without providing them with a proper social and economic foundation.

Tourgée is credited with having reintroduced southern life as a theme in popular fiction in the North. Writing in The Forum in December 1888, he said he found American literature to have become "distinctly Confederate in sympathy" and to have forgotten the root causes of the CIVIL WAR. Tourgée criticized Jim Crow laws in his newspaper column, "A Bystander's Notes," and encouraged African Americans toward activism. As the lawyer for a civil rights organization that he founded, Tourgée took the case of Homer Adolph Plessy to the Supreme Court (Plessy v. Ferguson). In 1897 Tourgée was appointed U.S. consul in Bordeaux, France.

Sources

Gross, Theodore L. Albion W. Tourgée. New York: Twayne, 1963.
Olsen, Otto H. Carpetbagger's Crusade: The Life of Albion Win-egar Tourgée. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1965.

A Tramp Abroad by Samuel L. Clemens (Hartford, Conn.: American Publishing, 1880) travel narrative

Written on contract toward the beginning of Samuel L. CLEMENS's long decline into financial trouble, A Tramp Abroad is an embellished account of a European trip that Clemens made in 1878–1879. By the time he wrote A Tramp Abroad he was a bankable humorist and travel writer—a reputation established with THE INNOCENTS ABROAD (1869) and ROUGHING IT (1872). Deliberately modeled on The Innocents Abroad, A Tramp Abroad uses the same basic formula of the straight-talking American mocking the reverence and sophistication of the Old World. To this Clemens added an increased measure of self-mockery, which helped to distinguish what might otherwise have seemed a too-familiar—though very funny—travel book. Initially A Tramp Abroad sold nearly as well as The Innocents Abroad had, though it has proved to be less enduring and is now usually considered a lesser work.

—Brett Barney

Transcendental Club (1836–circa 1843)

Founded in the Boston home of George RIPLEY, this loosely organized club was dedicated to the “exchange of thought among those interested in the new views in philosophy, theology, and literature.” The group grew out of the transcendentalist movement (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), inspired by the writings of Ralph Waldo EMERSON, and initially included Emerson, Bronson ALCOTT, and the Unitarian theologian James Freeman CLARKE. Another charter member was the clergyman Henry Hedge (1805–1890), who provided the club with an alternative moniker, the Hedge Club, so called because it met only when Hedge traveled to Boston from his home in Bangor, Maine. Later the group attracted writers such as Margaret FULLER, Orestes Augustus BROWNSON, Jones VERY, Elizabeth Palmer PEABODY, and Peabody’s sister Sophia Peabody, who became the wife of another member, Nathaniel HAWTHORNE. The literary journal THE DIAL was a direct outgrowth of the club’s discussions. Many of the members were involved in the experiment in communal living known as BROOK FARM.

Sources

- James, Laurie. Men, Women, and Margaret Fuller: The Truth That Existed between Margaret Fuller and Ralph Waldo Emerson and Their Circle of Transcendental Friends. New York: Golden Heritage Press, 1990.
- Myerson, Joel. A History of the Transcendental Club. Pullman: Washington State University Press, 1977.
- Simon, Myron, ed. Transcendentalism and Its Legacy. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1966.

Transcendentalism (circa 1836–1860)

This literary and philosophical concept is associated with New England writers such as Bronson ALCOTT, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, and Henry David THOREAU. Reacting against both the Puritanism and the rationalism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Transcendentalists adopted neither religious faith nor radical skepticism but instead explored the spiritual and immaterial aspects of humanity through engagement of the imagination and contact with nature. In this respect Transcendentalism is a variant of ROMANTICISM, which also exults in human intuition and creativity that goes beyond mere observation of the world. Transcendentalism espouses a belief in a kind of god or a divine principle inherent in humans that binds them to the natural world. The Transcendentalists, however, rejected specific creeds. Emerson, for example, left the Unitarian (see UNITARIANISM) church because he did not wish to be bound by an institution’s principles, no matter how liberal.

The term Transcendentalism derives from the work of German philosopher Immanuel Kant, who argued that knowledge arises from human nature rather than from concrete materiality—that what we know is not generated by experience but is inherent in us and transcends matter. The British Romantics—especially Samuel Taylor Coleridge—borrowed the philosophy of Kant and other German thinkers and, pushing it toward mysticism and idealism, influenced American thought and literature. Plato’s belief in the existence of ideal forms, which the senses can only dimly perceive but which the mind can intuit, shaped Transcendentalism’s notion of truth. American Transcendentalists were greatly influenced by eastern thought, particularly Confucianism and Buddhism, which also emphasize the human need to go beyond the evidence of the senses.

The American synthesis of these ideas located a core of meaning in the individual, who maintained all the elements of the universe within. Awareness of the “oversoul”—a type of collective conscience—guaranteed unity between the individual and the world, and transcendental writers who tapped into this belief stood firmly on what their consciences told them. The writer might be a “minority of one,” but when in tune with the truths of nature, he or she claimed a deeper authority than that founded on the laws of any particular society.

The key works of Transcendentalism include Thoreau’s WALDEN and Emerson’s “NATURE.” The teachings of Transcendentalism, however, were never codified as a school of thought, and consequently, there was considerable variation in the way Transcendentalism was interpreted. Leading members of the TRANSCENDENTAL CLUB are Alcott, Margaret FULLER, Theodore PARKER, Jones VERY, and Orestes Augustus BROWNSON; Nathaniel HAWTHORNE was influenced by Transcendentalism but also treated it with considerable reserve. Even writers outside of the movement, such as Walt WHITMAN and Herman MELVILLE, were affected by transcendentalist philosophy.

Sources

- Barbour, Brian M., ed. American Transcendentalism: An Anthology of Criticism. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1973.
- Gura, Philip E., and Joel Myerson, eds. Critical Essays on American Transcendentalism. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.
- Mott, Wesley T., ed. Biographical Dictionary of Transcendentalism. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- Myerson, Joel. The New England Transcendentalists and The Dial: A History of the Magazine and its Contributors. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980.

A Traveler from Altruria by William Dean Howells
(New York: Harper, 1894) novel

A utopian novel by leading nineteenth-century literary critic, author, and editor William Dean HOWELLS, A Traveler from Altruria was originally published serially in Cosmopolitan from November 1892 to October 1893. The book satirizes the economic inequalities and unrealistic social mores of the American Gilded Age and its dehumanizing cities. Nostalgic for pastoral village life, the novel also explores the destructive effects that industrialization and human indifference have on the environment. In his travels to Altruria, a fictional country somewhere in the Southern Hemisphere, American protagonist Mr. Homos discovers an ideal society with no financial want, political deceit, or class divisions, in which all work is valued and meaningful. Howells continued these themes in a sequel, Through the Eye of the Needle (1907).

Sources

Carter, Everett. Howells and the Age of Realism. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1954.

Howells, William Dean. The Altrurian Romances, edited by Clara M. Kirk and Rudolph Kirk. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968.

—Susan M. Stone

Trowbridge, John Townsend (1827–1916) poet, memoirist, children's writer, journalist

Although a prolific author in his own right, John Townsend Trowbridge is today most famous for his connections with other writers, especially Walt WHITMAN. Like Whitman, Trowbridge was born to working-class parents in rural New York and worked as a teacher before moving to New York City. There, he became acquainted with the publishing world, and he placed a few short pieces in journals before moving to Boston in 1848. He contributed fiction and essays to periodicals and filled two short stints as an editor. His first book, the moralistic children's novel Father Bright-hopes, appeared in 1853. In 1857 Trowbridge had his first major success with an antislavery novel, Neighbor Jack-wood, and he joined Harriet Beecher STOWE, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, and other famous authors in the inaugural issue of THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. In 1865 he accepted an assignment to tour the South and describe conditions there. The book that resulted, The South: A Tour of Its Battlefields and Ruined Cities, provides an important picture of the region at the beginning of Reconstruction. From 1865 through 1874 Trowbridge edited the children's magazine Our Young Folks, to which he contributed stories, poems, and essays. In later years he continued to write in all of these genres, especially preferring poetry. In his 1903 autobiography, My Own Story, Trowbridge records reminiscences of leading literary figures, including Emerson, Whitman, and Bronson ALCOTT.

Source

Trowbridge, John Townsend. My Own Story with Reflections of Noted Persons. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1903.

—Brett Barney

Truth, Sojourner (circa 1798–1883) abolitionist, women's rights activist, public speaker, autobiographer

Sojourner Truth was born Isabella in Hurley, New York, to enslaved parents owned by Johannis Hardenbergh, a Revolutionary War colonel. Following Hardenbergh's death when she was about nine years old, Isabella was sold for $100. She was eventually sold to John Dumont, her owner for over sixteen years. In Dumont's household, Isabella suffered from physical and, according to some biographers, sexual abuse, experiences common among enslaved women. In 1815 she married a fellow slave, Thomas, with whom she had five children. She became a free woman around 1827 in accordance with New York laws that were gradually emancipating slaves, as well as through her developing religious faith. In 1828 she and her son Peter moved to New York City. There, Isabella began working closely inside the Methodist perfectionist movement, a Christian religious reform movement that included speaking in tongues, singing, fasting, and, importantly, public preaching. During the 1830s her powerful speaking and singing voice quickly earned her a reputation. In 1843 Isabella dramatically left the city and adopted the name Sojourner Truth. Thereafter, Truth took up various speaking engagements until she came to live at the Northampton Association for Education and Industry, a utopian commune that held progressive ideas about race, class, and gender equality. After seeing the success of Frederick DOUGLASS's 1845 autobiography, NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS, Truth began dictating her life story to Olive Gilbert, a member of the Northampton Association. The narrative is more in line with spiritual autobiography than most other SLAVE NARRATIVES, such as Douglass's, or Harriet JACOBS's INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF A SLAVE GIRL. William Lloyd GARRISON, editor of THE LIBERATOR and president of the American Anti-Slavery Society, helped Truth publish her work. The book appeared in the spring of 1850 at a cost of 25¢. With money from the sale of her books, Truth bought a home, but she continued to travel the country, advocating equality for blacks and women alike and speaking to a variety of audiences. She faced many forms of racism in her daily and professional life, and in 1851 she is said to have removed her blouse to prove to her audience that she was a woman and not a man, as one audience member argued. In 1863 THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY published Harriet Beecher STOWE's "Sojourner Truth, the Libyan Sibyl." The article catapulted Truth into the national spotlight, making her one of the most famous black women of the nineteenth century. Truth worked in hospitals during the CIVIL WAR and in 1864 met with President Abraham Lincoln. After the war Truth continued to work on important issues such as woman's suffrage (See SUFFRAGISM), reminding her powerful white women colleagues of the importance of race in the debate. Truth died at her home in Battle Creek, Michigan.

Sources

Painter, Nell Irvin. Sojourner Truth: A Life, A Symbol. New York: Norton, 1996.

Sojourner Truth Institute: <<http://www.sojournertruth.org>> (viewed August 6, 2007).

Truth, Sojourner. The Narrative of Sojourner Truth, edited by Margaret Washington. New York: Vintage, 1993.

—M. A. Schueth

Tuckerman, Frederick Goddard (1821–1873) poet

Born into a family of Boston's elite known as the Boston Brahmins, Frederick Goddard Tuckerman published one book of poetry in his lifetime. New editions of his Poems (1860) were printed in 1864 and 1869. Tuckerman was largely forgotten until the poet Witter Bynner resuscitated his work and published a new edition of The Sonnets of Frederick Goddard Tuckerman in 1931.

Tuckerman graduated from Harvard and practiced law briefly, before retiring to Greenfield, Massachusetts, where he spent the remainder of his life. In Greenfield, Tuckerman closely studied nature and turned his observations into verse; although few were aware of his work, Tuckerman sent copies of his Poems to some of the most highly regarded writers of the time, and many responded with enthusiasm. The reintroduction of Tuckerman's work in the twentieth century brought the late poet to the attention of modernist critics like Yvor Winters who compared Tuckerman's ability to write about the natural world with that of the English Romantic William Wordsworth.

Sources

England, Eugene. Beyond Romanticism: Tuckerman's Life and Poetry. Provo, Utah: Brigham Young University Press, 1991.

Golden, Samuel A. Frederick Goddard Tuckerman. New York: Twayne, 1966.

Twain, Mark

See CLEMENS, SAMUEL LANGHORNE.

"'Twas the Night before Christmas"

See "A VISIT FROM ST. NICHOLAS."

Twice-Told Tales by Nathaniel Hawthorne (Boston: American Stationers, 1837) short-story collection

A collection of eighteen stories largely concerning the politics and religion of historical New England, Twice-Told Tales begins with a preface in which the author describes himself as, "for a good many years, the obscurest man of letters in America." There is humor in his preface, and in the title as well; while many of his stories had appeared in magazines and in GIFT BOOKS, they had been published pseudonymously, and the reader, if familiar with the work, would not have recognized the author's name. One reviewer for the Boston Courier suggested that Nathaniel HAWTHORNE, who had previously published only one book, was fictitious.

Many of the stories in Twice-Told Tales render New England history with a touch of the supernatural. Among the best-known stories in the collection is "The Ambitious Guest," in which a stranger stops for the night at a lonely cottage in the White Mountains. In "THE MINISTER'S BLACK VEIL" the title character wears a symbolic black veil from the eve of his marriage to his grave. "THE MAY-POLE OF MERRYMOUNT" is based on the history of Merrymount (now Quincy, Massachusetts) and the reaction of neighboring Puritans to the maypole that was raised there. "The Gentle Boy," concerning the fate of a Quaker child at the hands of the Puritans, examines the harshness of Puritan society.

In 1842 Hawthorne published a revised and enlarged edition of Twice-Told Tales. Although his stories had been critically well received—Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW said of the book, "though in prose, [it] is written nevertheless by a poet"—Hawthorne's stories were not instantly successful with the public: Edgar Allan POE called Hawthorne the "publicly-unappreciated man of genius." The stories in Twice-Told Tales, however, influenced the development of Hawthorne's craft and reflected themes that he continued to explore for the remainder of his literary career.

Sources

Cameron, Sharon. The Corporeal Self: Allegories of the Body in Melville and Hawthorne. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1981.

Swisher, Clarence, ed. Readings on Nathaniel Hawthorne. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 1996.

Thompson, Gary R. The Art of Authorial Presence: Hawthorne's Provincial Tales. Durham: Duke University Press, 1993.

Two Years before the Mast by Richard Henry Dana Jr. (New York: Harper, 1840) travel narrative

When Richard Henry DANA Jr.'s sight was impaired by a bout of measles, he took an unusual route to recuperation. Leaving Harvard, the undergraduate shipped out of Boston on August 14, 1834 as an ordinary seaman aboard the brig Pilgrim. On a hide-trading expedition the Pilgrim sailed around Cape Horn to San Francisco, its voyage recorded in a journal by Dana who, as a member of the crew, lived his life below decks, that is, "before the mast." Dana later transformed these journal entries into something like a novel, but he never lost sight of his intent to present "the life of a common sailor at sea as it really is—the light and the dark together."

As a record of the 150-day voyage, Two Years Before the Mast follows the format of a diary in which Dana records both the routines essential to shipboard life and what the sailors did to occupy themselves during their off-hours. The book also describes the harsh treatment sailors had to endure at the hands of the captain—including flogging—without access to avenues of legal redress. The public was nearly as outraged as Dana had been to discover the cruelties perpetrated on seamen.

After chronicling a sixteen-month sojourn at various ports in California, Dana's account continues with the return journey aboard the Alert in 1836. While this return proves to be a liberating escape from the difficulties of life at sea, the book reports Dana's surprising reaction: "the emotions which I had so long anticipated feeling I did not find, and in their place was a state of very nearly entire apathy."

In America, Two Years before the Mast had its most important influence on Herman MELVILLE, who founded a career on sea narratives and whose book about life aboard a man-of-war, WHITE-JACKET (1850), helped advance the cause of those opposed to corporal punishment in the U.S. Navy.

Sources

Gale, Robert L. Richard Henry Dana, Jr. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Shapiro, Samuel. Richard Henry Dana, Jr., 1815–1882. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1961.

Typee by Herman Melville (London: Murray, 1846) novel/travel narrative

When Herman Melville's first book, Typee: A Peep at Polynesian Life, was published in 1846 it became an early success, earning its author a lifelong reputation as "the man who lived among cannibals." The book blends autobiographical facts with fictionalized elements, presenting a narrative that is adventure story, autobiography, and a form of travel literature all in one.

In 1842, after sailing onboard the whaling ship Acushnet for a year, Melville and a friend jumped ship in the Marquesas Islands and spent one month in the Taipi valley of Nuku Hiva. Similarly, the book's first-person narrator, Tommo, and his friend Toby come to live among the Typee after leaving their ship. The book's narrative depicts Tommo's encounters with various aspects of Marquesan life and culture, as well as the reflections on his own culture that they occasion. Suspense is created by the protagonist's uncertainty about whether the Typee are cannibals, as well as by the precariousness of his position, which oscillates between guest and prisoner. In the end the Typee prove hostile, and Tommo barely manages to escape from the island by boat. The 1856 revised edition of Typee includes a sequel, "The Story of Toby."

Source

Melville, Herman. Typee; or a Peep at Polynesian Life, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, and G. Thomas Tanselle. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1967.

—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

Tales of the Jazz Age by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1922) short-story collection

F. Scott FITZGERALD's second volume of magazine stories followed The Beautiful and Damned (1922). He claimed credit for the phrase "Jazz Age." The collection included two major novelettes: "MAY DAY" and "THE DIAMOND AS BIG AS THE RITZ."

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia, S.C.: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

Taps at Reveille by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1935) short-story collection

F. Scott FITZGERALD's fourth and last collection of stories published during his lifetime included stories from the BASIL DUKE LEE and JOSEPHINE PERRY series, the Hollywood story "Crazy Sunday," the ghost story "A Short Trip Home," and two widely reprinted stories—"THE LAST OF THE BELLES" and "BABYLON REVISITED."

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia, S.C.: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, 2001.

—Morris Colden

Tarbell, Ida M. (1857–1944) journalist, biographer, historian

Educated at Allegheny College in her native Pennsylvania, Ida Minerva Tarbell got her start as a journalist on the Chautauquan magazine. By 1895 she was working for McClure's, a nationally syndicated magazine, in which her first book, A Short Life of Napoleon Bonaparte (1895) was serialized. She published the first of her several books on Abraham Lincoln, The Early Life of Abraham Lincoln, the following year. At McClure's Tarbell was given the opportunity to write about Standard Oil, a company that dominated American industry through its monopoly on oil and that she believed had victimized her father. Her well-researched articles, which became the two-volume The History of the Standard Oil Company (1904), established Tarbell's reputation and earned her a permanent place in the history of American journalism. She was recognized as one of the leading "muckraking" journalists (see MUCKRAKING MOVEMENT), so called for their investigations into corrupt practices in American business and politics. Her work was crucial in the chain of events that led to the 1911 decision by the Supreme Court to break up the Standard Oil monopoly. Tarbell continued to write and to work as an activist, lecturing around the country in favor of progressive policies, including women's rights. She published her autobiography, All in the Day's Work, in 1939.

Sources

Brady, Kathleen. Ida Tarbell: Portrait of a Muckraker. New York: Seaview/Putnam, 1984.

Kochersberger, Robert C., ed. More Than a Muckraker: Ida Tarbell's Lifetime in Journalism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1994.

Tarkington, Booth (1869–1946) novelist, short-story writer

Fashion becomes a mob contagion, but at first when the mob is small, we quicker parrots who hop into it feel ourselves to be brilliantly superior, speaking a language that is code to the vulgar. When in time, the mob grows enormous, we remove ourselves from it, call it rabble, despise its taste, and cackle of a new fashion, which may be an old, old one that we exclusives unwittingly revived.

—quoted in Keith J. Fennimore, Booth Tarkington (1974)

A leading writer of the Midwest and closely associated with his native state, Newton Booth Tarkington after being educated at Purdue and Princeton scored his first success with The Gentleman from Indiana (1899), which extolled the virtues of a country editor fighting political corruption. After several abortive attempts at writing plays and a commercial triumph as a popular romance novelist with Monsieur Beaucaire (1900), Tarkington found his two principal strengths: heavily plotted social novels involving Midwestern families whose fortunes were based on industry, and comical stories about adolescents in such works as PENROD (1914) and its sequels, and Seventeen (1916).

Three accounts of the rise and fall of industrial empires form the trilogy he called Growth. Between the first of these, The Turmoil (1914) and the third, The Midlander (1923), came The Magnificent Ambersons (1918), Tarkington's strongest, most ambivalent novel, which traces the decline of a once wealthy Midwestern family and its supplanting by, and romantic reconciliation with, a new order. This novel, like Alice Adams (1923), the story of a lower-class woman who aspires to marriage with wealth but whose dreams are not realized, won a PULITZER PRIZE.

A prolific, successful commercial writer whose sensibility was formed by William Dean Howells's genteel realism of the 1890s, Tarkington never embraced the more-radical thoughts or literary manner of the modernist period. He wrote many short stories and plays as well as more than thirty novels. His best work is evenly paced, seamlessly assembled, and truly felt—faithful to surface if not searchingly profound. But his earlier romantic stories and some later novels are marred by sentimentality and by contrived endings: Tarkington wrote sometimes with his audience too firmly in mind. His humorous tales of young people skirt these defects, although the scope of those stories is smaller.

Although Tarkington was regarded as a major novelist in the 1920s, his mostly approving attitude toward business was out of step with that iconoclastic decade. This unfashionableness was reinforced by his stories of juveniles, which made Tarkington seem a less serious writer than his contemporaries and than he often was. He nevertheless maintained a large popular following and commanded a respected position as a man of letters until his death.

Sources

Fennimore, Keith J. Booth Tarkington. New York: Twayne, 1974.
Russo, Dorothy Ritter, and Thelma L. Sullivan. A Bibliography of Booth Tarkington, 1869–1946. Indianapolis: Indiana Historical Society, 1949.

Woodress, James W. Booth Tarkington: The Man from Indiana. New York: Lippincott, 1955.

—Roger Lathbury

Tate, Allen (1899–1979) poet, critic

The Southern-bred Allen Tate was a student of John Crowe RANSOM at Vanderbilt University. He was a member of THE FUGITIVES and an editor of the magazine of modern poetry the group published (see MODERNISM). Although a modernist in literary temperament, Tate was also known as one of the Nashville AGRARIANS, a group of writers who looked to the pre-industrial South for their model of a society. He was hostile to Northern, urban civilization, although he maintained close personal contacts with Northern poets such as Robert Lowell and with NEW YORK INTELLECTUALS such as Philip RAHV, one of the editors of PARTISAN REVIEW. He was married to the Southern novelist Caroline GORDON for more than thirty years (1924–1959).

In the 1920s, as he was still finding his voice as a poet, Tate published two well-received biographies, Stonewall Jackson (1928) and Jefferson Davis (1929). In the next decade he published his first full-length poetry collections, Poems: 1928–1931 (1932), The Mediterranean and Other Poems (1936), and Selected Poems (1937), which include such poems as “Ode to the Confederate Dead,” “The Mediterranean,” and “Aeneas at Washington.” Tate's only novel, The Fathers, a probing psychological study of the Civil War, was published in 1938.

Tate's writing about poetry influenced the New Critics (see NEW CRITICISM), and he was able to put his literary tastes into practice by editing Hound and Horn (1931–1934) and SEWANEE REVIEW (1944–1946). His critical essays were collected in Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas (1936), Reason in Madness: Critical Essays (1941), On the Limits of Poetry: Selected Essays, 1928–1948 (1948), and The Man of Letters in the Modern World (1955). Tate received the Bollingen Prize for Poetry in 1956. His Collected Poems, 1919–1976 (1977) included important later poems: “The Maimed Man,” “The Buried Lake,” and “The Swimmers.”

Sources

Bishop, Ferman. Allen Tate. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Underwood, Thomas A. Allen Tate: Orphan of the South. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000.

Teasdale, Sara (1884–1933) poet

Born in St. Louis to affluent parents, Sara Teasdale was the first widely popular woman poet of the twentieth century. Her early verse was romantic and whimsical and praised for its musical lyric style. Her first widely read volume was Helen of Troy and Other Poems (1911). Her poems often appeared in Harriet MONROE'S POETRY and other leading journals. Her volume Love Songs (1917) won the Columbia University Poetry Society Prize (later the PULITZER PRIZE) and the Poetry Society of America Prize. After being romantically linked with poet Vachel LINDSAY, Teasdale married a businessman in 1914 but lived apart from him; they divorced in 1929. During this marriage her verse became dark and pessimistic with Flame and Shadow (1920) and Dark of the Moon (1926). Teasdale's lifelong bouts with depression grew more severe. Lindsay took his life in late 1931; Teasdale did the same in 1933.

Sources

Drake, William. Sara Teasdale: Woman & Poet. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979.

Schoen, Carol B. Sara Teasdale. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

—David G. Izzo

Tender Is the Night by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1934) novel

Tender Is the Night was F. Scott FITZGERALD'S fourth novel, published nine years after THE GREAT GATSBY. His most mature and complex work, it has not achieved the readership and reputation of The Great Gatsby because it makes greater demands on readers. The novel traces the decline of brilliant psychiatrist Richard Diver: his name is meaningful. Tender Is the Night examines the destructive effects of wealth, charm, and self-indulgence on character. Fitzgerald took the title from John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale," which expresses a sense of disenchantment and loss. The novel's principal settings are the French Riviera and Switzerland from 1917 to 1929, and the characters are affluent Americans.

Tender Is the Night had a disappointing critical and sales reception but has steadily gained stature as Fitzgerald's most deeply felt novel. The standard explanation is that when it was published during the GREAT DEPRESSION, reviewers and readers who required uplifting social messages, noble characters, and class struggle in fiction were offended by Fitzgerald's use of 1920s material and wealthy characters. Many critics complained that there was no clear cause for Diver's deterioration—missing the point that he is ruined by a combination of causes. Moreover, some readers were put off by the flashback structure that Fitzgerald provided to trace Dick Diver's destruction.

The first section of the novel covers several weeks in 1925 and introduces Dr. Richard Diver and his beautiful wife, Nicole Warren Diver, who live in luxury on the Riviera. Diver is a nonpracticing thirty-six-year-old psychiatrist who is writing a medical book. The Divers' guests include Abe North, an alcoholic American composer based on the humorist Ring LARDNER; Tommy Barban, a soldier of fortune who is in love with Nicole; and Rosemary Hoyt, an eighteen-year-old movie star based on actress Lois Moran. Much of the first section is seen through Rosemary's eyes, but she is not the narrator. The novel is written in Fitzgerald's third-person authorial voice. Though the Divers seem to have attained a perfect life, it is revealed in the first section that Nicole is subject to episodes of derangement.

The second section of the novel begins in Switzerland in 1917 and establishes Diver's professional credentials. In 1919 he marries Nicole Warren, a very rich eighteen-year-old mental patient. Although Diver believes that her money will not interfere with his career, their lifestyle spoils him. He becomes a partner in a Swiss sanitarium financed by Nicole's money, but he drinks too much and loses his professional discipline. He seduces Rosemary in Rome in 1928 and is arrested there after a drunken brawl.

The third section of the novel is set mainly on the Riviera during the summer of 1929 after Dick Diver has stopped working and his alcohol consumption has increased. Nicole enters an affair with Barban; Dick realizes that she no longer needs him as doctor or husband and agrees to a divorce: "The case was finished. Doctor Diver was at liberty." He returns to America and attempts to practice medicine but disappears into failure in Upstate New York: "in any case he is almost certainly in that section of the country, in one town or another."

The disappointing reception of Tender Is the Night worried Fitzgerald for the rest of his life. When he died in 1940, he left a copy of the novel with the chapters reorganized in straight chronological order, with his note: "This is the final version of the book as I would like it." His revised text was edited by Malcolm Cowley in 1951 but made no strong impression—except to confirm that the 1934 flashback structure was more effective.

Sources

Brucoli, Matthew J. with Judith S. Baughman. Reader's Companion to F. Scott Fitzgerald's Tender Is the Night. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.

Brucoli and George Parker Anderson, eds. F. Scott Fitzgerald's Tender Is the Night: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 273. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2003.

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. Tender Is the Night, "With the Author's Final Revisions," edited by Malcolm Cowley. New York: Scribners, 1951.

Fitzgerald. Tender Is the Night: A Romance, text established by Matthew J. Bruccoli. London: J. M. Dent, 1996.

LaHood, Marvin J., ed. Tender Is the Night: Essays in Criticism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1969.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

"That Evening Sun" by William Faulkner (1931) short story

One of William FAULKNER's earliest and most potent explorations of racism and its debilitating effects on whites and blacks in the early-twentieth-century South, "That Evening Sun" focuses on three Compson children—Quentin, the eldest; his sister, Caddy; and Jason, the youngest—and their interactions with Nancy, a black woman who serves as the Compsons' cook when their regular servant, Dilsey, is sick. The story captures the children's naiveté about Nancy's burdens, which include her work as a prostitute and the physical and mental abuse she suffers from her husband, Jesus. When Nancy becomes pregnant by a white Baptist deacon who refuses to pay her, she attacks him and is beaten and jailed; while in jail, she attempts suicide, for which she is again beaten. Later, her husband disappears, and she fears—irrationally, perhaps—that he will return to kill her. The final scenes are fraught with extreme tension as Nancy attempts to use the children as a shield to protect her from Jesus's threat. When Mr. Compson comes to her cabin to take his children home, she becomes resigned to her fate, despite his reassurances that she has nothing to fear. Nancy's plight passes awareness of race and racism to the children. Originally published as "That Evening Sun Go Down" in THE AMERICAN MERCURY, the story was revised by Faulkner and included in his collection These Thirteen (1931).

Sources

Jones, Diane Brown. A Reader's Guide to the Short Stories of William Faulkner. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994.

Skei, Hans H. Reading Faulkner's Best Short Stories. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Volpe, Edmund L. A Reader's Guide to William Faulkner: The Short Stories. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2004.

—John B. Padgett

Theatre Arts (1916–1948) periodical

Founded in Detroit at the Arts and Crafts Theatre by Sheldon Chaney, Theatre Arts moved to New York in 1924 under the editorship of Edith J. R. Isaacs. The magazine was dedicated to the development of "the creative impulse in the American theatre" and promoted a theater for the artist rather than for the commercial interests of the speculator. Isaacs enlarged the magazine to include reviews of the English theater and articles on developments in Europe as well as on theater in education and in the community. The slogan of the magazine was "A record and a prophecy."

Source

Gilder, Rosamond, and others. Theatre Arts Anthology. New York: Theatre Arts Books, 1950.

The Theatre Guild (1919– )

Founded in 1919 by former members of the Washington Square Players, the Theatre Guild produced artistically significant European and American plays on Broadway during much of the twentieth century. The company sold subscriptions and took productions on national and international tours. The Guild is particularly known for premiering dramas by George Bernard Shaw and Eugene O'NEILL and for staging the musical plays Porgy and Bess and OKLAHOMA! Guild productions often featured skilled actors, including Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne, and the organization gave early support to the GROUP THEATRE. The Theatre Guild was initially managed by a six-member board and later by founder Lawrence Langner and executive director Theresa Helburn. During its heyday, the Theatre Guild was considered the most important theatrical producer in America.

Source

Langner, Lawrence. The Magic Curtain: The Story of a Life in Two Fields, Theatre and Invention. New York: Dutton, 1951.

—Claudia Wilsch Case

The Theory of the Leisure Class by Thorstein Veblen (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1899) treatise

Subtitled "An Economic Study of the Evolution of Institutions," Thorstein VEBLEN's early examination of the concept of status in America proved to be immediately popular, making its author, an economics and social-sciences professor at the University of Chicago, an unlikely celebrity. The book also proved influential in the field of economics.

Veblen theorized that turn-of-the-century social structures were remnants of feudal times, "atavistic cultural survivals" that perpetuated social classes that arose in conjunction with the institution of ownership. While the lower classes struggle at industrial pursuits in order to support the whole of society, the aristocratic leisure class occupies itself with "conspicuous leisure and conspicuous consumption." This consumption itself determines who will be admitted to the leisure class, so that, in Veblen's view, waste—that is, any activity not contributing to material productivity—begets waste. The lack of balance in American society's social structure was, he argued, inherently regressive.

Veblen was reacting to the society he saw around him, the aftermath of the gilded age, in which industrial robber barons seemed to govern an economy to which the government had adopted a laissez faire attitude. The Theory of the Leisure Class profoundly affected the views of ordinary citizens—as well as politicians—about the structure of American society and almost certainly contributed to the trustbusting, labor organizing, and other progressive reforms that arose in the new century. Academics objected to his methods, and such defenders of cultural and aristocratic values as H. L. MENCKEN derided Veblen's lack of discrimination.

Sources

Diggins, John P. The Bard of Savagery: Thorstein Veblen and Modern Social Theory. New York: Seabury Press, 1978.

Jorgensen, Elizabeth Watkins, and Henry Irvin Jorgensen. Thorstein Veblen: Victorian Firebrand. Armonk, N.Y.: Sharpe, 1999.

They Knew What They Wanted (produced 1924) play

Sidney HOWARD's PULITZER PRIZE-winning three-act comedy-drama They Knew What They Wanted was produced by the THEATRE GUILD at the Garrick Theatre, where it opened on November 24, 1924, for 192 performances. Set in California's Napa Valley, the play departs from conventional morality in its exploration of a romantic triangle that develops after an aging Italian winegrower, Tony, proposes marriage by mail to a San Francisco waitress, Amy. To woo her, Tony had sent a photograph of a handsome farmhand, Joe, fearing that Amy would not find him attractive. Although Amy falls into an affair with Joe and becomes pregnant with his baby, the tensions are pragmatically resolved when Tony forgives her and offers to adopt the child.

—James Fisher

This Side of Paradise by F. Scott Fitzgerald (New York: Scribners, 1920) novel

F. Scott FITZGERALD's first novel was a surprise best-seller that treated the concerns of Princeton undergraduates and young women seriously. It has been credited with inspiring the burst of American collegiate fiction in the 1920s. The novel was regarded as daring because it announced the existence of a generation with new values; but it is tame by later standards of conduct. Fitzgerald's independent young women were fresh figures in American fiction. The hero, Amory Blaine, is "a romantic egoist" committed to fulfilling his aspirations.

Source

Fitzgerald, F. Scott. This Side of Paradise, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli. New York: Signet, 2006.

—Matthew J. Bruccoli

Thompson, Dorothy (1893–1961) reporter, newspaper columnist

A graduate of Syracuse University, Dorothy Thompson began her career working as a publicist for the women's suffrage movement before turning to freelance journalism. In the 1920s she became the first woman to head a major American news bureau overseas when she was named chief of the Berlin bureau for the Philadelphia Public Ledger. After her marriage to Sinclair LEWIS in 1928, she returned to freelance work, writing for such magazines as THE SATURDAY EVENING POST and Cosmopolitan, for which she interviewed Adolf Hitler. Although Thompson originally underestimated Hitler as a man of "startling insignificance" in her book I Saw Hitler (1932), she later became nationally known as an ardent critic of the German leader and called for American intervention against the fascist threat. In the later half of the 1930s she wrote articles on fascism for Foreign Affairs and was a regular radio commentator as well as a columnist for New York Herald Tribune and Ladies' Home Journal. Her books included Dorothy Thompson's Political Guide: A Study of American Liberalism and Its Relationship to Modern Totalitarian States (1938), Refugees: Anarchy or Organization? (1938), and Let the Record Speak (1939). She remained an influential political commentator into the 1950s.

Source

Kurth, Peter. American Cassandra: The Life of Dorothy Thompson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1990.

—Tilly Newell

Three Lives by Gertrude Stein (New York: The Grafton Press, 1909) fiction

Three Lives was Gertrude STEIN's first published text, and, as its subtitle indicates, is comprised of "Stories of The Good Anna, Melanctha and The Gentle Lena." All three stories focus on marginalized protagonists, ethnic-American women of lower socio-economic class, and relate tales of unhappy personal and sexual relationships followed by untimely deaths. The most developed of these, "Melanctha," is a bildungsroman focusing on a bisexual and biracial woman caught between conflicting identity categories: "Melanctha had not found it easy with herself to make her wants and what she had, agree. Melanctha Herbert was always losing what she had in wanting all the things she saw." Although Three Lives uses some techniques of literary realism, it also exemplifies early modernist experimentation (see MODERNISM) by featuring repetitions, deployments of sound as well as sense, and nontraditional narrative structures.

The book has proven more popular and readily understandable than most of Stein's experimental, avant-garde and nonnarrative texts that followed it. When Stein returned to narrative twenty-four years later in THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ALICE B. TOKLAS (1933), she declared that "Melanctha" was “the first definite step away from the nineteenth century and into the twentieth century in literature,” an assessment endorsed by many contemporary critics.

Source

Walker, Jayne L. The Making of a Modernist: Gertrude Stein from “Three Lives” to “Tender Buttons.” Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1984.

—Jessica G. Rabin

Three Soldiers by John Dos Passos (New York:

Doran, 1921) novel

Three Soldiers is a frank portrayal of army recruits during WORLD WAR I. It was written as a Marxist-inspired indictment of the social machinery that denies individual freedom and smothers the human spirit; as bitter social satire that records the way people during World War I spoke and acted and thought; and as an early modernist experiment that paved the way for John Dos Passos’s masterpieces, MANHATTAN TRANSFER (1925) and the USA trilogy (1938).

The novel was published after Dos Passos had seen action during World War I in the Norton-Harjes Volunteer Ambulance Corps and the American Red Cross (which absorbed the Norton-Harjes corps) and had served in the United States Army during the last months of the war and during demobilization. Three Soldiers is his first mature novel, and he worked on it for four years before he completed it. It is, as the title suggests, a novel from the perspective of three different soldiers, but, especially in the last half, it focuses on the artistic sensibilities of one man in particular who is crushed by the American military machine. Three Soldiers stands as an important work that, in the words of Dos Passos biographer Townsend Ludington, “marks a significant moment in America’s coming of age through its literature.”

Source

Clark, Michael. Dos Passos’s Early Fiction: 1912-1938. Selinsgrove, Pa.: Susquehanna University Press, 1987.

—Richard Layman

Thurber, James (1894–1961) short-story writer, essayist, cartoonist

In anything funny you write that isn’t close to serious you’ve missed something along the line.

—Interview, Paris Review (Fall 1955)

James Thurber, second son of an ineffectual father and a strong but eccentric mother, was born, raised, and educated in Columbus, Ohio. He attended Ohio State University but left in 1918 without a degree. Between 1918 and 1927 he worked as a journalist for the Columbus Dispatch and for the Paris and Riviera editions of the Chicago Tribune. During this period he married Althea Adams, who became, with Thurber’s mother, a prototype for his domineering female characters.

In 1927 Thurber was hired as a full-time staff member at THE NEW YORKER, founded by Harold Ross in 1925. Writer E. B. WHITE, his office mate, encouraged Thurber to develop the clear, precise, conversational writing style for which both he and The New Yorker became known. White also admired Thurber’s whimsical cartoons, which began appearing regularly in the magazine. Thurber wrote 365 signed “casuals” (short prose pieces) and many other items for The New Yorker. Following his divorce from Althea Thurber and his marriage to Helen Wismer, a former magazine editor, Thurber left his New Yorker staff position in 1936, but he continued as a regular contributor to the magazine. His second marriage and his later writing career survived his alcoholism and his severe psychological and physical afflictions—including encroaching blindness. His final words were reported to be “God bless . . . God damn.”

Thurber’s first book was a parody of the psychosexual manuals popular in the 1920s. Co-authored with White and illustrated by Thurber’s drawings, Is Sex Necessary? Or, Why You Feel the Way You Do (1929) sold well. It was followed by The Owl in the Attic and Other Perplexities (1931), which introduced Thurber’s theme of the “little man” exploited by terrifying women, by malevolent machines, by the anarchy of everyday life. The Seal in the Bedroom and Other Predicaments (1932), Thurber’s first cartoon collection, drew its title from one of his most famous drawings: a seal on the headboard of a bed has awakened a man and his wife, and she irritably exclaims: “All Right, Have It Your Way—You Heard a Seal Bark!” My Life and Hard Times (1933), which provides sketches based on Thurber’s Columbus childhood, is filled with eccentrics confronting chaos in the form of collapsing beds, breaking dams, intrusive ghosts, and biting dogs. Thurber later described his subject as “Reality twisted to the right into humor rather than to the left into tragedy.” Many other collections of stories, sketches, and cartoons followed, among them My World—and Welcome to It (1942), which included a classic story, “THE SECRET LIFE OF WALTER MITTY.” Thurber collaborated with Elliott Nugent on “The Male Animal,” a comic play dealing with free-speech issues, which ran for 244 performances on Broadway in 1940. Twenty years later Thurber performed in a revue based on his works, A Thurber Carnival (produced 1960). In addition, beginning in the late 1930s, he published fables, parodies, and romances for children and adults. His reminiscences of the founder and staff of The New Yorker were published in 1959 as The Years with Ross.

Thurber enjoyed high regard from his “serious” contemporaries. Ernest HEMINGWAY, for example, called his work “the best writing coming out of America.” Thurber’s stories continue to be read and studied because his subjects and themes are enduring and his style casual yet allusive, witty, ironic, and carefully controlled: "As brevity is the soul of wit, form, it seems to me, is the heart of humor and the salvation of comedy," he wrote in a 1960 essay.

Sources

Bowden, Edwin T. James Thurber: A Bibliography. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1969.

Kinney, Harrison. James Thurber: His Life and Times. New York: Holt, 1995.

Kinney and Rosemary A. Thurber, eds. The Thurber Letters: The Wit, Wisdom, and Surprising Life of James Thurber. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2002.

Toombs, Sarah Eleanora. James Thurber: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism. New York: Garland, 1987.

—Judith S. Baughman

Thurman, Wallace (1902–1934) novelist, playwright, editor

Born in Salt Lake City, Wallace Henry Thurman attended the University of Utah and the University of Southern California. Inspired by the literary ferment in New York City later known as the HARLEM RENAISSANCE, Thurman moved to the metropolis in 1925 and began writing essays, novels, and plays. He later became one of the first African Americans to serve as editor in chief for a major publishing house, Macaulay Publishing Company.

Thurman's first novel, The Blacker the Berry: A Novel of Negro Life (1929), is the story of a young girl with a "black complexion" who travels from Idaho to Harlem to escape the prejudices she faces in her own African American community. His play Harlem: A Melodrama of Negro Life in Harlem (produced 1929), cowritten with William Jourdan Rapp, centers on a family that moves from the South to New York City during the "great migration." His second novel, Infants of the Spring (1932), features characters based on Harlem Renaissance writers and provides a critical analysis of the aesthetic and political trends that Thurman felt governed the movement. His third and final novel, The Interne (1932), cowritten with Abraham L. Furman, is a tale of bureaucracy, corruption, and disillusionment in a public hospital.

Thurman died of tuberculosis in New York's City Hospital on Welfare Island. In one of his final letters, written to Langston HUGHES, Thurman asked "whodathought when I was in Carmel, that I would soon end up in the tubercular ward of the very hospital I damned and God-damned when I wrote The Interne. Ironic, I calls it. Or is nature finally avenging art?" Thurman was respected among his colleagues as an editor, playwright, and critic, but his novels received an almost unanimously negative response during his lifetime. The Blacker the Berry is now regarded as a groundbreaking novel for its provocative examination of intraracial prejudices.

Sources

Singh, Amritjit, and Daniel M. Scott III, eds. The Collected Writings of Wallace Thurman: A Harlem Renaissance Reader. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2003.

Van Notten, Eleonore. Wallace Thurman's Harlem Renaissance. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994.

—Darien Cavanaugh

The Time of Your Life by William Saroyan (produced 1939) play

The Time of Your Life, a humanistic three-act drama by William SAROYAN, opened on October 25, 1939, in a THEATRE GUILD production that ran for 185 performances. Saroyan became the first playwright to win both the New York Drama Critics Circle Award and a PULITZER PRIZE for the same play, but he controversially rejected the Pulitzer. The Time of Your Life has endured as a masterpiece of 1930s American drama and has been frequently revived by both professional and amateur companies.

The Time of Your Life is more a philosophical reflection on the eternal struggles of existence than a realistic drama of conflict. At its center is Joe, a well-dressed, generous man who indulges his own eccentricities and those of the people around him in Nick's, a rundown San Francisco saloon. The various patrons—including Harry, a struggling dancer; Tom, Joe's good-natured assistant; and Kitty Duval, a sensitive, unhappy prostitute—reflect on life as Joe observes their individual struggles to realize their dreams and to battle their fears and imperfect natures. When Willie, a pinball player, wins the jackpot, Joe philosophizes on the vagaries of existence: "In the time of your life, live, so that in that good time there shall be no ugliness or death for yourself or for any life your life touches." Saroyan makes certain that Joe's philosophy prevails over the example of Blick, a sadistic cop who viciously terrorizes the bar's habitués.

Lacking the linear plotting of a typical realistic drama, the play includes nonrealistic elements, such as the appearance of Nick's angelic teenaged daughter, who may or may not be living, and the mysterious Mary L., an elusive figure who fascinates Joe. What is true or false in the lives of his characters seems less important to Saroyan than the expression of their variant perspectives on life's meaning.

—James Fisher

Tobacco Road by Erskine Caldwell (New York: Scribners, 1932) novel

Even before it was adapted into a Broadway play, Erskine CALDWELL's Tobacco Road created a sensation. Combining realism and black humor, the novel focuses on a family in rural Georgia that has become hopelessly impoverished, physically spent, emotionally stunted, and torpid beyond their ravenous hunger and lust. Although his grandfather was a prosperous tobacco farmer, Jeeter Lester, the present head of the family, grew into manhood as a sharecropper on the land his family once owned—what has become a played-out cotton farm abandoned by its owner. His life is a shifting set of plans that he never finds the energy to implement. He tries to gain some material advantage by marrying off his daughters and sons, but nothing works out. When Jeeter follows the foolish agricultural tradition of burning the broom sedge off the fields, his ramshackle house catches fire, and he and his ailing wife burn to death in their bed.

Source

Miller, Dan B. Erskine Caldwell: The Journey from Tobacco Road: A Biography. New York: Knopf, 1995.

—Martin Kich

Toklas, Alice B. (1877–1967) memorist

Alice Babette Toklas grew up in San Francisco. She went abroad in 1907 and met Gertrude STEIN on her first day in Paris. By 1912 Toklas had become the writer's "wife." She also served as amanuensis and audience for Stein, who did not reach a wide readership until the 1930s. Only when Stein assumed the fictitious persona of Toklas in The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933) did she win a general audience. Several years after Stein's death Toklas composed her own memoir, What Is Remembered (1963). Toklas also authored two cookbooks.

Source

Souhami, Diana. Gertrude and Alice. New York: Pandora Press, 1991.

—Noel Sloboda

Tolson, Melvin B. (1898–1966) poet

Melvin Beaunorus Tolson graduated from Lincoln University and in 1924 began his academic career in Texas at Wiley College, where he organized and coached the school's successful debating team; in 1947 he left the college for Langston University, from which he retired. In the early 1930s Tolson attended Columbia University and wrote a thesis on the writers of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Inspired by Edgar Lee MASTERS's idea that a community could be portrayed through dramatic portraits of its citizens, Tolson began to write poems that were later collected in A Gallery of Harlem Portraits (1979). During the latter half of the 1930s and early 1940s he wrote a weekly newspaper column, later collected in Caviar and Cabbage: Selected Columns by Melvin B. Tolson from the Washington Tribune, 1937–1944 (1982). Tolson's first book to be published was Rendezvous with America (1944), which led reviewers to compare him with other African American poets such as Sterling BROWN, Countee CULLEN, and Langston HUGHES.

In 1953 he published Libretto from the Republic of Liberia (1953), a poem commissioned by the Liberian president for his country's centennial, which marked a change in Tolson's approach and was praised for its MODERNISM. The last collection Tolson published was Harlem Gallery: Book I, The Curator (1965), the first of what he planned to be a five-book epic poem on the African American experience in the United States.

Sources

Berube, Michael. Marginal Forces/Cultural Centers: Tolson, Pynchon, and the Politics of the Canon. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1992.

Farnsworth, Robert M. Melvin B. Tolson, 1898–1966: Plain Talk and Poetic Prophecy. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1984.

Flasch, Joy. Melvin B. Tolson. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Toomer, Jean (1894–1967), poet, short-story writer, fiction writer, philosopher

Talk about it only enough to do it. Dream about it only enough to feel it. Think about it only enough to understand it. Contemplate it only enough to be it.

—Essentials: Definitions and Aphorisms (1931)

The only child of Nathan Toomer, a planter, and Nina Pinchback, Nathan Eugene Toomer, who chose to be called "Jean," was raised in Washington, D.C. His grandfather was Pinckney Benton Stewart Pinchback, who had served as the acting governor of Louisiana during Reconstruction, the first United States governor of African American descent. Attending all-white schools as a child and all-black schools from middle school through high school, Toomer, like his parents, could pass as white. He attended several colleges but failed to earn a degree. Nevertheless, he read widely and met many young writers while living in New York, including Waldo FRANK, who encouraged BONI & LIVERIGHT to publish Toomer's first book. In summer 1921 Toomer served as principal of a small, rural all-black school near Sparta, Georgia, where he learned about the South, black folk culture, and the hardships blacks endured. He responded to this experience by writing poems, short stories, and a drama that became his tour de force, Cane (1923), a work that earned him a place in literary history.

Cane is now seen as one of the most influential works of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE and also a work of the LOST GENERATION. The title, derived from the labor-intensive process by which sugar cane is made into syrup, captures the African American plight at the beginning of the twentieth century: a world of racism, oppression, and lynching where blacks are losing their connection with their ancestral past. Although Toomer did not conceive of it as such, the work is most often characterized as an experimental, modernist novel (see MODERNISM). The work is actually a montage of impressionistic poetry, prose, and drama divided into three sections. The first section, set in rural Georgia, focuses on stories about black Southern women who defy social conventions. The second section, set in Washington, D.C., and Chicago, portrays the disconnection between blacks and their cultural past. The third section, "Kabnis," written as a drama set in the rural South, depicts Ralph Kabnis, an educated black artist from the North who takes a job as a schoolteacher. While Kabnis seeks meaning in black folk culture, which he believes institutionalized education and religion eradicate, he ultimately finds no meaningful connection with his slave heritage. Although it describes the waning of African American folk culture, Cane helped spur interest in that culture during the Harlem Renaissance and later during the Black Arts Movement of the 1970s.

In 1924, after Toomer discovered and became devoted to the mystic teaching of George Gurdjieff, he broke his ties with the literary world. He continued to write, but most of his work, drastically differing in style from Cane, was rejected by publishers. He privately published a book of aphorisms called Essentials in 1931. The following year Toomer married novelist Margery Latimer, who died giving birth to their daughter less than a year later. In 1934 he married Marjorie Content, daughter of a Wall Street banker, and the couple moved to a farm in Doylestown, Pennsylvania, where they remained until Toomer's death. In 1936 Toomer's epic poem "Blue Meridian," some thousand lines long, was published in The New Caravan. In it Toomer argues for "a new America," one in which racial differences are dissolved and a new race of spiritually conscious people evolve. In 1940 Toomer became a Quaker and joined the Society of Friends, after which he spent ten years dedicating his life to the society before retreating from public life.

Jean Toomer's works, especially Cane, continue to receive critical attention, and, despite his insistence on his multiracial identity, Toomer is known for the way his works express the African American experience. As Darwin Turner concludes in the "Introduction" to the 1975 edition of Toomer's masterwork: "Cane was not Jean Toomer's total life; it was perhaps merely an interlude in his search for understanding. No matter what it may have been for him, Cane still sings to readers, not the swan song of an era that was dying, but the morning hymn of a Renaissance that was beginning."

Sources

- Kerman, Cynthia and Richard Eldrige. The Lives of Jean Toomer: A Hunger for Wholeness. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- McKay, Nellie Y. Jean Toomer, Artist: A Study of His Literary Life and Work, 1894–1936. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.

O'Daniel, Therman B., ed. Jean Toomer: A Critical Evaluation. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1988.

Toomer, Jean. Cane: An Authoritative Text, Backgrounds, Criticism. Edited by Darwin T. Turner. New York: Norton, 1988.

—Blake Hobby

Torrence, Ridgely (1875–1950) poet, dramatist

Ridgely Torrence's first book was The House of a Hundred Lights: A Psalm of Experience after Reading a Couplet of Bidpai (1900), a long poem inspired by Edward FitzGerald's translation of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. He then turned to writing plays and was one of the first white dramatists to write seriously about black characters. His Granny Maumee, The Rider of Dreams, Simon the Cyrenian, subtitled "Plays for a Negro Theater," were produced and published in 1917. He was poetry editor of THE NEW REPUBLIC from 1920 to 1933, during which he published his second book of poetry, Hesperides (1925). He later collected his best poetry in Poems (1941). Torrence was a friend of Edwin Arlington ROBINSON, whose correspondence he edited as Selected Letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson (1940).

Source

Clum, John M. Ridgely Torrence. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Tortilla Flat by John Steinbeck (New York:

Covici-Friede, 1935) novel

John STEINBECK based Tortilla Flat, his first best-seller, on his interaction with a variety of locals in the town of Monterey, California. The novel is centered on Danny, a mule skinner in Texas during WORLD WAR I, who, on his return to Tortilla Flat (a district above the town of Monterey) finds himself suddenly heir to two small houses. His stroke of good fortune makes him the center of a group of oddball paisanos (natives of Mexican and Indian descent), all of whom are only interested in what they consider the basic joys of life: wine, women, and food. With an episodic structure and an intended parallel to Arthurian legend, the novel comically depicts the lives of this ragtag society and comments on its conflicting value systems. Led by the protagonist, the group discovers the difficulties posed by possessions and property, eventually moving from cohesion to disintegration.

Sources

- Owens, Louis. John Steinbeck's Re-Vision of America. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985.
- Lisca, Peter. The Wide World of John Steinbeck. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1958.

—Michael J. Meyer

Traven, B. (1882?– 1969) novelist

Little is certainly known about the life of this author, whose books were first published in Germany but who always claimed he was an American and generally set his works in Mexico and the United States. His manuscripts at first were mailed from Mexico to Germany, where eleven of his books were published from 1926 to 1933, establishing the mysterious author's popularity in Europe. His work did not begin to appear in the United States until 1934, when the author mailed an English version of the novel first published as Das Totenschiff (1926) to the American publisher Alfred A. Knopf as The Death Ship. In this first-person narrative, an American sailor, Gerald Gales, survives the sinking of a ship that is being destroyed for the insurance money. The same protagonist also appears in The Cotton Pickers, a 1926 novel that was translated from the German in 1956, in which he travels across Mexico working as cotton picker and other odd jobs, and in The Bridge in the Jungle (1938), an English version that Traven provided, in which he works as an alligator hunter and witnesses the death by drowning of a Mexican Indian boy. Traven's most famous novel is The Treasure of Sierre Madre (1935), the story of three Americans searching for a gold mine in the Mexican mountains. His short fiction has been collected in such volumes as Stories by the Man Nobody Knows (1961) and The Night Visitor (1973). Traven's work reveals an acute awareness of human flaws as well as strong radical sympathies and identification with the downtrodden.

Sources

Mezo, Richard E. A Study of B. Traven's Fiction: The Journey to Solipaz. San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1993.

Zogbaum, Heidi. B. Traven: A Vision of Mexico. Wilmington, Del.: SR Books, 1992.

Trilling, Lionel (1905–1975) literary critic, short-story writer, novelist

A graduate of Columbia University, Lionel Trilling became one of the first Jews to earn tenure at his alma mater. He then became one of the university's most prominent teachers in its Great Works of Literature program. Trilling's first book, Matthew Arnold (1939), an intellectual biography of the English poet and critic, established Trilling's credentials as a sensitive interpreter of writers' careers. His second book was another biography, E. M. Forster (1943). Trilling did not concentrate on a writer's work alone but also considered the writer's psychology, social background, and political beliefs.

The Middle of the Journey (1947), Trilling's only novel, is a thinly disguised account of Whittaker Chambers and of the post-WORLD WAR II cold war world of anti-Communism, in which Chambers won fame for accusing Alger Hiss, a prominent former government official, of having been a Communist spy. Trilling knew Chambers and was able to write sympathetically about his friend's involvement in the Communist cause while at the same time revealing the duplicity of the Communist Party and its agents.

Trilling's signature work, The Liberal Imagination (1950), solidified his reputation as one of the leading critics of his generation. This collection of essays, ranging in subject matter from the fiction of Henry James and Theodore Dreiser to the psychology of Sigmund Freud, called for liberals to reevaluate their ideology. Trilling argued for a darker, more complex view of literature and society than he found in most liberal critiques of culture. A corrective to other liberal publications, Trilling's book was all the more powerful because it argued from within, not against, the liberal tradition.

Trilling has remained a touchstone figure in American criticism and has been the subject of continuing study. He often stood between warring factions, pointing out the flaws in all positions. His other books include The Opposing Self (1955), Freud and the Crisis of Our Culture (1955), and Sincerity and Authenticity (1972).

Sources

Rodden, John, ed. Lionel Trilling and the Critics: Opposing Selves. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Trilling, Diana. The Beginning of the Journey: The Marriage of Diana and Lionel Trilling. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1993.

The Triumph of the Egg by Sherwood Anderson
(New York: Huebsch, 1921) collection

This eclectic collection of fiction, essays, poetry, and photographs—subtitled “A Book of Impressions from American Life in Tales and Poems”—opens with a poem titled “The Dumb Man” that begins thus: “There is a story.—I cannot tell it.—I have no words.” Most of these works feature inarticulate people struggling to break through the invisible walls that surround them; for instance, “The Door of the Trap” concerns a man who sees himself as “a living thing inside a shell, trying to break out.” This image appears triumphantly in “The Egg,” a satirical story in which his father's failure teaches a young boy about human frailty and alienation.

—Bev Hogue

Tropic of Cancer by Henry Miller (Paris: Obelisk Press, 1934) novel

Henry MILLER's first novel, published when he was forty-four years old, Tropic of Cancer celebrates an expatriate American's quest for a fulfilling life. The novel is a fictionalized memoir of Miller's life in Paris, where he moved in 1930. Miller describes his vagabond life on the Left Bank and portrays himself as a prodigious sexual athlete, including sexual scenes so explicit that the book was considered pornographic. While it remained banned in the United States until its publication by Grove Press in 1961 was upheld, the novel was praised by many critics and authors. Edmund WILSON called Tropic of Cancer "the epitaph for the whole generation of American writers and artists that migrated to Paris after the war."

Trumbo, Dalton (1905–1976) screenwriter, novelist

Dalton Trumbo became involved in the political movements of the 1930s, seeking a better form of government than capitalism seemed to offer during the GREAT DEPRESSION. His most influential work is JOHNNY GOT HIS GUN (1939), a powerful antiwar novel about a soldier who has lost all of his limbs and is deaf and blind.

Trumbo was blacklisted in the 1950s when he became part of the Hollywood Ten, a group of screenwriters who refused to testify before Congress about their political affiliations, specifically whether they had been members of the Communist Party. During this period of ostracism, Trumbo wrote scripts under other names. As Robert Rich, he won an Oscar for best motion-picture story for The Brave One (1956), about a boy who saves his pet bull from the bullring. He was hired under his own name to write scripts for Exodus (1960) and Spartacus (1960) just as the blacklist was ending.

Sources

Cook, Bruce. Dalton Trumbo. New York: Scribner's, 1977.

Trumbo, Dalton. Additional Dialogue, Letters of Dalton Trumbo, 1942–62, edited by Helen Manfull. New York: Evans, 1970.

"The Turn of the Screw" by Henry James (1898)
short story

First published in Collier's Weekly and collected in the same year in The Two Magics: The Turn of the Screw, Covering

End (1898), this ghostly mystery by Henry James employs an unreliable narrator, a suggestible young woman who undertakes a position as governess for two young children at an isolated English country estate. She is more than half in love with her employer, the children's uncle, whom she meets just once in London. The uncle remains in the city and insists that she contact him no further. When the governess arrives at the estate, she finds her charges, Flora and Miles, to be attractive and precocious, and she is especially drawn to the boy. Soon, however, she discovers that she has rivals for the children's affections and that the rivals are both dead. She believes Flora and Miles to be under the evil influence of her predecessor, Miss Jessel, and Miss Jessel's dead lover, Peter Quint, who was once a valet at the estate. With only the simpleminded housekeeper—who does not see the ghosts—as her ally, the governess decides that she must wrest the not-so-innocent children from the malicious hold of Jessel and Quint. But in her struggle for what she convinces herself is the children's souls, she terrorizes Flora and kills Miles, who dies in her arms. While one school of criticism has taken "The Turn of the Screw" at face value, finding it a ghost story of the first order, another interprets James's tale in psychological terms, with Jessel and Quint as projections of the lovesick governess's imagination.

Sources

Beidler, Peter G. Ghosts, Demons, and Henry James: The Turn of the Screw at the Turn of the Century. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1989.

Cranfill, Thomas M., and Robert Lanier Clark. An Anatomy of The Turn of the Screw. New York: Gordian Press, 1971.

Willen, George, ed. A Casebook on Henry James's The Turn of the Screw. New York: Crowell, 1960.

Tan, Amy (1948– ) novelist

Amy Tan was born in Oakland, California, the daughter of Chinese immigrants. She grew up very conscious of her Asian appearance among her Caucasian schoolmates. Tan graduated from San Jose State University with a B.A. in 1973 and an M.A. in 1974, got married, and, after three years of postgraduate study at University of California, Berkeley, became a successful business writer. This work did not satisfy her, and she turned to fiction, producing her first novel, THE JOY LUCK CLUB (1989), and achieving virtually instant success as a major new voice in contemporary literature. The novel won the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD. The Joy Luck Club, the story of four Chinese mothers and their American-born daughters, explores generational conflicts that center on the degree to which mothers and daughters assimilate American culture. The social club fosters the solidarity of these women, even though they have different orientations toward their communities.

The Kitchen God's Wife (1991), Tan's second novel, continues her exploration of mother/daughter relationships. It concentrates on Winnie Louie and her daughter, Pearl, and shifts between a narrative of Winnie's earlier life in China and Pearl's estrangement from her mother, with which Pearl gradually comes to terms. The Hundred Secret Senses (1995) differs from Tan's first two novels in that it explores the ties and tensions between sisters. The novel is noteworthy for its creation of Kwan, a dynamic woman with a strong Chinese identity who comes into conflict with her American-born sister, Olivia. Although Olivia would like to jettison her family's Chinese past, Kwan stubbornly finds ways to make her sister confront her Chinese heritage.

The Bonesetter's Daughter (2001) is another generational saga. The novel is divided into three sections. The first, set in contemporary California, concerns Ruth Young, a Chinese American confronted with a failing marriage and a mother who is degenerating into dementia. The second section is Ruth's mother's memoir of life in China, and the third section returns to Ruth's present. The hallmarks of Tan's fiction—the role of memory and language in maintaining and restoring both a sense of the past and of human identity—are paramount in this fully realized novel. Saving Fish from Drowning (2005) is a novel about the disappearance of eleven American tourists among twelve who travel to the Himalayan foothills and encounter a dissonant reality.

Tan wrote the screenplay for the 1993 movie version of The Joy Luck Club. She has also written two children's books, The Moon Lady (1992) and The Chinese Siamese Cat (1994). The Opposite of Fate: A Book of Musings, her collection of autobiographical essays, was published in 2003.

Principal Books by Tan

The Joy Luck Club. New York: Putnam, 1989.
The Kitchen God's Wife. New York: Putnam, 1991.
The Moon Lady. New York: Macmillan, 1992.
The Chinese Siamese Cat. New York: Macmillan, 1994.
The Hundred Secret Senses. New York: Putnam, 1995.
The Bonesetter's Daughter. New York: Putnam, 2001.
The Opposite of Fate: A Book of Musings. New York: Putnam, 2003.

Saving Fish from Drowning. New York: Putnam, 2005.

Studying Amy Tan

Five novels into her career Amy Tan has established herself as the most respected Asian American writer. Students should begin at the beginning with her first novel, The Joy Luck Club (1989), and proceed through the canon, paying particular attention to The Kitchen God's Wife (1991) and Saving Fish from Drowning (2005).

Biographical sources are, as of 2007, limited to Tan's memoir, The Opposite of Fate: A Book of Musings (2003), and standard reference sources.

For a critical overview, students should start with Amy Tan, edited by Harold BLOOM (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003). Bela Adams's book by the same title (Manchester, U.K.: Manchester University Press, 2005) is a full-length study of Tan's novels up to The Bonesetter's Daughter (2001). Mary Ellen Snodgrass's Amy Tan: A Literary Companion (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004) covers much the same ground, with appended time lines, a chronology of Tan's life, and selected checklists of works about each novel. E. D. Huntley's Amy Tan: A Critical Companion (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998), covers only the first three novels, with chapters on Tan's life and on Asian American literature in general. Amy Tan's Joy Luck Club, edited by Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002), will serve students interested in critical articles about that novel. Because Tan attracts substantial attention from critics, students should also consult the Modern Language International Bibliography for recent studies.

Tartt, Donna (1964– ) novelist, essayist, critic

Born in Greenwood, Mississippi, Donna Tartt achieved celebrity less for her first novel, The Secret History (1992), than for the publicity surrounding the astounding $450,000 advance. Tartt conceived of the book while attending Bennington College in Vermont, where she met fellow novelist Bret Easton Ellis, who later helped her secure her publishing deal. The novel, a sort of high literary thriller, concerns a coven of unusually intelligent college students who stage a Bacchanalia, kill a local, and seek to cover up their crime. Ten years passed before Tartt produced another novel, The Little Friend (2002), an ambitious Southern fiction about a precocious adolescent who searches for the truth about her murdered brother.

—Marshall Boswell

Tate, James (1943– ) poet, short-story writer

James Tate was born in Kansas City, Missouri; he received his B.A. in 1965 from Kansas State College and his M.F.A. in 1967 from the University of Iowa, where he studied under Donald JUSTICE. Tate's talent was recognized early when his third book, The Lost Pilot (1967), won the Yale

Series of Younger Poets Award; he was the youngest ever to be so honored. Robert LOWELL liked his understated, casual style, laced with self-deprecating humor. Tate's sharp turns of phrase are evident in later collections such as The Oblivion Ha-Ha (1970), Absences (1972), Viper Jazz (1976), and Reckoner (1986). His Selected Poems (1992) won a Pulitzer Prize. Worshipful Company of Fletchers (1994) won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. His Memoir of the Hawk appeared in 2001. Dreams of a Robot Dancing Bee, Tate's first collection of short stories, was published in 2002. He has been a professor of poetry at the University of Massachusetts since 1971.

Taylor, Peter (1917–1994) short-story writer, novelist

My feelings are both that this region of the upper South is very much a part of me and that I am very much a part of it. . . .

—“Literature, Sewanee, and the World” (1972)

Peter Taylor was born in Trenton, Tennessee, and grew up in Nashville, St. Louis, and Memphis. He received a scholarship to study at Columbia University but declined it when his father refused to allow him to study writing. Taylor accepted a job as a newspaper reporter in Memphis and took classes at Southwestern University (now Rhodes College); his teacher was Allen TATE, who encouraged him to enroll at Vanderbilt University to study with John Crowe Ransom. Taylor matriculated at Vanderbilt in 1936, and he followed Ransom to Kenyon College in Ohio two years later.

Taylor published his first stories in the Kenyon Review and the Sewanee Review. Drafted into the army in 1941, he served through WORLD WAR II. Soon after his return to the United States he began teaching writing classes at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro, where he spent most of his career. He published his first collection, A Long Fourth and Other Stories, in 1948. Taylor generally avoided the Gothic violence prevalent in Southern fiction at the time. His second book, a novel titled A Woman of Means (1950), was critically panned, and Taylor didn't publish another novel until thirty-six years later, when his A Summons to Memphis (1986) won a Pulitzer Prize.

In the meantime, Taylor established himself as a major writer with the publication of six volumes of short stories and eleven plays. His early collections The Widows of Thornton (1954) and Tennessee Day in St. Louis (1957) proved successful, and Taylor went on to write the award-winning All Happy Families Are Alike: A Collection of Stories (1959), which significantly marked the beginning of his use of the first-person narrative. Taylor's later works included The Old Forest and Other Stories (1985) and Oracle at Stoneleigh Court (1993). His last novel, In the Tennessee Country, was published in 1994.

Sources

- Graham, Catherine Clark. Southern Accents: The Fiction of Peter Taylor. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.
- McAlexander, Hubert Hurton. Peter Taylor: A Writer's Life. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.
- Robinson, David M. World of Relations: The Achievement of Peter Taylor. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.
- Stephens, C. Ralph, and Lynda B. Salamon, eds., The Craft of Peter Taylor. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1995.

Ten North Frederick by John O'Hara (New York: Random House, 1955) novel

Ten North Frederick is John O'Hara's second novel set in Gibbstown, Pennsylvania—twenty-one years after Appointment in Samarra (1934). The central figure is Joseph Chapin, a well-born, successful lawyer who in middle age develops the ambition to become president of the United States. This failed attempt is followed by the breakdown of his marriage and the disappointing lives of his children. Chapin then drinks himself to death like a gentleman.

Source

- Brucoli, Matthew J., ed. John O'Hara: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 324. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2006.

Terkel, Studs (1912– ) social historian

I tape therefore I am.

—Interview (1997)

Born Louis Terkel in Chicago and later nicknamed “Studs” after a character in a James T. Farrell novel, Terkel attended the University of Chicago, where he received his J.D. in 1934. He never pursued a career in law, but instead began a long career in radio as an interviewer. Terkel began publishing collections of interviews, including his Hard Times: An Oral History of the Great Depression (1970); Working: People Talk About What They Do All Day and How They Feel About What They Do (1974); and American Dreams: Lost and Found (1980). Terkel's “The Good War”: An Oral History of World War II (1984) won the Pulitzer Prize for nonfiction.

At the age of ninety-one Terkel published Hope Dies Last (2003), a comment on the state of American optimism and political activism. A collection of music-related interviews, And They All Sang: Adventures of an Eclectic Disc Jockey, appeared in 2006.

Sources

- Baker, James T. Studs Terkel. New York: Twayne, 1992.
- Parker, Tony. Studs Terkel: A Life in Words. New York: Holt, 1996.

Theroux, Paul (1941– ) novelist, travel writer

Paul Theroux was born in Medford, Massachusetts. His French-Canadian father encouraged his literary interests, prompting Paul and his brother, Alexander, to start a family newspaper. Theroux graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1963 with a B.A. Having joined the Peace Corps, he began teaching at a university in Malawi, East Africa. He was expelled from the program for political reasons in 1965. Three years later Theroux moved to Singapore.

Theroux's first novel, Waldo, appeared in 1967, and he followed this publication with three other novels in the next four years. These early African novels, Fong and the Indians (1968), Girls at Play (1969), and Jungle Lovers (1971), examine issues such as racism; many of Theroux's works are set in postcolonial Africa and Southeast Asia and attempt to explore the meaning of civilization as it is created by the interactions of different peoples.

Theroux became a best-selling travel writer with his The Great Railway Bazaar: By Train through Asia (1975) and The Old Patagonian Express: By Train through the Americas (1979). Many of his stories and novels are set in postcolonial Africa and Southeast Asia. Saint Jack (1973), set in Singapore, concerns Jack Flowers, a misfit who typifies Theroux's view of modern, displaced man. The Mosquito Coast (1981), a novel of Theroux's middle period, explores the consequences of extreme individualism. His later work became increasingly self-referential, including the novels My Secret History (1989) and My Other Life (1996).

In 1997 Theroux published his Collected Stories; he followed a year later with Sir Vidia's Shadow: A Friendship across Three Continents, a memoir in which he deals frankly with his sense of betrayal at the hands of his former mentor, the Anglophone writer—and Nobel Prize winner—V. S. Naipaul. Since then Theroux has continued his steady output of travel writing and fiction, publishing the travel memoirs Fresh Air Fiend (2000), Nurse Wolf & Dr. Sacks (2001), and Dark Star Safari (2002), and the novels Kowloon Tong: A Novel of Hong Kong (1998), the best-selling Hotel Honolulu (2001), Stranger at the Palazzo D'Oro (2004), and Blinding Light (2005).

Source

- Coale, Samuel. Paul Theroux. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Thompson, Hunter S. (1937?–2005) journalist

Born in Louisville, Kentucky, Thompson began working as a magazine journalist after his discharge from the U.S. Air Force in 1958. Self-described as a “gonzo Journalist,” Thompson was associated with the New Journalists of the 1960s who were themselves characters in their reportage (see NEW JOURNALISM). Thompson specialized in the journalism of excess, bragging about his own outrageous behavior, which included violence and drug use. His first book, Hell's Angels:

A Strange and Terrible Saga of the Outlaw Motorcycle Gangs, (1966), recounted his travels with the Hell's Angels. Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas: A Savage Journey to the Heart of the American Dream (1972) begins, "We were somewhere around Barstow on the edge of the desert when the drugs began to take hold," introducing an account of the city of sin through blurred eyes. That was followed by Fear and Loathing on the Campaign Trail '72 (1973), an irreverent account of the presidential campaigns of Richard M. Nixon and George McGovern. Thompson published a dozen other books, usually collected from his writings for the magazines Rolling Stone, High Times, and Smart, on which he served as correspondent. Thompson committed suicide in 2005.

Source

Perry, Paul. Fear and Loathing: The Strange and Terrible Saga of Hunter S. Thompson. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1992.

A Thousand Acres by Jane Smiley (New York: Knopf, 1991) novel

Winner of both the NATIONAL BOOK CRITICS CIRCLE AWARD and the Pulitzer Prize, Jane SMILEY's A Thousand Acres is an emotional story about three sisters living in rural Iowa and their troubled relationship with a domineering father. Smiley based her modern story on William Shakespeare's King Lear, with the father standing in as the title character and the three daughters—Ginny, Rose, and Caroline—assuming the roles of Goneril, Regan, and Cordelia, respectively. The basic premise of the novel also follows that of Shakespeare's play: Larry Cook, who has presided over the family's flourishing farm for decades, decides to retire and wills the land to his three daughters. Designed as a feminist rewriting of Shakespeare's play, in which the daughters, rather than the patriarch, are given primary voice, A Thousand Acres also addresses the tenuous plight of modern-day farmers, who must contend with technological advances and the threat of foreclosure.

Source

Farrell, Susan Elizabeth. Jane Smiley's A Thousand Acres: A Reader's Guide. New York: Continuum, 2001.

—Marshall Boswell

To Kill a Mockingbird by Harper Lee (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1960) novel

Harper Lee's only novel and the winner of the 1961 Pulitzer Prize, To Kill a Mockingbird introduces Atticus Finch, a white lawyer who defends Tom Robinson, a black man wrongly accused of raping a white woman in a small Alabama town during the Great Depression. Atticus's six-year-old daughter, Scout, narrates the story, juxtaposing her innocence with an exploration of Southern racism and American injustice, while Atticus operates under a simple but effective moral code: do not judge others prematurely, and seek honor and justice. "You never really understand a person until you consider things from his point of view," Atticus tells Scout, ". . . until you climb into his skin and walk around in it."

Scout and her brother, Jem, push the metaphor as they learn that even Boo Radley, an enigmatic neighbor who supposedly hasn't left his house in over a decade, can be empathized with once understood. Yet, the children face a rapid education when the community prejudices Robinson and the justice system that Atticus represents proves to be corrupt and directly engineered to sustain white power.

Sources

Bloom, Harold, ed. Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Petry, Alice Hall, ed. On Harper Lee: Essays and Reflections. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2007.

—Marshall Boswell

Toole, John Kennedy (1937–1969) novelist

Born in New Orleans and educated at Tulane (graduated 1958) and at Columbia University, where he earned an M.A. degree in 1959, Toole served in the army and then taught at several colleges. While in the army he set to work on a robust comic novel, A CONFEDERACY OF DUNCES, about the French Quarter of New Orleans. After futile efforts to find a publisher, he committed suicide. His mother gave the book to the novelist Walker PERCY, who persuaded Louisiana State University Press to publish it in 1980. The novel won a Pulitzer Prize and is now recognized as a contemporary classic. In Percy's words, the novel celebrates the life of a "fat Don Quixote," a phrase that captures the novel's creation of a modern picaresque myth.

Source

Nevils, René Pol, and Deborah George Hardy. Ignatius Rising: The Life of John Kennedy Toole. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2001.

Trillin, Calvin (1935– ) journalist

Born in Kansas City, Missouri, Calvin Trillin graduated from Yale in 1957. After spending two years in the army he began working as a reporter at Time magazine and as a staff writer at The New Yorker. He has written a wide range of books that reflect his political interests and satirical temper. Education in Georgia (1963) is an account of the first African Americans to be admitted to the state's university. U.S. Journal (1971; later published as Killings) examines the effects of murder on the community. Trillin's comments on American cuisine and culture include American Fried (1974), Alice, Let's Eat (1978), Third Helpings (1983), and Travels with Alice (1989).

Trillin's later work includes Remembering Denny (1993), the story of a friend who committed suicide; Messages From

My Father (1996) and Family Man (1998), both memoirs; and a novel, Tepper Isn't Going Out (2001). He has published essays, sketches, and political doggerel. About Alice, a memoir of his late wife, was published in 2006.

Trilling, Diana (1905–1996) critic, essayist

Born Diana Rubin, Trilling earned her B.F.A. from Radcliffe College and became a reviewer for The Nation and other periodicals. Associated with the New York Intellectuals, Trilling was established as an important essayist with the publication of her Claremont Essays (1964). Her later anticommunist views are evident in We Must March My Darlings (1977). Upon the death of her husband, the critic Lionel Trilling, she edited a twelve-volume uniform collection of his work. Another collection of her essays, Reviewing the Forties, was published in 1978. Trilling won popular acclaim with her 1981 account titled Mrs. Harris: The Death of the Scarsdale Diet Doctor. A memoir of her marriage, The Beginning of the Journey: The Marriage of Diana and Lionel Trilling, was published in 1993.

Source

Laskin, David. Partisans: Marriage, Politics, and Betrayal among the New York Intellectuals. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001.

Tri-Quarterly (1958– ) periodical

Tri-Quarterly is a literary magazine published by Northwestern University. Founded in 1958, the journal was redesigned in 1964 into a nine-by-eleven format that has influenced many literary magazines. Special issues that are thematically driven and the diverse offerings of general issues helped to make the magazine one of the most widely admired American literary journals.

—Tod Marshall

Tuchman, Barbara (1912–1989) journalist, historian

A New York native, Barbara Tuchman earned her B.A. from Radcliffe College in 1933 and published several books under her maiden name of Wertheim: The Lost British Policy (1938), Bible and Sword (1956), and The Zimmerman Telegram (1958). The latter, her first successful publication, demonstrates a mature style of narrative drama and historical synthesis as it recounts the role that an intercepted German telegram played in the entry of the United States into World War I.

Publishing under her married name, Tuchman earned a Pulitzer Prize for The Guns of August (1962), a study of how the German army planned its flanking movement and invasion of Belgium in the first days of World War I. Tuchman also won a Pulitzer Prize for Stilwell and the American Experience in China 1911–1945 (1971), a synthesis of biography and history. Her other books include A Distant Mirror (1978), about Europe in the fourteenth century; Practicing History (1981), a collection of essays; The March of Folly (1984), about political ineptitude; and The First Salute (1988), about the American Revolution.

Tyler, Anne (1941– ) novelist, short-story writer

I want to live other lives. I've never quite believed that one chance is all I get. Writing is my way of making other chances.

—Interview (1977)

Anne Tyler was born in Minneapolis, Minnesota, to Quaker parents, and spent her early years in several rural Quaker communes. Her penchant for telling stories to herself developed early, and at Duke University her writing teacher, Reynolds PRICE, encouraged her to develop her talent. Tyler graduated from Duke in 1961 with a B.A. in Russian. She completed courses for her doctorate in Russian at Columbia University but left to work as a Russian bibliographer at Duke before completing her dissertation.

Tyler's early novels, If Morning Ever Comes (1964), The Tin Can Tree (1965), A Slipping Down Life (1970), The Clock Winder (1972), and Celestial Navigation (1974), attracted relatively little notice—even though they are characterized by Tyler's typically eccentric characters, an emphasis on family relationships, the burden of the individual's isolation from community, and the journeys her characters undertake to discover their identities. Only with Searching for Caleb (1976), a five-generation family saga, did Tyler begin to receive national attention.

For the most part, Tyler's subsequent novels, especially Morgan's Passing (1980), Dinner at the Homesick Restaurant (1982), The Accidental Tourist (1985), and Breathing Lessons (1988), were highly praised, calling forth comparisons to Flannery O'CONNOR for their wit and irony. The whimsical nature of Tyler's middle period gave way to darker strains in such novels as Saint Maybe (1991), Ladder of Years (1995), and A Patchwork Planet (1998). Back When We Were Grown-ups (2001) is the story of a fifty-three-year-old woman reflecting on her life. Tyler's seventeenth novel, Digging to America (2006), chronicles the friendship of two couples who both adopt a Korean baby.

Sources

Petry, Ann Hall. Understanding Anne Tyler. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990.

Petry, ed. Critical Essays on Anne Tyler. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

Salwak, Dale, ed. Anne Tyler as Novelist. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1994.

Stephens, C. Ralph, ed. The Fiction of Anne Tyler. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990.

Uncle Remus, His Songs and His Sayings by Joel Chandler Harris (New York: Appleton, 1881) story collection

Uncle Remus, a character created by Georgia journalist and author Joel Chandler HARRIS, is the narrator of almost two hundred folktales published by Harris in newspapers and in several story collections, the first of which was Uncle Remus, His Songs and Sayings: The Folk-lore of the Old Plantation. Harris had learned the folk stories from slaves near his childhood home. The fictitious Uncle Remus lends LOCAL COLOR to the tales by speaking with an African American Southern slave dialect, which Harris renders phonetically.

Many of Uncle Remus's tales feature Brer Rabbit, a trickster, and his enemy, Brer Fox. The action often involves Brer Rabbit's outwitting more-powerful animals—a fact that has led many readers to view the tales as allegories of slaves' ways of coping with their white oppressors. Uncle Remus, a docile and loyal servant, is very different from the cunning Brer Rabbit and appealed to white readers' sensibilities, providing an unthreatening framework for the more subversive folk tradition. For decades after Harris's death, the figure of Uncle Remus remained so appealing to American consumers that, like the protagonist of UNCLE TOM'S CABIN, he was incorporated into popular songs, merchandise, derivative books, and, perhaps most notably, Disney's motion picture Song of the South (1946), which is based on the Uncle Remus stories and which the company has declined to release on DVD due to its controversial racial content.

Sources

Harris, Joel Chandler. Nights with Uncle Remus, edited by Bruce Bickley and John Bickley. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Harris. Uncle Remus: His Songs and His Sayings, edited by Robert Hemenway. New York: Penguin, 1982.

—Amanda Gailey

Uncle Tom's Cabin by Harriet Beecher Stowe (2 volumes, Boston: Jewett / Cleveland: Jewett, Proctor & Worthington, 1852) novel

Harriet Beecher STOWE's Uncle Tom's Cabin; or, Life among the Lowly provides a fictional account of two very different escapes from slavery. "Uncle Tom" Shelby is a devout Christian who sacrifices himself and his family's unity in order to help his owner out of debt. The second protagonist, Eliza Harris, is a young mulatto woman who escapes to Canada in order to prevent losing her child to slave traders. The power of the novel is largely derived from Stowe's skillful combination of melodrama and Christian symbolism: Uncle Tom becomes a saint through his humility and through his willingness to turn the other cheek to the injury he sustains. Although years later Uncle Tom became a shameful symbol to militant African Americans who rejected both his passivity and his brand of Christianity, in the context of Stowe's time, Uncle Tom invigorated the cause of abolition (see ABOLITIONISM).

First serially published in the NATIONAL ERA, Uncle Tom's Cabin sold three hundred thousand copies during its first year of publication, making it the best-selling American novel to date. Perhaps as important as the novel itself were the countless dramatizations of it that allowed even illiterate audiences to experience Stowe's call for emancipation.

When proslavery forces attacked the accuracy of her work, Stowe published A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin (1853), a record of the data she claimed to have used in writing her novel. Although research suggests that her investigation of laws, court documents, newspapers, and correspondence was undertaken after the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin, Stowe's Key accurately documents some of the abuses depicted in her novel.

Sources

- Ammons, Elizabeth, ed. Uncle Tom's Cabin: Authoritative Text, Backgrounds and Contexts, Criticism. New York: Norton, 1994.
- Gossett, Thomas. Uncle Tom's Cabin and American Culture. Dallas, Tex.: Southern Methodist University Press, 1985.
- Kirkham, Edwin B. The Building of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1977.
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher. The Annotated Uncle Tom's Cabin, edited by Henry Louis Gates and Hollis Rollins. New York: Norton, 2007.

The Union Magazine (1847–1852) periodical

First edited by the novelist Caroline M. KIRKLAND, who also contributed stories, this monthly magazine was taken over after eighteen months by John Sartain, who renamed it Sartain's Union Magazine. The magazine published Edgar Allan POE's poems "To Helen" in 1848 and "The Bells" in 1849. Sartain's Union also posthumously published Poe's 1848–1849 lecture "The Poetic Principle" in 1850. Other important contributors were Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW, James Russell LOWELL, and Henry David THOREAU, who contributed "Ktaadn" in 1848, the first part of his posthumously published autobiographical narrative, The Maine Woods (1864).

Source

- Nichols, Heidi L. The Fashioning of Middle-Class America: Sartain's Union Magazine of Literature and Art and Antebellum Culture. New York: Peter Lang, 2004.

United States Magazine and Democratic Review (1837–1849) periodical

Founded in 1837, this monthly literary and political review was published in Washington, D.C., until it was moved to New York City in 1841. Early features included Nathaniel HAWTHORNE's "Legends of the Province House" and John Greenleaf WHITTIER's "Songs of Labor." In 1841, after merging with Orestes Augustus BROWNSON's Boston Quarterly Review, the magazine became more overtly political, in large part because of the nationalism of its founder and editor John L. O'Sullivan (1813–1895), who in this magazine coined the term "manifest destiny" to explain American imperialism. After another merger, this time with United States Review in 1846, the success of the magazine began to wane.

Untermeyer, Louis (1885–1977) poet, biographer, critic, anthologist

A New York native, Louis Untermeyer earned praise for the lush, romantic quality of his early poetry. He collected poems from this phase of his career in Long Feud: Selected Poems (1962). A scholar of the history of poetry, he published Collected Parodies (1926), deft imitations of both ancient and modern poets. In 1937 he published a biography, Heinrich Heine: Paradox and Poet. His anthologies, such as Modern American Poetry (1919, revised in many subsequent editions) were quite influential, since Untermeyer provides accessible introductions to a broad range of modern poetry informed by his own work as a poet and his associations with great poets such as Robert Frost. His work as a critic is exemplified in Play in Poetry (1938). His collection of biographical portraits, Lives of the Poets: The Story of One Thousand Years of English and American Poetry, appeared in 1959. He published two autobiographies: From Another World (1939) and Bygones (1965). The Letters of Robert Frost to Louis Untermeyer was published in 1963.

Sources

Untermeyer, Louis. Bygones: The Recollections of Louis Untermeyer. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1965.

Untermeyer. From Another World: The Autobiography of Louis Untermeyer. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939.

The Unvanquished by William Faulkner (New York: Random House, 1938) novel

The Unvanquished began as a series of Civil War stories William Faulkner published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST; to create the novel, he revised them and added a concluding chapter. The stories follow Bayard Sartoris as he grows up in Mississippi during the Civil War, first playing at war with his black friend Ringo, a slave on the Sartoris plantation. But the play quickly becomes serious when their house is burned by invading Union troops and Bayard's grandmother is murdered trading with an unscrupulous raider in a horse-theft scheme. Bayard and Ringo hunt down the murderer and take revenge; but later, when the mature Bayard is again expected to avenge the death of his father, who has been murdered by a business partner, Bayard refuses—effectively breaking the cycle of violence in which he has spent his formative years.

Sources

Hinkle, James C., and Robert McCoy. Reading Faulkner: The Unvanquished. Reading Faulkner Series. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995.

Kinney, Arthur F. Critical Essays on William Faulkner: The Sartoris Family. Critical Essays in American Literature Series. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.

—John B. Padgett

Up From Slavery by Booker T. Washington (New York: Doubleday, Page, 1901) autobiography

Although Booker T. WASHINGTON was born a slave, by the time he wrote his autobiography he was, as president of Tuskegee Institute, probably the most powerful black person in the country. Up From Slavery is rags-to-riches story, but it concentrates more on the symbolism of Washington's accomplishments and the power of his philosophy of racial conciliation than on his personal life. For Washington, deprivation affords blacks an opportunity for advancement, not an excuse for disillusionment. He was heavily criticized by other black leaders—W. E. B. Du Bois, in particular—for his endorsement of what was regarded as a second-class vocational education for African Americans and for his accommodation of segregation.

Sources

- Andrews, William L., ed. Up From Slavery: Authoritative Text, Contexts, and Composition History, Criticism. New York: Norton, 1996.
- Harris, Thomas E. Analysis of the Clash over the Issues between Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois. New York: Garland, 1993.
- Weisberger, Bernard A. Booker T. Washington. New York: New American Library, 1972.

U.S.A. by John Dos Passos (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1938) novels

The U.S.A. Trilogy—The 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936)—provides a political and social panorama of American life from about the time of John Dos Passos's birth in 1896 to the 1930s. In his 1967 speech accepting the Feltrinelli Prize for lifetime achievement, Dos Passos explained his motivation in writing the trilogy: "I was thoroughly embarked on an effort to keep up a contemporary commentary on history's changes, always seen through an individual's eyes, heard by some individual's ears, felt through some individual's nerves and tissues. These were the U.S.A. books." Dos Passos wrote U.S.A. during the time of his intense interest in and sympathy with the radical Left. The trilogy is a satire on American society, meant to illustrate the effects of what Dos Passos called "monopoly capitalism"—a social and economic system dominated by big business.

In this experimental trilogy, Dos Passos used a mixture of four modes of narrative, each inspired by a modernist technique. The first mode to appear in the trilogy is the Newsreel—expressionistic montages of newspaper headlines and fragments of news stories. The chaos of modern life is depicted by the mix of sensationalistic snippets reporting international events contrasted with domestic squabbles; reports of violence contrasted with the mundane. The second mode is the Camera Eye—impressionistic autobiographical vignettes arranged chronologically. The Camera Eye traces the author's development and measures the effect on him of contemporary events. The third mode, and seemingly the most conventional, are the episodic stories of twelve characters, told in the third person using a narrative device called free indirect discourse, in which the third-person narrator's voice is merged with that of the character whose experience is being described. The twelve characters whose stories, sometimes overlapping, are sprinkled throughout the trilogy, are representative not so much of a cross-section of America as of the central theme that interested Dos Passos: the failure of the American dream and the emptiness of people driven by material acquisitiveness. The fourth mode is highly stylized biographies in the form of ironic prose poems about people who affected American culture, especially in the fields of business, science, and politics.

When the individual volumes of U.S.A. were published, they were hailed as important works. The Big Money prompted Time magazine to run a cover story on Dos Passos, comparing him to Leo Tolstoy, Honoré de Balzac, and James Joyce. Two years later, the trilogy was released as a single volume, with minor revisions. By that time, Dos Passos had published a series of essays critical of communist conduct during the Spanish Civil War. The left-wing press reassessed the U.S.A. trilogy in that light and attacked it as the work of a politically naive writer. The reassessment was both a demonstration of the insistence on orthodox political expression demanded by the communists and a turning point in Dos Passos's career, as he turned abruptly from the Left, becoming a political conservative.

Sources

- Pizer, Donald. Dos Passos' U.S.A.: A Critical Study. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1988.
- Pizer, ed. John Dos Passos's U.S.A.: A Documentary Volume, Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 274. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2003.
- Sanders, David S., ed. The Merrill Studies in U.S.A. Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1972.

—Richard Layman

Uhry, Alfred (1937– ) playwright

Born in Atlanta, Georgia, Alfred Uhry graduated from Brown University in 1958 and began his career in the theater. He wrote lyrics and librettos for Here's Where I Belong (produced 1968); The Robber Bridegroom (produced 1975), an adaptation of Eudora Welty's novel; and Little Johnny Jones (produced 1982). His first full-length play, Driving Miss Daisy (produced 1987), a poignant drama about an elderly Southern white woman and her African American chauffeur, won a Pulitzer Prize in 1988 and was made into a movie for which Uhry won an Academy Award for best adaptation. The Last Night of Ballyhoo (produced 1997) is a Tony Award-winning play about anti-Semitism in the South. His work is unified by his sensitive portrayals of Southern culture and character, dramatized in a realistic and comic mode. Uhry wrote the book for Parade (produced 1999), which won a Tony for best musical.

Updike, John (1932– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

My subject is the American Protestant small-town middle class. I like middles. It is in middles that extremes clash, where ambiguity restlessly rules. Something quite intricate and fierce occurs in homes, and it seems to me without doubt worthwhile to examine what it is.

—Updike (1966?)

In the course of almost fifty years of productivity, John Updike has published more than fifty books, including works of fiction, poetry, and nonfiction. A chronicler of the American suburban middle class, and one of the most successful writers of contemporary American literature, Updike remains best known as the author of four novels about Harry “Rabbit” Angstrom, the first of which was Rabbit, Run (1960; see RABBIT ANGSTROM).

John Updike

Updike was born in Reading, Pennsylvania, and spent the first decade of his life in the neighboring town of Shillington, called “Olinger” in his early fiction, where he lived in a small house with his parents and maternal grandparents. In 1945 the family moved to a six-room farmhouse in Plowville, Pennsylvania, the setting for such works as “Pigeon Feathers”

Photo: Alfred A. Knopf

In John Updike's
new novel,

a thirty-five-year-old advertising consultant employed in Manhattan describes the visit made by himself, his newly acquired second wife, and his eleven-year-old stepson to the farm where he grew up and where his mother now lives alone.

For three days a quartet of voices explores the air, relating stories, making confessions, seeking alignments, quarreling and pardoning. The time is the present; the place, southeastern Pennsylvania.

OF THE FARM

by the author of The Centaur, and Rabbit, Run $1.95 • now at better bookstores

ALFRED A. KNOFF

Advertisement for Updike's 1965 novel, a companion to The Centaur

(1960) and the novels The Centaur (1963) and Of the Farm (1965).

After graduating co-valedictorian of his senior class, Updike entered Harvard University on scholarship, graduating summa cum laude in 1954. His first story was published in The New Yorker that year, and by 1955 he had become a regular contributor to the magazine. He spent the year following his graduation studying art at the Ruskin School of Drawing and Fine Art at Oxford. Two years later he moved with his wife and children to the beach town of Ipswich, Massachusetts, a place he called "Tarbox" in his fiction, where he began concentrating on his writing. By 1959 he had published his first three books.

"A&P," a short story which Updike wrote in the late 1950s, is one of over a hundred pieces assembled in The Early Stories: 1953–1975 (2003). Updike's talents as a story writer include his precise psychological insight. The stories also lend themselves to being read autobiographically; the works in Collected Stories are arranged chronologically according to the protagonist's age.

Updike's second novel, Rabbit, Run (1960), was the first of four related best-selling novels about former high-school basketball star Rabbit Angstrom. Rabbit, Run concerns a washed-up high school basketball hero suffocating under the demands of married life. In response to an inner call he suspects might be spiritual in nature, he abruptly leaves his wife and child on a March night and takes up with a prostitute—with disastrous results. The novel was both sophisticated in its diagnosis of Rabbit's spiritual confusion and shockingly frank in its treatment of sexuality. These two qualities combined to make the novel something of a cause de scandale and put Updike on the literary map. His follow-up novel, The Centaur (1963), an Olinger tale with mythic overtones, cemented Updike's reputation and earned him his first NATIONAL BOOK AWARD.

In 1968 he published Couples, a nearly five-hundred-page novel about a coven of affluent suburbanites in a Massachusetts town called Tarbox who turn sex and adultery into a new religion. The best-selling book established Updike as the bard of adultery and explicit sex. He was the subject of a cover story in Time magazine, a mark of his literary celebrity. Updike followed Couples with Rabbit Redux (1971), a sequel to Rabbit, Run, in which his questing hero is depicted as a plump, dissatisfied suburbanite bewildered by the psychedelic decadence of the new decade but still looking for redemption.

Updike's treatment of adultery continued with his mid-seventies novels, Marry Me (1976), another Tarbox tale, and A Month of Sundays (1975), a contemporary rewrite of Nathaniel Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter. Updike completed his Scarlet Letter Trilogy with Roger's Version (1986), a novel about a young graduate student hoping to prove God's existence via a computer program, and S. (1988), an epistolary novel set in a Western religious commune and featuring, in Sarah Worth, the novel's libertine heroine, a modern-day Hester Prynne.

Updike continued the Rabbit series with Rabbit Is Rich (1981), in which Rabbit Angstrom finds financial success and some measure of fulfillment but runs afoul of his spoiled, taciturn son Nelson who, in Rabbit at Rest (1990), nearly ruins Rabbit's Toyota dealership due to an expensive cocaine habit.

Through these four novels Rabbit remains incorrigibly himself—selfish but observant, boorish yet charismatic—maintaining his cool, unshakable belief that “there is a God he is the apple of the eye of.”

In recent years Updike’s novels have become more daring and adventurous, while maintaining the concerns he identified early in his career: sex, religion, and art. Memories of the Ford Administration (1992) combines a modern-day tale of Updikean adultery with a novelized depiction of James Buchanan’s failed presidency, while in Brazil (1994) Updike tries his hand at Latin American magical realism. Gertrude and Claudius (2000) dramatizes the events leading up to the main action of Shakespeare’s Hamlet. Updike’s most characteristic novels from the last decade are the ambitious multigenerational saga, In the Beauty of the Lilies (1996), and Villages (2004), an adultery-laden bildungsroman that returns Updike to the small-town setting and sexual adventures characteristic of his early Olinger stories. His Terrorist (2006) inhabits the mind of a young boy of Arab extraction who contemplates a terrorist attack against his infidel countrymen. Updike, whom early critics accused of having “nothing to say,” has written more than fifty books and has been awarded every major American literary prize.

—Marshall Boswell

Principal Books by Updike

The Carpentered Hen and Other Tame Creatures. New York: Harper, 1958.

The Poorhouse Fair. New York: Knopf, 1959.

The Same Door. New York: Knopf, 1959.

Rabbit, Run. New York: Knopf, 1960.

The Magic Flute. New York: Knopf, 1962.

Pigeon Feathers. New York: Knopf, 1962.

The Centaur. New York: Knopf, 1963.

Telephone Poles and Other Poems. New York: Knopf, 1963.

Olinger Stories. New York: Vintage, 1964.

The Ring. New York: Knopf, 1964.

Assorted Prose. New York: Knopf, 1965.

A Child’s Calendar, illustrated by Nancy Ekholm Gurkert. New York: Knopf, 1965.

Of the Farm. New York: Knopf, 1965.

Verse. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1965.

The Music School. New York: Knopf, 1966.

Couples. New York: Knopf, 1968.

Midpoint and Other Poems. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Bottom’s Dream. New York: Knopf, 1969.

Bech: A Book. New York: Knopf, 1970.

Rabbit Redux. New York: Knopf, 1971.

Seventy Poems. London: Penguin, 1972.

Museums and Women. New York: Knopf, 1972.

Buchanan Dying. New York: Knopf, 1974.

A Month of Sundays. New York: Knopf, 1975.

Picked-Up Pieces. New York: Knopf, 1975.

Marry Me: A Romance. New York: Knopf, 1976.

Dust jacket for the third of Updike’s marriage novels, which include Couples (1968) and A Month of Sundays (1975)

Tossing and Turning. New York: Knopf, 1977.

The Coup. New York: Knopf, 1978.

Too Far to Go. New York: Fawcett Crest, 1979.

Problems and Other Stories. New York: Knopf, 1979.

Rabbit Is Rich. New York: Knopf, 1981.

Bech Is Back. New York: Knopf, 1982.

Hugging the Shore. New York: Knopf, 1983.

The Witches of Eastwick. New York: Knopf, 1984.

Facing Nature. New York: Knopf, 1985.

Roger’s Version. New York: Knopf, 1986.

Trust Me. New York: Knopf, 1987.

S. New York: Knopf, 1988.

Self-Consciousness: Memoirs. New York: Knopf, 1989.

Just Looking. New York: Knopf, 1989.

Rabbit at Rest. New York: Knopf, 1990.

Odd Jobs. New York: Knopf, 1991.

Memories of the Ford Administration. New York: Knopf, 1992.

Collected Poems: 1953–1993. New York: Knopf, 1993.

Dust jacket for Updike's second novel in the Bech series, 1982. It begins: "Though Henry Bech, the author, in his middle years had all but ceased to write, his books continued, as if ironically, to live, to cast shuddering shadows toward the center of his life, where that thing called his reputation cowered."

Brazil. Franklin Center, Pa.: Franklin Library / New York: Knopf, 1994.

The Afterlife and Other Stories. New York: Knopf, 1994.

A Helpful Alphabet of Friendly Objects. New York: Knopf, 1995.

Rabbit Angstrom: A Tetralogy. New York: Knopf/Everyman, 1995.

Golf Dreams: Writings on Golf. New York: Knopf, 1996.

In the Beauty of the Lilies. Franklin Center, Pa.: Franklin Library / New York: Knopf, 1996.

Toward the End of Time. New York: Knopf, 1997.

Bech at Bay: A Quasi-novel. New York: Knopf, 1998.

More Matter. New York: Knopf, 1999.

Gertrude and Claudius. New York: Knopf, 2000.

Licks of Love: Short Stories and a Sequel, "Rabbit Remembered." New York: Knopf, 2000.

Americana and Other Poems. New York: Knopf, 2001.

Seek My Face. New York: Knopf, 2002.

The Early Stories: 1953–1975. New York: Knopf, 2003.

Villages: A Novel. New York: Knopf, 2004.

Still Looking: Essays in American Art. New York: Knopf, 2005.

Terrorist. New York: Knopf, 2006.

Due Considerations: Essays and Criticisms. New York: Knopf, 2007.

Studying John Updike

Though he is known primarily as a novelist, John Updike is a master of three additional genres: poetry, short fiction, and essays. Students wishing to explore Updike's many novels should read the Rabbit tetralogy, beginning with Rabbit, Run (1960) and continuing through Rabbit Redux (1971), Rabbit Is Rich (1981), and Rabbit at Rest (1990) collected in Everyman's Library as Rabbit Angstrom: A Tetralogy (1995). The Complete Henry Bech: Twenty Stories (2001) and The Early Stories: 1953–1975 (2003) are good places to begin reading Updike's short fiction. Americana and Other Poems (2001) is a full collection of his poetry. His essays and essay-reviews are published frequently in The New Yorker. A good recent sampling can be found in Due Considerations: Essays and Criticism (2007).

William Pritchard's John Updike: America's Man of Letters (2000) unites biography with traditional literary criticism and stands as the primary biography of Updike. This book includes focused close readings of specific texts divided by chronological periods that he hopes will align Updike in the tradition established by Hawthorne, Howells, and Edmund Wilson. A comprehensive and enlightening collection is Conversations with John Updike (1994), edited by James Plath. These interviews give insight to Updike's philosophies of writing and why he chooses middle-class America as his focus. Martin Amis's chapter "John Updike" in his Visiting Mrs. Nabakov and Other Excursions (1995) cleverly presents both a critical and popular view of Updike and his novels.

Updike's Self-Consciousness: Memoirs (New York: Knopf, 1989) is the place to start for biographical information. William Pritchard's John Updike: America's Man of Letters (South Royalton, Vt.: Steerforth, 2000) unites biography with traditional literary criticism and stands as the primary biography of Updike.

Jack De Bellis's John Updike: A Bibliography 1967–1993 (New York: Greenwood Press, 1994) is a thorough primary and secondary bibliography. It is necessarily complemented by A Revised Cumulative Updike Publications Bibliography 1997–2007—Book, Short Stories, Articles, Reviews and Poems <http://userpages.prexar.com/joyerkes/> (viewed July 26, 2007), the site of the online Centaurian, which contains much useful information.

Jack De Bellis's The John Updike Encyclopedia (Westport, Conn: Greenwood Press, 2000) is an A to Z collection of entries on novels, and stories, characters, and topics. It is a useful ready-reference. Stacy Olster's The Cambridge Companion to John Updike (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006) collects new essays on his work. More traditional literary scholarship focusing on Updike is collected in John Updike (New York: Chelsea House, 1987), edited by Harold Bloom; John Updike: A Collection of Critical Essays (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979), edited by David Thorburn and Howard Eiland; and Critical Essays on John Updike (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982), edited by William Macnaughton. Critical articles on the Rabbit novels are collected in New Essays on Rabbit, Run (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993), edited by Stanley Trachtenberg, and Rabbit Tales: Poetry and Politics in John Updike's Rabbit Novels (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1998), edited by Lawrence Broer.

—Britt Terry

Uris, Leon (1924–2003) novelist

My guiding thought throughout [Battle Cry] was that the real Marine story had not been told. We were a different breed of men who looked at war in a different way.

—Interview

Born in Baltimore, Maryland, Leon Uris failed high-school English repeatedly but had early ambitions to become a writer. He dropped out of high school at the age of seventeen and joined the United States Marine Corps, serving in combat during WORLD WAR II. Uris wrote his first novel about the war, highlighting the camaraderie he experienced as a Marine. Battle Cry (1953) was a success, and Uris was asked to write the screenplay for the 1954 motion picture.

His third novel, Exodus (1958), is a chronicle of the founding of Israel. Based on extensive research—Uris conducted some twelve hundred interviews and read almost three hundred books in preparation for the project—Exodus was an immediate best-seller and has become Uris's most enduring work. In the foreword to the second printing Uris introduces his philosophy on writing about Jews: "All the cliché Jewish characters who have cluttered up our American fiction . . . have been left where they rightfully belong, on the cutting-room floor." Uris's fourth novel, Mila 18 (1961), is based on the history of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising during World War II. Other novels involving the experiences of Jews include QB VII (1970), The Haj (1984), and Mitla Pass (1988).

Uris wrote other historical novels, including two books about Ireland, Trinity (1976) and its sequel, Redemption (1995). The last of Uris's thirteen novels, O'Hara's Choice (2003), was published posthumously.

Source

Cain, Kathleen Shine. Leon Uris: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Virginia Company

This land-grant company chartered by James I in 1606, with the first venture in Jamestown, Virginia, was divided into two sections. The Virginia Company of London had jurisdiction over the southern regions from 34 degrees to 41 degrees north latitude, and the Virginia Company of Plymouth oversaw the northern sector from 45 degrees to 38 degrees south latitude. When Edwin Sandys (1516–1588), a leader of the company, successfully advocated the diversification of the economy, settlers began cultivating tobacco as well as cotton. In addition to the accounts of John SMITH and other JAMESTOWN colonists, notable contemporary accounts of the Virginia company include Nicholas Ferrar (1592–1637) and Arthur Woodnoth (1590?–1650?).

Sources

Craven, Wesley Frank. The Virginia Company of London, 1606–1624. Williamsburg, Va.: Virginia 350th Anniversary Celebration Corporation, 1957.

Kingsbury, Susan Myra, ed. The Records of the Virginia Company of London, 1607–1626. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1906–1935.

Vanity Fair (1859–1863) periodical

Founded in New York as a weekly by brothers Louis, William, and Henry Stephens, the original Vanity Fair was a humor magazine that lampooned national, social, and political affairs as well as writers. Edited from 1860 to 1861 by Charles G. LELAND and from 1862 until its demise the following year by Charles Farrar BROWNE, the magazine enjoyed contributions from members of the Pfaff's Cellar crowd, including George ARNOLD, William Winter, and Fitz-James O'Brien. A second magazine bearing the same name was founded in New York in 1868.

Very, Jones (1813–1880) poet, critic

The poets of the present day who would raise the epic song cry out, like Archimedes of old, "give us a place to stand on and we will move the world." This is, as we conceive, the true difficulty.

—Epic Poetry (1839)

Born in Salem, Massachusetts, Very entered Harvard as a sophomore in 1834. In his junior and senior years he was awarded the Bowdoin Prize for writing. His second winning essay, on epic poetry, came to the attention of Elizabeth PEABODY, who showed the essay to Ralph Waldo EMERSON in 1838.

While Very was in his senior year he experienced a spiritual rebirth that he called a "change of heart" and began to focus on living what he called a "will-less existence." Following his graduation in 1836 Very continued on at Harvard as a Greek tutor and divinity student. This period was characterized by extreme religiosity matched by intellectual accomplishments of a profound nature. By 1838 Very's fervor had turned to monomania (what J. F. Clarke, assistant editor at the WESTERN MESSENGER, called Very's "monosania"), and he was hospitalized briefly in the McLean Asylum.

Very continued to write poetry that was impressive for its conformity in style to the Shakespearean sonnet. His poems appeared in both the Western Messenger and THE DIAL, and in 1839 Emerson supported the publication of Very's only book to be published during his life, his Essays and Poems. Very tended to write from the point of view of God and to infuse his poems on nature with the spiritual. Although his poetry was heavily biblical and therefore not typical of the Transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), his focus on nature as a spiritual expression and the fact that his Christian influence was Unitarian (see UNITARIANISM) have led scholars to consider Very an important member of the Transcendentalist movement. In addition to Peabody and Emerson, contemporary admirers of Very's metaphysical verse and mystical approach to literature included William Cullen BRYANT and the elder William Ellery Channing.

Sources

Clayton, Sarah Turner. The Angelic Sins of Jones Very. New York: Peter Lang, 1999.

Deese, Helen R., ed. Jones Very: The Complete Poems. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993.

Gittleman, Edwin. Jones Very: The Effective Years, 1833–1840. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.

Winters, Yvor. Maule's Curse: Seven Studies in the History of American Obscurantism: Hawthorne, Cooper, Melville, Poe, Emerson, Jones Very, Emily Dickinson, Henry James. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1938.

Victor, Frances Fuller (1826–1902) historian, fiction writer, poet

Frances Fuller was born in Rome, New York, and reared in Pennsylvania and Ohio, but she is associated with the West, where she spent most of her adult life. Frances and her sister, Metta, (see Metta Victoria Fuller VICTOR), each began placing stories and poems in journals at an early age. Frances's first book, Anizetta, the Guajira; or, The Creole of Cuba, was published in 1848. Poems of Sentiment and Imagination, which the sisters co-authored, came in 1850. Following a brief marriage and a stint as a homesteader in the Nebraska Territory, Frances returned to New York, where she contributed to the DIME NOVEL series edited by Metta's husband, Orville Victor. After Frances married Orville's brother, Henry, the couple moved West in 1863, first to San Francisco and then to Oregon. During the 1870s Victor wrote The River of the West (1870), an Oregon history; All over Oregon and Washington (1872), a travel book; and The New Penelope and Other Stories and Poems (1877). As part of Hubert Bancroft's staff of writers, she was the uncredited author of several volumes of the History of the Pacific States (1874–1890). During her retirement in Oregon, she continued to publish books of nonfiction and poetry.

Source

Martin, Jim. A Bit of Blue, the Life and Works of Frances Fuller Victor. Salem, Ore.: Deep Well, 1992.

—Brett Barney

Victor, Metta Victoria Fuller (1831–1885) novelist, editor

Metta Fuller Victor, a prolific dime novelist (she contributed to the series edited by her husband, Orville Victor) and pioneering author of American detective fiction, was born in Pennsylvania. Victor published her first novel, a TEMPERANCE tale titled The Senator's Son, in 1851. The editor of the periodicals Home and the Cosmopolitan Art Journal, Victor began to publish DIME NOVELS in 1860. Over the course of her career, Victor wrote more than one hundred dime novels, the most popular of which was an abolitionist story, Maum Guinea and Her Plantation Children (1861). Victor is also credited with publishing one of the first mystery novels in the United States, The Dead Letter (1866), under the pseudonym Seeley Register.

Source

Nickerson, Catherine Ross. The Web of Iniquity: Early Detective Fiction by Women. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1998.

—Holly M. Kent

"The Village Blacksmith" by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1842) poem

One of his most enduringly popular poems, "The Village Blacksmith" was originally published in Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW's Ballads and Other Poems (1842). The poem is both a character study in verse and a moralistic piece—what Longfellow called a "psalm of life." Most of the poem's lines describe the blacksmith, both physically and spiritually. A man of physical strength and a paragon of simple virtues, he works hard, attends church, and weeps over his lost spouse. His life offers this symbolic lesson to readers: "Thus at the forge of life / Our fortunes must be wrought."

With its orthodox message delivered in an easily memorized hymn meter and regular rhyme scheme, the poem became a classroom staple for generations. Nostalgia also played a part in the poem's abiding popularity. The blacksmith shop, or "smithy," was commonly a community centerpiece, and over time "The Village Blacksmith" became a memorial to the simpler life that the forces of industrialization were making obsolete. Even today many readers instantly recognize the poem's opening lines: "Under a spreading chestnut-tree / The village smithy stands."

—Brett Barney

"A Visit from St. Nicholas" attributed to Clement C. Moore (1823) poem

This popular poem inaugurated the American image and story of Santa Claus and helped to establish American family traditions that continue into the twenty-first century. The poem first appeared anonymously in the Troy, New York, Sentinel in 1823. Over the years, attribution fell to Clement C. (Clarke) Moore, but more-recent scholarship suggests the poem may have actually been written by Moore's brother-in-law, Henry Livingston, or even by someone else. Today, the poem is frequently published in illustrated book form and retitled by its first line: "'Twas the Night before Christmas."

Source

Foster, Don. Author Unknown. New York: Macmillan, 2001.

—Connie Ann Kirk

Van Doren, Carl (1885–1950) critic, biographer

Carl Van Doren was a professor at Columbia University from 1911 to 1934 while also serving as literary editor of The Nation (1919–1922) as well as an editor for Century Magazine (1922–1925) and Literary Guild (1926–1934). He wrote several works of literary criticism, including The American Novel (1921), Contemporary American Novelists 1900–1920 (1922), and James Branch Cabell (1925). His biographies include Swift (1930), Sinclair Lewis (1933), and Benjamin Franklin (1938), for which he won a PULITZER PRIZE. Another notable work is The Great Rehearsal: The Story of the Making and Ratifying of the Constitution of the United States (1948). Three Worlds (1936) is his autobiography.

Source

Van Doren, Carl. The American Novel. New York: Macmillan, 1921: <<http://www.bartleby.com/187/>> (viewed July 10, 2007).

Van Doren, Mark (1894–1972) poet, critic, novelist, short-story writer

Like his brother Carl VAN DOREN, Mark Van Doren was a professor at Columbia University (1920–1959) and an editor of The Nation (1924–1928). His novels include The Transients (1935) and Windless Cabins (1940). Private Reader (1942) collects his literary criticism. He also published Autobiography (1958), Collected Stories (1962), and more than a dozen volumes of poetry. Van Doren was an example of the consummate man of letters who could appeal to a broader literate audience.

Van Doren's renown as a creative writer lay in poetry. His Collected Poems, 1922–1938 (1939) won a PULITZER PRIZE.

Later collections such as The Mayfield Deer (1941), Our Lady Peace, and Other War Poems (1942), and The Country Year (1946) show his interest in pastoral poetry, rural life, and war. He published Collected and New Poems, 1924–1963 (1963). Van Doren wrote highly formalized verse that led critic Allen TATE to predict that he would “last as a great poet in minor modes.”

Sources

Van Doren, Mark. The Selected Letters of Mark Van Doren, edited by George Hendrick. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.

van Druten, John (1901–1957) playwright, screen-writer

Born in England, John van Druten earned a bachelor of laws degree at London University. He abandoned the law as a career with the success of his play Young Woodley (produced 1925), which presented such an unflattering depiction of the English public school system that it was initially banned by the Lord Chamberlain and was first produced in New York. Praised in particular for his comedies of manners, Van Druten had a steadily productive career. He settled permanently in the United States in 1939 and became a citizen in 1944. Although he continued to write his own plays, including The Voice of the Turtle (produced 1943), a romantic comedy, he was also adept at adapting the works of others for the stage and screen. Two of his most notable successes were I REMEMBER MAMA (produced 1944), a play based on the reminiscences of her family by Kathryn Forbes, and Bell, Book, and Candle (produced 1950), a comedy about witchcraft.

Vanity Fair* (1868–1935) periodical

Founded in New York, Vanity Fair did not become a success until it was purchased in 1913 by the media magnate Condé Nast. Under editor Frank Crowninshield (1914–1935), the magazine became the most polished and sophisticated review of society and the arts of its era. It was notable for discovering new talent, and the list of writers whose early work appeared in its pages included Dorothy PARKER, Robert BENCHLEY, Clare Boothe LUCE, Thomas WOLFE, Paul Gallico, Gertrude STEIN, and E. E. CUMMINGS. In 1935 Vanity Fair was merged with the women's fashion magazine VOGUE.

Source

Amory, Cleveland, and Frederic Bradlee, eds. Vanity Fair, Selections from America's Most Memorable Magazine: A Cavalcade of the 1920s and 1930s. New York: Viking, 1960.

Van Vechten, Carl (1880–1964) novelist, critic, photographer

Carl Van Vechten graduated from the University of Chicago in 1903 and went to work for The New York Times. His dramatic criticism and other articles from this period are collected in Red: Papers on Musical Subjects (1925) and Excavations: A Book of Advocacies (1926). He also wrote novels that satirized and celebrated the activities of the sophisticated crowd in New York City. His best work in this vein is Firecrackers (1925) and Parties: Scenes from Contemporary New York Life (1930). Nigger Heaven (1926) is probably his most lasting work, as it captured something of the excitement generated by the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. Van Vechten treated life in Harlem sympathetically. Like Eugene O'NEILL and other white authors, he saw artistic material worth preserving and celebrating in the African American community.

Much of Van Vechten's work after 1930 involved photography. He took portraits of many of America's greatest writers. His autobiography is Sacred and Profane Memories (1932).

Sources

Bernard, Emily, ed. Remember Me to Harlem: The Letters of Langston Hughes and Carl Van Vechten. New York: Knopf, 2001.

Coleman, Leon. Carl Van Vechten and the Harlem Renaissance: A Critical Assessment. New York: Garland, 1998.

Lueders, Edward G. Carl Van Vechten. New York: Twayne, 1965.

The Varieties of Religious Experience by William James (New York & London: Longmans, Green, 1902) nonfiction

This psychological and philosophical study grew out of two lectures William James delivered at the University of Edinburgh in 1901 and 1902. Written from a psychologist's perspective, The Varieties of Religious Experience, subtitled A Study in Human Nature, concerns individual rather than institutional experiences of religious awareness. For James, institutional religion is characterized by external, ritual acts, as opposed to the "neurally conditioned" states of mind that interest him.

James's "arbitrary" definition of religion reflects his bias: it is "the feelings, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine." His approach is pragmatic, as he attempts to discover the function of religion and what difference it makes to an individual's existence. The significance of religious experiences, he writes, "must be tested not by their origin but by the value of their fruits."

Starting, then, from the premise that religion is a "way of accepting the universe," James proceeds to examine the lives of individuals who have testified to a subjective, but nevertheless real, experience of an "unseen order." Individual case histories presenting "the religion of healthy-mindedness," "the sick soul," "the divided self, and the process of its unification," religious conversion, and saintliness are all examined, with James ultimately concluding that some individuals have the capacity for mysticism, or in any event the ability to transcend the limits of normal human experience. When the effects of this facility are positive, the individual has a right to exercise belief, although not to impose it on others.

Sources

Capps, Donald, and Janet L. Jacobs, eds. The Struggle for Life: A Companion to William James's The Varieties of Religious Experience. West Lafayette, Ind.: Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, 1995.

Croce, Paul J. Science and Religion in the Era of William James. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

Ramsey, Bennett. Submitting to Freedom: The Religious Vision of William James. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Variety* (1905– ) periodical

Founded and edited in New York City by Sime Silverman, Variety has always been a theatrical trade journal. Initially devoted to vaudeville, the magazine expanded to cover all the theatrical arts as well as business, and in 1933 began to publish a separate daily edition in Hollywood. Known from the start for its racy language, Variety introduced numerous slang expressions into the American argot, including "eatery," "vamp," and "scram." Perhaps the most famous of its staff neologists was Jack Conway, who invented such terms as “high-hat,” “belly laugh,” and “pushover.” Published daily, it remains the publication to consult for news about show business on Broadway and in Hollywood, its products and personalities.

Sources

Besas, Peter. Inside “Variety”: The Story of the Bible of Show Business, 1905–1987. New York: Ars Millenii, 2000.

Green, Abel, ed. The Spice of Variety. New York: Holt, 1952.

Veblen, Thorstein (1857–1929) economist, social scientist

Born to Norwegian immigrant parents in Wisconsin, Thorstein Veblen spent his first seventeen years there and in the clannish Norwegian American farming communities of Minnesota. Although something of a misfit, he nevertheless absorbed the mores of his society and shared the anger that erupted in the 1870s and 1880s over the abuses local farmers endured at the hands of railroad monopolies and Eastern capitalists who controlled them. The populist philosophy born of this revolt informed much of Veblen’s most important works.

After studying at Carleton College; Johns Hopkins; Yale, where he received a Ph.D. in philosophy; and at Cornell, Veblen taught at several universities. In his first major work, THE THEORY OF THE LEISURE CLASS (1899), Veblen combined economic, anthropological, and social insights as he distinguished between productive and pecuniary earning, arguing that the latter, which provides no goods, could affect the economy negatively. His view of a parasitic leisure class that exploited the labor of others struck a chord with many Americans, but his ideas, satiric style, and coinage of such phrases as “conspicuous consumption” made his work controversial.

Veblen went on to publish other works that influenced the development of economic and social theory in the early twentieth century. In The Theory of Business Enterprise (1904) he questioned the “popular metaphysics” that equated the good of leaders of industry, or the “Captains of Industry” as Veblen called them, with the good of the people as a whole. In The Instinct for Workmanship and the State of the Industrial Arts (1914) he argued that man’s inherent will to work had been thwarted by predatory greed. His attack on the dominant financial order in The Vested Interests and the State of the Industrial Arts (1919) was expanded into a revolutionary proposal for the reorganization of labor into self-governing bodies in The Engineers and the Price System (1921).

Sources

Diggins, John P. Thorstein Veblen: Theorist of the Leisure Class. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1999.

Tilman, Rick. The Intellectual Legacy of Thorstein Veblen: Unresolved Issues. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Viking Press (1925– ) publishing house

This firm was founded by Harold Guinzburg and George S. Oppenheimer, who acquired the B. W. Huebsch backlist, and Huebsch became vice president of Viking that year. Viking had a strong international list. Its American authors included Dorothy PARKER, Erskine CALDWELL, and John STEINBECK. The Viking Portable Library, which was launched in 1943, included influential volumes for F. Scott FITZGERALD and William FAULKNER.

Source

“‘Enterprise . . . and Exploration’: Viking’s 25th Anniversary,” Publishers’ Weekly, 158 (9 December 1950): 2426–2429.

The Virginian by Owen Wister (New York & London: Macmillan, 1902) novel

Owen WISTER’S The Virginian, subtitled “A Horseman of the Plains,” is often considered the first WESTERN and established the pattern for the genre. Set in Wyoming cattle country in the 1870s and 1880s, the novel features a laconic hero known only as “the Virginian.” When in a poker game the Virginian is insulted by the villain Trampas, he utters what has become a deathless phrase: “When you call me that, smile.” After the Virginian marries a New England schoolmistress whom he has saved from peril, the novel reaches its climax during a confrontation between the Virginian and Trampas that features the first known shoot-out in American literature.

Sources

Fifty Years of The Virginian, 1902–1952. Laramie: University of Wyoming Library Associates, 1952.

Wright, Will. Six Guns and Society: A Structural Study of the Western. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975.

The Virginia Quarterly Review (1925– ) periodical

This literary and current-events journal publishes articles and reviews of interest to a broad audience concerned with the arts, culture, and politics. The magazine’s focus is more national than regional.

Vogue (1892– ) periodical

Founded in 1892, Vogue today is primarily a fashion magazine, but in its history it has published many important writers. In her memoir Always in Vogue, Edna Woolman Chase, who edited the magazine from 1914 to 1951, discusses how Vogue helped shaped American tastes

Source

Chase, Edna Woolman, and Ilka Chase. Always in Vogue. Garden City, N.Y., Doubleday, 1954.

Vorse, Mary Heaton (1874–1966) journalist, novelist

A pioneering labor journalist, Mary Heaton Vorse covered major strikes during the first third of the twentieth century and was active in reform efforts throughout her life. In Foot- note to Folly: Reminiscences of Mary Heaton Vorse, she tells of her involvement with the labor movement. Her most important novel, Strike! (1930), was inspired by her coverage of a violent textile strike in Gastonia, North Carolina. Vorse was associated for many years with the PROVINCETOWN PLAYERS, which she describes in Time and the Town: A Provincetown Chronicle (1942).

Source

Garrison, Dee. Mary Heaton Vorse: The Life of an American Insurgent. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.

Vachss, Andrew (1942– ) novelist, short-story writer
 Andrew Vachss, a leading writer of hard-boiled detective fiction, was born in Manhattan in 1942. He was graduated from Case Western Reserve University in 1965 and became director of ANDROS II, a maximum-security juvenile facility, in 1972. He completed a law degree at New England School of Law in 1975 and became a child welfare attorney. His first novel, Flood, appeared in 1985. The novel introduced his recurring hero, Burke, an unlicensed, ex-con private eye with a penchant for vengeance and a rock-hard moral code. Vachss's other popular novels, many of which feature Burke, are Strega (1987), Blue Belle (1988), Hard Candy (1989), Blossom (1990), Sacrifice (1991), Shella (1993), Down in the Zero (1994), Footsteps of the Hawk (1995), False Allegations (1996), Safe House (1998), Choice of Evil (1999), Dead and Gone (2000), Pain Management (2001), Only Child (2002), The Getaway Man (2003), Down Here (2004), Two Trains Running (2005), Mask Market (2006), and Terminal (2007). He has also provided the story and text for graphic novels. He continues to represent victims of child abuse.

Source

Official Website: The Zero: <<http://www.vachss.com/>> (viewed July 9, 2007).

—Marshall Boswell

Valentine, Jean (1934– ) poet

Jean Valentine was born in Chicago and graduated from Radcliffe College in 1956. Her first book, Dream Barker, and Other Poems (1965), exhibits a sophisticated handling of literary allusion and was selected for The Yale Series of Younger Poets Prize. Valentine's other collections include Pilgrims (1969); Ordinary Things (1974); The Messenger (1979); Home, Deep, Blue: New and Selected Poems (1988); Night Lake (1992); The River at Wolf (1992); The Under Voice: Selected Poems (1995); Growing Darkness, Growing Light (1997); and The Cradle of the Real Life (2000). Her Door in the Mountain: New and Collected Poems, 1965–2003 appeared in 2004. Valentine's work has been compared to Emily Dickinson's for its profound brevity; to Adrienne Rich's for its use of fragmented forms; and to Amy Lowell's for its tight focus on images.

Source

Upton, Lee. The Muse of Abandonment: Origin, Identity, Mastery, in Five American Poets. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1998.

Van Duyn, Mona (1921–2004) poet

Mona Van Duyn was born in Waterloo, Iowa. She earned a B.A. from the University of Northern Iowa in 1942 and an M.A. from the University of Iowa in 1943. With her husband, Jarvis Thurston, she cofounded and was co-editor, for twenty years, of the literary journal Perspective.

Van Duyn's first two books of poetry, Valentines to the Wide World (1958) and A Time of Bees (1964), were highly praised, and her third volume, To See, to Take (1970), won a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. In 1991 Van Duyn won the Pulitzer Prize for Near Changes (1990), and in 1992 she became the first woman named POET LAUREATE to the Library of Congress.

Although Van Duyn often wrote about her family, she is not considered an autobiographical or confessional poet. She was a master of domestic detail who pursued what she called a minimalist style, at times making use of traditional rhyme schemes such as the sonnet.

Source

Burns, Michael, ed. Discovery and Reminiscence: Essays on the Poetry of Mona Van Duyn. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1998.

Vidal, Gore (1925– ) novelist, playwright, essayist, critic

There is no human problem which could not be solved if people would simply do as I advise.

—Interview (1972)

Born at the Military Academy at West Point, New York, Eugene Luther Vidal (he took his mother's surname, Gore, at the age of fourteen) grew up in Washington, D.C., where his father worked in the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration. His maternal grandfather was Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma. As a young man Vidal developed an interest in politics that became the major concern of his novels, plays, and essays. Upon his graduation from Phillips Exeter Academy in 1943, Vidal enlisted in the U.S. Army, where he served during WORLD WAR II. His first novel, Williwaw (1946), is based on his military experience in the Aleutian Islands.

Vidal's third novel, The City and the Pillar (1948), brought controversy as well as fame. Never reticent about his homosexuality, he wrote about a young man whose homosexuality isolates him from others. Vidal's subsequent novels—The Season of Comfort (1949), A Search for the King: A Twelfth Century Legend (1950), Dark Green, Bright Red (1950), The Judgment of Paris (1952), and Messiah (1954)—were not well received, and by 1953 Vidal had turned to television writing to support himself. He also began writing potboiler detective novels under the name Edgar Box.

Vidal's Julian (1964), a novel about Julian the Apostate and the Roman world, attracted critical and popular attention. As with his later novels about American history, Vidal was able to develop a main character that mirrored many of the author's own heterodox political, social, and religious ideas. Washington, D.C. (1967), the first novel in Vidal's seven-volume American Chronicle, covers a twenty-year period beginning in 1937. The novel is a social and political novel of manners set against the background of World War II and the Korean War, the passing of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the rise and fall of Senator Joseph McCarthy. Burr (1973), the second novel in the American Chronicle, tells a revisionist account of America's Founding Fathers from the point of view of a dissenter, a man who has been at the seat of power and has seen its corruption. The novel reflected Vidal's belief that when Thomas Jefferson made the quasi-legal Louisiana Purchase, America began moving from a republic to an empire—a decline similar to the fall of ancient Rome. Burr was followed by 1876 (1976), Lincoln (1984), Empire (1987), Hollywood: A Novel of America in the 1920's (1990), and The Golden Age (2000), completing the chronicle. These novels exhibit a command of historical sources and also reflect a bias against the conventional, patriotic view of the American past and present. From presidents to very minor historical figures, Vidal portrays a vivid past and revisits historical issues in a provocative, if not always balanced, way.

Vidal returned to writing novels with Myra Breckenridge (1968) and Myron (1974), stories that challenge conventional notions of sexuality. Messiah, Kalki (1978), and Creation (1981), all set in the ancient world, represent Vidal's most expansive thoughts on the nature of civilization and the prospects for the future.

Vidal won a 1993 National Book Award for United States: Essays: 1952–1992, a collection of criticism about American literature and history. Palimpsest: A Memoir appeared in 1995; Gore Vidal, Sexually Speaking: Collected Sex Writings in 1999; and The Essential Vidal, a collection of his most important writings, also in 1999. Point to Point Navigation: A Memoir was published in 2007.

Sources

Baker, Susan, and Curtis S. Gibson. Gore Vidal: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Frank, Marcie. How to Be an Intellectual in the Age of TV: The Lessons of Gore Vidal. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2005.

Kaplan, Fred. Gore Vidal: A Biography. New York: Doubleday, 1999.

Parini, Jay, ed. Gore Vidal: Writing against the Grain. New York: Columbia University Press, 1992.

Viereck, Peter (1916–2006) historian, poet

Peter Viereck, who taught history at Mount Holyoke College for almost fifty years, was born in New York City and graduated with a B.S. in history and literature from Harvard. He later returned to Harvard and earned his M.A. in 1939 and his Ph.D. in 1942. His first book of poetry, Terror and Decorum (1948), won the 1949 Pulitzer Prize.

Viereck published several books of intellectual history, including Metapolitics: From the German Romantics to Hitler (1941) and Conservatism: From John Adams to Churchill (1956), and he is considered a founder of the early conservative movement in America. He published his New and Selected Poems in 1967 and Tide and Continuities: Last and First Poems, 1995–1938 in 1995.

Source

Henault, Mary. Peter Viereck. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Vietnam War (1954–1975)

The United States military first entered Vietnam in an advisory capacity in 1954, combat began in the 1960s, and U.S. forces did not withdraw until 1973. The war was divisive on the homefront. Antiwar protesters led what amounted to a cultural revolution, as opposition to the war broadened into a reassessment of basic assumptions about social and political values. The literary response was varied and impassioned. Supporters of the Vietnam War included John Steinbeck and James JONES, who wrote essays and books about their visits to the war scene; Jones's Viet Journal (1974) provides an account of his visit to Vietnam during the last days of U.S. involvement.

In Green Berets (1965), one of the most popular of the books that sought to reinforce traditional patriotic sentiment, Robin Moore tried to recover the heroic idea of the American mission in Vietnam by making the special forces (Green Berets) seem like cowboys.

The overwhelming tenor of the literature on Vietnam was decidedly antiwar. Writers such as Mary McCARTHY and Susan SONTAG visited North Vietnam, expressed sympathy for the North's effort to unify the country, and condemned the bombing of Vietnam by the United States. In his nonfiction reports, Dispatches (1977), Michael Herr squarely faces how his own violent tendencies were exacerbated by the war. Other memorable accounts of the war include Ron Kovic's autobiographical Born on the Fourth of July (1976); Wallace Terry's Bloods: An Oral History of the Vietnam War by Black Veterans (1984); Tim O'BRIEN's If I Die in a Combat Zone, Box Me Up and Ship Me Home (1973), a collection of autobiographical anecdotes that O'Brien called a work of "literary imagination"; Philip CAPUTO's A Rumor of War (1977); and W. D. Ehrhart's Vietnam-Perkasie: A Combat Marine Memoir (1983).

In his novel Dog Soldiers (1974), Robert Stone explores the seamy side of the war—the corruption and drug use rife in Vietnam during the U.S. occupation. Other fiction writers such as Bobbie Ann MASON (In Country [1985]), Caputo (Going After Cacciato [1978]; Indian Country [1987]), and O'Brien (The Things They Carried [1990]) wrote novels examining the war in Vietnam and the emotional turmoil caused by its aftermath. Robert Olen BUTLER's A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain (1992), a collection of stories about Vietnamese emigrés in a Louisiana town, won the 1993 Pulitzer Prize. Butler's other works include The Alleys of Eden (1981), the story of an American deserter who falls in love with a Vietnamese prostitute; On Distant Ground (1985), about a veteran returning to Vietnam in search of his lover and son; and They Whisper (1994), a novel about a Vietnam veteran and his wife.

Poets of the Vietnam War include Ehrhart (A Generation of Peace [1975]) and Walter McDonald (Caliban in Blue [1976]; After the Noise of Saigon [1988]). Ehrhart's second book of poetry, Rootless (1977), describes the experiences of a Vietnam veteran rebuilding his life after the war.

David RABE (Sticks and Bones [1971] and Streamers [1976]) is the important dramatist to emerge out of the war and to dramatize it and its aftermath. Other plays about the conflict include Barbara Garson's Macbird! (1966) and Megan Terry's musical Viet Rock (1967).

Sources

Bates, Milton J. The Wars We Took to Vietnam: Cultural Conflict and Storytelling. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.

Baughman, Ronald, ed. American Writers of the Vietnam War: W. D. Erhart, Larry Heinemann, Tim O'Brien, Walter McDonald, John M. Del Vecchio. Dictionary of Literary Biography, Documentary Series 9. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1991.

Jason, Philip K. Acts and Shadows: The Vietnam War in American Literary Culture. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000.

Vizenor, Gerald (1934– ) poet, novelist

Born in Minneapolis of Ojibway and French parents, Vizenor later became a member of the Chippewa. His father was murdered when he was eighteen months old, and he had a difficult childhood, living on a reservation, in foster homes, and with his mother and stepfather. He lied about his age to join the Minnesota National Guard at age fifteen, and two years later he joined the U.S. Army. Vizenor worked as a corrections officer while earning his B.A. (1960) at the University of Minnesota.

Vizenor is a prolific writer. He has written nine volumes of poetry, beginning with the privately published Poems Born in the Wind (1960) and including Two Wings the Butterfly (1962), Raising the Moon (1964), and Matsushima: Pine Islands: Haiku (1984). His poetry has been praised for its formal qualities. Vizenor writes about contemporary Indian life in his seven novels, including Darkness in Saint Louis Bearheart (1978), Trickster of Liberty: Tribal Heirs to a Wild Baronage (1988), Hotline Healers: An Almost Browne Novel (1997), and Chancers (2000). His short fiction has been collected in Landfill Meditation: Crossblood Stories (1991).

Vizenor's essays are collected in eight volumes, including Cross Bloods (1990), Interior Landscapes: Autobiographical Myths and Metaphors (1990), Dead Voices: Natural Agonies in the New World (1992), Manifest Manners: Postindian Warriors of Survivance (1994), and Fugitive Poses: Native American Indian Scenes of Absence and Presence (1998). Vizenor has also edited Narrative Chance: Postmodern Discourse on Native American Indian Literatures (1993), Summer in the Spring: Anishinaabe Lyric Poems and Stories (1993), and Native American Literature: A Brief Introduction and Anthology (1995).

Sources

- Blaeser, Kimberly. Gerald Vizenor: Writing in the Oral Tradition. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1996.
- Krupat, Arnold. The Turn to the Native: Studies in Criticism and Culture. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996.
- Lee, Robert, ed. Loosening the Seams: Interpretations of Gerald Vizenor. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 2000.

Vollmann, William T. (1959–2007) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

I'm . . . attracted to the extreme because frequently the extreme case illustrates the general case—and sometimes it can do this more forcefully and memorably than the ordinary is able to.

—Interview (1993)

As of 2007 William T. Vollmann has published eight novels, four of which form a projected seven-volume series dramatizing the brutal colonization of North America; three short-story collections; and two major works of nonfiction, one of which is a personal account of the author's experience with Mujahedeen fighters in Afghanistan and the other a seven-volume, three-thousand-page meditation on violence. Indeed, violence is the major preoccupation of Vollmann's work, in which the surreal metafictional strategies of Thomas Pynchon and Vladimir Nabokov are joined with journalistic adventurism and historical research.

Vollmann was born in Los Angeles, and he graduated summa cum laude from Cornell University in 1981. He then traveled to Afghanistan, returning shortly thereafter to pursue a graduate degree at the University of California at Berkeley, though he dropped out after a year. While working as a computer programmer in northern California, he wrote his first novel, You Bright and Risen Angels (1987), in which a computer programmer relates a war between humanoid bugs and the inventors of electricity. Many critics placed the novel in the then-nascent cyber-punk genre, an association Vollmann quickly upset with several follow-up volumes—The Rainbow Stories (1989), Thirteen Stories and Thirteen Epitaphs (1991), and Whores for Gloria (1991)—all of which deal with fringe figures such as prostitutes, drug addicts, and skin-head Nazis. In many of the pieces Vollmann enters the work as “the author” or “the recording angel,” and he became famous for his willing admission that, as part of his research method, he smoked crack cocaine with addicts and slept with prostitutes.

Just as Vollmann was being pigeonholed as a late incarnation of William S. Burroughs, he surprised his readers again by publishing An Afghanistan Picture Show; or, How I Saved the World (1992), which he had begun a decade earlier. The book is a self-effacing account of Vollmann's quixotic and foolish attempt to aid Afghan rebels in their battle against the Soviet Union. That same year he published the second of his Seven Dreams series, Fathers and Crows, having published the first volume, The Ice-Shirt, two years previously. Whereas The Ice-Shirt dramatizes the Vikings' violent experience on the continent prior to Columbus's arrival, Fathers and Crows deals with seventeenth-century Jesuits and their determined effort to convert Native Americans. The Rifles (1994), volume six in the projected series, combines an exploration of Canada's effort to relocate native Inuits in the 1950s with an account of John Franklin's journey to the North Pole. Argall: The True Account of Pocahontas and Captain John T. Smith (2001) is designated volume three. Like John Barth's The Sot-Weed Factor (1960) and Thomas Pynchon's Mason & Dixon (1997), the entire novel is written in a sustained parody of seventeenth-century prose.

Vollmann's other two major works of fiction are The Royal Family (2000), a novel about two brothers in northern California whose fates become deeply entangled with “The Queen of Prostitutes,” and Europe Central (2005), an equally ambitious kaleidoscopic novel that charts, through a spiraling arrangement of interlocked stories, the rise of Germany and the Soviet Union in the first half of the twentieth century. The book won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. Vollmann's seven-volume meditation on violence, Rising Up and Rising Down, appeared in 2003, followed in 2004 by a single-volume abridgement. Uncentering the Earth: Copernicus and the Revolutions of the Heavenly Spheres (2006) and Poor People (2007) are works of nonfiction.

Source

- LeClair, Tom. “The Prodigious Fiction of Richard Powers, William Vollmann and David Foster Wallace,” Critique: Studies in Contemporary Fiction, 38 (Fall 1996): 12–37.

—Marshall Boswell

Vonnegut, Kurt, Jr. (1922–2007) novelist, short-story writer

Newt remained curled in the chair. He held out his pointy hands as though a cat's cradle were strung between them. “No wonder kids grow up crazy. A cat's cradle is nothing but a bunch of X's between somebody's hands, and the little kids look and look at all those X's . . .”

“And?”

“No damn cat, and no damn cradle.”

—Cat's Cradle (1963)

Born in Indianapolis, Indiana, Kurt Vonnegut grew up in 1930s America, in a world of democratic values that he saw challenged by WORLD WAR II and its aftermath. Vonnegut's own family suffered during the Great Depression, and his father forced him to study science instead of the arts to improve his chances for a secure career. In 1943 Vonnegut left Cornell University and enlisted in the army, even though on principle he was opposed to the war.

A prisoner of war in Germany, Vonnegut came home after World War II and studied anthropology at the University of Chicago. He then worked as a publicist with General Electric and began writing novels and essays, using wit, humor, and the devices of science fiction and fantasy to demonstrate both his concern over the fate of humanity and the perversion of basic human values. In Player Piano (1952), his first novel, Vonnegut conceives of Ilium, New York, a fictional city divided between the important, professional people, and the downtrodden living on the other side of the river. The novel is set in an unspecified time not so distant from the present. Paul Proteus, the protagonist, grows disenchanted with his managerial duties at the Ilium works. Not even a beautiful wife makes him happy. He protests—as does Vonnegut—the increasing automatism of modern life and faces the choice between machine-like conformity and alienation.

Kurt Vonnegut Jr.

In Mother Night (1961), Howard W. Campbell Jr., a successful writer and producer, allows himself to be recruited by Major Frank Wirtanen as an American double agent. His role is that of a Nazi radio propagandist in Germany. As so often happens in stories of double agents, Campbell loses track of who he is and what he truly believes in. When he dies, it is for what he calls “crimes against himself,” echoing “crimes against humanity,” the phrase used at the Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals.

CAT’S CRADLE (1963) ridicules both religion and science, both of which, in Vonnegut’s view, are used by human beings to further immoral quests for power, which in turn leads to a confusion about what is real and what is an illusion. SLAUGHTERHOUSE-FIVE (1969), perhaps Vonnegut’s most important work, features Vonnegut as one of the characters and draws on his wartime experience in the bombing of Dresden, a firestorm that destroyed the city. The novel shifts between vivid realistic scenes and time-travel fantasies that include such disruptive events as the assassinations of Robert Kennedy and Martin Luther King Jr.

Vonnegut’s later novels, including Breakfast of Champions (1973), Slapstick (1976), Jailbird (1979), and Deadeye Dick (1982), are also autobiographical but without the deep seriousness and historical weight of his earlier work. Vonnegut claimed that Timequake (1997) was going to be his last novel, although he published God Bless You, Dr. Kevorkian, a novella, in 1999.

Vonnegut’s short stories are collected in Canary in a Cat House (1961), Welcome to the Monkey House (1968), and Bagombo Snuff Box: Uncollected Short Fiction (1999). He published one play, Happy Birthday, Wanda June (1971), and one teleplay, Between Time and Timbuktu: Or, Prometheus-5, a Space Fantasy (1972).

Vonnegut’s nonfiction is collected in Wampeters, Foma, and Granfalloon (Opinions) (1974), Palm Sunday: An Autobiographical Collage (1981), and Fates Worse than Death: An Autobiographical Collage of the 1980s (1991).

Principal Books by Vonnegut

Player Piano. New York: Scribners, 1952.

The Sirens of Titan. New York: Dell, 1959.

Canary in a Cat House. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1961.

Mother Night. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Gold Medal, 1961.

Cat’s Cradle. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1963.

God Bless You, Mr. Rosewater; or, Pearls Before Swine. New York, Chicago & San Francisco: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1965.

Welcome to the Monkey House. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1968.

Slaughterhouse-Five; or, The Children’s Crusade. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1969.

Happy Birthday, Wanda June. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1971.

Dust jacket for Vonnegut's 1969 novel inspired by his experience in the firebombing of Dresden at the end of World War II

Breakfast of Champions; or, Goodbye Blue Monday! New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1973.

Wampeters, Foma and Granfaloon (Opinions). New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1974.

Slapstick; or, Lonesome No More! New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1976.

Jailbird. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1979.

Sun Moon Star, by Vonnegut and Ivan Chermayeff. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.

Palm Sunday: An Autobiographical Collage. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1981.

Deadeye Dick. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1982.

Nothing Is Lost Save Honor: Two Essays. Jackson, Miss.: Nouveau, 1984.

Galápagos. New York: Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1985.

Bluebeard. New York: Delacorte, 1987.

Hocus Pocus. New York: Putnam, 1990.

Fates Worse Than Death: An Autobiographical Collage of the 1980s. New York: Putnam, 1991.

Timequake. New York: Putnam, 1997.

Bagombo Snuff Box: Uncollected Short Fiction. New York: Putnam, 1999.

God Bless You, Dr. Kevorkian. New York: Seven Stories Press, 1999.

Studying Kurt Vonnegut

At the end of his nonfiction collection Palm Sunday (1981), Kurt Vonnegut assigns a letter grade to each of his books, awarding an A+ to only two of them: CAT'S CRADLE (1963) and SLAUGHTERHOUSE-FIVE (1969). The critical consensus on Vonnegut concurs with this assessment, and the student wishing to enter Vonnegut's world should start with these two novels. Welcome to the Monkey House (1968) is the best-known collection of his short stories, and Palm Sunday provides an entry point for his voluminous nonfiction writing.

There is currently no definitive biography on Vonnegut, though Vonnegut's novels, essays, and interviews provide ample autobiographical information. The most

Dust jacket for Vonnegut's 1973 novel, which he called a fiftieth-anniversary birthday present to himself exhaustive bibliography of Vonnegut in print is Kurt Vonnegut: A Comprehensive Bibliography, edited by Asa Pieratt, Julie Huffman-Klinkowitz, and Jerome Klinkowitz (Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1987), which records in detail both primary and secondary sources. Vonnegutweb (<<http://www.vonnegutweb.com/index.html>> [viewed July 9, 2007]), a fan-created website, features a more up-to-date critical bibliography as well as transcripts for Vonnegut's often amusing public commencement speeches. Mustarazza's edited collection The Critical Response to Kurt Vonnegut (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994) provides a running commentary on Vonnegut's place within the public consciousness and academic community, collecting contemporary book reviews of each of Vonnegut's novels except Timequake and supplementing them with critical Dust jacket for Vonnegut's 1985 novel about Darwin, evolution, and natural selection articles. Other worthwhile essay collections include At Millennium's End: New Essays on the Work of Kurt Vonnegut, edited by Kevin Alexander Boon (Albany: State University of New York Press, 2001); Kurt Vonnegut: Images and Representations, edited by Mark Leeds and Peter Reed (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000); and Kurt Vonnegut, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 2000). Important single-volume discussions include William Rodney Allen's Understanding Kurt Vonnegut (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990), Lawrence Broer's Sanity Plea: Schizophrenia in the Novels of Kurt Vonnegut (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1994), and Jerome Klinkowitz's The Vonnegut Effect (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004).

—Student Guide by Jonathan Sircy

Wampanoag Tribe

The Wampanoag, which means “eastern people,” were located in Rhode Island along the Narragansett Bay and in south-eastern Massachusetts. The cultivation of staple crops—corn, beans, and squash—was supplemented by fishing the coastal waters and hunting. In the 1500s the Wampanoag made contact with Europeans who explored and fished the NEW ENGLAND coast. In 1600 the tribe numbered between twelve thousand and fifteen thousand people. By 1620 epidemics had reduced their population to about five thousand. Massasoit, their sachem, entered into peacemaking treaties with the PLYMOUTH colonists in 1621 to aid in their defense against the NARRAGANSETT. Although the Wampanoag considered this alliance as one between equals, the English viewed the Wampanoag as subordinates. Later, under the leadership of Massasoit’s son, Metacomet, war broke out as colonists encroached on native lands, and KING PHILIP’S WAR led to near annihilation of the tribe, with only around four hundred members surviving. Wamsutta, Metacomet’s brother, and his wife, Weetamoo, served as Mary White ROWLANDSON’s masters during her three-month captivity in 1675.

Source

O’Brien, Jean M. Dispossession by Degrees: Indian Land and Identity in Natick, Massachusetts, 1650–1790. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

War of 1812

The War of 1812 between the United States and Great Britain occurred over trade issues ignited by Great Britain’s attempts to prevent American commerce with France, which had become successful during the Napoleonic Wars of the French Revolution (1792–1815). Although America desired neutrality during Anglo-Franco conflicts, in 1794 the British disrupted American trade in the French West Indies when its navy seized more than 240 American merchant ships. Despite John JAY’s Treaty of 1794, which provided a momentary postponement of war, the trading and military conflicts escalated. When the 1811 Battle of Tippecanoe disclosed British plans to arm Native Americans, a formal declaration of war was imminent. On June 18, 1812, President James MADISON declared war against Great Britain. Battles north into Canada went badly, but those on the sea proved more successful; the USS Constitution defeated the Guerriere, and the United States, commanded by Stephen Decatur (1779–1820), defeated the Macedonian. In August 1814 British forces seized Washington, D.C., destroyed government buildings, and burned down the Capitol and the White House. On December 24, 1814, after great economic strain on both sides, the United States and Great Britain negotiated a treaty in Ghent, Belgium, which restored peace but did not directly address the initial issues of free trade. American casualties exceeded twenty thousand, and the cost reached $158,000,000.

Francis Scott KEY, a poet and lawyer, watched the naval bombardment of Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, from the deck of a British ship. During the night of September 13–14, 1814, Key wrote the poem “Defence of Fort M’Henry” to commemorate the surviving American flag as an enduring symbol of pride and courage. Printed in the Baltimore Patriot on September 20 and set to the music of “Anacreon in Heaven” by John Stafford Smith (1750–1836), the “Defense of Fort McHenry” begins,

*O! Say can you see by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming
Whose broad stripes and bright stars through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watch'd were so gallantly streaming?*

The poem was later retitled "The Star-Spangled Banner" and was adopted as the national anthem by an act of Congress in 1931.

Another contemporary literary response was Samuel Woodworth's (1784–1842) "The Heroes of the Lake: A Poem, in Two Books Written in the Autumn of 1813" (1814). And when Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809–1894) read in the Boston Daily Advertiser on September 14, 1830, about plans to scrap the USS Constitution, he wrote "Old Ironsides" two days later to honor the great ship; the poem begins "Ay, tear her tattered ensign down! / Long has it waved on high, / And many an eye has danced to see / That banner in the sky; / Beneath it rung the battle shout, / And burst the cannon's roar;— / The meteor of the ocean air / Shall sweep the clouds no more."

Sources

- Allison, Robert J. Stephen Decatur: American Naval Hero, 1779–1820. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2005.
Hickey, Donald R. The War of 1812: A Forgotten Conflict. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.
Molotsky, Irvin. The Flag, the Poet, and the Song: The Story of the Star-Spangled Banner. New York: Dutton, 2001.

Ward, Nathaniel (circa 1578–1652) pamphleteer

Nathaniel Ward was born in Haverhill, England, circa 1578, the son of John Ward, a Puritan minister. He received his M.A. in 1603 from Emmanuel College, Cambridge, a school known for its Puritan sympathies. He practiced law until 1616, when he went to Germany, where he was ordained two years later in the ANGLICAN CHURCH. He served as chaplain in an English factory in Ebling, Germany, until 1624, after which he returned to England, where he became a curate in a London parish until 1628 and then, in 1620, rector in Essex until 1633 when his Puritan beliefs prompted his dismissal for nonconformity.

In 1634 Ward immigrated to Massachusetts, where he became copastor at Agawam (Ipswich) until 1636. In 1641 he was asked to help compile the colony's first code of laws. An ardent defender of the Puritan way of life in NEW ENGLAND, Ward showed little tolerance in his writings for other dissenting sects. In his Simple Cobbler of Aggawam in America (1647), published in England, Ward warned of the dangers of permitting extremist religious sects to settle in New England.

He argued that the reputation of the Puritan colonies had already been sullied by "unfriendly reports of us . . . [as] an effluvium of wild opinionists, swarmed into a remote wilderness to find elbowroom for our fanatic doctrines and practices." Therefore, leaders in Massachusetts must be diligent in preventing genuine extremists from gaining a foothold in New England. "I dare take upon me," he concluded, "to be the herald of New England so far, as to proclaim to the world, in the name of the colony, that all Familists, antinomians, Anabaptists, and other enthusiasts shall have free liberty to keep away from us, and such as will come to be gone as fast as they can, the sooner the better." He returned to England the year this book was published and the Puritan movement under Oliver Cromwell became successful. He remained there until his death in October of 1652.

Works

- Ward, Nathaniel. A Religious Retreat Sounded to a Religious Army. London: Printed for Stephen Bowtell, 1647; reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: University Microfilms International, 1984.
Ward. The Simple Cobbler of Aggawam in America. London: Printed for Stephen Bowtell, 1647; reprint, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1969; Early American Imprints, 1658.

Sources

- Bradley, Patricia L. "The Unifying Pauline Sub-Text of Nathaniel Ward's The Simple Cobbler of Aggawam, Early American Literature, 34 (1999): 32–47.
Egan, James. "Nathaniel Ward and the Marprelate Tradition," Early American Literature, 15 (1980): 59–71.
Webster, Tom. Godly Clergy in Early Stuart England: The Caroline Puritan Movement, 1620–1643. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Warren, Mercy Otis (1728–1814) poet, playwright, historian, critic

Perhaps few will deny that religion, viewed merely in a political light, is after all the best cement of society, the great barrier of just government, and the only certain restraint of the passions, those dangerous inlets to licentiousness and anarchy.

—The Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (1805)

Dramatist, poet, historian, essayist, and PATRIOT, Mercy Otis Warren was born on September 25, 1728, on Cape Cod, in Barnstable, Massachusetts, the third of thirteen children born to James and Mary Allyne Otis. Her father was a successful commercial farmer, local merchant, country lawyer, and an ambitious politician. Each of his older children had a role to play in their father's plans for the future: James Jr.

Portrait of Mercy Otis Warren by John Singleton Copley, 1763

as a Boston lawyer, Joseph as manager for the family estate, Samuel Allyne as a lawyer and merchant, and Mercy as a link to another important family and a significant proponent of Republican, ANTI-FEDERALIST ideals. Although she had little formal education, Mercy Otis attended her brother James's tutoring sessions directed by their uncle, the Reverend Jonathan Russell. Though her exact participation is undocumented, this curriculum included history, literature, Latin and Greek. Mercy Otis continued to study and learn throughout her life, an education that evolved over an extended period and encompassed the influence of a diverse group of individuals, including her husband and her most intimate friends.

On November 14, 1754, Mercy Otis married James Warren (1726–1808), a successful merchant and farmer, who shared the Otis's Whiggish political orientation. The Warrens were, in fact, one of the most important families in Boston, and the marriage provided an important economic and political alliance. Mercy and James Warren had five sons: James (1757), Winslow (1759), Charles (1762), Henry (1764), and George (1766).

Mercy Otis Warren was a woman of varied and prolific literary talents. Actively interested in a wide variety of subjects, Warren exercised these interests by corresponding with a broad network of individuals, including many of the leading politicians and thinkers of her time. John ADAMS and Elbridge Gerry (1744–1814), for example, provided an audience for Warren's political opinions. Her social critiques inevitably found their way to Abigail ADAMS, the most important of the many lettered women with whom Warren interacted and corresponded. Warren also maintained a correspondence with noted British historian Catharine Sawbridge Macaulay (1731–1791). Warren was a prolific letter writer as evidenced by the three boxes of her correspondence, preserved as the Mercy Warren Papers by the Massachusetts Historical Society, which offers an unbroken record of the elite experience during the turbulent years of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and the early Republic.

Warren applied her talents with equal diligence to poetry, producing a significant and varied body of work over her lifetime that included philosophical and religious topics. Elegies, in poetry and prose, were a particular strength for Warren (see ELEGY). In "On the Death of Mrs. S. _____, Who Died within a Few Days of her Marriage" (n.d.), Warren offers condolences to the bereaved and a contemplation on the destruction of youth. This theme recurs in Warren's elegies for three of her sons.

Warren's writings tackled instructional themes as well. Concerned about the influence of polite society on young men who were away from home, Warren wrote letters and poems encouraging caution and moderation. The published letters of advice from Philip Stanhope, Lord of Chesterfield, to his son were a frequent target for Warren's criticism. Warren attacked Chesterfieldian manners in letters to her sons (one of these letters was published multiple times, beginning with its publication in the Independent Chronicle, January 18, 1781) and in her poetry. "To a Young Gentleman, Residing in France" (1782) offers similar advice to her son Winslow Warren: "Yet private virtue wants the youth's support; Leave all the fopperies of a foreign court. . . Then may thy youth and manners both engage, And smile contempt on folly's pu'ile rage."

Elegies, introspection, and instruction were not, however, uncommon subjects for female poets who wrote privately and for the few who wrote publicly during the eighteenth century. Warren stands out from this group as a political poet. Encouraged by her circle, Warren emerged as an important critic and satirist during the American Revolution. The Squabble of the Sea Nymphs; or, the Sacrifice of the Tuscaro-ros (1774) exemplifies Warren's abilities as a poet and satirist and her awareness of current events. Based on a theme suggested by John Adams but incorporating Warren's own flair with SATIRE and her familiarity with classical literature, The Squabble of the Sea Nymphs celebrates the Boston Tea Party while at the same time satirizing the role of the British and the colonial government.

Warren made her greatest contribution as a writer of satirical plays. Published anonymously in newspapers or as Quincy Nov. 24. 1813.

Madam

I have been much to blame for neglecting to acknowledge your obliging favour of Sept 12.th

I am very much obliged to you for your Civilities to my Wife my Son, Coll. Smith and my Granddaughters. My Girls have long expressed an earnest desire to see Madam Warren, and have been highly gratified by their Visit and very grateful for the kind hospitality, the social enjoyments and instructive conversations they experienced.

I congratulate you Madam on the happy Marriage of a Granddaughter who ~~you~~ once obliged us with a very short Visit. I was delighted with her manners and Accomplishments, and found her Visit much too short. May every blessing attend her and all your Family, in whose prosperity I take a constant Interest.

Governor A means notice of your Brother I thought worth preserving in your family. The oddity of the Dialogue and the particular manner of its composition were the circumstances that made it rather an object of Curiosity than Use. I think however the Traits of Character are correct.

I know not Madam what your Father, your Husband or your Brother would think of these Times. A mighty Effort of nature is in Operation, that no Understanding below that Providence which superintends and directs it, can comprehend. An entire Separation, in Government at least between America and Europe seems to be commencing; but what will be its course, when and how it will terminate; and what influence it will have upon Asia and Africa, no living Man I believe will pretend to foresee.

We have acted our parts. The Curtain will soon be drawn upon us. We must leave the future to that Providence which has protected broad­sides—the plays were not intended for performance—these satires had an immediate impact on revolutionary politics in Boston. Warren skirted the laws against libel and sedition by writing anonymously and by cloaking her subjects in thinly veiled pseudonyms. The Adulateur (1773), set in “Upper Servia,” attacked the colonial government and in particular Governor Thomas HUTCHINSON, labeling him with a stinging epithet (“Rapatio”) that was to plague him until his departure from Boston. Warren’s beloved brother, James OTIS Jr., appears in the play as Brutus, leader of the patriots. The Defeat (1773) continued the theme, depicting Rapatio and his court as a cabal of incompetent conspirators. In The Group (1775), Warren’s most accomplished political satire from the early period, she offered an informed critique of the Massachusetts Government Act, one of the so-called Intolerable Acts that effectively suspended the existing provincial government.

Three additional satires have been credited to Warren. Historians and literary critics are divided over attribution to Warren of THE BLOCKHEADS: OR, THE AFFRIGHTED OFFICERS, a satirical depiction of the British occupation of Boston. The Motley Assembly (1779), a social critique of fashion and manners, incorporates many of Warren’s literary hallmarks. The same theme appears in a third disputed satire, Sans Souci (1785), a biting critique of elite society in post-Revolutionary Boston. Once again, evidence has been presented for and against attribution to Warren.

In 1790 Warren published Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous. Including a series of poems written over the previous twenty years and two new plays, this publication was the first in which Warren publicly identified herself as the author. The two plays—The Sack of Rome and The Ladies of Castille—were written as five-act verse tragedies using historical themes. Although they are set in fifth-century Rome and sixteenth-century Spain, both plays serve as commentaries on the new American nationalism, focusing on the issue of republican virtue, in its practical rather than its philosophical application.

In 1805 Warren published her most significant work, History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution, a comprehensive three-volume compilation of facts and observations, beginning with the STAMP ACT in 1765 and ending with the close of George WASHINGTON’s second term as president. Warren’s History was not the first to be published—that distinction goes to David RAMSAY (1749–1815)—but it was the product of intensive research and lengthy analysis, delayed by the demands of family and by illness. Warren’s own papers, copies of letters to and from important Revolutionary leaders, included volumes of important information. Warren actively sought information from these and other individuals as the war was drawing to a close. Her History was successful as a publication, if somewhat controversial because it opposed the creation of a strong central government after independence. John Adams took exception to his depiction in Warren’s History, igniting a series of letters between him and Warren that as a group serve as an important historical and literary source. The letters reveal the strains in their relationship, which had widened since the close of the war. They also serve as the inspiration for a renewed friendship.

Warren’s literary career came to a close after the publication of her History. She continued to correspond and to put her own papers in order, apparently conscious of their historical value. Hampered by poor vision, she became dependent on her son James Jr., who served as her amanuensis. Warren died in her home in October 19, 1814.

Works

Warren, Mercy Otis. Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous. Boston: Printed by I. Thomas & E. T. Andrews, 1790; republished as The Plays and Poems of Mercy Otis Warren, edited by Benjamin Franklin V. Del Mar, N.Y.: Scholars’ Facsimiles and Reprints, 1980.

Warren. The History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution: Interspersed with Biographical, Political, and Moral Observations, 2 volumes. Boston: Printed by Manning and Loring for E. Larkin, 1805; Early American Imprints, second series, 9687; Indianapolis: Liberty Classics, 1988.

Warren and John Adams. Correspondence between John Adams and Mercy Warren. 1878. Edited by Charles F. Adams. New York: Arno, 1972.

Warren and Elbridge Gerry. A Study in Dissent: The Warren-Gerry Correspondence, 1776–1792, edited by C. Harvey Gardiner. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Sources

Anthony, Katharine. First Lady of the Revolution: The Life of Mercy Otis Warren. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958; Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972.

Harris, Sharon M. Women’s Early American Historical Narratives. New York: Penguin, 2003.

Richards, Jeffrey H. Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Richards. Mercy Otis Warren. New York: Twayne / London: Prentice Hall, 1995.

Zagarri, Rosemarie. A Woman’s Dilemma: Mercy Otis Warren and the American Revolution. Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995.

Recommended Writings

The Warren-Gerry Correspondence (1776–1792)

Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous (1790)

The History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution . . . (1805)

Correspondence between John Adams and Mercy Warren (1878)

Studying Mercy Otis Warren

Mercy Otis Warren was a historian and playwright whose extensive correspondence provides valuable perspectives on early American culture and politics. Recent authoritative biographies include Jeffrey H. Richards's Mercy Otis Warren (New York: Twayne, 1995) and Rosemarie Zagarri's A Woman's Dilemma: Mercy Otis Warren and the American Revolution (Wheeling, Ill.: Harlan Davidson, 1995). For a profile of Warren, see Cheryl Oreovicz's "Mercy Otis Warren (1728–1814)" (Legacy, 13 [1996]: 54–64). Earlier important biographies include Alice Brown's Mercy Warren (New York: Scribners, 1896); Katharine Anthony's First Lady of the Revolution: The Life of Mercy Otis Warren (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958 / Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972); and Jean Fritz's Cast for a Revolution: Some American Friends and Enemies, 1728–1814 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1972). Selected Warren writings are available in American Women Writers to 1800, edited by Sharon M. Harris (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996) and Harris's Women's Early American Historical Narratives (New York: Penguin, 2003). A selection of Warren's correspondence is provided in Correspondence between John Adams and Mercy Warren, edited by Charles F. Adams (New York: Arno, 1972) and A Study in Dissent: The Warren-Gerry Correspondence, 1776–1792, edited by C. Harvey Gardiner (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1968). Archival sources include the Mercy Warren Papers (1709–1814) and the Warren-Adams papers (1767–1822), housed at the Massachusetts Historical Society in Boston.

For critical works about Mercy Otis Warren in the context of her historical period, see Pauline E. Schloesser's The Fair Sex: White Women and Racial Patriarchy in the Early American Republic (New York: New York University Press, 2002) and Kate Davies's Catharine Macaulay and Mercy Otis Warren: The Revolutionary Atlantic and the Politics of Gender (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005).

Students interested in Warren's plays and the study of early American DRAMA should consult Worthington Chauncey Ford's "Mrs. Warren's 'The Group'" (Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society, 62 [October 1928]: 15–22); Krystan V. Douglas's "A Question of Authorship: Mercy Otis Warren and The Blockheads" (Theatre Survey, 30 [May–November 1989]: 85–92); Richards's Theater Enough: American Culture and the Metaphor of the World Stage, 1607–1789 (Durham: Duke University Press, 1991); Oreovicz's "Heroic Drama for Uncertain Age: The Plays of Mercy Otis Warren," in Early American Literature and Culture: Essays Honoring Harrison T. Meserole, edited by Kathryn Zabelle Derounian-Stodola, 1992: 192–210; Philip Hicks's "Portia and Marcia: Female Political Identity and the Historical Imagination, 1770–1800" (William & Mary Quarterly, 62 [2005]: 265–294); and Richards's Drama, Theatre, and Identity in the American New Republic (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005).

For studies focused on Warren as an historian, see Elizabeth F. Ellet's Revolutionary Women in the War for American Independence, volume 1 (New York: Baker & Scribner, 1848); William Raymond Smith's History As Argument: Three Patriot Historians of the American Revolution (The Hague: Mouton, 1967); and Nina Baym's "Between Enlightenment and Victorian: Toward a Narrative of American Women Writing History" (Critical Inquiry, 18, no. 1 [Autumn 1991]: 22–41).

Washington, George (1732–1799) soldier, statesman, commander of the Continental Army, first president of the United States

Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness.

—Washington's First State of the Union Address,
January 8, 1790

Washington is usually ignored as a writer of early American literature. Much of his work, in diary form, dealt with daily concerns, administrative, personal or otherwise, and was not intended for the public. Yet, Washington did have a flair for the written word, despite his limited formal education. Washington's patriotism and devotion to the nation he helped create come through in much of his private correspondence. The themes of his writing mark him as a man of his social class and historical era. They include honor, duty, and discipline, the advantages of the philosophy of John Locke (1632–1704), and individual commitment to liberty.

Born February 22, 1732, at Wakefield Plantation in Virginia, Washington was the eldest of six children from the second marriage of his father, Augustine Washington. George's education was rudimentary, but along the way he learned surveying. His father died when George was eleven, and his half brother Lawrence became a surrogate father. Throughout the late 1740s and the 1750s Washington worked as a surveyor and served in the Virginia militia, where he rose to the rank of colonel. His first major combat operation was in 1754 against the French at Fort Necessity, Pennsylvania, challenging their control of the Ohio Valley. The failure of the operation contributed to the outbreak of the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, which in turn precipitated the difficulties between the colonies and Britain.

In 1758 Washington produced his first literary effort, The Journal of Major George Washington, Sent by the Honorable Robert Dinwiddie, Esq.; His Majesty's Lieutenant-Governor and Commander in Chief of Virginia, to the Commandant of the French Forces on Ohio (1754). The journal is a simple retelling, taken from rough notes, of Washington's expedition against the French.

In 1759 Washington married Martha Dandridge Custis. Between 1759 and 1774 he managed his Virginia plantation and served in the Virginia House of Burgesses, where he supported the initial protests against British policies. He represented Virginia at the First and Second Continental Congresses, and in 1775 was appointed commander in chief of the Continental Army. Despite an under-supplied amateur army, Washington managed to lead the Americans to victory in 1781. A national hero, he resolutely resisted any attempts to make him king or to head a military junta. When news of a plot by military officers to overthrow the civil government reached him, Washington drafted The Newburgh Address (1783). It effectively put an end to the plot. Addressing his officers at the encampment at Newburgh, Washington declared,

Portrait of George Washington, Colonel of the Virginia Regiment, by Charles Willson Peale, 1772

While I give you these assurances, and pledge my self in the most unequivocal manner, to exert whatever ability I am possessed of, in your favor—let me entreat you, gentlemen, on your part, not to take any measures, which, viewed in the calm light of reason, will lessen the dignity, & sully the glory you have hitherto maintained—let me request you to rely on the plighted faith of your country, and place a full confidence in the purity of the intentions of Congress. . . .

In 1783 Washington returned to civilian life at his beloved plantation, Mount Vernon. The failures of the confederation government drew him back into public service, however, and he served as presiding officer at the constitutional convention in 1787. “The confederation,” he explained in a letter to a friend, “appears to me to be little more than a shadow without the substance, and Congress a nugatory body, their ordinances being little attended to.” Washington believed that the United States could become “one of the most respectable nations upon earth,” but to do so required a strong, active central government. Upon the ratification of the CONSTITUTION in 1788, George Washington was unanimously elected the first president of the United States; he served two terms, from 1789 to 1797.

During his presidency, Washington demonstrated a willingness to use presidential power but to remain respectful of the prerogatives of the then fledgling Congress. Washington tried in vain to remain above the developing factions of his government but became strongly identified with the FEDERALISTS rather than the emerging Jeffersonian Republicans. In foreign affairs he settled boundary disputes with Britain and Spain on the continent, but refused to be drawn into the war between England and France following the French Revolution.

In 1796 Washington retired, refusing to serve for a third term as president. In his Farewell Address, widely recognized as his single most important piece of work (although it was written with the help of Alexander HAMILTON and, to a lesser degree, James MADISON), he urged the American people to avoid both the divisiveness of factions, sectional and party, and the dangers of foreign entanglements.

Washington, who in his own lifetime was referred to as “the father of his country,” died at Mount Vernon on December 14, 1799.

Works

- Washington, George. Newburgh Address. 1783. Boston: N.p., 1966.
- Washington. Washington's Farewell Address to the People of the United States. 1796. Washington, D.C.: For sale by the Supt. of Docs., U.S.G.P.O., 1998.
- Washington. The Writings of George Washington, 1745–1799, edited by John C. Fitzpatrick, 39 volumes. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1931–1944.
- Washington. The Diaries of George Washington, 6 volumes, edited by Donald Jackson and Dorothy Twohig. Charlottesville, Va.: University Press of Virginia, 1976–1979.

Washington. The Papers of George Washington, 52 volumes to date, edited by W. W. Abbot. Charlottesville, Va.: University Press of Virginia, 1981–1999.

Sources

- Achenbach, Joel. The Grand Idea: George Washington's Potomac and the Race to the West. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2004.
- Brookhiser, Richard. Founding Father: Rediscovering George Washington. New York: Free Press, 1996.
- Ellis, Joseph J. His Excellency: George Washington. New York: Knopf, 2004.
- Freeman, Douglas Southall. George Washington, 7 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1948–1957.
- Randall, Willard Sterne. George Washington: A Life. New York: Holt, 1997.
- Wills, Garry. Cincinnatus: George Washington and the Enlightenment. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1984.

Recommended Writings

- The Newburgh Address (1783)
The Farewell Address (1796)

Studying George Washington

George Washington was the first president of the United States, a military leader, farmer, and statesman. The Library of Congress lists over one thousand items in its general catalog on Washington. Multivolume biographies of Washington include Douglas Freeman's George Washington: A Biography, 7 volumes (New York: Scribners, 1948–1957) and James Flexner's George Washington, 4 volumes (Boston: Little, Brown, 1965–1972). More-accessible single-volume biographies include Marcus Cunliffe's George Washington: Man and Monument (Boston: Little, Brown, 1958) and James MacGregor Burns and Susan Dunn's George Washington (New York: Times Books, 2004). For the authoritative edition of Washington's writings, see The Papers of George Washington, edited by W. W. Abbot and others (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1983– ). Washington's personal writings are collected in The Diaries of George Washington, 6 volumes, edited by Donald Jackson and Dorothy Twohig (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1976–1979).

Notable recent biographical studies include John Richard Alden's George Washington: A Biography (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1984); George Washington Reconsidered, edited by Don Higginbotham (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001); Henry Wiencek's An Imperfect God: George Washington, His Slaves, and the Creation of America (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 2003); and Joseph J. Ellis's His Excellency: George Washington (New York: Knopf, 2004). Earlier biographies providing important information include Douglas Southall Freeman's George Washington, a Biography (New York: Scribners, 1948) and James Thomas Flexner's Washington, the Indispensable Man (Boston: Little, Brown, 1974).

For general historical background and study of Mount Vernon, see William Alfred Bryan's George Washington in American Literature, 1775–1865 (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1952; 1970) and Robert F. Dalzell Jr. and Lee Brown Dalzell's George Washington's Mount Vernon: At Home in Revolutionary America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1998).

Among the many studies devoted to Washington's military career, students will find the following works helpful: Burke Davis's George Washington and the American Revolution (New York: Random House, 1975); Don Higginbotham's George Washington and the American Military Tradition (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985); John Buchanan's The Road to Valley Forge: How Washington Built the Army That Won the Revolution (Hoboken, N.J.: John Wiley & Sons, 2004); Edward G. Lengel's General George Washington: A Military Life (New York: Random House, 2005); and Thomas J. Fleming's Washington's Secret War: The Hidden History of Valley Forge (New York: Smithsonian Books/Collins, 2005).

For a study of Washington's presidency, see Forrest McDonald's The Presidency of George Washington (Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1994) and Richard Norton Smith's Patriarch: George Washington and the New American Nation (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1993). Printed bibliographies include William Spohn Baker's Bibliotheca Washingtoniana; A Descriptive List of the Biographies and Biographical Sketches of George Washington (Detroit: Gale Research, 1967) and Alan M. Fusonie and Jean Fusonie's A Selected Bibliography on George Washington's Interest in Agriculture (Davis: Agricultural History Center, University of California, 1976).

For scholarly information on George Washington available through electronic sources, students should explore The Papers of George Washington Documentary Editing Project at the University of Virginia (<<http://gwpapers.virginia.edu/>> viewed May 2, 2007) and The George Washington Papers at the Library of Congress, 1741–1799 (<<http://memory.loc.gov/ammem/gwhtml/gwhome.html>> viewed May 3, 2007). For more general biographical study, see George Washington's Mount Vernon (<<http://www.mountvernon.org/>> viewed May 3, 2007). Students interested in portraiture should explore the special exhibit from The National Portrait Gallery and the Smithsonian Institute, "George Washington: A National Treasure" (<<http://www.georgewashington.si.edu/>> viewed May 3, 2007).

Webster, Noah (1758–1843) educator, grammarian, journalist

Noah Webster was born in West Hartford, Connecticut, on October 16, 1758, the son of Noah Webster, a farmer and justice of the peace, and Mercy Steele Webster, a descendant of William BRADFORD. Following early preparatory training with a local minister, the young Webster attended Yale College in 1774 at significant expense to his family, graduating in 1778, after serving briefly in the AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Following his graduation, he worked as a teacher and clerk in order to pay for his part-time studies as a lawyer. Webster's law career was brief. Admitted to the bar in 1781, he delayed practice until 1789. That same year he married Rebecca Greenleaf, daughter of a Boston merchant. They had two sons and six daughters.

Webster was active as a lawyer until 1793, when he decided to leave the legal profession and return to teaching. In 1783 Webster published an elementary speller, A Grammatical Institute of the English Language. His interest in English anticipated and advanced the growing movement for Americanization of the language; his dominance in this field is what Webster is best known for today. Webster expanded the speller, adding a grammar in 1784 and a reader in 1785, incorporating American spellings and American geographic and historical references. Accordingly, subsequent editions were published with revised titles that emphasized their nationalist bent: An American Spelling Book and, for the expanded edition, An American Selection of Lessons in Reading and Speaking (1787). As an author Webster was successful in volumes sold, longevity, and impact. The first edition sold five thousand copies. By 1837 more than fifteen million copies had been sold. An additional forty-five million copies were sold over the next fifty-three years. More important, Webster's speller played a major role in the standardization of spelling and pronunciation.

The speller and reader made Webster a common name in the classroom. Both works were reprinted without Webster's authorization; in order to avoid substantial losses in profit, Webster led the fight for enforceable copyright laws at the state level. The experience converted him to the nationalist cause. Beginning in 1783, Webster emerged as an important advocate of the FEDERALIST movement, publishing a series of articles in The Connecticut Courant and a pamphlet, Sketches of American Policy (1785).

Webster also emerged as one of the best-traveled Americans of his time. He ranged widely through the NEW REPUBLIC, advocating standardized copyright legislation and promoting his books. He paid his way by teaching classes and giving public lectures, and the experience paid dividends. Book sales increased, and Webster became a practiced and sought-after lecturer. In 1789 he published Dissertations on the English Language, a collection of five original lectures. Webster also worked at perfecting his speller, experimenting with Benjamin FRANKLIN's phonetic alphabet and eventually settling on an orthographic or standard spelling method that had a long-term influence on the teaching of English grammar.

In 1793 Webster became a publisher. He had already gained some experience in journalism writing editorials and pamphlets and editing a short-lived journal, The American Magazine (1787). In 1793 he relocated to New York for a second time and established two Federalist organs—The Minerva (later The Commercial Advertiser), a daily newspaper, and The Herald (later The Spectator), a semiweekly newspaper—both first published in 1794. He remained active as a publisher for the next ten years.

Webster left journalism for good and returned to his interests in language and education, publishing a series of highly successful school texts, including The Little Reader's Assistant (1790) and Elements of Useful Knowledge, which was published as a series from 1802 to 1806. Webster also published a collection of essays, a medical history, and an edited version of John WINTHROP's Journal (1790).

In 1806, with the publication of A Compendious Dictionary of the English Language, Webster took the first step to becoming the best-known American lexicographer. He perfected his methodology over the next two decades and in 1828 published An American Dictionary of the English Language, a massive two-volume work unequaled in size and style. Although already somewhat dated when it was published, Webster's dictionary included original and derivative meanings along with British and American definitions for words. For the balance of his life Webster continued to improve on his dictionary, while working on other publications. He died in New Haven on May 28, 1843.

Webster is best known as a lexicographer. With over sixty million copies of his Spelling Book sold by 1890, Webster provided Americans with a standardized English that represented distinctions from British usage. Along with his Dictionary and various essays on science, economics, grammar, and notable persons, Webster emphasized American cultural, linguistic, and social contributions.

Works

Webster, Noah. An American Spelling Book. Philadelphia: Young & McCulloch, 1787; New York: Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1962; Early American Imprints, 20863, 20864.

Webster, ed. American Magazine. 1787–1788; Early American Imprints, 20191, 20925.

Webster. Dissertations on the English Language, 1789. Boston: Printed for the author by Isaiah Thomas, 1789; Menston: U.K.: Scolar, 1967; Early American Imprints, 22259.

Webster. An American Dictionary of the English Language, 2 volumes. New York: S. Converse, 1828; reprinted as Noah Webster's First Edition of an American Dictionary of the English Language. San Francisco: Foundation for American Christian Education, 1979.

Webster. A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects. New York: Webster & Clark, 1843; New York: Burt Franklin, 1968; Early American Imprints, 31593.

Webster. The Autobiographies of Noah Webster: From the Letters and Essays, Memoir, and Diary, edited by Richard Rollins. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1989.

Sources

Micklethwait, David. Noah Webster and the American Dictionary. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2000.

Snyder, K. Alan. Defining Noah Webster: Mind and Morals in the Early Republic. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1990.

Unger, Harlow G. Noah Webster: The Life and Times of an American Patriot. New York: John Wiley, 1998.

Weems, Mason Locke (1759–1825) writer

Mason Locke “Parson” Weems, the most notable writer of political folklore in the early nineteenth century, was born October 11, 1759, at Marshes Seat, Herring Bay, Maryland, to a Scottish farmer and his second wife. As a youth, Weems attended school in Maryland, and in 1773 he went to England in the midst of the AMERICAN REVOLUTION to train for the Anglican priesthood to study medicine. He returned to Maryland in 1776 and then returned to England in 1781. Ordained in 1784, Weems went back to Maryland to serve as pastor in a variety of parishes over the next decade.

By 1792 Weems had added a second career to supplement his ministerial income. Working as a traveling BOOKSELLER, he apparently was inspired to become a writer himself. His experience persuaded him that the literate public was fascinated by moralistic and patriotic themes. Thus, he wrote biographies that celebrated and embellished the virtues of important American political and military figures. In 1798 he married Frances Sewall, with whom he had ten children. The family lived in Virginia. Between 1800 and 1822 he published works on the Revolutionary War guerilla fighter Francis Marion (1732–1795); diplomat, printer, and political leader Benjamin FRANKLIN; and the founder of the QUAKER colony of Pennsylvania, William PENN. In researching his subjects, Weems rarely analyzed his sources with rigor. He based much of his Franklin biography, for example, on Franklin’s AUTOBIOGRAPHY. In his works, Weems often relied on anecdotes to make a point.

Weems is best remembered for his biography of George WASHINGTON. The first edition of A History of the Life and Death, Virtues, and Exploits of General George Washington, published in 1800, a year after Washington’s death, was eighty pages long. Weems eventually expanded it to three times the original length, in part to accommodate the public appetite and in part to rebut John Marshall’s (1755–1835) five-volume portrayal of Washington, which appeared between 1804 and 1807. During Weems’s lifetime this version of his Washington biography went through thirty editions, introducing the myth of Washington’s confession to chopping down a cherry tree, which first appeared in the 1806 edition.

Weems’s biographies interest cultural historians because they provide insight into many of the dilemmas facing Americans in the early Republic. The Life of Washington blended values central to revolutionary republicanism—a fading culture by 1800—and liberalism—an emerging one. Thus, Washington was depicted as a man who displayed civic virtue by sacrificing for his country and providing disinterested leadership; but he was also portrayed as a paragon of honesty, diligence, and temperance. This biography was less a sermonistic tale and hagiography than an instructional work meant to be used in American schools. McGuffey’s readers and middle-class etiquette manuals later trumpeted the same liberal traits. When “Parson” Weems died May 23, 1825, he was the undisputed mythmaker of the early Republic.

Works

Weems, Mason Locke. A History of the Life and Death, Virtues, and Exploits of General George Washington, with Curious Anecdotes, Equally Honourable to Himself and Exemplary to His Young Countrymen. George-Town, S.C.: Printed for the Rev. M. L. Weems by Green & English, 1800; Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1962; Early American Imprints, 39061, 39062, 39063.

Weems. The Life of Gen. Francis Marion in the Revolutionary War, against the British and Tories in South Carolina and Georgia. Philadelphia: Mathew Carey, 1809.

Weems. The Life of Dr. Benjamin Franklin, Written Chiefly by Himself. Baltimore: Printed by Ralph W. Pomeroy, 1815; enlarged as The Life of Benjamin Franklin, with Many Choice Anecdotes and Admirable Sayings of this Great Man. Philadelphia: Mathew Carey, 1818; Early American Imprints, second series, 42864.

Source

Leary, Lewis Gaston. The Book-Peddling Parson: An Account of the Life and Works of Mason Locke Weems, Patriot, Pitchman, Author, and Purveyor of Morality to the Citizenry of the Early United States of America. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Algonquin, 1984.

Wheatley, Phillis (1753/1754–1784) poet

*Some view our sable race with scourful eye,
‘Their colour is a diabolic die’
Remember, Christians, Negroes, black as Cain,
May be refin’d, and join th’ angelic train.
—“On Being Brought from Africa to America” (1773)*

Phillis Wheatley, one of the earliest African American women to publish in North America, is believed to have been born in Senegal in 1753 or 1754. At the age of seven or eight, she arrived in Boston on July 11, 1761 aboard the slave ship the Phillis and shortly afterward purchased by John Wheatley, a wealthy Boston tailor, to work as a domestic servant for his wife Susanna Wheatley. The Wheatleys named their new slave after the ship that brought her to America.

The Wheatley family soon noticed the young African girl’s gift for language. Phillis became fluent in spoken English in a remarkably short time. John and Susanna, impressed by her “sharp intellect,” decided to educate her on a par with their own children, a rare decision for eighteenth-century colonial slaveholders. Wheatley learned to read and write quickly and moved on to the study of Latin.

Phillis Wheatley

Engraving of Phillis Wheatley from the frontispiece for her Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, 1773

She soon demonstrated a talent for poetry. In 1767 she published "On Messrs. Hussey and Coffin" in the Rhode Island Newport Mercury. Other poems followed, appearing in various magazines. Then, in 1770, Wheatley earned the attention of Boston's literary elite with her tribute to a leading minister of the religious revivalist movement of the 1740s and 1750s, known popularly as the GREAT AWAKENING. The poem, An Elegiac Poem, on the Death of That Celebrated Divine, and Eminent Servant of Jesus Christ, the Reverend and Learned George Whitefield, established her as a literary phenomenon.

The Wheatley family emancipated Phillis Wheatley before her arrival in London on May 8, 1773, to promote her forthcoming book of poems and to meet with her generous benefactor, the Countess Huntingdon. The trip was financed by John and Susanna, and there she was eagerly feted by English nobility and literary circles. Although she had been unable to find a publisher for her work in America, British publisher Archibald Bell had agreed to publish her poems under the title Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773). This collection secured her literary legacy and historical significance. Wheatley returned to Boston on September 13, 1773, and she was manumitted on October 18, 1773.

Wheatley continued to write, expressing in her poetry both her devotion to Christianity and her support of American independence. George WASHINGTON, to whom Wheatley had dedicated a poem, arranged to have a Virginia newspaper publish her appeal to Americans to extend liberty to their slaves. Wheatley's patriotism did not translate into a livable income; by war's end she was in desperate financial straits.

On March 12, 1778, Wheatley married John Peters, a free black Bostonian. The Peterses had three children, two of whom died before the Revolution ended. The marriage was marked by constant financial difficulties. When John Peters was jailed for debt, Phillis Wheatley Peters found herself without friends to assist her. John and Susanna Wheatley were dead. Thus the poet supported herself and her family by working as a laundress in a boardinghouse that catered to black Bostonians.

Although she had hoped to publish a second book of poems, Wheatley, who grew ill and was overworked, died on December 5, 1784. Her youngest child, then a toddler, died a few hours afterward.

Works

Wheatley, Phillis. Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral. London: A. Bell, 1773; Early American Imprints, 19913, 25983.

Wheatley. Complete Works, edited by Vincent Carretta. New York: Penguin, 2001.

Sources

Richmond, Merle A. Bid the Vassal Soar: Interpretive Essays on the Life and Poetry of Phillis Wheatley (ca. 1753–1784) and George Moses Horton (ca. 1797–1883). Washington: Howard University Press, 1974.

Robinson, William Henry and Kathryn Zabelle Derounian, eds. Critical Essays on Phillis Wheatley. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982.

Recommended Writings

"Letter to the Rt. Hon'ble the Countess of Huntingdon" (1770)

"On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield 1770" (1770)

"To Mæcenas" (1772)

"To the Right Honourable William, Earl of Dartmouth, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for North-America, & Etc." (circa 1772)

"Farewell to America" (1773)

O To the University of Cambridge wrote in 1767—
 While an intrinsic ardor bids me write
 The muse doth promise to assist my pen.
 'Twas but e'en now I left my native shore
 The sable Land of error's darkest night
 There, sacred Nine! for you no place was found.
 Parent of science, 'twas thy powerful hand Brought me in safety from the dark abodes (Heav'n in
 To you, bright youths! he points the heights of
 To you, the knowledge of the depths profound
 Above, contemplate the ethereal space
 And glorious Systems of revolving worlds.
 Still more, ye Sons of Science! you've relieved
 The pleasing sound by messengers from heav'n,
 The saviour's blood, for your redemption flows.

Manuscript page from "An Address to the University of Cambridge Wrote in 1767" by Phillis Wheatley, then age fourteen

"On Being Brought from Africa to America" (1773)
 "To the University of Cambridge, in New England" (1773)
 Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral (1773)
 "To His Excellency General Washington" (1776)

Studying Phillis Wheatley

Phillis Wheatley, a Senegalese slave and the first African poet from early America to be published, was well known during her lifetime and was celebrated throughout America and England. For primary works, the student will be well served by the Penguin edition of her writings, edited by Vincent Carretta. An important contemporary biography that students should consult is Henry Louis Gates Jr.'s The Trials of Phillis Wheatley: America's First Black Poet and Her Encounters with the Founding Fathers (New York: Basic Civitas Books, 2003). Notable earlier biographies on Wheatley include Benjamin Griffith Brawley's Early Negro American Writers Selections with Biographical and Critical Introductions (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1935); Brawley's Negro Builders and Heroes (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1937); Martha Sherman Bacon's Puritan Promenade (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1964); William Henry Robinson's Phillis Wheatley in the Black American Beginnings (Detroit: Broadside Press, 1975); and Merle A. Richmond's Bid the Vassal Soar; Interpretive Essays on the Life and Poetry of Phillis Wheatley (ca. 1753–1784) and George Moses Horton (ca. 1797–1883) (Washington: Howard University Press, 1974).

Critical studies about Phillis Wheatley and her eighteenth-century culture include Critical Essays on Phillis Wheatley, edited by William Henry Robinson and Kathryn Zabelle Derounian (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1982); Robinson's Phillis Wheatley and Her Writings (New York: Garland, 1984); Philip M. Richards's "Phillis Wheatley and Literary Americanization" (American Quarterly, 44 [June 1992]: 163–191); and Carretta and Philip Gould's Genius in Bondage: Literature of the Early Black Atlantic (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2001).

For more-specific study of religious themes and Wheatley's poetry, see George Rigsby, "Form and Content in Phillis Wheatley's Elegies" (CLA Journal, 19 [December 1975]: 248–257); Rigsby's "Phillis Wheatley's Craft as Reflected in Her Revised Elegies" (Journal of Negro Education, 47 [Fall 1978]: 402–413); James A. Levernier, "Phyllis Wheatley and the New England Clergy" (Early American Literature, 26, no. 1 [1991]: 21–38); and Michele McKay and William J. Scheick's "The Other Song in Phillis Wheatley's 'On Imagination'" (Studies in the Literary Imagination, 27, no. 1 [1994]: 71–84).

The MLA bibliography is an important source for recent publications. A reliable earlier source is Robinson's Phillis Wheatley: A Bio-Bibliography (Boston: G.K. Hall, 1981).

Phillis Wheatley's poems, letters, original manuscripts, and first editions are located in many libraries, such as the Boston Public Library; Duke University Library; MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY; AMERICAN ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY; Houghton Library at Harvard University; the Schomburg Collection in New York City; Dartmouth College; and in various British repositories, such as the Cambridge University Library and the British Library.

White, John (1575–1648) minister

Puritan minister John White was born in the winter of 1575 in Oxfordshire, England, the son of John and Isabel White.

He attended Winchester College and New College, Oxford, where he received his M.A. degree in 1600 and where he remained as a fellow for six additional years. In 1606 White married Anne Burgess, with whom he produced a family of four sons.

As pressure against nonconformist Protestants increased in England, White began to consider creating a refuge for Puritans in America. Along with other Puritans, he organized the Dorchester Company in 1623 and soon afterward helped found the Massachusetts Bay Company, which received a royal CHARTER in 1629. Although he never emigrated, remaining as rector of Trinity Church in Dorchester, England, for forty years, he played a crucial role in securing the patent and the necessary supplies for the early colonists. In American history White is remembered for his role as a founder of the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY.

Several of John White's most important publications focus on the issues and history of colonization. The Humble Request (1630), a petition attributed to White and signed by Governor WINTHROP and others, is a brief for royal tolerance, if not support, of the founding of a dissenter colony in Massachusetts. The Planters Plea (1630) extends White's advocacy of the Massachusetts Bay Colony project. In it White argues that the idea for such a colony was divinely inspired and cites the biblical injunction to "replenish the earth, and to subdue it" as a justification for colonization.

Works

White, John. The Planters Plea. London: Printed by William Iones, 1630; New York: Da Capo, 1968.

White. The Puritans' Farewell to England; Being the Humble Request of the Governor and Company of the Massachusetts-Bay in New England About to Depart Upon the Great Emigration, April 7, 1630. London, Printed for John Bellamie, 1630; facsimile, New York: New England Society, 1912.

Sources

Rose-Troup, Frances James. John White, the Patriarch of Dorchester and the Founder of Massachusetts, 1575–1648, with an Account of the Early Settlements in Massachusetts, 1620–1630. New York & London: Putnam, 1930.

Staloff, Darren. The Making of an American Thinking Class: Intellectuals and Intelligentsia in Puritan Massachusetts. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

Whitefield, George (1714–1770) evangelist

George Whitefield was born December 27, 1714, in Gloucester, England, and attended Oxford University, where he encountered John and Charles Wesley, the founders of Methodism. When the Wesleys went to America to spread the movement, Whitefield became its leader in England. Even as a young man, Whitefield was known for his zeal and his self-confidence, which arose, in part, from his firm belief that he was a divinely inspired teacher. Following a brief visit to Georgia in 1738, Whitefield returned home to discover that the Church of England had closed the pulpit to him. Undaunted, the young minister began preaching at outdoor meetings.

In 1739 Whitefield returned to the American colonies, where he was a major (if not the major) impetus for the GREAT AWAKENING, attracting such influential ministers as Jonathan EDWARDS to revivalism. Whitefield, who eventually broke with the Wesleys, made at least seven trips back and forth across the Atlantic between the 1740s and 1760s. Eschewing a particular pulpit, he declared that “all the world is my parish, and I will preach wherever God gives me opportunity.” Opportunities arose frequently: Whitefield preached eighteen thousand sermons in his lifetime—in England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland, and the colonies. In such sermons as The Eternity of Hell-Torments (1738), Thankfulness for Mercies Received, a Necessary Duty (1738), and The Heinous Sin of Drunkenness (1739), he expressed his unshakable faith in predestination and in regeneration through a “new birth.” He ignored the labels given to members of differing sects: “Don’t tell me you are a Baptist, or Independent, Presbyterian, a Dissenter,” he once instructed his audience, “tell me you are a Christian, that is all I want.” Whitefield died September 30, 1770, in Boston, Massachusetts. The following year six volumes of his writings were collected and published in The Works of the Reverend George Whitefield (1771).

Whitefield’s style was characterized by an unbridled enthusiasm and fervor and by his willingness to speak of his personal, intimate relationship with God, as in A Short Account of God’s Dealings with the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield (1740). In 1739, Benjamin FRANKLIN noted Whitefield’s immense popularity: “The Multitudes of all Sects and Denominations that attended his Sermons were enormous.” In Phillis WHEATLEY’s well-known eulogy “On the Death of the Rev. Mr. George Whitefield,” she too praises Whitefield’s preaching:

*Thy sermons in unequalled accents flowed,
And ev’ry bosom with devotion glowed;
Thou didst, in strains of eloquence refined,
Inflame the heart, and captivate the mind.*

As the fervor of the Great Awakening diminished, however, Whitefield’s appeal became more theatrical than theological. Audiences came to see the man himself and to watch his preaching style rather than to listen to his message. Whitefield died in 1770. In the following two years, six volumes of his writings were collected and published as The Works of the Reverend George Whitefield.

Work

Whitefield, George. The Works of the Reverend George Whitefield. London: Printed for Edward & Charles Dilly, 1771–1772; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1985.

Sources

- Lambert, Frank. Pedlar in Divinity: George Whitefield and the Transatlantic Revivals, 1737–1770. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- Stout, Harry S. The Divine Dramatist: George Whitefield and the Rise of Modern Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1991.

Wieland by Charles Brockden Brown (New York:

T. & J. Swords, 1798) novel

Wieland; Or, The Transformation. An American Tale, a GOTHIC ROMANCE set in Mettigen, Pennsylvania, tells of the “extraordinary and rare” incidents that befell the Wieland family. The novel begins in approximately 1763, after the FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR, and ends in 1775, just prior to the Revolutionary War. The narrative is framed as a letter written by Clara Wieland to a friend. After experiencing the childhood loss of their father, a German mystic who spontaneously combusted, and then their mother’s death, Clara and her brother, Theodore, are left to ponder religious and scientific mysteries. Clara becomes romantically attached to Henry Pleyel, who is already engaged. Theodore, who is called Wieland in Clara’s narrative, marries their family friend Catherine Pleyel. When a mysterious ventriloquist named Carwin arrives in town, the Wieland family experiences complication and tragedy. Wieland turns delusional, and, hearing voices he believes are from God, commits murder. Wieland is thought to be loosely based on a true story.

Sources

- Barnard, Philip, Mark Kamrath, and Stephen Shapiro, eds. Revising Charles Brockden Brown: Culture, Politics, and Sexuality in the Early Republic. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2004.
- Watts, Steven. The Romance of Real Life: Charles Brockden Brown and the Origins of American Culture. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994.

Wigglesworth, Michael (1631–1705) poet, clergyman

Michael Wigglesworth was born in Yorkshire, England, on October 18, 1631, to Edward and Esther Wigglesworth, but his family immigrated to Connecticut when he was seven years old. Wigglesworth was already preparing for college at the age of nine. His father’s illness and his own frailty as a child forced him to abandon advanced studies until he was fourteen. He received his bachelor’s and master’s degrees from HARVARD in the 1650s and remained as a tutor until he was called to the church at Malden, Massachusetts. Soon after taking up his duties at Malden, Wigglesworth was stricken with a chronic and painful disease that continued to plague him for thirty years. During this long period of illness he was forced to share his duties in the pulpit with another minister. In 1686 Wigglesworth returned to his full duties in the Malden church. His sudden recovery was later celebrated by Cotton MATHER, who wrote in A Faithful Man, Described and Rewarded (1705) that “It pleased God . . . wondrously to restore His Faithful Servant.”

Despite these health problems, Wigglesworth was remarkably productive as a Puritan poet. In 1662 he published what became his best-known work, The Day of Doom; or A Description of the Great and Last Judgement, which was reprinted throughout the eighteenth century and used in catechism and Bible-study classrooms. This collection of poems—including “To the Christian Reader,” “A Prayer unto Christ the Judge of the World,” and “A Short Discourse on Eternity”—deals with the themes of predestination, the suffering of sinners, God’s love for his saints, and the rewards the faithful will receive. Also in 1662 he published “God’s Controversy with New England,” a poetic JEREMIAD that urged New Englanders to repent and rectify their fallen condition. This poem was probably inspired by a drought that hit the region in 1661, a natural calamity that Wigglesworth interpreted as a sign of God’s wrath. In 1670 he published his second major work, Meat Out of the Eater; or, Meditations concerning the Necessity, End and Usefulness of Afflictions unto God’s Children, a collection of meditations and songs that attempted to console the struggling Christian doing battle with the inequities of daily life.

Wigglesworth’s reputation as a poet was unchallenged in his lifetime, but his marital life was highly controversial. His first wife, his cousin Mary Reyner, died in 1659, an event that may have triggered his health crisis. In 1679 he married Martha Mudge, his housekeeper, who was twenty-five years his junior. The community disapproved, largely because of Mudge’s “obscure parentage” and her failure to join a church. Censure by the Boston clergy may have increased the outrage of Wigglesworth’s Malden congregation, who voted to reduce his salary as a result of the marriage. At the age of sixty-eight the widowed Wigglesworth married for a third time and fathered a son. Altogether, his marriages produced eight offspring. The achievements of his two sons helped to soften public opinion regarding Wigglesworth’s personal life. His son Samuel became a noted physician and pastor of a church in Hamilton, Massachusetts. Edward, the child of his old age, was named the first Hollis Professor of Divinity at Harvard College.

Works

Wigglesworth, Michael. The Diary of Michael Wigglesworth, 1653–1657: The Conscience of a Puritan. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.

Wigglesworth. The Poems of Michael Wigglesworth. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1989.

Source

Crowder, Richard. No Featherbed to Heaven: A Biography of Michael Wigglesworth, 1631–1705. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1962.

Wilderness Road, Braddock’s Road, Forbes Road

These roads were main routes across the Allegheny and Appalachian Mountains that facilitated westward migration in the eighteenth century. The Wilderness Road connects Fort Chiswell in the Shenandoah Valley via the Cumberland Gap into the Ohio Valley and the Kentucky territory. Indian trails following a streambed allowed access over the mountains. The Transylvania Company hired Daniel Boone (1734–1820) and a team of thirty in 1775 to cut the Wilderness Road. Built in 1755 by General Edward Braddock to transport British troops across the Allegheny Mountains during the Seven Years’ War (see FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR), Braddock’s road expands upon the original Nemacolin’s Path between the Potomac and Monongahela Rivers, cleared between 1749 and 1750 by Nemacolin, a DELAWARE, and Thomas Cresap of Maryland. Braddock’s road connected Fort Cumberland to Fort Duquesne, which lies at the junction of the Allegheny, the Ohio, and the Monongahela Rivers. In 1758 John Forbes provided a more strategic approach to Fort Duquesne. Forbes’ Road begins in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, continues west-southwest across the Alleghenies to Fort Ligonier, and ends at Fort Duquesne, which General Forbes renamed Fort Pitt, after his commanding general. Notable chroniclers of the migrant roads and culture include John Forbes (1710–1759), Daniel Boone (1734–1820), John Filson (1747?–1788), and Thomas Speed (1841–1906).

Works

Filson, John. Discovery, Settlement, and Present State of Kentucke. . . . Wilmington, Del.: James Adams, 1784.

Boone, Daniel. Life and Adventures of Colonel Daniel Boone. Brooklyn, N.Y.: C. Wilder, 1823.

Source

Cayton, Andrew R. L., and Fredrika J. Teute, eds. Contact Points: American Frontiers from the Mohawk Valley to the Mississippi, 1750–1830. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.

Willard, Emma Hart (1787–1870) educator, textbook writer, poet

Emma Hart Willard was a pioneer in the education of women in America. As a teacher she taught subjects not previously available to women, and as an administrator she opened the doors for women’s education in the nineteenth century. Willard published widely and is noted for her works on education as well as her textbooks, but she was also a published poet.

Emma Hart was born in Berlin, Connecticut, on February 23, 1787, the sixteenth of seventeen children of her father, Samuel Hart, and the ninth of Samuel Hart’s second wife’s ten children. Emma’s father encouraged her education, and in 1802 she enrolled in the Berlin Academy. By 1804, at the age of sixteen, she had become a teacher in the academy, and two years later she served as the head of the school for a term. Her career as an educator continued with a teaching post in Westfield, Massachusetts and then an appointment as principal of a girls' academy in Middlebury, Vermont, where she met and married John Willard, a physician twenty-eight years her senior.

While in Vermont, Willard began to investigate the differences between the content and quality of education available to young men and that of young women. Realizing that her own training was deficient, she began to study both geometry and philosophy. In 1814 Willard opened a school for girls in her own home. Her Middlebury Female Seminary demonstrated the ability of women to teach and to learn the classical and scientific subjects generally assumed to be suited to men only. In 1819 Willard made her arguments for more rigorous female education public in a PAMPHLET, An Address to the Public: Particularly to the Members of the Legislature of New York, Proposing a Plan for Improving Female Education. Leading political figures such as John ADAMS and Thomas JEFFERSON applauded Willard's position, but the New York Legislature took no action on her proposal. In fact, several members of the state government expressed the view that Willard's call for equal education for women ran contrary to God's will. Governor DeWitt Clinton (1769–1828) disagreed, and he asked Willard to open a school in New York State.

Willard agreed at once, establishing her first school in Waterford, New York, in 1819. In 1821, she relocated to Troy, New York, after the town council there raised funds to build a girls' school. The Troy Female Seminary opened its doors in September 1821 and became one of the most influential centers for female education in the nineteenth century. The seminary—with a curriculum that included science, mathematics, and social studies—attracted the daughters of wealthy families throughout the region, and by 1831 it had more than three hundred students.

During her years at the seminary Willard produced several textbooks, including an Abridged History of the United States; or, Republic of America (1828) and A System of Universal History in Perspective (1835). She also found time to publish a volume of poetry, The Fulfillment of a Promise, in 1831. Her best-known poem from that collection, "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," reflects her firm faith in the watchful eye of God.

Willard retired as head of the Troy Seminary in 1838, but she continued to lecture and write for several decades. Her later works demonstrate her continued interest in science and history. They include A Treatise on the Motive Powers Which Produce the Circulation of the Blood (1846), Last Leaves of American History (1849), and Astronography; or, Astronomical Geography (1854). Willard died in Troy on April 15, 1870. Twenty-five years later the Troy Seminary was renamed the Emma Willard School, in memory of its founder.

Works

Willard, Emma. Abridged History of the United States; or, Republic of America. New York: White, Gallaher & White, 1830; Columbus, Ohio: Greyden Press, 1998.

Willard. The Fulfillment of a Promise, by Which Poems by Emma Willard Are Published. New York: White, Gallaher & White, 1831; Woodbridge, Conn.: Research Publications, 1975.

Sources

Lutz, Alma. Emma Willard, Pioneer Educator of American Women. Boston: Beacon, 1964.

Kelley, Mary. Learning to Stand and Speak: Women, Education, and Public Life in America's Republic. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006.

Willard, Samuel (1640–1707) essayist, theologian

Samuel Willard was born in Concord, Massachusetts, on January 31, 1640, to Simon and Mary Sharpe Willard. He graduated from HARVARD in 1659 and was ordained as a minister in 1664. He served as minister of the Groton church for several years, but in 1678 he was called to one of the most prominent Congregational churches, the Old South Church in Boston. Well known and respected as a learned scholar, Willard became one of the leading spokesmen for orthodoxy in NEW ENGLAND.

During his lifetime Willard composed approximately forty-five sermons and essays. His most famous work, A Compleat Body of Divinity . . . (1726) was, when it appeared in print, the longest single work published by an American press. It is a collection of Willard's lifetime of thought explicated in more than 250 monthly lectures he gave from 1688 to 1703. In this collection Willard defends the traditional Puritan way of life against the social, cultural, and demographic forces that ultimately led to what historians have called the transition from Puritan to Yankee society. A Compleat Body remained a standard theological text well into the nineteenth century.

Although he was a standard-bearer for orthodoxy, Willard took surprisingly liberal positions on such matters as church membership and the legitimacy of the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS. He openly opposed the witch trials in Some Miscellany Observations on . . . Witchcrafts (1692), warning against the use of spectral evidence by the Salem courts—that is, testimony that the witches' spirits could be seen by the accusers. When Samuel SEWALL later chose to confess guilt for his role in those trials, he turned to Willard to read his confession aloud from his pulpit.

Willard was twice married, first to Abigail Shorman and then to Eunice Tynge, and fathered eighteen children. He died in September 1707 and was buried in the Old Granary Burial Ground.

Works

Willard, Samuel. Some Miscellany Observations on Our Present Debates Respecting Witchcrafts. Philadelphia: Printed by William Bradford for Hezekiah Usher, 1692; Early American Imprints, 631.

Willard. Brief Directions to a Young Scholar Designing the Ministry, for the Study of Divinity. Boston: Printed by J. Draper for T. Hancock, 1735; Early American Imprints, 3976.

Willard. A Compleat Body of Divinity in Two Hundred and Fifty Expository Lectures on the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. Boston: Printed by B. Green & S. Kneeland for B. Eliot & D. Henchman, 1726; Early American Imprints, 2828.

Source

Lowrie, Ernest Benson. The Shape of the Puritan Mind: The Thought of Samuel Willard. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974.

Williams, John (1664–1729) minister, captivity narrative writer

John Williams was born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1664, the son of Samuel Williams, a shoemaker, and Theoda Parke. After graduating from HARVARD in 1683, Williams taught school in Dorchester, Massachusetts, for two years. In 1687 he married Eunice Mather, thus forming a family connection to some of NEW ENGLAND's most prominent Puritan clergymen, including Increase MATHER, Cotton MATHER, and Eleazer MATHER; John Warham (1595–1670); and Solomon Stoddard (1643–1729). A year after his marriage, Williams was ordained as the first pastor of the frontier town of Deerfield, Massachusetts.

Williams is best known for his retelling of his capture by Indians from his home in Deerfield, which was a vulnerable target for attack by the Canadian French and their Native American allies. As the local pastor, Williams interpreted these threats as evidence of God's occasional displeasure with his congregation, although he urged the Deerfield community to stand their ground against the enemy. Danger became a reality soon after the Anglo-French conflict, known in the colonies as Queen Anne's War, broke out in 1703. Before dawn on February 29, 1704, a war party attacked and burned the town. Thirty-nine settlers were either killed by the raiding party of Indians or burned to death while hiding in their houses; 140 were taken captive. Two of Williams's children were killed in the raid, but the minister, his wife, and their remaining six children were taken captive. Eunice Williams, weak from the recent delivery of an infant, was unable to keep up on the four-hundred-mile forced march required by the Indians and was put to death with the blow of a hatchet.

Three years later, in 1706, the Massachusetts government ransomed Williams, and he returned to New England. He soon learned that several of his children had also been ransomed, and a few had escaped and made their way back to Massachusetts. His daughter Eunice, however, had refused every effort to be returned to the colony. She had embraced the Mohawk Indian life, taking on a new name, Aongote, converting to Catholicism, and eventually marrying an Indian named François-Xavier Arosen, with whom she had two daughters.

Serving as a minister in Boston, Williams set down his experiences as a captive in The Redeemed Captive Returning to Zion, published in 1707. He became a powerful advocate for increased military protection of outlying communities, arguing in a SERMON to the Massachusetts General Assembly, God in the Camps; or, The Only Way for a People to Engage the Presence of God with their Armies (1707), that the government had failed the people of Deerfield in 1704. In both the CAPTIVITY NARRATIVE and the sermon, however, Williams cast the tragedy of Deerfield in religious terms, as punishment for sins, an opportunity for contrition and repentance, and a test of faith. New Englanders must, Williams wrote, bring God into their camp by living up to their Puritan ideals both as individuals and as a community. Williams's sermon may have influenced the colonists' failed attempt to seize Port Royal in 1704.

Following the publication of The Redeemed Captive, Williams returned to Deerfield. He collected his scattered children and began his life anew, marrying his first wife's cousin, Abigail Bissell, in 1708. The couple had five children before his death in 1729. Although Williams never gave up his efforts to redeem his daughter Eunice and bring her safely back to the Protestant colonial society, he had no success.

Work

Williams, John. The Redeemed Captive Returning to Zion. Boston: Printed by B. Green, for Samuel Phillips, at the Brick Shop, 1707; Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1976; Early American Imprints.

Source

Demos, John. The Unredeemed Captive: A Family Story from Early America. New York: Knopf, 1994.

Williams, Roger (circa 1603–1683) essayist, clergyman, social critic

Roger Williams, founder of Rhode Island, is best remembered for his democratic and humanitarian ideals, most notably his belief in religious tolerance. Once a Puritan minister, Williams eventually left all established churches, yet retained his Christian faith. Williams was a radical for his time, and his best writings were often a part of larger debates—he refuted the legitimacy of the Massachusetts charter, challenged the Puritans to recognize that they had divided from the Church of England, and theorized about the separation of church and state.

Williams was born in London in 1603, the son of James Williams, a tailor, and Alice Pemberton Williams. With the sponsorship of Sir Edward Coke, Williams studied at Charterhouse and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, completing a bachelor's degree in 1627. He initiated studies toward a master's degree, but he left Cambridge without completing all of the requirements. In 1629 he accepted a position as chaplain to Sir William Masham in Essex. That same year he met with John WINTHROP, Thomas HOOKER, and John COTTON, leaders of the Puritan expedition in America. The following year Williams was married to Mary Barnard, and on December 10, 1630, they sailed for America on the Lyon. The couple eventually had six children.

Williams arrived in Boston in February 1631. Although he remained in Boston for only a brief period, he initiated what became a long-running dispute with the Puritan elite. Critical of what he observed, Williams rejected a position in the Congregational Church. He took the opportunity to criticize the very foundation of the colony, the relationship of the church and the state, arguing that the colonial government had no authority to enforce church regulations, nor did it have the authority to demand an oath of loyalty from the general populace.

Williams left Boston for a position as minister in Salem. His activities in Salem continued to anger the colonial authorities. In 1635 he was recalled to Boston. Refusing to answer the summons, he was found guilty in absentia of various charges against the colony and banished. Facing deportation, he fled to Narragansett, where he made his first attempt to found a colony. He succeeded in his second attempt, and on May 1636 Williams established what would become the colony of Providence.

Exercising his beliefs concerning government and religious tolerance, Williams granted suffrage to all heads of households and opened his colony to other religious groups, including QUAKERS and Jews. In contrast to the restrictive policies in Massachusetts Bay, Providence offered liberal access to land. In 1643, with his settlement established, Williams left for England, where he obtained a CHARTER formalizing the colony of Providence Plantation, which incorporated settlements in Providence, Newport, and Portsmouth.

In England, Williams opposed attempts to establish the Puritan church and to make membership compulsory. PAMPHLETS such as THE BLOODY TENENT OF PERSECUTION expanded on his arguments in favor of religious tolerance and in opposition to what he saw as undemocratic governments. He put these ideas into practice on his return to Providence by establishing strict separation of church and state.

On his return, however, Williams found significant conflict. William Coddington, a leading citizen of Newport, obstructed the unification of Providence Plantations by obtaining a commission designating Newport as a separate colony. To rectify the situation, Williams sailed for England for a second time in 1651, returning in 1654 with a revised patent that rescinded Coddington's claim. Once again Williams occupied himself in England by engaging in a pamphlet war against the Puritans. His publications included The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody (1652), a response to John Cotton's The Bloody Tenent Washed and Made White (1647).

On his second return from England, Williams began a three-year term as the president of the General Assembly. He continued to play a major role in provincial politics and was an early advocate of Indian rights. In 1643 he published A Key into the Language of America, a study of the local Indians that presented them as a possible model for Christian behavior. Williams remained a steadfast supporter of the Indians, serving as an ambassador during the PEQUOT WARS, advocating limitations on seizures of Indian lands, and working to avert KING PHILIP'S WAR in 1675. There were limitations to his advocacy, however. When war did come, Williams supported the other colonies.

There were similar limitations to his policy of religious tolerance. Williams lost patience with the Quakers, and in particular with George Fox the founder of the sect, (1624–1691) and became embroiled in a bitter debate. This debate resulted in the publication of Williams's George Fox Digg'd out of His Burrowes (1676). Williams remained active in town affairs until his death in 1683.

Work

Williams, Roger. Complete Writings. New York: Russell & Russell, 1963.

Sources

Chupack, Henry. Roger Williams. New York: Twayne, 1969.

Covey, Cyclone. The Gentle Radical: A Biography of Roger Williams. New York: Macmillan, 1966.

Gaustad, Edwin Scott. Liberty of Conscience: Roger Williams in America. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 1991.

Wilson, James (1742–1798) lawyer, statesman

James Wilson was one of the few Revolutionary era leaders to sign the DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE and the CONSTITUTION. As a “founding father” and a dominant figure at the Constitutional Convention, Wilson helped create a strong central government for the new nation.

Wilson was born in Carskerdo, near St. Andrews, Scotland, oldest son of William Wilson and Aleson Lansdale Wilson. He was educated at the Universities of St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. In 1765, in the midst of the STAMP ACT crisis, he immigrated to America, seeking his fortune. In 1766 he became tutor in Latin at the College of Philadelphia but quickly moved on to study law under the noted lawyer John DICKINSON. In 1767 Wilson was admitted to the Philadelphia bar, but by 1770 he had moved west to Carlisle. The following year he married Rachel Bird, daughter of an ironworks owner.

By 1774 Wilson was deeply involved in Revolutionary politics. He was elected to the Pennsylvania colonial legislature and then took over the chairmanship of the Carlisle committee of correspondence, attended the first provincial assembly, and completed preparation of Considerations on the Nature and Extent of the Legislative Authority of the British Parliament, an essay that established him as a Whig leader. In it, he argued that “all power is derived from the people,” and because the colonists were not represented in Parliament, that government had no power over them. The only union with Britain was through the king, he argued, and the king's wishes could be denied by the colonial assemblies.

In 1775 Wilson became a delegate to the Continental Congress, where he voted with the moderates to delay consideration of Richard Henry Lee's June 7, 1776 resolution for independence. However, on July 1 and 2 Wilson voted for and signed the Declaration of Independence. Wilson fell out of favor in Pennsylvania political circles because of his opposition to the highly democratic state constitution. Popular anger at Wilson for his views reached a climax in 1776 when a mob fired on his home. For the next several years, Wilson devoted his energies to making money, largely through land speculation and through his position as a director of the new Bank of North America. But when the conservatives regained power in Pennsylvania in 1782, Wilson returned to politics. He served in Congress from 1785 to 1787 and wrote Considerations on the Bank of North America (1785), a defense of the confederation's power to charter a national bank.

At the constitutional convention Wilson was a powerful spokesman for a new government. He served on the Committee of Detail, which produced the final version of the Constitution. At home in Pennsylvania, he spearheaded the campaign for ratification. In 1789 George WASHINGTON appointed him associate justice of the Supreme Court, and later he was chosen the first law professor at the College of Philadelphia. The lectures of his short tenure there provide evidence of his belief that America had to develop its own legal system. Toward this end, he began an official digest of the laws of Pennsylvania, which he never completed.

Wilson barely escaped impeachment as a Supreme Court judge, and in 1797 he had to flee Pennsylvania to escape arrest for debts arising from failed land schemes. He eventually went into hiding in Edenton, North Carolina, where he died of a stroke.

Work

Wilson, James. The Works of James Wilson, edited by Robert G. McCloskey. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University, 1967.

Sources

Hall, Mark David. The Political and Legal Philosophy of James Wilson, 1742–1798. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1997.
Seed, Geoffrey. James Wilson. Millwood, N.Y.: KTO Press, 1978.
Smith, Charles Page. James Wilson, Founding Father. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1956.

Wingfield, Edward Maria (1560?–1613?) explorer, merchant

British military officer and explorer, Edward Maria Wingfield was born in Stoneley, Huntingdonshire, north of London, around 1560 to Thomas Maria Wingfield and Margaret Ker-rye. Wingfield studied to be a barrister, but these plans were interrupted by military duty in Holland and Ireland. Wingfield then became a member of the Royal Council, investing a significant amount of his own fortune to the VIRGINIA COMPANY. In 1606, when he was fifty-six, Wingfield sailed with the first immigrants to Virginia.

Although Wingfield was elected the first president of the colony at JAMESTOWN in May 1607, mismanagement and conflicts with other leaders—John SMITH in particular—prevented Wingfield from assuming this position. He was deposed on September 10, 1607, and returned to England in April 1608. Especially relevant to early American studies, Wingfield kept a detailed diary of his year at Jamestown that documents the hardships and struggles of the first colonists, while also serving as a defense of Wingfield's actions. In this diary, edited and printed for the first time in 1859 as A Discourse of Virginia, Wingfield initially refers to himself in the third person and then shifts to the first after he is deposed. In an entry dated July 3, 1607, he describes trading and other interactions with the local ALGONKIN whose leader, "the Great Powhatan" had sent a deer as a gift: "the President likewise bought, diverse times, deer of the Indians, beavers and other flesh, which he always caused to be equally divided among the Colony." The colonists had suffered great hunger when they first arrived, so Powhatan's gift was particularly significant. In his journal Wingfield also recounts his trial, dismissal, and after various difficulties within the colony itself, his preparation for his return to England.

Work

Wingfield, Edward Maria. A Discourse of Virginia (1608), edited by Charles Deane. Boston: John Wilson & Son, 1859.

Sources

Bridenbaugh, Carl. Jamestown, 1544–1699. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
Price, David. Love and Hate in Jamestown: John Smith, Pocahontas, and the Heart of a New Nation. New York: Knopf, 2003.

Winthrop, John (1588–1649) diarist, orator

for wee must Consider that wee shall be as a Citty upon a Hill, the eies of all people are uppon us; soe that if wee shall deale falsely with our god in this worke wee have undertaken and soe cause him to withdrawe his present help from us, wee shall be made a story and a byword through the world.

—A Modell of Christian Charity (1630)

Massachusetts governor John Winthrop was born to Adam Winthrop, the lord of the manor at Groton in Suffolk, England. At fourteen John entered Trinity College, Cambridge,

John Winthrop

Portrait of John Winthrop

where his father was auditor. There he became quite ill during which time he had a religious experience that prompted him to associate himself with the Puritans of the Church of England. Despite this radical commitment, his father named him lord of the Groton manor. His social position secure, Winthrop went to London to study law at Gray's Inn, and on completing his studies he returned home to serve as justice of the peace at Groton. In 1627 he was named His Majesty's Court of Wards and Liveries in London. By this time Winthrop was married to his third wife, Margaret Tyndal, his first two wives having died young.

In 1629 Winthrop grew seriously concerned about political and religious developments under the Stuart kings, especially the dissolution of Parliament by Charles I and determined to seek refuge in the New World. In April 1630 Winthrop and three of his sons boarded the ARBELLA, bound for the Puritan colony at Massachusetts Bay. While making the transatlantic crossing, Winthrop addressed his fellow colonists in what would become the most memorable statement of the mission of the new colony. His sermon "Christian Charitie. A Modell Hereof" described Massachusetts as "a Citty upon a Hill," and told the colonists that they were Christians entrusted by God to form a religious commonwealth. He warned his audience that "wee are Commaunded this day to loue the Lord our God, and to loue one another[,] to walke in his wayes and to keepe his Commaundments and Ordinance, and his lawes, and the Articles of our Covenant with him."

As governor of the colony, Winthrop began to keep a journal while on board the Arbella, writing reports in it until 1649. In 1790 the journal was published as A Journal of the Transactions and Occurrences in the Settlement of Massachusetts and the Other New-England Colonies, from the Year 1630 to 1644 (1790); a more complete version appeared in 1825–1826 as The History of New England from 1630 to 1649. The journal provides a rich account of the activities of the colony, although those activities are viewed through Winthrop's religious prism.

During his career as governor, Winthrop found that the harmony and uniformity of a "city upon a hill" was harder to maintain than he might have hoped. Religious conflict vexed the colony from its earliest years, as religious radicals such as Roger WILLIAMS and Anne HUTCHINSON challenged the theological and political foundations of Massachusetts. Winthrop played a central role in the exile of both of these dissenters, defending his judgment against Hutchinson in Antinomians and Familists Condemned by the Synod of Elders in New-England . . ., better known by the title of its second and third editions, A Short Story of the Rise, Reign, and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists & Libertines (1644). Calling Hutchinson "this American Jesabel," Winthrop observed that she "kept her strength and reputation, even among the people of God, till the hand of Civill Justice laid hold of her, and then she began evidently to decline and the faithfull to bee freed from her forgeries." Later, in "Defense of an Order of Court," Winthrop argued that those who are likely to undermine the uniformity of the commonwealth should be denied admission into the colony.

Perhaps Winthrop's greatest speech was delivered to the Colony's General Court in 1645, following his acquittal on the charges that he exceeded his magisterial authority. In what he called his "little speech" Winthrop set forth the fundamental, and highly conservative, Puritan political philosophy. A magistrate's authority came not simply from those who elected him, Winthrop explained, but from God. A good magistrate therefore upheld the community's covenant with God by governing according to God's laws to the best of their ability. Winthrop distinguished between natural liberty, to do what one wants—which, he insisted was "incompatible and inconsistent with authority" and "makes men grow more evil, and in time to be worse than brute beasts"—and moral liberty, "the proper end and object of authority, and cannot subsist without it; and it is a liberty to that only which is good, just, and honest." By the time of his death in 1649, Winthrop feared that the mission of the "city upon a hill" to which he had dedicated his life was failing in the face of growing acquisitiveness and expanding commerce.

Works

Winthrop, John. A Journal of the Transactions and Occurrences in the Settlement of Massachusetts and the Other New England Colonies, from the Year 1630 to 1644. Hartford: Printed by Elisha Babcock, 1790; reedited as The History of New England from 1630 to 1649, 2 volumes, edited by James Savage; volume 1, Boston: Printed by Phelps & Farnham, 1825; volume 2, Boston: Printed by T. B. Wait & Son, 1826; revised and enlarged again, Boston: Little, Brown, 1853; Salem, N.H.: Ayer, 1992.

Winthrop, John. Winthrop Papers, 5 volumes. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1929–1947.

Emerson, Everett H., ed. Letters from New England: The Massachusetts Bay Colony, 1629–1638. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1976.

Winthrop, John. The Journal of John Winthrop, 1630–1649, edited by Richard S. Dunn, James Savage, and Laetitia Yeandle. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1996.

Sources

Bremer, Francis J., and L. A. Botelho, eds. The World of John Winthrop: Essays on England and New England, 1588–1649. Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 2005.

Dunn, Richard S. Puritans and Yankees: The Winthrop Dynasty of New England, 1630–1717. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1962.

Emerson, Everett. Puritanism in America, 1620–1750. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977.

Winthrop, Robert C. Life and Letters of John Winthrop, second edition, 2 volumes. Boston: Little, Brown, 1869.

Recommended Writings

A Modell of Christian Charity (1630)

The Journal of John Winthrop (1630–1649)

A Journal of the Transactions and Occurrences in the Settlement of Massachusetts and the Other New England Colonies, from the Year 1630 to 1644 (1790)

Studying John Winthrop

John Winthrop, founding governor of the MASSACHUSETTS BAY COLONY, was a key historian of early American culture and politics. Students interested in the life of Winthrop should consult Lee Schwenger's John Winthrop (Boston: Twayne, 1990); James G. Moseley's John Winthrop's World: History As a Story, the Story As History (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1992); and Francis J. Bremer's John Winthrop: America's Forgotten Founding Father (New York: Oxford University Press, 2003). Early biographies of Winthrop include Edmund S. Morgan's The Puritan Dilemma: The Story of John Winthrop (Boston: Little, Brown, 1958); Robert C. Black's The Younger John Winthrop (New York: Columbia University Press, 1966);

Title page for the second edition in 1644 of John Winthrop's retitled collection of documents related to the banishment of Anne Hutchinson from the Massachusetts Bay Colony. His name was inadvertently left off the title page.

Darrett Bruce Rutman's John Winthrop's Decision for America, 1629 (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1975); and Richard S. Dunn's "John Winthrop Writes His Journal" (The William and Mary Quarterly, 41 [1984]: 185–212).

For studies of John Winthrop within the historical context of Puritan NEW ENGLAND, students should consult Philip F. Gura's A Glimpse of Zion's Glory: Puritan Radicalism in New England, 1620–1660 (Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1984); M. Susan Power's Before the Convention: Religion and the Founders (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1984); Andrew Delbanco's The Puritan Ordeal (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1989); Helena M. Wall's Fierce Communion: Family and Community in Early America (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990); Virginia DeJohn Anderson's New England's Generation: The Great Migration and the Formation of Society and Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991); Francis J. Bremer's Shaping New England: Pu- ritan Clergymen in Seventeenth-Century England and New England (New York: Twayne, 1994); Laura Lunger Knoppers's Puritanism and Its Discontents (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2003); The World of John Winthrop: Essays on England and New England, 1588–1649, edited by Bremer and L. A. Botelho (Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 2005); and Ivy Schweitzer, Perfecting Friendship: Politics and Affiliation in Early American Literature (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2006).

Key earlier studies of New England Puritan culture include Perry Miller's The New England Mind: The Seventeenth Century (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1939); Lawrence Shaw Mayo's The Winthrop Family in America (Boston: Massachusetts Historical Society, 1948); Dunn's Puritans and Yankees: The Winthrop Dynasty of New England, 1630–1717 (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1962); Rutman's Winthrop's Boston: A Portrait of a Puritan Town, 1630–1649 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1965); Morgan's The Puritan Family; Religion & Domestic Relations in Seventeenth-Century New England (New York: Harper & Row, 1966); and Everett H. Emerson's Puritanism in America, 1620–1750 (Boston: Twayne, 1977).

Students interested in primary sources and archival records, see The John Winthrop Papers, housed at the MASSACHUSETTS HISTORICAL SOCIETY. For a printed bibliography, consult Geoffrey P. Carpenter's A Secondary Annotated Bibliography of John Winthrop, 1588–1649 (New York: AMS Press, 1999).

Wise, John (1652–1725) essayist

A treatise writer and minister, John Wise was born in Roxbury, Massachusetts, on August 15, 1652, son of an indentured servant. He graduated from HARVARD in 1673 and was ordained as a Congregationalist minister. He served as a minister in Branford, Connecticut, until 1677 and acted as chaplain to colonial troops during KING PHILIP'S WAR. In 1678 he married Abigail Gardner (with whom he had seven children), and soon afterward he accepted a position in the new church at Ipswich, Massachusetts, where he served for forty-five years.

A defender of civil liberties and religious liberties, Wise frequently challenged arbitrary government in both the secular and the religious spheres. He has been called the first man in the colonies to oppose taxation without representation, based on his leadership role in protesting a poll and property tax imposed by Massachusetts governor Sir Edmund Andros in the 1680s. At Wise's urging, the Ipswich community refused to appoint tax collectors, infuriating Andros, who ordered Wise arrested. Wise was imprisoned for twenty-one days, fined, and suspended from his ministry. When Andros was removed from power following the ascendancy to the English throne of William and Mary in 1688 (known as the Glorious Revolution) Massachusetts authorities exonerated Wise and restored him to his position as pastor of the Ipswich church.

In 1692 Wise challenged the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS, submitting a petition on behalf of two of the accused, John and Elizabeth Proctor. He gained colonywide notice with his The Churches Quarrel Espoused (1713), a satirical rebuttal to the sixteen proposals issued by Cotton MATHER and others in 1705 that sought to shore up orthodoxy by creating a council to oversee ministerial appointments and to arbitrate disputes between ministers and their congregations. Wise argued that these proposals were authoritarian, and he defended the right of each congregation to determine questions of church discipline and to select its own ministers. Like most of his work, The Churches Quarrel Espoused was written in a plain, lively style that made it accessible to ordinary men and women rather than targeted exclusively for the intellectual elite.

Wise picked up the theme of resistance to authoritarianism once again in his work A Vindication of the Government of New-England Churches (1717). In A Vindication he drew an analogy between civil governments, which thrive when they operate under democratic principles, and churches, which thrive when they enjoy independent self-governance. In making this analogy, Wise examined the merits of monarchical, aristocratic, and democratic forms of government. As the "end of all good Government is to Cultivate Humanity and Promote the happiness of all," he wrote, a democratic government was best suited to this purpose. A Vindication was republished in 1772 and is widely acknowledged as a precursor to the literature justifying revolution and independence. Wise's writings were republished and widely read prior to the AMERICAN REVOLUTION and, later, the Civil War.

Works

Wise, John. The Churches Quarrel Espoused. New York: Printed and sold by William Bradford, 1713; Early American Imprints, 1660.

Wise. A Vindication of the Government of New-England Churches. Boston: Printed by J. Allen for N. Boone, 1717; Early American Imprints, 1941.

Sources

Cook, George Allan. John Wise, Early American Democrat. New York: King's Crown Press, 1952.

Turner, Eldon R. "Peasants and Parsons: John Wise's Churches Quarrel Espoused," Early American Literature, 18 (1983): 146–170.

Wister, Sarah (1761–1804) diarist

Sarah Wister (called Sally) was born in Philadelphia on July 20, 1761, the oldest child of Daniel Wister, a QUAKER merchant. Sally attended Anthony BENEZER's progressive school for girls and there developed a love of writing that continued throughout her life. When she was sixteen, however, her life was disrupted by the AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Her family fled British-occupied Philadelphia for the safety of Gwynedd, Pennsylvania.

During and following the war, Wister tried her hand at many different forms of writing and grew more contemplative and spiritual in her themes in later years. An avid reader of novels in her youth, she turned to the study of philosophy and theology and to the historical writings of John Locke (1632–1704) and Hannah More (1745–1833) in her adulthood. She kept a devotional journal from 1796 through 1797, recording her inner struggles between faith and despair, and she wrote several neoclassical poems under the pseudonym “Laura.” But it is Sally Wister’s Journal, written between 1777 and 1778 and published in 1886, that establishes her place in American literature.

Perhaps to ease her sense of isolation during the war, Wister began to keep a journal that took the form of letters constituting a continuing dialogue with her closest friend, Deborah Norris. The journal provides a valuable glimpse into the everyday life of a young, elite woman of the eighteenth century. It is filled with the details of Wister’s daily routine, which included such chores as sewing and ironing as well social activities such as visiting and entertaining military officers. The journal is not simply a record of activity, however; Wister frequently examines and describes her own feelings about her experiences and circumstances. She sketches the characters of those around her, demonstrating a flair for drama in her accounts of the military figures who passed in and out of her family’s household. Wister’s focus on the small world of her household rather than on the larger landscape of the American Revolution suggests a desire to sustain a sense of normalcy in the midst of upheaval and disruption of the American Revolution.

From the beginning, the journal shows Wister’s willingness to be optimistic during the war. On October 19, 1777, she writes,

... how new is our Situation!, I feel in good spirits, though surrounded by an Army, the house as full of officers, the yard alive with soldiers, very peaceable sort of men, tho’ they eat like other folks, talk like them, and behave themselves with elegance; so I will not be afraid of them, that I won’t. Adieu, adieu I am going to my chamber to dream, I suppose, of bayonets and swords, sashes, guns, and epaulets.

Wister’s life after the war was quiet and uneventful. She never married, devoting her adult years to caring for her aging parents. Wister died at age forty-three, only two months after her mother’s death.

Work

Wister, Sarah. The Journal and Occasional Writings of Sarah Wister, edited by Kathryn Zabelle Derounian. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1987.

Source

Stabile, Susan. “Under the Wisteria: The Topography of Sarah Wister’s Commonplace Book,” in Finding Colonial Americas: Essays Honoring J. A. Leo Lemay, edited by Carla Mulford and David S. Shields. Newark, Del.: University of Delaware Press, 2001, 227–248.

Wolcott, Roger (1679–1767) pamphleteer, chronicler, poet, statesman

*Chear’d with the sight [of land] they set all Sails a-trip,
And rais’d the English Ensign on their Ship.*

Brave Youths with eager Strokes bend knotty Oars, Glad shouts bring chearful Echo’s from the Shores.

—“A Brief Account of the Agency of the Honorable John Winthrop . . .” (1725)

A second-generation colonial American and the first published poet in Connecticut, Roger Wolcott had no formal education and yet rose to become governor of Connecticut from 1751 to 1754. Wolcott was born January 4, 1679, in Windsor, Connecticut, to Martha Pitkin Wolcott and Simon Wolcott, a farmer. Wolcott began his professional career as a clothing apprentice, and after only five years in this position, at the age of twenty, he established his own business. In 1701 he married Sarah Drake, his second cousin, and moved to South Windsor, where he farmed and became involved as a public servant by serving in the militia, as a town magistrate, lawyer, and as governor of Connecticut. The Wolcotts had fifteen children.

Wolcott’s major poem, Poetical Meditations, Being the Improvement of Some Vacant Hours (1725) was epic in style. His choice of topic, the founding of Connecticut and the retelling of the land acquisition, belies its title. Despite a religious-sounding topic, Wolcott’s poem is far more secular in its concerns than a conventional poem from its era. Wolcott also wrote prose PAMPHLETS and an autobiography, which he completed on June 10, 1755, a decade before his death. Roger Wolcott died on May 17, 1767.

Work

Poetical Meditations, Being the Improvement of Some Vacant Hours. New London, Conn.: T. Green, 1725.

Source

Lawrence, William. Roger Wolcott. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1902.

Wonders of the Invisible World by Cotton Mather
(Boston: Benj. Harris, 1692)

Wonders of the Invisible World was commissioned by the Court of Oyer and Terminer (“to hear and determine”) as a defense of their decision to execute twenty-one people during the SALEM WITCHCRAFT TRIALS in 1692. Despite Mather's own recommendation that those who were allegedly possessed by demons be prayed over rather than hung, his Wonders defends the court's actions as representative of divine judgment. Mather cites the example of Martha Carrier, an alleged witch, whose disembodied form appears throughout Salem and who is blamed for several mysterious incidents, including the unexplained death of cattle:

Martha Carrier was Indicted for the Bewitching of certain Persons, according to the Form usual in such Cases. Pleading Not Guilty, to her Indictment, there were First brought in a considerable number of the Bewitched Persons; who not only made the Court sensible of an horrid Witchcraft committed upon them, but also deposed, That it was Martha Carrier, or her Shape, that Grievously Tormented them, by Biting, Pricking, Pinching, and Choaking of them. It was further deposed, that while this Carrier was on her Examination, before the Magistrates, the Poor People were so Tortured that every one expected their Death upon the very Spott; but that upon the binding of Carrier they were eased. Moreover the Look of Carrier then laid the Afflicted People for Dead; and her Touch, if her Eye at the same Time were off them, raised them again.

Scholars have noted that the events surrounding the Salem witch trials of August 2, 1692, influenced a break in Puritan solidarity. Robert Calef's More Wonders of the Invisible World (1700) condemns both the trials and Mather's tract.

Source

Norton, Mary Beth. In the Devil's Snare: The Salem Witchcraft Crisis of 1692. New York: Knopf, 2002.

Wood, William (1606?–1639) travel writer

Little is known of William Wood's life. He was born in England and appears to have attended Cambridge University. He arrived in Massachusetts in the earliest wave of settlement in 1629 but returned to England in 1633. The following year Wood published his New England's Prospect. The first half of the book acquaints the reader with the topography, climate, flora, and fauna of NEW ENGLAND. The second half, some twenty chapters, is devoted to a detailed discussion of Native American material culture and traditions, including their diet, clothing, housing, decorative objects, modes of worship, methods and motives for warfare, and social customs.

Wood's positive characterization of the Native Americans as a race was intended to dispel colonists' fears. He described the region's natives as "wise, lofty-spirited, constant in friendship to one another; true in their promise, and more industrious than many others." He also appended a brief introduction to Native American language.

Wood's vivid, richly descriptive style made New-England's Prospect a persuasive PROMOTIONAL TRACT. Like most recruitment literature, it exaggerated the advantages and diminished the dangers of settlement, attributing the unfortunate deaths of many on the transatlantic voyage, for example, not to the hazards of ocean travel but to poor preparations or the preexisting bad health of those who died. Wood himself survived a second transatlantic crossing, returning to New England around 1635, and remaining until his death in 1639.

Work

Wood, William. New-England's Prospect, edited by Alden T. Vaughan. London: Thomas Cotes for John Bellamie, 1634; edited by Alden T. Vaughan. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1977.

Source

Branch, Michael P. Reading the Roots : American Nature Writing Before Walden. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2004.

Woodmason, Charles (circa 1720–circa 1776)

diarist, minister

Little is known about Charles Woodmason except that he was born in England, possibly in London, and occasionally published verse in London magazines in the 1770s. A poet, his themes were distinctly American, built around dramatic descriptions of an often wild and dangerous American landscape. He is best remembered for his personal journal, kept during the years of his backcountry proselytizing.

Woodmason sailed to South Carolina from Gosport, England, in 1752, leaving a wife and a young son behind. In South Carolina he bought both land and slaves; he was successful both in farming and as a merchant. A devout Anglican, Woodmason volunteered to conduct the religious services in his parish in 1756. Although the position was understood to be temporary, he continued in the role for six years. In 1762 Woodmason returned to England, a transatlantic crossing that may have been prompted by the news of his wife's death. He returned to Charleston only months later and settled there. He was appointed a justice of the peace, and he later held other public offices.

Woodmason served as stamp distributor for the taxes that resulted from the STAMP ACT, imposed on the colonies by Britain. In the wake of public disapproval, he decided to apply to serve as an itinerant minister in the backcountry of South Carolina. To qualify for this position, he returned to England for ordination in the ANGLICAN CHURCH. By summer 1766 Woodmason had begun his ministry in St. Mark's parish, a huge frontier area filled with many dissenting sects. St. Mark's became the center of the colony's Regulator Movement, in which a group of settlers protesting the lack of government and law enforcement in the backcountry imposed their own justice and blamed the Charleston-based government for neglect.

Woodmason traveled three thousand miles a year on horseback, hoping to convert local residents of dissenting sects. He also spoke out for law and order, voicing many of the political views associated with the Regulators. In The Carolina Backcountry, in fact, he emerges as a strong champion of the Regulator cause; yet, his commitment to political representation for the backcountry did not prevent him from criticizing the people who were being deprived of their rights. Woodmason soundly attacked and belittled the Baptists and other sectarians who populated St. Mark's parish. His portrait of the backcountry is far from flattering, for it emerges as impoverished, disease-ridden, and filled with ignorant, lazy men and women whose religious nonconformity had led to immorality and often savagery. Woodmason's clearest political statement, however, remains A Remonstrance Presented to the Commons House of Assembly of South Carolina, by the Upper Inhabitants of the said Province, November 1767, which listed the grievances of the frontier settlers.

By 1772, his health had deteriorated, and, discouraged by his failure to convert the evangelicals to Anglicanism, he abandoned the western parish to preach to colonists in Maryland and Virginia. When the impending revolution brought about a crisis of loyalties in the mid 1770s, Woodmason remained faithful to the king and to his church. He left America for London in 1774, a LOYALIST refugee.

Woodmason is best remembered for his personal journal, kept during the years of his backcountry proselytizing. The Carolina Backcountry on the Eve of the Revolution: The Journal and Other Writings of Charles Woodmason, Anglican Itinerant is, according to editor Richard J. Hooker, "probably the fullest extant account of any American colonial frontier."

Work

Woodmason, Charles. The Carolina Backcountry on the Eve of the Revolution; The Journal and Other Writings of Charles Woodmason, Anglican Itinerant, edited by Richard J. Hooker. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1953.

Sources

Edgar, Walter B. Partisans and Redcoats: The Southern Conflict That Turned the Tide of the American Revolution. New York: Morrow, 2001.

Underwood, James Lowell, and William Lewis Burke, eds. The Dawn of Religious Freedom in South Carolina. Columbia: University of South Carolina, 2006.

Woolman, John (1720–1772) theologian, essayist

True charity is an excellent virtue, and sincerely to labour for their good, whose belief, in all points, doth not agree with ours, is a happy slate. To refuse the active payment of a tax which our Society generally paid was exceedingly disagreeable; but to do a thing contrary to my conscience, appeared yet more dreadful.

—Journal, 1755–1758

John Woolman's importance can be found in the lasting influence his writings had on Anglo-American antislavery movements for more than one hundred years. His most important writings on slavery include Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (published in two parts in 1754 and 1762). As advertised in the subtitle, Recommended to Professors of Christianity, of Every Denomination, Woolman's appeal was largely moral, emphasizing religious reasoning and voluntary reform.

Woolman was born on October 19, 1720 at Rancocas, Burlington County, New Jersey, to a prominent QUAKER family; his grandfather was an original proprietor of West Jersey. An avid reader, Woolman was largely self-taught, with the formal phase of his education limited to the local Quaker school. He was apprenticed to a tailor and established his own shop in Mount Holly in 1741. Woolman was successful as a tailor and in a variety of other ventures, including surveying and the drawing up of simple legal documents. But he gravitated toward the ministry, speaking at local Quaker meetings. The change was not unexpected. An introspective and studious young man, Woolman was keenly interested in Quietist or German evangelical literature and had experienced a crisis in faith during his adolescent years.

In 1746 Woolman began a series of missionary journeys throughout the northern and southern colonies to spread the faith. In his travels he visited many of the key centers of slavery, including the tobacco region in Virginia and slave ports, including Perth Amboy, New Jersey, and Newport, Rhode Island. Woolman was particularly disturbed by the many Quakers who owned and traded slaves. Through his observations Woolman developed an abhorrence for slavery, becoming an ardent abolitionist. In 1749, he was married to Sarah Ellis. The couple had two children, one of whom died in infancy.

Woolman advocated against slavery with some immediate success. In 1758 he helped lead the call for the abolition of slavery among Quakers at the annual meeting in Philadelphia. Partly in response to Woolman, New Jersey established a high tariff in 1769 on slave imports. In 1776 the annual meeting of Quakers in Philadelphia finally disowned those members who refused to free their slaves.

Woolman tackled other topics in his writings, including an essay on the corruption of wealth and the need for charity, Considerations on Pure Wisdom and Human Policy (1768), and a treatise on poverty and slavery, A Plea for the Poor (written around 1763, published 1793). As was the case in his writings on slavery, Considerations and A Plea for the Poor emphasized religious answers to the problems Woolman confronted. His Journal, a confessional autobiography, was perhaps his most important and lasting work. In it Woolman recorded his strict manner of life, when possible, making his trips on foot, wearing undyed clothing, and avoiding any product connected with the slave trade. Published in numerous editions into the twentieth century, it made a lasting impact in American and England as a landmark record of inner spiritual life.

Woolman died of smallpox in York, England on October 7, 1772, having crossed the Atlantic to work among the poor and to spread his message among the English Quakers.

Work

Woolman, John. The Journal and Major Essays of John Woolman, edited by Philips P. Moulton. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Sources

- Cady, Edwin Harrison. John Woolman. New York: Twayne, 1965.
 Peare, Catherine Owens. John Woolman: Child of Light; the Story of John Woolman and the Friends. New York: Vanguard, 1954.
 Whitney, Janet Payne. John Woolman, American Quaker. Boston: Little, Brown, 1942.

Wright, Susanna (1697–1784) poet

Susanna Wright, described in a 1911 article in Harper's Weekly Advertiser as "the original New Woman of America," established a ferry along the Susquehanna River, farmed the land, and was one of the first to try to produce silk in Pennsylvania. Wright became a noted writer and in her poetry avowed that men and women should be considered as equals. More than thirty of Susanna Wright's poems survive, including neoclassical meditations, verses celebrating birthdays and commemorating deaths, and verse letters. Among her best known poems are "To Eliza Norris-at Fairhill" and "The Grove." The first, addressed to Eliza Norris, her friend and a vocal champion of the expansion of women's economic independence and education, challenges the existing male authority that rests on the biblical story of the Garden of Eden. In "The Grove" Wright employs heroic couplets in her meditation on human mortality and the human abuse of power, as she describes the impact on the human society of its decimation of a forest.

Susanna Wright was born in Lancashire, England, on August 4, 1697, the daughter of Patience Gibson and John Wright. Her father had trained as a physician, but after his conversion to Quakerism, he made his living as a tradesman, farmer, and ferry master. In 1714 the Wright family moved to eastern Pennsylvania. In the late 1720s they headed west, settling first in the Susquehanna River Valley and then on the colony's westernmost frontier, where they hoped to establish a QUAKER presence among the German and Scotch-Irish population.

Susanna Wright remained there, at Wright's Ferry, all her life. She never married but managed her father's household for many years after the death of her mother in 1722. Despite her grueling life in a frontier household, Wright managed to find time for such interests as scientific observation and civic activities. She experimented with cultivating silkworms, studied the medicinal use of herbs, and served her neighbors as doctor and lawyer, creating poultices and drafting deeds as needed.

Susanna Wright's reputation as a writer spread throughout the colony. She was an enthusiastic correspondent, producing a lively and extensive exchange with leading Quaker figures such as James LOGAN and Benjamin FRANKLIN. She became part of a network of talented Pennsylvania poets that included Hannah GRIFFITTS and Deborah Logan (1761–1839). Travelers such as Franklin and Benjamin RUSH made it a point to stop at Wright's home to engage her in conversation. She remained a lively conversationalist and hostess well into her eighties.

Work

Wright, Susanna. "Sixteen New Poems," in Milcah Martha Moore's Book: A Commonplace Book from Revolutionary America. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1997.

Source

Stabile, Susan M. Memory's Daughters: The Material Culture of Remembrance in Eighteenth-Century America. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2004.

Walam Olum (translated, 1883) poem

This epic poem details the tribal history of the Lenni Lenape (Delaware) Indians in five books of 183 verses. Beginning with the creation myth and chronicling the tribe's prehistoric migration from the Northwest to the Atlantic coast to their encounter with white men, the original Red Score, or "painted record," was inscribed in pictographs on birch bark and is now lost. In 1833 the European naturalist Constantine Rafinesque made a manuscript copy of the work as an addendum to his translation of Lenni Lenape songs, published in his book The American Nations (1836). Later translations of the Walam Olum were made by the archaeologist Ephraim George Squier and by the anthropologist Daniel G. Brinton (1837–1899), who published his version in The Lenape and Their Legends, with the Complete Text of the Walam Olum (1885). In 1996 a scholar asserted that the 1833 translation by Rafinesque was a hoax and brought into question the authenticity of the Walam Olum.

Sources

- Barnhart, Terry A. "The Burden of Proof: American Indian Traditions and the Walam Olum," in his Ephraim George Squier and the Development of American Anthropology. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2005.
- Weslager, C. A. The Delaware Indians: A History. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1972.

Walden by Henry David Thoreau (Boston: Ticknor & Fields, 1854) nonfiction narrative

A record of THOREAU's determination to test the transcendentalist doctrines of self-reliance, individualism, and the necessity of sublimating the material to the spiritual, the eighteen essays that constitute Walden describe more than two years of experimental living. In March 1845 Thoreau began building a cabin on the banks of Walden Pond outside Concord, Massachusetts, which he then occupied. His plan was "to live deliberately"; he lived alone, meeting his earthly needs through his own labor. Thoreau believed, like his fellow transcendentalists (see TRANSCENDENTALISM), that concentration on the natural world would reveal truths too often hidden by humankind's concentration on materialism. Thoreau's sojourn at Walden Pond reinforced not only the American archetype of the self-sufficient individual but also the national mythology that there is always a new frontier, a fresh, unsullied place to make a new beginning. In September 1847 Thoreau returned to Concord.

Sources

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Henry David Thoreau's Walden. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
- Boudreau, Gordon V. The Roots of Walden and the Tree of Life. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1990.
- Dillman, Richard. Essays on Henry David Thoreau: Rhetoric, Style, and Audience. West Cornwall, Conn.: Locust Hill Press, 1993.
- Johnson, William C. What Thoreau Said: Walden and the Unsayable. Moscow: University of Idaho Press, 1991.
- Petrulionis, Sandra Harbert, and Laura Dassow Walls. More Day to Dawn: Thoreau's Walden for the Twenty-First Century. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2007.

Wallace, Lewis (1827–1905) novelist

Should one ask . . . why I . . . have presumed to write this book, . . . I would be thrice happy did he content himself with this answer—The Jesus Christ in whom I believe was, in all stages of his life, a human being. His divinity was the Spirit within him. . . .

—Preface, The Boyhood of Christ

Lewis Wallace was born in Brookville, Indiana, to prominent parents. His father, David Wallace, was a lawyer, soldier, and civil servant. His mother, Esther French Test, was the daughter of a U.S. congressman; she died when Wallace was seven years old. A desultory student, Wallace nevertheless was an avid reader of history, biography, and ROMANCE. During the Mexican War in 1846 he gathered together and headed a company of Indiana troops, but they never saw battle. When in 1849 he followed his father into the law profession, it was without enthusiasm. In 1852 he married Susan Arnold Elston; they had one child. During the 1850s he was elected first as state prosecutor and then as state representative.

When the CIVIL WAR began, Wallace was appointed state adjutant general. He once again succeeded in quickly enlisting many volunteers. During the course of the war he rose to the rank of major general, distinguishing himself in a number of battles. Wallace's most important military accomplishment probably came in July 1864 when he and his troops successfully prevented Confederate forces from occupying Washington, D.C. His service record had nevertheless been permanently blemished by his participation in the battle of Shiloh (April 1862); until his death Wallace was compelled to assert his blamelessness in a tactical miscalculation that caused his troops' late arrival at the battlefield.

Wallace's career as a professional writer began with the publication of The Fair God in 1873. A work of historical fiction that had been written decades earlier, the novel portrays Cortez's conquest of the Aztecs. The book sold well, but it is for Wallace's next novel, BEN-HUR: A TALE OF THE CHRIST (1880) that he is remembered. Wallace wrote the book during an appointment as governor of the New Mexico Territory from 1878 to 1881. In terms of sales during the nineteenth century, the novel is second only to UNCLE TOM'S CABIN. Its romantic and adventurous depiction of the early Christian world has been popular with generations of readers, and its story has been retold in a succession of stage and screen adaptations. In 1888 Wallace published a sequel of sorts, The Boyhood of Christ. Later works include The Prince of India (1893), the narrative poem The Wooing of Malkatoon (1898), and the closet drama Commodus (1898). After Wallace's death at Crawfordsville, Indiana, his wife completed and published Lew Wallace, an Autobiography (1906).

Source

Morsberger, Robert E., and Katherine M. Morsberger. Lew Wallace: Militant Romantic. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980.

—Brett Barney

Ward, Artemus

See BROWNE, CHARLES FARRAR.

Warner, Anna Bartlett (1827–1915) novelist, children's story writer, hymnist, biographer

Shortly after her birth in New York City, Anna Bartlett Warner's mother and namesake died. When family finances began to decline in 1837, the family left their privileged life and moved to Constitution Island, across from West Point, New York. Anna and her older sister, Susan Bogart WARNER (author of the wildly popular THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD [1851]), successfully supported the family through their writing. Anna (whose pseudonym was Amy Lothrop) designed a popular board game, wrote children's stories, and collaborated with Susan on over eighteen books, including the children's book Mr. Rutherford's Children (2 volumes, 1853–1855). Her more than twenty books blend ROMANTICISM with reality and reflect her strong piety. They include Dollars and Cents (1852), a semi-autobiographical story of financial failure, and the biography of her sister, Susan Warner (1909). Deeply committed to Christian teachings, she wrote Hymns of the Church Militant (1858), some of which are still popular today.

Sources

Foster, Edward Halsey. Susan and Anna Warner. Boston: Twayne, 1978.

Kelly, Mary. Private Woman, Public Stage: Literary Domesticity in Nineteenth-Century America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984, pp. 85–93, 147–152, and passim.

Warner, Anna Bartlett. Susan Warner (Elizabeth Wetherell). New York & London: Putnam, 1909.

—Mary Rose Kasraie

Warner, Charles Dudley (1829–1900) essayist, editor, novelist

Charles Dudley Warner is best remembered for his collaboration with Mark Twain (Samuel Langhorne CLEMENS) on the novel that gave the late-nineteenth-century period of industrial prosperity its name, THE GILDED AGE (1873). Born in Massachusetts and reared in western New York, where he graduated from Hamilton College in 1851, Warner first took a job far from home, working as a railroad surveyor in Missouri. In the mid 1850s he returned east to attend law school at the University of Pennsylvania. He practiced law in Chicago from 1858 to 1860; however, his first love was literature, and in 1861 he settled in Hartford, Connecticut, where he edited the Hartford Evening Post and then the Courant. Warner's first book of essays, My Summer in a Garden (1870), was praised for its stylistic likeness to the works of Washington IRVING. Other equally successful essay collections followed. Warner traveled widely and wrote prolifically about his journeys in books such as Saunterings (1872). He also wrote biographies of Irving (1881) and Captain John Smith (1881).

Warner, Susan Bogart (1819–1885) novelist, theological essayist, children's writer

Susan Bogart Warner is remembered most for her first and most popular novel, THE WIDE, WIDE WORLD (1850), which was a best-selling work of American fiction. Born into wealth and raised in luxury before a series of economic setbacks caused the exhaustion of the family's resources, Warner turned to writing, having always loved language and storytelling, in order to help support the family. She published her first novel under the pseudonym of Elizabeth Wetherell, hiding her identity in case the novel was a failure. She continued her writing career until the end of her life; at her death of a stroke she was in the process of revising her final novel, Daisy Plains.

Source

Baker, Mabel. The Warner Family and the Warner Books. West Point, N.Y.: Constitution Island Association, 1971.

—Vicki Martin

A Week on the Concord and Merrimack

Rivers by Henry David Thoreau (Boston & Cambridge, Mass.: Munroe, 1849) essay collection

Henry David THOREAU's first full-length book is based on an 1839 boating trip he took with his brother, John, who died in 1842. The book includes an introduction to the Concord River, followed by seven chapters titled after the days of the week. In these seven chapters/days, Thoreau takes the reader through both a physical journey of the natural world and a spiritual journey, with reflections on literature, religion, and death. The book includes material from Thoreau's original travel notes, as well as some poems and excerpts from other essays, some of which had been previously published in the Transcendentalist literary journal, THE DIAL.

Source

Johnson, Linck. "A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," in The Cambridge Companion to Henry David Thoreau, edited by Joel Myerson. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995, pp. 40–56.

—Tiffany K. Wayne

Wells-Barnett, Ida B. (1862–1931) journalist, pamphleteer, autobiographer, reformer

I had an instinctive feeling that the people who have little or no school training should have something coming into their homes weekly which dealt with their problems in a simple, helpful way . . . so I wrote in a plain, common-sense way on the things that concerned our people.

—Crusade for Justice (1970)

Ida B. Wells was born into slavery in Holly Springs, Mississippi. Her father, Jim Wells, was active in local politics after Emancipation and was a trustee of Shaw University (now Rust College), a school founded by the Freedman's Aid Society in 1866. She attended school at Shaw until she was eighteen years old. When she lost her parents and her youngest sibling to a yellow-fever epidemic in 1878, Wells took responsibility for the family. She dropped out of college and went to work as a local schoolteacher until 1884, when she moved to Memphis to take a position in the public-school system.

Wells's writing career was prompted by her forced removal from a first-class train car in 1884. Although she held a ticket for the car, she was told to move to the smoking car, which was reserved for African Americans under the "separate but equal" laws of the post-Reconstruction South. Wells sued the Chesapeake, Ohio and Southwestern Railroad and won, but the verdict was reversed on appeal. Based on her experience Wells wrote a series of letters concerning racial and gender issues to local and national periodicals.

When her public criticism of the poor quality of black schools in Memphis caused her dismissal in 1891, she took up full-time work as a journalist. Already part owner of the Memphis Free Speech and Headlight, Wells stepped up the militancy of her editorials. After three of her friends were lynched in 1892, Wells urged her fellow citizens to leave the city, saying that lynching was a racist strategy to destroy the hard-won economic independence of the black middle class. When the offices of the Free Speech were destroyed by a mob, Wells was undaunted. Broadening her antilynching crusade, she bought an interest in the New York Age, where she published two weekly columns under the byline "Iola." She published many antilynching pamphlets over the next few years and, in 1893, she lectured in England in an effort to bring international pressure to bear on the cause.

Wells was living in Chicago when she married Ferdinand L. Barnett, a lawyer. The couple had four children, whom Wells-Barnett often took along on her lecture tours. Having become a supporter of SUFFRAGISM, and active in the civic-minded women's-club movement of the late nineteenth century, she founded the Alpha Suffrage Club and cofounded the Cook County League of Women's Clubs. As secretary of the National Afro-American Council she helped organize the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In 1910 she formed the Negro Fellowship League, which found employment for Southern blacks who had migrated north. To fund the project Wells-Barnett contributed her salary she earned as a probation officer.

Wells-Barnett continued to work as a journalist into her fifties, covering the 1918 race riot in East St. Louis, Illinois, for the Chicago Defender and the indictment of twelve innocent farmers for murder in Arkansas in 1921. In 1928 she started an autobiography, and two years later she resumed work on the diaries she had kept intermittently throughout her life. After her death in 1931 following a sudden illness, her daughter, Alfreda Duster, edited and published these works.

Sources

- McMurry, Linda O. To Keep the Waters Troubled: The Life of Ida B. Wells. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Miller, Ericka M. The Other Reconstruction: Where Violence and Womanhood Meet in the Writings of Wells-Barnett, Grimke, and Larsen. New York: Garland, 2000.
- Thompson, Mildred I. Ida B. Wells-Barnett: An Exploratory Study of an American Black Woman, 1893–1930. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1990.

The Western Messenger (1835–1841) periodical

Founded in Cincinnati, Ohio, by a group of Unitarian ministers, this monthly served as an outlet for TRANSCENDENTALIST and UNITARIAN articles as well as for the exploration of German and Asian literature. William Henry Channing was the magazine's editor as well as a contributor. Other contributors included Margaret FULLER, Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Jones VERY, and Elizabeth PEABODY.

Source

- Habich, Robert D. Transcendentalism and the Western Messenger: A History of the Magazine and its Contributors, 1835–1841. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1985.

"When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" by Walt Whitman (1865–1866) poem

Written by Walt WHITMAN following President Abraham Lincoln's assassination, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" ranks among the most celebrated of elegies. The poem was first published in Sequel to Drum-Taps (1865–1866), a last-minute addendum bound into five hundred copies of Drum-Taps (1865), Whitman's poetic response to the CIVIL WAR. The poem appeared alongside a second, very different elegy, "O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!" in the same volume and was later incorporated into LEAVES OF GRASS (1867). Written in sixteen sections, "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd" addresses—and ultimately celebrates—the cycle of birth and death. The symbolic lilac, with its flowers and heart-shaped leaves, introduces Whitman's lament: each blooming season will call to mind the springtime death of Lincoln and the poet's grief.

Sources

- Cavitch, Max. American Elegy: The Poetry of Mourning from the Puritans to Whitman. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2006.
- Warren, James Perrin. "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," American History through Literature, 1820–1870, edited by Janet Gabler-Hover and Robert Sattelmeyer. Detroit: Scribner's, 2006, pp. 1242–1245.

Whitcher, Frances Miriam Berry (circa 1812–1852) humorist

Born in Whitesboro, New York, to Lewis and Elizabeth Wells Berry, Frances Miriam Berry was a shy and lonely child, though she possessed what she later described as "a remarkably strong sense of the ridiculous." In 1839 a local newspaper published a series of her humorous sketches, narrated by the rustic and uneducated Widow Spriggins, whose pretensions to sophistication are undercut by her nonstandard dialect, frequent malapropisms, and apparent inability to distinguish between reality and the world of her favorite novel. Berry gained a wider audience for her work in 1846, when she began publishing sketches in the Saturday Gazette. For this series, Berry employed another dialect-speaking narrator, Priscilla Bedott. In her quest to find a husband, the gossipy and self-important Widow Bedott introduces other comical small-town characters.

In 1847 Berry married William Whitcher, an Episcopal minister. The couple moved to Elmira, New York, and while continuing the Widow Bedott stories for the Gazette, Miriam began another series of sketches for GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK. Narrated this time by Melissa Maguire, Priscilla Bedott's likable sister, the stories again feature dialect and satirize provincial society.

After some of Whitcher's characterizations were linked to local parishioners, William Whitcher resigned his pastorate, and the couple returned to Whitesboro. There, in 1849, a daughter, Alice Miriam, was born. Frances Whitcher's health slowly deteriorated, and she died of tuberculosis scarcely two years later. Her Saturday Gazette and Godey's stories, collected in 1855, remained popular for decades and were successfully adapted for the stage.

Sources

- Morris, Linda. Women's Humor in the Age of Gentility: The Life and Works of Frances Miriam Whitcher. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1992.
- Whitcher, F. M. The Widow Bedott Papers. New York: Houghton, Osgood, 1855; Boston: Gregg Press, 1974.

—Brett Barney

White-Jacket by Herman Melville (2 volumes, New York: Harper, 1850) novel/autobiographical account White-Jacket; or, The World in a Man-of-War is based on Herman MELVILLE's own experiences as an enlisted man in the U.S. Navy, sailing on the frigate United States from Honolulu to Boston (1843–1844). The book defies classification as either autobiographical account or novel, most closely resembling the so-called seaman's man-of-war narrative popular in Melville's time. Though quite humorous throughout, its tone is powerfully egalitarian, with a strong condemnation of flogging, a then-legal punishment. The protagonist and narrator takes his name from the white duck frock he wears, which sets him apart from the other sailors and causes him many problems. As REDBURN had been, White-Jacket was well received, although it was belittled by its author.

Source

Melville, Herman. White-Jacket; or, The World in a Man-of-War, edited by Harrison Hayford, Hershel Parker, and G. Thomas Tanselle. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1970.
—Vanessa Y. Steinroetter

Whitman, Walt (1819–1892) poet, journalist

*I celebrate myself, And what I assume you shall assume,
For every atom belonging to me as good belongs to you.*
—“Song of Myself” (1855)

Walt Whitman was born on Long Island and just before his fourth birthday moved with his family to Brooklyn, New York. In 1825 he started six years of public school there, taking a job at the age of eleven in a law firm under James B. Clark and his son, Edward, who tutored Whitman in writing and gave him a library subscription. In 1831 Whitman went to work at the Long Island Patriot. He published his first signed article in the NEW YORK MIRROR in 1834, and by the age of sixteen he was a journeyman printer in New York City. As a young adult Whitman vacillated between working as a printer and as a schoolteacher, a profession he first adopted in 1836. In 1838 he founded the Long Islander in Huntington, New York; this weekly lasted about a year, and by 1842 Whitman was back in New York City working as an editor at the New York Aurora. Whitman's tenure at the Aurora was brief—he was fired—and he accepted an offer by a former employer to write a temperance novel (see TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT). Whitman later denounced his resulting best-seller, Franklin Evans; or The Inebriate (1842).

For the next four years Whitman worked for various newspapers until he was hired as editor of THE BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE. His Democratic affiliation matched the personality of the journal, but Whitman's antiabolitionist stance (see ABOLITIONISM) was complicated by his alignment with the Free Soil Party (whose agenda was to admit to statehood only those territories disavowing slavery), and his politics cost him his job in 1848.

Daguerreotype of Walt Whitman, 1853 or 1854

In 1846 Whitman met J. E. McClure, who recruited him to help establish a New Orleans newspaper, the Crescent. After just three months, however, Whitman returned up the Mississippi River and through the Great Lakes and upstate New York areas, returning to Brooklyn to work on several local papers, including the Brooklyn Freeman, a Free-Soil paper he founded and edited, and the Brooklyn Times. By the late 1840s Whitman was making a study of New York City, spending his time at the opera, riding the ferryboats, and talking to the drivers of horse-drawn cabs. The long catalogues of LEAVES OF GRASS (1855) later included vivid descriptions of the areas of the country he had visited and those he imagined—both demonstrating his encyclopedic knowledge of New York City.

The period of 1850 to 1855 marked Whitman's evolution from occasional writer of conventional verse to brash experimentalist: by the time Whitman published the first edition of Leaves of Grass, he had completely revolutionized himself and his concept of poetry. No longer “Walter” but “Walt,” he ? soldiers,

 Ashes of heroes, blended with ashes of roses
 & lilacs, fused
 Ashes cerulean blended with the ashes of gray,
 Ashes of pine & palmetto
 blended,
 Ashes of North and South - ashes of East & West,
 Ashes of seaboard & inland ashes of ~~valley~~ prairie, & hill & valley rich

 A Sacred aroma & powder powder - odor & dust immortal,
 Curious

Whitman's notes circa 1870 for his poem published as "Hymn of Dead Soldiers" put in his book an engraving of himself in casual dress, striking a jaunty pose, his hat cocked to the side, thus announcing a departure from the august establishment figures of traditional poetic sensibilities. The persona Whitman cultivated abandoned all formalities: rough-and-ready like the city he lived in, he was all energy; he did not stand on his dignity. His verse was not shackled by the meters or the rhymes of the past; it flowed in long lines but also expressed compact, vivid, and earthy images.

Many of Whitman's poems were sensual, erotic, and, for his time, scandalous. Often misunderstood, he was fired from his job in the Department of the Interior because his books were thought to be immoral. His open discussion of sexuality inspired the work of many Beat poets in the 1950s, including that of Allen Ginsberg.

Leaves of Grass became Whitman's lifework. He continued to revise and add to it, incorporating poems that reflect his extraordinary experiences as a nurse during the CIVIL WAR—first issued as DRUM-TAPS in 1865. Much of his Civil War verse, such as "Cavalry Crossing a Ford," prefigures the precision of the early-twentieth-century imagists. He also wrote prose recollections of the war, published in Specimen Days (1882). Whitman gradually attracted an international audience, with many visitors making pilgrimages to see him after he suffered a paralyzing stroke in 1873 and retired to Camden, New Jersey. He died there shortly after completing revisions for a final edition of Leaves of Grass.

Principal Books by Whitman

Franklin Evans; or The Inebriate: A Tale of the Times. New York: J. Winchester, 1842.

Leaves of Grass, anonymous. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Fowler & Wells, 1855; revised second edition, 1856; revised third edition, Boston: Tayer & Eldridge, 1860–1861 (i.e., 1860); revised fourth edition, New York: William E. Chapin, 1867; revised fifth edition, Washington, D.C. (i.e., New York): J. S. Redfield, 1871; revised "Author's Edition," Camden, N.J., 1876; revised sixth edition, Boston: James R. Osgood, 1881–1882 (i.e., 1881); republished, Philadelphia: Rees Welsh, 1882; revised and enlarged as Leaves of Grass: Including Sands at Seventy . . . 1st Annex, Good-Bye My Fancy . . . 2d Annex, A Backward Glance o'er Travel'd Roads, and Portrait from Life. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1892.

Drum-Taps. New York: Peter Eckler, 1865.

Sequel to Drum-Taps: (Since the Preceding Came from the Press.) When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd. And Other Pieces. Washington, 1865–1866 (i.e., 1865).

Democratic Vistas. Washington, D.C. (i.e., New York): J. S. Redfield, 1871.

After All, Not to Create Only. Boston: Roberts, 1871.

Passage to India. Washington, D.C. (i.e., New York): J. S. Redfield, 1871.

As a Strong Bird on Pinions Free. And Other Poems. Washington, D.C. (i.e., New York): J. S. Redfield, 1872.

Walt Whitman, 1875

Memoranda during the War. Camden, N.J.: The Author, 1875–1876 (i.e., 1876).

Two Rivulets, including Democratic Vistas, Centennial Songs, and Passage to India. Camden, N.J.: The Author, 1876.

Specimen Days & Collect. Philadelphia: Rees Welsh, 1882–1883 (i.e., 1882).

Specimen Days in America. London: Walter Scott, 1887.

Complete Poems & Prose of Walt Whitman, 1855–1888: Authenticated & Personal Book. (Handled by W. W.), Portraits from Life, Autograph. Camden, N.J.: Whitman, 1888.

Democratic Vistas, and Other Papers. London: Walter Scott, 1888.

November Boughs. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1888.

Good-Bye My Fancy: 2d Annex to Leaves of Grass, anonymous. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1891.

Complete Prose Works. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1891.

Notes and Fragments, edited by Richard Maurice Bucke. London, Ont.: Printed for the editor by A. Talbot & Co., 1899.

The Complete Writings of Walt Whitman, 10 volumes, edited by Bucke, Thomas B. Harned, and Horace L. Traubel. New York: Putnam, 1902.

Drawing by Childe Hassam of Whitman's House

An American Primer, edited by Traubel. Boston: Small, Maynard, 1904.

The Uncollected Poetry and Prose of Walt Whitman, Much of Which Has Been But Recently Discovered, with Various Early Manuscripts Now First Published, 2 volumes, edited by Emory Holloway. Garden City, N.Y. & Toronto: Doubleday, Page, 1921.

Walt Whitman and the Civil War: A Collection of Original Articles and Manuscripts, edited by Charles I. Glicksberg. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1933.

New York Dissected . . . A Sheaf of Recently Discovered Newspaper Articles by the Author of "Leaves of Grass," edited by Holloway and Ralph Adimari. New York: Rufus Rockwell Wilson, 1936.

The Collected Writings of Walt Whitman, 23 volumes to date, edited by Gay Wilson Allen and others. New York: New York University Press, 1961–1984; New York: Peter Lang, 1998–2003; Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2002—comprises The Correspondence of Walt Whitman, 7 volumes, edited by Edwin Haviland Miller and Ted Genoways. New York: New York University Press, 1961–1977; Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2002; The Early Poems and the Fiction, edited by Thomas L. Brasher. New York: New York University Press, 1963; Prose Works 1892: Specimen Days; Collect and Other Prose, 2 volumes, edited by Floyd Stovall. New York: New York University Press, 1963, 1964; Leaves of Grass: Comprehensive Reader's Edition, edited by Blodgett and Sculley Bradley. New York: New York University Press, 1965; Daybooks and Notebooks, 3 volumes, edited by William White. New York: New York University Press, 1977; Notebooks and Unpublished Prose Manuscripts, 6 volumes, edited by Edward F. Grier. New York: New York University Press, 1984; The Journalism, 2 volumes, edited by Herbert Bergman, Douglas A. Noverr, and Edward J. Recchia. New York: Peter Lang, 1998–2003.

Walt Whitman's Blue Book: The 1860–61 Leaves of Grass Containing His Manuscript Additions and Revisions, 2 volumes, edited by Arthur Golden. New York: New York Public Library, 1968.

Letters

The Correspondence of Walt Whitman, 7 volumes, edited by Edwin Haviland Miller and Ted Genoways. New York: New York University Press, 1961–1977; Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 2002.

Studying Walt Whitman

Probably more than any other major American author, Walt Whitman is identified with a single book, Leaves of Grass. Such a statement, however, conceals a multitude of complexities, the most salient being the fact that Whitman published no fewer than six different—sometimes radically different—poetry collections under that title over the course of three and a half decades (1855–1892). The first of these contained twelve poems without individual titles, plus a long introductory essay, totaling about forty-three thousand words. The version issued just before Whitman's death comprised over one hundred thirty thousand words and nearly four hundred poems, some with titles that have become instantly recognizable, plus a concluding essay. For many years reprintings based on this "Deathbed edition" shaped public and scholarly views of the poet and his work. Over the past several decades, though, persuasive arguments for the importance of other editions have been put forward and these have also been reprinted. At the same time, scholars have drawn attention to Whitman's nonpoetic writing, both the journalism that occupied him for more than a decade prior to the first Leaves of Grass and the substantial body of critical and biographical work that he continued to publish throughout his career.

The foremost resource for students of Whitman, at any level, is the Walt Whitman Archive (<<http://www.whitmanarchive.org>> viewed August 2, 2007), edited by Ed Folsom and Kenneth M. Price. This immense academically oriented site makes available, at no charge, an ever-growing set of primary and secondary materials. Among its most important offerings are all the editions of Leaves of Grass published during Whitman's lifetime (available as both text and page images); an excellent biography by Folsom and Price; annotated reproductions of all extant photographs of the poet; all known contemporary reviews of his published work; page images and meticulous transcriptions of poetry manuscripts, conversations between Whitman and close friend Horace Traubel from the nine-volume With Walt Whitman in Camden; a searchable bibliography of all significant Whitman scholarship since 1940; and a growing collection of full-length critical monographs by eminent Whitman scholars.

In some ways the Archive continues the work of The Collected Writings of Walt Whitman (1961–2004), a decades-long venture begun with New York University Press and

(Memories of President Lincoln from p. 325 to p. 336 inclusive)

(must continue on page 357)

(This cluster runs from this page to 368. I have Memories of President Lincoln for running head over odd pages.)

Memories of President Lincoln

(357)

WHEN LILACS LAST IN THE DOOR-YARD BLOOM'D

1

WHEN lilacs last in the door-yard bloom'd,
And the great star early droop'd in the western sky in the night,
I mourn'd—and yet shall mourn with ever-returning spring.
Ever-returning spring, trinity sure to me you bring,
Lilac blooming perennial, and drooping star in the west,
And thought of him I love.

2

O powerful, western, fallen star!
O shades of night, O moody, tearful night!
O great star disappear'd, O the black murk that hides the star!
O cruel hands that hold me powerless, O helpless soul of me!
O harsh surrounding cloud, that will not free my soul!

supplemented, in recent years, by volumes from University of Iowa Press and Peter Lang Publishing. Among the essential resources in the Collected Writings are Whitman's letters, prose manuscripts, notebooks, early journalism, and a carefully annotated "reader's" edition of Leaves of Grass. Of the many other editions of Whitman's work that are available, the single-volume Poetry and Prose: Walt Whitman, edited by Justin Kaplan (New York: Modern Library, 1996), is especially recommended. In addition to being inexpensive, it prints both the first and final editions of Leaves and a large selection of Whitman's most important prose writings.

Recent years have seen a host of good Whitman biographies. Jerome Loving's Walt Whitman: The Song of Himself (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999), Gary Schmidgall's Walt Whitman: A Gay Life (New York: Dutton, 1997), and David Reynolds's Walt Whitman's America: A Cultural Biography (New York: Knopf, 1995) are especially worthwhile. None, however, can be said to completely supersede Gay Wilson Allen's The Solitary Singer: A Critical Biography of Walt Whitman (New York: Macmillan, 1955; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985), which remains essential.

Good critical treatments of Whitman are legion and continue to appear at a dizzying rate. Students can gain a sense of the issues and trends in Whitman scholarship by sampling Walt Whitman: A Critical Anthology, edited by Francis Murphy (Harmondsworth, U.K.: Penguin, 1969); Critical Essays on Walt Whitman, edited by James Woodress (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1983); Walt Whitman: The Centennial Essays, edited by Ed Folsom (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1994); The Poetry of Walt Whitman, edited by Nick Selby (Basingstoke, U.K.; New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004); and A Companion to Walt Whitman, edited by Donald D. Cummings (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2006). Issues of American Literary Scholarship (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press) include annual overviews of Whitman criticism, and students should also consult the constantly updated critical bibliography on the Whitman Archive. Walt Whitman: An Encyclopedia, edited by J. R. LeMaster and Donald D. Cummings (New York & London: Garland, 1998), is an invaluable general reference.

—Brett Barney

Whittier, John Greenleaf (1807–1892) poet

*He findeth not who seeks his own,
The soul is lost that's saved alone.*

—"The Meeting" (1894)

John Greenleaf Whittier was born into a Massachusetts Quaker family. His basic values remained those of his family, although early on he became attracted to poetry, reading the verse of Scottish poet Robert Burns and taking perceptive delight in rural New England. He was employed as an editor and mentored by William Lloyd GARRISON, the journalist and New England abolitionist who printed some of Whittier's earliest poems.

Whittier published his first book, Legends of New-England in Prose and Verse, a work of LOCAL COLOR and history, in 1831. He pursued New England themes and characters in the poems Moll Pitcher (1832) and Mogg Megone (1836), the latter a narrative of Indian life during the colonial period. These works reflected Whittier's abiding concern with social justice. He spoke at antislavery meetings, served in the state legislature in 1835, and published Poems Written during the Progress of the Abolition Question in the United States (1838) and Voices of Freedom (1846). Having aligned himself with the abolitionist movement, Whittier is said to have remarked, "I set a higher value on my name as appended to the Anti-Slavery Declaration of 1833 than on the title page of any book."

While he continued his engagement with social and political causes, Whittier also continued to probe New England history, producing Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal in the Province of Massachusetts Bay, 1678–1679 (1849), his only sustained work of fiction. The novel has been compared to Nathaniel HAWTHORNE's fiction because Whittier pursues a deeply romantic view of Puritan behavior that attempts to do justice to the rebelliousness of individuals and the Puritan sense of community. Whittier's other prose includes Old Portraits and Modern Sketches (1850) and Literary Recreations and Miscellanies (1854). Whittier's pastoral poetry includes some of his best work. The Chapel of the Hermit (1853); The Panorama and Other Poems (1856); and Home Ballads, Poems and Lyrics (1860) include the poems on which his poetic reputation is based: "Maud Muller," "The Barefoot Boy," "Skipper Ireson's Ride," and "Telling the Bees." But Snow-Bound (1866), an idyll based on his memory of being snowed in on his father's Massachusetts farm, is considered his masterwork. Other volumes of verse about rural life and colonial Quaker history followed. Whittier also edited John Woolman's Journal (1871), the work of a Quaker ancestor who greatly influenced his worldview.

Sources

Kribbs, Jayne K., ed. Critical Essays on John Greenleaf Whittier. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1980.

Leary, Lewis. John Greenleaf Whittier. New York: Twayne, 1961.

Pickard, John B. John Greenleaf Whittier: An Introduction and Interpretation. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1961.

The Wide, Wide World by Elizabeth Wetherell

(i.e., Susan Bogart Warner) (New York: Putnam, 1850)
novel

Written by Susan Bogart WARNER using the pseudonym Elizabeth Wetherell, The Wide, Wide World became what has been called the first American best-seller. In the over eighty years it stayed in print, the novel appeared in 106 editions.

The book tells the story of Ellen Montgomery, who becomes an orphan of sorts when she is left on a secluded farm in the care of her father's sister while he and his invalid wife go off to Europe. Ellen's experience of the wide world begins with the farm, where she is under the control of her unfeeling aunt, contrasted with the home of her aunt's neighbors, the Humphreys, where she is surrounded by love and books. She next goes to Scotland, where she lives with other controlling relatives. Since the novel does not take Ellen beyond her adolescence, she does not end happily married as do the heroines of the typical sentimental novels of the time. Instead, she returns to her loving surrogate family, the Humphreys, to be the center of their attention. Warner's best-known novel, The Wide, Wide World features aspects typical of her work—middle-class characters, powerless young women trying coping with adversity, vernacular dialogue (see DIALECT AND VERNACULAR WRITING), rich descriptions of ordinary domestic scenes and tasks, and the examination of abstract theological and social issues.

Source

Warner, Susan. The Wide, Wide World, afterword by Jane Tompkins. New York: The Feminist Press at the City University of New York, 1987.

—Vicki Martin

Wilcox, Ella Wheeler (1850–1919) poet, fiction writer, nonfiction writer

Born in rural Wisconsin, Ella Wheeler Wilcox began writing poetry and fiction at an early age as an escape from her surroundings. Her first poems appeared in periodicals such as FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, FRANK LESLIE'S POPULAR MONTHLY, and Peterson's Magazine. When a prospective publisher declared her Poems of Passion (1883) immoral, another publisher capitalized on the ensuing public interest, and the volume became a best-seller. In 1884 Wheeler married businessman Robert Wilcox. She continued to publish poetry and also produced a few volumes of fiction. Much of her writing in later life was devoted to treatises on spiritualism.

—Brett Barney

Willis, Nathaniel Parker (1806–1867) editor, man of letters

Born into a family of writers and editors in Portland, Maine, Nathaniel Parker Willis was educated at Yale, where he made a name for himself as a poet and prose stylist. He founded and edited THE AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE (1829–1831), to which he also contributed stories and poems. By the age of twenty-five, he had cultivated a sophisticated public persona, and his taste in literature and fashion was highly regarded throughout the nation. When financial difficulties brought his magazine to an end, Willis moved to New York and joined George Pope Morris at The New-York Mirror.

Willis traveled to Europe as a foreign correspondent for the Mirror, sending back letters from England and Turkey that describe the social affairs of those countries. Upon his return he collected these letters in Pencillings by the Way (1835) and Loiterings of Travel (1840). When Willis's romantic tragedy Tortesa, or the Usurer (1839) attracted the support of Edgar Allan Poe, Willis hired Poe as literary critic for the Mirror. The Mirror also served as an outlet for Willis's American sketches, later collected as Al'Abri; or, The Tent Pitch'd (1839) and American Scenery (1840). Among his other literary efforts is the collection Dashes at Life with a Free Pencil (1845), a volume of stories with surprise endings that anticipated the work of O. Henry (William Sydney Porter). Willis is unflatteringly portrayed in Ruth Hall (1855), a novel written by his sister, Sara Payson Willis PARTON (Fanny Fern).

Sources

Auser, Courtland P. Nathaniel P. Willis. New York: Twayne, 1969.
Baker, Thomas N. Sentiment & Celebrity: Nathaniel Parker Willis and the Trials of Literary Fame. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Wilson, Harriet E. Adams (1828?–1863?) novelist

Perhaps the first published African American novelist, Harriet Wilson—and her one novel, Our Nig (1859)—were mere footnotes to American literary history until 1984, when the scholars Henry Louis Gates Jr. and Davis Ames Curtis discovered that the novelist, long believed to be a white woman, was black.

Born in Milford, New Hampshire, sometime between 1825 and 1828, Harriet Adams was left at age six at the home of the Haywards, a wealthy old Milford family who apparently subjected her to severe mistreatment. When she was eighteen, Adams left the Haywards, and in 1850—the year that passage of the Fugitive Slave Act endangered African Americans in the North—lived in the household of a carpenter named Samuel Boyle. On October 6, 1851, Adams married Thomas Wilson, a freeman posing as a fugitive slave in order to earn money lecturing about the evils of slavery. In June of the next year, deserted by her husband, Harriet Wilson gave birth to a son, George Mason Wilson, in a paupers' "country house."

Alone, ill, and impoverished, Harriet Wilson was compelled to write Our Nig: Sketches from the Life of a Free Black, in a Two-Story White House, North, Showing That Slavery's Shadows Fall Even There. The book recounted the story of Frado, a mixed-race servant who is abandoned as a child by her white mother and abused by the white family for whom she works. Wilson registered the book's copyright and published it in September 1859. Her son, who had been placed in foster care, died five months later. It was his death certificate, rediscovered by Gates and Curtis, that revealed Wilson's racial identity.

Sources

- Andrews, William L. To Tell a Free Story: The First Century of Afro-American Autobiography, 1760–1865. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Curtis, David Ames, and Henry Louis Gates Jr. “Establishing the Identity of the Author of Our Nig,” in Wild Women in the Whirlwind: Afro-American Culture and the Contemporary Literary Renaissance, edited by Joanne Braxton and Andree McLaughlin. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1990, pp. 48–69.
- Ellis, R. J. Harriet Wilson’s Our Nig: A Cultural Biography of a “Two-Story” African American Novel. New York: Rodopi, 2003.

Winnemucca, Sarah [Thocmetony] (circa 1844–1891) autobiographer, historian, American Indian rights activist

Now you must not suppose that my people are weak or uncourageous. . . . We helped the Bannacks and the Umatillas in the war, because we are kindred of theirs. . . . Why did they make war? I will tell you: Your white men are too greedy.

—“The Pah-Utes” (1882)

Sarah Winnemucca, a Paiute Indian born in present-day Nevada, was the first female Native American autobiographer. Life among the Piutes: Their Wrongs and Claims, her only written work, is an autobiography-cum-history that also uses myth, politics, and humor to describe the history of her people and depict her life experiences as a child, a domestic, a popular entertainer, and a translator and liaison between the Paiutes and the government. Winnemucca lectured extensively in New England, where her criticism of the government’s land-acquisition practices and its harsh treatment of Indians made her notorious, to such an extent, she writes, that officials tried to prevent her from lecturing. However, in Boston she met Elizabeth Palmer Peabody and Mary Mann, both of whom encouraged her political activities and provided financial and editorial assistance for compiling her lectures into an autobiography. In it, Winnemucca describes her precarious position negotiating between a white government and Native Americans and her critical assessment of government-appointed reservation agents. Nevertheless, she advocates peaceful relations between the groups and fair treatment of her people. Using some of the profits from her lectures and her book, Winnemucca returned to Nevada and, in 1884, founded the Peabody Indian School for Paiute children. The school practiced bilingual education and maintained the primacy of American Indian culture; it closed in 1887. Although she married several times, no marriage was successful, and her last husband, Lewis Hopkins, gambled away her earnings. Winnemucca died of tuberculosis four years after her school closed. She is remembered as an activist for Native American rights, a supporter of Native American education, and a campaigner for peaceful relations between whites and Native Americans.

Sources

- Canfield, Gae Whitney. Sarah Winnemucca of the Northern Paiutes. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1983.
- Ruoff, A. LaVonne Brown. “Early Native American Women Authors: Jane Johnston Schoolcraft, Sarah Winnemucca, S. Alice Callahan, E. Pauline Johnson, and Zitkala-Ša,” in Nineteenth-Century American Woman Writers: A Critical Reader, edited by Karen E. Kilcup. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1998.
- Zanjani, Sally S. Sarah Winnemucca. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2001.

—Mary Rose Kasraie

Woman in the Nineteenth Century by Margaret Fuller (New York: Greeley & McElrath, 1845) nonfiction study

Possibly the inaugural text of the women’s rights movement in America, Woman in the Nineteenth Century is a large-scale defense of female intellectualism. Margaret Fuller’s argument, that the gender divisions engrained in Western civilization deplete feminine and masculine vitality alike, first appeared in THE DIAL (July 1843). Its original title, “The Great Lawsuit: Man versus Men. Woman versus Women,” reveals Fuller’s focus on gender and the division between ideal and real versions of men and women. Fuller engages classical and biblical sources of gender divisions, claiming that they have, over time, altered the psychological—even physiological—makeup of women. The main feature of this alteration is an overdeveloped capacity for “intuition” and “magnetism.” This “magnetic element” is unfairly used to rationalize the traditional prohibition of women from public life. Christianity’s concept of the Virgin Mary, Fuller argues, partially dispels the classical and biblical myths that woman is the source of sin. But Fuller argues that the Virgin compounds the problem, as she reinforces sexist logic: “through woman man was lost, so through woman must man be redeemed.” Fuller’s analysis of heroines in various mythologies, histories, and literatures provides positive alternative models of femininity. Fuller ultimately proposes that woman’s acuity can either relieve or reinforce her social repression.

Source

- Fuller, Margaret. Woman in the Nineteenth Century, 1845, edited by Larry J. Reynolds. New York: Norton, 1998.

—Jason Arthur

The Woman Question

"What do women want?" questioned social theorists and commentators of the latter half of the nineteenth century, particularly in the United States and Western Europe. This "woman question" was linked to specific nineteenth-century social movements, most notably, in the United States, to the women's suffrage movement (see SUFFRAGISM), in which activists fought for women's right to vote. The woman question was also linked to the American social ideals of "True Womanhood" and "Woman's Sphere," neither of which left room for substantial freedom of thought and action. Oftentimes, discussion of the woman question was paired with and discussed in juxtaposition to the Negro question. In both cases, the social dilemma was clear: What is to be done with these "others," these oddities, and how can the mainstream Caucasian male leaders of society best deal with the discontent expressed by these two groups?

The nineteenth-century American woman was largely devoid of legal and social rights. She was typically expected to remain in the "Woman's Sphere," meaning she was supposed to happily and exclusively tend to her husband and children, focusing on their spiritual edification and on her own spiritual and social purity, as dictated by the majority Christian tenets of the day. To do such was to belong in the sacred realm of "True Womanhood" and was deemed by many to be the highest achievement to which a woman could aspire. This ideology left women with little or no education, virtually no options beyond marriage and motherhood, and no sanctioned voice in the political machinery of the country. It was in reaction to these restrictions that a group of women, some working together and others working independently, used the written word to address the woman question by outlining reasons they believed all women should be well educated, entitled to professions or avocations beyond marriage and motherhood, and granted full citizenship through the right to vote.

That the woman question is tied theoretically and historically to the Negro question is no great surprise, given that the two groups shared certain types of oppression, including the prohibition against full legal status as citizens of the United States. Many women were already staunch abolitionists, working on a volunteer basis—as they did for so many causes—with various antislavery societies throughout the nation (see ABOLITIONISM). That so many white women worked with the antislavery societies is no surprise either, as many of them felt that casting their lot with the other major oppressed group would help strengthen the agenda of both groups and speed the path to suffrage for both. When Elizabeth Cady STANTON, Lucretia Mott, and Susan B. ANTHONY held the first Women's Rights Convention in Stanton's hometown of Seneca Falls in 1848, they were supported in their quest for rights by African American male abolitionists such as Frederick DOUGLASS. The women's rights movement continued to enjoy the broad support of African American male leaders until slavery had been abolished, and it became clear that their fight for voting rights would be strengthened if it were not bound up with the fight for women's suffrage. In 1870 the Fifteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution was passed, granting men of all races the right to vote. The Nineteenth Amendment, which granted women the right to vote, was not passed by Congress until 1919; it was ratified in 1920.

Although Abigail Adams was writing to her husband John as early as the mid eighteenth century urging him to "remember the ladies" when drafting what would become the guiding documents of United States government, Margaret FULLER is credited with having published the first full-length treatise addressing the woman question from the point of view of an independent, intellectual woman with her 1855 book, WOMAN IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. The premise of the book originated with Fuller's article, "The Great Lawsuit: Man versus Men. Woman versus Women," which was published in the July 1843 issue of the magazine THE DIAL, of which Fuller was editor. In Woman in the Nineteenth Century Fuller outlines the atrocities that women of her time faced, namely, social, financial, and legal inequality.

Fuller's monograph is predated, however, by the "Declaration of Sentiments" written by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott for the first 1848 Women's Rights Convention. This document is modeled after the Declaration of Independence and enumerates the inequalities that nineteenth-century American women faced. Stanton later also wrote The Woman's Bible, published in 1895, with a group of other women referred to as "The Revising Committee." The Woman's Bible offers discussion on and an alternative interpretation of the commonly taught Christian Scripture, with the aim of proving a scriptural basis for the equality of women.

Other American women writers of the nineteenth century also address the woman question in their works. Earlier in the century, sisters Sarah and Angelina GRIMKÉ had written on both abolition and women's rights. Sarah Moore Grimké's 1838 Letters on the Equality of the Sexes forms an early and passionate response to the woman question. Fanny Fern (Sarah Payton WILLIS) wrote the autobiographical novel Ruth Hall, which traces a young widow and mother's rise to financial independence and security, in 1855. Fern herself became the epitome of independence through her writing, much of it in the form of newspaper and magazine columns quite popular with women readers. Former slave Sojourner TRUTH gave many speeches on both abolition and women's rights; because Truth was illiterate, these speeches were transcribed into text on her behalf. One of her most famous speeches is her 1881 "Address to the First Annual Meeting of the American Equal Rights Association."

As women of the nineteenth century began to take charge of their own education and time, and as they worked on a myriad of social causes—from Jane ADDAMS's Hull House in Chicago, which worked for the betterment of the conditions of immigrant women, to Frances Ellen Watkins HARPER's crusade to educate women of color and make them financially independent—dissatisfaction with their lot in life became more pronounced. They insisted that they be made free citizens in their own right, with the ability to go to college, pursue careers beyond the home, and take charge of their own finances and futures. No longer wishing to be the legal responsibility of first their fathers and then their husbands, they demanded to be considered adults capable of piloting their own courses in life.

Few, however, suggested that the answer to the woman question was that women cast aside the roles of wife and mother. Rather, they argued that women should be allowed choice beyond the mainstream path. Some activists, such as Stanton, did a remarkable job of working both inside and outside of the home, although not without difficulties. Others, such as Charlotte Perkins GILMAN, wrote extensively about the possibilities of great freedom that could come only from being husbandless and often childless. The woman question was, in the estimation of such women, simply a question of equality. In the eyes of many social and religious leaders, however, the woman question was much more complicated: it brought to mind images of social upheaval, with women thoughtlessly abandoning husbands and children and running amok in the business world, disturbing the balance of commerce. Among other things, they feared that such outcomes would lead to both the downfall and the degradation of women, who were presumed to be the sacred and quiet guiding force of American family life.

As the twentieth century began, women continued to address the woman question in their writings. Charlotte Perkins Gilman writes of women's need for financial independence in the nonfiction Women and Economics: A Study of the Economic Relation between Men and Women as a Factor in Social Evolution (1898). This text became highly influential to the women's right movement, largely because of Gilman's courage to live as closely to the ideal she preached as possible. Perkins also writes of women's predisposition to equality and freedom, and of the horrors of being denied such, in many of her works of fiction, most notably "The Yellow Wallpaper" (1892), Herland (1915), and Unpunished (unpublished until 1997). The Southern writer Kate CHOPIN describes a woman's need for independence—financial, social, and sexual—in her 1899 novel, The Awakening, which shocked mainstream America's sensibilities while addressing basic concerns of the woman question. African American author Frances Ellen Watkins HARPER deals with answers to the woman question from the perspective of race in her 1892 novel, Iola Leroy, which, much like Gilman's work, dictates the importance of a woman's preparing for her own financial stability by becoming educated and by following the path toward which her individual talents point.

Source

Helsing, Elizabeth K., Robin Lauterbach Sheets, and William Veeder. The Woman Question: Society and Literature in Britain and America, 1837–1883. New York: Garland, 1983.

—Terry D. Novak

Woodhull, Victoria C. (1838–1927) reformer, pamphleteer

Born in Ohio, as a child Victoria Woodhull traveled with her family staging seances, telling fortunes, and peddling patent medicine, and engaging in various other forms of flamboyant quackery. Woodhull married twice, the first time at age fifteen, before moving with her sister and other family members to New York City, where they so charmed the transportation magnate Cornelius Vanderbilt (1794–1877) that he helped set them up as Wall Street brokers. With the help of Stephen P. Andrews, they started the radical periodical Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly (1870–1876), which, in addition to advocating socialism, free love, birth control, and women's suffrage (see SUFFRAGISM), was also the first periodical to publish news of the sexual scandal surrounding Henry Ward BEECHER. The periodical also featured an English translation of Karl Marx's Communist Manifesto.

In 1872 Woodhull was nominated for president by the Equal Rights Party, with Frederick DOUGLASS as her running mate. Five years later the Claflin sisters moved to England, where Victoria married into a wealthy banking family and her sister Tennessee married a baronet. From 1892 to 1901 Woodhull published a periodical called Humanitarian with her daughter, Zulu Maud Woodhull. With her sister she also published the pamphlet The Human Body as the Temple of God (1890). Woodhull's own significant publications include the pamphlets The Origins, Tendencies and Principles of Government (1871); the eugenics tracts Stirpiculture (1888) and The Alchemy of Maternity (1889); and her And the Truth Shall Make You Free: A Speech on the Principles of Social Freedom (1871).

Sources

- Friskin, Amanda. Victoria Woodhull's Sexual Revolution: Political Theater and the Popular Press in Nineteenth-Century America. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2004.
- Gabriel, Mary. Notorious Victoria: The Life of Victoria Woodhull, Uncensored. Chapel Hill, N.C.: Algonquin Books, 1998.
- Goldsmith, Barbara. Other Powers: The Age of Suffrage, Spiritualism, and the Scandalous Victoria Woodhull. New York: Knopf, 1998.
- Johnston, Johanna. Mrs. Satan: The Incredible Saga of Victoria C. Woodhull. New York: Putnam, 1967.
- Krull, Kathleen. A Woman for President: The Story of Victoria Woodhull. New York: Walker, 2004.

Woolson, Constance Fenimore (1840–1894)short-story writer, novelist, poet

It is dangerous to ask a writer of novels about novels! . . . The truth is, that, to a writer, the subject is so vast,—really, his whole life's interest—that if he is to tell you what he thinks, he will almost never get through. . . . This is the reason, I think, why writers like to be with writers. . . .

—Letter to Sam Mather (circa 1887)

Although often considered a New England writer because she was born in Claremont, New Hampshire, Constance Fenimore Woolson moved with her family to Cleveland when she was a child. Her early schooling was in Cleveland at Miss Hayden's School and the Cleveland Female Seminary, and she completed her education at Madame Chegarney's, a finishing school in New York, where she graduated at the top of her class when she was eighteen. Woolson, the great-niece of James Fenimore COOPER, became a LOCAL-COLOR writer, as did many other New England women authors, but her settings went beyond New England. Her Cleveland experience led her to write from experience about Mackinac Island in Lake Michigan, as well as about other Great Lakes locations. Woolson's later travels in the South and in Europe became the basis for her further regional writing.

Woolson took on the role of caretaker of her mother after her father died in 1869. She began writing and publishing in 1870, with travel sketches she sent from New York to the Daily Cleveland Herald. She published her only children's novel, The Old Stone House (1872), using the pseudonym Anne March; it was published just five years after the publication of LITTLE WOMEN by Louisa May ALCOTT. Woolson gave up children's writing, though, believing that public interest in the genre had attracted many unskilled women writers and elevated them to a higher estimation than they deserved. She continued to contribute sketches and stories to periodicals such as HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY, and THE GALAXY.

Her writing about the South during Reconstruction from the viewpoint of an unmarried Northern woman was successful since she was able to communicate the role of the outsider in regard to region, gender, and marital status. She benefited from the lifelong friendship of two Southern literary men, Edmund Clarence STEDMAN, poet and critic, and Paul Hamilton HAYNE, poet. The two men acted as literary mentors, assuming the role her father had performed. In Europe she met another important male writer of the nineteenth century, Henry JAMES, who also contributed to her development as an artist and championed her fiction, once including her in a gathering with Ralph Waldo EMERSON, Ivan Turgenev, and George Eliot.

Woolson, being especially fond of Italy and England, spent her later years in Europe. As she aged, she became susceptible to two family afflictions, deafness and depression. In Venice she fell from her window to the pavement below and died. Whether her death was an accident or suicide has never been determined. She is buried on a hillside in Rome.

Woolson considered herself more influenced by James Fenimore COOPER and Nathaniel HAWTHORNE than by the female writers of domestic and sentimental fiction who preceded her. Her five novels, published between the years of 1882 and 1894, deal with themes of ethnic, racial, national, and religious diversity and struggling women artists who never achieve the critical success or ability to earn a living that Woolson herself attained.

Sources

Dean, Sharon. Constance Fenimore Woolson: Homeward Bound. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.

Moore, Rayburn S. Constance F. Woolson. New York: Twayne, 1963.

Torsney, Cheryl B. Constance Fenimore Woolson: The Grief of Artistry. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989.

Torsney, ed. Critical Essays on Constance Fenimore Woolson. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992.

—Vicki Martin

"The Wreck of the Hesperus" by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1841) poem

This ballad by Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW was first published in his second volume, Ballads and Other Poems (1841), and became one of his most famous compositions. Like EVANGELINE, it was inspired by an historical event, in this case the wreck of the schooner Favorite off the reef of Norman's Woe, Massachusetts, in 1839. In the poem the schooner is called Hesperus, the ancient Greek word for "the evening star"—a name more suitable to Longfellow's tragic (as opposed to ironic) purposes. The ballad represents a man who takes his daughter to sea, too prideful to heed the warnings of an old sailor who forecasts an oncoming hurricane. When the power of the storm proves greater than the man's skill as a sailor, he wraps his daughter in his coat and binds her to the mast. He is unable to answer the girl's innocent questions, having died of cold. At dawn, a fisherman sees the girl "lashed close to a drifting mast," tears frozen in her eyes and her hair pulsing on top of the still unquiet sea.

—C. Love

Wright, Frances (1795–1852) reformer, editor

Born in Scotland, Frances (Fanny) Wright toured the United States several times before settling in New York in 1829. From 1818 to 1820 she toured the country with a production of her play, Altorf (1819), about Swiss freedom fighters, and carried out the fact-gathering missions that resulted in Views of Society and Manners in America (1821). In 1824 she accompanied the Marquis de Lafayette on his triumphal tour of America, in the course of which Wright met both Thomas Jefferson and James Madison. The two former presidents encouraged Wright's efforts to gradually emancipate slaves through the foundation in 1825 of the Tennessee Nashoba Community, an experiment in communal living that lasted for three years, until Wright grew ill and had to leave. From 1828 to 1829 Wright co-edited the liberal periodicals New Harmony Gazette and Free Enquirer with the social reformer Robert Dale Owen. Even after she permanently settled in the United States, she continued to tour, giving public lectures on the redistribution of wealth, the errors of orthodox religion, the need for free public education, ABOLITIONISM, and women's rights.

Sources

- Bartlett, Elizabeth Ann. Liberty, Equality, Sorority: The Origins and Interpretation of American Feminist Thought: Frances Wright, Sarah Grimke, and Margaret Fuller. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Carlson, 1994.
- Kissel, Susan S. In Common Cause: The "Conservative" Frances Trollope and the "Radical" Frances Wright. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1993.
- Morris, Celia. Fanny Wright, Rebel in America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1984.

War Is Kind by Stephen Crane (New York: Stokes, 1899) poetry collection

Stephen CRANE's second collection of poetry includes 37 poems, two-thirds of which are free-verse epigrams, the others relying on conventional patterns of rhyme and structure. As in THE BLACK RIDERS AND OTHER LINES, God and Nature seem indifferent to the plight of humanity, and traditional religion cannot ultimately explain the meaning of life. Several poems criticize war and the excesses of the Gilded Age such as greed and yellow journalism. Others—a series of mysterious, sentimental poems titled “Intrigue”—may reflect a deeply personal experience in Crane's life involving love, jealousy, and betrayal.

Source

Hoffman, Daniel G. The Poetry of Stephen Crane. New York: Columbia University Press, 1956.

—Paul Sorrentino

Warren, Robert Penn (1905–1989) novelist, poet, playwright, essayist, teacher

The philosophical novelist, or poet, is one for whom the documentation of the world is constantly striving to rise to the level of generalization about values, for whom the image strives to rise to symbol, for whom images always fall into a dialectical configuration, for whom the urgency of experience, no matter how vividly and strongly experience may enchant, is the urgency to know the meaning of experience.

—Introduction to Joseph Conrad's Nostromo (1951)

Born April 24, 1905, Robert Penn Warren grew up in a cultured home in Guthrie, Kentucky. His mother, a teacher, and his father, a businessman and a closet poet, inculcated in him a love of learning. His interest in poetry and history was especially encouraged by his maternal grandfather, who recited poems and recounted tales of history, including his own experiences in the Civil War. Warren's appreciation for nature was developed in the hunting trips he took with Kent Greenfield, an older boy whom he later wrote about in the story “Goodwood Comes Back” and the poem “American Portrait: Old Style.”

Warren entered Vanderbilt University intending to major in chemical engineering, but John Crowe RANSOM's freshman English class converted him to an English major. While he was still an undergraduate, he was invited to attend meetings of THE FUGITIVES, a Nashville literary group that included Donald DAVIDSON and Allen TATE. While at Vanderbilt, Warren published poems in The Fugitive: A Journal of Poetry and in 1924 met Cleanth Brooks, who later became a teaching colleague and a collaborator on influential textbooks. Warren continued his education at the University of California, Berkeley, and at Yale and Oxford, where he was a Rhodes scholar. He published his first book, John Brown: The Making of a Martyr, in 1929. At this point Warren was a southern conservative and AGRARIAN who criticized northern values, especially industrialism and its destructive impact on individual freedom. He contributed to I'LL TAKE MY STAND (1930), a defense of the Old South and the agrarian tradition.

His long teaching career began in 1930 at Southwestern College (now Rhodes College) in Memphis, where he met undergraduate Albert Russell Erskine Jr., who later worked with him on THE SOUTHERN REVIEW and became his editor at RANDOM HOUSE. He subsequently taught at Louisiana State University (1934–1942), the University of Minnesota (1942–1949), and Yale University (1950–1955, 1961–1973).

Robert Penn Warren, 1950

During his years at L.S.U., Warren, together with Brooks and Erskine, made The Southern Review into a prestigious literary quarterly. Thirty-Six Poems, his first collection of poems, was published in 1935. His and Brooks's textbook Understanding Poetry (1938) influenced the way poetry was taught in the United States by promulgating the close-reading approach that came to be known as NEW CRITICISM. In 1939 Warren published his first novel, Night Rider, set during the tobacco wars in Kentucky and Tennessee around the turn of the century. In his early years in Baton Rouge, Warren observed firsthand the complexity of politics in the progressive and yet corrupt administration of governor and later senator Huey Long, whose career inspired his PULITZER PRIZE-winning novel, All the King's Men (1946).

Warren's abilities as a teacher and critic complement his talent as a writer in every major literary genre. His contributions to American letters include ten novels, sixteen short stories, fifteen volumes of poetry, seven dramas, five textbooks, eight books of nonfiction, two children's books, and more than one hundred essays and reviews. In addition to his Pulitzer Prize in fiction, Warren twice received the Pulitzer Prize in poetry as well as every other major literary award granted in this country, including the National Book Award, the Edna St. Vincent Millay Prize for Poetry, the National Medal for Literature, a MacArthur Prize Fellowship, and a Gold Medal for Poetry from the Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters.

While Warren considered himself first a poet, the success of All the King's Men meant that during his lifetime he was best known for his prose. His central fictional focus is man's search for self-knowledge and the redemptive quality of love. Often based on documented events, Warren's fiction uses history as backdrop for the deeper issues of human relationships and understanding. The sense of place, which plays a significant role in all of his works, is clearly evident in his last novel, A Place to Come To (1977). Warren's important nonfiction includes two volumes of social criticism: Segregation: The Inner Conflict in the South (1956) and Who Speaks for the Negro? (1965), which demonstrate how his political stand had evolved since 1930, as he became an advocate for integration.

Although Warren has set his fiction and dramatic works in the South, his poetry makes use of his foreign travels to Italy, France, Egypt, and Mexico. As a poet he excelled in both the short forms of the lyric and in long narrative poems, such as Brother to Dragons: A Tale in Verse and Voices (1953; revised 1979) which begins with an historical event—the murder of a slave by Thomas Jefferson's nephew Lilburne Lewis. This crime is the starting point for Warren's exploration of one of his most important themes: the fallen nature of man, the flaw in human character that makes such crimes inevitable. Warren won a Pulitzer Prize for Promises: Poems 1954–1956 (1957) and another for Now and Then: Poems 1976–1978 (1978). His other notable award-winning volumes of verse include Selected Poems: New and Old, 1923–1966 (1966) and Audubon: A Vision (1969). He was named the first poet laureate of the United States in 1986. His poetry is distinguished by vivid imagery, metaphors, and brilliant descriptions. No American poet has better integrated an understanding of American history and of historical incidents into his or her poetry.

While All the King's Men is acknowledged as a classic American novel, many critics contend that Warren's greatest accomplishments are in poetry, and still others cite his influential work as a critic as his most important legacy. His long, varied career of accomplishment justifies R. W. B. Lewis's assessment that Robert Penn Warren is "the most complete man of letters in our time."

—James A. Grimshaw Jr.

Principal Books by Warren

John Brown: The Making of a Martyr. New York: Payson & Clarke, 1929.

Thirty-Six Poems. New York: Alcestris, 1935.

Night Rider. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1939.

Eleven Poems on the Same Theme. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1942.

At Heaven's Gate. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1943.

Selected Poems, 1923–1943. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1944.

All the King's Men. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1946.

Blackberry Winter. Cummingtown, Mass.: Cummingtown, 1946.

The Circus in the Attic and Other Stories. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1947.

World Enough and Time: A Romantic Novel. New York: Random House, 1950.

Brother to Dragons: A Tale in Verse and Voices. New York: Random House, 1953.

Band of Angels. New York: Random House, 1955.

Segregation: The Inner Conflict in the South. New York: Random House, 1956.

To a Little Girl, One Year Old, In a Ruined Fortress. New Haven: Yale School of Design, 1956.

Promises: Poems 1954–1956. New York: Random House, 1957.

Selected Essays. New York: Random House, 1958.

Remember the Alamo! New York: Random House, 1958.

How Texas Won Her Freedom: The Story of Sam Houston and the Battle of San Jacinto. San Jacinto Monument, Tex.: San Jacinto Museum of History, 1959.

The Cave. New York: Random House, 1959.

The Gods of Mount Olympus. New York: Random House, 1959.

All the King's Men: A Play. New York: Random House, 1960.

You, Emperors, and Others: Poems 1957–1960. New York: Random House, 1960.

The Legacy of the Civil War: Meditations on the Centennial. New York: Random House, 1961.

Wilderness: A Tale of the Civil War. New York: Random House, 1961.

Flood: A Romance of Our Time. New York: Random House, 1964.

Who Speaks for the Negro? New York: Random House, 1965.

A Plea in Mitigation: Modern Poetry and the End of an Era. Macon, Ga.: Wesleyan College, 1966.

Selected Poems: New and Old, 1923–1966. New York: Random House, 1966.

Incarnations: Poems 1966–1968. New York: Random House, 1968.

Audubon: A Vision. New York: Random House, 1969.

Homage to Theodore Dreiser: August 27, 1871–December 28, 1945, On the Centennial of His Birth. New York: Random House, 1971.

Meet Me in the Green Glen. New York: Random House, 1971.

Or Else: Poem/Poems 1968–1974. New York: Random House, 1974.

Democracy and Poetry. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1975.

Selected Poems: 1923–1975. New York: Random House, 1976.

A Place to Come To. New York: Random House, 1977.

Now and Then: Poems 1976–1978. New York: Random House, 1978.

Dust jacket for Warren's third novel, which was inspired by the career of Louisiana governor and U.S. Senator Huey Long

Brother to Dragons: A Tale in Verse and Voices (A New Version). New York: Random House, 1979.

Being Here: Poetry 1977–1980. New York: Random House, 1980.

Jefferson Davis Gets His Citizenship Back. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1980.

Rumor Verified: Poems 1979–1980. New York: Random House, 1981.

Chief Joseph of the Nez Perce. New York: Random House, 1983.

New and Selected Poems 1923–1983. New York: Random House, 1985.

Portrait of a Father. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1988.

New and Selected Essays. New York: Random House, 1989.

The Collected Poems of Robert Penn Warren, edited by John Burt. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998.

Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men: Three Stage Versions, edited by James A. Grimshaw Jr. and James A. Perkins. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2000.

BROTHER TO DRAGONS

Dust jacket for Warren's 1953 poem concerning the brutal murder of a slave by Thomas Jefferson's nephew. Warren had long been fascinated by the incident because "this was Jefferson's family. The philosopher of our liberties and the architect of our country and the prophet of human perfectibility had this in the family blood."

All the King's Men (Restored Edition), edited by Noel Polk. New York: Harcourt Brace, 2001.

The Cass Mastern Material: The Core of Robert Penn Warren's All the King's Men, edited by Perkins. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2005.

Studying Robert Penn Warren

Robert Penn Warren's writing career falls broadly into two periods: 1929–1951, a time that coincides with his first marriage, which ended in divorce; and 1952–1989, a period that coincides with his second marriage, to the writer Eleanor Clark, which gave him a family and a renewed sense of promise. During the first period, Warren established his position in American letters with his textbook collaborations with Cleanth Brooks, three collections of poetry, and four novels, including All the King's Men (1946). In the second portion of his career, Warren continued to write in all genres but his poetry overshadowed his other work, as he went beyond the use of standard forms in his early poetry to experiment with form, images, and language.

Starting out in Warren studies may be likened to standing at a point where five roads intersect: Which direction does one take? Charlotte H. Beck's Robert Penn Warren, Critic (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006) is useful in examining Warren's criticism and in gaining a better understanding of his fiction and poetry. Three books offer an overall look at Warren's work. Two seminal works stand as bookends to the criticism between 1960 and 1980: Leonard Casper's Robert Penn Warren: The Dark and Bloody Ground (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1960) was the first book-length study and captures the early periods of Warren's fiction and poetry; at the other end is James H. Justus's The Achievement of Robert Penn Warren (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981), which is regarded by many as the best single critical study. A simplified overview of Warren's entire canon is provided by James A. Grimshaw Jr.'s Understanding Robert Penn Warren (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001).

Three other critical studies explore Warren's basic themes: John Burt's Robert Penn Warren and American Idealism (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988), Hugh Ruppensburg's Robert Penn Warren and the American Imagination (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990), and William Bedford Clark's The American Vision of Robert Penn Warren (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1991).

For students interested primarily in Warren's fiction, Barnett Guttenberg's Web of Being: The Novels of Robert Penn Warren (Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1975), Randolph Paul Runyon's The Taciturn Text: The Fiction of Robert Penn Warren (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1990), and Leonard Casper's The Blood-Marriage of Earth and Sky: Robert Penn Warren's Later Novels (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997) are good for their general coverage; while Lucy Ferriss's Sleeping with the Boss: Female Subjectivity and Narrative Pattern in Robert Penn Warren (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1997) and Jonathan S. Cullick's Making History: The Biographical Narratives of Robert Penn Warren (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2000) provide narrower analyses of the novels.

Serious students of Warren's poetry will want to refer to The Collected Poems of Robert Penn Warren (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1998), edited by Burt, which includes comprehensive notes on the writing of and allusions in the poems. Important studies of Warren's poetry began with Victor H. Strandberg's A Colder Fire: The Poetry of Robert Penn Warren (Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1965), the first book-length study of Warren's poetry; also valuable is his The Poetic Vision of Robert Penn Warren (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1977). Runyon's The Braided Dream: Robert Penn Warren's Late Poetry (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1990) examines connections among Warren's later poems and his Ghostly Parallels: Robert Penn Warren and the Lyric Poetry Sequence (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006) deals with Warren's earlier poetry between 1935–1976. Recommended as well are Calvin Bedient's "In the Heart's Last Kingdom": Robert Penn Warren's Major Poetry (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1984) and Lesa Carnes Corrigan's Poems of Pure Imagination (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1999).

Biographical study of Warren begins with Joseph Blotner's Robert Penn Warren: A Biography (New York: Random House, 1997), but also important are Warren's autobiographical reminiscence in Portrait of a Father, the various edited collections of interviews with Warren, and the Selected Letters of Robert Penn Warren (3 volumes, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press). A good illustrated introduction to Warren is Dictionary of Literary Biography 320: Robert Penn Warren: A Documentary Volume, edited by James A. Grimshaw Jr. (Detroit: Thomson Gale, 2006).

The primary bibliographical resource is Robert Penn Warren: A Descriptive Bibliography, 1922–1979, edited by Grimshaw (Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1981). It contains works by Warren, works on which he collaborated, secondary material, plus manuscripts and unpublished works. Neil Nakadate's Robert Penn Warren: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977) is an annotated catalogue of criticism that complements the complete bibliography. RWP: An Annual of Robert Penn Warren Studies (Bowling Green: Western Kentucky University, 2001– ) provides critical articles as well as a useful listing of new books about Warren.

—James A. Grimshaw Jr.

Washington, Booker T. (1856–1915) educator, orator, autobiographer

Booker Taliaferro Washington was born into bondage in rural Virginia, the offspring of a black slave mother and a white father he never knew—although, as his autobiography Up From Slavery (1901) reveals, Washington suspected that his father was also his master. Later freed, Washington worked in the West Virginia coal mines while struggling to get an education. He began by teaching himself to read; then he made a 500-mile journey, mostly on foot, to the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute in Virginia, where he parlayed a janitorial job into a vocational education. After he successfully established a program for Native Americans at Hampton in 1881, Washington was named to head a new normal school for African American students at Tuskegee, Alabama.

Washington served as principal of the Tuskegee Institute until his death in 1915, transforming it from a vocational school into a college that also offered professional education. The success of this endeavor, combined with his compelling personal story and his oratorical gifts, made him the most influential African American of his time. His most famous address, later called the Atlanta Compromise, was given in 1895 at the opening of the Cotton States and International Exposition, in which he argued that blacks should not seek social equality with whites, claiming that “in all things that are purely social we can be as separate as fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress.”

W. E. B. Du Bois and others objected to Washington's acceptance of the status quo of segregation and unequal rights. The reaction against Washington's position contributed to the organization of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1909.

Sources

Harlan, Louis R. Booker T. Washington in Perspective: Essays of Louis R. Harlan, edited by Raymond W. Smock. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988.

Harlan. Booker T. Washington: The Making of a Black Leader, 1856–1901. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.

Harlan. Booker T. Washington: The Wizard of Tuskegee, 1901–1915. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.

The Waste Land by T. S. Eliot (New York: Boni & Liveright, 1922) poem

T. S. ELIOT's The Waste Land (1922), widely accepted as the signature poem of the twentieth century, was considered a hoax by some of its first readers. Like Igor Stravinsky's Rite of Spring (1912) and James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), it shocked the conventional public—less because of its themes, which are universal, than its form, which was new. Combining allusions to myth with images from contemporary life, poetic language with slang, and fragments from many times and places and in several languages, it seemed like a cultural and spiritual rag-bag. Moreover, instead of using a single narrator, it combined different voices, some of which were from myth and ancient history, some from postwar Europe. The poem appeared in fall 1922, first in The Criterion in England and THE DIAL in the United States, and then as a separate publication. When published as a book, it contained another disconcerting feature—scholarly notes, some serious, some playful.

Written in the aftermath of WORLD WAR I, The Waste Land reflects a moment of crisis in the history of Europe and Western civilization and in the life of the poet. Devastation—in the lives of individuals, families, and nations; in nature and in culture—is a major theme; and a careful recollection of scattered fragments of life, art, and religion is a crucial aspect of the poem's structure. A striking example of the thematic/structural synthesis can be seen in the collapsing cities of part V: “Falling towers / Jerusalem Athens Alexandria / Vienna London.” This composite “Unreal City” includes ancient origins (Jewish, Christian, classical) and modern capitals (Austro-Hungarian, English).

For the poem's first readers, the title image suggested the bleak barren land of the Western Front, but even for them, it reached beyond the postwar moment. The larger theme is spiritual barrenness. Eliot universalized his image and extended his theme throughout history by anchoring his poem in a myth that has existed in one version or another for millennia and in virtually all cultures. This myth, suggested to him by J. G. Frazer's The Golden Bough (1890–1915) and Jessie Weston's From Ritual to Romance (1920), deals with the response of ancient agricultural peoples to seasonal cycles of death in fall/winter and rebirth in spring/summer, cycles that provided the foundation of their religion. The transcultural myth (or monomyth) tells of a land in which crops fail and children and cattle are stillborn. Their plight is connected to the weakness of their ruler; when he becomes impotent from sickness or a wound, they become barren. This myth, Frazer claimed, is the ancestor of all religion and all art. Eliot uses its surviving fragments in history to suggest a picture of a shattered postwar culture in which people are alienated from nature and each other and lead mechanical lives, unblessed by human love, unredeemed by any belief that could restore meaning. Looking back in The Use of Poetry and Use of Criticism (1933), Eliot suggested that his poem was realistic in that it was "the first to respond . . . to the modern situation and not call upon Make-Believe."

The Waste Land has five sections, each of which consists of fragments of myth and of modern life. The first, "The Burial of the Dead," describes a situation in which people are out of step with nature, perceiving winter as kind and April as cruel. The second, "A Game of Chess," depicts in parallel portraits two modern marriages, one upper-middle-class (literally childless), the other, working-class (literally fecund but spiritually barren). The third section, "The Fire Sermon," introduces Tiresias, an ancient prophet who watches with bored resignation a mechanical and meaningless sexual encounter between two office workers. The fourth, "Death by Water," presents a drowned sailor, his death a stark literalization of the symbolic death of Christian baptism. The last, "What the Thunder Says," projects longing for relief, which does not come, and ends with fragments of an Eastern benediction.

Sources

- Brooker, Jewel Spears, and Joseph Bentley. Reading The Waste Land: Modernism and the Limits of Interpretation. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1990.
- Eliot, Valerie, ed. The Waste Land, A Facsimile and Transcript of the Original Drafts. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.
- North, Michael, ed. The Waste Land, Norton Critical Edition. New York: Norton, 2001.
- Southam, B. C. A Guide to the Selected Poems of T. S. Eliot, sixth edition. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1994.
- Jewel Spears Brooker

Waters, Frank (1902–1995) novelist, historian, biographer

In his many novels and nonfiction works Frank Waters has explored the lives of whites, Indians, mestizos, Hispanics, and Chinese immigrants who interact amid the deserts and mountains of the Southwest. Waters dropped out of Colorado College before completing an engineering degree and began a long period of wandering and various jobs in the region. His first book was the novel Fever Pitch (1930; republished as Lizard Woman, 1984), in which a gold miner, an engineer, and a mestiza are variously affected by a mountain range surrounding a gold strike. In his Colorado trilogy—Wild Earth's Nobility (1935), Below Grass Roots (1937), and Dust within the Rock (1940)—Waters offers a fictionalized history of his family and himself. Other novels by Waters include The Man Who Killed the Deer (1942), an acclaimed work set in a fictionalized Taos Pueblo; The Yogi of Cockroach Court (1947), in which a Chinese merchant seeks enlightenment in a wild Mexican border town; The Woman at Otowi Crossing (1966), a satirical work in which a Los Alamos scientist comes to see connections between modern discoveries and Native American mysticism; and Flight from Fiesta (1986), in which a young white woman tourist forms a bond with an alcoholic Native American man.

Waters's nonfiction books include biographies, histories, and works on Southwestern and Native American culture: Midas of the Rockies: The Story of Stratton and Cripple Creek (1937), The Colorado (1946), Masked Gods: Navaho and Pueblo Ceremonialism (1950), The Earp Brothers of Tombstone: The Story of Mrs. Virgil Earp (1960), Book of the Hopi (1963), To Possess the Land: A Biography of Arthur Rochford Manby (1974), Mexico Mystique: The Coming Sixth World of Consciousness (1975), and Mountain Dialogues (1981).

Sources

- Blackburn, Alexander. A Sunrise Brighter Still: The Visionary Novels of Frank Waters. Athens: Swallow Press/Ohio University Press, 1991.
- Deloria, Vine, Jr., ed. Frank Waters: Man and Mystic. Athens: Swallow Press/Ohio University Press, 1993.

The Web and the Rock by Thomas Wolfe (New York & London: Harper, 1939) novel

Thomas WOLFE's posthumously published third novel traces the life of George Webber from his boyhood and college years in the South to his endeavor to become a novelist in New York. Webber is essentially the same figure as Eugene Gant, the protagonist of Wolfe's first two novels, and The Web and the Rock develops Esther Jack, Gant's mistress and benefactress who was introduced in OF TIME AND THE RIVER (1935). A married woman some twenty years older than Webber, she is clearly based on Wolfe's mistress Aline Bernstein. Wolfe did not finish The Web and the Rock. His work-in-progress was shaped into a novel by editor Edward Aswell.

—Morris Colden

Webb, Walter Prescott (1888–1963) historian

Raised on the edge of the Texas plains and educated at the University of Texas, Walter Prescott Webb taught at his alma mater from 1918 until his death. He established his reputation with his first book, The Great Plains (1931), a work he said he had been researching since childhood, in which he argued for the distinctiveness of the culture that had developed west of the ninety-eighth meridian based on its contrast to the woodland culture of the East. Webb's interdisciplinary approach to the history of the West is evident in all his works, including Divided We Stand: The Crisis of a Frontierless Democracy (1937) and The Great Frontier (1952).

Sources

Frantz, Joe, ed. Essays on Walter Prescott Webb. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1976.

Furman, Necah Stewart. Walter Prescott Webb: His Life and Impact. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1976.

Weidman, Jerome (1913–1998) novelist, playwright, short-story writer, essayist

A first-generation American-Jewish writer, Jerome Weidman claimed that growing up on New York City's LOWER EAST SIDE defined his writing: "All my characters are Jews even when I write them as Gentiles. . . . I cannot make a character come alive unless I step into his or her shoes and write as though I am writing about myself, and I cannot make this absolutely essential step except as a Jewish boy from East Fourth Street." He was educated at City College and New York University, where he was studying law when his first novel was published. The success of I Can Get It for You Wholesale (1937), a novel about the rise of Harry Bogen from a clerk to a ruthless manufacturer in the city's garment industry, turned Weidman into a full-time writer. He continued the story of the unsavory Bogen in What's In It for Me? (1938). The Horse That Could Whistle "Dixie" (1939) was the first of Weidman's several story collections. His subsequent novels include The Enemy Camp (1958), which examines anti-Semitism and the Jews' ambivalent attitudes toward Gentile society, and Fourth Street East (1970), a fictionalized autobiographical account of Weidman's childhood and youth. Weidman also was a successful dramatist, winning a PULITZER PRIZE for Fiorello! (1960), a musical written in collaboration with George Abbott.

Welty, Eudora (1909–2001) short-story writer, novelist

Eudora Welty spent most of her life in her native Jackson, Mississippi, leaving to attend the University of Wisconsin, where she obtained a B.A. degree in 1929, and to live briefly in New York City. For three years at the depths of the GREAT DEPRESSION she was employed as a publicity agent for the State Office of the Works Progress Administration in Mississippi. She traveled the state, doing stories on local projects and taking photographs of the people, and in the process gathered ideas for her fiction. Her first short stories were published in LITTLE MAGAZINES in 1936, the same year her photographs of poor blacks were exhibited in a small New York camera shop, and she soon began to place stories in respected periodicals such as THE SOUTHERN REVIEW and Atlantic Monthly.

In 1941 Welty published her acclaimed collection of seventeen short stories, A Curtain of Green, which was introduced by Katherine Anne PORTER and included such stories as "Petrified Man," "Why I Live at the P.O.," and "A Worn Path." The collection shows Welty's keen ear for the speech of her fellow Southerners as her characters reveal themselves through dialogue. Unlike many Southern writers, Welty usually shied away from violent subjects, although her work does subtly show the dark as well as the light sides of the South. The next year Welty published the novella The Robber Bridegroom, which features her characteristic mix of folklore and realistic portraiture. Her story collection The Wide Net (1943) was unified by a focus on the Natchez Trace. Delta Wedding (1946), her first full-length novel, examines the tensions of love and separateness within a large Southern family. In 1949 she published The Golden Apples, the work that many consider to be her masterpiece, a collection of seven interwoven stories set over a period of forty years in the delta town of Morgana, Mississippi.

Welty's comic novella The Ponder Heart (1954), the dramatic monologue of small-town hotel manager Edna Earle Ponder, was successfully dramatized for Broadway. Two of her later novels, Losing Battles (1970) and The Optimist's Daughter (1972), enhanced her reputation, with the latter winning a PULITZER PRIZE. Both novels extended her portraits of Southern characters into family dramas and sagas depicting life in the 1930s and the present. The Collected Stories of Eudora Welty was published in 1980.

In her nonfiction Welty comments incisively on her own work and the nature of fiction in The Reading and Writing of Short Stories (1949), Place in Fiction (1957), Three Papers on Fiction (1962), The Eye of the Story: Selected Essays and Reviews (1978), and A Writer's Eye: Collected Book Reviews (1994). She has also written a popular memoir, One Writer's Beginnings (1984).

Sources

Champion, Laurie, ed. The Critical Response to Eudora Welty's Fiction. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Kreyling, Michael. Understanding Eudora Welty. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.

Vande Kieft, Ruth M. Eudora Welty. New York: Twayne, 1962.

Waldron, Ann. Eudora: A Writer's Life. New York: Doubleday, 1998.

Wescott, Glenway (1901–1987) novelist, short-story writer

The Wisconsin-born Glenway Wescott attended the University of Chicago for less than two years, leaving in 1919 to travel and pursue his writing. He began his career as a poet with The Bitterns (1920), but he turned to prose with The Apple of the Eye (1924), a novel about a Wisconsin boy who rebels against the puritanism of his culture. Wescott lived as an expatriate in France, where he continued to write mainly about his native state, from 1925 to 1933. He began his acclaimed novel The Grandmothers (1927) as a memoir of his family, but it transmuted into fiction as he created a narrator, Alwyn Tower, who grappled with the history of his family and the Midwest. Other works written during this period include Good-Bye Wisconsin (1928), a collection of ten stories, and The Babe's Bed, a short-story, in which an expatriate returning to visit his Wisconsin family faces the difficulty of rendering the truth of experience through fiction, published separately in a small Paris edition. Wescott was never again as productive as a writer as he had been in the 1920s, when he was seen as one of the most promising of the young American writers. The most celebrated of his later works is the novella The Pilgrim Hawk (1940), set near Paris, in which an older Alwyn Tower meditates on love and marriage.

Sources

Johnson, Ira D. Glenway Wescott: The Paradox of Voice. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1971.

Rueckert, William H. Glenway Wescott. New York: Twayne, 1965.

—Mary C. Vinnedge

West, Dorothy (1907–1998) novelist, short-story writer, editor

Dorothy West is regarded as the last writer of the HARLEM RENAISSANCE. A trained journalist with a degree from Columbia University, West placed her first important story, "Typewriter," in Opportunity in 1926. This ironic story is about a poor black father who, while he dictates letters to his daughter for her typing lessons, imagines himself to be the successful businessman he had no opportunity to become in America. In 1934 West founded and edited her own magazine, Challenge, one of the first periodicals to provide young black writers with a venue for their work. The journal, which changed its title to New Challenge for its final issue, came to an end in 1937. Although West continued to write short stories for periodicals, she did not publish a book until The Living Is Easy (1948), a novel that examines the corrupted values of some upwardly mobile African Americans, especially Cleo Judson, a South Carolina woman who marries an older man, the "Black Banana King," for his money. Three years before her death, West published The Wedding (1995), a novel that she had begun in the 1930s but had abandoned for many years. Some of her periodical publications were collected in The Richer, the Poorer: Stories, Sketches, and Reminiscences (1995).

—KaaVonia Hinton

West, Nathanael (1903–1940) novelist

I have no particular message for a troubled world (except possibly "beware"). . . . I'm a comic writer and it seems impossible for me to handle any of the 'big things' without seeming to laugh or at least smile.

—West to Malcolm Cowley, May 11, 1939

Born Nathan Weinstein to prospering German Jewish immigrants in New York City, Nathanael West was an unmotivated student—though a precocious and avid reader—whose frequent truancy prevented his graduating from high school.

Nathanael West, circa 1935

He managed, however, to alter his grade report and gain admission into Tufts College in 1921, though he flunked out after one term. In 1922 he managed to use another student's transcript to transfer to Brown University, where he finished an English degree in 1924. West, who began writing at Brown, never attained his goal of becoming a full-time novelist; however, he managed to complete four short novels during the 1930s while living on the income he earned as a hotel manager in New York City and later as a screenwriter in Hollywood. Both jobs made it possible for him to observe interesting character types, many of which figured into his novels. In April 1940 he married Eileen McKenney. While returning from a hunting trip on December 22 of that year, West and his wife were killed in an automobile accident near El Centro, California.

West's novels are black comedies that portray a spiritually sterile world occupied by grotesque, alienated characters, who harbor illusions of escaping their miserable condition. His first novel, The Dream Life of Balso Snell (1931) is set in the belly of the Trojan horse—a symbol for the deception upon which West felt modern civilization was founded—which its Babbitt-like protagonist (see BABBITT) enters through “the posterior opening of the alimentary canal.” MISS LONELYHEARTS (1933), the story of a newspaper advice columnist's search for order and transcendence in a world filled with suffering, fared well with reviewers; however, when its publisher went bankrupt, the book quickly disappeared. With his next two novels, West attacked the myth of the American Dream. In A Cool Million (1934), the stalwart protagonist embarks on a Horatio Alger-style quest, only to be robbed, beaten by police, and jailed. He ultimately loses his teeth, an eye, a thumb, and a leg; is scalped; and finally shot. In West's last novel, THE DAY OF THE LOCUST (1939), Hollywood serves as the “dream dump” where the lifeless are lured by a promise of excitement only to find deeper despair. While critics detected West's literary powers, readers of the 1930s were not comfortable with his pessimism or ready for his off-color characters. West's books earned him a meager $1,280 dollars in his lifetime.

At the time of his death, West was practically unknown, although he had gained the respect and friendship of such writers as William Carlos WILLIAMS—with whom he briefly coedited the literary journal Contact—F. Scott FITZGERALD, Dashiell HAMMETT, William FAULKNER, and James THURBER. A major West revival blossomed in 1957 with the publication of The Complete Works of Nathanael West, and an abundance of critical interest followed. In 1962 critic Stanley Edgar Hyman called Miss Lonelyhearts “one of the three finest American novels of our century,” along with Ernest HEMINGWAY'S THE SUN ALSO RISES (1926) and Fitzgerald's THE GREAT GATSBY (1925). The impact of West's fiction on the work of later writers, particularly Flannery O'Connor, John Hawkes, and Richard Brautigan, is undeniable.

—John Cusatis

Dust jacket for West's 1933 novel, which he described as a “portrait of a priest of our time who has a religious experience”

Principal Books by West

The Dream Life of Balso Snell. Paris & New York: Contact Editions, 1931.

Miss Lonelyhearts. New York: Liveright, 1933.

A Cool Million: The Dismantling of Lemuel Pitkin. New York: Covici Friede, 1934.

The Day of the Locust. New York: Random House, 1939.

Studying Nathanael West

Nathanael West's four slim novels—The Dream Life of Balso Snell (1931), MISS LONELYHEARTS (1933), A Cool Million (1934) and THE DAY OF THE LOCUST (1939)—total just a few hundred pages and are readily available in paperback. Yet, the brevity of West's collected work belies its significance, just as the comic surface of the novels masks the gravity of his outlook. Reading and rereading West is both convenient and re-

Dust jacket for West's 1939 novel, about the violence that lies beneath the illusions of Hollywood warding; his fiction is tightly structured and relies on irony, imagery, symbolism, and characterization.

Thematically, West's fiction is concerned with human suffering. In each of the novels the protagonist is involved in a frustrated spiritual quest, which annuls any sense of idealism he may possess. Good exists in West's world, but it does not triumph: self-centeredness, exploitation, and deception prevail. For West an alluring exterior often conceals internal danger, as symbolized by the seductive Faye Greener of The Day of the Locust, whose "long, swordlike legs" invite destruction. With the exception of the satirical, Candide-like Lemuel Pitkin in A Cool Million, West's protagonists are capable of extremes of compassion and cruelty, mirroring the oscillating forces of good and evil in the world they struggle to understand.

Stylistically, West's use of comedy, particularly satire, to convey the tragic nature of his characters' lives underscores the absurdity he observed in man's tendency to follow his illusions. Yet, West's fiction—like that of Flannery O'Connor, whom he greatly influenced—conveys a moral urgency beneath the comedy, which is reinforced by his use of symbolic settings, names, and character traits, resulting in the allegorical nature of much of his fiction.

Students should begin their study by reading Miss Lonelyhearts and The Day of the Locust and then proceed to A Cool Million and the obscure, surrealistic Dream Life of Balso Snell. All four of West's novels as well as several essays, unpublished short stories, a play, a screenplay, and twenty-nine letters written to friends such as William Carlos WILLIAMS, F. Scott FITZGERALD, and Malcolm Cowley are collected in Nathanael West: Novels and Other Writings (New York: Library of America, 1997).

Until the late 1950s, little had been written about West or his fiction, and when articles began to appear, many were filled with misinformation regarding West's life; however, important criticism has been written since the 1960s. Jay Martin's Nathanael West: The Art of His Life (New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1970) is the standard literary biography, while James F. Light's Nathanael West: An Interpretive Study (Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1961) provides a worthwhile critical analysis of each of the novels, as do Robert Emmet Long's Nathanael West (New York: Ungar, 1985) and Kingsley Widmer's Nathanael West (New York: Twayne, 1982). Randall Reid's The Fiction of Nathanael West (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967) examines the various cultural and literary sources that seem to inform West's novels. Critical Essays on Nathanael West, edited by Ben Siegel (New York: G. K. Hall, 1994), provides a wide overview of scholarship and reviews regarding West's work.

Students who wish to draw comparisons with West should read the fiction of Ring Lardner—who influenced West, particularly in his use of the epistolary form employed in Miss Lonelyhearts—as well as the fiction of O'Connor, Joseph Heller, and Kurt Vonnegut, who use dark comedy to convey similar themes.

—John Cusatis

The Western

Critical and popular consensus regards the Western as the most characteristically American genre. Recognizable for its setting—the American western frontier sometime between the end of the Civil War and the turn of the twentieth century—the genre narrates conflicts between stock Western characters: cowboys, marshals, outlaws, Indians, Eastern schoolmarms, tenderfoots, dance-hall girls, ranchers, and farmers. In its portrayal of the frontier mythology that has grown out of the historic settlement of the West, the Western genre has grappled with themes central to the nation's conception of itself as exceptional in experience, character, and destiny: the rugged individual in tension with the demands of a community; the conflict of society with natural, primitive, or "savage" forces; the drive for progress and the nostalgia for a simpler, more agrarian past; flight from the restrictive and even corrupt Eastern establishment into the rejuvenating possibilities of the Western wilderness. From the inception of the modern Western at the turn of the century through the 1960s, the Western enjoyed sustained production and popularity in fiction, in the cinema, and on television.

The roots of the modern Western novel can be found in early American Puritan captivity narratives, the novels of James Fenimore Cooper, the tales of popular frontier figures like Daniel Boone, the sketches of Bret Harte, and even Wild West shows. By the end of the nineteenth century, narratives with Western themes enjoyed wide readership in Western pulp-paper magazines (see PULP MAGAZINES) and dime novels. The modern Western was born in 1902 when Owen WISTER published THE VIRGINIAN. Wister's novel differed from the dime novel and pulp-fiction Westerns in its serious treatment of the themes that became central to the genre and in its creation of a new type of hero, the heroic cowboy, to engage its audience. Though lacking formal education, this cowboy hero possesses the self-reliance, common sense, and learned skills that enable him to survive in the rugged West, defeat his enemies, and win the hand of the Eastern schoolmarm; he also adheres to a strict code of behavior that governs his dealings with women, his peers, and his enemies. Wister successfully combined adventure, romance, and a concern for realism to establish a formula for the genre. His most notable followers in the next twenty-five years included Zane GREY, Eugene Manlove RHODES, Emerson Hough, and Alfred Henry Lewis. Writers such as Max Brand, Ernest Haycox, and Luke Short also continued to enjoy popularity during the 1920s and 1930s.

While formulaic pulp Westerns steadily maintained their readership, the adult Western novel underwent a maturation process in the 1930s and 1940s. Complex characters and themes were examined, sometimes in ways that questioned the frontier myth, perhaps reflecting the nation's struggles through the GREAT DEPRESSION and the approach and advent of WORLD WAR II. For example, Vardis FISHER's Western novels published during the 1930s examine human irrationality and cruelty. Walter Van Tilburg CLARK's THE OX-BOW INCIDENT (1940) treats social inequality and injustice. Wallace STEGNER's The Big Rock Candy Mountain (1943) is a family chronicle notable for its critical use of the myth of the West, for the head of the family searches for riches that are always beyond his grasp. The adult Westerns of this period signal the more thoughtful and critical treatment of the Western myth that occurred in the ensuing decades.

Sources

Cawelti, John G. The Six-Gun Mystique Sequel. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1999.

Pilkington, William T. Critical Essays on the Western Novel. Boston, Mass.: G. K. Hall, 1980.

Slotkin, Richard. Gunfighter Nation: The Myth of the Frontier in Twentieth Century America. New York: Atheneum, 1992.

—Michelle C. Greenwald

Western Star by Stephen Vincent Benét (New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1943) poem

Stephen Vincent BENÉT's Western Star was published in the year of his death at age forty-four. Intended as the first book of a nine-volume poem about the settling and growth of America, the completed portion of the unfinished poem treats only the English settlements in New England and Virginia during the colonial era. The poem of some 5,000 lines of mostly unrhymed verse won the poet his second PULITZER PRIZE.

Source

Stroud, Parry. Stephen Vincent Benet. New York: Twayne, 1962.

—David G. Izzo

Wexley, John (1907–1985) dramatist, social critic

The politically liberal John Wexley wrote about the social issues of his time. The Last Mile (produced 1930) is a drama about the final hours of a man on death row. They Shall Not Die (produced 1934) is an impassioned play about the injustice done in the SCOTTSBORO CASE. Wexley's most important work of nonfiction is The Judgement of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg (1955), a militant defense of the couple executed for espionage. Wexley's book reflects the tenor of the time, when many liberals saw the Rosenbergs as persecuted by a reactionary United States government intent on finding Communist conspirators.

Wharton, Edith (1862–1937) novelist, short-story writer

There are two ways of spreading light: to be the candle or the mirror that reflects it.

—Yale University Lecture, 1913

Born Edith Newbold Jones in New York City on January 24, 1862, Edith Wharton spent most of her early childhood in Europe. She began her literary development "making up" stories at the age of six. Her aristocratic family belonged to the "old money" society of New York, into which Wharton made her debut at age seventeen. Despite her upbringing, with its emphasis on manners and education for which she was always grateful, Wharton criticized the materialism and values of the elite in her mature work. Her first literary efforts were poems, and a book of her poetry, Verses (1878), was published anonymously when she was still a teenager. In the 1880s she was able to place poems in Atlantic Monthly, The Century, Harper's, and SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE. In 1885 she married Edward "Teddy" Robbins Wharton with whom she would have a troubled marriage and eventually divorce.

By the mid 1890s Wharton was experiencing nervous breakdowns, most likely caused by depression. As part of her therapy she was encouraged to write and soon dedicated herself to becoming an author. She collaborated with another writer on her first book-length prose work, The Decoration of Houses (1897). Two years later she published a well-received collection of short stories, The Greater Inclination, which includes several stories about unhappy marriages.

Edith Wharton, circa 1910

From 1901 to 1911, the Whartons alternately resided at the Mount, their home in Lenox, Massachusetts, and a Paris residence. During this time Wharton developed many of her literary friendships, the most notable of which was with Henry James. James encouraged and influenced Wharton's early works, and critics often compared her fiction to his. Her technique became increasingly original, and by the early twentieth century she had created her own style. Unlike James, Wharton was more interested in sociological exploration than in writing psychologically dense fiction.

By 1901 Wharton had conquered her bouts with depression. She published short stories and nonfiction articles in magazines, followed by her first novel, The Valley of Decision, in 1902. Her novel THE HOUSE OF MIRTH (1905) established Wharton as an important literary figure and sold better than any other of her works. The novel sharply criticizes the debasement of people, especially women, and the power of money in turn-of-the-century New York society.

After the publication of The House of Mirth, Wharton began spending most of her time in France. While not as successful as her previous novel, The Fruit of the Tree (1907), which is set in a factory town in New England and aims at social reform, marks her first attempt at investigating life outside of upper-class New York. Her collection The Hermit and the Wild Woman and Other Short Stories (1908) explores themes of male dominance, female manipulation, and unhappy marriages. By 1911 the Whartons had separated and sold the Mount.

The publication of her next major novella ETHAN FROME (1911), which investigates marital discontent and the harsh realities of life in rural New England, brought mixed reviews and disappointing sales. While some reviewers commented favorably on Wharton's style, most believed the novella inferior to The House of Mirth, calling it bleak, crude, and amoral. Some critics again compared her work to Henry James's fiction, while others tried to place her within the context of female regional writing. Yet, Wharton had long since jettisoned the Jamesian qualities of her earlier works, and her novel clearly had higher aims than a regional audience. Ethan Frome is now regarded as one of her best works.

In 1912 Wharton briefly left her long-time publisher Scribners (See CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS), whom she blamed for poor sales of Ethan Frome, and published her next novel, The Reef (1912), with Appleton. A bold novel for its time, The Reef (1912) is about a mature man and woman, both raised in old New York, whose plan to marry is upset by their encounter with a young American woman who does not share their values. When the new publisher did not improve her sales, Wharton the following year renewed her relationship with Scribners and published The Custom of the Country (1913), a satirical novel attacking society on both sides of the Atlantic that reviewers found too cynical. During this same year Wharton's divorce from Teddy was finalized. In 1917 she published Summer which, like Ethan Frome and The Fruit of the Tree, was set in rural New England. A bildungsroman, Summer is about a young woman who experiences passion and must cope with its consequences. Wharton regarded the work highly, and modern critics agree.

In 1920 Wharton reached the height of her career when she published the novel often considered to be her best, THE AGE OF INNOCENCE, another satirical portrait of aristocratic New York society, for which she won the PULITZER PRIZE the following year. In the years that followed until her death on August 11, 1931, Wharton received many accolades, including an honorary doctorate degree from Yale and a Gold Medal from the National Institute of Arts and Letters, but her later publications are not her strongest and her popularity waned among critics and readers. With the rise of feminist literary criticism over the past few decades, however, scholars have reinvestigated her works. Her skillful focus on the lives of women in the early twentieth century as well as the relevance of her themes have secured Wharton's place as one of the principal women writers in American literature.

—Stephanie Todd and Grace Wetzel

Principal Books by Wharton

- Verses*, anonymous. Newport, R.I.: C. E. Hammett, 1878.
The Decoration of Houses, by Wharton and Ogden Codman Jr. New York: Scribners, 1897.
The Greater Inclination. New York: Scribners, 1899.
The Touchstone. New York: Scribners, 1900.
Crucial Instances. New York: Scribners, 1901.
The Valley of Decision, 2 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1902.
Sanctuary. New York: Scribners, 1903.
Italian Villas and Their Gardens. New York: Century, 1904.
The Descent of Man and Other Stories. New York: Scribners, 1904.
Italian Backgrounds. New York: Scribners, 1905.
The House of Mirth. New York: Scribners, 1905.
Madame de Treymes. New York: Scribners, 1907.
The Fruit of the Tree. New York: Scribners, 1907.
The Hermit and the Wild Woman, and Other Stories. New York: Scribners, 1908.
A Motor-Flight Through France. New York: Scribners, 1908.
Artemis to Acton and Other Verse. New York: Scribners, 1909.
Tales of Men and Ghosts. New York: Scribners, 1910.
Ethan Frome. New York: Scribners, 1911.
The Reef. New York: Appleton, 1912.
The Custom of the Country. New York: Scribners, 1913.
Fighting France, from Dunkerque to Belfort. New York: Scribners, 1915.
Xingu and Other Stories. New York: Scribners, 1916.
Summer. New York: Appleton, 1917.
The Marne. New York: Appleton, 1918.
French Ways and Their Meaning. New York & London: Appleton, 1919.
The Age of Innocence. New York & London: Appleton, 1920.
In Morocco. New York: Scribners, 1920.
The Glimpses of the Moon. New York & London: Appleton, 1922.
A Son at the Front. New York: Scribners, 1923.
Old New York, 4 volumes. New York & London: Appleton, 1924.
The Mother's Recompense. New York & London: Appleton, 1925.
The Writing of Fiction. New York & London: Scribners, 1925.
Here and Beyond. New York & London: Appleton, 1926.
Twelve Poems. London: Medici Society, 1926.
Twilight Sleep. New York & London: Appleton, 1927.
The Children. New York & London: Appleton, 1928.
Hudson River Bracketed. New York & London: Appleton, 1929.
Certain People. New York & London: Appleton, 1930.
The Gods Arrive. New York & London: Appleton, 1932.
Human Nature. New York & London: Appleton, 1933.
A Backward Glance. New York & London: Appleton-Century, 1934.

Frontispiece by Alonzo Kimball for Edith Wharton's 1907 novel The Fruit of the Tree. The caption is "He stood by her in silence, his eyes on the injured man."

- The World Over*. New York & London: Appleton-Century, 1936.
Ghosts. New York & London: Appleton-Century, 1937.
The Buccaneers. New York & London: Appleton-Century, 1938.
The Collected Short Stories of Edith Wharton, 2 volumes, edited by R. W. B. Lewis. New York: Scribners, 1968.
Fast and Loose: A Novelette, as David Olivieri, edited by Viola Hopkins Winner. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1977.
The Cruise of the Vanadis, edited by Claudine Lesage. Amiens: Sterne Presses de L'Ufr Clerc Université Picardie, 1991.
Edith Wharton Abroad: Selected Travel Writings 1888–1920, edited by Sarah Bird Wright. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995.
The Uncollected Critical Writings, edited by Frederick Wegener. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Studying Edith Wharton

Edith Wharton's career consists of three phases: the early years (1862–1904), the middle years (1905–1920), and the late years (1921–1937). The study of Wharton should begin with her best works, all written during the middle years: THE HOUSE OF MIRTH (1911), ETHAN FROME (1911), The Custom of the Country (1913), Summer (1917), and THE AGE OF INNOCENCE (1920). Recommended works for a fuller appreciation of her career are The Reef (1912), The Mother's Recompense (1925), Hudson River Bracketed (1929), and The Gods Arrive (1932).

First-day issue for the United States postage stamp honoring Wharton

For a standard secondary introduction to Wharton, students should consult Carol J. Singley's A Historical Guide to Edith Wharton (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003), which includes a brief biography, contextual history, selected critical essays, a synopsis of critical trends, and an illustrated life chronology. Also recommended is Sarah Bird Wright's Edith Wharton: A to Z (New York: Facts on File, 1998), a compilation of text synopses and critical responses, correspondences, photographs and illustrations, and writings by Wharton.

Critical perspectives on particular works appear regularly in the Edith Wharton Review, published by the Edith Wharton Society. Recent criticism is also collected in A Forward Glance: New Essays on Edith Wharton (Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1999), edited by Clare Colquitt, Susan Goodman, and Candace Waid. Essays in this collection address intertextuality, class, gender, genre, and race, paying particular attention to Wharton's lesser-known works. The Cambridge Companion to Edith Wharton, edited by Millicent Bell (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995), includes ten essays that treat both individual novels and overarching issues such as class in Wharton's fiction. Helen Killoran's The Critical Reception of Edith Wharton (Rochester: Camden House, 2001) charts trends in literary scholarship and criticism on Wharton from 1898 to the present.

Students seeking information on Wharton's life can consult the work of many biographers. The standard biography is R. W. B. Lewis's Edith Wharton: A Biography (New York, Evanston, San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1975).

Also valuable are Eleanor Dwight's Edith Wharton: An Extraordinary Life (New York: Harry N. Abrams, 1994) and Hermione Lee's Edith Wharton (London: Chatto & Windus, 2007), which presents Wharton's private and professional life in impressive detail. For condensed biographical and bibliographical chronologies, see Edgar F. Harden's An Edith Wharton Chronology (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005).

The Edith Wharton Society website (<<http://www.wsu.edu/~campbelld/wharton/index.html>> viewed August 6, 2007) tracks current Wharton scholarship, and offers lists of recommended texts. The site provides biographical information, links to primary and secondary works, teaching resources, and news on conferences and essay collections. The main collections of Wharton's papers are at the Beinecke Library at Yale University, the Houghton Library at Harvard University, the Firestone Library at Princeton University, and the Lilly Library at the University of Indiana, Bloomington.

—Stephanie Todd and Grace Wetzel

What Makes Sammy Run?* by Budd Schulberg

(New York: Random House, 1941) novel

What Makes Sammy Run?, Budd SCHULBERG's first novel, tells the story of Smelka Glickstein, who rises from New York's ghetto to become Sammy Glick, powerful movie-studio boss and archetypal heel. Schulberg—whose father, B. P. Schulberg, was head of Paramount Studios (1925–1932)—had firsthand knowledge of Hollywood, where he grew up and then worked as a screenwriter. Set in the 1930s during the screenwriters' unionizing days, the novel is narrated by Al Mannheim, a New York Hollywood columnist, who first encounters Glick as a ferret-looking copyboy. The unscrupulous Sammy breaks promises, careers, and hearts in his successful drive to reach his pinnacle of power as the quintessential movie mogul. At the book's end he marries for true love, only to discover that his wife will be using him as a convenient cover for her own sexual adventures. What Makes Sammy Run? outraged studio executives, and it was charged with anti-Semitism.

—Michael Edelson

What Price Glory? by Laurence Stallings and Maxwell Anderson (produced 1924) play

What Price Glory? was the most successful of three collaborations between Laurence STALLINGS and Maxwell ANDERSON. Depicting the experiences of American soldiers in France during WORLD WAR I, the three-act comedy-drama opened on September 5, 1924, and ran for 435 performances.

Two career soldiers, Captain Flagg and First Sergeant Quirt, are friendly rivals and drinking buddies, a comic situation exacerbated when Flagg wins a leave in Paris while Quirt is left behind to command Flagg's company. Complications arise when Flagg returns to find that Quirt has become involved with Charmaine, a French village girl whom Flagg considers his girlfriend. The mood of the play turns more serious when the company is called to the front and Quirt is wounded. Veterans considered the play a credible representation of their wartime experiences, and audiences responded to its realistic situations, rough language, and broad humor. What Price Glory? was indicative of the deepening thematic seriousness of the Broadway stage in the 1920s and is regarded as the finest Broadway play to depict Americans in World War I.

Source

Brodwin, Stanley, "Some Kind of Damned Religion": A Reading of What Price Glory? by Maxwell Anderson and Laurence Stallings," in Art, Glitter, and Glitz: Mainstream Playwrights and Popular Theatre in 1920s America, edited by Arthur Gerwitz and James J. Kolb. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

—James Fisher

Wheelock, John Hall (1886–1978) poet, editor

John Hall Wheelock was born in New York City and studied at Harvard, where he was recognized as the official poet of the class of 1908. Between 1905 and his death, Wheelock published more than a dozen volumes of poetry. His first important collection, The Human Fantasy (1911), appeared about the same time he was hired at Scribner's Bookstore in New York City, beginning a fifty-year association with CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS. Wheelock later worked as an editor for the publishing house under Maxwell PERKINS, whom he succeeded as senior editor. Wheelock was especially influential as the editor of the Poets of Today series (1954–1961). As a poet, Wheelock was a Romantic in the vein of William Wordsworth, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Walt Whitman. His work ranges from the lyrical to the philosophical and mystical. His collections include The Belovèd Adventure (1912); Dust and Light (1919); The Black Panther (1922); The Bright Doom (1927); The Gardener (1961), which won a Bollingen Prize; and By Daylight and in Dream: New and Collected Poems, 1901–1970 (1970).

Source

Wheelock, John Hall. The Last Romantic: A Poet Among Publishers: The Oral Autobiography of John Hall Wheelock, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli with Judith S. Baughman. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

White Fang by Jack London (New York: Macmillan, 1906) novel

Jack LONDON began writing White Fang as a "companion book" to THE CALL OF THE WILD (1903), which traces a tame dog's reversion to wildness. In White Fang, a wild wolf dog is domesticated after he is rescued from a life in professional dogfights. This naturalistic novel (see NATURALISM) shows London's profound belief in the power of environment to shape character, as White Fang is transformed by the gentleness of his new master, Weedon Scott, a mining engineer, who takes him from the savage Yukon to his California ranch. White Fang shows his loyalty when he is severely wounded in saving Weedon's father, a judge, from an assault by an escaped convict—a man who has been transformed into a killer by the harsh treatment he has experienced.

Source

Watson, Charles N. The Novels of Jack London: A Reappraisal. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1983.

White, William Allen (1868–1944) editor, novelist

William Allen White, a graduate of the University of Kansas, made his reputation as the editor and proprietor of his hometown newspaper, the Emporia Daily and Weekly Gazette (1895–1944). Although his newspaper never reached a circulation of more than 8,000, White became an influential journalist, first attracting national attention with his 1896 anti-Populist editorial "What's the Matter With Kansas?" White's fiction included the novels A Certain Rich Man (1909), about the corrupting influence of big business, and In the Heart of a Fool (1918), which contrasts the lives of an idealistic labor organizer and a politician interested only in power. In 1922 White won a PULITZER PRIZE for "To an Anxious Friend," an editorial defending journalistic freedom. His editorials were collected in such books as The Editor and His People (1924) and Forty Years on Main Street (1937). The posthumously published The Autobiography of William Allen White (1946) also won a Pulitzer.

Sources

Jernigan, E. Jay. William Allen White. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
Quantic, Diane Dufva. William Allen White. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1993.

Rich, Everett. William Allen White: The Man from Emporia. New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1941.

Widdemer, Margaret (1897–1978) poet, novelist

Margaret Widdemer's first book was the best-selling novel The Rose Garden Husband (1915). Her first collection was The Factories and Other Lyrics (1917), in which she expressed outrage at the treatment of workers, especially child laborers. Her second collection, Old Road to Paradise (1918), more moderate in tone, won an American Poetry Society Prize, the early version of the PULITZER PRIZE. Widdemer's later work was criticized for sentimentality. In her memoir Golden Friends I Had (1964), she recalls such writers as Edna St. Vincent MILLAY, Joyce KILMER, Thornton WILDER, Ezra POUND, T. S. ELIOT, and F. Scott FITZGERALD.

Source

Overton, Grant. Margaret Widdemer. New York: Farrar & Rinehart, 1930.

The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line by Charles W. Chesnutt (New York: Houghton, Mifflin, 1899) collection

Charles W. CHESNUTT's second story collection, The Wife of His Youth and Other Stories of the Color Line is made up of nine stories set in Ohio and North Carolina, the two states in which he spent most of his life. They include characters who are like himself: middle-class, mixed-race African Americans, most notably in the title story as well as "A Matter of Principle" and "Her Virginia Mammy." The racial themes include interracial marriage in "Uncle Wellington's Wives" and frequent and thoughtful looks at the effects of Jim Crow and segregation throughout the United States in the era of Reconstruction.

Source

McWilliams, Dean. Charles W. Chesnutt and the Fictions of Race. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2002.

—Monica F. Jacobe

Wilder, Laura Ingalls (1867–1957) novelist, children's writer

I wanted the children now to understand more about the beginning of things, to know what is behind the things they see—what it is that made America as they know it.

—Speech, 1937

One of the best-loved American writers of the twentieth century, Laura Ingalls Wilder contributed to the historical memory of the nation through her fiction. The second of five children, Wilder in her early sixties began chronicling her childhood experiences traveling in a covered wagon and growing up in pioneer America. Her historical fiction continues to please new generations of readers.

Wilder achieved success with her first novel, Little House in the Big Woods (1932), set in her native Pepin, Wisconsin, which covers a year in the life of a fictionalized version of her parents and siblings. After Farmer Boy (1933), which Wilder based on the experiences of her husband, Almanzo Wilder, Wilder returned to the Ingalls, taking readers on the family's eventful journey; south to Independence, Kansas; north to Walnut Grove, Minnesota; and west to South Dakota in Little House on the Prairie (1935), On the Banks of Plum Creek (1937), By the Shores of Silver Lake (1939), The Long Winter (1940), Little Town on the Prairie (1941), and These Happy Golden Years (1943). Wilder appealed to her young readers by writing each book in a style and reading level appropriate to Laura, the child heroine. As Laura grows older and becomes more mature, the books become more stylistically complex. In Little House in the Big Woods, Laura is a child of five and thinks and reacts appropriately. In the last book in the series, These Happy Golden Years, Laura marries. The posthumously published The First Four Years (1971) covers the early years of Laura's marriage.

Little House on the Prairie, the most widely recognized title of the "Little House" series, takes readers into the day-to-day hardships and joys of a homesteading family. Wilder describes an era where children spoke with respect to their elders, did demanding chores with pride, and strove to do well in their studies. The novels, with their message of the hardworking, courageous Ingalls family triumphing over difficulties sold well even during the depth of the GREAT DEPRESSION and have enjoyed an enduring legacy.

Sources

Anderson, William. Laura Ingalls Wilder: A Biography. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.

Giff, Patricia Reilly. Laura Ingalls Wilder: Growing Up in the Little House. New York: Viking, 1987.

Mara, Will. Laura Ingalls Wilder. New York: Children's Press, 2003.

—Christine Marie Hilger

Wilder, Thornton (1897–1975) playwright, novelist

I am not interested in the ephemeral—such subjects as the adulteries of dentists. I am interested in those things that repeat and repeat and repeat in the lives of the millions.

—Conversations with Thornton Wilder (1992)

One of the most versatile writers in American letters, Thornton Wilder was the author of plays, novels, screenplays, essays, librettos, and journals. He remains the only writer to win a PULITZER PRIZE in both drama and fiction.

Born in Madison, Wisconsin, Wilder spent part of his childhood in China, where his father served as a diplomat. He attended Oberlin College for two years and served in the United States Army Coast Artillery Corps during WORLD WAR I before he graduated from Yale University in 1920. After eight months studying at the American Academy in Rome, he taught French at the Lawrenceville School in New Jersey from 1921 to 1928. During this period he also attended Princeton University, earning a master's degree in French literature in 1926.

Wilder began his professional writing career while he was a full-time teacher. His first novel, The Cabala (1926)—which treated an American's year abroad in Rome—was well received and served as an entrée into the world of writers, critics, and intellectuals. During the 1920s he met leading writers, including George Bernard Shaw, F. Scott FITZGERALD, Ernest HEMINGWAY, and the critic Edmund WILSON. His second novel, The Bridge of San Luis Rey (1927), examines the theological significance of the deaths of five travelers when a bridge in eighteenth-century Peru collapses. It won the PULITZER PRIZE and became an international best-seller, establishing Wilder among the most promising young writers of the 1920s. After quitting his teaching job, he traveled in Europe, lectured in America, and published his third novel, The Woman of Andros, in 1930, the same year he accepted a teaching position at the University of Chicago.

Scholars generally agree that proletarian critic Michael GOLD's attack on The Woman of Andros—which was set in ancient Greece—for not dealing with contemporary socioeconomic issues inspired Wilder to write his first works with American settings, characters, and themes: The Long Christmas Dinner and Other Plays in One Act (1931), followed by his first novel set in America, Heaven's My Destination (1935). Three of the one-act plays employed the nonrealistic theatrical style that Wilder made famous in his three major plays. Wilder became close friends with Gertrude STEIN after she lectured at the University of Chicago in 1934.

In 1936 Wilder left teaching to turn his attention to writing for the stage. In a remarkably productive five years, he produced his three famous full-length plays. OUR TOWN (produced 1938), which won Wilder his first Pulitzer Prize in drama, was followed by another Pulitzer Prize-winning drama, THE SKIN OF OUR TEETH (1942). Wilder's farce The Merchant of Yonkers (produced 1938) was a critical and commercial failure; however, slightly revised and retitled The Matchmaker, it became a hit when it was produced in 1955. He also wrote the first draft of the screenplay for director Alfred Hitchcock's movie Shadow of a Doubt (1943).

After the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor drew the United States into WORLD WAR II, Wilder enlisted and was given the rank of captain in Army Air Force Intelligence. After the war he struggled to complete works except for his epistolary novel about Julius Caesar, The Ides of March (1948). An incomplete series of one-act plays expresses a darker view of life than is evident in his earlier works, which perhaps reflects the aftereffects of his war experience and his reaction to the deaths of his mother and Gertrude Stein. During the 1960s Wilder's health began to fail, though he still managed to produce his longest novel, The Eighth Day (1967), which won the National Book Award. He published his last novel, Theophilus North, in 1973, and died in his sleep at his home in Hamden, Connecticut in 1975.

Wilder was a philosophical writer who in his creative work views life simultaneously from the perspective of the microcosm and the macrocosm. His great themes are the suffering of the human heart, the effects of the passage of time on individuals and families, and the progress of human civilization despite threats to its survival. Though his writing is often intellectually challenging as well as moving, Wilder also has the ability to make his audiences and readers laugh. While he holds a higher position in drama than he does in fiction, The Bridge of San Luis Rey continues to be cited in lists of the greatest novels of the twentieth century.

Although some critics have accused Wilder of sentimentality and reacted against the generally religious, often specifically Christian belief that informs most of his works, Wilder's use of sentiment and exploration of spiritual issues almost certainly accounts in some measure for his popularity. People wonder about the meaning of life, and Thornton Wilder movingly wrote about it.

—Lincoln Konkle

Principal Books by Wilder

The Cabala. New York: A. & C. Boni, 1926.

The Bridge of San Luis Rey. New York: A. & C. Boni, 1927.

The Angel That Troubled the Waters and Other Plays. New York: Coward-McCann, (1928)—comprises Nascunter Poetae, Prosperina and the Devil, Fanny Otcott, Brother Fire, The Penny That Beauty Spent, The Angel on the Ship, The Message and Jehanne, Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came, Centaurs, Leviathan, And the Sea Shall Give Up Its Dead, Now the Servant's Name Was Malchus, Mozart and the Gray Steward, Hast Thou Considered My Servant Job?, The Flight into Egypt, and The Angel That Troubled the Waters.

The Woman of Andros. New York: A. & C. Boni, 1930.

The Long Christmas Dinner and Other Plays in One Act. New York: Coward-McCann / New Haven: Yale University Press, 1931)—comprises The Long Christmas Dinner, Queens of France, Pullman Car Hiawatha, Love and How to Cure It, Such Things Only Happen in Books, and The Happy Journey to Trenton and Camden.

Lucrece, adapted from André Obey's Le Viol de Lucrece. Boston & New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1933.

Heaven's My Destination. New York & London: Harper, 1935.

Our Town. New York: Coward-McCann, 1938.

- The Merchant of Yonkers*. New York & London: Harper, 1939.
The Skin of Our Teeth. New York & London: Harper, 1942.
Our Century. New York: Century, 1947.
The Ides of March. New York & London: Harper, 1948.
The Drunken Sisters. New York, Hollywood, London & Toronto: S. French, 1957.
The Matchmaker. New York, Hollywood, London & Toronto: S. French, 1957.
Plays for Bleecker Street, 3 volumes. New York: S. French, 1960–1961)—comprises Infancy, Childhood, and Someone from Assisi.
The Eighth Day. New York, Evanston, Ill. & London: Harper & Row, 1967.
Theophilus North. New York, Evanston, Ill., San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1973.
The Alcestiad. New York, Hagerstown, Md., San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1977.
American Characteristics and Other Essays, edited by Donald Gallup. New York, Hagerstown, Md., San Francisco & London: Harper & Row, 1979.
The Journals of Thornton Wilder, 1939–1961, edited by Gallup. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1985.

Studying Thornton Wilder

Though Thornton Wilder wrote some twenty plays and seven novels, most students will be served fully by the works in two collections: Three Plays: Our Town, The Skin of Our Teeth, The Matchmaker (New York: Harper, 1957) comprises his best-known dramatic works, and A Thornton Wilder Trio: The Cabala, The Bridge of San Luis Rey, The Woman of Andros (New York: Criterion 1956) comprises his best-known novels. The Library of America volume, Thornton Wilder: Collected Plays and Writings on the Theatre (2007) is easily accessible; it includes the three plays in the Harper volume plus a screenplay (Shadow of a Doubt), lesser plays, and Wilder's essays on the theatre.

There are three biographies of Wilder, Richard H. Goldstone, Thornton Wilder: An Intimate Portrait. New York: Saturday Review Press/Dutton, 1975) by his bibliographer; Linda Simon, Thornton Wilder: His World. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1979) by a Skidmore College professor who has written other literary biographies; and Gilbert A. Harrison, The Enthusiast: A Life of Thornton Wilder. New Haven: Ticknor & Fields, 1983), by a former editor of The New Republic. Harrison's biography is regarded as the best of the three. The Journals of Thornton Wilder, 1939–1961, edited by Donald Gallup. 1985) is a first resource for serious students.

Richard H. Goldstone and Gary Anderson, Thornton Wilder: An Annotated Bibliography of Works by and about Thornton Wilder. New York: AMS Press, 1982) is the primary bibliography to consult. Claudette Walsh, Thornton Wilder: A Reference Guide, 1926–1990. New York: G. K. Hall, 1993) is preferable for secondary works, though it must be supplemented with the MLA International Bibliography for works published since 1990.

Conversations with Thornton Wilder, edited by Jackson R. Bryer (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1992) is an excellent place to begin study of Wilder's work, as the interviews included there allow students to get a sense of Wilder's artistic goals. Thornton Wilder: A Comprehensive Research and Study Guide, edited by Harold Bloom (Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003) and Critical Essays on Thornton Wilder, edited by Martin Blank (New York: G. K. Hall, 1996) are useful collections of critical articles. Richard Burbank's revised Thornton Wilder (New York: Twayne, 1978) and David Castronovo's Thornton Wilder (New York: Ungar, 1986) are serviceable overviews of his career. Students seeking a fuller study might try Lincoln Konkle's Thornton Wilder and the Puritan Narrative Tradition (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2006). Donald Haberman's Our Town: An American Play (Boston: Twayne, 1989) provides a basic approach to Wilder's most popular play, and Haberman's The Plays of Thornton Wilder (Middletown, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1967) remains a useful book despite being dated.

Williams, Ben Ames (1889–1953) novelist, short-story writer

A graduate of Dartmouth College in 1910, Ben Ames Williams was a popular writer of his time, publishing some forty books between 1919 and 1953. While working as a journalist in Boston, Williams began publishing his fiction in PULP MAGAZINES but was able in 1917 to place his first story in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. During his career he published some 135 stories, 35 serials, and 7 articles with the magazine. He often wrote of rural Maine but was also known for his detective stories such as The Silver Forest (1926), The Dreadful Night (1928), and Money Musk (1932). His works include House Divided (1947) and The Unconquered (1953), epic novels about the Civil War and its effects.

Williams, Tennessee (1911–1983) playwright

Maybe we are a long way from being made in God's image, but [ . . . ] there has been some progress since then! Such things as art—as poetry and music—such kinds of new light have come into the world since then! In some kinds of people some tenderer feelings have had some little beginning! That we have got to make grow! And cling to, and hold as our flag. In this dark march toward whatever it is we're approaching. . . . Don't—don't hang back with the brutes!

—A Streetcar Named Desire (1947)

Thomas Lanier Williams III was born on March 26, 1911, into a troubled Southern family: an emotionally absent father, an overbearing mother, and a sister tormented by mental illness. He spent his early childhood in his mother's native Mississippi before the family moved to St. Louis in 1919. The most significant relationship of Williams' life was with his sister, Rose, who suffered from paranoid schizophrenia. She became a model for many of the playwright's tragic female characters. Her small bedroom featured a delicate collection of glass animals and looked out onto a dead-end alley where neighborhood dogs often cornered and killed cats. After visiting his sister in a sanitarium, Williams recorded in his notebooks "Life—life—how incomprehensibly brutal you can be—why?—That question is much too old. It does no good to repeat these old questions—except in art when we can give them some kind of poetic expression." Williams, who had begun his college career at the University of Missouri, was attending Washington University in St. Louis when a lobotomy was performed upon Rose in 1937 as a treatment for her illness. The procedure left Rose becalmed but permanently delusional. Throughout his life Williams suffered from guilt at his self-described abandonment of his sister, and he also feared for his own emotional stability. After his sister's brain operation Tom Williams rechristened himself Tennessee, distancing himself both artistically and emotionally from his past.

Tennessee Williams, 1955

In 1938 Williams won a playwriting contest sponsored by the GROUP THEATRE with American Blues, a collection of short plays. During WORLD WAR II Williams led a nomadic existence traveling throughout the United States. His first professionally produced play Battle of Angels (produced 1940) closed during its out-of-town preview in Boston. Williams later revised it as Orpheus Descending (produced 1957). While he worked briefly in Hollywood as a screenwriter for MGM he began a screenplay about his family titled "The Gentleman Caller," which he later revised into THE GLASS MENAGERIE. On December 26, 1944, this autobiographical play opened in Chicago to great popular and critical acclaim. Through a montage of scenes the play dramatizes Williams's troubled relationship with his parents and offers a sensitive portrait of his sister. Playwright William Inge recalled the production as "one of the greatest experiences of my life" because "it enabled me for the first time to see the true dynamics between life and art."

Rose's mental breakdown also served as the inspiration for Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire (produced 1947), an examination of the tragic effects of uncontrollable passion that won the PULITZER PRIZE for best drama. The play's sexual frankness and brutality caused great controversy. In a 1975 interview Williams claimed that "God exists in our understanding of each other, and in our acts based upon our understanding." Characters become monsters in Williams plays when they reject or abuse the tenderness offered to or expected by others. The often irreconcilable and violent struggle between the desire for creation and the desire for destruction fuels Williams's tragedies. Some observers have criticized the playwright for depicting too often—and too empathetically—the barbaric side of humanity. As an explanation Williams often quoted the Roman playwright Terence: "Nothing human is alien to me." Williams's plays serve as dramatic metaphors for the tragic fate of a sensitive individual—one with "tenderer feelings"—preyed upon by a monster-filled world.

Williams received his second Pulitzer Prize for Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (produced 1955), an examination of a wealthy Southern family corrupted by the "odor of mendacity." The character of Big Daddy can be seen as a portrait of Williams's overbearing father. In Suddenly Last Summer (produced 1958), the playwright's most personal play after The Glass Menagerie, Williams dramatized the horror of Rose's madness and its equally nightmarish "cure." Sweet Bird of Youth (produced 1959) contrasts the artificial life of a Hollywood star with the political corruption of a small southern town. Night of the Iguana (produced 1961) examines the allure and escapism of sexual indulgence. Although Williams primarily wrote tragedies, he did produce two successful comedies, The Rose Tattoo (produced 1951) and Period of Adjustment (produced 1959).

Poster from the 1951 movie made from Williams's play first produced on stage in 1947

Williams's dramas dominated the Broadway stage during the 1940s and 1950s. As he became uncomfortable with his fame and the conservatism of American culture, Williams spent much of his adult life abroad, using Key West, Florida, as his U.S. base. Beginning in 1947 Williams lived intermittently with Frank Merlo until Merlo's death in 1963. He also formed significant and often troubled friendships with writers William Inge, Truman Capote, Gore Vidal, and Carson McCullers. In the 1960s and 1970s Williams experimented with dramatic techniques while battling alcohol and drug addiction. In fall 1969 he suffered a nervous collapse and was hospitalized. Williams continued to write for the stage until his death, but never equaled his earlier commercial or critical success.

Tennessee Williams is one of the most celebrated playwrights of the twentieth century, rivaled among Americans only by Eugene O'Neill and Arthur Miller. His drama successfully combines the epic vision of O'Neill and the social criticism of Miller with a startling sensitivity for human suffering. Like O'Neill, Williams followed the ancient Greek model of depicting flawed tragic heroes waging losing battles against capricious gods. As did the Greeks he describes rather than depicts gruesome events, thereby intensifying their horror in the audience's imagination. His characters suffer the classic tragic punishments of exile, insanity, and death for violating ancient taboos. Following Aristotle's famous instruction, his plays inspire both pity and fear.

Williams's work is distinguished by his sensitive as well as brutal depictions of character and by his poetic dialogue. Director Harold Clurman notes that in the author's plays "It is the 'peculiar people,' the unprotected, the innocently sincere, the injured, the estranged, the queer, the defenseless, the abandoned, the maimed whom Williams redeems by his compassion." In an epitaph for Williams, who died on February 25, 1983, playwright David Mamet described Williams's plays as "the greatest dramatic poetry of the American language."

—Park Bucker

Principal Books by Williams

- Battle of Angels*. New York: New Directions, 1945.
The Glass Menagerie. New York: Random House, 1945.
27 Wagons Full of Cotton and Other One-Act Plays. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1946—includes 27 Wagons Full of Cotton, The Purification, The Lady of Larkspur Lotion, The Last of My Solid Gold Watches, Portrait of a Madonna, Auto-Da-Fé, Lord Byron's Love Letter, The Strangest Kind of Romance, The Long Goodbye, Hello from Bertha, This Property Is Condemned, Talk to Me Like the Rain and Let Me Listen, and Something Unspoken.
You Touched Me! by Williams and Donald Windham. New York: S. French, 1947.
A Streetcar Named Desire. New York: New Directions, 1947.
Summer and Smoke. New York: New Directions, 1948.

- The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone*. New York: New Directions, 1950.
The Rose Tattoo. New York: New Directions, 1951.
Camino Real. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1953.
Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. New York: New Directions, 1955.
Baby Doll. New York: New Directions, 1956.
Orpheus Descending with Battle of Angels. New York: New Directions, 1958.
Suddenly Last Summer. New York: New Directions, 1958.
Sweet Bird of Youth. New York: New Directions, 1959.
Period of Adjustment. New York: New Directions, 1960.
The Night of the Iguana. New York: New Directions, 1961.
The Milk Train Doesn't Stop Here Anymore. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1963.
Eccentricities of a Nightingale and Summer and Smoke. New York: New Directions, 1964.
Kingdom of Earth (The Seven Descents of Myrtle). New York: New Directions, 1967.
The Two-Character Play. New York: New Directions, 1969.
Small Craft Warnings. New York: New Directions, 1972.
Out Cry. New York: New Directions, 1973.
Memoirs. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.

Front cover of the MGM campaign book for the 1964 movie version of Williams's 1961 play

Vieux Carré. New York: New Directions, 1979.

A Lovely Sunday for Crève Coeur. New York: New Directions, 1980.

Collected Stories. New York: New Directions, 1985.

The Red Devil Battery Sign. New York: New Directions, 1988.

Something Cloudy, Something Clear. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1995.

Studying Tennessee Williams

Tennessee Williams published more than twenty full-length plays in his lifetime as well as novels, short stories, poems, and scores of one-act plays. A study of Williams should begin with his first two masterpieces, THE GLASS MENAGERIE (1945) and A Streetcar Named Desire (1947). Williams provided readers with much information on the autobiographical sources and thematic intentions of his plays in their published introductions. He explains the background of The Glass Menagerie in the essay "The Author Tells Why It Is Called 'The Glass Menagerie,'" a commentary he originally wrote for newspaper publication that is reprinted in the illustrated chronicle Tennessee Williams, edited by Margaret A. Van Antwerp and Sally Johns (Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 4. Detroit: Brucoli Clark/Gale Research, 1984). Williams initially explored the theme of the play in his short story "Portrait of a Girl in Glass," which is included in Collected Stories (New York: New Directions, 1985). Similarly, Williams used the one-act-play form as a workshop for A Streetcar Named Desire. Both "The Lady of Larkspur Lotion" and "Portrait of a Madonna" feature early versions of Blanche DuBois. Other autobiographical information can be found in his Memoirs (1975); his published interviews, Conversations with Tennessee Williams, edited by Albert J. Devlin (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1986); his essay collection Where I Live (1978); and in four letter collections: Tennessee Williams' Letters to Donald Windham, 1940–1965, edited by Donald Windham (New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1977), Five O'Clock Angel: Letters of Tennessee Williams to Maria St. Just, 1948–1982 (New York: Knopf, 1990), and in the two-volume collection The Selected Letters of Tennessee Williams, edited by Devlin and Nancy M. Tischler (New York: New Directions, 2000–2004). Recommended biographies are Donald Spoto's The Kindness of Strangers: The Life of Tennessee Williams (Boston: Little, Brown, 1985) and Lyle Leverich's Tom: The Unknown Tennessee Williams (New York: Crown Publishers, 1995).

Williams sometimes reworked an entire play if it failed in its initial production. The original and revised versions allow readers to trace the author's revisions. Students can also study how the playwright transformed a work of the theater from the one-act 27 Wagons Full of Cotton into the screenplay Baby Doll. Any student of dramatic literature should also consider the original production of a play, and how the rehearsal process affects the evolution of a text. Williams often credited much of the success of his plays to their directors and performers. Based on the suggestions of director Elia Kazan, Williams completely revised the third act of Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, but when he published the play he included both versions. Brenda Murphy chronicles Kazan's effect on Williams's plays in Tennessee Williams and Elia Kazan: A Collaboration in the Theatre (Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992). Interviews with many interpreters of Williams's plays have been collected by Mike Steen in A Look at Tennessee Williams (New York: Hawthorn, 1969). Facsimiles of programs, photographs of productions, and other theatrical memorabilia are collected in The World of Tennessee Williams, edited by Richard F. Leavitt (New York: Putnam, 1978). The volume also reproduces much of Williams's artwork.

A study of Williams's plays benefits from comparison with other American playwrights, particularly Lillian HELLMAN, William Inge, Edward Albee, and Lanford Wilson. Students should also examine the influences of William Shakespeare, August Strindberg, and Anton Chekhov—Williams's favorite playwright—on his work. Nondramatic influences on Williams include Emily Dickinson, D. H. Lawrence, and Hart CRANE. Middle Tennessee State University publishes The Tennessee Williams Annual Review and many of its issues are available on-line (<www.tennesseewilliamsstudies.org/> viewed August 6, 2007). A substantial collection of Williams's papers is at the Humanities Research Center, the University of Texas at Austin.

—Park Bucker

Williams, William Carlos (1883–1963) poet, novelist, short-story writer, critic, autobiographer

As a writer, I have been a physician, and as a physician a writer.

—The Autobiography (1951)

William Carlos Williams is one of the outstanding poets of the modernist movement (see MODERNISM) in American literature. His poetry ranges from the briefest of lyrics to the epic poem Paterson. The versatile Williams is also known for his stories, novels, sketches, essays, and autobiography. In his career he wrote twenty-three volumes of poetry, five collections of short fiction, six novels, seven books of nonfiction, and five plays. Throughout, he strove to create an American art, to write in "the American idiom"—a fresh, immediate style opposed to that of T. S. ELIOT, who believed in writing self-consciously within an established tradition derived from Europe.

Born September 17, 1883, in Rutherford, New Jersey, to an English-born father who never changed his British citizenship and a mother of French, Dutch, Spanish, and Jewish heritage who was born in Puerto Rico, Williams learned to appreciate cultural diversity from a young age, and his parents as well as his English grandmother figure in his poetry.

As a youth he attended public schools in Rutherford, the city in which he lived almost all of his life, but his mother took him and his younger brother abroad to Europe in 1897, where he attended private schools. Upon their return to the United States, Williams went to Horace Mann High School in New York City, where he began to develop literary aspirations. He then studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he met his lifelong friend Ezra POUND and the painter Charles Demuth. Painting became an influence on his writing and a subject of his poetry. Pound's influence on Williams was crucial to his early development as a poet. When Williams had his first volume of verse—conventional imitations of nineteenth-century forms—privately published as Poems (1909), Pound was blunt in his criticism: “There are fine lines in it, but nowhere I think do you add anything to the poets you have used as models.” In Selected Essays (1954) Williams writes about others whose work was influential in his development, writers such as James Joyce, Marianne MOORE, and Kenneth Burke and artists such as Pieter Brueghel and Henri Matisse.

William Carlos Williams, 1954

Williams began medical practice in Rutherford in 1910 and continued as a family doctor for forty years. He was already dedicated to a career as a poet as well, and often, as he records in The Autobiography (1951), he used his typewriter between patients to quickly produce a poem. Influenced by the tenets of IMAGISM, he began publishing poems in Harriet MONROE's POETRY and other periodicals as well as his own books, including the collections Al Que Quiere! (1917), Sour Grapes (1921), and Spring and All (1923). Poems such as “The Red Wheelbarrow,” “This Is Just to Say,” and “The Yachts,” which appear in virtually all the standard anthologies of American literature, exemplify his use of compact four-to-six-syllable lines and common, everyday words that present evocative visual images without any apparent editorializing. Williams later formulated his aesthetic in his famous pronouncement: “No ideas but in things.”

Williams's poetry is characterized by an innovative use of language. He was fond of metrical irregularity and often used the “variable foot,” a technique that allowed him to fragment lines of poetry to emphasize places, phrases, or individual words. Sometimes the lines are divided according to grammatical units, but often they are designed to demonstrate an idea, such as the fragmentation of modern life through the use of broken lines and flashes of incomplete thought. His poetry communicates the impression of an animated painting or photograph, combining visual and aural patterns to create meaning, not to instruct or moralize but rather to convey the importance and beauty in common experiences. During the 1920s and into the 1930s Williams achieved little recognition and did not significantly influence the progress of American poetry. His verse began to attract more attention when his Collected Poems: 1921–1931 (1934) was published by Objectivist Press (see OBJECTIVISM) organized by his friends George OPPEN, Pound, Louis ZUKOFSKY, Carl Rakoski, and Charles REZNIKOFF.

Williams turned to prose in the short novel The Great American Novel (1923); the collection of essays In the American Grain (1925), in which he treated figures important to American heritage and history, paying tribute not merely to North American culture but also to the Aztecs and the peoples of Mesoamerica; and his first full-length novel, A Voyage to Pagany (1928), which was based on a trip to Europe he took in 1924. He collected short stories in The Knife of the Times and Other Stories (1932) and Life Along the Passaic River (1938). His practice as a doctor brought an authenticity to stories such as “The Use of Force.” With extraordinary economy, this brief story portrays a doctor's fluctuating emotions as he tries to preserve a professional manner while treating a headstrong young girl. His profession in medicine had a profound relation to his poetry as well. The struggles and characters of his pa-

KORA IN HELL: IMPROVISATIONS

By WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS

Cover for Williams's 1920 collection of experimental prose passages tients, often poor immigrants, are portrayed in his writing, especially in his expression of the American experience. He wrote in detail and with emotion about the women especially, whose babies he delivered and whose enduring strength he admired. In 1937 he published White Mule, the first novel in a trilogy that he continued with In the Money (1940) and The Build-Up (1952).

In the 1940s Williams embarked on his great urban epic Paterson, published in five volumes from 1946 to 1958. The city, the history of New Jersey, and the poet's sensibility all meld together in an historical and aesthetic work that is reminiscent of John Dos Passos's U.S.A. in its use of newspaper accounts, letters, and histories. By the late 1950s Williams's central place in American poetry was beginning to be hailed by poets such as Denise Levertov, Allen Ginsberg, Robert Lowell, and Paul Blackburn, and his collection Pictures from Brueghel (1962) won a PULITZER PRIZE. He is now regarded as one of the great American poets of the twentieth century.

—Lori Shores

Principal Books by Williams

- Poems*. Rutherford, N.J.: Privately printed, 1909.
The Tempers. London: Elkin Mathews, 1913.
Al Que Quiere! Boston: Four Seas, 1917.
Kora in Hell: Improvisations. Boston: Four Seas, 1920.
Sour Grapes. Boston: Four Seas, 1921.
The Great American Novel. Paris: Three Mountains Press, 1923.
Spring and All. Paris: Contact Editions, 1923.
GO GO. New York: Monroe Wheeler, 1923.
In the American Grain. New York: A. & C. Boni, 1925.
A Voyage to Pagany. New York: Macaulay, 1928.
A Novellette and Other Prose (1921–1931). Toulon, France: TO Publishers, 1932.
The Knife of the Times and Other Stories. Ithaca, N.Y.: Dragon Press, 1932.
The Cod Head. San Francisco: Harvest Press, 1932.
Collected Poems 1921–1931. New York: Objectivist Press, 1934.
An Early Martyr and Other Poems. New York: Alcestis Press, 1935.
Adam & Eve & The City. Peru, Vt.: Alcestis Press, 1936.
White Mule. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1937.
Life Along the Passaic River. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1938.
The Complete Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams 1906–1938. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1938.
In the Money: White Mule—Part II. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1940.
The Broken Span. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1941.
The Wedge. Cummington, Mass.: Cummington Press, 1944.
Paterson (Book One). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1946.
Paterson (Book Two). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1948.
The Clouds, Aigeltinger, Russia, &. Aurora, N.Y.: Wells College Press / Cummington, Mass.: Cummington Press, 1948.
A Dream of Love: A Play in Three Acts and Eight Scenes. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1948.
Selected Poems. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1949; enlarged, 1968.
The Pink Church. Columbus, Ohio: Golden Goose Press, 1949.
Paterson (Book Three). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1949.
The Collected Later Poems. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1950; revised, 1963.
Make Light of It: Collected Stories. New York: Random House, 1950.
A Beginning on the Short Story [Notes]. Yonkers, N.Y.: Alicat Bookshop Press, 1950.
Paterson (Book Four). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1951.
The Autobiography. New York: Random House, 1951.
The Collected Earlier Poems. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1951.
The Build-Up: A Novel. New York: Random House, 1952.
The Desert Music and Other Poems. New York: Random House, 1954.
Selected Essays. New York: Random House, 1954.
Journey to Love. New York: Random House, 1955.

- I Wanted to Write a Poem*, reported and edited by Edith Heal. Boston: Beacon, 1958.
- Paterson* (Book Five). Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1958.
- Yes, Mrs. Williams: A Personal Record of My Mother*. New York: McDowell, Obolensky, 1959.
- The Farmers' Daughters: The Collected Stories*. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1961.
- Many Loves and Other Plays: The Collected Plays*. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1961.
- Pictures from Brueghel and Other Poems*. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1962.
- Paterson*, books 1–5 and notes for book 6. New York: New Directions, 1963.
- The William Carlos Williams Reader*, edited by M. L. Rosenthal. New York: New Directions, 1966.
- Imaginations*, edited by Webster Schott. New York: New Directions, 1970.
- The Embodiment of Knowledge*, edited by Ron Loewinsohn. New York: New Directions, 1974.
- A Recognizable Image: William Carlos Williams on Art and Artists*, edited by Bram Dijkstra. New York: New Directions, 1978.
- Selected Poems*, edited by Charles Tomlinson. New York: New Directions, 1985.
- The Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams*, edited by A. Walton Litz and Christopher MacGowan. 2 volumes. New York: New Directions, 1986, 1988.
- Paterson*, edited by MacGowan. Revised edition. New York: New Directions, 1992.

Studying William Carlos Williams

For students studying William Carlos Williams, one of the best places to start is with the edition of the poet's Selected Poems, edited by Charles Tomlinson (1985). For a comprehensive collection, excluding the epic poem Paterson, students should look to the two-volume The Collected Poems of William Carlos Williams, edited by A. Walton Litz and Christopher MacGowan (1986, 1988). The definitive text of Paterson is also edited by MacGowan (1992). A representative selection of Williams's prose—which critics consider less significant than his poetry—can be found in Imaginations (1970). With so much contemporary attention given to T. S. ELIOT and Ezra POUND, Williams's critical reception was slow in developing during his lifetime, a point Paul Mariani emphasizes in his study of critical responses to Williams's poetry, William Carlos Williams: The Poet and His Critics (Chicago: American Library Association, 1975). Perhaps this point—that Williams's reception was lukewarm compared to Pound's and Eliot's—is most clear in that the first book-length study of his work did not appear until Vivienne Koch's William Carlos Williams (Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1950). Mariani has, additionally, written the most thorough biography, William Carlos Williams: A New World Naked (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980). Reed Whitemore's William

Dust jacket for the final volume of Williams's epic poem of verse and prose centered on the Passaic River and Paterson, New Jersey

Carlos Williams: Poet from Jersey (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press: 1975) and the Twayne Series biography by Charles Whitaker, William Carlos Williams (Boston: Twayne, 1989), also offer useful biographical accounts of the poet's life and work.

Williams's critical reputation has continued its upward swing since the 1970s, and Critical Essays on William Carlos Williams, edited by Stephen Gould Axelrod and Helen Deese (New York: G. K. Hall, 1995), is a diverse collection of essays that trace some of the major trends in this ever-expanding body of work. Since then, many additional important essays have been written, though there is no complete secondary bibliography available at this time, so students should consult the electronic or print versions of the MLA bibliography. Todd Giles's "A Comprehensive William Carlos Williams Bibliography: 1994–2004," published in the Fall 2005 issue of the William Carlos Williams Review, is useful for studying the major trends of that decade. Some of the most helpful scholarship on Williams appears in the Review, which has been in existence since 1975.

Book-length studies of Williams's work include Joel Connarroe's William Carlos Williams's Paterson: Language and Landscape (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1970), a good introduction to this long work, though not comprehensive. For another take on Paterson, see Margaret Glynne Lloyd's William Carlos Williams's Paterson: A Critical Reappraisal (Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1980). Many critics have noted the connection between Williams and the visual arts; the best book on this issue is MacGowan's William Carlos Williams's Early Poetry: The Visual Arts Background (Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Press 1984). Other critics have, in addition to exploring Williams's connections to painting, considered him in the wider context of artistic expression, including Peter Schmidt in William Carlos Williams, The Arts, and Literary Tradition (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988) and Kerry Driscoll in William Carlos Williams and the Maternal Muse (Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Press, 1987).

—Graham Stowe

Wilson, Edmund (1895–1972) critic, novelist, diarist

The most well-read and accomplished American critic of his era, Edmund Wilson was educated at Princeton University, where he formed a lifelong friendship with F. Scott FITZGERALD. After Fitzgerald's death, Wilson helped sustain and enhance his friend's reputation, editing Fitzgerald's unfinished novel, THE LAST TYCOON (1941), and a collection of writings by and about the author, THE CRACK-UP (1945).

Although Wilson was comfortable in the academy, he spent most of his life outside it, first reporting for the New York Sun and then, after service in WORLD WAR I, for VANITY FAIR (1920–1921) and THE NEW REPUBLIC (1926–1931). Especially at The New Republic he set a high standard for book reviews and did his utmost to further the careers of outstanding American writers.

Wilson's first important book, Axel's Castle: A Study in the Imaginative Literature of 1870–1930 (1931), demonstrates his trademark blend of biographical and literary criticism. He wrote in the nineteenth-century tradition of a man of letters, and as his career developed he avoided narrow critical approaches such as the NEW CRITICISM and stayed apart from critics grouped around influential journals such as PARTISAN REVIEW.

Although Wilson was primarily interested in literature, he also explored political ideology in such works as To the Finland Station: A Study in the Writing and Acting of History (1940), which shows both his attraction to and ultimate rejection of Marxism. The Wound and the Bow: Seven Studies in Literature (1941) is his most extensive foray into the psychological origins of art. Wilson's other noteworthy critical works include The Triple Thinkers (1938), The Boys in the Back Room: Notes on California Novelists (1941), Classics and Commercials: A Literary Chronicle of the 1940s (1950), The Shores of Light: A Literary Chronicle of the Twenties and the Thirties (1952), Patriotic Gore: Studies in the Literature of the American Civil War (1962), and The Bit Between My Teeth: A Literary Chronicle of 1950–1965 (1965).

Wilson also wrote poetry, plays, and fiction, notably I Thought of Daisy (1929), a novel about New York bohemians in the 1920s, and Memoirs of Hecate County (1946), a series of loosely connected short stories in which an intellectual recalls his sexual and social experiences in suburbia and Manhattan. The latter was banned in many communities because of what critics saw as its pornographic content. Wilson's diaries, published in several volumes covering each decade of his life beginning with the 1920s, show ample evidence of his keen delight in sexual experience. While the diaries make frank and informative reading about Wilson's life and times, they are reticent on certain matters, including his contentious marriage to Mary McCarthy.

Sources

Dabney, Lewis M. Edmund Wilson: A Life in Literature. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 2005.

Wain, John, ed. Edmund Wilson: The Man and His Work. New York: New York University Press, 1978.

Wilson, Harry Leon (1867–1939) humorist, novelist, short-story writer

Harry Leon Wilson began his writing career by publishing pieces in Puck, a humor magazine he later edited for six years (1896–1902). When he quit the weekly, he devoted himself to becoming a professional writer, achieving his first success with The Spenders (1902), a novel that contrasts the frontier spirit of the West with the civilized East. He collaborated with his fellow Midwesterner Booth TARKINGTON on several commercially successful plays between 1907 and 1910. Beginning with the comic Bunker Bean (1913), Wilson's novels were regularly serialized in the THE SATURDAY EVENING POST before their book publication. His most popular works include Ruggles of Red Gap (1915), the story of a British valet working in a western cattle town; the stories that feature the good-hearted ranch owner and tale-teller Ma Pettentill, collected in Somewhere in Red Gap (1916), Ma Pettengill (1919), and Ma Pettengill Talks (1923); and Merton of the Movies (1922), about a store clerk so smitten with movies that he becomes a success by imitating the roles he has obsessively watched on-screen.

Source

Kummer, George. Harry Leon Wilson: Some Account of the Triumphs and Tribulations of an American Writer. Cleveland, Ohio: Press of Western Reserve University, 1963.

Winesburg, Ohio by Sherwood Anderson (New York: Huebsch, 1919) short-story cycle

Sherwood ANDERSON wrote these stories separately, and many can stand alone, but together they form a cohesive study of early-twentieth-century life in a Midwestern village. George Willard, a cub reporter for the Winesburg Eagle, links many of the stories, collecting information, impressions, and experiences in a provincial town that stifles passion, joy, and creativity. The series of stories that make up “Godliness, a Tale in Four Parts” rejects the pastoral ideal by portraying farmers as slaves to the land. The lonely Wing Biddlebaum of “Hands” indulges in dreams for a pastoral golden age only to have those dreams destroyed by the small-minded village residents. The book is not, however, unremittingly bleak. “Paper Pills” celebrates “the sweetness of the twisted apples,” and Anderson sometimes reveals the sweet spots in a series of twisted, grotesque characters trapped inside prisons of their own making.

Anderson was widely criticized for the sexual frankness of Winesburg, Ohio, but his willingness to explore the depths of the human condition inspired a generation of writers, including Ernest HEMINGWAY and William FAULKNER. Also influential was the book’s portrayal of the sensitive young artist who finally escapes the limitations of village life, for the stories George hears from the townspeople—often dealing with their solitariness, their dreams, and their failures—become part of his own maturation as a writer and as an adult. At the end of the book, George Willard leaves his town for the city, and his life in Winesburg, while it had shaped him, becomes “but a background on which to paint the dreams of his manhood.”

Sources

Anderson, Sherwood. Winesburg, Ohio, critical edition, edited by Charles E. Modlin and Ray Lewis White. New York: Norton, 1996.

Crowley, John W., ed. New Essays on “Winesburg, Ohio.” Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

—Bev Hogue

“Winter Dreams” by F. Scott Fitzgerald (1922)

short story

A miniature version of THE GREAT GATSBY (1925) published three years before the novel in Metropolitan Magazine, F. Scott FITZGERALD’s “Winter Dreams” recounts how a caddy’s response to an imperious rich girl drives him to success. After Judy Jones twice jilts him he leaves the Midwest for Wall Street. When he is thirty-two Dexter Green learns that her beauty has faded and that she is unhappily married. He experiences a terrible sense of loss: “Even the grief he could have borne was left behind in the country of illusion, youth, of the richness of life, where his winter dreams had flourished.” Fitzgerald included “Winter Dreams” in his collection ALL THE SAD YOUNG MEN (1926).

Source

Brucoli, Matthew J. Classes on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Columbia: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

—Matthew J. Brucoli

Winters, Yvor (1900–1968) poet, critic

The Chicago-born Yvor Winters had a distinguished teaching career at Stanford University while publishing poetry praised for its classical restraint, exquisite sense of form, and moral discrimination. After beginning his education at the University of Chicago, Winters was diagnosed with tuberculosis and left for a sanitarium in Santa Fe, New Mexico, where he stayed for more than two years. His experience there with Native American culture affected his development as a poet and is especially apparent in his first collections, The Immobile Wind (1921) and The Magpie’s Shadow (1922). Winters continued his education at the University of Colorado, earning his B.A. and M.A. degrees in Romance languages, and went on to Stanford for his Ph.D. in English (1934). Winters’s fourth collection, Proof (1930), shows his turn to traditional English meter and rhyme, away from the IMAGISM and free verse that had marked his early work. Winters’s career as a poet culminated in his Collected Poems (1952), which won the Bollingen Prize when he revised and expanded it in 1960.

Winters was an astute critic of American literature, especially poetry. His special subject was the ambiguity and obscurity of modern poetry, which he attributed, in part, to the influence of Romanticism. His important critical books include Primitivism and Decadence (1937), Maule’s Cure (1938), The Anatomy of Nonsense (1943), The Function of Criticism (1957), and Forms of Discovery (1967).

Sources

Parkinson, Thomas. Hart Crane and Yvor Winters: Their Literary Correspondence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978.

Powell, Grosvenor. Language as Being in the Poetry of Yvor Winters. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.

Powell. Yvor Winters: An Annotated Bibliography, 1919–1982. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983.

Winterset by Maxwell Anderson (produced 1935) play

In 1928 Maxwell ANDERSON collaborated with Harold Hickerson on Gods of the Lightning, an unsuccessful dramatization of the highly publicized trial and execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti (see SACCO-VANZETTI CASE).

Seven years later Anderson on his own revisited the issues raised by the Sacco-Vanzetti case. Shifting his focus to the survivors of the wrongly executed immigrants, Anderson wrote the three-act allegorical tragedy Winterset, which opened on Broadway on September 25, 1935, for a 195-performance run. While the play won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award and generated considerable critical interest because of Anderson's use of blank verse, which he attempted to popularize in subsequent plays, it has rarely been revived.

—James Fisher

Wister, Owen (1860–1938) novelist, short-story writer, biographer

Owen Wister became famous for writing the first modern Western, THE VIRGINIAN (1902). Born in Philadelphia in 1860 to a prominent physician and an artistic mother, Wister attended private schools in the United States and Europe and Harvard University. Though talented as a composer, he followed his father's wishes and entered business and then the law. Wister traveled to Wyoming in 1885 on the advice of his doctor to recuperate from nervous depression and discovered his calling as a "chronicler of the West." His Wyoming experiences became the source for short-story collections such as Red Men and White (1896), tales of the Western cattle country, and for The Virginian, which set the pattern for the genre of the WESTERN. In addition to books such as Philosophy 4 (1903), a novel about undergraduate life at Harvard, and Lady Baltimore (1906), a romance set in Charleston, South Carolina, Wister also wrote poetry, political essays, and biographies of Ulysses S. GRANT (1900) and George Washington (1907), and his friend Theodore Roosevelt (1930).

Sources

Payne, Darwin. Owen Wister: Chronicler of the West, Gentleman of the East. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1985.

Wister, Owen. Owen Wister out West: His Journals and Letters, edited by Fanny Kemble Wister. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958.

Wister. The Virginian, edited by Robert Shulman. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

—Michelle C. Greenwald

Wolfe, Thomas (1900–1938) novelist, short-story writer

No man has more than his own life, and no man's material is greater than his one life can absorb and hold.

—Wolfe to Maxwell Perkins, December 23, 1936

Thomas Wolfe was born in Asheville, North Carolina, which became ALTAMONT in his fiction. He was the eighth and last surviving child born to W. O. Wolfe, a stonecutter with a love for language, and his wife, Julia, a real-estate speculator and boardinghouse proprietor. Theirs was a tempestuous marriage, and Wolfe oftentimes found himself caught in the middle of their clashing personalities and domestic squabbles. At age six he was permanently moved a few blocks away from his family's house to live with his mother in the Old Kentucky Home, a boardinghouse. Wolfe's sense of wandering, his search for a home, originated in his growing up in this boardinghouse and played no small part in the development of his artistic sensibility.

Wolfe entered the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in fall 1916. Most of Chapel Hill's upperclassmen were called away for WORLD WAR I in spring 1917, and Wolfe became a big man on campus, enthusiastically throwing himself into Chapel Hill's social, literary, and intellectual life. After his graduation in 1920, Wolfe continued his education by enrolling in Harvard, where he worked for the next two years on his M.A. degree in English. Studying with George Pierce Baker at his prestigious 47 Workshop, Wolfe honed his abilities as a playwright. His writing during this period, especially his two apprentice plays—the one-act The Mountains and the four-hour-long Welcome to Our City, produced by the Workshop in 1921 and 1923, respectively—demonstrated an emerging interest in using his own experiences or those of people he knew in Asheville as the raw material for his work. The rejection of Welcome to Our City as too long for a New York production in 1923 contributed to the end of Wolfe's ambitions as a playwright. In 1924 he began teaching English at Washington Square College of New York University, a position he held for six years.

Thomas Wolfe, circa 1935

In 1925 Wolfe met Aline Bernstein, a noted stage designer who was nearly two decades his senior, and they began a seven-year affair that sustained him emotionally and financially as he started his professional writing career. The following year he began work on his first novel, titled "O Lost," which he dedicated to Bernstein when it was published as LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL (1929). Bernstein's wealth and social contacts in Manhattan society provided material for his future novels while also supplying Wolfe with many lingering resentments about class privilege.

Wolfe's fiction is characterized by his use of autobiographical material and themes, endowing his novels with an intensity of feeling and experience. His work is also deeply literary, woven with intricate strands of myth and indebted to the epic dramas of Goethe and Shakespeare, the high poetic style of the British Romantics, and the work of such novelists as Tolstoy, Dickens, Proust, and Joyce.

His novels burst with litanies of words, emotions, sensations, and experiences, which at times captivated and bewildered his readers and frustrated his critics. The largely sprawling forms that his novels assumed were criticized for their seeming lack of discipline.

At age twenty-nine, Wolfe gained his first taste of personal and professional success with the publication of Look Homeward, Angel. The novel—which followed the arc of its autobiographical protagonist, Eugene Gant, from birth to college—proved highly controversial in Asheville for its thinly veiled portrait of townspeople and local history and its presentation of the domestic life of Wolfe's family. The intensity of the local reaction, especially among family and friends, wounded Wolfe, forcing him into a self-imposed exile from his hometown for seven years.

Matching the success of his first novel became a burdensome challenge for Wolfe. Six years elapsed between his first novel and second. But OF TIME AND THE RIVER (1935)—a novel of more than 900 pages—confirmed the artistic promise of Look Homeward, Angel, continuing the story of Eugene's life through his growth as an artist. Despite its great length, the novel proved a commercial success and brought Wolfe popular and critical acclaim. But the novel's disjointed narrative form prompted the fiercest criticisms of his professional career. Bernard DeVoto of THE SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE famously charged

Dust jacket for Wolfe's first novel; he worked with editor Maxwell Perkins to revise his long manuscript into a work Scribners would publish that Wolfe was incapable of shaping his manuscripts into publishable narratives without the assistance of Maxwell PERKINS, his editor at the House of Scribner (see CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS). And these criticisms, coupled with Wolfe's own misgivings about some of Perkins's cuts he had been forced to accept, eventually contributed to his break with Scribners in 1937.

As he basked in the success of his second novel and began work on his next major work, Wolfe also proceeded with a series of smaller projects. FROM DEATH TO MORNING (1935) brought together most of his published short stories, among them "Only the Dead Know Brooklyn." THE STORY OF A NOVEL (1936) expanded a lecture he delivered at the University of Colorado's Writers' Conference on the craft of writing and his experience as a novelist. "I Have a Thing to Tell You," first published in THE NEW REPUBLIC in 1937, warned readers of the dangerous rise of Adolf Hitler and Nazism in Germany.

Dust jacket for Wolfe's 1935 novel, which continues the Eugene Gant story begun in Look Homeward, Angel

In 1938 a new publisher, Harper and Brothers, and a new editor, Edward Aswell, took over responsibility for Wolfe's professional life. Before he could finally settle down to work with Aswell on editing his next novel, Wolfe fell ill in Seattle after a tour of National Parks. Brought back east to Baltimore's Johns Hopkins Hospital by his family, he died from tuberculosis of the brain on September 15, 1938.

Wolfe's death left Aswell alone to shape the author's extensive body of unpublished work into books. The two posthumous novels, THE WEB AND THE ROCK (1939) and YOU CAN'T GO HOME AGAIN (1940), centered on the novelist George Webber and his artistic maturation and growing social consciousness. These novels served as a second autobiographical cycle no less powerful than Look Homeward, Angel and Of Time and the River.

Wolfe proved an important artistic influence on a generation of American writers raised in the provincialism of the GREAT DEPRESSION that was tempered by WORLD WAR II. Writers as diverse as James Jones, William Styron, James Dickey, Tennessee WILLIAMS, Kurt Vonnegut, and Carson McCULLERS all drew inspiration from his work. Although his novels have remained in print since their publication, Wolfe's critical reputation among college teachers, literary scholars, and critics and his visibility among the general readership have diminished. Yet, his work continues to excite new generations of readers.

—S. Zebulon Baker

Principal Books by Wolfe

Look Homeward, Angel. New York: Scribners, 1929.

Of Time and the River. New York: Scribners, 1935.

From Death to Morning. New York: Scribners, 1935.

The Story of a Novel. New York & London: Scribners, 1936.

The Web and the Rock. New York & London: Harper, 1939.

You Can't Go Home Again. New York & London: Harper, 1940.

The Hills Beyond. New York & London: Harper, 1941.

Gentlemen of the Press. Chicago: Black Archer, 1942.

A Stone, A Leaf, A Door: Poems, edited by John S. Barnes. New York: Scribners, 1945.

Mannerhouse: A Play in a Prologue and Three Acts. New York: Harper, 1948; revised and edited by Louis D. Rubin Jr. and John L. Idol Jr. Baton Rouge & London: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.

A Western Journal: A Daily Log of the Great Parks Trip. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1951.

Thomas Wolfe's Purdue Speech: "Writing and Living", edited by William Braswell and Leslie A. Field. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Studies, 1964.

The Mountains, edited by Pat M. Ryan. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1970.

The Notebooks of Thomas Wolfe, edited by Richard S. Kennedy and Paschal Reeves, 2 volumes. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1970.

Welcome to Our City: A Play in Ten Scenes, edited by Kennedy. Baton Rouge & London: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.

K-19: Salvaged Pieces, edited by Idol. Athens, Ohio & Columbia, S.C.: Thomas Wolfe Society/Bryan, 1983.

The Autobiography of an American Novelist, edited by Leslie Field. Cambridge, Mass. & London: Harvard University Press, 1983—comprises original, uncut versions of The Story of a Novel and Thomas Wolfe's Purdue Speech: "Writing and Living".

The Hound of Darkness, edited by Idol. Athens, Ohio: Thomas Wolfe Society, 1986.

The Complete Short Stories of Thomas Wolfe, edited by Francis E. Skipp. New York: Scribners, 1987.

The Good Child's River, edited by Suzanne Stutman. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1991.

The Lost Boys: A Novella, edited by James W. Clark Jr.. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1992.

The Starwick Episodes, edited by Kennedy. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

The Party at Jack's, edited by Stutman and Idol. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.

O Lost A Story of the Buried Life, edited by Arlyn and Matthew J. Bruccoli. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

Studying Thomas Wolfe

Thomas Wolfe's most important works are divided by his association with two editors, Maxwell PERKINS, who worked with Wolfe, and Edward Aswell, who assembled Wolfe's work-in-progress for publication after the author's death. Working with Perkins, Wolfe produced the novel still considered his masterpiece, LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL (1929), as well as another novel, OF TIME AND THE RIVER (1935), and a collection of stories, FROM DEATH TO MORNING (1935). In THE STORY OF A NOVEL (1936) Wolfe writes about working on Of Time and the River with Perkins, whose early influence on Wolfe readers may judge for themselves by comparing Look Homeward, Angel to O Lost, the original version of the novel prepared from Wolfe's typescript by Arlyn and Matthew J. Bruccoli (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000), which restores some 66,000 words cut by the editor. Although Wolfe's posthumously published works—the novels THE WEB AND THE ROCK (1939) and YOU CAN'T GO HOME AGAIN (1940) and the collection The Hills Beyond (1941)—are widely believed to suffer from Aswell's inappropriate editorial intrusion, they remain important as part of Wolfe's literary legacy.

The most useful companion to Wolfe's work and life is Ted Mitchell's Thomas Wolfe: A Documentary Volume in the Dictionary of Literary Biography series (Volume 229. Detroit: Bruccoli Clark Layman/Thomson Gale, 2001), which is also published in a paperback version as Thomas Wolfe: An Illustrated Biography (New York: Pegasus Books, 2006). This comprehensive volume provides a chronological account of Wolfe's life as well as reviews of his works and critical articles and is amply illustrated with photographs, documents, and facsimiles of manuscripts.

The recommended biographies are David Herbert Donald's Look Homeward: The Life of Thomas Wolfe (Boston: Little, Brown, 1987) and Elizabeth Nowell's Thomas Wolfe: A Biography (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1960), by Wolfe's literary agent. Nowell also edited The Letters of Thomas Wolfe (New York: Scribners, 1956). Wolfe's relationships with single correspondents are the focus of other letter collections, including The Letters of Thomas Wolfe to His Mother, edited by C. Hugh Holman and Sue Fields Ross (New York: Scribners, 1968); My Other Loneliness: Letters of Thomas Wolfe and Aline Bernstein, edited by Suzanne Stutman (Chapel Hill & London: University of North Carolina Press, 1983); and To Loot My Life Clean: The Thomas Wolfe-Maxwell Perkins Correspondence, edited by Matthew J. Bruccoli and Park Bucker (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000).

Dust jacket for the full text of Wolfe's first novel, based on his manuscript

The primary bibliography is Thomas Wolfe: A Descriptive Bibliography, compiled by Carol Johnston (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1987). Useful secondary bibliographies are John S. Phillipson's Thomas Wolfe: A Reference Guide (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1977) and John E. Bassett's Thomas Wolfe: An Annotated Critical Bibliography (Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow Press, 1996). John Lane Idol Jr.'s A Thomas Wolfe Companion (New York: Greenwood Press, 1987) is a reliable reference that combines literary and bibliographical criticism and scholarship. The best critical study is Richard S. Kennedy's The Window of Memory: The Literary Career of Thomas Wolfe (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962).

The organ for Wolfe studies is The Thomas Wolfe Review (formerly The Thomas Wolfe Newsletter), which is published annually by the Thomas Wolfe Society. The most comprehensive Internet site is UNC-Wilmington's The Thomas Wolfe Web Site (<<http://library.uncwil.edu/wolfe/wolfe.html>> viewed August 6, 2007), which includes the on-line catalogue for the University of North Carolina collection of Wolfe papers, tables of contents for The Thomas Wolfe Review, and links to the Thomas Wolfe Memorial in Asheville, North Carolina. The primary collection of his papers can be found in the William B. Eerdmans Collection at Harvard University's Houghton Library, the catalogue for which is available on-line.

—Todd Hagstette

The Women by Clare Boothe Luce (produced 1936) play

In her foreword to the published version of The Women (1937), Clare Boothe LUCE describes her comic play as a satire of "a numerically small group of ladies native to the Park Avenues of America." Dramatizing only female characters, Luce exposes the idle rich ladies of 1930s Manhattan as vain and vicious creatures, capable of betraying their oldest friend to obtain a prize piece of gossip. She counters the cruelty of the upper-class women by her portrayal of hardworking and principled, but usually nameless, hairdressers, models, secretaries, cooks, maids, and other working-class women. The protagonist is Mary, Mrs. Stephen Haines, a naive, overly sweet woman, who, as the playwright explains, had she been reasonably intelligent, would have made "short shrift of her enemies." The major conflict of the play involves Mary's "friends" trying to control her reactions to her husband's adulterous relationship with the social climber Crystal Allen. With its witty one-liners, The Women proved a commercial success, premiering on Broadway on December 26, 1936, for a run of 657 performances. In 1956 the play served as the basis for the movie musical The Opposite Sex.

—Park Bucker

Wood, Charles Erskine Scott (1852–1944) poet, satirist

Charles Erskine Scott Wood, a West Point graduate, pursued an army career in the West and then became a lawyer in Oregon. He published several volumes of poetry, including The Poet in the Desert (1915), a dialogue between Truth and a Poet that expresses his concern about social justice. His most important work is a series of satirical essays in dialogue form, a few of which were published in THE MASSES, a radical magazine hospitable to his antiwar views, before it was discontinued as a result of government action during WORLD WAR I. Scott's essays discussing the world's sorry record of intolerance, religious persecution, and other failings were collected in his most popular work, Heavenly Discourse (1927). In one of the first dialogues, "God Receives a Delegation," the Almighty admits to his presence "scientists, artists, poets, and Mark Twain" but sends reformers such as Carry A. Nation and fundamentalists to a lower plane where they "will have fifty-six planes of growth" to pass through before reaching God's level. In addition to Twain, the dramatis personae of the dialogues include Thomas Jefferson, Tom Paine, and Benjamin Franklin as well as Jesus, Buddha, Confucius, Rabelais, Voltaire, and many others.

Source

Hamburger, Robert. Two Rooms: The Life of Charles Erskine Scott Wood. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1998.

Woollcott, Alexander (1887–1943) literary critic

Alexander Woollcott was one of the most famous of the NEW YORKER writers—a wit, a tastemaker, and a public personality. A member of the ALGONQUIN ROUND TABLE, he was a boisterous and cosmopolitan figure whose opinions and influence stretched across the Anglo-American world of entertainment and letters. THE MAN WHO CAME TO DINNER (1939), a play by George S. KAUFMAN and Moss HART, is a good-natured parody of Woollcott as public personality and nuisance. Among Woollcott's books are the essay collections Shouts and Murmurs (1922) and While Rome Burns (1934), both of which capture his stirring style and robust convictions.

Sources

Chatterton, Wayne. Alexander Woollcott. Boston: Twayne, 1978.
Teichmann, Howard. Smart Aleck: The Wit, World, and Life of Alexander Woollcott. New York: Morrow, 1976.

World War I (1914–1918)

The war that came to be known as World War I began in August 1914 with Germany, Austria-Hungary, and the Ottoman Empire (the Central Powers) pitted against Britain, France, and Russia (the Allies). President Woodrow Wilson soon declared America's neutrality. After several American ships were sunk in February and March 1917, and after the German foreign minister's telegram proposing a German-Mexican alliance was intercepted, the United States entered the war on the side of the Allies on April 2, 1917.

President Wilson had vowed to keep the country out of war, and his change of policy angered and embittered many. The president appealed to American patriotism and called for the nation's involvement to "make the world safe for democracy." His administration also conducted an intensive propaganda campaign that portrayed the Germans as primitive "Huns" out to destroy the very idea of civilization.

The U.S. Army grew from 200,000 to 4 million, with 2 million troops going overseas in the American Expeditionary Force. The American entry into the war aided the exhausted British and French forces, who had fought the Germans to a stalemate. Russia, in the grips of its 1917 Revolution, made a separate peace with Germany. All told, more than 116,000 Americans died in the war, with more than half succumbing not to combat but to disease.

Serious American war literature largely begins in the 1920s with an outpouring of major works that condemn the horrors of modern warfare and the idealism with which the United States entered a tragic and unnecessary world war. War-related works published during the conflict were, for the most part, propagandistic. For example, the poems of Alan SEEGER, who served with the French Foreign Legion until his death in 1916, resemble those of the English war poet Rupert Brooke. In his most famous poem, "A Rendezvous with Death," Seeger described in abstract and idealistic terms a soldier's fatalistic acceptance of death.

Abstraction and idealism quickly became targets for writers once the war ended. A work of literary NATURALISM, John Dos Passos's novel Three Soldiers (1921) set the standard for the postwar literature of disenchantment by portraying the U.S. Army as a vast, inhuman machine that ultimately crushes all three of the novel's main characters. Other antiheroic war novels from the 1920s include E. E. CUMMINGS's THE ENORMOUS ROOM (1922), Thomas Boyd's Through the Wheat (1923), Laurence STALLINGS's Plumes (1924), William FAULKNER's Soldier's Pay (1926), James Stevens's Mattock (1927), and Ernest HEMINGWAY's A FAREWELL TO ARMS (1929). The last of these, regarded as the best American novel of the war, takes place on the Italian Front and pits two lovers against an insane world of military blunders and hollow martial rhetoric.

Not every writer of the 1920s saw World War I in such bleak terms. A more ambivalent picture of the conflict appears in Willa CATHER's One of Ours (1922), a work that explores the seductive appeal of heroic idealism, and in Laurence Stallings and Maxwell ANDERSON's WHAT PRICE GLORY? (produced 1924), the most popular drama to emerge from the war. Hervey Allen's acclaimed memoir Toward the Flame (1926) presents military violence as the ultimate expression of human nature, revealing both nobility and depravity.

MODERNISM became the dominant mode in significant World War I literature published after 1930. Nineteen-Nineteen (1932), the second volume of Dos Passos's experimental U.S.A. trilogy, re-creates the atmosphere of wartime America and Europe through newspaper headlines, snippets of song lyrics, capsule biographies of public figures, and stream-of-consciousness passages. William March's Company K (1933) presents the story of one combat unit through the perspectives of 113 different soldiers. Long after World War I had gone out of fashion as a literary topic, Faulkner returned to the subject in his PULITZER PRIZE-winning novel A Fable (1954), a retelling of the Christ tale (set on the Western Front) that represents his modernist techniques at their most challenging.

Sources

Cooperman, Stanley. World War I and the American Novel. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967.

Trout, Steven. American Prose Writers of World War I: A Documentary Volume. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 316. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Thomson-Gale, 2005.

—Steven Trout

World War II (1939–1945)

Although World War II began in 1939 with the British and French declaration of war on Germany, which had invaded Poland, the United States did not enter the conflict for two years. Between 1939 and 1941 it watched with growing alarm as German armies overran much of Western Europe and Japanese forces ravaged China. In March 1941 Congress approved the Lend Lease Act, which allowed the president to lend or lease arms, munitions, and supplies to countries whose defense was deemed vital to U.S. security. This act, in essence, represented an economic declaration of war against the Axis powers. With the surprise Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7, 1941, the United States entered the war and rapidly mobilized its economy. By 1945 the country had twelve million men and women in uniform, and at the height of its production, the American war machine could make one ship every day and one airplane every five minutes. The war in Europe ended with Germany's surrender on May 8, 1945; Japan surrendered on August 10, 1945, shortly after the United States dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The United States suffered 292,131 killed and 671,801 wounded in the war.

Although most of the important American literature about World War II was written after 1945, the war produced important contemporary writing. Correspondents such as Martha GELLHORN, John HERSEY, A. J. LIEBLING, and Ernie PYLE turned their reporting into books, including Gellhorn's A Stricken Field (1940) and The Wine of Astonishment (1948); Hersey's Men on Bataan (1942), Into the Valley (1943), his Pulitzer Prize-winning novel A Bell for Adano (1944), and Hiroshima (1946); Liebling's The Road Back to Paris (1944); and Pyle's Ernie Pyle in England (1941), Here Is Your War (1943), and Brave Men (1944). Established poets who wrote about the war include W. H. AUDEN, Gwendolyn BROOKS, H.D. (see Hilda DOOLITTLE), Ezra POUND, Robinson JEFFERS, and Yvor WINTERS.

Sources

Fussell, Paul. Wartime: Understanding and Behavior in the Second World War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Higgins, Ian, ed. The Second World War in Literature: Eight Essays. Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1986.

Richard Wright

Wright, Richard (1908–1960), novelist, autobiographer, short-story writer

I would hurl words into this darkness and wait for an echo, and if an echo sounded, no matter how faintly, I would send other words to tell, to march, to fight, to create a sense of hunger for life that gnaws in us all.
—American Hunger (1977)

Richard Wright's two-part autobiography, comprising BLACK BOY (1945) and the posthumously published American Hunger, is among the most-famous and most-read American memoirs. Wright was born on September 4, 1908, near Natchez, Mississippi, to Nathaniel Wright, a sharecropper, and Ella Wilson Wright, a schoolteacher. In his childhood and youth Wright moved with his mother to Memphis, Tennessee, and then to towns in Arkansas before returning to Mississippi. Despite his often unsettled existence and his resentment of his status as a black boy in the Jim Crow South, he was a good student who developed an ambition to become a writer. Concluding that he had little chance of making a career in the South, Wright in December 1927 moved to Chicago, where for a time he worked as a postal clerk before he lost his job as a result of the GREAT DEPRESSION.

In the 1930s, as American Hunger describes, Wright began dual careers as a political activist and as a writer. In 1932 he joined the communist-inspired John Reed Club (see JOHN REED), where he made contacts with other writers, and became a member of the Communist Party in 1933. He published his first major story, "Superstition," in the April 1931 issue of Abbott's Monthly, and two years later he began placing proletarian poems—including "I Have Seen Black Hands," "We of the Streets," and "Red Leaves of Red Books"—in New Masses (see THE MASSES) and other radical periodicals. In May 1937 Wright moved to New York, becoming the Harlem editor for The Daily Worker. Throughout the decade he had followed the efforts of HARLEM RENAISSANCE writers to further African American literature. In October 1937 in New Masses he published a harshly critical review of Zora Neale HURSTON's Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937), a novel that Wright saw as nothing more than literary minstrelsy.

Wright's first major publication was Uncle Tom's Children (1938), a collection of short stories concerned, as the title implies, with African American literary and social history. The volume was a success, but it in no way prepared the literary establishment for the publication of his masterpiece NATIVE SON (1940), a novel that details the downward spiral of Bigger Thomas, a black youth from Chicago's slums who unintentionally kills the daughter of a wealthy white family he works for as a chauffeur. As he explained in How "Bigger" Was Born (1940), Wright viewed the commercial and critical success of Native Son as integral to its purpose as a social protest novel.

Having achieved prominence with his first novel, Wright turned to nonfiction, writing a history of his people in Twelve Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States (1941). In 1942 Wright severed all ties with the Communist Party, tracing his disillusionment with and split from the organization in his Atlantic Monthly essay "I Tried to Be a Communist" (1944), a piece in which Wright made clear the primacy of race, rather than class, in his social, political, and literary philosophies. His memoir Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth (1945) became the exemplary narrative of the black experience in the early-twentieth-century rural South, comparable to Frederick Douglass's narrative of slavery or Malcolm X's memoir of an urban childhood.

At the close of WORLD WAR II, Wright moved to Paris, where he became a part of that city's thriving intellectual community. He traveled extensively, especially in Africa. In his writing he explored new and less-popular directions. In novels such as The Outsider (1953) and Savage Holiday (1954) he turned away from analyzing racial tensions per se to treat existential and Freudian themes, interests inspired by his new friendships with Jean-Paul Sartre and Albert Camus. In his nonfiction Wright wrote about the conditions in Africa in Black Power (1954), global race relations in The Color Curtain (1956), and religion in Pagan Spain (1956). In his last novel, The Long Dream (1958), Wright returned to social-protest writing. It was to have been the first in a trilogy of such works, left unfinished when Wright died of an apparent heart attack in Paris on November 28, 1960—an event that was so unexpected as to occasion conspiracy theories.

Wright's fiction and his often combative reviews of contemporary African American writers such as Hurston made him a controversial figure during his lifetime, and the meaning of his legacy—though not its importance—has concerned writers and critics ever since. Ralph Ellison and James Baldwin respected Wright's talents but saw in his novels an emphasis on politics at the expense of literary complexity and merit—an argument articulated in Baldwin's Notes of a Native Son (1955). Toni Morrison and Alice Walker have linked Wright to a tradition in black male literature of misogyny toward black women. Yet, Native Son and Black Boy have remained on reading lists and curricula continually; in these two seminal works Wright depicts and analyzes the African American and national condition with a forcefulness and honesty rarely equaled.

—Ben Railton

Principal Books by Wright

- Uncle Tom's Children: Four Novellas*. New York & London: Harper, 1938; enlarged as Uncle Tom's Children: Five Long Stories. New York & London: Harper, 1940.
- Native Son*. New York & London: Harper, 1940.
- How "Bigger" Was Born*. New York: Harper, 1940.
- Native Son (The Biography of a Young American): A Play in Ten Scenes*, by Wright and Paul Green. New York & London: Harper, 1941.
- Twelve Million Black Voices: A Folk History of the Negro in the United States*. New York: Viking, 1941.
- Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth*. New York & London: Harper, 1945.
- The Outsider*. New York: Harper, 1953.
- Savage Holiday*. New York: Avon, 1954.
- Black Power: A Record of Reactions in a Land of Pathos*. New York: Harper, 1954; revised edition, London: Dobson, 1956.
- The Color Curtain: A Report on the Bandung Conference*. Cleveland & New York: World, 1956.
- Pagan Spain: A Report of a Journey into the Past*. New York: Harper, 1956.
- White Man, Listen!* Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1957.
- The Long Dream*. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958.
- Eight Men*. Cleveland & New York: World, 1960.
- Lawd Today*. New York: Walker, 1963.
- American Hunger*. New York: Harper & Row, 1977.

Dust jacket for Wright's first novel, in which the story of Bigger Thomas is told in three books: "Fear," "Flight," and "Fate"

Richard Wright Reader, edited by Ellen Wright and Michel Fabre. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.

Studying Richard Wright

Richard Wright's career was short but prolific: in the years between 1938 and his death in 1960 he published sixteen books, along with a wide variety of essays, poems, and reviews. The books can be grouped into three broad categories: novels and other works of fiction; autobiographies; and works of racial and social history. His most well-known and significant works fall into the first two categories and were published within a seven-year period: the short-story collection Uncle Tom's Children (1938); his masterpiece, the political and social protest novel NATIVE SON (1940); the self-reflective How "Bigger" Was Born (1940), an analysis of Native Son; and the first half of his autobiography,

Dust jacket for the second volume of Wright's autobiography, 1977, which deals with his life in the North and his involvement with Communist Party USA

BLACK BOY (1945). In each of these major works Wright engages in complex, controversial, and powerful ways with the personal, psychological, familial, political, regional, and national meanings of African American history and identity in the first half of the twentieth century. The serious student of Wright must begin with all four—as well as American Hunger (1977), the posthumously released second half of his autobiography.

The centrality of autobiography to Wright's writing throughout his career means that critical works on Wright himself are of great use to students. Kenneth Kinnamon and Michael Fabre's Conversations with Richard Wright (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1993) and Hazel Rowley's Richard Wright: The Life and Times (New York: Holt, 2001) are recommended. More textually focused biographical analyses can be found in Fabre's The Unfinished Quest of Richard Wright (New York: Morrow, 1973), Dan McCall's The Example of Richard Wright (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973), and Addison Gayle's Richard Wright: Ordeal of a Native Son (New York: Doubleday, 1980).

Excellent introductions to Wright scholarship include Henry Louis Gates Jr. and K. A. Appiah's Richard Wright: Critical Perspectives Past and Present (New York: Amistad, 1993), Robert Butler's The Critical Response to Richard Wright (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995), Robert Felgar's Student Companion to Richard Wright (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000), and Kinnamon's Richard Wright: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism and Commentary, 1983–2003 (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003). Worthwhile recent book-length studies of Wright include Yoshinobu Hakutani's Richard Wright and Racial Discourse (Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1996), M. Lynn Weiss's Gertrude Stein and Richard Wright: The Poetics and Politics of Modernism (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998), and Abdul JanMohamed's The Death-Bound Subject: Richard Wright's Archaeology of Death (Durham: Duke University Press, 2005). An on-line MLA Bibliography search for Wright yields more than thirty articles or books in the last two years alone, reflecting just how much significant work continues to be done on this major American writer.

—Ben Railton

Wylie, Elinor (1885–1928) poet, novelist

Elinor Wylie published four volumes of verse and four novels to critical praise in the 1920s. She admired Percy Bysshe Shelley and echoed his lyrical Romanticism in her poems. Her first novel, Jennifer Lorn (1923), was a satire of effete aestheticism. Shelley was the subject of two novels, The Orphan Angel (1926) and Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard (1928). Wylie died of a stroke. The posthumous verse volume Angels and Earthly Creatures (1929) is considered her finest achievement.

Source

Olson, Stanley. Elinor Wylie. A Life Apart. New York: Dial, 1979.

—David G. Izzo

Wagoner, David (1926– ) poet, novelist

The work of Ohio-born David Wagoner has been praised for its lyrical power and understated tone. He often writes about the Northwest, and his titles reflect his grounding in nature and geography. One of his major influences is Theodore ROETHKE, whose notebooks Wagoner edited and published as Straw for the Fire (1972). Wagoner received his B.A. in 1947 from Pennsylvania State University and his M.A. from Indiana University. He has been a professor of English at the University of Washington, Seattle, and editor of Poetry Northwest since 1966.

Wagoner's poetry collections include Dry Sun, Dry Wind (1953), A Place to Stand (1958), The Nesting Ground (1963), New and Selected Poems (1969), Riverbed (1972), and Sleeping in the Woods (1974). He published his Collected Poems 1956–1976 in 1976. Later collections include In Broken Country (1979), Landfall (1981), First Light (1983), Through the Forest: New and Selected Poems 1977–1987 (1987), Walt Whitman Bathing: Poems (1996), and Traveling Light: Collected and New Poems (1999). The House of Song (2002) includes one hundred new poems.

His novels tend to be set in nineteenth-century America and have been described as light in tone and picaresque. The titles suggest a whimsical sense of life as a quest for success and companionship: Money Money Money (1955), The Escape Artist (1965), Baby, Come on Inside (1968), Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight? (1970), The Road to Many a Wonder (1974), Tracker (1975), The Whole Hog (1976), and The Hanging Garden (1980). Wagoner has also published a book of poetry based on the legends of Northwest Indians, Who Shall Be the Sun? (1978).

Sources

McFarland, Ron. The World of David Wagoner. Moscow: University of Idaho Press, 1997.

Pinsker, Sanford. Three Pacific Northwest Poets: William Stafford, Richard Hugo, and David Wagoner. New York: Twayne, 1987.

Wakoski, Diane (1937– ) poet

Born in Whittier, California, Diane Wakoski began writing poetry at age seven. At the University of California at Berkeley she studied under the poets Thom Gunn and Josephine MILES. She received her B.A. in 1960. Her first poetry collection, Coins and Coffins (1962), features dramatic narrative poems in the style of what has been called CONFESSIOAL POETRY, although Wakoski dislikes the term.

The Motorcycle Betrayal Poems (1971)—her best-known work—deals thematically with failed marriages and love affairs. The book is dedicated: “to all those men who betrayed me at one time or another, in hopes they will fall off their motorcycles and break their necks.” A certain rawness pervades many of her poems—an outspoken need for sex and other sensual pleasures.

Wakoski was awarded the Poetry Society of America's William Carlos Williams Award for Emerald Ice: Selected Poems, 1962–1987 (1988). She has published more than forty books of poetry, including The George Washington Poems (1967); Dancing on the Grave of a Son of a Bitch (1973); Looking for the King of Spain (1974); and a four-volume series, Archaeology of Movies and Books: Medea the Sorceress (1991), Jason the Sailor (1993), The Emerald City of Las Vegas (1995), and Argonaut Rose (1998). She has often presented herself as the poet of places—especially of California and Las Vegas. Wakoski's nonfiction includes Creating a Personal Mythology (1975) and Toward a New Poetry (1980). Her The Butcher's Apron: New and Selected Poems, Including "Greed: Part 14" was published in 2000.

Source

Newton, Robert. Diane Wakoski: A Descriptive Bibliography. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1987.

A Walk on the Wild Side by Nelson Algren (New York: Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1956) novel

A Walk on the Wild Side was a novel Nelson Algren did not intend to write. Following the success of The Man with the Golden Arm (1949), Algren was asked for permission to reprint his first book, the proletarian novel Somebody in Boots (1935). He agreed on the condition that he be allowed to make changes—changes that grew so extensive that the result was an entirely new work of fiction. With the removal of the overt Marxism, the story became a picaresque tragicomedy—as comically serious and emotionally complex as anything Algren wrote, despite his contention that he was after a “reader’s book,” in which one must always seek first to amuse.

The novel’s protagonist is Dove Linkhorn, an innocent in the manner of Mark Twain’s Huck Finn: a comic figure trapped in a tragic, often terrible world. “I don’t know what kind of great I’m bound to be,” Dove declares, “all I know for certain is I’m a born world-shaker.” Poor and uneducated, Dove leaves his hardscrabble life in Texas during the early years of the Depression for a life on the road before arriving in New Orleans, where he finds employment as a door-to-door salesman, a manufacturer of Daddy-O condoms, and a performer in a sexual peep show. Throughout, Dove’s story is interrupted by detailed biographies of minor characters, quick sketches of grifters and mental “defectives,” and lengthy descriptions of the brothel in which Dove works and of the jail in which he is eventually incarcerated.

A burlesque of the American Dream, A Walk on the Wild Side reveals the wages of ignorance and poverty, violence and depravity. Although reviewers in the mid 1950s found Algren’s politics, style, and subject matter out of step with COLD WAR America, the novel appeared on The New York Times best-seller list for fifteen weeks. Algren thought A Walk on the Wild Side his best novel, and it remains, along with The Man with the Golden Arm, the work for which he is best remembered.

Source

Horvath, Brooke. “A Walk on the Wild Side,” in Understanding Nelson Algren. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005, pp. 98–113.

—Brooke Horvath

Walker, Alice (1944– ) poet, novelist, short-story writer, biographer

Well, us talk and talk bout God, but I still adrift. Trying to chase that old white man out of my head. I been so busy thinking bout him I never truly notice nothing God make. Not a blade of corn (how it do that?) not the color purple (where it come from?). Not the little wildflowers. . . . You have to git man off your eyeball, before you can see anything a’tall.

—The Color Purple (1982)

Walker was born in Eatonton, Georgia. A childhood accident in which her right eye was scarred by a BB pellet drove her into a reticence relieved only by her omnivorous reading, especially her love of poetry. She graduated from high school as valedictorian and went on first to Spellman College and then to Sarah Lawrence, where she received a B.A. in 1965. She visited Africa after her junior year, became pregnant, and, feeling suicidal, had an abortion, an experience she wrote about in her first collection of poems, Once (1968). She overcame her despair and wrote a short story, “To Hell with Dying” (1967), which was published as a children’s book in 1988.

Alice Walker

Dust jacket for Walker's first novel, 1970

After graduation from college, Walker became actively involved in the civil rights struggle. She taught in Mississippi at Jackson State College (1968–1969) and Tougaloo College (1970–1971). She published Five Poems (1972), her second book of poetry, and her first novel, The Third Life of Grange Copeland (1970), a dark tale of self-conflicted African Americans and their struggle with oppression. She expressed her growing identification with the plight of black women in a collection of short fiction, In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women (1973). Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems (1973) won the Lillian Smith Award of the Southern Regional Council. In 1974 Walker published a biography for children: Langston Hughes, American Poet.

Meridian (1976), Walker's second novel, has been called a "woman-centered" perspective on the civil rights movement. It concentrates on African American mothers and clearly grows out of Walker's struggle with her own first pregnancy. Through anthologies of African American writing and by creating her own company, Wild Tree Press, Walker encouraged new writers while also teaching women's studies at Wellesley College, Brandeis University, Yale, and the University of California at Berkeley. Walker came to national attention with her novel THE COLOR PURPLE (1982), the story of Celia, who overcomes a rape and oppression by African American men. The novel won a Pulitzer Prize and a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and was made into a major motion picture directed by Steven Spielberg. At the same time Walker became a focal point for the ire of African American men—including Ishmael REED—who believed her depiction of them was biased and demeaning.

Walker published a memoir, In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens (1983), which reiterated her commitment to black feminism while emphasizing her dedication to the renewal of an entire people. Her next two novels, The Temple of My Familiar (1989) and Possessing the Secret of Joy (1992), received negative criticism from reviewers, who regarded her work as too ideological and didactic. She addressed this criticism in The Same River Twice (1996), acknowledging the painfulness of the attacks on her. Her subsequent novels are By the Light of My Father's Smile (1998), The Way Forward Is with a Broken Heart (2000), and Now Is the Time to Open Your Heart (2004).

Dust jacket for Walker's 1982 novel, which won the American Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction

Walker's Complete Stories appeared in 1994, Living by the Word: Selected Writings, 1973–1987 in 1988, Warrior Marks: Female Genital Mutilation and the Sexual Blinding of Women (with Pratibha Parmar) in 1993, and Anything We Love Can Be Saved: A Writer's Activism in 1997.

Principal Books by Walker

Once: Poems. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1968.
The Third Life of Grange Copeland. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1970.
In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973.
Langston Hughes: American Poet. New York: Crowell, 1974.

Meridian. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1976.
Good Night, Willie Lee, I'll See You in the Morning. New York: Dial, 1979.
You Can't Keep a Good Woman Down. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1981.
The Color Purple. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982.
In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983.
Horses Make a Landscape Look More Beautiful: Poems. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984.
Living by the Word: Selected Writings, 1973–1987. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1988.
To Hell with Dying. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1988.
The Temple of My Familiar. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1989.

Complete Poems: Her Blue Body Everything We Know: Earthling Poems, 1965–1990. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1991.

Finding the Green Stone. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1991.

Possessing the Secret of Joy. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1992.

Warrior Marks: Female Genital Mutilation and the Sexual Blinding of Women, by Walker and Pratibha Parmar. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1993.

The Complete Stories. London: Women's Press, 1994.

The Same River Twice: Honoring the Difficult: A Meditation on Life, Spirit, Art, and the Making of the Film, The Color Purple, Ten Years Later. New York: Scribners, 1996.

Anything We Love Can Be Saved: A Writer's Activism. New York: Random House, 1997.

By the Light of My Father's Smile: A Novel. New York: Random House, 1998.

The Way Forward Is with a Broken Heart. New York: Random House, 2000.

In Love and Trouble: Stories of Black Women. Orlando, Fla.: Harcourt, 2001.

Now Is the Time to Open Your Heart: A Novel. New York: Random House, 2004.

We Are the Ones We Have Been Waiting For: Inner Light in a Time of Darkness. New York: New Press, 2006.

—Marshall Boswell

Studying Alice Walker

Alice Walker's most important work is the novel THE COLOR PURPLE (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982), which won both the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and the Pulitzer Prize. Alice Walker's The Color Purple, edited by Harold Bloom (New York: Chelsea House, 2000), presents twelve essays on race, gender, nationality, epistolary form, and other key topics related to this novel. All of Walker's early short stories, including the seminal "Everyday Use," are available in The Complete Stories (1994).

The first biography of Walker is Alice Walker: A Life by Evelyn C. White (New York: Norton, 2004), which is thorough in its coverage and emphasizes the ways in which growing up in Mississippi during the civil rights era shaped Walker's life and writing. Early in her career Walker's writing was heavily influenced by her political activism and her interest in African American women writers, particularly Zora Neale Hurston. Walker has spent considerable effort examining these issues from her own perspective. The Same River Twice (1996) is a scrapbook of Walker's thoughts on writing, history, activism, and the making of the movie version of The Color Purple (Warner Bros., 1985). It includes journal entries, letters, and personal essays. Two other books, In Search of Our Mothers Gardens (1983) and We Are the Ones We Have Been Waiting For (2006), are similar in format and scope, and the latter includes several essays based on public lectures given by Walker.

Dust jacket for Walker's fourth novel, 1989, which she called a romance of the past five hundred thousand years

For a complete bibliography of Walker's early career, see Alice Walker: An Annotated Bibliography 1968–1986 by Erma Davis Banks and Keith Byerman (New York: Garland, 1989). There is no up-to-date bibliography available. For current bibliography, students should consult the annual MLA bibliographies.

Walker's article "In Search Of Zora Neale Hurston" (Ms. Magazine, March 1975) is widely credited for resurrecting Hurston as a literary figure. As a result, Walker has become closely associated with Hurston. For more on the relationship between the two, see Alice Walker and Zora Neale Hurston: The Common Bond, edited by Lillie P. Howard (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993). For a general overview of Walker and her writing, see Gerri Bates's Alice Walker: A Critical Companion (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2005), which provides substantial biographical information as well as literary analysis of all of Walker's major works to 2004. Additional book-length critical texts are Maria Lauret's Alice Walker (New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000) and Donna Haisty Winchell's Alice Walker (New York: Twayne, 1992).

There is an abundance of scholarly essays on Walker and her writings. Alice Walker: Critical Perspectives Past and Present, edited by Henry Louis Gates and K. A. Appiah (New York: Amistad, 1993), is the first major collection of essays. Critical Essays on Alice Walker, edited by Ikenna Dieke (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999) collects seventeen essays on sexuality, masculinity, comedy, deracination, and historical context in Walker's work.

—Student Guide by Darien Cavanaugh

Walker, Margaret (1915–1998) poet, novelist, essayist
Margaret Walker was born in Birmingham, Alabama, and grew up in a middle-class family that moved to New Orleans in 1925. She finished high school at age fourteen and went on to two years of college at New Orleans University (now Dillard University). At an early age she met important African American writers such as W. E. B. Du Bois and Langston Hughes, who read her poetry and encouraged her to attend Northwestern University. Her first poems were published in Crisis magazine in 1934, and she graduated from Northwestern in 1935. Walker earned her M.A. in 1940 and her Ph.D. in 1965, both from the University of Iowa.

Walker worked for the Works Progress Administration during the Great Depression. As part of the Writers' Project she worked on a guide for the state of Illinois. She developed slowly as a writer, completing an unpublished novel, "Goose Island," and a collection of poetry, For My People (1942), which was chosen as the winner of the Yale Younger Poets Series Award.

Walker's greatest contribution to African American literature came with the publication of Jubilee (1966), her epic novel about slavery. The book was based on her maternal grandmother's stories, and it exhibited Walker's command of history. She followed this success with a new volume of poetry, Prophets for a New Day (1970). In 1972 she published her dissertation, How I Wrote Jubilee. October Journey, another poetry collection, was published in 1973. In 1987 Walker published the long-awaited biography Richard Wright: Daemonic Genius, and, in 1989, her This Is My Century: New and Collected Poems. She spent much of her time teaching, holding a thirty-year tenure at Jackson State College in Mississippi.

Sources

Giovanni, Nikki. A Poetic Equation: Conversations between Nikki Giovanni and Margaret Walker. Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1974.

Graham, Maryemma, ed. Fields Watered with Blood: Critical Essays on Margaret Walker. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

Wallace, David Foster (1962– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

. . . most kinds of "low" art—which just means art whose primary aim is to make money—is lucrative precisely because it recognizes that audiences prefer 100 percent pleasure to . . . 49 percent pleasure and 51 percent pain. Whereas "serious" art . . . is more apt to make you uncomfortable, or to force you to work hard to access its pleasures, the same way that in real life true pleasure is usually a by-product of hard work and discomfort.

—Interview (1993)

Since publication of his first novel, David Foster Wallace has emerged as one of the most influential and controversial writers of the post-WORLD WAR II generation. Best known for his 1,096-page novel INFINITE JEST (1996), Wallace is also both renowned and derided for his complex and ornate prose, which mixes technical erudition and pop-culture goofiness, all situated amid a welter of footnotes, endnotes, abbreviations, and specialized jargon. His work paradoxically employs the techniques and strategies of METAFICTION in order to move beyond self-consciousness, irony, and parody.

Wallace was born in Ithaca, New York, and moved with his family to Illinois several years later. He soon distinguished himself as a "near great" junior tennis player but abandoned his athletic ambitions in high school when he discovered a similarly prodigious mathematical ability. He studied mathematics and philosophy at the University of Amherst, but he broke off his studies after his sophomore year and returned to Illinois, where he began writing a novel. He completed the book upon his return to Amherst, and, after graduating in 1985, he enrolled in the graduate writing program at the University of Arizona. While in Arizona, he met novelist Robert BOSWELL, who helped him locate an agent for his manuscript, now titled The Broom of the System (1987). The book was elaborately plotted, comic, and addressed such arcane subjects as entropy, information theory, and the ideas of twentieth-century philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein.

In 1989 he published a book of short stories, Girl with Curious Hair, in which fictional characters mingle with real-life figures and celebrities such as David Letterman, Pat Sajak, Alex Trebek, Merv Griffin, and President Lyndon B. Johnson. The stories explore the fluid boundary between reality and representation. The book concludes with a novella, "Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way," set partially in a creative-writing workshop where the instructor, Professor Ambrose, clearly represents John BARTH, and whose star student, an archery champion named Mark Nechtr, is “a boy hotly cocky enough to think he might someday inherit Ambrose’s bald crown and ballpoint scepter. . . .”

Infinite Jest, which appeared seven years later, has become one of the most celebrated novels of the 1990s, spawning book-length studies, websites, and a cult following. In many ways the novel confirms the agenda the character Mark Nechtr proposed in “Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way.” Set in a near future in which calendar years are marked by corporate sponsors rather than numbers, Infinite Jest blends technical jargon, futuristic slang, drug- and pop-culture erudition, and surreal (even grotesque) comedy.

After Infinite Jest, Wallace concentrated on short fiction. His two short-story collections, Brief Interviews with Hideous Men (1999) and Oblivion (2004), have succeeded in deepening his engagement with his characteristic themes of solipsism, loneliness, and popular culture, while at the same time forestalling a full assessment of his overall significance. He has also published two collections of essays, A Supposedly Fun Thing I’ll Never Do Again (1997) and Consider the Lobster (2005), in which he addresses the major themes and obsessions of his fiction in a lighter, more accessible way.

Sources

Boswell, Marshall. Understanding David Foster Wallace. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

Burn, Stephen. Wallace’s Infinite Jest: A Reader’s Guide. New York: Continuum, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Wallace Markfield (1926–2002) novelist

Wallace Markfield was born in Brooklyn and graduated from Brooklyn College. His literary career was launched with a brilliant first novel, To an Early Grave (1964), a satirical work about literary politics. The humor has a quality of hurt or pain; Markfield once remarked that he did not learn “aggravation” was not a Yiddish word until he was an adult. After publishing two more well-received novels—Teitelbaum’s Window (1971) and You Could Live If They Let You (1974), the latter about a stand-up comedian—Markfield stopped publishing fiction until Radical Surgery (1991), a political thriller that received little attention. Wallace Markfield is classed with the disappointments of American literature: writers who showed marked promise and aroused strong expectations but gave up or burned out too soon.

—Morris Colden

Sources

Review of Contemporary Fiction, Markfield issue (Spring 1982).

Irvin Faust, “Wallace Markfield: A Tribute and a Farewell,” Dictionary of Literary Biography Yearbook: 2002, pp. 440–442. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale, 2003.

Wallant, Edward Lewis (1926–1962)

novelist

Born in New Haven, Connecticut, Edward Lewis Wallant is best known as the author of the novel The Pawnbroker (1961), which dramatizes the life of a concentration-camp survivor.

After graduating from high school in 1944 Wallant attended the University of Connecticut for a semester before entering the navy during WORLD WAR II. He spent another semester at the University of Connecticut in 1946 and then studied drafting at the Platt Institute. After graduating in 1950 Wallant began a career as a commercial artist. That year he also began taking creative-writing classes, and by 1955 he had published his first story, “I Held Back My Hand,” in an anthology edited by one of his mentors. His first novel, The Human Season, appeared in 1960. This award-winning novel was followed by Wallant’s The Pawnbroker, which earned him a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1962 and allowed him to resign from his job to become a full-time writer; however, Wallant died shortly thereafter. Two other novels, The Tenants of Moonbloom (1963) and The Children at the Gate (1964), were published posthumously.

Source

Galloway, David. Edward Lewis Wallant. Boston: Twayne, 1979.

Wasserstein, Wendy (1950–2006) playwright,

essayist

Wendy Wasserstein is best known as a playwright who examines the conflict of baby-boom women torn between the traditional values of their mothers and the more progressive world of the feminist movement. Born in Brooklyn, New York, Wasserstein received her B.A. in 1971 from Mount Holyoke College, her M.A. in 1973 from City College of the City University of New York, and her M.F.A. in 1976 from Yale University. Her most recognized plays—Uncommon Women and Others (produced 1977), Isn’t It Romantic (produced 1981), and The Heidi Chronicles (produced 1988)—each present Wasserstein’s trademark female characters managing the struggle between feminism and traditional female roles in a dramatic atmosphere balanced by seriousness and humor. In 1989 Wasserstein won the Pulitzer Prize for The Heidi Chronicles, which highlights the fictional life and times of art history professor Dr. Heidi Holland, who—like Wasserstein herself—comes of age in the late 1960s and begins to see a fissure in her generation’s activist identity. Although she is best known for her plays, Wasserstein also wrote several nonfiction books, including Bachelor Girls (1990) and Shiksa Goddess; or, How I Spent My Forties: Essays (2001). Her only novel, The Elements of Style (2006), is about the response of wealthy New Yorkers to the 9/11 tragedy.

—Marshall Boswell

Waters, Frank (1902–1995) novelist

Colorado-born Frank Waters studied engineering at Colorado College but left before taking a degree. He published his first book, Fever Pitch, in 1930. (The book was later published under its original title, The Lizard Woman [1984].) Waters has centered virtually all of his work—more than twenty books—in the West and Southwest, exploring the lives of Native Americans, miners, and hunters, and the interrelationships of these peoples. He published a trilogy about a young man's career in mining: Wild Earth's Nobility (1935), Below Grass Roots (1937), and Dust within the Rock (1940). His novels centering on Native American life include The Man Who Killed the Deer (1942) and Flight from Fiesta (1986).

Waters wrote several nonfiction books that complement his fiction: The Colorado (1946); Book of the Hopi (1963); and Mountain Dialogues (1981), a collection of reminiscences. He also took a special interest in Mexico, which serves as the setting for his novel The Yogi of Cockroach Court (1947), and as the subject of his history, Mexico Mystique (1975).

Sources

Blackburn, Alexander. A Sunrise Brighter Still: The Visionary Novels of Frank Waters. Athens: Swallow Press/Ohio University Press, 1991.

Deloria, Vine, Jr., ed. Frank Waters: Man and Mystic. Athens: Swallow Press/Ohio University Press, 1993.

The Waters of Kronos by Conrad Richter (New York: Knopf, 1960) novel

Winner of the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, this novel was the first volume of an autobiographical trilogy Conrad Richter did not live to complete. The Waters of Kronos is a story about the aging writer John Donner (Richter) who comes back to the East to find his boyhood home under the waters of a dammed-up Kronos River. Magically borne back into the past, Donner experiences again his boyhood, his parents and ancestors, and the world the waters have covered over. The second novel of the trilogy, A Simple Honorable Man (1962), is a loving portrait of Richter's father, who at thirty-eight sold his store and became a Lutheran minister. Going from town to town in rural Pennsylvania, often accompanied by his son John, Harry Donner lives a life of honor and sacrifice that Richter eloquently portrays.

—Marvin J. LaHood

Watts, Alan (1915–1973) religion writer

Alan Watts was born in England, settled in the United States in 1938, and became a U.S. citizen in 1943. After completing high school in Canterbury with honors, he went to work for his father. Having discovered an affinity for Zen at a young age, Watts was publishing articles on religion by the time he was nineteen years old. When he was twenty-one, he met two of his mentors, Krishnamurti and D. T. Suzuki, and the same year Watts published his first book, The Spirit of Zen (1936). The work was the first to bring Asian thought to the West, and it synthesized Eastern and Western philosophy in a way that was accessible to laymen. His later publications include Behold the Spirit (1947) and The Way of Zen (1957); the latter secured a cult following for Watts. Although Watts in some ways criticized the BEATS, his name is often associated with them because he wrote and lectured widely on the subject of Zen Buddhism and because he experimented with hallucinogenic drugs. In his essay Beat Zen, Square Zen and Zen (1959) Watts dismisses the Beat as a “fake-intellectual hipster searching for kicks, name-dropping bits of Zen”; however, he held high regard for his friend Gary SNYDER, and for Allen GINSBERG, whom Watts calls a “rabbinic sadhu” in his autobiography, In My Own Way (1972).

Sources

Furlong, Monica. Genuine Fake: A Biography of Alan Watts. London: Heinemann, 1986.

Stuart, David. Alan Watts. Radnor, Pa.: Chilton, 1976.

Welch, James (1940–2003) poet, novelist

James Welch was born on the Blackfoot Indian reservation in Browning, Montana, the son of James P. Welch Sr., a Blackfoot, and Rosella O'Bryan Welch, a Gros Ventre Indian. Although the young Welch attended reservation schools, he graduated from high school in Minneapolis and earned his B.A. in 1965 from the University of Montana in Missoula. As a student in the M.F.A. program at the university Welch studied under Richard HUGO. Welch's first book, Riding the Earthboy 40 (1971), is a collection of fifty-four poems about a family named Earthboy who lives on a forty-acre ranch. The poems reflect a deep feeling for the land and the spirits that inspire its inhabitants. Welch attracted national attention with his novel Winter in the Blood (1974), which, like Welch's poetry, evokes the spirits of Indian ancestors.

Welch's The Death of Jim Loney (1979) examines the life of the despairing Jim Loney, who actively seeks his own death. Fools Crow (1986) is a powerful historical novel about the Blackfoot tribe. The Indian Lawyer (1990) is about an Indian who earns a partnership in a prestigious law firm. Welch is also the author of Killing Custer (1994), an historical account of the events leading up to General George Armstrong Custer's death at Little Big Horn and the aftermath of his battle with the Sioux.

Sources

Lupton, Mary Jane. James Welch: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2004.

McFarland, Ron. Understanding James Welch. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

West, Jessamyn (1902–1984) novelist, short-story writer

Eliza was a fine woman, pious and work-brickel and good-looking as female preachers are apt to be: a little, black-haired, glossy woman with a mind of her own.
—The Friendly Persuasion (1945)

Jessamyn West was born in Indiana but settled in California, where she attended Whittier College. She received an A.B. in 1923 and then studied at Oxford University. Upon her return to the United States, West began graduate school at the University of California at Berkeley, but she was forced to withdraw when she was hospitalized with tuberculosis. During her two-year confinement at a sanatorium, West drew on stories her mother had told her about their ancestors and began to write about the Birdwell family, Quaker farmers living in rural Indiana. By the time she had fully recovered from her illness, she was publishing stories in Harper's, Atlantic Monthly, and Ladies' Home Journal. In 1945 West published her first book, The Friendly Persuasion, a novelistic collection of some of the stories she had written while convalescing. West's third book, the novel The Witch Diggers (1951), also explores life on an Indiana farm in the 1890s.

West changed settings to California in her Cress Delahanty (1953), a collection of short stories that repeated the novelistic trait of Friendly Persuasion. South of the Angels (1960) maintained the California setting, portraying the lives of settlers on the Tract outside of Los Angeles in the mid 1920s. Many of West's later novels, such as Leafy Rivers (1967) and The Massacre at Fall Creek (1975), are set in the Midwest and deal with Native Americans and the settling of the land in the nineteenth century. Other story collections include Love, Death, and the Ladies' Drill Team (1955) and Crimson Ramblers of the World, Farewell (1970).

West published two autobiographies, Hide and Seek (1973), about a three-month stay in a trailer in the wilderness of Colorado, and The Woman Said Yes (1976), an examination of life, death, and euthanasia based on the conversations West had with her terminally ill sister.

Sources

Farmer, Ann Dahlstrom. Jessamyn West. Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1982.

Shivers, Alfred S. Jessamyn West: Revised Edition. New York: Twayne, 1992.

Whalen, Philip (1923–2002) poet

Born in Oregon, Philip Whalen was drafted into the U.S. Army Air Corps in 1941, and he spent three years as an instructor of radio operation and maintenance. After his discharge he augmented an earlier interest in poetry by reading and writing during his free time, and he published his first book of poems, Three Satires, in 1951, the same year he graduated with a B.A. from Reed College. While he was a student at Reed, Whalen studied calligraphy. His interest in fonts and especially in spacing between words is evident in his work, which is often presented in unusual typefaces.

Whalen is associated with the BEATS, and particularly members of the San Francisco Poetry Renaissance, along with his Reed College friends Gary SNYDER and Lew Welch. Whalen was ordained as a Zen Buddhist priest in 1973. He published more than twenty books of poetry, including Self-Decompressions: Selected Poems (1978), Enough Said: Fluctuat Nec Mergitur: Poems 1974–1979 (1980), and Heavy Breathing: Poems, 1967–1980 (1983). He has also published three novels, You Didn't Even Try (1967), Imaginary Speeches for a Brazen Head (1972), and The Diamond Noodle (1979).

Sources

Kherdian, David. Six Poets of the San Francisco Renaissance: Portraits and Checklists. Fresno, Calif.: Giligia Press, 1967.

Suiter, John. Poets on the Peaks: Gary Snyder, Philip Whalen & Jack Kerouac in the North Cascades. Washington, D.C.: Counterpoint, 2002.

White, Edmund (1940– ) novelist, playwright, biographer

Edmund White was born in Cincinnati and grew up in Texas. He was educated at the Cranbrook Academy in Michigan and at the University of Michigan, where he earned his B.A. in Chinese in 1962. He identified himself as homosexual at an early age. His writing career has coincided with the gay rights movement, making White a spokesman of sorts for the gay white male in America for almost forty years.

White worked at Time magazine in 1969 and then worked as an editor at The Saturday Review from 1972 to 1973. His first novel, Forgetting Elena (1973), was widely reviewed and praised by such writers as Vladimir NABOKOV, one of White's influences. Between 1977 and 1979 White taught creative writing at Johns Hopkins, Columbia, and other universities. His second novel, the autobiographical A Boy's Own Story (1982), established his reputation in the United States and in England. The novel is one of the key works of GAY AND LESBIAN LITERATURE, as is the sequel, Beautiful Room Is Empty (1988), and the last part of this autobiographical trilogy, The Farewell Symphony (1997). White's other novels include Caracole (1985), The Married Man (2000), and Fanny: A Fiction (2003). Skinny Alive: Stories was published in 1995.

White has written essays, included in The Burning Library (1994), and two biographies, Genet (1993) and Marcel Proust (1999). White published his memoirs, My Lives, in 2006.

Source

Barber, Stephen. Edmund White: The Burning World. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.

White Noise by Don DeLillo (New York: Viking, 1985)
novel

DON DELILLO's eighth novel, White Noise, is an examination of life in America at the end of the twentieth century. The narrator is Jack Gladney, a professor of Hitler Studies at a small Midwestern liberal arts college. Jack and his wife, Babette, live in cheerful chaos with their children from various past marriages. Babette begins displaying disturbing evidence of memory loss around the same time that a mysterious chemical cloud, referred to as the Airborne Toxic Event, descends upon the community. The shapelessness of the cloud discloses in Jack a terrifying fear of death, which the white noise of contemporary life—the endless aural blanket of piped in Muzak, television commercials, and radio broadcasts—has previously hidden.

The novel consists primarily of a series of short, finely observed vignettes that serve as platforms for DeLillo to comment on contemporary life and the degree to which people's access to reality has been displaced by layers of mediation, such as television and mass entertainment. One of the most celebrated sequences occurs early in the novel when Jack and his colleague, Murray Siskind, visit an attraction called The Most Photographed Barn in the World.

White Noise won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD and has since become a touchstone book for younger Postmodern novelists, such as David Foster WALLACE, Jonathan FRANZEN, and Rick MOODY.

Sources

DeLillo, Don. White Noise: Text and Criticism, edited by Mark Osteen. New York: Penguin, 1998.

Lentricchia, Frank, ed. New Essays on White Noise. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Orr, Leonard. Don DeLillo's White Noise: A Reader's Guide. New York: Continuum, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

White, Theodore H. (1915–1986) journalist

Theodore H. White graduated with an A.B. from Harvard in 1938 and went to work for Time magazine, becoming its bureau chief in China between 1939 and 1945. He correctly predicted that the Chinese Communists would take power after WORLD WAR II and thus came into conflict with the magazine's owner, Henry Luce, a staunch support of Chiang Kai-shek, the Nationalist leader who eventually fled to Taiwan. He left Time and later worked as European correspondent for the New Republic, Reporter, and Collier's magazines. Although White wrote fiction about his experiences in China and in World War II, it was his groundbreaking account of the 1960 presidential election that won him fame. The Making of the President 1960 (1961), which won a Pulitzer Prize, brought a novelistic style and personal observation to coverage of a presidential campaign. White used the technique in subsequent books, including in The Making of the President series accounts of the 1964, 1968, and 1972 campaigns, but it was his first that remained a landmark. In Search of History (1978) is a memoir of his career.

Source

Hoffmann, Joyce. Theodore H. White and Journalism as Illusion. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1995.

Whitehead, Colson (1969– ) novelist, essayist

Born in New York, Colson Whitehead has come to be regarded among the vanguard of Generation X writers. He graduated from Harvard in 1991 and worked for several years as a television critic for Village Voice. His first novel, The Intuitionist (1999), blends allegorical surrealism with various conventions borrowed from detective fiction to tell the politically charged story of Lila Mae Watson, a black elevator inspector and Intuitionist, and her rival white elevator inspectors, the Empiricists. The novel was a finalist for the Hemingway/PEN Award for First Fiction. John Henry Days (2001) is an ambitious work that addresses folk hero John Henry against the backdrop of modern-day pop culture, and Apex Hides the Hurt (2006), another politically charged novel is about an African American “nomenclature consultant.” The Colossus of New York: A City in 13 Parts (2003), a stylized portrait of the city in various voices, is Whitehead's first volume of nonfiction.

—Marshall Boswell

Whittemore, Reed (1919– ) poet, biographer, critic

Reed Whittemore graduated with a B.A. from Yale University in 1941; after serving in WORLD WAR II, he took additional courses at Princeton during the 1945–1946 school year. He has taught at several colleges and universities, including Carlton College in Minnesota and the University of Maryland. Whittemore has been highly praised for his light and witty verse, collected in such volumes as An American Takes a Walk (1956) and The Self-Made Man (1959). Honored as the Poetry Consultant to the Library of Congress from 1964 to 1965, Whittemore published his Poems, New and Selected in 1967. He also published a well-received biography, William Carlos Williams: Poet from New Jersey (1975), and two books on the history and nature of biography from ancient times to the present: Pure Lives: The Early Biographers (1988) and Whole Lives: Shapers of Modern Biography (1989). The Poet as Journalist (1976) collects his essays and reviews.

Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? by Edward Albee
(produced 1962) play

Edward ALBEE's sixth produced play, his first on Broadway, raises issues about American marriage, middle-class life, and middle age. The play opened on October 13, 1962, and ran for 644 performances.

Martha, the daughter of a college president, is married to George, a history professor who has failed to fulfill her ambitious hopes for him. As George and Martha taunt each other, she sings, "Who's afraid of Virginia Woolf?" Martha thinks her song is clever; George is unaffected by it. The line is repeated by various characters including George, who reacts sarcastically to Martha trying to "shame [him] into a sense of humor."

Throughout the play George and Martha lacerate one another, each highlighting the other's faults in front of a newly hired young professor and his wife, whom they have invited for a nightcap. The guests, Nick and Honey, soon become a part of the "fun and games." The savage drama of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? is mitigated by moments when George and Martha feel compassion for each other. The play won six Tony Awards, including Best Play, and the National Drama Critics Circle Award in 1963.

Sources

- Albee, Edward. Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? New York: Atheneum, 1962.
- Bottoms, Stephen J. Albee: Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Roudané, Matthew C. Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?: Necessary Fictions, Terrifying Realities. Boston: Twayne, 1990.
- Marshall Boswell

Wideman, John Edgar (1941– ) novelist

John Edgar Wideman was born in Washington, D.C. A star athlete and a scholar, he graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1963 with a B.A. in English and subsequently studied at Oxford University on a Rhodes scholarship. He was the first African American to win the scholarship since Alain Locke more than fifty years earlier. Wideman has taught at several colleges, most notably as professor of English at the University of Massachusetts.

Wideman published his first novel, A Glance Away, in 1967. It tells the story of a black drug addict in recovery and a white homosexual English professor who interact and help one another cope with their situations. The search for a usable past is the search for roots—a point made in Wideman's next novel, Hurry Home (1970). The Lynchers (1973) extends this theme to a story dominated by black characters in the inner city. Published as The Homewood Trilogy in 1985, Damballah (1981), Hiding Place (1981), and Sent for You Yesterday (1983) recast the same themes in terms of a family saga extending over five generations. Stories are told and retold in a loosely structured way that has been compared to folklore and to jazz. Philadelphia Fire (1990) is the fictional account of the 1985 police bombing of a radical African American group, MOVE. The novel is Wideman's most searching and challenging exploration of African American urban life, integration, and urbanization. The Cattle Killing (1996), partially set in Africa, and Two Cities (1998) read like codas to Philadelphia Fire because they revisit the intersection between racist ideology and the urge toward self-destruction. These novels present blacks as benefactors and whites as oppressors. Wideman exhibits a concern for the urgency of the plight of African Americans, but he also recognizes the need to treat suffering with compassion and imagination.

Wideman also has written nonfiction on the topics he has covered in his novels. His memoir, Brothers and Keepers, appeared in 1984; Fatheralong: A Meditation on Fathers and Sons, Race and Society, in 1994. Later story collections include The Stories of John Edgar Wideman (1992) and God's Gym (2005).

Sources

- Coleman, James W. Blackness and Modernism: The Literary Career of John Edgar Wideman. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989.
- Mbalia, Doreatha D. John Edgar Wideman: Reclaiming the African Personality. London: Associated University Presses, 1995.
- TuSmith, Bonnie, and Keith E. Byerman, eds. Critical Essays on John Edgar Wideman. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006.

Wieners, John (1934–2002) poet, playwright

Born in Boston, John Wieners graduated with an A.B. from Boston College in 1954. Encouraged by Charles OLSON, Wieners enrolled at Black Mountain College in 1955, where he became associated with the BLACK MOUNTAIN POETS, particularly Olson and Robert DUNCAN. In the late 1950s Wieners went to San Francisco and became part of the BEAT scene, which he described vividly in The Hotel Wentley Poems (1958). His second book, Ace of Pentacles, appeared in 1964. He turned to Christian symbolism with Pressed Wafer (1967). Wieners wrote eighteen poems while he was in a mental hospital, a collection published as Asylum Poems (For My Father) (1969) and later incorporated into Nerves (1970)—considered by many critics to be his best collection. The Journal of John Wieners Is to Be Called 707 Scott Street for Billie Holiday, 1959 appeared in 1996.

Wilbur, Richard (1921– ) poet, translator

The writing may take years, and I cross out a great deal; but however hard I work, the process is experienced as passive. The words find their form.

—Interview (2004)

Richard Wilbur grew up in rural New Jersey. The son of the artist Lawrence Wilbur, he attended Amherst College and served in the U.S. Army during WORLD WAR II. Wilbur continued his education after the war and graduated from Harvard in 1947, teaching there until 1954. Since then he has held teaching posts at Wellesley, Wesleyan, and Smith.

The Beautiful Changes and Other Poems (1947), Wilbur's first book of poetry, reflects his traditionalist approach. He has been largely immune to fashions in poetry, and he has not been influenced much by contemporaries in the BEAT or CONFESSIOAL schools. His poetry reflects a deep feeling for nature that stems from his childhood experiences. Wilbur's work is grounded in history, based on his command of French and other European texts. Things of This World (1956) won both a Pulitzer Prize and a NATIONAL BOOK AWARD. Years later Wilbur was awarded another Pulitzer Prize, for his New and Collected Poems (1988). He served as POET LAUREATE of the United States from 1987 to 1988.

Wilbur has also earned respect as a translator—notably, of Molière's plays The Misanthrope (1666; translated 1955) and Tartuffe (1669; translated 1963). Wilbur's nonfiction includes Responses: Prose Pieces 1953–1976 (1976), On My Own Work (1983), and The Cat Bird's Song: Prose Pieces 1963–1995 (1997). Mayflies: New Poems and Translations was published in 2000. Six years later, at the age of eighty-five, Wilbur won the Ruth Lilly Poetry Prize.

Sources

Butts, William, ed. Conversations with Richard Wilbur. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990.

Hougen, John. B. Ecstasy Within Discipline: The Poetry of Richard Wilbur. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995.

Williams, John A. (1925– ) novelist, biographer

John A. Williams was born in Mississippi and grew up in Syracuse, New York. He served in the Navy during WORLD WAR II. His novel The Angry Ones (1960), written while he was working as a publisher's assistant in New York City, deals thematically with death and racial tension. Williams achieved considerable attention with The Man Who Cried I Am (1967), the fictional autobiography of a dying African American writer. Sons of Darkness, Sons of Light (1969) probes racial conflict in New York City. Captain Blackman (1972) examines the life of an African American World War II veteran as he is scouting in Vietnam during the VIETNAM WAR. !Click Song (1982) returns to Williams's theme of the conflicts inherent in becoming an African American writer. Jacob's Ladder (1987) deals with the politics of West Africa and its relationship to African Americans. Clifford's Blues (1998) deals with the Holocaust and African American identity.

Williams published his biography of Martin Luther King Jr., The King God Didn't Save, in 1970, and his biography of Richard Wright, The Most Native of Sons, in the same year. He writes about his travels as an African American in the United States in This Is My Country Too (1965). In 1991 he published a biography of the comedian Richard Pryor, If I Stop I'll Die: The Comedy and Tragedy of Richard Pryor.

Sources

Cash, Earl A. John A. Williams: The Evolution of a Black Writer. New York: Third Press, 1975.

Muller, Gilbert H. John A. Williams. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Williams, Joy (1944– ) novelist, short-story writer, essayist

I write out of a sense of guilt. I believe in guilt. There's not enough guilt around these days for my taste.

—"Shifting Things," The Writer on Her Work (1991)

Joy Williams was born in Massachusetts and grew up in Maine as an only child. Both her father and her grandfather were Congregationalist ministers, and Williams developed a fascination with the stories of the Bible that fueled her desire to write. She graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Marietta College and received her M.F.A. from the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP in 1965. Williams pursued a brief career as a researcher and data analyst at the U.S. Navy Marine Laboratory in Siesta Key, Florida. She left that post in 1969 with a strong concern for ecological and environmental issues and a love for the Florida Keys, interests that shaped her writing.

Williams is the author of four novels, three collections of short stories, and two books of nonfiction. Her first novel, State of Grace (1973), established Williams's Impressionistic style, as the story of the pregnant protagonist is filled out by flashbacks to her childhood and early adulthood. Williams's next novels, The Changeling (1978), Breaking and Entering (1988), and The Quick and the Dead (2000), have plots and characters that are equally disjointed. Williams's work frequently skirts the borders among the real, the probable, and the imaginary; for instance, in The Quick and the Dead, a girl's dead mother appears as a visceral—and vituperative—ghost, and the inhabitants of an Arizona nursing home subsist in a state that is neither living nor dead. Many of Williams's characters exist in this way—marooned in a society in which life is bizarre and maybe not quite life. Her widely anthologized short stories hinge on the same themes; her collections include Taking Care (1982), Escapes (1990), and Honored Guest (2004). Williams's The Florida Keys: A History and Guide (1986) has gone through more than ten editions, and her essay collection Ill Nature (2001) establishes Williams as an articulate environmentalist.

—Anna Teekell

Wilson, August (1945–2005) playwright

*The only research I do is to listen to the music [of a decade]. There's a lot of history of our people in the music. When I was writing Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, I didn't want to know anything about Ma Rainey. I figured what I needed to know I'd get out of her music. Listening to her singing gave me a good sense of who she was.*

—Interview (2000)

Born Frederick Kittel in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Wilson was the son of a white German baker and Daisy Wilson, an African American cleaning woman. Wilson rarely saw his father, who abandoned the family and divorced his mother soon after his birth. Mrs. Wilson married a black man when August was a teenager, and they moved to a white suburb, where they experienced racial violence. August dropped out of high school and joined the army. By 1965 he had decided to become a writer and worked at odd jobs to support himself. Influenced by Malcolm X, Wilson was active in the Black Power movement as he helped to found the Black Horizon Theatre Company in Pittsburgh. He changed his last name from Kittel to Wilson to recognize his mother's guidance and his racial identity.

Wilson's early plays were performed in community theaters. His first play, Recycle, was produced locally in 1973, but it was not until 1984—six plays later—that his career began to progress when he teamed with director Lloyd Richards at the Yale Repertory Theater in New Haven, Connecticut. Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, a success on Broadway in 1984, had started as a workshop production directed by Richards. The play centers on the singer Ma Rainey and explores the exploitation of black musicians by white record companies in the 1920s. Although critics found fault with the structure of the play, they were impressed with its treatment of racism. The play won a New York Drama Critics Circle Award in 1985.

In 1983 Wilson wrote Fences (produced 1985), which had successful productions throughout the late 1980s at the Yale Repertory Theater, and then on Broadway. The play, winner of a New York Drama Critics Circle Award, a Tony, and the Pulitzer Prize, among other awards, is about a black family in the 1950s, headed by Troy Maxson, a garbage collector, ex-convict, and former Negro League baseball player. The family dynamics reminded critics of Arthur MILLER's play DEATH OF A SALESMAN.

While Fences remained a hit on Broadway, Wilson opened a second play there in 1988. JOE TURNER'S COME AND GONE, written in 1984 and produced at Yale in 1986, is set in a Pittsburgh boardinghouse. It explores the consequences of slavery, Reconstruction, and the black migration to Northern cities. For this play Wilson won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award. Written in 1986, THE PIANO LESSON was produced at Yale in 1987 and premiered on Broadway in 1990; it earned

August Wilson

Wilson another Pulitzer Prize. Set in the Depression, it is another family drama, with a piano serving as a metaphor for the family's struggle over its heritage and the meaning of culture. Two Trains Running, written in 1989, produced at Yale in 1990, and produced on Broadway in 1992, won the American Theatre Critics Association Award. The play is set in Pittsburgh in the 1960s and focuses on a group of characters in a coffee shop who come to terms with the issues of the day. Other Broadway plays include Seven Guitars (produced 1995), King Hedley II (produced 2001), and Gem of the Ocean (produced 2004). Early in his career Wilson realized that he was writing an historical cycle of plays, each play focusing on a twentieth-century decade. Radio Golf (produced 2005), set in the late 1990s, completes the ten-play cycle. It opened on Broadway after Wilson's death. To commemorate his theatrical achievement the Virginia Theatre was renamed the August Wilson Theatre.

Wilson's dramas highlight the conflicts in every decade of African American history. He avowed a desire not only to tell the story of African Americans but also to develop a self-conscious African American perspective. Although critics such as Robert Brustein have criticized Wilson's work as propagandistic, the prevailing critical opinion is that Wilson has successfully avoided the pitfalls of didactic art, which forces certain conclusions to the detriment of the work of art itself.

Principal Books by Wilson

Ma Rainey's Black Bottom. New York: New American Library, 1985.

Fences. New York: New American Library, 1986.

Dust jacket for Wilson's 1990 play, which earned him his second Pulitzer Prize for Drama

Joe Turner's Come and Gone. New York: New American Library, 1988.

The Piano Lesson. New York: Dutton/Plume, 1990.

Two Trains Running. New York: Dutton/Plume, 1993.

Seven Guitars. New York: Dutton, 1996.

The Ground on Which I Stand. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2001.

Jitney. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 2001.

King Hedley II. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2005.

Gem of the Ocean. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2006.

Radio Golf. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 2007.

Studying August Wilson

August Wilson continues to be one of the more consistently produced playwrights on the American stage. The most frequently anthologized, produced, and discussed plays include the Pulitzer Prize-winning Fences and THE PIANO LESSON, along with Ma Rainey's Black Bottom and JOE TURNER'S COME AND GONE. Students should begin here to develop a sense of Wilson's major themes and motifs.

Yvonne Shafer's bibliography August Wilson: A Resource and Production Sourcebook (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998) includes discussion of the production history of Wilson's plays. Critical overviews of Wilson's work can be found in Peter Wolfe's August Wilson (New York: Twayne, 1999), Mary Bogumil's Understanding August Wilson (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1998), Mary Ellen Snodgrass's August Wilson: A Literary Companion (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2004), and Alan Nadel's May All Your Fences Have Gates: Essays on the Drama of August Wilson (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1994). Sandra Shannon's The Dramatic Vision of August Wilson (Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1995) and Shannon's August Wilson's Fences: A Reference Guide (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2003) provide additional analysis of the plays, with the latter offering a useful overview of the production history and critical reception of Fences. Dana Williams's and Shannon's August Wilson and Black Aesthetics (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004) places Wilson within both the context of African American literature and the broader realm of American historical drama.

In respect to gender portrayals, Keith Clark's Black Manhood in James Baldwin, Ernest J. Gaines, and August Wilson

Credits from the program for Wilson's 1984 play that ran on Broadway for 275 performances and won the New York Drama Critics Circle Award

(Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002) places Wilson within the context of black male subject formation in the post-WORLD WAR II era. Carla McDonough's Staging Masculinity: Male Identity in Contemporary American Drama (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1997) discusses Wilson alongside playwrights Sam SHEPARD, David MAMET, and David RABE.

On matters of craft and the social role of drama, Joan Herrington's I Ain't Sorry for Nothin' I Done: August Wilson's Process of Playwriting (New York: Limelight Editions, 1998) provides insight into Wilson's technique. Conversations with August Wilson, edited by Jackson Bryer and Mary Hartig (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2006), includes interviews conducted over the twenty-year period between 1984 and 2004. The interviews reveal Wilson's candid accounts of the writing and staging of his own work, as well as his perspective on the racial divide in America and the need for a more active, ethnocentric African American presence in theater.

—Student Guide by Paul Plisiewicz

Wilson, Lanford (1937– ) playwright

Lanford Wilson was born in Lebanon, Missouri, and grew up in Springfield and in Ozark, Missouri, with his mother and stepfather. Wilson did not get to know his father until he moved to San Diego in 1955, during which time he enrolled at San Diego State University to study art and art history. Having previously dedicated his time to writing short stories, Wilson tried writing a play in 1959, later remarking, "I wrote two pages and knew I was a playwright." Wilson moved from California to Chicago, where he became more active in the theater. In 1962 he moved to New York City and became involved in the emergence of Off-Off-Broadway, co-founding the Circle Repertory Company in 1969. His early plays were experimental one-act plays, including So Long at the Fair (produced 1963), The Madness of Lady Bright (produced 1964), and This Is the Rill Speaking (produced 1965). His later plays are autobiographical and focus on the saga of the Talley family. His full-length plays include Balm in Gilead (produced 1965), which was produced by the experimental La Mama Theatre, and The Hot I Baltimore (produced 1973), which ran for more than 1,100 performances at the Circle Repertory Company. Talley's Folly (produced 1979) won the 1980 Pulitzer Prize.

Wilson is among the most prolific American playwrights, and all of his more than forty-five plays have opened Off-Broadway, most produced by his Circle Repertory Company. In addition to his Pulitzer Prize, he has won four Obie awards (for Village Voice [1973], Hot I Baltimore, The Mound Builders [1983], and Sympathetic Magic [1997]); the New York Drama Critics Circle Award twice (for Hot I Baltimore and Talley's Folly), and the American Theatre Critics Award for Book of Days [(1999)]. Wilson also has shown an impressive range of approaches from the realistic to the absurd.

Wilson's work has been collected in Balm in Gilead and Other Plays (1965). His later dramas include Four Short Plays (1994) and Book of Days: A Play in Two Acts (2000).

Sources

Bryer, Jackson R., ed. Lanford Wilson: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1994.

Dean, Anne M. Discovery and Invention: The Urban Plays of Lanford Wilson. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1994.

Woiwode, Larry (1941– ) short-story writer, novelist

Larry Woiwode was born in Carrington, North Dakota, and spent his childhood in nearby Sykeston, the site of his family's home. His family moved to Chicago when he was ten, and Woiwode later attended the University of Illinois. He left after five years of study without completing a bachelor's degree, but he was awarded an associate's degree in rhetoric. He then moved to New York City, where he worked as a freelance writer. After several writer-in-residence positions at various colleges, he moved his family to North Dakota in 1978 to start an organic farm.

Woiwode's first novel, What I'm Going to Do, I Think (1969), tells the story of the wedding of Chris and Ellen Van Eenanam, who are faced with an unwanted pregnancy, and describes the effect that their mismatched personalities have on their relationship during an extended honeymoon on Lake Michigan. The book won the William Faulkner Foundation Award for the best first novel of the year. Beyond the Bedroom Wall: A Family Album (1975), Woiwode's most famous novel, is an account of three generations of the Neumiller family, beginning with its first immigrants to North Dakota in 1881. Beyond the Bedroom Wall is also notable for its evocations of Midwestern speech and for its descriptions of the prairie landscape.

After his less successful Poppa John (1981)—which tells the story of a soap-opera actor who finds God—Woiwode returned to the form of Beyond the Bedroom Wall in Born Brothers (1988), a novel about two brothers who yearn to reestablish their bond in the context of American society's lapsed faith in communal and family values. Indian Affairs (1992) returns to the story of the Van Eenanams, now in the eighth year of their marriage, which is complicated by Chris's exploration of his Native American roots. As with What I'm Going to Do, I Think, there is no resolution to the couple's sense of anomie, and this time the possibility that they can overcome this void seems more remote.

Woiwode's short fiction is collected in The Neumiller Stories (1989) and in Silent Passengers: Stories (1993). He has published one book of poetry, Even Tide (1977). His non-fiction includes Acts (1993), a collection of criticism; and a memoir, What I Think I Did: A Season of Survival in Two Acts (2000). In 1995 Woiwode began his term as the state Poet Laureate of North Dakota.

Source

Yancey, Philip, ed. Reality and Vision: Seventeen Christian Authors Reveal Their Literary Legacy. Dallas: Word Publishing, 1990.

Wolfe, Tom (1931– ) journalist, novelist

Unless some movement occurs in American fiction over the next ten years that is more remarkable than any detectable right now, the pioneering in non-fiction will be recorded as the most important experiment in American literature in the second half of the twentieth Century.

—“Stalking the Billion-footed Beast: A Literary Manifesto for the New Social Novel,” Harper’s Magazine (November 1989)

Born and raised in Richmond, Virginia, Tom Wolfe attended Washington and Lee University and went on to Yale to obtain a Ph.D. in American studies. He made his reputation as a witty and often scathing critic, panning contemporary novelists for turning their backs on social reality and for turning inward, producing small works that were not commensurate with the size or complexity of American life.

Wolfe sought out subjects that were iconoclastic and countercultural. The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby (1965) explored the youth culture. The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (1968) followed the novelist Ken Kesey and his cohorts the Merry Pranksters on a psychedelic tour of the country. Wolfe found heroes in such figures as the race-car driver Junior Johnson. In Radical Chic and Mau-Mauing the Flak Catchers (1970) Wolfe excoriated the literary establishment for fawning over 1960s radicals and black militants. In The Painted Word (1975) he dismissed much of modern art, which he found pretentious and too self-involved. He presented a novelized history of the space program in The Right Stuff (1979).

In The New Journalism (1973) Wolfe argued that the freshest, most engaged, and most imaginative contemporary writing was coming not from novelists but from journalists who reported on the social reality of America (see NEW JOURNALISM). He predicted there would come a day when the novel would return to its journalistic roots and once again reflect America in all its diversity.

Wolfe has attempted to fulfill his prediction in two novels, Bonfire of the Vanities (1987) and A Man in Full (1998). In the former, Sherman McCoy, a Wall Street bond trader and self-described “master of the universe,” loses his way returning from the airport in his Mercedes and runs down a black man. The resulting story comments on the nature of race, class, and character in contemporary America. A Man in Full is essentially a study of the new South. Set in Atlanta, the novel examines the veneer of success in a world still rigidly separated by class and race. I Am Charlotte Simmons (2004) concerns an innocent young woman’s initiation into the over-sexed life of contemporary college life.

Sources

McKeen, William. Tom Wolfe. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Shomette, Doug, ed. The Critical Response to Tom Wolfe. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992.

Weingarten, Marc. The Gang That Wouldn’t Write Straight: Wolfe, Thompson, Didion, and the New Journalism Revolution. New York: Crown, 2006.

Wolff, Geoffrey (1937– ) autobiographer, biographer, novelist

Born in Los Angeles, Geoffrey Wolff earned an A.B. at Princeton in 1961. In 1976 he published an unusual biography, Black Sun: The Brief Transit and Violent Eclipse of Harry Crosby, both a biography of a Paris publisher of the 1920s and an account of a decade of American history. Wolff’s memoir of his con-man father, The Duke of Deception (1979), was highly praised not only for the quality of its writing but also because it raised issues about the way individuals create themselves in modern society. The Final Club (1990) is a memoir about Wolff’s years at Princeton, and A Day at the Beach (1992) is about his wife and sons. Less well known are Wolff’s novels: Bad Debts (1969), Providence (1986), and The Age of Consent (1995). The Edge of Maine (2005) is a personal memoir and a history.

Wolff, Tobias (1945– ) short-story writer, autobiographer

The brother of Geoffrey WOLFF, Tobias Wolff lived as a child with his mother and an abusive stepfather, a difficult experience he relates in the well-received memoir This Boy’s Life (1989). Wolff served in U.S. Army Special Forces during the early years of the VIETNAM WAR, took a B.A. degree at Oxford University in 1972 and an M.A. at Stanford in 1978, and commenced a career teaching creative writing, primarily at Stanford. His first novel, Ugly Rumours, was published only in London, and Wolff disavows it. His first collections of stories, In the Garden of North American Martyrs (1981) and Back in the World (1985), were more successful. His spare, elegant short fiction has been compared to Raymond CARVER’s work. His novel, The Barracks Thief (1985), the story of soldiers away from the Vietnam War scene, won the PEN/FAULKNER AWARD. In Pharaoh’s Army: Memories of the Lost War (1994), which revises parts of his first novel, is Wolff’s reckoning with his Vietnam experience. Old School (2003) is a novel set at a New England prep school during the 1960s. The Night in Question: Stories appeared in 1996. He also has edited The Picador Book of Contemporary American Stories (1993) and Best American Short Stories (1994), among other collections of short fiction.

Source

Hannah, James. Tobias Wolff: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Woodward, C. Vann (1908–1999) historian

Born in Arkansas, C. Vann Woodward received an A.B. from Emory University in 1930, an M.A. from Columbia University in 1932, and a Ph.D. from the University of North Carolina in 1937. He was a professor of history at Johns Hopkins University for fifteen years and a professor at Yale from 1961 until his death in 1999.

Woodward's first important work was Tom Watson: Agrarian Rebel (1938), the biography of a progressive politician whose career degenerated into race baiting. Watson's fate was the fate of the South, which had turned from Reconstruction and the emerging Civil Rights Movement to segregation—particularly, as enforced by Jim Crow laws. Woodward's argument that the laws of segregation had been recently introduced in the South (based on the dates of the Mississippi Plan in the late 1800s) was explicated in his The Strange Career of Jim Crow (1955).

Woodward's Origins of the New South: 1877–1913 (1951) is probably his best-known work, and one of pure historical narrative. Following Tom Watson, it advanced Woodward's reputation as a major critic on race relations in America. In 1956, after the success of The Strange Career of Jim Crow, Woodward published "The Historical Dimension," an essay that commented on Southern literature and its philosophical connection to the South's history. Woodward's most influential volume is The Burden of Southern History (1960), a collection of essays that follows the example of "The Historical Dimension": as with much of his work, these essays attempt to explain the significance of daily Southern life based on its connection to the past.

Woodward was a shrewd commentator on history as a discipline. Thinking Back: The Perils of Writing History appeared in 1986. He also edited Mary Chesnut's Civil War (1981), which won the 1982 Pulitzer Prize for History.

Sources

Roper, John Herbert, ed. C. Vann Woodward: A Southern Historian and His Critics. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1997.

Roper, ed. C. Vann Woodward, Southerner. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1987.

The World According to Garp by John Irving (New York: Dutton, 1978) novel

John Irving's fourth novel, The World According to Garp, is the story of a struggling writer who wrestles with lust, infidelity, and his errant muse. The novel covers the entire life of the title character, T. S. Garp, from the comic circumstances attending his conception to his death by assassination.

The World According to Garp, updating the comic exuberance of Charles Dickens's David Copperfield, features a host of motifs that have become staples of Irving's fictional universe—including wrestling and writing. But the novel also functions as a compulsively readable depiction of mid-1970s life, complete with suburban adulterers, obsessive joggers, transsexual pro football players, and feminist pop icons. The novel rounds out the early part of Irving's career, in which he honed his talents on a trio of well-received but commercially unsuccessful novels and began his career as the best-selling author of such works as The Hotel New Hampshire (1981), The Cider House Rules (1985), and A PRAYER FOR OWEN MEANY (1989).

Sources

Davis, Todd F., and Kenneth Womack. The Critical Response to John Irving. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

Reilly, Edward C. Understanding John Irving. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

—Marshall Boswell

World War II (1939–1945)

James JONES's novel FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (1951) presents a vivid account of the U.S. Army in Hawaii just before the Pearl Harbor attack on December 7, 1941. Jones continued the story of the war years in his novel The Thin Red Line (1962), and then explored the postwar lives of the soldiers in Whistle (1978). Norman MAILER's THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1948) dramatized a long patrol on a Japanese-held island. His portrait of General Cummings suggests that the U.S. Army also harbored fascist elements. His novel also emulated the work of John Dos Passos in presenting an array of characters from the different regions and ethnic groups who went to war.

Other important novels about World War II include Irwin SHAW's THE YOUNG LIONS (1948) and Gore VIDAL's debut novel, Williwaw (1946). Herman WOUK wrote the best-selling Caine Mutiny and presented a canvas of the United States and of the military in the years leading up to the war in The Winds of War (1971). His War and Remembrance (1978) includes descriptions of the naval war in the Pacific.

Martha Gellhorn provided a description of the Battle of the Bulge and the liberation of the German concentration camp Dachau in The Wine of Astonishment (1948), later reprinted as Point of No Return (1989). Joseph HELLER's CATCH-22 (1961) and Kurt VONNEGUT's SLAUGHTERHOUSE-FIVE (1969) are memorable accounts of the horror and absurdity of war. Other noteworthy works include James A.

MICHENER's Tales of the South Pacific (1944), made into the musical South Pacific; John Hersey's A Bell for Adano (1944), a comic story of the American army's occupation of an Italian town; and Thomas Heggen's comic treatment of life in the navy, Mister Roberts (1946).

James Gould Cozzens's Guard of Honor (1948), set at a Florida airbase, is the best work of fiction to come out of the war. Perhaps the most distinguished poetry about the war was published by Randall JARRELL.

Sources

Aichinger, Peter. The American Soldier in Fiction, 1880–1963: A History of Attitudes Toward Warfare and the Military Establishment. Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1975.

Fussell, Paul. Wartime: Understanding and Behavior in the Second World War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Wouk, Herman (1915– ) novelist, playwright

Herman Wouk was born in New York City, the son of a Russian Jewish immigrant who established a successful laundry business. Wouk studied philosophy and comparative literature and graduated with honors from Columbia University in 1934. Having written for the humor magazine at Columbia, he found employment as a gag writer for radio comedians before joining the navy at the beginning of WORLD WAR II; he saw action while serving onboard two destroyer-minesweepers in the Pacific fleet from 1942 to 1946.

Wouk's first novel, Aurora Dawn (1947), is a lighthearted satire on the advertising industry, written to "relieve the tedium of military service at sea in wartime." The City Boy (1948) is a bildungsroman of Herbie Bookbinder, an urban, Jewish boy at summer camp. The Caine Mutiny (1951), an historical drama, won the 1952 Pulitzer Prize for fiction. Colored by Wouk's experiences in the navy, The Caine Mutiny tells the story of Captain Queeg and the mutiny that occurs onboard his ship due to his seeming incompetence and despotism. Wouk's novel Marjorie Morningstar (1955) is the story of a Jewish girl (born Morgenstern) who dreams of becoming a movie star. To do so, she believes she must repudiate her Jewish past. Although she fails to attain her dream, she achieves a new consciousness of her identity and what it means to be a Jew. Youngblood Hawke (1962) is a novel based in part on the life of Thomas Wolfe.

Wouk drew again on his experiences in World War II with The Winds of War (1971) and War and Remembrance (1978), two novels he called historical romances. Based on years of travel and research, the books have been praised for providing an historical account of World War II through the eyes of middle-class America.

Wouk's next three novels—Inside, Outside (1985), The Hope (1993), and The Glory (1994)—explore twentieth-century Judaism, politics, and history, including the creation of the State of Israel and the status of U.S. politics from the end of World War II to the 1970s. Inside, Outside presents an account of the Nixon presidency through the eyes of David Goodkind, a special assistant to the president. The complex portrait of Goodkind juxtaposes the inside history of Jewish life in America with the outside world of secular events.

Sources

Beichman, Arnold. Herman Wouk: The Novelist as Social Historian. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books, 1984.

Mazzeno, Laurence W. Herman Wouk. New York: Twayne, 1994.

Wright, Charles (1935– ) poet, translator

Charles Wright was born in Pickwick Dam, Tennessee. He earned a B.A. in history from Davidson College in 1957 and then joined army intelligence for three years. He served in Italy, where he read Ezra Pound and formed the ambition to become a poet. After his discharge Wright studied at the IOWA WRITERS' WORKSHOP, where he earned an M.F.A. in 1963. Wright melds humor with a philosophical consciousness of the nature of the world. His influences include the Italian poet Eugenio Montale, whose work he has translated into English.

In The Grave of the Right Hand (1970), his fifth book and his first major collection, written while he was in Rome on a Fulbright fellowship, Wright contemplates Italian art, especially the work of surrealist painter Giorgio De Chirico. Hard Freight (1973) pays homage to the influence of such poets as Pound and Arthur Rimbaud. Bloodlines (1975) probes deeply into Wright's Southern roots. Although The Southern Cross (1981) contains four "self-portraits"—and although his poetry is often autobiographical, at least, in setting—his poems are not CONFessional.

Country Music: Selected Early Poems (1982) won the NATIONAL BOOK AWARD, and Black Zodiac (1997) won the Pulitzer Prize in poetry. His other collections include The World of the Ten Thousand Things: Poems, 1980–1990 (1990) and Negative Blue: Selected Later Poems (2000), Short History of the Shadow (2002), and Buffalo Yoga (2004).

Source

Andrews, Tom, ed. The Point Where All Things Meet: Essays on Charles Wright. Oberlin, Ohio: Oberlin College Press, 1995.

Wright, James (1927–1980) poet

James Wright was born in Martins Ferry, Ohio, an industrial town on the upper Ohio River. The Great Depression as well as the contrast between the natural beauty of the Ohio Valley and the blight of urban civilization informs much of his poetry.

Wright served in Japan during WORLD WAR II and graduated from Kenyon College in 1952. His first book of poetry, The Green Wall (1957), was published in the Yale Series of Younger Poets. The style of these poems ranges from relaxed free verse to more formal blank verse, the latter unusual for a contemporary poet. The Branch Will Not Break (1963) signaled a more subjective turn, in part influenced by Robert BLY, Wright's colleague at the University of Minnesota. With Bly's encouragement Wright began translating Pablo Neruda and Cesar Vallejo, two South American poets who had infused contemporary poetry with a more-personal approach that included surreal imagery. Wright's Collected Poems (1971) won a Pulitzer Prize; the book shows the evolution and maturation of his work. His To a Blossoming Pear Tree was published in 1977. Just as he was diagnosed with cancer, he completed a final collection of poetry, This Journey (1982), which was published posthumously.

Source

Elkins, Andrew. The Poetry of James Wright. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1991.

The Yemassee by William Gilmore Simms (New York: Harper, 1835) novel

Having established himself as both a popular and critically respected fiction writer with Martin Faber; The Story of a Criminal (1833) and Guy Rivers: A Tale of Georgia (1834), William Gilmore SIMMS turned to the history of his native South Carolina to produce The Yemassee; A Romance of Carolina. Simms insisted in his introduction to The Yemassee that although it was considered a novel by present-day standards, his book's "loftier origin" and focus on "the possible" rather than the mundane made it a ROMANCE in the tradition of Sir Walter Scott's Waverly series rather than a "domestic novel" à la Henry Fielding or Samuel Richardson.

Following Scott's model, Simms chose for his "American romance" an historical setting important to the formation of regional identity. The story's actions take place in the early decades of the eighteenth century, a time of violent conflict between the native Yemassee Indians and the English settlers. The Yemasseees are led by Sanutee, an old chief who in former times had been on friendly terms with the English but who has resolved to drive them from the land because of the depredation they have brought. His son, Oconestoga, is the visible symbol of that depredation, having turned traitor and drowned his natural gifts in the white man's liquor. The settlers are led by "Gabriel Harrison" (Governor Charles Craven in disguise), an embodiment of civility and a dashing suitor to the young and beautiful heroine, Bess Matthews. In the end, the lovers overcome the objections of Bess's father, and the settlers defeat the Yemasseees in a decisive battle.

Although not generally considered Simms's best work, the novel was acclaimed by the public and critics alike, reportedly selling out of its first printing in thirty hours and going into three editions within the year. The book continues to draw interest primarily for its American Indian characters, considered by some to be the most realistic and well-rounded in nineteenth-century literature. Some critics point out that, as in Cooper's Leather-Stocking Tales, the Native characters in The Yemassee fit the "noble savage" stereotype: a people whose virtue depends upon being essentially untainted by contact with Europeans and therefore incompatible with the inexorable progress of civilization.

—Brett Barney

"Young Goodman Brown" by Nathaniel Hawthorne (1835) short story

Nathaniel HAWTHORNE's "Young Goodman Brown," which first appeared in New-England Magazine in April 1835, is set in the seventeenth-century Puritan community of Salem, Massachusetts, and concerns the title character, a young Puritan man, who makes a covenant with the devil. Brown attends a Black Mass in the forest, where he sees many of his fellow townspeople, including his wife, Faith, and several religious leaders from the community. He returns to Salem, uncertain whether his experience was real or a hallucination. For the rest of his life, he doubts the goodness of the people around him, including his wife, and he becomes bitter and suspicious of humanity, eventually dying an unhappy man. Like many of Hawthorne's tales, the story is allegorical, with Brown representing a Bunyanesque everyman and his wife representing faith in humanity.

—Y. P. Renfro

Sources

Bunge, Nancy L. Nathaniel Hawthorne: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel. Mosses from an Old Manse, 2 volumes. New York: Wiley & Putnam, 1846.

The Youth's Companion (1827–1929) periodical

This Boston weekly was founded by Nathaniel Willis and Asa Rand as a secular magazine for children. In 1857 Daniel Ford Sharp purchased the magazine and, targeting adults as well as children, raised circulation from four thousand to five hundred thousand. Contributors included Louisa May ALCOTT, Harriet Beecher STOWE, and John Greenleaf WHITTIER. In 1929 The Youth's Companion merged with The American Boy.

Yaddo (1900– ) artist retreat

Located in Saratoga Springs, New York, Yaddo has hosted hundreds of writers, including Gwendolyn BROOKS, Arna BONTEMPS, Paul BOWLES, John CHEEVER, Donald DAVIDSON, James T. FARRELL, Kenneth FEARING, Langston HUGHES, Katherine Anne PORTER, Lionel TRILLING, Eudora WELTY, William Carlos WILLIAMS, and Louis ZUKOFSKY. It was founded by Katrina Nichols Trask Peabody as a refuge for creative artists. Residence generally is restricted to a month or two, with a token charge for room and board. About twenty artists and writers can be accommodated at one time.

Source

Waite, Marjorie Peabody. Yaddo, Yesterday and Today. Saratoga Springs, N.Y., 1933.

Yale Series of Younger Poets (1918– ) literary prize

Begun to encourage writers under age forty who had not yet published a volume of verse and run by Yale University Press, this series has published the first books of John Ashbery, Adrienne Rich, Muriel RUKEYSER, and many other distinguished poets. Stephen Vincent BENÉT edited the series from 1918 to 1941. W. H. AUDEN and Archibald MACLEISH also served as consultants.

Yezierska, Anzia (1880–1970) novelist, short-story writer

Anzia Yerzierska, born in the Russian-Polish town of Plinsk, came to New York City with her family in the early years of the twentieth century. She grew up in an impoverished environment in the LOWER EAST SIDE. Despite many hardships, Yezierska graduated from Columbia University, where she was encouraged by the philosopher John Dewey, and began a successful career as a writer. Her first two books—Hungry Hearts (1920), a collection of short stories, and the novel Salome of the Tenements (1923)—were sold to Hollywood and made into silent movies. Her writing is noted for relating the experiences of Jewish immigrants—particularly women. After a period of great success in the 1920s, Yezierska faded into relative obscurity; but her fictionalized autobiography, Red Ribbon on a White Horse (1950), renewed her standing as a writer.

Source

Henriksen, Louise Levitas. Anzia Yezierska: A Writer's Life. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1988.

—Britta Herdegen

Yoknapatawpha County setting

Yoknapatawpha County is the name William FAULKNER applied to a fictional county based upon his home in Lafayette County, Mississippi. Beginning with his third novel, Sartoris (1929), Faulkner followed the advice of literary mentor Sherwood ANDERSON to write about the people and places he knew. In a 1956 interview, Faulkner described how he discovered that his “own little postage stamp of native soil was worth writing about and that I would never live long enough to exhaust it.” He set most of his fiction here, including THE SOUND AND THE FURY (1929), AS I LAY DYING (1930), SANCTUARY (1931), LIGHT IN AUGUST (1932), ABSALOM, ABSALOM! (1936), THE UNVANQUISHED (1938), Go Down, Moses (1942), and the three novels of the SNOPEs TRILOGY, as well as many of his most-acclaimed short stories: "Barn Burning," "A ROSE FOR EMILY," "THAT EVENING SUN," and "Red Leaves." Often based on real-life stories and people from his Mississippi home, including his own family, many of Faulkner's characters appear in multiple works, offering an intertextual richness and saga-like quality to his Yoknapatawpha fiction; families who figure prominently in more than one work include the Compson, Snopes, McCaslin, and Sartoris families. In Absalom, Absalom! Faulkner included a hand-drawn map of the county depicting the location of events from his earlier works; he signed the map "William Faulkner, Sole Owner & Proprietor." He included a slightly different, more up-to-date map for the 1946 publication of The Portable Faulkner.

—John B. Padgett

You Can't Go Home Again by Thomas Wolfe (New York & London: Harper, 1940) novel

Thomas WOLFE's posthumously published fourth novel continues the account of George Webber's career after the events of THE WEB AND THE ROCK. In You Can't Go Home Again Webber publishes his first novel and forms a father-son relationship with editor Foxhill Edwards—based on Wolfe's editor Maxwell PERKINS. The title refers to Webber's visit to his hometown before publication of his novel and the town's subsequent outraged response to it—as happened with Wolfe's LOOK HOMEWARD, ANGEL.

George makes his final break with Esther Jack because he resents her world of successful, sophisticated people in the arts. His growing social conscience during the GREAT DEPRESSION prompts Webber to terminate his professional relationship and friendship with Edwards, who does not share his sense of social guilt.

You Can't Go Home Again, like The Web and the Rock, was unfinished when Wolfe died; it was made publishable by editor Edward Aswell, triggering a sixty-year argument among critics and scholars about the reliability of the texts of these novels.

—Morris Colden

You Can't Take It With You by George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart (produced 1936) play

George S. KAUFMAN and Moss HART reached the zenith of their collaboration with the populist comedy You Can't Take It With You, which won a PULITZER PRIZE in 1937, during the depths of the GREAT DEPRESSION. Directed by Kaufman, the play opened on Broadway for a remarkable 838-performance run on December 14, 1936. Its popular and critical success inspired a 1938 Academy Award-winning motion picture directed by Frank Capra, as well as several Broadway revivals and television productions.

The simple plot involving a rich boy-poor girl love affair nearly destroyed by the socio-economic and philosophical gulf between their families is enlivened by a range of rich comic characterizations. The Vanderhof-Sycamore clan, headed by Martin Vanderhof (known to one and all as Grandpa), is an eccentric collection of American originals. With Grandpa's benign approval, three generations of the family, not to mention Reba the maid, her unemployed boyfriend Donald, and assorted others, live together in one house and pursue their individual passions, from playwriting and ballet to xylophone playing and firecracker making, with blithe disregard for social expectations.

When Grandpa's granddaughter Alice becomes romantically involved with Tony Kirby, scion of a financial dynasty where she works, Kaufman and Hart mine considerable humor, as well as satiric social observations, from the inevitable clash between the Alice's free-spirited family and the staid Kirbys. The overarching hopeful message of You Can't Take It With You is embodied in its title, spoken by Grandpa, who insists that life is short and that the pursuit of riches is not the road to fulfillment.

—James Fisher

You Know Me Al by Ring Lardner (New York: Doran 1916) short-story collection

The six linked stories in Ring LARDNER's You Know Me Al were first published in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST between March and November 1914. Because each had "Busher" in the title, they are known as the Busher stories—a reference that later came to include most of Lardner's baseball stories about players who exhibit bush-league attitudes, even if they play in the big leagues. At the beginning of the story cycle, Jack Keefe has just been moved from his bush-league team to the Chicago White Sox, and the stories consist of his semilliterate letters home to his friend Al, which frequently use the eponymous phrase. The letters to Al are written over a two-year period, during which Jack Keefe gets married, separates from his wife, and reconciles with her before a son is born. He is cut from the White Sox, demoted to the second team, and then reinstated. He unwittingly shows himself to be selfishly egotistical, stingy, hopelessly gullible, and mean. The tone of the stories is humorous, but Keefe's lack of character supplies a dark undertone. The stories are admired for their accurate rendering of vernacular usage.

The Saturday Evening Post had a circulation of more than two million readers in 1914, and Lardner's stories were widely admired. Lardner published two other collections of epistolary stories about Jack Keefe, Treat 'Em Rough (1918) and The Real Dope (1919).

—Richard Layman

Young, Stark (1881–1963) critic, novelist, short-story writer

A graduate of the University of Mississippi who earned an M.A. in English at Columbia University, Stark Young was influenced by his experiences in the South and the North, believing that the two cultures seemed to “feed and bless each other.” Young first established his reputation as a theater critic for THE NEW REPUBLIC. He collected his essays and reviews in The Flower in Drama (1923), The Theater (1927), and Immortal Shadows (1948).

Young had a second career as a novelist, publishing Heaven Trees (1926), The Torches Flare (1928), River House (1929), and his best-known work, So Red the Rose (1934), a evocative work set in Civil War-era Mississippi. The Street of the Islands (1930) and Feliciano (1935) collect Young’s short stories. The Pavilion (1951) is a memoir.

Sources

Pilkington, John. Stark Young. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Young, Stark. A Life in the Arts: Letters, 1900–1962. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1975.

Yale Critics

The Yale Critics—also referred to as the Yale School of Critics—were the leading advocates of DECONSTRUCTION in America in the 1980s. The group consisted of Harold BLOOM, Paul de Man, Geoffrey Hartman, and J. Hillis Miller, all of whom were associated with Yale University at the time. Deconstruction, developed and proposed by French theorist Jacques Derrida, is a method of philosophical and literary analysis in which the critic traces out competing and even contradictory meanings latent within the text. Of the group, de Man was perhaps the most stringent adherent to Derrida's ideas, while Bloom, who began his career as a Freudian, allied himself with the group while maintaining his idiosyncratic independence. The Yale Critics helped transform the practice of criticism in America throughout the decade, and, as such, also came under fierce attack from those who were suspicious of and even hostile to the anarchic implications of deconstruction. Four years after his death in 1983, de Man was discovered to have written more than two hundred articles, many of them frankly anti-Semitic, for Nazi-affiliated newspapers during the Nazi occupation of Belgium. The discovery made the front page of The New York Times and sparked a full-scale scandal, as many critics of deconstruction in general and of the Yale Critics specifically seized upon this news as proof of the troubling nihilism they saw as implicit in deconstruction practice.

Sources

Arac, Jonathan, Wlad Godzich, and Wallace Martin, eds. The Yale Critics: Deconstruction in America. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1983.

Lehman, David. Signs of the Times: Deconstruction and the Fall of Paul de Man. New York: Poseidon, 1991.

—Marshall Boswell

Yates, Richard (1926–1992) novelist, short-story writer, screenwriter

Getting out of here is an appealing idea. . . . But then, as long as I've lived, getting out of wherever I am has seemed an appealing idea.

—Interview (1989)

Richard Yates was born in Yonkers, New York, and he grew up an only child, living with his mother, a hard-drinking, struggling sculptor. He attended Avon Old Farms School in Avon, Connecticut, and served in the army during WORLD WAR II. Yates skipped college in order to accelerate his writing career; upon his return to the United States he moved to New York and began working as a copywriter. During this period he completed his first novel, Revolutionary Road (1961), a portrait of Frank and April Wheeler, an artistic and ambitious married couple who watch their potential wither away amid the stultifying desolation of 1950s suburban life. The book has since become a minor classic.

Yates's other well-received novels include A Special Providence (1969), which draws upon his World War II experiences; Disturbing the Peace (1975), a tragic novel about a playwright suffering from an alcoholic breakdown; The Easter Parade (1976), the tale of two sisters, and his best book after Revolutionary Road; and A Good School (1978), a short novel set at a prep school similar to Avon Old Farms School. For a brief period he worked as a speechwriter for Senator Robert F. Kennedy, an experience that was to be the basis of his final work, "Uncertain Times," which has never been published. Yates died in 1992 of emphysema, complicated by a long-time combination of smoking and heavy drinking.

Yates's work is realistic and unsparing, and he frequently draws its particulars from his own tragic life. His characters are lonely and they rarely achieve the success they seek. The Collected Stories of Richard Yates was published in 2001. Contemporary short-story writers including Richard FORD, Andre DUBUS, and Michael CHABON cite Yates as a major influence.

Source

Bailey, Blake. A Tragic Honesty: The Life and Work of Richard Yates. New York: Picador, 2003.

—Marshall Boswell

Yerby, Frank (1916–1991) novelist

Frank Yerby was born in Georgia and graduated with an M.A. from Fisk University in 1938. Yerby's first book, The Foxes of Harrow (1946), was set in the South just before the Civil War. Because most of his books were published without a photograph of him on the dust jacket, many readers assumed that Yerby was white; the author of more than thirty historical romances, he was the most popular African American writer of his time.

Yerby set his fiction in different periods of the past, sometimes dealing with the history of African Americans and sometimes dealing with the ancient world. His notable novels include A Woman Called Fancy (1951), Goat Song: A Novel of Ancient Greece (1967), and Western: A Saga of the Great Plains (1982). McKenzie's Hundred (1985) returns to the pre-Civil War South.

The Young Lions by Irwin Shaw (New York: Random House, 1948) novel

Set between New Year's Eve, 1938 and the end of WORLD WAR II in 1945, The Young Lions, Irwin SHAW's first novel, tells the intertwining stories of three soldiers. Michael Whiteacre is a theatrical stage manager, moved by patriotism and a romantic notion of war to enlist in the army. After complaining about barracks life and arranging a relatively safe noncombat job, he opts to join the battle at the front, inspired by the bravery of Noah Ackerman, his boot-camp friend. Ackerman is a Jew from New York who has endured a lifetime of anti-Semitism and feels compelled to leave his new wife to fight the Nazis. Injured during the Normandy invasion, he recovers to fight alongside Whiteacre. Walking together, the two encounter Christian Diestl, an Austrian ski instructor and Nazi Party member, who becomes a sergeant in the German army. He enjoyed the early victories but has become disillusioned by the course of the war. In the firefight that follows, Diestl and Ackerman are killed, and the wounded Whiteacre is left with a profound sense of the horrors and the rewards of combat.

The novel deals forcefully with the realities of battle and with anti-Semitism in the U.S. Army. It was a best-seller as well as a critical success against which Shaw's subsequent novels were gauged. Published the same year as Norman Mailer's THE NAKED AND THE DEAD (1948), The Young Lions is generally regarded as the better work.

Young, Albert (1939– ) novelist, poet

Albert James Young, a Mississippi native, has been a resident of California since graduating from the University of California, Berkeley, with a B.A. in Spanish in 1969. Snakes (1970), his first novel, is about a jazz musician. Who Is Angelina? (1975) is about a young African American woman in search of her identity. Other novels—Sitting Pretty (1976), Ask Me Now (1980), and Seduction by Light (1988)—range in subjects: the story of a retired professional basketball player trying to cope with life after basketball; a narrative about an account of one year in the life of a down-and-out philosopher; an African American woman from Mississippi who finds it difficult to adjust to a new life in Los Angeles.

Young's poetry is expansive and colloquial. His major collections include Dancing (1969), The Song Turning Back into Itself (1971), Geography of the Near Past (1976), and The Blues Don't Change (1982). This poetry reflects both the African American experience and the idioms of African Americans, which have been heavily influenced by jazz. His poems are collected in Heaven: Collected Poems 1956–1990 (1992) and The Sound of Dreams Remembered: Poems 1990–2000 (2001). Young has published two "musical memoirs": Kinds of Blue (1984) and Things Ain't What They Used to Be (1987).

Source

Lee, Don. "About Al Young," Ploughshares, 19 (Spring 1993): 219–224.

—Marshall Boswell

Zenger, John Peter (1697–1746) printer, journalist

John Peter Zenger's name is inextricably linked to the freedom of the press in America. He was born in the Rhenish Palatinate region of Germany. At the age of thirteen he left Germany with his parents and siblings. His father died during the voyage, but the rest of the family settled in New York. Within a year, Zenger was working for William Bradford (1663–1752) as a printer's apprentice. At the end of his apprenticeship, Zenger married Mary White in 1719 in Philadelphia and relocated to Chestertown, Maryland, where he established his own printing business. He returned to New York two years later, a widower with one son. In 1722 Zenger married Anna Catherina Maulin, and the couple had five children.

Following a brief partnership with Bradford, Zenger opened his own printing shop in 1726. He met with modest success until 1733, when he became embroiled in a political dispute between two factions: the court or ruling faction led by New York governor William Cosby (circa 1690–1736) and the opposition faction or River Party led by Lewis Morris II. Representing the interests of the powerful De Lancey family, the court faction controlled THE NEW YORK GAZETTE, which was printed by Zenger's former master, William Bradford. To gain access to the public arena the opposition faction, which included David HUMPHREYS, James Alexander (1691–1756), and Cadwallader COLDEN, established the NEW-YORK WEEKLY JOURNAL, with Alexander as the anonymous editor and Zenger as the named publisher.

The first edition of the Journal, published on November 5, 1733, attacked Cosby's faction for attempting to influence a recent election in Westchester County by unfairly disenfranchising Quakers who had refused to take the oath of loyalty to the king. From this point forward a steady stream of anti-Cosby criticism flowed from Zenger's shop as articles in the Journal and in many pamphlets and broadsides. Rip Van Dam (1660–1749) was the author of one of the pamphlets, Articles of Complaint (1734). But Alexander appears to have written the majority of these attacks. The ballads and essays borrowed on the current wave of English opposition literature, incorporating satire and political philosophy. Accordingly, the River Party depicted Cosby and his faction as "pettyfogging knaves [who] deny us Rights of Englishmen."

The highly charged political atmosphere was a boon for Zenger's publishing business, but it also placed Zenger and the authors at risk. Cosby responded to the attacks by publicly burning two of the offending BALLADS and several copies of the Journal. He also responded to Van Dam's list of thirty-four charges by filing a suit for libel. The suit was summarily rejected by the grand jury. Having failed in his first attempt, Cosby continued his campaign to close the opposition press, choosing sedition (a criminal charge) rather than libel (a civil complaint) to prosecute Zenger, who as the named publisher was the most exposed target.

Zenger was arrested on November 17, 1734, charged with seditious libel, and jailed. The Journal missed an issue, but Cosby gained little in the short run. The paper resumed publication under the control of Zenger's wife, Anna. Anti-Cosby articles and editorials continued to appear in the Journal, raising a public outcry against Cosby's tactics.

Public awareness did not alleviate Zenger's immediate problem. Unable to post the high bail, Zenger remained in prison. The actual jury trial was delayed by countless motions and by the obstruction of Justice James De Lancey (1703–1760). De Lancey interfered with and eventually disbarred Zenger's attorneys, James Alexander and William SMITH. The jury phase of the trial finally began nine months later, with Andrew Hamilton (1676–1741), an experienced attorney who had trained in Britain, assuming responsibility for Zenger's defense. Hamilton's strategy caught the attorney general by surprise. Expected to deny the charges, Hamilton admitted that Zenger had printed the articles but insisted that they were neither libelous nor seditious—because they were true. The strategy and the argument, which was directed at the jury, worked. After one day of testimony and arguments, the jury found Zenger not guilty.

The trial had a positive effect on Zenger's career. He was appointed as the public printer for New York in 1737 and for New Jersey the following year. His case was constantly invoked as a symbol of freedom of the press in America and as a legal precedent. The case itself was recorded and memorialized in A Brief Narrative of the Case and Tryal of John Peter Zenger, Printer of the New-York Weekly Journal, edited by Alexander and published by Zenger in 1736. It was republished in multiple editions in London and New York.

Zenger died in New York July 28, 1746, leaving the Journal in the hands of his wife. Anna Zenger continued to run the printing business and the newspaper until 1748, when her son John assumed responsibility.

Works

"Mr. Zenger's Malice and Falshood": Six Issues of the New-York Weekly Journal, 1733–1734. Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society, 1985.

Zenger, John Peter. A Brief Narrative of the Case and Trial of John Peter Zenger, Printer of the New-York Weekly Journal. New York: Printed by the author, 1736. Edited by Stanley Nider Katz. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1972.

Sources

Heartman, Charles Frederick. Charles F. Heartman Presents John Peter Zenger, and His Fight for the Freedom of the American Press, Together with a Genuine Specimen of the New York Weekly Journal. Printed by John Peter Zenger. Highland Park, N.J.: Printed for Harry B. Weiss, 1934.

Putnam, William Lowell. John Peter Zenger and the Fundamental Freedom. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1997.

Rutherford, Livingston. John Peter Zenger and Freedom of the Press. Mount Vernon: A. Colish, 1984.

Zugsmith, Leane (1903–1969) novelist

Leane Zugsmith made her name as a proletarian novelist (see PROLETARIAN LITERATURE). All Victories Are Alike (1929) examines a newspaper editor's disillusionment with liberal values. Goodbye and Tomorrow (1931) explores the life of an older woman who sponsors artists. Never Enough (1932) is a full-scale treatment of the 1920s. The Reckoning (1934) is about the life of a slum boy. A Time to Remember (1936) portrays the unionization of a department store. The Summer Soldier (1938) is an excoriating attack on racism. Zugsmith published two collections of short stories: Home Is Where You Hang Your Childhood (1937) and Hard Times with Easy Payments (1941).

Source

Ravitz, Abe. Leane Zugsmith: Thunder on the Left. New York: International Publishers, 1992.

Zukofsky, Louis (1904–1978) poet

Enrolling at Columbia University when he was fifteen, Louis Zukofsky earned an M.A. degree when he was twenty. By the late 1920s he had attracted the attention of Ezra POUND, who introduced Zukofsky to William Carlos WILLIAMS in 1928. Both poets believed in the objectivist approach to poetry (see OBJECTIVISM), although Zukofsky favored a musical line quite different from Williams's terse lines. That same year Zukofsky embarked on his lifelong devotion to "A," a poem in twenty-four movements that explores the culture and economy of his times as well as his own sensibility. "A" was published in 1978.

In 1931 Zukofsky edited an issue of Harriet MONROE's POETRY magazine, which featured the work of Williams, Carl Rakosi, Charles REZNIKOFF, and George OPPEN, which Zukofsky then published as a book, An "Objectivists" Anthology (1932). Zukofsky emphasized in his introduction that a poem is a kind of object, not a mystical, romantic expression of feelings.

Source

Scroggins, Mark, ed. Upper Limit Music: The Writing of Louis Zukofsky. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1997.

Zindel, Paul (1936–2003) playwright, novelist

Born in Staten Island, New York, Paul Zindel grew up with an interest in science, and he began acting and writing plays at a young age. He graduated from Wagner College with a B.S. in 1958 and an M.S. in 1959 and subsequently taught high-school chemistry from 1960 to 1969. His first play, The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds (produced 1964), was the story of an unhappy girl's relationship with her mother and sister. The play won the Pulitzer Prize in drama, an Obie, and the New York Critics Circle Award, among other honors. Charlotte Zolotow, a senior editor at Harper and Row, encouraged Zindel to write a book for teenagers. He published his first book, The Pigman, in 1968; the book exhibits Zindel's attunement to the development of adolescents who feel alienated from their families and society. After this success, Zindel published one of his most critically acclaimed books for young adults, My Darling, My Hamburger (1969).

Zindel's other plays include And Miss Reardon Drinks a Little (produced 1967), The Secret Affairs of Mildred Wild (produced 1972), and Amulets Against the Dragon Forces (produced 1989). He has written several other novels for young adults, including Confessions of a Teen-age Baboon (1977), Harry and Hortense at Hormone High (1984), A Begonia for Miss Applebaum (1989), and David & Della (1993). He has also published several picture books for children, a horror trilogy, and a memoir, The Pigman and Me (1992). Zindel's publications toward the end of his life were mainly mysteries, including The Square Root of Murder (2002).

Sources

Forman, Jack Jacob. Presenting Paul Zindel. Boston: Twayne, 1988.

Paul Zindel: The Official Website <<http://www.paulzindel.com/index.htm>> (viewed April 4, 2007).

The Zoo Story* (1960) play

Edward ALBEE's first play, The Zoo Story, had its debut performance on September 28, 1959 at the Schiller Theater in Berlin. It later appeared Off-Broadway at New York's Provincetown Playhouse in early 1960. A short but tense one-act play, The Zoo Story has become regarded as one of the signature works of American absurdist theater. The play features two characters: a middle-aged man named Peter, and his intense, mysterious antagonist, Jerry. When the play opens, Peter is quietly sitting on a bench in Central Park and reading a book. Jerry enters and immediately shouts at Peter that he's been to the zoo. Despite Peter's attempt to ignore him, Jerry continues to engage Peter, badgering him about his marriage and what Jerry regards as Peter's middle-class complacency. The play's tension quickly escalates until Jerry, at the height of the drama, rushes at Peter with a knife. Jerry ends up impaling himself as Peter rushes away in horror. "You won't be coming back here anymore, Peter," Jerry calls as Peter retreats. "You've been dispossessed. You've lost your bench, but you've defended your honor." Although the play is reminiscent of the work of Samuel Beckett—particularly his famous two-character drama, Waiting for Godot—it is distinguished from similar works of European absurdist theater for its realistic setting and its relatively straightforward characterization. Albee's primary target is the conformist bourgeois culture of the 1950s. The play ran for 582 performances Off-Broadway and won an Obie Award before moving to Broadway.

Sources

Albee, Edward. The Zoo Story, The Death of Bessie Smith, The Sandbox. New York: Coward-McCann, 1960.

Gussow, Mel. Edward Albee: A Singular Journey. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1999.

—Marshall Boswell

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Virginia D. New England's Generation: The Great Migration and the Formation of Society and Culture in the Seventeenth Century. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Andrews, William L., and others. Journeys in New Worlds: Early American Women's Narratives. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1990.
- Appleby, Joyce. Liberalism and Republicanism in the Historical Imagination. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Axtell, James. After Columbus: Essays in the Ethnohistory of Colonial North America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Axtell. The Invasion Within: The Contest of Cultures in Colonial North America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Bailyn. Pamphlets of the American Revolution, 1750–1776. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1965.
- Bercovitch, Sacvan. The American Jeremiad. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.
- Bercovitch. The Cambridge History of American Literature/Prose Writing, 1590–1820. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Bercovitch. The Puritan Origins of the American Self. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975.
- Berkin, Carol. First Generations: Women in Colonial America. New York: Hill & Wang, 1996.
- Berkin. Revolutionary Mothers: Women in the Struggle for America's Independence. New York: Knopf, 2005.
- Bonomi, Patricia U. Under the Cope of Heaven: Religion, Society, and Politics in Colonial America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Brigham, Clarence. History and Bibliography of American Newspapers, 1690–1820. Worcester, Mass.: American Antiquarian Society, 1947.
- Brown, Richard D. Knowledge Is Power: The Diffusion of Information in Early America, 1700–1865. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Bushman, Richard L. The Refinement of America: Persons, Houses, Cities. New York: Knopf, 1992.
- Butler, Jon. Becoming America: The Revolution before 1776. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Calloway, Colin Gordon. The American Revolution in Indian Country: Crisis and Diversity in Native American Communities. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Calloway. New Worlds for All: Indians, Europeans, and the Remaking of Early America. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.
- Carretta, Vincent, ed. Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1996.
- Chaplin, Joyce E. An Anxious Pursuit: Agricultural Innovation & Modernity in the Lower South, 1730–1815. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
- Cott, Nancy F. The Bonds of Womanhood: "Woman's Sphere" in New England, 1780–1835. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Cressy, David. Coming Over: Migration and Communication between England and New England in the Seventeenth Cen-

- ture. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.
- Davidson, Cathy N. Revolution and the Word: The Rise of the Novel in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Davis, David Brion. The Problem of Slavery in the Age of Revolution, 1770–1823. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1975.
- Davis, Richard Beale. A Colonial Southern Bookshelf: Reading in the Eighteenth Century. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1979.
- Delbanco, Andrew. The Puritan Ordeal. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1989.
- Demos, John. A Little Commonwealth: Family Life in Plymouth Colony. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Elliott, Emory. Power and the Pulpit in Puritan New England. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Elliott. Revolutionary Writers: Literature and Authority in the New Republic, 1725–1810. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Elliott, ed. American Colonial Writers, 1606–1734. Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 24. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1984.
- Elliott, ed. American Colonial Writers, 1735–1781. Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 31. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1984.
- Elliott, ed. American Writers of the Early Republic. Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 37. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1985.
- Elliott, ed. Columbia Literary History of the United States. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Emerson, Everett H. Major Writers of Early American Literature. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1972.
- Fischer, David Hackett. Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Fliegelman, Jay. Prodigals and Pilgrims: The American Revolution against Patriarchal Authority, 1750–1800. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982.
- Franklin, Wayne. Discoverers, Explorers, Settlers: The Diligent Writers of Early America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Gay, Peter. The Enlightenment: An Interpretation, 2 volumes. New York: Knopf, 1966–1969.
- Gay. A Loss of Mastery: Puritan Historians in Colonial America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966.
- Giles, Paul. Transatlantic Insurrections: British Culture and the Formation of American Literature, 1730–1860. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
- Gilmore, Michael T. The Middle Way: Puritanism and Ideology in American Romantic Fiction. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1977.
- Godbeer, Richard. Sexual Revolution in Early America. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002.
- Gould, Philip. Covenant and Republic: Historical Romance and the Politics of Puritanism. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Granger, Bruce. Political Satire in the American Revolution, 1763–1783. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1960.
- Greven, Philip. The Protestant Temperament: Patterns of Child-Rearing, Religious Experience, and the Self in Early America. New York: Knopf, 1977.
- Gunn, Giles. Early American Writings. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Gura, Philip F. A Glimpse of Zion's Glory: Puritan Radicalism in New England, 1620–1660. Middletown: Wesleyan University Press, 1984.
- Hall, David D. Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgment: Popular Religious Belief in Early New England. New York: Knopf, 1989.
- Harris, Sharon M., ed. American Women Writers to 1800. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Hayes, Kevin J. A Colonial Woman's Bookshelf. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1996.
- Hoffman, Ronald, and Peter J. Albert, eds. Women in the Age of the American Revolution. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1989.
- James, Edward T., and Barbara Sicherman, eds. Notable American Women: A Biographical Dictionary, 4 volumes. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971–1980.
- Johnson, Allen, and others, eds. Dictionary of American Biography, second edition, 11 volumes. New York: Scribners, 1964.
- Kerber, Linda. Toward an Intellectual History of Women: Essays by Linda Kerber. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Kerber. Women of the Republic: Intellect and Ideology in Revolutionary America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- Kolodny, Annette. The Land Before Her: Fantasy and Experience of the American Frontiers, 1630–1860. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Kolodny. The Lay of the Land: Metaphor as Experience and History in American Life and Letters. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1975.
- Kupperman, Karen Ordahl. Indians and English: Facing Off in Early America. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2000.
- Lang, Amy Schrager. Prophetic Woman: Anne Hutchinson and the Problem of Dissent in the Literature of New England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.
- Leder, Lawrence H., ed. Colonial Legacy: Volume II, Some Eighteenth Century Commentators. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
- Levernier, James, ed. American Writers Before 1800: A Biographical and Critical Dictionary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Meserole, Harrison, ed. American Poetry of the Seventeenth Century. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1985.
- Miller, Perry. Errand into the Wilderness. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1956.

- Mulford, Carla, ed. American Women Prose Writers to 1820. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 200. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1999.
- Nelson, Dana D. The Word in Black and White: Reading "Race" in American Literature 1638–1867. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Norton, Mary Beth. Liberty's Daughters: The Revolutionary Experience of American Women, 1750–1800. Boston: Little, Brown, 1980.
- Plumstead, A. W. The Wall and the Garden: Selected Massachusetts Election Sermons, 1670–1775. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1968.
- Samuels, Shirley. Romances of the Republic: Women, the Family, and Violence in the Literature of the Early American Nation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Scanlan, Thomas. Colonial Writings and the New World, 1583–1671: Allegories of Desire. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Scheick, William J. Authority and Female Authorship in Colonial America. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.
- Shields, David S. Civil Tongues and Polite Letters in British America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Shields. Oracles of Empire: Poetry, Politics, and Commerce in British America, 1690–1750. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990.
- Shuffelton, Frank. Mixed Race: Ethnicity in Early America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Sloan, William David, and Julie Hedgepeth Williams. The Early American Press, 1690–1783. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.
- Spengemann, William C. The Adventurous Muse: The Poetics of American Fiction, 1789–1900. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Spengemann. A New World of Words: Redefining Early American Literature. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1994.
- Stern, Julia A. The Plight of Feeling: Sympathy and Dissent in the Early American Novel. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Taylor, Alan. American Colonies. New York: Viking, 2001.
- Thomas, Isaiah. The History of Printing in America with a Biography of Printers. Edited by Marcus A. McCorison. New York: Weathervane, 1970.
- Tyler, Moses Coit. A History of American Literature, 1607–1765. New York: Putnam, 1878.
- Ulrich, Laurel Thatcher. Good Wives: Image and Reality in the Lives of Women in Northern New England, 1650–1750. New York: Knopf, 1982.
- Vaughan, Alden. The Puritan Tradition in America, 1620–1730. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Wall, Helena M. Fierce Communion: Family and Community in Early America. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Zuckerman, Michael. Peaceable Kingdoms: New England Towns in the Eighteenth Century. New York: Knopf, 1970.
- Aldridge, John W. After the Lost Generation: A Critical Study of the Writers of Two Wars. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1951.
- Elizabeth Ammons. Short Fiction by Black Women, 1900–1920. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Aronson, Arnold. American Avant-Garde Theatre: A History. London & New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Baker, Robert A., and Michael T. Nietzel. Private Eyes: One Hundred and One Knights. A Survey of American Detective Fiction, 1922–1984. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1985.
- Barzun, Jacques, and Wendell Hertig Taylor. A Catalogue of Crime, revised and enlarged edition. New York: Harper & Row, 1989.
- Bercovitch, Sacvan, ed. The Cambridge History of American Literature, volumes 7 and 8. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996–1999.
- Berkowitz, Gerald M. American Drama of the Twentieth Century. London & New York: Longman, 1992.
- Bigsby, C. W. E. A Critical Introduction to Twentieth Century American Drama, 3 volumes. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982–1985.
- Bone, Robert A. The Negro Novel in America, revised edition. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1965.
- Brucoli, Matthew J., and Richard Layman, eds. Hardboiled Mystery Writers: Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, and Ross MacDonald. Dictionary of Literary Biography Documentary Series, volume 6. Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale Research, 1989. Republished, New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002.
- Carby, Hazel. Reconstructing Womanhood: The Emergence of the Afro American Woman Novelist. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Carpenter, Humphrey. Geniuses Together: American Writers in Paris in the 1920s. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1988.
- Cawelti, John G. Adventure, Mystery, and Romance: Formula Stories as Art and Popular Culture. Chicago & London: University of Chicago Press, 1976.
- Cawelti, John. The Six Gun Mystique. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1984.
- Christian, Barbara. Black Women Novelists: The Development of a Tradition, 1892–1976. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980.
- Coven, Brenda. American Women Dramatists of the Twentieth Century: A Bibliography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1982.
- Cowley, Malcolm. Exile's Return: A Literary Odyssey of the 1920s, third edition, edited by Donald W. Faulkner. New York: Penguin, 1994.
- Cowart, David, and Thomas L. Wymer, eds. Twentieth-Century American Science-Fiction Writers. Dictionary of Literary Biography, volume 8. Detroit: Brucoli Clark/Gale Research, 1981.
- Curti, Merle. The Growth of American Thought. New York: Harper & Row, 1964.

Dictionary of Literary Biography (Detroit: Brucoli Clark Layman/Gale, 1978-):

- 4: American Writers in Paris, 1920-1939, edited by Karen Lane Rood, 1980.
- 9: American Poets Since World War II, 2 parts, edited by Donald J. Greiner, 1980.
- 11: American Humorists, 1800-1950, 2 parts, edited by Stanley Trachtenberg, 1982.
- 22: American Writers for Children, 1900-1960, edited by John Cech, 1983.
- 26: American Screenwriters, edited by Robert E. Morsberger, Stephen O. Lesser, and Randall Clark, 1984.
- 28: Twentieth-Century American-Jewish Fiction Writers, edited by Daniel Walden, 1984.
- 44: American Screenwriters, Second Series, edited by Randall Clark, Robert E. Morsberger, and Stephen O. Lesser, 1986.
- 45: American Poets, 1880-1945, First Series, edited by Peter Quartermain, 1986.
- 46: American Literary Publishing Houses, 1900-1980: Trade and Paperback, edited by Peter Dzwonkoski, 1986.
- 48: American Poets, 1880-1945, Second Series, edited by Peter Quartermain, 1986.
- 51: Afro-American Writers from the Harlem Renaissance to 1940, edited by Trudier Harris, 1987.
- 54: American Poets, 1880-1945, Third Series, 2 parts, edited by Peter Quartermain, 1987.
- 63: Modern American Critics, 1920-1955, edited by Gregory S. Jay, 1988.
- 86: American Short-Story Writers, 1910-1945, First Series, edited by Bobby Ellen Kimbel, 1989.
- 102: American Short-Story Writers, 1910-1945, Second Series, edited by Bobby Ellen Kimbel, 1991.
- 175: Native American Writers of the United States, edited by Kenneth M. Roemer, 1997.
- 206: Twentieth-Century American Western Writers, First Series, edited by Richard H. Cracroft, 1999.
- 226: American Hard-Boiled Crime Writers, edited by George Parker Anderson and Julie B. Anderson, 2000.
- 228: Twentieth-Century American Dramatists, Second Series, edited by Christopher J. Wheatley, 2000.
- 256: Twentieth-Century American Western Writers, Third Series, edited by Richard H. Cracroft, 2002.
- 275: Twentieth-Century American Nature Writers: Prose, edited by Roger Thompson and J. Scott Bryson, 2003.
- 303: American Radical and Reform Writers, First Series, edited by Steven Rosendale, 2005.
- 306: American Mystery and Detective Writers, edited by George Parker Anderson, 2005.

Documentary Series

- 6: Hardboiled Mystery Writers: Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, Ross Macdonald, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli and Richard Layman, 1989.

- 11: American Proletarian Culture: The Twenties and The Thirties, edited by Jon Christian Suggs, 1993.

- 12: Southern Women Writers: Flannery O'Connor, Katherine Anne Porter, Eudora Welty, edited by Mary Ann Wimsatt and Karen L. Rood, 1994.

- 15: American Expatriate Writers: Paris in the Twenties, edited by Matthew J. Brucoli and Robert W. Trogdon, 1997.

Docherty, Brian, ed. American Crime Fiction: Studies in the Genre. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.

Drake, William. The First Wave: Women Poets in America, 1915-1945. New York: Macmillan, 1987.

Dukore, Bernard F. American Dramatists, 1918-1945. New York: Grove, 1984.

Elliot, Emory, ed. Columbia Literary History of the United States. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Etulain and N. Jill Howard, eds. A Bibliographical Guide to the Study of Western American Literature, second edition. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1995.

Fetterley, Judith, and Marjorie Pryse, eds. American Women Regionalists, 1850-1910. New York: Norton, 1992.

Ganewere, Robert J., ed. The Exploited Eden: Literature on the American Environment. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Gray, Richard. The Literature of Memory: Modern Writers of the American South. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1977.

Groden, Michael, and Martin Kreiswirth. The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1994. Updated edition available online <http://www.press.jhu.edu/books/hopkins\_guide\_to\_literary\_theory/special.html>.

Hoffman, Frederick J. The Twenties: American Writers in the Postwar Decade, revised edition. New York: Collier, 1962.

Kessler, Carol Farley, ed. Daring to Dream: Utopian Fiction by United States Women before 1950, second edition. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1995.

King, Loverlerie. A Student's Guide to the Study of African American Literature. New York: Peter Lang, 2001.

Madden, David, ed. Tough Guy Writers of the Thirties. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Miller, Jordan Yale. American Drama Between the Wars: A Critical History. Boston: Twayne, 1991.

Murphy, Brenda. American Realism and American Drama, 1880-1940. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987.

Murphy, ed. The Cambridge Companion to American Women Playwrights. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Nye, Russell B. The Unembarrassed Muse: The Popular Arts in America. New York: Dial, 1970.

Parini, Jay, ed. The Columbia History of American Poetry. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.

Rosenblatt, Roger. Black Fiction. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1974.

- Savage, William W., Jr. The Cowboy Hero: His Image in American History & Culture. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1979.
- Shockley, Ann Allen. Afro American Women Writers, 1746–1933: An Anthology and Critical Guide. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988.
- Stauffer, Helen Winter, and Susan J. Rosowski. Women and Western American Literature. Troy, N.Y.: Whitston, 1982.
- Steckmesser, Kent L. The Western Hero in History and Legend. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1965.
- Swados, Harvey, ed. The American Writer and the Great Depression. Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966.
- Taubmann, Howard. The Making of the American Theatre. New York: Coward McCann, 1965.
- Taylor, J. Golden, Thomas J. Lyon, and others, eds. A Literary History of the American West. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1987.
- Tuska, Jon and Vicki Piekarski, eds. Encyclopedia of Frontier and Western Fiction. New York: MacGraw-Hill, 1983.
- Wade, Stephen. Jewish American Literature Since 1945. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2001.
- Washington, Mary Helen, ed. Invented Lives: Narratives of Black Women, 1860–1960. Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor, 1987.
- Wiget, Andrew. Native American Literature. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
- Wilmeth, Don B., and Tice Miller, eds. Cambridge Guide to American Theatre. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Wilmeth, and Miller. The Cambridge Guide to American Theatre. Cambridge & New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Wood, James. Magazines in the United States, third edition. New York: Ronald Press, 1971.

CONTRIBUTORS

David A. Allred
Meg A. Amstutz
George Parker Anderson
L. Michelle Baker
S. Zebulon Baker
Judith S. Baughman
Geraldine Cannon Becker

Casey Boyle
Tom Bristow
Jewel Spears Brooker
Matthew J. Bruccoli
Park Buckner

Claudia Wilsch Case
Darien Cavanaugh
Laurie Champion
Allan Chavkin
John Cusatis

Joanna Daxell

Christopher C. De Santis
Michael Edelson

Kate Falvey

Alex Feerst
James Fisher

Philip Furia

Snow College
University of Georgia
University of South Carolina
Shepherd University
Emory University
University of South Carolina
University of Maine at Fort Kent
University of South Carolina
University of Edinburgh
Eckerd College
University of South Carolina
University of South Carolina Sumter
Brooklyn, New York
University of South Carolina
San Diego State University
Texas State University
Charleston County School of the Arts
Université de Sherbrooke, Quebec
Illinois State University
State University of New York at Stony Brook
New York City College of Technology/CUNY
Macalester College
University of North Carolina at Greensboro
University of North Carolina at Wilmington

James R. Giles
Michelle C. Greenwald

James A. Grimshaw Jr.

Todd Hagstette
Darren Harris-Fain
Britta Herdegen
Christopher Herr
Christine Marie Hilger
Audra Himes

KaaVonnia Hinton
Blake Hobby

James Hoff
Bev Hogue
Lindsay Holmgren
Brooke Horvath
Colin Irvine
David G. Izzo
Monica F. Jacobe
Kimberly M. Jew
Nancy Carol Joyner
Robin Kemp
Gary L. Kerley

Martin Kich
Lincoln Konkle
Marvin La Hood
Roger Lathbury

Northern Illinois University
University of Tennessee Knoxville
Texas A&M University—Commerce
University of South Carolina
Shawnee State University
University of Florida
Missouri State University
Texas Woman's University
Indiana University of Pennsylvania—Punxsutawney
Old Dominion University
University of North Carolina at Asheville
The Graduate Center, CUNY
Marietta College
McGill University
Kent State University, Stark
Augsburg College
Fayetteville State University
Catholic University
Washington and Lee University
Western Carolina University
Atlanta, Georgia
North Hall High School, Gainesville, Georgia
Wright State University
College of New Jersey
Buffalo State College
George Mason University

- |                      |                                     |                       |  |
|----------------------|-------------------------------------|-----------------------|--|
| Richard Layman       | Brucoli Clark Layman         | Matthew Boehm         | University of South Carolina    |
| Richard Lingeman     | New York, New York           | Marshall Boswell      | Rhodes College                  |
| Greta Little         | University of South Carolina | Casey Boyle           | University of South Carolina    |
| Michael MacBride     | Minnesota State University   | Jennifer Brady        | Rhodes College                  |
| Martin J. Manning    | Washington, D.C.             | Matthew J. Brucoli    | University of South Carolina    |
| Brian McAllister     | Albany State University      | Park Bucker           | University of South Carolina    |
| Crystal McCage       | Hudson College               |                       | Sumter                          |
| Patrick Meanor       | State University of New York | Jeremey Cagle         | University of South Carolina    |
|                      | College at Oneonta           | Darien Cavanaugh      | University of South Carolina    |
| Christopher Metress  | Samford University           | Kirk Curnutt          | Troy University                 |
| Michael J. Meyer     | De Paul University;          | John Cusatis          | School of the Arts, Charleston, |
|                      | Northeastern Illinois        |                       | South Carolina                  |
|                      | University                   | Michael Edelson       | Long Island, New York           |
| Robert F. Moss       | Charleston, South Carolina   | Jonathan Elmore       | University of South Carolina    |
| Josephine Owens      | San Francisco, California    | James Fisher          | University of North Carolina    |
| John B. Padgett      | Brevard College              |                       | at Greensboro                   |
| Jessica G. Rabin     | Anne Arundel Community       | Wanda H. Giles        | Northern Illinois University    |
|                      | College                      | James A. Grimshaw Jr. | Texas A&amp;M University–       |
| Ben Railton          | Fitchburg State College      |                       | Commerce                        |
| Richard J. Schrader  | Boston College               | Todd Hagstette        | University of South Carolina    |
| Michael Schroeder    | Savannah State University    | Brooke Horvath        | Kent State University           |
| Lori Shores          | Minnesota State University   | Meeghan Kane          | University of South Carolina    |
| Noel Sloboda         | Penn State University York   | Lincoln Konkle        | College of New Jersey           |
| Paul Sorrentino      | Virginia Tech                | Marvin La Hood        | Buffalo State College           |
| Elizabeth Spies      | University of California,    | Richard Layman        | Brucoli Clark Layman            |
|                      | Riverside                    | Elizabeth Leverton    | Columbia, South Carolina        |
| Graham Stowe         | University of South Carolina | Abigail Lundelius     | University of South Carolina    |
| Christopher Sutch    | George Mason University      | Jonathan Maricle      | University of South Carolina    |
| Skye L. Suttie       | Clemson University           | Tod Marshall          | Gonzaga University              |
| Paul Kareem Tayyar   | University of California,    | Robert F. Moss        | Charleston, South Carolina      |
|                      | Riverside                    | Paul Plisiewicz       | University of South Carolina    |
| Stephanie Todd       | University of South Carolina | Brian Ray             | University of South Carolina    |
| Steven Trout         | Fort Hays State University   | Amber Shaw            | University of Georgia           |
| Darlene Harbor Unrue | University of Nevada         | Matthew Shipe         | Washington University–          |
|                      | Las Vegas                    |                       | St. Louis                       |
| John C. Unrue        | University of Nevada         | Lori Shores           | Minnesota State University      |
|                      | Las Vegas                    | Jonathan Sircy        | University of South Carolina    |
| John Wargacki        | Seton Hall University        | Paul Kareem Tayyar    | University of California,       |
| Genevieve West       | Ferris State University      |                       | Riverside                       |
| Grace Wetzell        | University of South Carolina | Anna Teekell          | Washington University–          |
| R. John Williams     | Irvine Valley College        |                       | St. Louis                       |
| Seongho Yoon         | University of Massachusetts  | Britt Terry           | University of South Carolina    |
| Patricia A. Young    | Western Illinois University  | John C. Unrue         | University of Nevada Las Vegas  |